4. In opposition to the high claims of the bishops of Rome as Peter's successors, I observe, that they cannot prove, by good historical evidence, Peter's having ever been a bishop of the church at Rome; consequently they cannot be his successors in a see which he never filled. It is true, to prove that Peter was the first bishop of the church at Rome, the following testimonies from the fathers are appealed to by the Papists:—Irenæus, who was bishop of Lyons in Gaul, and who flourished about the year 178, tells us, "that Linus was made bishop of Rome by Peter and Paul, and after him Anacletus, and the third Clemens." Tertullian, who flourished about the year 200, saith, "Clemens was the first bishop of Rome after Peter." See Fulke's note on Rom. xvi. 16. in his edition of the Rhemish New Testament.—Eusebius, who flourished about the year 315, in his E. Hist. b. 3. c. 2. without hinting that either Paul or Peter were bishops of Rome, thus writeth: "After the martyrdom of Paul and Peter, Linus first obtained the episcopate of the church of the Romans.—Of him, Paul writing to Timothy, makes mention in the salutation in the end of the epistle, saying, Eubulus, and Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia, salute thee." The same Eusebius saith, Peter was the first bishop of Antioch. E. Hist. b. 3. c. 36. "At the same time flourished Ignatius, who is still highly honoured, being the second in the succession of the church of Antioch after Peter." But in chap. 22. of the same book Eusebius saith, "Euodius having been the first bishop of Antioch, Ignatius succeeded him."—Jerome, who flourished about the year 392, saith, "Peter sat at Rome 25 years, until the last year of Nero." If so, Peter came to Rome in the second or third of Claudius, and from that time forth had his ordinary residence among the Christians in Rome, as their bishop, till his death. Yet the same Jerome, in his book of illustrious men, chap. 16. calleth "Ignatius the third bishop of the church of Antioch after the apostle Peter."—Damasus, who was himself a bishop of Rome, and contemporary with Jerome, saith, "Peter came to Rome in the beginning of Nero's reign, and sat there 25 years." But as Nero reigned only 14 years, if the testimony of Damasus is to be credited, we must believe that Peter survived Nero 11 years, and was not put to death by him; contrary to ancient tradition, which represents Paul and Peter as put to death at one time by Nero.—Origen, who flourished about the year 230, speaks of Peter as the bishop of Antioch; for in his sixth homily on Luke he thus expresses himself, "I have observed it elegantly written in an epistle of a martyr, Ignatius, second bishop of Antioch after Peter," &c.—Lastly, according to Epiphanius, Peter and Paul were both of them bishops of Rome. See Fulke's note on Philip. iv. 3.

The reports of the ancients concerning Peter's being the first bishop of Rome being so different and so inconsistent, it is a proof that these reports were not founded on any certain tradition, far less on any written evidence; but took their rise, in all probability, from the bishops of Rome themselves, who very early attempted to raise themselves above all other bishops; and for that purpose spake of themselves as Peter's successors in the see of Rome: And because, in the third and fourth centuries, when religious controversies were carried to a great height, and the churchmen who were put out of their places generally fled for redress to the bishops of Rome, it was natural for the oppressed to advance the power of their protectors, by readily admitting all the claims which they set up as Peter's successors. Nay, some of them may, from flattery, have invented the strange story of Peter's having sat as the bishop of Rome 25 years; notwithstanding, according to the ancient tradition already mentioned, he was the first bishop of Antioch. But the improbability of Peter's having resided in Rome, as bishop of the church there, for so many years, will appear from the following well known facts.—Paul's epistle to the Romans was written A. D. 57 or 58, that is, in the third or fourth year of Nero, when, according to Jerome, Peter had acted as bishop of the church at Rome full 15 years. Now in that epistle, although many salutations were sent to persons of inferior note, no salutation was sent to Peter. This I think could not have happened, if Peter had been then residing in the church at Rome as its bishop. See Heb. xiii. 24.—In the letters which Paul wrote from Rome, during his first imprisonment, which lasted more than two years, he made no mention of Peter, not even in his letter to the Colossians, chap. iv. 10, 11. where he recites the names of 'all the brethren of the circumcision, who were his fellow-labourers in the kingdom of God.' Is not this a strong presumption that Peter did not then reside in Rome as its bishop?—Towards the end of Paul's second imprisonment, he thus wrote to Timothy, 'At my first answer no one appeared with me, but all forsook me. May it not be laid to their charge?' If Peter then resided at Rome, as bishop of the church there, is it to be thought that he would have forsaken his brother apostle on so trying an occasion, when the testimony of Jesus was to be maintained before the emperor, or his prefect?—Lastly, is it probable that Paul, who never had been at Rome, and was personally unknown to most of the brethren there, would have written to them so long a letter to instruct them in the true doctrine of the gospel, and to compose the dissensions which had taken place among them, if Peter had resided among them, and instructed them as their bishop, during the space of 25 years? Besides, would Paul, who, in his epistle to the Hebrews, hath so often mentioned the apostles, under the denomination of their rulers, have omitted, in his epistle to the Romans, to mention Peter, if he had been residing among them as their bishop at the time it was written?

Since, then, the most ancient Christian fathers, Tertullian excepted, mention Peter as the first bishop of Antioch; and since the testimonies concerning his being the first bishop of Rome are of a later date, and are in themselves not only different but inconsistent; also, since there are such strong presumptions in Paul's epistles, that Peter did not reside in Rome during Paul's lifetime, there is good reason to think that he never was bishop of the church at Rome. But if Peter never was bishop of Rome, the claim of the bishops of that church to be his successors in an office which he never held, is ridiculous. Wherefore, although it were true that the powers promised to Peter were promised, not only to him as the bishop of a particular church, but also to his successors in that episcopate, the bishops of Antioch, as his succe-sors, would have a better title to these powers than the bishops of Rome.

If any more arguments were necessary to refute the extravagant claims of the bishops of Rome to infallibility in doctrine and discipline, the following well-known facts might be mentioned as absolutely decisive. Different bishops of Rome, in different ages, have directly contradicted each other in their decisions concerning doctrine, as well as concerning discipline. The same may be said of councils, both general and particular, where the bishops of Rome have presided, either in person or by their legates. Where, then, is the so much vaunted infallibility of the bishops of Rome? And where the infallibility of councils, on which so much stress hath been laid both in ancient and modern times?

From the foregoing facts and reasonings it appears, that the church of Rome is not 'the church of the living God, which is the pillar and support of the truth,' exclusively of all other Christian churches. Far less is it 'the pillar and support of the truth,' by virtue of any infallibility which its bishops possess as Peter's successors in the bishoprick of Rome. The honour of supporting the truth, as shall be shewed immediately, belongs to no particular church whatever, but to the Catholic church, consisting of all the churches of God which have existed from the beginning, and which are to exist to the end of the world.—Farther, it appears that the bishops of Rome have no just title to supreme authority over all the churches of Christ, as successors to the apostle Peter; because there is no certain evidence that he preceded them in the bishoprick of Rome.—To conclude, the claim of the bishops of Rome to infallibility and supreme authority in the Catholic church, which they have founded on a fact so destitute of evidence as Peter's having been the bishop of Rome during 25 years, ought to be strenuously resisted by the whole Christian world, as subversive of the liberty wherewith Christ hath made mankind free in all religious matters.

II. The futility of the claim of the church of Rome to be 'the pillar and support of the truth,' will appear still more clearly, if we consider what the truth is, of which the church of the living God is the pillar and support.

The truth which is supported by the church of the living God, as by a pillar placed on a firm foundation, is not any particular system of doctrine expressed in words of human invention, such as the symbols of faith, which, both in ancient and modern times, have been composed by convocations of the clergy, assembled in councils, whether general or particular, under the patronage of the civil powers. But the truth which is supported by the church of the living God, is that scheme of true religion, consisting of the doctrines, precepts, and promises, which God hath made known to mankind by revelation; and which having been consigned to writing by the apostles and prophets, to whom it was revealed by the Spirit, their gospels and epistles contain the truth, expressed in that 'form of sound words,' which the apostle Paul commanded Timothy 'to hold fast,' 2 Tim. i. 13.

Agreeably to this account of the truth, the gospel revelation is called the truth in the following passages of scripture—Gal. iii. 1. v. 7. Eph. i. 13. 2 Thess. ii. 10. 12. 1 Tim. ii. 4. vi. 5. 2 Tim. ii. 15. 18. Tit. i. 1. and elsewhere.—The inspired writers having so often called the gospel revelation the truth, it can hardly be doubted, that when the apostle Paul, in his first epistle to Timothy, gave to the church of the living God the honourable appellation of 'the pillar and support of the truth,' he meant to tell him, that the Catholic church, by preserving in their original integrity the inspired writings of the evangelists and apostles, and of Moses and the prophets, which contain the revelations of God from first to last, have supported or preserved the truth in the world. For all the revelations of God to mankind being exhibited, in an infallible manner, in these writings preserved by the church, if any errors, either in faith or practice, are attempted to be introduced by false teachers, or by men covetous of power or of riches, they may be detected and refuted, not by appealing to the decrees of councils, and to the creeds of particular churches, but to the divinely inspired scriptures, fairly interpreted according to the plain unconstrained meaning of the passages which relate to these subjects, taken in connexion with the context where they are found.

Thus it appears, that 'the universal church of the living God,' by preserving the scriptures in their original integrity, in which the whole revelations of God are contained, hath not only secured the truth of revelation itself from being shaken by the attempts of infidels to overthrow it, but hath prevented its doctrines, precepts, and promises, from being corrupted by false teachers and worldly men, who endeavour to make gain of godliness. Moreover, by handing down the scriptures from age to age in their genuine purity, the Catholic church hath prevented the revelations of God from being lost. And by so doing, 'the church of the living God' hath actually become 'the pillar and support of the truth;' because, if the scriptures had either been corrupted or lost, the revelations of God, which are the truth, would have been corrupted or lost together with them.

III. It remains to shew in what way the divinely inspired scriptures, which contain the gospel revelation which is the truth, have been preserved in their original integrity by the church of the living God.

Some of the writings of the New Testament were inscribed and sent to particular churches; such as Paul's epistles to the Thessalonians, the Corinthians, the Romans, the Ephesians, and the Colossians. Others of them were written and sent to particular persons; such as his epistles to Timothy, Titus, and Philemon; and John's epistles to Gaius, and the Elect Lady. Others of them were inscribed and sent to persons professing the Christian faith, who were scattered through widely extended and distant countries; such as Paul's epistles to the churches of Galatia, and to the Hebrews; Peter's two epistles to the strangers dispersed through Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia; and the epistle of James to the twelve tribes scattered abroad. These writings, though sent to particular churches and persons, were not intended for their use alone, but for the use of the whole community of Christians every-where. It is therefore reasonable to believe, that while the particular churches and persons to whom the apostles sent their epistles, preserved the originals with the greatest care, they would transcribe them, not only for the use of their own members, but for the use of their brethren in other churches, to whom, no doubt, they sent these transcripts, that they might have an opportunity of taking copies of them, and of dispersing them for general edification. Moreover, as in the first age the disciples of Christ were very zealous in spreading the knowledge of their religion, we may believe that into whatever country they travelled for the purpose of preaching Christ, they carried with them such of the sacred writings as were in their possession, that their converts might take copies of them to be used in their public assemblies for worship, and by themselves in private. Thus, copies of the gospels and epistles were in a short time carried into all the provinces of the Roman empire, and even beyond the bounds of the empire, where the gospel was introduced. And these writings being considered by the disciples of Christ as their most precious treasure, the copies of them were preserved with much more care, and were multiplied to a far greater degree, than the copies of any other book extant at that time: insomuch, that there is no heathen writing existing, of which there are so many ancient MS. copies remaining, as of the writings which compose the canon of the New Testament.

Of those ancient MSS. of the New Testament which still remain, some are found in the libraries of princes, universities, and monasteries, and some have been brought into Europe from different and distant parts of the world. These, added to the former, have considerably increased the number of the ancient copies of the scriptures; so that the learned of this and the preceding ages have had an opportunity of examining and comparing many very ancient copies, both of the whole New Testament, and of particular parts thereof. Accordingly, these learned men have, with incredible labour, faithfully collected all the various readings of the copies which they collated, and have found, that although in number these readings amount to many thousands, the greatest part of them make no material alteration in the sense of the passages where they are found. And with respect to those which alter the sense of particular passages, the same learned men, by that critical skill for which they were famed, have been able in most instances, with a good degree of certainty, to fix upon the genuine readings of all the doubtful passages.

Every one, however, must be sensible, that if the scriptures had come down to us only in the copies preserved in any one church of the living God, and we had been restrained from consulting the copies preserved elsewhere, as we must have been if the scriptures had been entrusted to a particular church, the errors unavoidably occasioned by the carelessness of transcribers, and by other causes, could not in many instances have been corrected, unless by the uncertain conjectures of critics, which, in writings divinely inspired, would have been of no authority. Whereas, by consulting copies of the scriptures found in different and distant parts of the world, the faulty readings of one copy have been happily corrected by the concurring better readings of other copies, confirmed by the readings preserved in the ancient translations of the scriptures still remaining; so that we have the text of the gospels and epistles as it was originally written by their inspired authors, or nearly so.—The world, therefore, being indebted for the preservation of the scriptures, not to any one church of the living God, but to the whole community of the churches of Christ, each having contributed its share by the copies which it hath preserved, the universal church, and not any particular church, is 'the church of the living God,' which, by preserving the scriptures, hath become in very deed 'the pillar and support of the truth.' See 1 Tim. vi. 20. note 1.

The same reasoning will apply to the ancient oracles of God, which were delivered to the Jews to be kept. For, by carefully preserving the Hebrew scriptures, in which the former revelations are recorded, and by handing them down from age to age uncorrupted, notwithstanding in their disputes with us Christians they had many temptations to corrupt them, 'the church of the living God' among the Jews was to them, as the Christian church is to us, the pillar and support of the truth.

Here, however, it is to be carefully observed, that although the church of the living God hath supported the truth, by preserving the scriptures in which it is contained, neither the truth itself, nor the writings in which it is contained, derive any part of their authority from the Catholic church. The truth derives its authority from the inspiration by which it was made known to the evangelists and apostles; and the copies of the scriptures in our possession, which contain the truth or revelations of God, derive their authority, not from the church, but from their being materially the same with those written by the inspired penmen. And of this we are assured, in the same manner that we are assured of the genuineness of the writings of other ancient authors. Only the proofs in behalf of the authenticity of the scriptures, arising from the ancient copies of these writings in our possession, are more in number, and of greater weight, than the proofs which can be produced in behalf of the authenticity of any other ancient writing whatever.

CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

ST. PAUL began this epistle with asserting his apostolical dignity, not because Timothy was in any doubt concerning it, but to make the Ephesians sensible of the danger they incurred, if they rejected the charges and admonitions, which, by the commandment of God and of Christ, the apostle ordered Timothy to deliver to them, ver. 1, 2.—Next, to establish Timothy's authority with the Ephesians as an evangelist, he renewed the commission he had given him at parting; namely, to charge some who had assumed the office of teachers, not to teach differently from the apostles, ver. 3.—and, in particular, not to draw the attention of the people to those fables which the Jewish doctors had invented to make men rely on the ritual services of the law for procuring the favour of God, notwithstanding they were utterly negligent of the duties of morality; neither to lay any stress on those endless genealogies whereby individuals traced their pedigree from Abraham, in the persuasion that, to secure their salvation, nothing was necessary but to be rightly descended from him; an error which the Baptist, long before, had expressly condemned: Luke iii. 8. 'Begin not to say within yourselves, we have Abraham to our father,' ver. 4.—This kind of doctrine the apostle termed vain babbling, because it had no foundation in truth, and made men negligent both of piety and charity, ver. 5, 6.—Farther, because in recommending these fables and genealogies, the Judaizers pretended they were teaching the law of Moses, the apostle assured Timothy they were utterly ignorant of that law, ver. 7.—which he acknowledged to be a good institution, provided it was used lawfully; that is, agreeably to its true nature, ver. 8.—

whereas the Jews perverted the law, when they taught that it made a real atonement for sin by its sacrifices; for the law was not given to justify the Jews, but by temporal punishments to restrain them from those crimes which are inconsistent with the well-being of society; so that the law of Moses, being a mere political institution, was no rule of justification to any person, ver. 9, 10.—This account of the law, Paul told Timothy, was agreeable to the representation given of it in the gospel, with the preaching of which he was entrusted, ver. 11.—an honour he was exceedingly thankful for, because formerly he had been a persecutor of the disciples of Christ, ver. 12, 13.—But he had received mercy, for this cause, that in him Jesus Christ might shew to future ages such an example of pardon, as should encourage the greatest sinners to hope for mercy on repentance, ver. 16.—Then, in a solemn doxology, he celebrated the praise of God in a sublime strain, ver. 17.—And that Timothy might be animated to surmount the danger and difficulty of the work assigned to him, the apostle informed him, that he had committed it to him by prophecy; that is, by special impulse of the Spirit of God; and from that consideration urged him to carry on strenuously the good warfare against the false teachers, ver. 18.—by always holding the truth with a good conscience; which some teachers having put away, had made shipwreck of themselves and of the gospel, ver. 19.—Of this sort were Hymeneus and Alexander, two noted Judaizing teachers, whom the apostle, after his departure from Ephesus, had delivered to Satan, that they might learn no more to blaspheme, ver. 20.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. I.—1 Paul an apostle of Jesus Christ, by the commandment¹ of God our Saviour,² and of the Lord Jesus Christ our hope;³

2 To Timothy, *my genuine son*¹ in the faith; (χαρις) grace, (οικτιρησις) mercy, and (εὐνομία) peace,² from God our Father, and Christ Jesus our Lord.

3 As I entreated¹ thee to continue in Ephesus, when going into Macedonia, so do,² that thou mayest charge some³ not to teach differently.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. I.—1. I Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, write this epistle by the commandment of God, the contriver of our salvation, and of the Lord Jesus Christ, on whose death, and not on the sacrifices of the law, our hope of eternal life is founded;

2 To Timothy, who is my genuine son in the faith, being like minded with myself: May gracious assistances, merciful deliverances, such as I have often obtained, and inward peace from God our Father, and from Christ Jesus our Lord, be multiplied to thee.

3 As I entreated thee to continue in Ephesus, when I was going into Macedonia, I now, by the commandment of God, require thee so to do; that thou mayest charge the Judaizers not to teach differently from the inspired apostles of Christ;

Ver. 1.—1. By the commandment of God.]—This clause, if joined with what goes before, signifies that Paul was made an apostle by the commandment of God and of Christ. See Tit. i. 3. note 1. But joined with what follows, the meaning is, that he wrote this epistle to Timothy by the commandment of God and of Christ. This construction I have adopted as most suitable to the apostle's design:—1. Because when Timothy charged the teachers, and exhorted the people, and ordered the whole affairs of the church of Ephesus, it was of great importance that the Ephesians should know, that in all these matters he followed the commandment of God and Christ, delivered to him by the apostle: 2. Because Paul was made an apostle, not by the commandment of Christ, but by Christ himself, Acts xxvii. 16.—13.

2. Our Saviour.]—This title is given to God in other passages, 1 Tim. ii. 3. iv. 10. Tit. iii. 4. Jude ver. 25. because he contrived the method of our salvation, and sent his Son into the world to accomplish it, John iii. 16.

3. Our hope.]—The apostle hoped for salvation, not through the sacrifices of the law, as the Judaizers did, but through the atonement for sin made by the death of Christ.

Ver. 2.—1. Timothy my genuine son.]—See Titus, chap. i. 4. Illustration. Some think the apostle called Timothy his son, for the same reason that the disciples of the prophets were called the sons of the prophets. But I rather suppose he called Timothy his son, because he had converted him, and thereby conveyed to him a new nature. We have the same phraseology, Philen. ver. 10. 'my son Onesimus, whom I begat in my bonds.' 1 Cor. iv. 15. 'To Christ Jesus, by the gospel, I have begotten you.'—Perhaps also the apostle called Timothy his genuine son, on account of his age, and because he resembled him in the disposition of his mind, his faith, his love, and his zeal in spreading the gospel.

2. Grace, mercy, and peace.]—To the churches, and to Philemon, the benediction is, 'Grace and peace.' But to Timothy and Titus, who were exposed to great dangers in discharging their office, the apostle wished mercy likewise; which therefore may mean merciful deliverances from dangers and enemies.

Ver. 3.—1. As I entreated thee.]—Beza observes, that by using the soft expression, ἐνέειπεν εἰ, I entreated thee, the apostle hath left a singular example of modesty, to be imitated by superiors, in their behaviour towards their inferiors in the church.

2. So do.]—At the time the apostle wrote this letter, the absolute necessity of Timothy's presence in Ephesus having been made known to him, perhaps by revelation, he turned his former request into a command.

3. That thou mayest charge some not to teach differently.]—These teachers seem to have been Judaizers, and members of the church at Ephesus. For with other teachers Timothy could have little influence. In not mentioning the names of these corrupt teachers,

4 Nor to give heed to fables¹ and endless genealogies,² which occasion (ἔκκειναι) disputes, rather than great edification,³ which is (αἰ, 167.) through faith.

5 Now, (το τέλος τῆς παραγγελίας, ver. 3.) the end of the charge⁴ is love from a pure heart, and a good conscience, and unfeigned faith;⁵

6 From which things some having swerved,¹ have turned aside to foolish talking; (see 1 Tim. vi. 20. 2 Tim. ii. 14.)

7 Desiring to be teachers of the law,¹ though they neither understand what they say, nor (ἀγνοοῦν) concerning what things they strongly affirm.

8 We know indeed that the law is good, if one use it lawfully.

9 Knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous¹ man, but for the lawless and disorderly, the ungodly and sinners, the unholy and profane, murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, manslayers,

10 Fornicators, sodomites, man-stealers,¹ liars, false swearers, and if any other thing be opposite to wholesome doctrine;²

11 According to the glorious¹ gospel of the blessed God,² with which I am entrusted.

12 (Καί, 204.) Now I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, who hath strengthened¹ me, because he reckoned me faithful when he appointed me to the ministry;

13 Who was formerly a defamer, and a persecutor, and an injurious person. But I received mercy, because I acted ignorantly in unbelief.¹

4 Nor to inculcate fabulous traditions, invented to prove that men cannot be saved unless they obey the law of Moses; and uncertain genealogies, by which every Jew endeavours to trace his descent from Abraham, and which by their uncertainty occasion disputes, rather than the great edification which is through a right faith only.

5 Now the scope of the charge to be given by these to these teachers is, that, instead of inculcating fables and genealogies, they inculcate love to God and man, proceeding from a pure heart, and directed by a good conscience, and nourished by unfeigned faith in the gospel doctrine:

6 From which things some teachers having swerved, have in their discourses turned aside to foolish talking; talking which serves no purpose but to discover their own folly, and to nourish folly in their disciples:

7 As thou mayest know by this, that they set themselves up as teachers of the law of Moses, though they understand neither what they themselves say concerning it, nor the nature of the law which they establish.

8 I acknowledge indeed that the law of Moses is an excellent institution, if one use it agreeably to the end for which it was given.

9 Now we know this, that the law is not made for justifying a righteous man, but for condemning and punishing the lawless (see 1 John iii. 4. note 2.) and disorderly, namely, atheists and idolaters; persons polluted with vice, and who are excluded from things sacred, murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, those who slay others unjustly;

10 Fornicators and sodomites, man-stealers, liars, those who perjure themselves; and if any other practice be opposite to the doctrine which preserves the soul in health, the law was made to restrain and punish it.

11 This view of the law I give according to the glorious gospel of the infinitely and independently blessed God, with the preaching of which I am entrusted.

12 Now I thank Christ Jesus our Lord, who strengthened me for preaching it, by bestowing on me the gifts of inspiration and miracles, because he knew that I would be faithful to my trust, when he appointed me to the apostleship;

13 Who was formerly a defamer of him and of his doctrine, and a persecutor of his disciples, and an injurious person in my behaviour towards them. But I received pardon, (ver. 16.), because I acted from ignorance, being in a state of unbelief, and fancying that I was doing God service.

the apostle shewed great delicacy, hoping that they might still be reclaimed. The same delicacy he had observed in his treatment of the false teacher at Corinth, and of the incestuous person there.

Ver. 4.—1. Nor to give heed to fables.—These are called, Tit. i. 14. 'Jewish fables,' because they were invented by the Jewish doctors to recommend the institutions of Moses.

2. And endless genealogies.—Though the Jews were all, excepting the proselytes, descended from Abraham, the genealogies by which many of them pretended to derive their pedigree from him, could not with certainty be showed to end in him; for which reason the apostle termed them ἀεὶ κεινὰς, endless. See Tit. iii. 9. note 1.

3. Great edification.—So the phrase ἐκδοκιμασθὲν θεῷ properly signifies, being the Hebrew superlative.—Mill affirms that all the ancient MSS., without exception, read here ἀποδοκιμασθὲν θεῷ, 'rather than the dispensation of God which is by faith;' the Christian dispensation. But I have followed the reading of the common edition adopted by the English translators, as it gives a good sense of the passage.

Ver. 5.—1. Now the scope of the charge.—The word παραγγελία denotes a message or order brought to one from another, and delivered by word of mouth. The charge here meant, is that which the apostle ordered Timothy to deliver to the teachers in Ephesus. For he had said, ver. 3. 'I entreated thee to remain, &c. So do, (ἵνα παραγγέλλω) that thou mayest charge some.' Here he told him what the scope of his charge was to be. See ver. 18. Others think παραγγελία here signifies the gospel. But I do not remember that this word has that sense any where in scripture.

2. Unfeigned faith.—According to Benson, the apostle in this expression had those Judaizing teachers in his eye, who, to gain the unbelieving Jews, taught doctrines which they knew to be false; so that their faith in these doctrines was feigned.

Ver. 6. From which things some have swerved.—The verb ἀποστρέφω, as Theophylact observes, signifies to err from the mark at which one shoots; and is elegantly used in this place, as τάλως was introduced in the preceding verse.

Ver. 7. Teachers of the law.—Νομοδιδασκαλός properly signifies a doctor of the law, and is of the same import with the Hebrew word Rabbī.

Ver. 9. Is not made for a righteous man, &c.—The law of Moses being given as a rule of life to the good as well as the bad, the apostle's meaning doubtless is, that it was given, not for the purpose of justifying the most righteous man that ever lived, but for restraining the wicked by its threatenings and punishments. This will appear still more clearly, if the doctrine of the Judaizers is considered. They affirmed, that obedience to the law of Moses was the only way in which men could be saved; understanding by obedience one's doing the things which that law enjoined; or, in case of failure, his having recourse to the atonement which it prescribed for the offence. But to overturn this corrupt doctrine, the apostle here declared, that the law of Moses was not given for the purpose of justifying any man, not even the righteous, but merely for restraining the lawless and disorderly by its threatenings and punishments; so that it was not a religious institution, but a mere municipal law, whereby God, as king of the Jews, governed them in Canaan as his people or subjects. It is thought by some, that in the catalogue of sinners given in this and in the following verse, the apostle had the ten commandments in his eye.

Ver. 10.—1. Man-stealers.—They who make war for the inhuman purpose of selling the vanquished as slaves, as is the practice of the African princes, are really man-stealers. And they who, like the African traders, encourage that unchristian traffic by purchasing the slaves whom they know to be thus unjustly acquired, are partakers in their crime.

2. Wholesome doctrine.—According to the apostle, wholesome doctrine is that which condemns wicked practices. And on the other hand, the doctrine which encourages men to sin, or which makes them easy under sin, is in the apostle's estimation unwholesome.

Ver. 11.—1. Glorious gospel.—The gospel is called glorious, because in it the light of true doctrine shines brightly.

2. Of the blessed God.—The epithet of blessed is given to God, because being infinitely and independently happy in himself, he stands in no need of any of his creatures to make him happy.

Ver. 12. Who hath strengthened me.—Before his ascension, Christ promised the spiritual gifts to his apostles under the name of δυνάμεις, 'power or strength from on high.' Acts i. 8. Hence the spiritual gifts are termed, 2 Cor. xii. 9. ἡ δύναμις τοῦ Χριστοῦ, 'the power or strength of Christ.' Wherefore the phrase in this verse, ἐνδυναμωσάντων με, 'who hath strengthened or empowered me,' means, who hath bestowed on me inspiration and miraculous power, to fit me for being an apostle.

Ver. 13. I acted ignorantly in unbelief.—In the instance of Paul, we see how much guilt a man, who is not at pains to inform him self, may through ignorance contract, without going contrary to his conscience. At the time Paul was doing things which, after he became an apostle, made him call himself the chief of sinners, he was 'touching the law blameless,' and thought that, in persecuting the Christians, he was doing God service.

Ver. 14.—1. And the grace of our Lord.]—Some are of opinion, that χάρις here, as 1 Cor. xv. 10. is used in the sense of χάρισμα, so that the translation might run, 'And the spiritual gift of our Lord hath superabounded,' &c. But this makes no difference in the sense of the passage, since the miraculous gifts with which he was endowed were the effects of Christ's goodness to him.

2. Hath superabounded in me with faith and love.]—By faith the apostle means, such a just notion of the power and wisdom of God as led him to see, that God neither needs nor requires his servants to promote his cause by persecution, or any cruelty whatever.—By love, he means such benevolence as disposed him to allow all men the exercise of the right, which he himself claimed, of judging for himself in matters of religion. In these virtues, the apostle was very deficient before his conversion; but, after it, they superabounded in him.

Ver. 15.—1. This saying is true.]—Πάντα ἀληθές. The word πάντα signifies believing as well as faithful, Gal. iii. 9. note. But these being the attributes of a person, cannot be applied to a saying or doctrine. Wherefore the proper translation of the word in this verse is, credible, true.

2. Sinners, of whom I am chief.]—The apostle did not mean, that he was absolutely the greatest of all sinners, but the greatest of those who sin through ignorance; as is plain from ver. 13. And he spake in this manner concerning himself, to shew the deep sense he had of his sin in reviling Christ, and persecuting his disciples; and that he judged charitably of the sins of other men, and of their extenuations.—Farther, he does not say, of whom I was, but of whom I am the chief, even after he had altered his conduct. By this manner of speaking the apostle hath taught us, that a sinner, after reformation, is still guilty of the sins he hath committed; that in pardoning him God considers him as guilty; and that till he is actually pardoned at the judgment, he ought to consider himself in the same light. Wherefore, like the apostle, notwithstanding we have repented, we ought often to recollect our sins, to keep ourselves humble, and to increase our thankfulness to God for having delivered us from their power, as well as for giving us the hope of pardon.

Ver. 16.—1. That in me the chief of sinners.]—Here τὸν μέγιστον ἁμαρτωλὸν answers to ὁ πρῶτος ἁμαρτωλός in ver. 15. And therefore, the words of sinners, are fitly supplied in this place. Some, however, think πρῶτος, in both places, should be translated the first, supposing the apostle's meaning to be, That he was the first blasphemer and persecutor of the Christians, since the effusion of the Spirit, who had obtained mercy. But this opinion is contrary to Acts ii. 33—41. vi. 7.

2. For a pattern.]—The word πρότυπον denotes a pattern made by impression; being derived from τυπός, which signifies a mark made by impression or striking, John x. 28.—For more concerning ὑποτύπωσις, see 2 Tim. i. 13. note 1. and concerning τυπός; see 1 Pet. iii. 21. note 2.

3. To them who should hereafter believe.]—The original of this

14 And in thus pardoning me, and making me his apostle, the goodness of our Lord hath superabounded towards me, accompanied with the faith and love which is required by Christ Jesus, but in which I was greatly deficient formerly.

15 This saying is true, and worthy of cordial and universal reception, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom, on account of my rage against Christ and his disciples, I reckon myself the chief; I mean of those who have sinned through ignorance.

16 However, though my sin was great, for this cause I received pardon, that in me, the chief of those who sin through ignorance, Jesus Christ might shew forth the greatest clemency in forgiving offenders, for an example of mercy to encourage them who should in future ages repent and believe on him, in order to obtain ever lasting life.

17 Now, ravished with the goodness of God, in making me an example of pardon for the encouragement of future penitents, I say, To the Ruler of the ages, who is immortal and invisible, to the wise God alone, be honour and glory, for ever and ever. Amen.

18 This charge to the Judaizers, not to teach differently, I commit to thee, son Timothy, to deliver to them; and I do it agreeably to the revelations which were before made to me concerning thee, and which I now mention, that through the recollection of these revelations, and of the honour which was done thee by them, thou mayest strenuously carry on the good warfare against the enemies of truth in Ephesus.

19 In carrying on this warfare, hold fast the true faith, and at the same time a good conscience, using no improper methods in spreading the gospel; which faith and good conscience some teachers having put away from worldly motives, with respect to the faith have made shipwreck; they have corrupted the gospel, and destroyed their own souls.

20 Of whom are the two Judaizing teachers Hymeneus and Alexander, whom, for their obstinately persisting wilfully to corrupt passage may be supplied and translated as follows, 'for a pattern of the pardon of them who should hereafter believe.' And it must be acknowledged, that no example could be more proper, to encourage the greatest sinners in every age to repent, than the pardon which Christ granted to one who had so furiously persecuted his church.

Ver. 17.—1. Now to the King eternal.]—Perhaps τῷ βασιλεὶ τῶν αἰώνων may be better translated, to the King of the ages, namely, the age before the law, the age under the law, and the age under the Messiah. According to this translation, which is perfectly literal, the apostle's meaning is, To him who hath governed the three dispensations under which mankind have lived, so as to make them co-operate to the same great end, the pardoning of sinners, and who is immortal, &c. be honour and glory for ever ascribed by angels and men.

2. Immortal.]—Ἀβυσσος signifies incorruptible. But it is rightly translated immortal, because what is incorruptible is likewise immortal.

3. Invisible.]—By this epithet the true God is distinguished from the heathen deities, who, being all of them corporeal, were visible. Bengelius supposes this epithet was given to God, to shew the folly of those who will not acknowledge God, because he is not the object of their senses.

4. To the wise God alone.]—See this translation supported, Rom. xvi. 27. note 1.—The Alexandrian and Clermont MSS., the Syriac, Vulgate, and other ancient versions, with some of the fathers and Greek commentators, omit the word ὁ σοφός, on which account, Eusebius and Mill are of opinion, that it was inserted from Rom. xvi. 27. In this doxology the apostle contrasted the perfections of the true God, with the properties of the false gods of the heathens.

Ver. 18.—1. According to the prophecies which went before concerning thee.]—In the apostolical age, some were pointed out by revelation, as persons fit to be invested with particular offices in the church. In that manner Paul and Barnabas were separated to the work of preaching to the Gentiles, Acts xiii. 2.; so also the elders of Ephesus were made bishops by the Holy Ghost, Acts xx. 28. Timothy likewise was appointed an evangelist by revelation. But where persons had professed the gospel for a considerable time, and had given proof of their constancy, good disposition and ability, an immediate designation of the Holy Ghost was not necessary to their being made bishops and deacons, because their fitness for these offices might be known by the ordinary rules of prudence. Accordingly, when the apostle ordered Titus and Timothy to ordain persons to these offices, he directed them to ordain those only who were possessed of the qualifications which he described.—Others, by τὰς προφητείας, prophecies, understand the prophetic gifts bestowed on Timothy to fit him for the ministry.

2. Mayest carry on through them the good warfare.]—Ruling the church of Ephesus was called a warfare, because Timothy had many enemies to fight against; and in the contest was to endure continual labour, watching, and danger. Hence Timothy is called 'a good soldier of Jesus Christ,' 2 Tim. ii. 3.

Ver. 19. Made shipwreck.]—In this metaphorical passage the apostle insinuates, that a good conscience is the pilot who must guide us in our voyage through the stormy sea of this life, into the harbour of heaven.

whom I have delivered to Satan,' that they might be taught by chastisement not to blaspheme.

the gospel, I have delivered to Satan, to be by him tormented with bodily pains, that they might be taught by a chastisement miraculously inflicted on them, not to revile either Christ, or his doctrine concerning the salvation of the Gentiles. Let the faithful in Ephesus avoid these wicked teachers.

Ver. 20. Whom I have delivered to Satan.]—This is the punishment which the apostle ordered the Corinthians to inflict on the incestuous person, 1 Cor. v. 5. See the notes on that passage. The apostles delivered obstinate offenders to Satan, not only for their own reformation, but for striking terror in others. If the offender, in consequence of this punishment, was afflicted with some bodily disease, it probably wore off on his repentance, or through length of time. And even though it continued, some of the offenders may have been so obstinate in their wicked courses, that they did not amend. This seems to have been the case with Hymeneus and Alexander, two of the corrupt teachers at Ephesus, whom Timothy was left to oppose. For notwithstanding the apostle, after his departure, punished them by delivering them to Satan, they persevered in spreading their erroneous doctrines, 2

Tim. ii. 17, 18, iv. 14.—The apostle's treatment of Hymeneus and Alexander is a proof that he was guilty of no imposture in the things which he preached: nor of any bad practices among his disciples; otherwise he would have behaved towards these opponents with more caution, for fear of their making discoveries to the disadvantage of his character.—At what time the apostle delivered Hymeneus and Alexander to Satan, does not appear. But from his informing Timothy of it, as a thing he did not know, it may be conjectured, that the apostle did it after he left Ephesus, and was come into Macedonia; probably immediately before he wrote this epistle. And as it was done without the knowledge or concurrence of the church at Ephesus, it was not the censure called excommunication, but an exercise of miraculous power which was peculiar to him as an apostle.

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Directions contained in this Chapter.

IN this chapter, the apostle, first of all, gave Timothy a rule, according to which the public worship of God was to be performed in the church of Ephesus. And, in delivering that rule, he shewed an example of the faithfulness, on account of which Christ had made him an apostle. For, without fearing the rage of the Jewish zealots, who contended that no person could be saved who did not embrace the institutions of Moses, he ordered public prayers to be made for men of all nations and religions, ver. 1.—For kings, and for all in authority, notwithstanding they were heathens, that the disciples of Christ, shewing themselves good subjects by praying for the Roman magistrates, might be allowed in peace to worship the only true God according to their conscience, ver. 2.—Thus, to pray for all men, the apostle assured Timothy is acceptable to God, ver. 3.—who hath provided the means of salvation for all men, ver. 4.—and is equally related to all men, as their Creator and Governor, and as the object of their worship; even as Jesus Christ is equally related to all men, as their Mediator and Saviour, ver. 5.—having offered himself a ransom for all: a doctrine, the proof of which, the apostle told Timothy, was now set before the world in its proper season, ver. 6.—by many preachers, and especially by Paul himself, who was appointed a herald to proclaim, and to prove, that joyful doctrine, ver. 7.

But because the Jews fancied their prayers offered up in the Jewish synagogues and prayer houses, but especially in the temple at Jerusalem, were more acceptable to God than prayers offered up any-where else; also, because the heathens were tintured with the same superstition concerning prayers offered in their temples, the apostle ordered prayers to be made by men in every place, from a pure heart, without wrath, and without disputings about the seasons and places of prayer, ver. 8.—From which it is plain, that not the time when, nor the place where, prayers are made, but the dispositions of mind with which they are made, render them acceptable to God.—Next, he ordered women, when joining in the public worship of God, to appear in decent apparel, adorned with the ornaments of modesty and purity of manners, rather than with gold and silver and costly raiment, ver. 9.—It seems there were in Ephesus some ladies who had embraced the gospel, to whom this injunction was necessary. These were to adorn themselves with good works, ver. 10.—And because some of the Ephesian women preached and prayed in the public assemblies in presence of the men, on pretence of their being inspired, the apostle strictly forbade that practice, as inconsistent with the subordinate state of women, who are not to usurp authority over men, ver. 11, 12.—For, the inferiority of the woman to the man, God shewed, by creating the man before the woman, ver. 13.—Besides, that women should not teach men, but be taught by them, is suitable to that weakness of understanding, of which their general mother Eve gave a melancholy proof, when she was deceived by the devil into transgression, ver. 14.—Nevertheless, for the comfort of pious women, the apostle observed, that as a woman brought ruin upon mankind, by yielding to the temptation of the devil, so a woman, by bringing forth the Saviour, hath been the occasion of the salvation of mankind, ver. 15.

CHAP. II.—1 Now I exhort, first of all, that (I exhort, from ex, timor) deprecations,¹ supplications, (see Heb. v. 7. note 4.), intercessions, and thankgivings, be made for all men;

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. II.—1 Now I exhort, first of all, that in the public assemblies, deprecations of evils, and supplications for such good things as are necessary, and intercessions for their conversion, and thankgivings for mercies, be offered in behalf of all men, for heathens as well as for Christians, and for enemies as well as for friends;

Ver. 1. Now I exhort, first of all, that deprecations, &c.]—By this exhortation we are taught, while men live, not to despair of their conversion, however wicked they may be; but to use the means necessary thereto, and to beg of God to accompany these means with his blessing.

Ver. 2.—1. And all who are in authority:]—that is, for the ministers and counsellors of kings, and for the inferior magistrates, by whatever names they may be called.—In the early times, the Jews prayed for the heathen princes who held them in captivity, Ezra vi. 10. Baruch i. 10, 11, being directed by God to do so, Jerem. xlix. 7. But afterwards, becoming more bigoted, they would not pray for any heathen ruler whatever. Nay, the zealots among them held, that no obedience was due from the people of God to idolatrous princes, and often raised seditions in the heathen countries, as well as in Judea, against the heathen magistrates. See Pref. to 1 Pet. sect. 4. This malevolent disposition some of the Jewish converts brought with them into the Christian church. The apostle, therefore, agreeably to the true spirit of the gospel, commanded the brethren at Ephesus to pray, both in public and private, for all men, whatever their nation, their religion, or their character might be, and especially for kings.

2. That we may lead a quiet and peaceable life.)—Besides what that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life,² in all godliness and honesty.

3 For this is good¹ and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour,

4 Who commandeth all men to be saved,¹ and to come to the knowledge of the truth. (See Tit. i. 1. note 4.)

5 For THERE is one God,¹ and one Mediator² between God and men, the man³ Christ Jesus;

6 Who gave himself a ransom¹ for all:² OF WHICH the testimony is in its proper season.³

7 (Εκ ε, 142. 2.) For which I was appointed a herald and an apostle, (I speak the truth in Christ, I lie not¹), a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and truth.

8 (Βυλαμαι, see ver. 4. note), I command, therefore, that the men¹ pray every-where,² is mentioned in the commentary, this may imply our praying that all in authority may exercise their power in such a wise and equitable manner, that, under the protection of their government, we may live in peace with our neighbours and undisturbed by foreign enemies.—In the first age, when the disciples of Christ were liable to be persecuted for their religion by their heathen neighbours, it was highly necessary, by praying for kings and all in authority, to make the heathen rulers sensible that they were good subjects. For thus they might expect to be less the object of their hatred.

Ver. 3. For this is good.—For the disciples of Christ thus to pray for all men, especially for their heathen enemies and persecutors, was of excellent use, to make the latter sensible how good, how patient, and how benevolent the disciples of Jesus were, and that their religion led them to no seditious practices. In the first ages, this display of the Christian character was the more necessary, that the heathens were apt to confound the Christians with the Jews, and to impute to them the odious spirit and wicked practices of the Jews, who, confining their benevolence to those of their own religion, cherished a most rancorous hatred of all the rest of mankind.

Ver. 4. Who commandeth all men to be saved.—So ε, δειλαι παντας ανθρωπους σωθηναι should be translated; for the will of a superior declared, is the same as a command. In this sense the word δειλαι is used Luke v. 12. 'Lord, (δευ δειλαις) if thou command, thou canst cleanse me: 13. δειλω, I command, be thou cleansed.'—John xxi. 22. Εαν αυτος δελω μνησιν, 'If I command him to remain till I come.'—Gal. vi. 13. δειλουσιν, 'They command you to be circumcised.'—Heb. x. 5. 'He saith, sacrifice and offering (ουκ δειλουσας) thou dost not command. Ver. 8. Whole burnt-offerings and sin-offerings (ουκ δειλουσας) thou dost not command.'—If ε, δειλαι παντας ανθρωπους σωθηναι is rightly translated, 'who commandeth all men to be saved,' the apostle's meaning will be, as in the commentary, that God commanded the apostles to save all men from ignorance and vice by preaching the gospel to them.—Pelagius, supposing the apostle to speak of the eternal salvation of all men, thought his meaning was, that God willeth all men to be saved who will themselves.—Others, that God willeth all men to be saved, who are capable of salvation.—Damascen, that God originally willed all men to be saved, and would have saved all men if sin had not entered.—Others, that God willeth all sorts of men to be saved.—Others, supposing that Christ is called God our Saviour in this passage, translate ε, δειλαι, 'who desireth all men to be saved.'—Eustasius understood this of 'God's willing all men to be saved' by us, so far as our prayers and endeavours can contribute to their salvation. But, in support of the translation and interpretation which I have given of this passage, let it be observed, that 'to be saved,' sometimes in scripture signifies, 'to be delivered from ignorance and unbelief.' This sense the word evidently hath Rom. xi. 26. 'And so all Israel shall be saved.' That it hath the same sense in the passage under consideration, appears from the apostle's explication—'saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth.'—When St. Paul ordered prayers to be offered for all men, because God commandeth all men to be saved, he had in his eye Christ's command to his apostles to preach the gospel to every creature, that all might have the knowledge and means of salvation offered to them. See 2 Pet. iii. 9.

Ver. 5.—1. For there is one God.—After God elected Abraham and his posterity to be his visible church and people, he called himself the God of Israel, because no other nation knew and worshipped him. From God's taking to himself this title, the Israelites inferred that they were the only objects of his favour, and that he took no care of the rest of mankind. But to show the Jewish Christians the impropriety of entertaining such thoughts of God, the state, by whatever name they may be called, that, finding us good subjects, we may be suffered to lead an undisturbed and peaceable life, while we worship the only true God, and honestly perform every civil and social duty.

3 For this, that we pray for all men, and especially for rulers, although they be heathens, is good for ourselves, and acceptable in the sight of God our Saviour,

4 Who commandeth all men to be saved from heathenish ignorance and Jewish prejudices, and to come to the knowledge of the truth, that is, of the gospel, through the preaching of the word.

5 For there is one God, the maker, benefactor, and governor of all, and one Mediator between God and men; consequently, all are equally the objects of God's care: This Mediator is the man Christ Jesus,

6 Who voluntarily (John x. 18.) gave himself a ransom not for the Jews only, but for all. Of which doctrine the publication and proof is now made in its proper season; so that, since Christ gave himself for all, it is certainly the will of God that we should pray for all.

7 For the bearing of which testimony concerning the benevolence of God towards all men, and concerning Christ's giving himself a ransom for all, I was appointed an herald, or messenger of peace, and an apostle divinely inspired, (I call Christ to witness, that I speak the truth and lie not), a teacher of the Gentiles in faith and truth; that is, in the true faith of the gospel. Esa. iv. 19.

8 I command, therefore, that the men pray for all, (ver. 1.), in every place appointed for public worship, lifting up holy hands; apostle put them in mind, that the one God is equally related to all mankind, as their Creator and Governor; and that the one Mediator gave himself a ransom for all.—In this passage there is an allusion to Zech. xiv. 9. See Rom. iii. 30. note 1.

2. And one Mediator between God and men.—Mediator here denotes one who is appointed by God to make atonement for the sins of men by his death; and who, in consequence of that atonement, is authorized to intercede with God in behalf of sinners, and empowered to convey all his blessings to them. In this sense there is but 'one Mediator between God and men,' and he is equally related to all.

3. The man Christ Jesus.—By declaring that the one Mediator is 'the man Jesus Christ,' St. Paul insinuates, that his mediation is founded in the atonement which he made for our sins in the human nature. Wherefore, Christ's intercession for us is quite different from our intercession for one another. He intercedes, as having merited what he asks for us. Whereas we intercede for our brethren, merely as expressing our good-will towards them. And because exercises of this kind have a great influence in cherishing benevolent dispositions in us, they are so acceptable to God, that, to encourage us to pray for one another, he hath promised to bear our prayers for others, when it is for his glory and their good. Perhaps the apostle called Jesus a man here, for this other reason, that some of the false teachers had begun to deny his humanity. See Preface to 1 John, sect. 3. If so, it proves the late date of the apostle's first epistle to Timothy.

Ver. 6.—1. Who gave himself a ransom.—Αντιλυτρος. This is an allusion to Christ's words, Matt. xx. 28. 'To give his life (αντεν αντι) a ransom for many.'—Any price given for the redemption of a captive, was called by the Greeks λυτρον, a ransom. But when life was given for life, Eustasius says they used the word αντιλυτρος. Thus, Rom. iii. 24. the justified are said to have απολυτρωσιν, 'redemption through Jesus Christ.' But, Rom. vii. 23. απολυτρωσις signifies deliverance simply. Also Deut. vii. 8. to redeem signifies to deliver simply. See Eph. i. 7. note 1.

2. For all.—This, according to some, means for all sorts of men; agreeably to Rev. v. 9. 'Thou hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and blood, and people, and nation.' But the expression will bear a more general meaning, as was shewed 2 Cor. v. 15. note 1.

3. Of which the testimony is in its proper season.—In this translation I have followed the Vulgate: 'Cujus testimonium temporibus suis confirmatum est.' The proper season for publishing and proving that Christ gave himself a ransom for all, was doubtless after he had actually died for that purpose.

Ver. 7. I speak the truth in Christ, I lie not.—This solemn asseveration the apostle used Rom. ix. 1. He introduces it here in confirmation of his being a herald and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles in the true faith of the gospel, because some in Ephesus denied his apostleship, and because he was going to give commands quite contrary to their sentiments. On this passage Benson's remark is, 'what writer ever kept closer to his subject than this apostle? The more we understand him, the more we admire how much every sentence, and every word, tendeth to the main purpose of his writing.'

Ver. 8.—1. I command, therefore, that the men pray.—As the apostle is speaking of public prayer, his meaning I suppose is, that the men, and not the women, were to lead the devotion of the assembly; especially as in ver. 12. he expressly forbids women to speak in the church.

2. Every-where.—By this precept, the apostle condemned the superstitious notion both of the Jews and Gentiles, who fancied that lifting up holy⁸ hands, without wrath,⁴ and (διαλογίζεσθαι) disputings.⁵

9 In like manner also, that the women adorn themselves in decent apparel,¹ with modesty and sobriety, not with plaited hair ONLY, or gold, or pearls, or costly raiment;

10 But (which becometh women professing godliness!) (ἡς, 119.) with good works. (See 1 Pet. iii. 6. notes.)

11 Let a woman learn in silence with all submission.

12 (ὡς, 105.) For I do not allow a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over a man,¹ but to be silent.

13 For Adam was first formed, then Eve. (1 Cor. xi. 9.)

14 (καὶ, 224.) Besides, Adam was not deceived:¹ But the woman being deceived, became in transgression.²

15 (ὡς, 100.) However, she shall be saved (διὰ τὴν ἡμετέραν) through child-bearing,¹ if they hands purified from sinful actions; and that they pray without wrath and disputings about the seasons and places of prayer.

9 In like manner also I command, that the women, before appearing in the assemblies for worship, adorn themselves in decent apparel, with modesty and sobriety, which are their chief ornaments, not with plaited hair only, or gold, or jewels, or embroidered raiment; in order to create evil desires in the men, or a vain admiration of their beauty;

10 But, instead of these vain ornaments, let them (as becometh women professing the Christian religion) adorn themselves with works of charity, which are the greatest ornaments of the female character, and to which the tender-heartedness of the sex strongly disposes them.

11 Let every woman receive instruction in religious matters from the men in silence, with entire submission, on account of their imperfect education and inferior understanding.

12 For I do not allow a woman to teach in the public assemblies, nor in any manner to usurp authority over a man; but I enjoin them, in all public meetings, to be silent.

13 The natural inferiority of the woman, God shewed at the creation; for Adam was first formed, then Eve, to be a help meet for him.

14 Besides, that women are naturally inferior to men in understanding, is plain from this—Adam was not deceived by the devil; but the woman being deceived by him, fell into transgression.

15 However, though Eve was first in transgression, and brought death on herself, her husband, and her posterity, the female sex prayers offered in temples were more acceptable to God than prayers offered any-where else.—This worshipping of God in all places, was foretold as the peculiar glory of the gospel dispensation, Mal. i. 11.

3. Lifting up (ἁγία) holy hands,]—that is, hands not cleansed with water, but hands undefiled with murder, rapine, and other wicked actions. This the Psalmist anciently inculcated, Psal. xxiv. 4. xxi. 6. as did the prophet Isaiah likewise, chap. i. 16, 17.—There is here an allusion to the custom of the Jews, who, before they prayed, washed their hands, in token of that purity of heart and life which is necessary to render prayers acceptable to God. The lifting up of hands is put for praying, the thing signified by that action.

4. Without wrath.]-By wrath, the apostle means an inward resentment of injuries, accompanied with a resolution of doing evil to those who have injured us. Perhaps also he meant to condemn the Judaizers for the anger which they often expressed against the Gentile converts, on account of their not obeying the law of Moses.

5. And disputings.]-Διαλογίζεσθαι, sometimes signifies reasonings in one's own mind, sometimes reasonings and disputings with others. See Luke ix. 46, 47.—The disputings of which the apostle speaks in this passage, are not those only about the times and places of prayer, but those about other points of religion, whereby bigots inflame themselves into rage against those who differ from them.—This precept of the word of God ought to be well attended to by all who lead the devotion of others in the public assemblies, that they may beware of introducing their private resentments, and angry passions, into their addresses to the Deity.

Ver. 9. That the women adorn themselves (κατασκευάζουσιν) in decent apparel.]-The τοῦ of the Greeks was a kind of garment used by the women, which reached down to their ankles. The κατασκευάζουσιν, according to Theophylact and Ecumenius, was a long upper garment which covered the body every way.—Κατασκευάζουσιν not only what is beautiful, but what is neat and clean, and suitable to one's station. For, in this passage, the apostle does not forbid either the richness or expensiveness of the dress of women in general, as is plain from the commendation given to the virtuous woman, Prov. xxxi. 21, 22, who, through her industry, clothed all her household with scarlet, and herself with silk and purple; not to mention, that the good of society requires persons to dress themselves according to their rank and fortune. What the apostle forbids is, that immodest manner of dressing which is calculated to excite impure desires in the spectators; also, that gaudiness of dress which proceeds from vanity, and nourishes vanity; in short, that attention to dress which consumes much time, leads women to neglect the more important adorning of their minds, makes them careless of their families, and runs them into expenses greater than their husbands can afford. See 1 Pet. iii. 3. note.—How apt the eastern women were to indulge themselves in finery of dress, we learn from the prophet Isaiah's description of the dress of the Jewish ladies in his time, Isa. iii. 16–24.

Ver. 10. Becometh women professing godliness.]-As, in scripture, ungodliness often denotes idolatry and false religion in general, godliness in this verse may signify true religion, and particularly the Christian religion; a meaning which it has likewise, chap. iii. 16.—By introducing this precept concerning the women's dress, immediately after his precepts concerning public prayers, the apostle, I think, cautioned women against appearing in gaudy dresses, when they joined in the public worship. This is evident from the subsequent verse, which forbids them to speak in the church.—See 1 Pet. iii. 3., where the same direction is given to women concerning their dress.

Ver. 12. Nor to usurp authority over a man.]-The Greek word αὐθεντία signifies both to have and to exercise authority over another. In this passage it is properly translated usurp authority; because when a woman pretends to exercise authority over a man, she arrogates a power which does not belong to her. See 1 Cor. xi. 5. note 1. xiv. 34. note.

Ver. 14.—1. Besides, Adam was not deceived.]-The serpent did not attempt to deceive Adam; but he attacked the woman, knowing her to be the weaker of the two. Hence Eve, in extenuation of her fault, pleaded, Gen. iii. 13. 'The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat.' Whereas Adam said, ver. 12. 'The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat;' insinuating, that as the woman had been given him for a companion and help, he had eaten of the tree from affection to her.—In this view of the matter, the fall of the first man stands as a warning to his posterity, to beware of the pernicious influence which the love of women, carried to excess, may have upon them to lead them into sin.—What is mentioned Gen. iii. 22. 'Behold the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil,' does not imply that Adam was either tempted or deceived by the serpent, from an immoderate desire of knowledge: it relates to the woman alone, according to the known use of the word man, which in the Greek and Latin languages, as well as in the Hebrew, signifies man and woman indiscriminately. Hence it is said, ver. 24. 'So he drove out the man;' that is, both the man and the woman. See Spect. vol. vii. No. 610.—The apostle's doctrine concerning the inferiority of the woman to the man in point of understanding, is to be interpreted of the sex in general, and not of every individual; it being well known, that some women, in understanding, are superior to most men. Nevertheless, being generally inferior, it is a fit reason for their being restrained from pretending to direct men in affairs of importance; which is all the apostle meant to prove.

2. But the woman being deceived, became in transgression.]-The behaviour of Eve, who may be supposed to have been created by God with as high a degree of understanding as any of her daughters ever possessed, ought to be remembered by them all as a proof of their natural weakness, and as a warning to them to be on their guard against temptation.—Perhaps also the apostle mentioned Eve's transgression on this occasion, because the subjection of women to their husbands was increased at the fall, on account of Eve's transgression, Gen. iii. 16.

Ver. 15.—1. She shall be saved through child-bearing.]-The word σωθήσεται, saved, in this verse, refers to ἡ γυνή, the woman, in the foregoing verse, who is certainly Eve. But the apostle did not mean to say, that she alone was to be saved through child-bearing; but that all her posterity, whether male or female, are to be saved through the child-bearing of a woman; as is evident from his adding, 'If they live in faith, and love, and holiness, with sobriety.' For, safety in child-bearing doth not depend on this condition at all; since many pious women die in child-bearing, while others of a contrary character are preserved.—The salvation of the human race through child-bearing, was intimated in the sentence passed on the serpent, Gen. iii. 15. 'I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head.' Accordingly, the Saviour being conceived in the womb of his mother by the power of the Holy Ghost, he is truly 'the seed of the woman' who was to bruise the head of the serpent; and a woman, by bringing him forth, hath been the occasion of our salvation.—Vulg. 'Per aliorum generationem.'

shall be saved equally with the male, through child-bearing; through bringing forth the Saviour; if they live in faith, and love, and chastity, with that sobriety which I have been recommending

2. If they live in faith.]—The original word μαρτυροῦνται is rightly translated live; for so it signifies in other passages, particularly Philp. i. 25.—The change in the number of the verb from the singular to the plural, which is introduced here, was designed by the apostle to shew, that he does not speak of Eve, nor of any particular woman, but of the whole sex. See Esa. iv. 14.

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Directions given in this Chapter.

BECAUSE many false teachers were now spreading their erroneous doctrines with great assiduity among the Ephesians, St. Paul judged it necessary that Timothy, to whom he had committed the care of the church at Ephesus, should be assisted by a number of bishops and deacons, well qualified to teach the people. Wherefore, after observing what an honourable office that of a Christian bishop is, ver. 1.—he described the qualities and virtues necessary in one who aspires to attain it; whereby it appears, that an able and faithful Christian bishop is a person most venerable on account of his character, as well as on account of his office, ver. 2-7.—In like manner, the apostle described the qualifications and virtues necessary in a Christian deacon, ver. 8, 9.—and that none might be appointed to these offices who were not of a good character, he ordered them to be proved, that is, ordered their names to be published to the people, that if any person had aught to say against them, he might have an opportunity to speak it. And if no accuser appeared, they were to be considered as of an unblemished reputation, and were to be invested with the proposed office, ver. 10.—The apostle likewise described the character of those women who were to be employed as female presbyters, in teaching the young of their own sex the principles of the Christian faith; and as female deacons, in taking care of the sick and the poor, ver. 11.—Farther, by observing that the deacons, who performed their office well, purchased to themselves a good degree, the apostle, I think, insinuated, that the most faithful of the deacons might be chosen bishops, ver. 13.—These things he wrote to Timothy concerning the doctrine he was to teach, the errors he was to confute, the manner of performing the public worship, the behaviour and dress of the women in their assemblies for worship, and the character and qualifications of the persons Timothy was to ordain bishops and deacons, notwithstanding he hoped to come to him soon, ver. 14.—Or, if any accident prevented his coming, having written these things in this letter, Timothy might know in what manner to behave himself in the house or temple of God, now committed to his care; which therefore was neither the temple at Jerusalem, far less that at Ephesus, but the church of Christ at Ephesus, consisting of all in that city who believed. And to excite Timothy to be diligent in teaching true doctrine, zealous in opposing error, and cautious in ordaining persons to sacred offices, he told him, that in regard the Catholic Christian church is the temple in which the living God is worshipped, and the knowledge of true religion is preserved, and the practice of virtue is maintained, it is actually the pillar and support of the truth, ver. 15.—By giving that honourable appellation to the Christian church, the apostle hath insinuated, that therein are kept, not the mysteries of any of the heathen gods, but the far greater mystery of godliness, or true religion, to be made known, not to a few initiated persons, as the heathen mysteries were, but to all mankind.—Lastly, to shew the greatness of the mystery of godliness which is kept in the Catholic Christian church, the apostle explained the particulars of which it consists, ver. 16.—Thus, by tacitly contrasting the Christian church with the temples of Ephesus and Jerusalem, and by displaying the far more noble purposes for which it was erected, the apostle hath shewed how vastly superior it is to all the most magnificent material fabrics which have ever been reared for the worship of God by the hands of men.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. III.—1 This saying is true, if one earnestly seeketh the office of a bishop,² he desireth an excellent³ work.

2 (Δύω) Therefore a bishop must be unblemished, the husband of one wife,¹ vigilant,² prudent,³ of comely behaviour,⁴ hospitable,⁵ fit to teach. (3 Tim. ii. 24.)

Ver. 1.—1. If one earnestly seeketh.]—The word εργαζομαι properly signifies the eager desire and endeavour of a hungry person to obtain food. But it is used also to express any strong desire whatever. It is a more forcible word than επιθυμειν, desires, in the subsequent clause, which likewise signifies strong desire, and might be translated coveteth.

2. The office of a bishop.]—This, in the Syriac version, is 'consecrated presbyterium, covets the eldership.' See 1 Tim. v. 17. note 1. Yt. i. 6. note 3.

3. He desireth an excellent work.]—A bishop's office is termed εργον, a work, to intimate, that he must not spend his life in ease and idleness, but in a continued application to the duties of his office. It is also termed καλον εργον, a good or excellent work, because of its honourableness and usefulness. See 3 Tim. ii. 2. note 2.—The words καλος and εργον are often used promiscuously, to denote what is morally good. But when they are distinguishedly used, includes also the idea of honour, and εργον the idea of profit.

Ver. 2.—1. The husband of one wife.]—That the gospel allows

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. III.—1 When about to elect bishops, thou shouldst remember that this saying is true, If one earnestly seeketh the office of a bishop, he desireth a work which, though very laborious, is both honourable and beneficial, as it promotes the glory of God and the good of mankind.

2 Therefore a bishop ought to be free from blame; the husband of one wife, at a time; attentive to his duty and to his people; prudent in his conduct; of comely behaviour; hospitable to strangers; fit to teach, by having good knowledge of the things he is to teach, a clear manner of expressing his thoughts, and an earnest desire to instruct the ignorant.

women to marry a second time, is evident from 1 Cor. vii. 9, 39. By parity of reason, it allows men to marry a second time likewise. Wherefore, when it is said here, that 'a bishop must be—the husband of one wife;' and 1 Tim. v. 9. that the widow who is employed by the church in teaching the young of her own sex the principles of the Christian religion, must have been 'the wife of one husband,' the apostle could not mean, that persons who have married a second time are thereby disqualified for sacred offices. For in that case, a bishop whose wife dies while he is young, must lay down his office, unless he can live continually unmarried. The apostle's meaning, therefore, in these canons is, that such persons only are to be intrusted with sacred offices, who, in their married state, have contented themselves with one wife and with one husband at a time; because thereby they have shewed themselves temperate in the use of sensual pleasures.—As the Asiatic nations universally practised polygamy, from an immoderate love of the pleasures of the flesh, the apostle, to bring mankind back to use marriage according to the primitive institution, which enjoined one man to be united to one

3 Not given to wine, no striker;¹ *not one who earns money by base methods,*² but equitable, (see Philip. iv. 5. note 1.), not a brawler, nor covetous.

4 One who ruleth well his own house,³ having his children in subjection TO HIM with all gravity. (See Tit. i. 6. notes.)

5 For if one know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God?

6 Not a new convert,⁴ lest being puffed up with pride,⁵ he fall into the condemnation of the devil.⁶

7 (24. 104.) Moreover, he must even have a good testimony from those without, that he

3 He must not be addicted to wine, nor of such a hasty temper as to be a striker of those who provoke him, nor one who gains money by sinful, or even by dishonourable occupations, but equitable in judging of the offences which any of his flock may commit; not a noisy, abusive, quarrelsome talker, nor covetous in his dealings.

4 He must be one who possesseth such wisdom and firmness as to govern properly his own family. In particular, he must have his children in subjection to him; as becometh the gravity of his character, and his reputation for prudence.

5 For if one be not capable of governing so small a society as his own family, but suffers his children to be disobedient and vicious, how shall he govern in a proper manner that greater and more important society, the church of God?

6 A bishop must be not one newly converted, lest being puffed up with pride on account of his promotion, he fall into the punishment inflicted on the devil.

7 Moreover, before his conversion, he must have behaved in such a manner as even to have a good testimony from the heathens; that woman only at a time, ordered by inspiration, that none should be made bishops, but those who, by avoiding polygamy, had shewed themselves temperate in the use of sensual pleasures.—In like manner, because, according to our Lord's determination, Mark x. 2—12. persons who divorced each other unjustly, were guilty of adultery when they married themselves to others; also because such really had more wives and husbands than one at a time; as was the case with the woman of Samaria, mentioned John iv. 18. the apostle, to restrain these licentious practices, which were common among the Greeks and Romans as well as among the Jews, ordered that no widow should be chosen to instruct the younger women, but such as had been the wife of one husband only at a time, 1 Tim. v. 9.

It may be objected, perhaps, that the gospel ought to have prohibited the people, as well as the ministers of religion, from polygamy and divorce, if these things were morally evil.—As to divorce, the answer is, by the precept of Christ, all, both clergy and people, were restrained from unjust divorces. And with respect to polygamy, being an offence against political prudence rather than against morality, it had been permitted to the Jews by Moses, Deut. xxi. 15. on account of the hardness of their heart, and was generally practised by the eastern nations as a matter of indifference. It was therefore to be corrected mildly and gradually, by example rather than by express precept. And, seeing reformation must begin somewhere, it was certainly fit to begin with the ministers of religion, that, through the influence of their example, the evil might be remedied by degree, without occasioning those domestic troubles and countless divorces which must necessarily have ensued, if, by an express injunction of the apostles, husbands, immediately on their becoming Christians, had been obliged to put away all their wives except one. Accordingly, the example of the clergy and of such of the brethren as were not married at their conversion, or who were married only to one woman, supported by the precepts of the gospel, which enjoined temperance in the use of sensual pleasure, had so effectually rooted out polygamy from the church, that the emperor Valentinian, to give countenance to his marrying Justina during the life of his wife Severa, whom he would not divorce, published a law, permitting his subjects to have two wives at a time; Socrat. Ecc. Hist. lib. iv. c. 31.

The direction I have been considering does not make it necessary, to one's being a bishop, that he be a married person, as Vigilantius, a presbyter of the church at Barcelona, in the end of the fourth century, contended: But the apostle's meaning is, that if such a person be married, he must, as was observed above, have only one wife at a time. This appears from ver. 4. where it is required of a bishop, that he have his children in subjection. For surely that requisition doth not make it necessary to one's being a bishop, that he have children; but that, if he have children, they be obedient to him.—Now, although it be not necessary to one's being a bishop that he be married, yet if a young unmarried man be made a bishop, it may be proper, for avoiding temptation, that he marry, if he have not the gift of continency. See chap. v. 16. note.

2. Vigilant.—Because the word νῆπιος comes from νῆπιον, to be sober, in opposition to one's being drunk, Estius thinks it should, in this passage, be translated sober. But as sobriety is mentioned ver. 3. and as νῆπιος signifies also to watch, its derivative, νῆπιος, may very properly be translated vigilant or attentive. For certainly it is a chief quality in a bishop, to be attentive to all the duties of his office, and to his flock.

3. Prudent.—Σοφία, sophia mentis. This word signifies a person whose mind is well regulated, and free from all excesses of passion of every kind; so might be translated, one who governs his passions.

4. Of comely behaviour.—Κοσμιος, from κοσμος, to set in order, to adorn. This may signify, that a bishop's discourse, his dress, his visage, his gait, his manners, must all be suitable to the gravity of his function.—The word σοφία respects the inward man, but κοσμιος the outward.

5. Hospitable.—φιλόξεμος, literally, a lover of strangers. See Rom. xii. 8. note 5. where the obligation which lay on the bishops, in the primitive times, to be hospitable to such of the brethren as were strangers, or poor, or persecuted, is explained. Yet the bishop's hospitality was not to be confined to the brethren. He was to extend it to his heathen acquaintance also, and even to such stranger heathens as, agreeably to the manners of the times, came to him, drawn by his reputation for beneficence. The reason was, by receiving such into his house, he would have an opportunity of recommending the Christian religion to them by his conversation and example. From this account it is evident, that the hospitality anciently required in a bishop, was not what is now meant by that word; namely, the keeping a good table and an open house for one's friends and others, who are able to make him a return in kind; but it consisted in entertaining strangers of the character just now described; the poor also, and the persecuted for the sake of religion.—That the bishop might be able to exercise this general hospitality, which the manners of the times (see 1 Cor. ix. 6. note 1.) made necessary, their churches supplied them with a liberal maintenance. But now that the ancient customs are changed, and inns are every-where open, in which travellers, for their money, can be as well accommodated as in private houses, there is little occasion for what the apostle calls hospitality.—The benevolent disposition of a bishop, in the present state of things, will be more properly exercised in relieving the poor, who are much more numerous now among Christians than in the first ages. For then, the profession of the gospel exposing men to persecution, few embraced our religion who had not some degree of probity. The brethren, therefore, in these days, being generally men of principle, would not, without cause, be burdensome to the community to which they belonged. But at present, in the countries where Christianity is professed, and where the church comprehends many who, though they call themselves Christians, have no principle of religion at all, the number of the poor who must be relieved is exceedingly great.

Ver. 3.—1. Not given to wine.—The apostle condemns in a bishop frequent and much drinking, although it should not be carried the length of intoxication; because by much drinking much time is wasted, the faculties of the mind are enervated, and a sensual disposition is cherished.

2. Who earns money by base methods.—So the word μισθωτής (misothētēs, ordidum quantum faciens, Scapula) properly signifies.—As many of the brethren in the first age maintained themselves by their own labour, it might happen, that the occupations which they followed in their heathen state, and which they continued to follow after they became Christians, were not very reputable. Wherefore, to discourage trades of that sort, and especially to prevent the ministers of religion from gaining money by sinful and even by low methods, the apostle ordered, that no one should be elected a bishop who was engaged in such occupations.

Ver. 4. One who ruleth well his own house.—A bishop must not only rule his own family, but he must rule it well; rule it so as to promote religion and virtue in all its members; rule it calmly, but firmly, never using harshness where gentleness and love will produce the desired effect: also he must afford to his family, according to his circumstances, what is necessary to their comfortable subsistence.

Ver. 6.—1. Not a new convert.—Μετάνειος, literally, one newly ingrafted; namely, into the body of Christ by baptism; one newly converted. Such were not to be made bishops, because being imperfectly instructed in the Christian doctrine, they were not fit to teach it to others.—Besides, as their constancy and other virtues had not been sufficiently tried, they could have had little authority, especially with the brethren of longer standing and greater experience.

2. Lest (μὴ being puffed up.)—Bengelius says μὴ is of the same signification with καὶ, that μὴ is a smoky heat void of flame, and that they are said μὴ πνεύματι, whom wine, or pride, or an high opinion of their own knowledge, intoxicates and makes giddy. See 2 Cor. x. 5. note 1.

3. Fall into the condemnation of the devil.—According to Erasmus, this clause should be translated, 'fall into the condemnation of the accuser,' a sense which the word καταδίκη, hath, ver. 11. For he supposes, that by the accuser is meant the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles, who were ready to condemn the Christians for every misdeed. But others understand the apostle as speaking of that evil spirit who, in scripture is called the Devil, and who was cast out of heaven by his sin, 2 Pet. ii. 4. Jude, ver. 6. which in this passage is insinuated to have been pride; but in what instance, or how shewed, is nowhere told. There are who think he refused some ministrations appointed him by God: Others, that he would not acknowledge the Son of God as his superior.

8 The deacons in like manner MUST BE grave,² not double-tongued, not giving THEMSELVES to much wine, not persons who earn money by base methods.

9 Holding fast the mystery¹ of the faith with a pure conscience. (Chap. i. 19.)

10 (Καί ἴσως δὲ) But let these also be proved first,¹ then let them exercise the deacon's office, being unaccused.

11 (Γυναῖκες ἁγνῆς). The women in like manner¹ MUST BE grave, not slanderers,² BUT vigilant,³ faithful in all things.

12 Let the deacons be the husbands of one wife, (see ch. iii. 2. note 1.), ruling well THEIR children, and their own houses.¹

13 For they who have performed the office of a deacon well, procure to themselves an excellent degree,¹ and great boldness in the faith which is in Christ Jesus.

Ver. 7. May not fall into reproach, and the snare of the devil.]—Here it is intimated, that the sins which one hath formerly committed, when cast in his teeth after he becomes a minister, may be the means of tempting him to repeat these sins, by the devil suggesting to him, that he has little reputation to lose. Nor is this the only evil. The people, knowing his former miscarriages, will be the less affected with what he says to them.—All who are candidates for the ministry ought to consider these things seriously.

Ver. 8. The deacons (see Rom. xvi. 1. note 3.) in like manner must be grave.]—The word εὐσέβεια, translated grave, includes also the ideas of dignity and staidness. These qualities were required in deacons, because they seem to have been employed in teaching. See ver. 9. note.

Ver. 9. Holding fast the mystery of the faith.]—In the opinion of many, this is the doctrine of the salvation of the Gentiles by faith without the works of the law of Moses, called 'the mystery of God's will,' Eph. i. 9; and 'the mystery which hath been hid from ages and generations,' Col. i. 26. But I rather think it denotes the doctrine of the gospel in general, called, 1 Cor. ii. 7, 'a mystery;' and ver. 16. of this chapter, 'the mystery of godliness.'—The apostle's direction implies, that a deacon should be both sound in the faith, and conscientious in maintaining it. And although the apostle hath not mentioned it, Timothy, from this direction concerning deacons, must have been sensible that it was equally necessary in bishops as in deacons, to hold the mystery of the faith with a pure conscience.—Soundness in the faith being required in deacons, it is a presumption that they were sometimes employed in teaching; but whether by preaching, or by catechizing, is hard to say. They likewise performed the office of readers in the church. See Beza here.

Ver. 10. But let these also be proved first.]—The word also implies, that the rule for trying the character of the deacons was to be observed with relation to bishops. The rule was this: They published in their assemblies for worship the names of the persons designed for ecclesiastical functions, that if any one had ought to accuse them of, they might shew it. So we are told by Lampadius, in his life of Alexander Severus, tom. ii. c. 46., quoted at large, Truth of the Gospel Hist. p. 331., who, it seems, wished to have the same method followed in appointing the governors of provinces; and alleged the example of the Jews and Christians, who published the names of their ministers before they established them in their offices. Now, although Lampadius speaks of a rule observed by the Christians in the time of Alexander Severus, previous to their admitting persons to be bishops and deacons, it was a rule so natural and reasonable, that we may suppose it was prescribed by the apostles, and that it is referred to in this passage, where he ordered persons to be proved before they exercised the deacon's office. But Eadius thinks the apostle, in this direction, required that no one should be made either a bishop or a deacon till he had given proof both of his stedfastness in the faith, and of his other virtues, during a reasonable space of time after his conversion. The other interpretation, however, agrees better with the subsequent clause, being (ὄντας ἀκατήγοροις) unaccused.

Ver. 11.—1. The women, in like manner, must be grave.]—In translating εὐσέβεια by the word women, I have followed the Vulgate, which hath here, Mulieres similiter pudicas. The women in like manner must be modest: because I see no reason for its being made a qualification of deacons to have wives 'vigilant and faithful in all things,' especially as it is not made a qualification of bishops to have wives of that character. Besides, Chrysostom and the Greek commentators, with the most ancient Latin fathers, were of opinion, that the apostle, in this passage, is speaking both of those women who in the first age were employed in ministering he may not be liable to reproach for the sins he committed before his conversion, and fall into the snare of the devil, who by these reproaches may tempt him to renounce the gospel.

8 The deacons, in like manner, must be of a grave character, not double-tongued, speaking one thing to this person, and another to that, on the same subject; not giving themselves to much wine; not persons who earn money by base methods. See ver. 3. note 2.

9 He must hold fast the doctrines of the gospel with a pure conscience: He must not, from fear or self-interest, either conceal or disguise these doctrines.

10 However, let these also be tried first, by publishing their names to the church, that if any one hath ought to lay to their charge, he may shew it; and after such a publication of their names, let them exercise the deacon's office, if no person accuses them.

11 The women, in like manner, who are employed in teaching the young, must be stayed in their deportment; not slanderers and tale-bearers, but vigilant and faithful in all the duties belonging to their office.

12 Let the deacons be the husbands of one wife only at a time, having shewed their temperance by avoiding polygamy and causeless divorce. They must likewise rule with prudence and firmness their children, and every one in their families.

13 For they who have performed the office of a deacon with ability and assiduity, secure to themselves an honourable rank in the church, and great courage in teaching the Christian faith. For even the wicked must respect persons who shew so much benevolence and activity, in relieving the poor, the afflicted, and the persecuted.

to the afflicted, and of those who were appointed to teach the young of their own sex the principles of religion.—As the manners of the Greeks did not permit men to have much intercourse with women of character, unless they were their relations, and as the Asiatas were under still greater restraints, (see Rom. xvi. 1. note 3.), it was proper that an order of female teachers should be instituted in the church, for instructing the young of their own sex. Of these I think the apostle writes in his epistle to Titus, chap. ii. 3, 4. where he gives an account of their office, and calls them εὐσεβῆς, γυναῖκες ἁγνῆς, female elders, because of their age. And it is believed that they are the persons called widows, of whose maintenance by the church the apostle speaks, 1 Tim. v. 2. and whose character and state he there describes, ver. 9, 10. See the note on ver. 16. of that chapter.—Farther, Clement of Alexandria reckons widows among ecclesiastical persons, Pædog. Lib. iii. c. 12. 'There are many precepts in scripture concerning those who are chosen, some for priests, others for bishops, others for deacons, others for widows.'—Grotius tells us, these female presbyters or elders were ordained by the imposition of hands till the council of Laodicea; and for this he quotes the xth canon of that council.—From what is said of Euodia and Syntyche, Philip. iv. 3. it is probable they were female presbyters. Perhaps also Priscilla, Tryphena, and Tryphosa, were of the same order, with some others, whom in his epistle to the Romans he salutes, Rom. xvi. 3, 12, as 'labouring in the Lord.'

For these reasons, and on account of the particulars mentioned Rom. xvi. 1. note 3., I think the apostle in 1 Tim. iii. 11. describes the qualifications, not of the deacons' wives, but of the women who in the first age were employed by the church to minister to the sick and afflicted, and to instruct the young of their own sex in the principles of the Christian faith.

2. Not slanderers.]—Μη διακολούης. This Greek word comes from διακολάω, transfere verbum aut calumniam, and is very properly translated slanderers. It was necessary that the women who were employed in ministering to the afflicted, and in teaching the younger women, should be free from detraction, because their slanders might provoke the bishops and deacons to administer rebukes rashly.

3. But (εὐσεβῆς) vigilant.]—As it was required of the bishop that he should be εὐσεβής, vigilant or attentive to all the duties of his function, and to his flock, so the women who were employed in ministering to the sick, and in teaching the young of their own sex, were to be 'vigilant and faithful in all things;' in all the duties of their office.—Eadius, who understands this verse of the wives of the bishops and deacons, is of opinion, that the word εὐσεβῆς, translated vigilant, signifies sober, or free from drunkenness. If this is the apostle's meaning, the requisition in this verse will be an implied direction to the ministers of the gospel, who ought to rule well all the members of their own families, to attend chiefly to the good qualities of the women they propose to marry. See, however, ver. 2. note 2.

Ver. 12. Ruling well their children, and their own houses.]—This qualification, which was required in bishops likewise, shews how anxious the apostle was that all who bore sacred offices should be unblamable in every respect; knowing that the disorderly behaviour of the members of their family, might give occasion to suspect that they had been careless of their morals.

Ver. 13. They who have performed the office of a deacon well, (εὐσεβῶντες) procure to themselves (κατακτάουσιν) an excellent stop or degree.]—In the early ages, the bishops or pastors were sometimes taken from among the deacons. Thus Eleutherus, bishop of Rome, before his promotion, was a deacon of that church in the time of Anicetus, as Eusebius informs us, Eccles. Hist. v. 6. Edit. Vales. But whether this was the practice in the apostle's time; or,

14 These things I write to thee, (ναὺς, 16.) although I hope to come to thee soon:

15 (As, 108.) OR, if I tarry long, that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house¹ of God, which is the church of the living God,² the pillar and support³ of the truth.

16 (Kas, 207.) For confessedly great is the mystery¹ of godliness; God was manifested² in the flesh, was justified (σ, 167.) through the Spirit,³ was seen of angels,⁴ was preached to the Gentiles,⁵ was believed on in the world,⁶ was taken up in glory.⁷

if it was the practice, whether St. Paul had it in view here, is hard to say.—Because οἶκος; signifies a step or seat, some imagine the apostle alludes to the custom of the synagogue, where persons of the greatest dignity were set on the most elevated seats.

Ver. 15.—1. In the house of God.—The tabernacle first, and afterwards the temple, obtained the name of the house or habitation of God, because there the symbol of the divine presence resided, 1 Sam. i. 7.—Matt. xxi. 13. 'My house shall be called the house of prayer.'—Matt. xxiii. 33. 'Behold your house is left to you desolate.'—2 Kings v. 18. 'The house of Rimmon,' or his temple.

2. Which is the church of the living God.—Under the gospel dispensation, no material building or temple is called the house of God. That appellation is given only to the church of God, or to those societies of men who profess to believe in Christ, and join together in worshipping God according to the gospel form. See 3 Thess. ii. 4. note 3.

3. The pillar (στυλὶς ἰδρυμένη) and support of the truth.—The word ἰδρυμένη coming from ἰδρύω, to establish, is fitly translated firmamentum, a support.—Some commentators think Timothy is called, in this passage, 'the pillar and support of the truth,' for the same reason that Peter, James, and John, are called pillars, Gal. ii. 9., and that the particle καί, and, should be supplied before στυλὶς καὶ ἰδρυμένη; and that the clause should be construed and translated thus: 'That thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself as the pillar and support of the truth, in the church of the living God.' But not to insist on the harshness and singularity of this construction, I observe, that in regard the interpretation of the passage hath been much contested, a word which entirely changes the apostle's meaning should by no means be inserted in the text on mere conjecture; because in that manner the scriptures may be made to speak any thing which bold critics please.—The two clauses of the sentence, στυλὶς καὶ ἰδρυμένη τοῦ Θεοῦ ζῶντος, στυλὶς καὶ ἰδρυμένη τῆς ἀληθείας, wanting something to couple them, the substantive verb with the relative pronoun, either in the masculine or in the feminine gender, must be supplied. If the relative masculine, ὃς, is supplied, God will be 'the pillar and support of the truth;' or of that scheme of true religion which hath been discovered to mankind by revelation, and which is called in the next verse 'the mystery of godliness.' Of this scheme of truth God may justly be denominated 'the pillar and support,' because he hath supported it from the beginning, and will support it to the end.—But if the relative feminine, ἥτις, is adopted, 'the church of the living God' will be 'the pillar and support of the truth;' which I take to be the apostle's meaning; because, as the logicians speak, the subject of his proposition is, not God, but the church of the living God. This I gather from the omission of the verb and the relative. For on supposition that the apostle meant to tell Timothy, that the church of the living God is the pillar and support of the truth, he could not write ὃς, as that would have made 'God the pillar and support of the truth,' contrary to his intention. Neither could he write ἥτις, because, being a repetition of the verb and the relative expressed in the clause immediately preceding, it would have been grating to the reader's ear; and besides, it is unnecessary, as ἥτις ἐστὶ relates both to ἐκκλησία τοῦ Θεοῦ ζῶντος, and to ἐκκλησία τῆς ἀληθείας.—I have no doubt myself concerning the meaning of the passage; yet, because it is appealed to in proof of a controverted doctrine, (see Pref. sect. 5.), I have in the translation left it as ambiguous as it is in the original, by not supplying the relative, either in the one gender or in the other.

The church of the living God, as 'the pillar and support of the truth,' is here contrasted with the house or temple of the lifeless image of Diana, at Ephesus, which was the pillar and support of falsehood, idolatry, and vice.—In the opinion of some, 'the church of the living God' is termed 'the pillar and support of the truth,' in allusion to the two pillars which Solomon placed in the porch of the temple, and to which, it is said, the prophets affixed their prophecies in writing, that they might be read by the people who came into the temple to worship. Others think the allusion is to the pillars in the heathen temples, on which tables were hung up, containing laws, and other matters of importance, which were designed to be published. But to settle this is of no importance, because to whichever of the customs the apostle alluded, his meaning is the same.—That 'the church of the living God, which is the pillar and support of the truth,' is not the church of Rome, nor any particular church, but the Catholic Christian church, consisting of all the churches of Christ throughout the world, see proved Pref. sect. 5.

Ver. 16.—1. Great is the mystery of godliness.—See ver. 9. where 14 These things (see the Illustration) I write to thee, although I hope to come to thee soon, to give thee more complete instruction concerning thy behaviour.

15 Or if by any accident I am obliged to tarry long, I have written these things, that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is neither the temple at Jerusalem, nor the temple of Diana at Ephesus, but the church of the living God, consisting of all believers, and which is the pillar and support of the truth.

16 Thou oughtest to behave properly in the church; for confessedly most important is the doctrine of the gospel which is kept therein; namely, that to save sinners by his death, the Son of God was manifested in the flesh; was justified through the Spirit, who raised him from the dead; was, after his resurrection, seen of the apostles his messengers; was preached to the Gentiles as their Saviour; was believed on in many parts of the world; was taken up into heaven in a glorious manner.

the incorrupt doctrine of the gospel is called 'the mystery of the faith,' for the reasons mentioned 1 Cor. ii. 7. note 1.—Here, 'the mystery of godliness' is called μυστήριον, great, in allusion to the Eusebian mysteries, which were distinguished into Μυστήριον and Μεγαλόν, the lesser and the greater. Wherefore, by calling the articles mentioned in this verse μυστήριον, a great mystery, the apostle hath intimated, that they are the most important doctrines of our religion.

2. God was manifested in the flesh.—The Clermont MS., with the Vulgate, and some other ancient versions, read here ὃς, which, instead of ὅτι, God.—The Syriac version, as translated by Tremellius, hath, 'Quod Deus revelatus est in carne.'—That God was revealed in the flesh.—The Colbertine MS. hath ὃς, who. But Mill saith, it is the only Greek MS. which hath that reading. All the others, with one consent, have ὅτι; which is followed by Chrysostom, Theodoret, and Theophylact, as appears by their commentaries. Mill saith, ὃς and ὅς were substituted in place of the true reading; not however by the Arians, nor by the other heretics, as neither they, nor the orthodox fathers, have cited this text.—See Mill in loc. where he treats as fabulous what Liberatus and Himerius tell us concerning Macedonius being expelled by Anastasius for changing ὅς in this text into ὃς; where also he delivers his opinion concerning the alteration made on this word in the Alexandrian MS.—See also Pearson on the Creed, p. 128., who has very well defended the common reading.—The thing asserted in this verse, according to the common reading, is precisely the same with what John hath told us in his gospel, chap. i. 14. 'The word (who is called God, ver. 1.) was made flesh, and dwelt among us.'—The other reading, not very intelligibly, represents the gospel as manifested in the flesh, and taken up in glory. See note 7.

3. Was justified through the Spirit.—Jesus having been publicly put to death as a blasphemer for calling himself the Son of God, he was justified, or acquitted from the crime of blasphemy, which was imputed to him by the chief priests and elders, and demonstrated to be the Son of God through the operation of the Spirit, who raised him from the dead, (see 1 Pet. ii. 18. note 2), and who, agreeably to Christ's promise, by descending on his apostles, enabled them to speak foreign languages and to work miracles. Likewise at his baptism, the Spirit, by descending on him, pointed him out as the person whom the voice from heaven declared to be God's beloved Son.

4. Was seen of angels.—that is, of the apostles, and of the other witnesses who were appointed to publish and testify his resurrection to the world; and who are here called (αγγέλοι, angels), messengers, for the same reason that John Baptist is so called, Luke vii. 37. 'This is he of whom it is written, Behold I send (αγγελισάμην, my angel) my messenger before thy face.' See also Luke ix. 52. where the messengers, whom Jesus sent before him into a village of the Samaritans are called αγγέλοι, angels, without the article, as in this passage. Yet I have not ventured to alter the common translation, because I cannot tell whether the apostle may not have had in his eye those angels, who, during his ministry, saw the Son of God manifested in the flesh; those also who, after his resurrection, saw him manifested in the same manner.

5. Was preached to the Gentiles.—It is with great propriety mentioned by the apostle as a part of the mystery of godliness, formerly kept secret, that the Son of God manifested in the flesh was preached to the Gentiles as their Saviour, as well as the Saviour of the Jews. For, on the one hand, this was a thing which the Jews were persuaded would never happen; and, on the other, it was a favour which the Gentiles had no reason to expect.

6. Was believed on in the world.—This undeniable fact, of which the evidence remains at this day, is mentioned as a part of the mystery of godliness, because it is a strong proof of the truth of Christ's resurrection, and of the spiritual gifts and miraculous powers by which the apostles, and their assistants, are said, in the Christian records, to have spread the gospel through the world. For, to believe that the multitudes, not only among the barbarous nations, but among the learned Greeks and Romans, who forsook their native religion and embraced the gospel, were persuaded to do so merely by the force of words without the aid of miracles and spiritual gifts, is to believe a greater miracle than any recorded in the gospel history. See this argument illustrated, 2 Cor. iv. 7. notes 2, 3.

7. Was taken up in glory.—Ανάστει. This is the word used to signify our Lord's ascension, Mark xvi. 19. Acts i. 2. 11. 22. See also Luke ix. 51.—But because, in the order of time, Christ's ascension preceded his being preached to the Gentiles and his being believed on in the world, a critic, mentioned by Benson, interprets this clause of the glorious reception which the mystery of godliness, or gospel, met with from mankind. To this interpretation, however, there are two objections:—1. It supposeth it to be the true reading in the beginning of the verse, whereby 'the mystery of godliness,' or the gospel, will, as before observed, be said, not very intelligibly, to have been manifested in the flesh: 2. The glorious reception of the gospel is the same with its being believed in the world, a tautology by no means to be imputed to so accurate a writer as St. Paul.—The supposed difficulty, arising from the order in which the events mentioned in this verse are placed, is in reality no difficulty at all; as in other passages of scripture, things are related, neither in the order of time in which they happened, nor according to their dignity. Thus, Heb. xi. 27. Moses's leaving Egypt with the Israelites is mentioned before the institution of the passover, ver. 28. Thus also, Heb. xii. 28. the spirits of just men made perfect are mentioned next to 'God,' and before 'Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant,' because something was to be added concerning him. For the same reason, 'the seven spirits' are put before 'Jesus Christ,' Rev. i. 4, 5.—As the 'taking of Christ up in glory,' implies that 'he sat down on the right hand of God' in the human nature, and is to continue there till all his enemies are subdued, it is a principal part of the mystery of godliness, and affords the greatest consolation to believers. It was therefore with much propriety placed last in this enumeration, that it might make the stronger impression on the reader's mind. It was placed last for this reason also, that it was appealed to by Christ himself, John vi. 62. as a proof of his having 'come down from heaven;' that is, of his being the Son of God manifested in the flesh.

CHAPTER IV.

View and Illustration of the Predictions contained in this Chapter.

By calling the Christian church, in the end of the preceding chapter, 'the pillar and support of the truth,' the apostle teaches us, that one of the important purposes for which that great spiritual building was reared, was to preserve the knowledge and practice of true religion in the world. Nevertheless, knowing that, in after-times, great corruptions both in doctrine and practice would at length take place in the church itself; and that the general reception of these corruptions by professed Christians would be urged as a proof of their being the truths and precepts of God, on pretence that the church is 'the pillar and support of the truth,' the apostle, to strip these corruptions of any credit which they might derive from their being received by the multitude, and maintained by persons of the greatest note in the church, judged it necessary, in this fourth chapter, to foretell the introduction of these corruptions, under the idea of an 'apostasy from the faith,' and to stigmatize the authors thereof as lying hypocrites, whose conscience was seared. And to give his prediction the greater authority, he informed Timothy, that the Spirit spake it to him with an audible voice; and mentioned in particular, that these lying teachers would corrupt the gospel by enjoining the worship of angels and of departed saints, ver. 1, 2.—and by forbidding certain classes of men to marry, on pretence that hereby they made themselves more holy; and by commanding some at all times, and all at some times, to abstain from meats which God hath created to be used with thanksgiving by them who know and believe the truth, ver. 3.—namely, that every kind of meat is good, and that nothing is to be cast away as unclean which God hath made for food, provided it be received with thanksgiving, ver. 4.—For it is sanctified, that is, made fit for every man's use, by 'the word (or permission) of God, and by prayer,' ver. 5.—These things the apostle ordered Timothy to lay before the brethren in Ephesus, because the foreknowledge of them was given to him, and by him discovered to Timothy, for this very purpose, that he might warn the faithful to oppose every appearance and beginning of error, ver. 6.—And because the Jewish fables, termed by the apostle 'old wives' fables,' and the superstitious practices built thereon, had a natural tendency to produce the errors and corruptions which he foretold were to arise in the church, he ordered Timothy to reject them with abhorrence, ver. 7.—Especially as rites pertaining to the body are of no avail in the sight of God, and of very little use in promoting either piety or love; whereas a pious and holy life is the only thing which renders men acceptable to God, ver. 8.—Withal, that these things might make the deeper impression on Timothy's mind, the apostle solemnly protested to him, that in affirming them he spake the truth, ver. 9.—As indeed he had shewed, by the heavy reproaches and other evils he had suffered for preaching, that he trusted for salvation neither to the rites of the law of Moses nor to the mortifications prescribed by the Pythagorean philosophy, nor to the favour of any idol, but to the favour of the living God alone, who is the preserver of all men, but especially of believers, ver. 10.—The same doctrine he ordered Timothy to inculcate on the Ephesian brethren, ver. 11.—and to behave in such a manner that it should not be in the power of any person, whether he were a teacher or one of the people, to despise him on account of his youth, ver. 12.—Then, because the Jews and Judaizing teachers founded their errors on misinterpretations of the Jewish scriptures, he ordered Timothy to read these inspired writings frequently to the people in their public assemblies, and likewise in private for his own instruction; and on the true meaning of these scriptures to found all his doctrines and exhortations, ver. 13.—In the mean time, that he might attain the true knowledge of these ancient oracles, he ordered him to exercise the spiritual gift which he possessed; probably the inspiration called 'the word of knowledge,' which had been imparted to him by the imposition of the apostle's hands, when, in conjunction with the eldership of Lystra, he ordained him an evangelist, ver. 14.—Farther, he desired Timothy to meditate much on the scriptures of the Old Testament, and to be wholly employed in studying them, and in explaining them to the people, ver. 15.—Finally, he commanded him to take heed to his own behaviour and to his doctrine, from this most powerful of all considerations, that by so doing he would both save himself and them who heard him, ver. 16.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. IV.—1 But, although the church, by preserving the mystery of godliness in the world, be the support of the truth, the Spirit

Ver. 1.—1. The Spirit (πνεῦμα; ἀγγέλλει) expressly saith;—or, in so many words saith. Mede supposes this to be an allusion to Dan. xi. 38—39. But the things here mentioned are not in Daniel, nor any where else in scripture; not even in the prophecy which the apostle himself formerly delivered concerning the man of sin. I therefore think these words were, for the greater solemnity and certainty, pronounced by the Spirit in the apostle's hearing, after he had finished the preceding passage concerning the church's being the pillar and support of the truth. Of the Spirit's speaking in an audible manner, we have other instances in scripture. Thus the Spirit spake, in Peter's hearing, the words recorded Acts x. 19, 20; and in the hearing of the prophets of Antioch, the words mentioned, Acts xiii. 13. See also Acts xvi. 6. xxi. 11.

2. That in after-times.—So the phrase ἐν ὑστερίαις καιροῖς may be translated, because it denotes future times, without marking whether they are near or remote. Mede thinks a particular time is determined in this passage. For he supposes all the times mentioned in the new Testament to have a reference to Daniel's four monarchies, which he considers as the grand sacred calendar; namely, the Babylonian, the Medo-Persian, the Grecian, and the Roman monarchies. Now, as the Roman was the last monarchy, and as under it the God of heaven set up the kingdom of his Son, Mede thinks the latter, or last times, are the last part of the duration of the Roman empire, when the man of sin was to be revealed. Others, because the times in which the gospel was promulgated are called, Heb. i. 1, 2. 'the last days,' and 1 Pet. i. 20. 'the last

MANY, 54.) some will apostatize from the faith,³ giving heed to deceiving spirits,⁴ and to doctrines concerning demons;⁵

2 (Eph. 167.) Through the hypocrisy of liars,¹ who are seared (supp. scire) IN their own conscience;²

3 Who forbid to marry,¹ AND COMMAND² to abstain³ from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving by the faithful⁴ (222, 219.) who thoroughly know the truth;⁵

4 (Ors) That every creature of God is good, being received with thanksgiving, and nothing IS to be cast away.

expressly saith to me, that in after-times many in the Christian church will apostatize from the faith of the fundamental doctrines of the gospel, giving heed to teachers who falsely pretend to be inspired, and to doctrines concerning the power of angels and departed saints, and the worship due to them, whereby the worship due to Christ, as Governor and Mediator, will be wholly neglected.

2 This belief of the doctrine concerning demons, and the other errors I am about to mention, will be propagated under the hypocritical pretence of humility, and superior holiness, by lying teachers, who are seared in their conscience, and who will invent innumerable falsehoods, to recommend their erroneous doctrines and corrupt practices to the ignorant multitude.

3 These lying teachers will forbid the clergy, and such of both sexes as wish to live piously, to marry; and command the people to abstain from certain meats, which God hath created to be used with thanksgiving by the faithful, who thoroughly know the truth concerning that matter;

4 That every creature of God, fit for man's food, is good, and may be used, being received with thanksgiving to God the giver; and no kind is to be cast away, either from peevishness, or from the fancy that it is unlawful.

times,¹ understand by the latter times, the times of the gospel indefinitely. See 2 Pet. iii. 3. note 2.

3. Some will apostatize from the faith.]-Though the verb αποστατίζω was used by the Greeks to signify subjects withdrawing their obedience from the civil powers, 2 Thess. ii. 3. note 1., the apostle did not use it here to denote rebellion, but men's relinquishing the true faith and practice of the gospel; as the phrase, 'apostatize from the faith,' imports. Whithy, therefore, and those whom he hath followed, are mistaken, who interpret the apostasy foretold 2 Thess. ii. 3. of the rebellion of the Jews against the Romans, which ended in the overthrow of their state. In the epistle to the Thessalonians, the character of the teachers who were to introduce the apostasy is described; but in this epistle, the erroneous opinions and corrupt practices which constituted the apostasy, are foretold. And as the apostle hath introduced this prophecy immediately after his account of the mystery of godliness, may we not conjecture that his design in so doing was, to give the faithful an opportunity of comparing the apostasy, called, in the epistle to the Thessalonians, the mystery of iniquity, with the mystery of godliness, that they might be the more sensible of the pernicious nature of the apostasy, and be excited to oppose it in all its stages?

4. Giving heed (παρακαταλαμβάνω) to deceiving spirits;]-that is, to false pretensions to inspiration, which cause men to err from the true faith of the gospel. The apostle means those gross frauds by which the corrupt teachers, in the dark ages, were to enforce their erroneous doctrines and superstitious practices on the ignorant multitude, under the notion of revelations from God, or from angels, or from departed saints. In this sense the word spirits is used 1 John iv. 1. 'Believe not every spirit; every pretender to inspiration; but try the spirits whether they are of God.'

5. And to doctrines concerning demons.]-For this translation, see Essay iv. 24. The word translated demons was used by the Greeks, to denote a kind of beings of a middle nature between God and man. See 1 Cor. x. 20. note 1. Col. ii. 8. notes. They gave the same name also to the souls of some departed men, who they thought were exalted to the state and honour of demons for their virtue. See Newton on Prophecy, vol. ii. p. 418. The former sort they called superior demons, and supposed them to have the nature and office which we ascribe to angels: The latter they termed inferior demons. These were of the same character with the Romish saints: And both sorts were worshipped as mediators. When, therefore, the Spirit of God foretold, in an audible manner, that in after-times 'many would give heed to deceiving spirits, and to doctrines concerning demons,' he foretold, that on the authority of feigned revelations, many in the church would receive the doctrine concerning the worship of angels and saints, and the praying of souls out of purgatory; and called it the doctrine of demons, because it was in reality the same with the ancient heathenish worship of demons, as mediators between the gods and men. Farther, the sin for which many were punished with the plague of the Euphrates horsemen is said, Rev. ix. 20. to be 'their worshipping (προσκύνησις) demons; that is, angels and saints; not devils, as our translators have rendered the word. For in no period of the church were devils worshipped by Christians. Epiphanius, quoting this text, adds to it the following clause: 'For they will be worshippers of the dead, as in Israel also they were worshipped,' alluding to the Israelites worshipping Baalim and Ashtaroth. Beza and Mann contend, that this addition is a part of the inspired original. But Mede and Mill think it a marginal explication, because it is found only in one ancient MS. On supposition, however, that it is a marginal explication, it shews what the ancients took to be the meaning of this text.

Ver. 2.-1. Through the hypocrisy of liars.]-This is a more literal, and, at the same time, a more just translation of the words, ὑποκριτῶν ψευδολόγων, than that given in our Bible, which, by construing ψευδολόγων with λαλῶντων, represents the demons speaking lies in hypocrisy, as every person skilled in the Greek language must acknowledge. The hypocrisy here mentioned, is that feigned show of extraordinary piety and sanctity which the lying teachers were to put on, with an intention to gain the confidence of the multitude. Hence they are described as 'having the form of godliness, but denying the power,' 2 Tim. iii. 5.-These hypocritical teachers are called liars, because of the gross fictions and frauds which they were to contrive for the purpose of establishing the worship of demons. How well the appellation agrees to the Romish clergy in the dark ages, any one may understand who is acquainted with the lies then propagated, concerning the apparitions of angels, and of the ghosts of departed saints, and concerning the miracles done by them, and by their relics, and by the sign of the cross, &c. all preached by monks, and priests, and even bishops; and committed to writing in the fabulous legends of their saints, to render them objects of adoration.

2. Who are seared in their own conscience.]-Scire thinks this clause should be translated, 'who are burnt in their conscience;' meaning, that these impostors would bear in their consciences indelible marks of their atrocious crimes, as malefactors bear in their bodies marks impressed with red-hot irons, in token of their crimes. This opinion Bengelius, spouses, and supports it by a passage from Plato's Gorgias. But the translation I have adopted gives a meaning equally emphatical and proper.

Ver. 3.-1. Who forbid to marry.]-This false morality was very early introduced into the church, being taught first by the Encratites and Marconites, and afterwards by the Manichæans, who said marriage was the invention of the evil god, and who considered it as sinful to bring creatures into the world to be unhappy, and to be food for death. In process of time the monks embraced celibacy, and represented it as the highest pitch of sanctity. At length celibacy was recommended by the priests, and by the orthodox themselves, and more especially by the bishops of Rome, the great patrons of the worship of angels and saints. For they strictly enjoined their clergy, both regular and secular, to abstain from marriage. Thus, the worship of demons, and the prohibition of marriage, though naturally unconnected, have gone hand in hand in the church, as the Spirit here foretold.

2. And command.]-In the original of this passage there is the boldest ellipsis which is anywhere found in the New Testament. For, as the ancient commentators observe, it requires the word command to be supplied, whose meaning is directly opposite to the meaning of the word expressed in the clause immediately preceding, although it appears to stand in construction with it.

3. To abstain from meats.]-The lying teachers, who enjoined the worship of demons, were likewise to command the faithful to abstain from meats. This part of the prophecy hath been exactly fulfilled. For it is as much the rule of the monks and nuns to abstain from meats, as from marriage. Besides these rules to certain classes of men, the lying teachers instituted particular times and days of fasting, to be observed by all Christians without exception: namely, the forty days of Lent, and two days every week, whereon to taste flesh is a sin. Here, therefore, the apostle hath pointed out two instances of the hypocrisy of the lying teachers who were to enjoin the worship of demons. Under the false pretence of holiness, they were to recommend abstinence from marriage to the monks, and friars, and nuns; and under the equally false pretence of devotion, they were to enjoin abstinence from meats to some men at all times, and to all men at some times. But there is no necessary connexion between the worship of demons and abstinence from marriage and meats; consequently the Spirit of God alone could foretell that these two hypocrites were to be employed for the purpose of recommending the worship of demons.

4. Created to be received with thanksgiving by the faithful.]-It is an observation of Bishop Newton, that "man is free to partake of all the good creatures of God: But thanksgiving is the necessary condition. What then can be said of those who have their tables spread with the most plentiful gifts of God, and yet constantly sit down and rise up again, without suffering so much as one thought of the Giver to intrude upon them? Can such persons be reputed either to believe, or know the truth?" See 1 Thess. v. 17. note.

5. Who thoroughly know the truth]-concerning meats, namely, that every creature of God is good, &c. as it is expressed in the next verse. See also Rom. xiv. 14. This knowledge is necessary to render the eating of all kinds of meat lawful, and to give us satisfaction in the use of them.

5 For it is sanctified (ἁγιασθε, 96.) by the command of God, and (προσεύχεσθε) or prayer.

6 Laying these things before the brethren,¹ thou wilt be a good minister of Jesus Christ, nourished by the words of the faith, and of the good doctrine, to the knowledge of which² thou hast attained.

7 But profane and old wives' fables¹ reject; (ἅ) and exercise thyself (ἄσχε) to godliness.²

8 For bodily exercise is profitable for little;¹ but godliness is profitable for all things, having the promise of the present life, and of that to come.² (See chap. vi. 19.)

9 This saying is true, (see 1 Tim. i. 15. note 1.), and worthy of all reception.

10 (Εκ τούτο γὰρ, 91.) Besides, for this we both labour and suffer reproach, (ὅτι) that we trust¹ in the living God, who is (ἐσθλὸς) the Saviour² of all men, especially of believers.

11 These things give in charge, and teach.

12 Let no one despise thy youth: But be thou a pattern to the believers in speech, in behaviour,¹ in love, in spirit,² in faith, in chastity.³ (See Tit. ii. 5.)

13 Till I come, apply thyself to reading,¹ to exhortation, to teaching, (διδασκαλία). See 2 Tim. iii. 16. note 3.

Ver. 5.—1. Laying these things, &c.]—If any prejudices with respect to the distinction of meats remained in Timothy's mind, through the strictness of his education in the Jewish religion, the clear and express manner in which the apostle here asserted the lawfulness of eating all kinds of meats, must have entirely freed him from these prepossessions.

2. To the knowledge of which thou hast attained.]—That the expression in the original, ἐπὶ τῇ ἐπιστάσει, is rightly translated 'to the knowledge of which thou hast attained,' will appear from the Bible translation of Luke i. 3. Παρεβόλου δὲ οὐκ ἔσθ' ἡμῶν πάλιν ἀπεβόλ' ὥς, 'Having had perfect understanding, (that is, knowledge), of all things from the very first.'

Ver. 7.—1. Profane and old wives' fables.]—Eusebius saith the context directs us to understand this, not of the Jewish traditions, which indeed were most incredible and senseless tales, but of the Simonian fables. For these heretics, as Irenæus, Epiphanius, and Augustine inform us, framed long tales concerning a good and an evil God, the creation of the world, the wars of the angels, &c. which were both impious and absurd. But, in Bishop Newton's opinion, the apostle here insinuates, that all the things which the lying teachers were to preach, concerning the worship of angels and saints, abstinence from marriage and meats, and the miracles said to be performed by the saints and their relics in confirmation of the superstitions which they inculcated, are no better than profane and old wives' fables, told to amuse children.

2. And exercise thyself to godliness.]—ἄσχεσθαι. This is an allusion to the exercises by which the Athletes prepared themselves for the combats. The apostle's meaning is, That by the exercise of godliness, men prepare themselves for the employments of the life to come; see ver. 8. note 1.

Ver. 8.—1. Bodily exercise is profitable for little.]—In this verse the apostle condemns, not only the austerities of the Essenes and Pythagoreans, but, if we may believe Eusebius, Whitty, Doddridge, and others, the exercises also by which the Greeks prepared themselves for the combats. Eusebius was of this opinion, because the word γυμνασία is used; which, though it signifies exercise in general, was the technical word for that kind of exercise which the Athletes performed naked, as a preparation for the combats.

2. Having the promise of the present life, and of that to come.]—According to Warburton, the apostle's meaning is, That godliness is profitable for all things, as having in the law the promise of happiness in the present life, and in the Gospel the promise of happiness in the life to come. But there are promises in the gospel likewise, of the good things of this life to the godly: Matt. vi. 20. 'If God so clothe the grass of the field,' &c.—ver. 33. 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.'—Mark x. 29. 'There is no man that hath left house, &c. for my sake and the gospel's, 30. But he shall receive an hundred fold now in this time,' &c. These promises, however, do not

5 For, under the gospel, all meats are made lawful to us by the command of God, allowing us to eat of every kind in moderation; also by prayer to God, that he would bless us in the use of it.

6 By laying these things, concerning the lawfulness of all sorts of meats, and concerning the corrupt doctrines and practices which are to arise in the church, before the brethren in Ephesus under thy care, thou wilt be a faithful minister of Jesus Christ, nourished by the precepts of the true faith and of the sound doctrine, to the knowledge of which thou hast attained by my instructions.

7 But the foolish stories and old wives' fables which the Judaizers tell to establish their false doctrines, reject, as tending to impiety; and employ thyself in these exercises of the understanding and of the affections, in which godliness consists.

8 For the bodily mortification which the Jewish fables are framed to recommend, is attended with little advantage; but the exercise of godliness, that is, the practice of piety and morality, is profitable for advancing all our interests, temporal and eternal, having the blessings of the present life and of that to come promised to it.

9 What I have said concerning the unprofitableness of bodily exercise, and the profitableness of godliness, is true, and worthy of the most hearty reception.

10 On account of this, I both endure great hardships and suffer reproach from Jews and Gentiles, that I trust to be made happy both here and hereafter, neither through bodily exercise, nor through the sacrifice of beasts, nor through the power of any idol, but by the living God, who is the preserver of all men, but especially of believers.

11 These things solemnly enjoin as God's express commands, and teach the believers to act suitably to them.

12 Let no one have reason to despise thy admonitions on account of thy youth: But be thou a pattern to the faithful in gravity of speech, in propriety of behaviour, in fervency of love to God and man, in meekness but firmness of spirit, in soundness of faith, in chastity.

13 Till I return, apply thyself to reading the scriptures to the people in the public assemblies. Read them likewise in private for thine own improvement: also apply thyself to exhorting those who err, and to teaching the young and ignorant.

ascertain to every individual who lives in a godly manner, health, and wealth, and reputation; but they assure us that piety and virtue have a natural tendency to promote our temporal welfare, and commonly do promote it. Or, if, in particular instances, through cross accidents, it happens otherwise, the consciousness of a well-spent life affords unspeakably more delight, than the enjoyment of temporal prosperity affords to those who, being destitute of godliness, have no hope of happiness in the life to come.

Ver. 10.—1. That we trust.]—The word ἐσθλὸς being in the perfect tense, denotes here, as in many other passages, continuation of action: 'We have trusted, and at present do trust, in the living God.'

2. Who is the Saviour.]—Some understanding the word ἐσθλὸς, Saviour, in a spiritual sense, contend that the apostle in this passage teaches, that all who are sincere in the belief and practice of the religion which they profess, shall be saved eternally. But the context, which speaks of 'the promise of the present life' as belonging to godliness, directs us to understand this word as I have done, agreeably to its use in other passages: Psal. xxxvi. 6. Ὁ κύριος καὶ σπῆσαι τὸν ἐσθλόν ἐπιτίμι, 'Lord, thou preservest man and beast.'—Job vii. 20. 'I have sinned—O thou preserver of men.' God preserves both man and beast by the care of his providence; but saves believers from eternal death.

Ver. 12.—1. In behaviour.]—The word ἄσχεσθαι is often used in scripture to denote a man's moral and religious conduct. Stephen in his Thesaur, saith, the Greek authors do not use it in that sense. But it is certainly a very proper sense of the word, according to its etymology. For it literally signifies a turning backwards and forwards, as persons do who follow their business.—The metaphorical sense of this word is better expressed, in English, by behaviour than conversation.

2. In spirit.]—This is wanting in the Alexandrian, Clermont and some other ancient MSS.; also in the Syriac and Vulgate versions.—Some are of opinion that spirit here means the spiritual gifts with which Timothy was endowed, and in the exercise of which he was to be a pattern to the believers. But as all the other directions relate to moral qualities, the interpretation given of spirit in the commentary appears more natural; especially as ver. 14. contains a direction to Timothy, concerning the proper use of his spiritual gift.

3. In chastity.]—The Romish commentators contend that by ἐν τῇ ἀσχεσίᾳ, chastity, the apostle in this passage enjoins celibacy to the clergy. But the word is used to denote chastity of speech and behaviour in general; and, Titus ii. 4, 5. it signifies chastity in those who are married.

Ver. 13. Apply thyself to reading.]—Besides reading the Jewish scriptures to the brethren in their assemblies for worship after the example of the synagogue, Timothy was here directed to read these scriptures in private likewise for his own improvement, ver. 15. that he might be able to confute the Jews and Judaizers, who founded

14 Neglect not the spiritual gift¹ which is in thee, which was given thee (dox) according to prophecy,² (μυστα) together with the imposition of the hands³ of the eldership.⁴

15 Make these things thy care:¹ Be wholly employed in them,² that thy proficiency may be evident to all.

16 Take heed to thyself, and to THE doctrine; continue in them: for, in doing this, thou wilt both save thyself and them who hear thee.¹

14 That thou mayest understand the scriptures, neglect not to exercise the spiritual gift which is in thee, which was given thee by the imposition of my hands, according to a prophetic impulse, together with the imposition of the hands of the eldership at Lystra, who thereby testified their approbation of thy ordination as an evangelist.

15 Make these things, the things mentioned ver. 13., the objects of thy constant care: Be wholly employed in the practice of them, that thy proficiency in knowledge and goodness may be evident to all.

16 Take heed to behave suitable to thy character as an evangelist, and to teach true doctrine; and continue to take heed to thyself, and to thy doctrine; for, in doing this, thou wilt both save thyself, and be the instrument of saving them who hear and obey thy instructions.

their errors or misinterpretations of the scriptures. Thus understood, the direction, as the ancient commentators observe, is an useful lesson to the ministers of the gospel in all ages. For if a teacher, who possessed the spiritual gifts, was commanded to read the scriptures for improving himself in the knowledge of the doctrines of religion, how much more necessary is that help to those teachers who must derive all their knowledge of the gospel from the scriptures, and who cannot, without much study, be supposed to know the customs, manners, and opinions alluded to in these writings!

Ver. 14.—1. Neglect not the spiritual gift which is in thee.]—The word χρημα commonly denotes the spiritual gifts conferred on believers in the first age, whether by an immediate illapse of the Holy Ghost, or by the imposition of the apostle's hands. Rom. i. 10. For the meaning of this exhortation see 1 Thess. v. 19. note.

2. Given thee according to prophecy.]—The spiritual gift was given to Timothy by the laying on of the apostle's hands. So the apostle himself affirms, 2 Tim. i. 6. Here he tells him he gave it to him by or 'according to prophecy'; that is, by a particular inspiration moving him so to do. For, in conferring the spiritual gifts, as well as in working miracles, the apostles were not left to their own prudence, but were directed by a particular inspiration, called in this passage πνευματικα προφητια. See 1 Cor. xii. 10. note 2. at the close. By the same kind of inspiration, particular persons were pointed out by the prophets as fit to be invested with sacred functions. Thus Timothy had the inspection of the church at Ephesus committed to him by St. Paul, 1 Tim. i. 18. κατα τας προφητειας, 'according to the prophecies which went before concerning him.'

3. Together with the imposition of the hands of the eldership.]—Since it appears from 2 Tim. i. 6. that the apostle, by the imposition of his own hands alone, conferred on Timothy the spiritual gift here mentioned, we must suppose that the eldership at Lystra laid their hands on him, only to shew their concurrence with the apostle in setting Timothy apart to the ministry by prayer; in the same manner as the prophets at Antioch, by the command of the Holy Ghost, separated Paul and Barnabas by prayer to the work to which they were appointed. The order in which the apostle mentions these transactions, leads us to think, that the first conferred on Timothy the gift of the Spirit by the laying on of his own hands; then set him apart to the work of an evangelist by prayer, accompanied with the laying on of the hands of the eldership.

4. Hands of the eldership.]—For an account of the eldership, see 1 Tim. v. 17. note 1.—This is generally understood of the eldership of Lystra, who, it is supposed, were the brethren who recommended Timothy to the apostle, Acts xvi. 3. But Estius thinks the eldership of Ephesus is here meant; and conjectures that Timothy was made bishop of Ephesus by the laying on of their hands. But if that had been the case, the apostle, when leaving Ephesus, need not have entreated Timothy to abide in Ephesus to oppose the false teachers. His ordination as bishop of Ephesus, and his acceptance of that office, fixed him there.—Bengellus somewhere says, Timothy and Titus were not bishops, the one of Ephesus the other of Crete, but the apostle's vicars in these churches. What it is to be the vicar of an apostle, I confess I do not understand.

Ver. 15.—1. Make these things thy care.]—So ταυτα σου σημανεις. Thus Hierodotus (Gale's edit. p. 15.) says of an lately married, Taura i sui pates, these things are now his care.

2. Be wholly employed in them.]—On this passage Bengellus writes as follows: "In his quiet, minus erit in socialibus mundanis, in studiis alienis, in colligendis libris, conchiliis, nummis, quibus multi pastores, notabilium status partem insistentes, conterunt."

Ver. 16. Thou wilt both save thyself and them who hear thee.]—What a powerful argument is here suggested, to engage ministers to preach the doctrines of the gospel truly and diligently, and to set a good example before their flock. By thus faithfully discharging their duty, they will save themselves eternally; and, by their good doctrine and example, impressing their hearers with a just sense of the obligations of religion, and persuading them to become religious, they will be the instruments of saving them likewise. Other power to save is not competent to man.

CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Directions contained in this Chapter.

BECAUSE it is the duty of ministers to reprove such of their people as err, and because the success of reproof, in a great measure, depends on the manner, in which it is given, the apostle, in this chapter, directed Timothy how to admonish the old and the young of both sexes, ver. 1, 2.—Next, he ordered him to appoint a proper maintenance for those widows who, being poor, and having no relations able to maintain them, were employed by the church in the honourable and useful office of teaching the younger women the principles of religion, and in forming their manners, ver. 3.—And to prevent the church from being burdened with too great a number of poor widows, the apostle ordered all to maintain their own poor relations who were able to do it; because so God hath commanded, ver. 4.—And, that Timothy might have a clear rule to walk by in this business, the apostle described the circumstances, character, age, qualifications, and virtues of those widows, who might fitly be maintained by the church, and employed in teaching the younger women, ver. 5–10.—as also the character and age of those who were to be rejected, if they offered themselves to be employed and maintained in that manner, ver. 11–15.—And that the church might be under no necessity of employing any widows as teachers, but such as were really desolate, the apostle, a second time, ordered the rich to take care of their own aged female relations who were poor, ver. 16.

With respect to those elders who were employed as presidents in the church, and in determining controversies about worldly matters between man and man, the apostle ordered Timothy to allot to them an honourable maintenance out of the church's funds; especially if to the office of presiding they joined that of preaching and teaching, ver. 17, 18.—And for guarding the character of those who bare sacred offices against malicious attacks, he forbade Timothy to receive any accusation against an elder, unless it was of such a nature that it could be proved, and was actually offered to be proved, by two or three credible witnesses, ver. 19.—But being so proved, he required him to rebuke the guilty person publicly, that others might fear, ver. 20.—without shewing, in that affair, either prejudice against or partiality for any person, ver. 21.—On the other hand, that those who held sacred offices might give as little occasion as possible for accusations, the apostle ordered Timothy to ordain no person a bishop or deacon rashly; but, previous to that step, to inquire into the character and conduct of the candidate with the greatest strictness. And to excite him to the more care in this important part of his duty, he told him, that by ordaining unfit persons to sacred functions, he would make himself a partaker of all the sins they might commit in executing such holy offices, inconsiderately bestowed on them, ver. 22.—Next, he directed him to take care of his health, which, considering the office he was appointed to, was of great consequence to the church, ver. 23.—Then gave him a rule, by which he was to guide himself in judging of the characters and qualifications of the persons he proposed to ordain as bishops and deacons, ver. 24, 25.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. V.—1 When reproof is necessary, do not severely rebuke an old man, but beseech him, as thou wouldst beseech thy father in the like case; and the young men who sin, as if they were thy own brothers.

2 The old women beseech, as if they were mothers to thee, and the young, as if they were thy sisters, observing the strictest chastity in speech and behaviour towards them.

3 With respect to widows who are to be maintained by the church as teachers, my command is, Employ and maintain those only who are really widows, or desolate.

4 But if any widow have children or grandchildren able to maintain her, let not the church employ her as a teacher; but let these relations learn first piously to take care of their own family, and, then to make a just return of maintenance to their aged parents for their care in bringing them up. For this attention to parents in poverty is good for society, and acceptable in the sight of God. See ver. 8. 16.

5 Now, to shew these who the widows are of whom I speak, she who is really a widow and desolate, besides being poor and friendless, is of a pious disposition; she trusteth in God for her support, and continueth in deprecations and prayers night and day. Such a widow will take pleasure in instructing the young.

6 But the widow who liveth in gaiety and luxury is dead while she liveth in that manner, and should not be employed as a teacher of the young.

7 Now, these things concerning the obligation lying on children to maintain their parents, charge the Ephesians to perform, that they may be blameless in that matter.

8 For if any one professing Christianity maintaineth not his own poor relations, and especially those with whom he hath lived in family, he hath renounced the faith of the gospel, and is worse than an infidel; many of whom would be ashamed of thus violating the obligations of nature and humanity.

9 Let not any widow be taken into the number of teachers of the young under sixty years old, having neither been an harlot, nor a

Ver. 1.—1. Do not severely rebuke.]—This is the proper translation of the phrase Μὴ ἐπιτιμᾷς, which literally signifies, Do not strike; and metaphorically, Do not sharply reprove.

2. An old man.]—In scripture πρεσβύτερος commonly signifies an elder. But as it is here opposed to νεώτερος, the young, in the following clause, it is not the name of an office, as it is ver. 17. 19, but it denotes simply advanced age.—In ver. 20. the apostle ordered Timothy to rebuke before all, them who sinned in an atrocious or open manner, even though they were elders. I therefore suppose he is, in this passage, speaking of offences which were to be reprov'd in private. And in that case, when the party in fault was either an old man, or an old woman, the respect due to age, especially from a young teacher, such as Timothy was, makes the apostle's rule in admonishing them highly proper.

Ver. 3.—1. Honour widows.]—For the meaning of the word ἀγαπάω, see ver. 17. note 3.—The Greek commentators inform us that the widows of whom the apostle speaks in this passage, were aged women appointed by the church to instruct the young of their own sex in the principles of the Christian faith, and who for that service were maintained out of the funds of the church. See 1 Tim. iii. 11. note 1. This opinion of the Greek commentators is rendered probable by the apostle's order to Timothy, ver. 9. to admit none into the number of widows without inquiring into their age, circumstances, character, and qualifications, even as in ordaining bishops and deacons. See ver. 16. note 2.

2. Who are really widows.]—By a real widow is to be understood one who is desolate, ver. 5; one who is not able to maintain herself, and who has no near relations in a condition to maintain her. Because in the first age the poor were maintained by the church, ver. 16. the apostle, to lessen the number of the poor, ordered Timothy in this passage to honour, that is, to employ and maintain as teachers, only such poor widows as had no relations able to maintain them. This was a prudent regulation, because, by employing as teachers widows really desolate, an honourable office, with a decent maintenance, was allotted to worthy persons, who at any rate must have been supported by the church. See ver. 16.

Ver. 4. Let these learn first piously to take care of their own family.]—ἵνα ἑαυτοὺς, ἄρτι, may signify that we are to maintain our own family before we maintain our parents; because, our wives and children depending on us for their support, if we were to neglect them for the sake of maintaining our parents, they would become a burden on the public, which, in that case, would not be benefited by our piety towards our parents. But after maintaining our family, if we have to spare, we are to requite our parents for the care they have taken of us in our nonage, by maintaining them when reduced to poverty. This is a duty so sacred, that a family of real Christians will cheerfully submit to some hardships, rather than suffer their parents to live on the charity of others.

Ver. 5.—1. Really a widow and desolate.]—The word ἀπαισ signifies reduced to solitude. The apostle, I suppose, alludes to the signification of χρηεῖς, which comes from χρεός, orbis, desertus, aut aliqua re indigens.—Scapula.

2. Trusteth in God.]—ἠσπασεν, hath trusted and continueth to trust. See iv. 10.

Ver. 6.—1. She who liveth in pleasure.]—The word εὐσταλώς signifies who fareth deliciously. See, concerning this word, James v. 5. note 2.

2. Is dead while she liveth.]—She is spiritually dead; dead to virtue and religion. This may be said of every wicked person, but especially of the widows described in this verse. Our Lord likewise used the word dead to express extreme wickedness: 'Let the dead bury their dead.' The philosophers represented those as dead, who abandoned their sect, and gave themselves up to sensual pleasures.

Ver. 7. These things give in charge, that they may be blameless.]—The gender of the word ἐπιτιμᾷς shews, that the Ephesian brethren, not the widows, were the persons to whom Timothy was to give these things in charge.

Ver. 8.—1. Especially those of his family.]—Some translate οἰκίαν, of the household, namely, of faith; and support their translation by Gal. vi. 10. See the note on that verse. But I rather think the apostle means one's parents, and brothers, and sisters, and other near relations.

2. He hath denied the faith.]—To disobey the precepts of the gospel, is to deny or renounce the faith of the gospel. So the apostle thought. Wherefore, 'the faith of the gospel' includes obedience to its precepts.

3. Is worse than an infidel.]—Many of the heathens, being sensible of the obligations they were under to take care of their relations, especially their parents, affectionately maintained them, when they became unable, through age or poverty, to support themselves.

Ver. 9.—1. Under sixty.]—ἑξήκοντα, supp. ἡλικίαν, ad minimum.

10 Borne witness to for good works; (u. 127.) that she hath brought up children, that she hath lodged strangers,¹ that she hath washed the saints' feet, that she hath relieved the afflicted, that she hath diligently followed every good work.

11 But the younger widows reject: for when they cannot endure Christ's rein,¹ they will marry;

12 Incurring condemnation, because they have put away their first fidelity.¹

13 And at the same time also they learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house; and not only idle, but tattlers also,¹ and meddlers, speaking things which they ought not.

14 I command, therefore, young WIDOWS¹ to marry, to bear children, to govern the house, to give no occasion to the adversary for reproach.

15 For already some are turned aside (πρὸς) after Satan.¹

16 If any believing man or believing woman have widows,¹ let them relieve them,² and let not the church be burdened, that it may relieve those who are really widows.

The Latins likewise use the word minimum for ad minimum.—Bengelius saith (u. 127) is put here adverbially.

2. Having been the wife of one husband;—namely, at a time. For although it was not the custom among civilized nations for women to be married to more than one husband at a time, if a woman divorced her husband unjustly, and after that married herself to another man, she really had two husbands. See the note on ver. 14. of this chapter, and 1 Tim. iii. 2. note 1.—Because the Latins used the word uxorita to denote a woman who from her virginity had been married only to one man; and because that kind of monogamy was reckoned honourable in some of the heathen priests and priestesses, Whitty supposes the apostle ordered bishops to be the husbands of one wife, and widows to have been the wives of one husband in the sense above described, that they might be nothing inferior to the heathen ministers of religion. But, in my opinion, he would have spoken more conformably to truth, if he had said that the corrupters of Christianity enjoined these things to Christian bishops, and deacons, and widows, that they might, in the eyes of the people, be nothing inferior to the heathen priests and priestesses.

Ver. 10. That she hath lodged strangers, &c.)—This, and the other good works mentioned by the apostle, being attended with great expense, the poor widows who desired to be taken into the number, cannot be supposed to have performed them at their own charges. I therefore suppose the apostle is speaking of female deacons, who had been employed in the offices here mentioned at the common expense; consequently the meaning of the direction will be, that, in choosing widows, Timothy was to prefer those who formerly had been employed by the church as deaconesses, and had discharged that office with faithfulness and propriety. For since these women had spent the prime of their life in the laborious offices of love mentioned by the apostle, without receiving any recompense but maintenance, it was highly reasonable, when grown old in that good service, to promote them to an honourable function, which required knowledge and experience rather than bodily strength, and which was rewarded with a liberal maintenance.

Ver. 11. When they cannot endure Christ's rein.]—Καταρτησιν, to pull away, and πρὸς, reins; and that the metaphor is taken from high-fed brute animals, who, having pulled away the reins, run about at their pleasure. Glassius and Le Clerc translate the clause 'who do not obey the rein.' Estius, following the Greek commentators, supposes that τοῦ Χριστοῦ is governed by πρὸς in the compound word καταρτησιν, and that the meaning is, they pull the rein contrary to Christ, whilst he restrains them from marriage. But whatever the etymology of this word may be, the apostle plainly means, that the younger widows who had undertaken the office of teaching the novices of their own sex, not being able to continue under that restraint from marriage which they had laid on themselves by devoting themselves to the service of Christ, and which the nature of their office required, would marry and desert his service. See ver. 15.—The simple word relinquere is used, Rev. xviii. 2—9. to denote one's living voluptuously.

Ver. 12. They have put away their first fidelity.]—Among other things, πρὸς, faith, signifies fidelity in performing promises and concubine, but the wife of one husband at a time; consequently, hath governed her passions properly in her youth.

10 Farther, she must be one who is borne witness to for good works; that she hath brought up children religiously and virtuously; that she hath formerly lodged strangers, even though heathens, that she hath washed the disciples' feet in their journeys, when they went about preaching the gospel, that she hath relieved the afflicted; in short, that she hath diligently performed every charitable work.

11 But the younger widows reject as teachers, because, when they cannot endure that restraint to which they have subjected themselves for Christ's sake, they will marry, and, by encumbering themselves with a family, they will render themselves unfit for teaching;

12 Subjecting themselves to condemnation, both from God and men, because, by marrying, they have renounced their first engagement to serve Christ.

13 And at the same time also they learn to be idle, wandering about from house to house, on pretence of following the duties of their office: And not only idle, but tale-bearers also, and meddlers in other people's affairs, publishing the secrets of families, which they ought not to divulge.

14 I command, therefore, young widows to marry, if a fit opportunity offers, to bear children, to govern the house with prudence, and, by behaving in all respects properly, to give no occasion to the adversaries of our religion to reproach the gospel, on account of the bad behaviour of those who profess it.

15 I am anxious to have these rules observed, because already some widows, whom the church hath employed as teachers, by marrying, are turned aside from that work to follow after Satan.

16 If any Christian man or Christian woman have poor widows nearly related to them, let them relieve them, if they are able, and let not the church be burdened with maintaining such as teachers, that it may relieve those who are really desolate, by employing and maintaining them as teachers of the younger women.

engagements: Rom. iii. 3. 'Will not their unbelief destroy (τρεῖν) the faithfulness (or fidelity) of God?'—Tit. ii. 10. 'Shewing all good (εὐεργετῶν) fidelity.' See also Gal. v. 22. 1 Tim. i. 12.—The faithfulness which the widows who married are here said to have put away, was their faithfulness to Christ, which they had virtually plighted when they took on them the office of teaching the younger women; for by marrying they put it out of their power to perform that office with the attention and assiduity which it required.

Ver. 13. Tattlers also.]—The word φλυση, garrula et inepte loquaces, signifies persons given to idle talk, a vice to which women who go about from house to house are commonly much addicted.

Ver. 14. I command, therefore, young widows to marry.]—As the discourse is concerning widows, that word is rightly supplied here. From this command it is evident, that under the gospel second marriages are lawful both to men and to women; and that abstaining from them is no mark of superior piety. Hence a presumption arises, that 'the wife of one husband,' ver. 9, doth not mean a woman who had been married only once, but a woman who had been married to one husband only at a time. See 1 Tim. iii. 2. note 1.—It is true the apostle, in his first epistle to the Corinthians, advised all who had the gift of continency to remain unmarried; not, however, because celibacy is a more holy state than marriage, but because, in the then persecuted state of the church, a single life was more free from trouble and temptation. So he told them, 1 Cor. vii. 9. 26. 32. 39. Wherefore the papists, who at all times recommend a single life to those who aim at superior sanctity, misunderstand the apostle, when they affirm that he considered celibacy as a more holy state than wedlock. For, if that were true, why did he order that aged widows, who had been married to one husband, should be employed to teach the young of their own sex, and not rather aged women who never had been married at all? Also, why did he make it a qualification of the bishop, that he should be the husband of one wife; and not rather that he should be an unmarried person, and continue unmarried all his life?—As the requisition, that a bishop should be the husband of one wife, did not make it necessary that every bishop should be a married man, (1 Tim. iii. 2. note 1. at the end), so the apostle's command to the younger widows to marry, did not oblige them to marry, if they could live chastely unmarried, and found it convenient, in other respects, so to do. Besides, every young widow might not have it in her power to marry.

Ver. 15. Some are turned aside after Satan.]—Some of the widows employed by the church as teachers, had, by marrying, incapacitated themselves for that excellent office. This the apostle termed 'a turning aside after Satan,' not because marriage is an unlawful state in itself, but because, through the temptation of Satan, they had deserted their station in the church.

Ver. 16.—1. Have widows;—that is, grandmothers, mothers, daughters, or sisters, who are poor widows. In the opinion of Estius, this precept extended to the proprietors of slaves, and bound them to maintain their slaves, when they became incapable of labour.

2. Let them relieve them.]—Εκπαιρξιν, suppedient, let them supply them, namely, with necessities.

At the conclusion of this discourse concerning widows, it may be proper to unite in one view the arguments which show that the apostle speaks therein, not of poor widows in general, but of those only who were to be employed and maintained as teachers.—1. It is ordered, ver. 9. that none should be admitted into the number under 'sixty years old'; neither any who had had 'more than one husband.' And, ver. 10. they were to be 'borne witness to for good works.' But many widows under sixty, many who had been married to two husbands successively, and many who were not borne witness to for good works, might, by disease and misfortune, be reduced to extreme want. All these certainly were not to be excluded from the alms of the church; as they must have been by the apostle's rules, if these rules related to poor widows in general.—2. The widow to be relieved by the church was one, ver. 10. 'who had brought up children,' &c. But these qualifications are not in every woman's power. Every woman is not capable of bearing and bringing up children, of lodging strangers, and of relieving the afflicted; because every woman's health and fortune do not enable her to do such good works. How then could the apostle make these the conditions on which a poor widow was to receive the alms of the church?—3. If by widows the apostle meant poor widows in general, who were to be relieved by the church, why should such, because they married a second time, have been condemned by him, ver. 11. as 'not enduring Christ's rein?' and ver. 12. as 'putting away their first faith?' and ver. 15. as 'turning aside after Satan?' A poor widow's second marriage, instead of being an offence, was a commendable action, as thereby the burden of her maintenance was removed from the church, and laid on her new husband.—4. We are told, ver. 13. that if young widows were received into the number, they would wander about from house to house, and become meddlers, &c. But if such were ordinary poor widows whom the church maintained, what occasion had they to wander about as beggars? Or if they did, what family would suffer them to meddle in their affairs?

On the other hand, if the widows, of whom the apostle speaks, were persons maintained and employed by the church to teach the younger women, every thing said concerning them will have the greatest propriety.—1. It was fit that such should be sixty years old before they were employed; because, being of a grave deportment, and well informed, their instruction would have the greater weight.—2. As it was required in a bishop that he should be an husband, that he might have some experience in the affairs of life, so the female teacher was to be a widow, that having been a wife, she might be capable of teaching the younger women the duties of the married state. And as it was required that a bishop should be the husband but of one wife at a time, so it was ordered that a widow should have been the wife but of one husband at a time; because, in both, it was a proof of that temperance with respect to sensual pleasure, which the teachers of religion ought to observe.—3. As the efficacy of instruction very much depends on the reputation of the teacher, it was required in a widow, that she should 'be well reported of for good works,' especially those which belong to the female sex. She was to have been a mother, that she might have a tender affection to the young women under her care; and she was to have 'brought up children,' that she might be fit to manage the tempers of her pupils. She was in the former part of her life, at the church's expense I suppose, to have 'lodged strangers, washed the saints' feet, and relieved the afflicted;' because these good works proved her to be a person of a benevolent heart; and who, as a teacher of religion, would take delight in promoting the eternal interest of those committed to her care.—4. That widows employed by the church in teaching should not marry, was absolutely necessary, not because a single state is more holy than wedlock, but because the cares of a family would occupy them so fully, that they would have little leisure to teach; and because their husbands might require their attendance at home.—Wherefore, since by marrying they relinquished an office acceptable to Christ and profitable to his church, which they had solemnly undertaken, they might be said 'not to endure Christ's rein, but to have put away their first fidelity,' and 'to have turned aside after Satan.'

Ver. 17.—1. Let the elders.—In the first age, the name πρεσβυτερος, elder, was given to all who exercised any sacred office in the church, as is plain from Acts. xxi. 23. where the persons are called bishops, who, ver. 17. were called elders. The same thing appears from Titus i. 5. where those are called elders, who, ver. 7. are named bishops; and from 1 Tim. iv. 14. where collectively all who held sacred offices in Lystra are called 'the presbytery or eldership,' and are said to have concurred with the apostle in setting Timothy apart to the ministry.—The persons who held sacred offices in the church were named elders, because they were commonly chosen from among the first or earliest converts. And in bestowing sacred offices on them, the apostle shewed great prudence; for by their early conversion, and their constancy in professing the gospel, notwithstanding the persecution they were exposed to, the first converts discovered such a soundness of understanding, such a love of truth and goodness, and such fortitude, as rendered them very fit for sacred functions.

As soon as a number of persons in any city were converted, the apostle formed them into churches, by appointing the first converts to perform sacred offices steadily among them. This appears from Acts xiv. 21. where we are told, that Paul and Barnabas having taught many in Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, returned; and in passing through these cities, ver. 23. 'ordained them elders in every church.'—In like manner there were elders at Ephesus, Acts xx. 17.; and at Philippi there were several 17 Let the elders who preside prudently in your religious meetings, be counted worthy of double honour; let them have a liberal maintenance from the funds of the church; especially those who, besides presiding, labour in preaching and catechizing.

'bishops and deacons,' Philip. i. 1.; and at Thessalonica, some 'who laboured among them,' and others 'who presided over them,' and others, 'who admonished them,' are mentioned, 1 Thess. v. 12.—Farther, in the great cities, where the apostle Paul resided for years, it is reasonable to think the disciples became at length so numerous, that they could not all meet together for worship in one place, but must have assembled either in different places, or at different hours in the same place. In either case, these separate assemblies must have had different preachers, presidents, catechists, and deacons. Nay, if any of those separate assemblies was very numerous, it is probable that more persons than one were appointed to perform each distinct function. Yet, however great the multitude of the disciples, or however numerous the places where they assembled might be in any city, the brethren there were always considered as one church. This appears from the inscriptions of the apostle's epistles, where it is not said, 'to the churches at Corinth,' or 'to the churches at Ephesus,' but 'to the church in these cities.'—Farther, from what is said concerning Timothy's ordination to the ministry, 1 Tim. iv. 14. it would seem, that in ordaining persons to the ministry, the collective body of those who held sacred offices in any church, called the presbytery or eldership, signified their consent to the election of the candidate by laying their hands on him, accompanied with prayer.

Before this subject is dismissed, I will make three remarks. The first is, That although in the primitive church the offices of the ministry were various, and in large churches more persons than one were appointed to each office, yet in smaller churches, whose members could not afford maintenance to a numerous ministry, all the different sacred offices seem to have been performed by the bishops and deacons.—Their office therefore including all the sacred functions, nothing is said in scripture concerning the qualifications necessary in those who were to be made bishops and deacons.—My second remark is, That in the catalogues of the spiritual men whom Christ placed in his church, (Rom. xii. 6–8. 1 Cor. xii. 28. Eph. iv. 11.) bishops and deacons are not mentioned. The reason is, though many of the first bishops and deacons were endowed with spiritual gifts, it was not necessary that they should be spiritual men. All the duties of their office might be performed with the help of natural talents and acquired endowments.—My third remark is, That although the offices of the spiritual men were of great importance in the church, there is no account given in scripture of the qualifications necessary to the spiritual men, as of the qualifications necessary to bishops and deacons; because their office was to continue only for a time; and because they were placed in the church, not by the designation of men, but by the immediate designation of Christ himself, who placed them by the supernatural gifts with which he endowed them. The case was different with the bishops and deacons. Their offices were to continue in the church to the end of the world; and the persons who were to discharge these offices were to be chosen in every age, by men who, not having the gift of discerning spirits, needed to be directed in their choice. Particular rules, therefore, are given in scripture, for the election of fit persons to discharge these offices; and in making the choice, the church is left to apply these rules, according to the dictates of common prudence.

2. The elders who preside well.—This order of elders are called, Heb. xiii. 7. 17. 24. ἡγουμενοι, Guides, Rulers: And, Rom. xii. 8. προεσταντες, Presidents: And, 1 Thess. v. 12. they are distinguished from those 'who laboured among them and admonished them.'

In the early ages the duties of the president or ruler were very important. For, first, as the Christians denied, not only the power, but the existence of the heathen gods, and had no visible objects of worship of their own, they were considered as atheists; and their assemblies being supposed to be held for impious and seditious purposes, were liable to be disturbed by the rabble. It was, therefore, the business of the president to appoint places and times for the meeting of the brethren, which would be least offensive to the heathens, and where, if they were disturbed, they might most easily make their escape. The prudent carriage likewise of the presidents, and their discreet manner of speaking to their adversaries, who from curiosity or other motives came into their assemblies, might be of great use in conciliating their goodwill.

Secondly, The rulers presided in all the religious assemblies of the Christians, for the purpose of directing the public worship. And while the spiritual gifts existed in the church, they pointed out which of the spiritual men were to pray, which to sing psalms, and which to prophesy or preach; and determined the order wherein these offices were to be performed. Thus, to regulate the order in which the spiritual men were to exercise their gifts in the public assemblies was the more necessary, that individuals, from a vain desire of displaying their particular gifts, were apt to create confusion in the Christian assemblies, unless when restrained by the authority and prudence of the president.

Thirdly, The presidents heard and decided all the controversies about worldly matters, which arose among the brethren; and to their decision the faithful, after the apostle Paul ordered it, 1 Cor. vi. 1–6. readily submitted. This branch of the president's duty was very necessary. For the Christians being generally hated, on account of their opposition to the established idolatry were not likely to obtain a patient and equitable hearing from such inhuman judges. Besides, the laws of the empire allowing them, as Jews, to determine their own controversies by judges of their own appointment, they shewed a litigious disposition

18 For the scripture (Deut. xxv. 4.) saith, The ox treading out the corn thou shalt not muzzle; and, The labourer is worthy of his hire. (See Luke x. 7. and Matt. x. 10. where the expression is HIS MEAT.)

19 Against an elder receive not an accusation, unless (ver. 189.) by two or three witnesses.

20 Those who sin, rebuke before all, that others also may be afraid.

21 I charge thee, (ver. 220) in the presence of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ, and of the elect angels, (see 2 Tim. iv. 1.), that thou observe these things without prejudice,² doing nothing by partiality.³

22 Lay hands hastily on no one,⁴ neither partake of other men's sins. Keep thyself pure.

23 No longer drink water, but use a little wine, for thy stomach's sake⁵ and thy frequent infirmities.

24 Of some men the sins are very manifest going before to condemnation: (ver. 24) But in some (ver. 220.) especially they follow after.

25 In like manner also, the good works or some are very manifest, and those which are otherwise cannot be LONG hidden.

unbecoming their Christian profession, when they brought their suits into the heathen courts, and dishonoured all their brethren, by declaring that they thought there was not a wise and equitable person among them, to whose determination they could submit their disputes, 1 Cor. vi. 1-8.

Fourthly, The presidents managed the temporal affairs of the church as a society. The money collected by the brethren, for defraying the common expenses, supporting the poor, and maintaining those who were employed in sacred offices, was very early put into the presidents' hands, and from them the deacons received the share that was allotted for the poor; as did the teachers what belonged to them. And as the president was supposed to be a person of good understanding, prudent, and experienced in business, the brethren would naturally apply to him for advice respecting their worldly affairs, at least in all difficult cases.

3. Are worthy of double honour.]—The word τιμω signifies the honour done to a person, by bestowing on him such things as are necessary to his comfortable support: Acts xxviii. 10. 'Who also honoured us with many honours;' they gave us all things useful for our present support; and when we departed, they laden us with such things as were necessary.' Hence honour signifies the maintenance given to parents who are poor: Matt. xv. 6. 'And honour not his father or his mother.' It signifies likewise the maintenance given by the church to widows: ver. 3. 'Honour widows who are really widows.'—The double honour of which the elders who preside well are said to be worthy, is a liberal maintenance: For the Hebrews used the word double, to express plenty of any thing. Thus Elisha, at parting with Elijah, prayed that 'a double portion of his spirit might be upon him,' 2 Kings ii. 9. See also Rev. xviii. 6.—The office of ruling being allotted to persons of the most distinguished characters among the disciples, and the duties of their office leaving them little time to mind their own affairs, it was proper that they should receive a liberal maintenance from the church, to whose service they devoted the greatest part of their time and pains.

4. Especially those who labour in preaching and teaching.]—That διδακται signifies teaching, see 2 Tim. iii. 16. note 3. It seems in the apostle's days, some of the elders who presided employed themselves also in preaching and catechizing. This appears likewise from Heb. xiii. 7. 'Remember them who have the rule over you, who have spoken unto you the word of God.'—Among the presidents who laboured in teaching, the bishops were the chief. For of them it was required, not only that they should be 'apt to teach,' but, 1 Tim. iii. 4. that they should 'rule their own house well.' 5. For if a man know not how to rule his own house, how shall he take care of the church of God? The ability to rule was the more necessary in a bishop, because in small churches, as was formerly observed, chap. v. 17. note 1, it might happen that there was no ruler but the bishop. In churches where there were other rulers, the bishop we may suppose consulted them, and ruled in conjunction with them. In process of time, however, the bishops arrogated to themselves the whole power of ruling their own churches, both in spiritual and temporal affairs; as we learn from Pseudo-dionysius in his commentary on 1 Tim. v. 1. 'The custom of having elders, in imitation of the synagogue, whose only business it was to rule, and without whose advice nothing was to be 18 The duty of the faithful to maintain widows and elders, is enjoined both in the law and in the gospel. For the law saith to the Jews, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox while treading out the corn, but allow him to eat of that which he treadeth as a recompense for his labour; and in the gospel Christ enjoins the same duty, for this reason, that the labourer is worthy of his hire.

19 Against an elder, whether he be a bishop, a president, or a deacon, receive not an accusation, unless it is offered to be proved by two or three credible witnesses.

20 Those who, by the testimony of credible witnesses, are found in sin, rebuke before the whole church, that other elders also may be afraid to commit the like offences.

21 I charge thee, in the presence of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ, and of the chief angels, that thou observe these rules concerning the admonition of the old and the young, and the maintaining of widows and elders, and the censuring of sinners, without being prejudiced against any person; and doing nothing from favour.

22 Appoint no one to any sacred office hastily, without inquiring into his character and qualifications: Neither, by conferring those offices on unworthy persons, partake of other men's sins. In the whole of thy conduct, keep thyself blameless.

23 Thy health being of great importance to the church, no longer drink pure water, but mix a little wine with it, on account of the disorder of thy stomach, and thy many other bodily infirmities.

24 In judging of those who desire sacred offices, consider, that of some men the sins are very manifest, leading before inquiry to condemnation. Such reject. But in others especially, their sins are so concealed that the knowledge of them follows after inquiry. For which reason no one ought to be appointed to sacred offices hastily.

25 In like manner also, the good works and good qualities of some men are very manifest: Such may be admitted to sacred offices without any particular inquiry. And those which are not manifest cannot be long hidden, if an accurate inquiry be made.

done in the church, has, I know not for what reason, grown out of use, through the pride of the bishops, who wished to be themselves the only persons of consideration in the church." On the ancient practice mentioned in the foregoing passage, as Estius observes, the reformed founded their little councils, which they called consistories.—See a passage from Jerome's letter to Evaristus, quoted Tit. i. 5. note 3. where he shews in what manner bishops came to be raised above presbyters.

Ver. 18. The labourer is worthy of his hire.]—This, as well as what goeth before, is affirmed by the apostle to be said in the scripture, yet it is nowhere written in the Jewish scriptures. It is found only Matt. x. 10. Luke x. 7. The apostle therefore must have read either Matthew's or Luke's gospel, before he wrote this epistle. And seeing he quotes this saying as scripture, and represents it as of equal authority with the writings of Moses, it is a proof, not only of the early publication of these gospels, but of their authenticity as divinely inspired writings.—See what is written concerning the maintenance of the ministers of the gospel, 1 Cor. ix. 12. Gal. vi. 6.

Ver. 19. Unless by two or three witnesses.]—This I think is the proper translation of the clause. For I see no reason why an accusation against an elder should not be received unless in the presence of witnesses; but I see a good reason for not receiving such an accusation, unless it is offered to be proved by a sufficient number of credible witnesses. This method of proceeding puts a stop to groundless accusations of the ministers of religion.

Ver. 20. Those who sin, rebuke before all.]—That this was the practice of the synagogue Vitringa hath shewed, Vitr. Synagog. p. 729.

Ver. 21.—1. Elect angels.]—The Hebrews called things excellent in their kind, elect. See Eas. iv. 41.—Others think, the elect angels are those who minister to the heirs of salvation, and who in the execution of their office are witnesses of the conduct of the persons to whom they minister. Bengellus thinks there is here a reference to the general judgment.

2. Without prejudice.]—Περίεργος; This word signifies a judgment formed, before the matter judged hath been duly examined.

3. By partiality.]—Περίεργος; literally, a leaning to one side.—Partiality is a judgment guided by favour; but prejudice is a judgment dictated by hatred.

Ver. 22. Lay hands hastily on no one.]—This is another proof, that, in the first age, men were ordained to ecclesiastical functions by the imposition of the hands of those who were in the ministry before them. And the direction being addressed to Timothy alone, it is urged as a proof that the power of ordination was lodged, not with the presbytery or eldership, but with the bishop.

Ver. 23. Use a little wine for thy stomach's sake.]—Though this counsel might have been given to Timothy without inspiration, it was with propriety inserted in an inspired writing, because thereby the superstition of those who totally abstain from wine, and all fermented liquors, on pretence of superior sanctity, is condemned.—Some critics think this verse is not in its proper place: for which reason, Benson says, 'It should be read in a parenthesis, as a thought let in by the apostle, when he reflected on the state of the Christian church, Timothy's great usefulness in it, and his present sickly condition.'—How greatly the apostle esteemed Timothy as a fellow-labourer, and what an high value he put on his services in the gospel, may be seen Philip. ii. 19-22.

CHAPTER VI.

View and Illustration of the Precepts and Doctrines contained in this Chapter.

BECAUSE the law of Moses, Exod. xxi. 2. allowed no Israelite to be made a slave for life without his own consent, the Judaizing teachers, to allure slaves to their party, taught that, under the gospel likewise, involuntary slavery is unlawful. This doctrine the apostle condemned here, as in his other epistles, 1 Cor. vii. 20, 21, 22. Col. iii. 22., by enjoining Christian slaves to honour and obey their masters, whether they were believers or unbelievers, ver. 1, 2.—and by assuring Timothy, that if any person taught otherwise, he opposed the wholesome precepts of Jesus Christ, and the doctrine of the gospel, which in all points is conformable to godliness or sound morality, ver. 3.—and was puffed up with pride, without possessing any true knowledge—either of the Jewish or of the Christian revelation, ver. 4.—Next, the apostle told Timothy, that the Judaizers, who inculcated such a doctrine, did it to make gain of the slaves, whom they persuaded to embrace the gospel in the hope of thereby becoming freemen; and that these teachers esteemed that the best religion, which brought them the greatest gain, ver. 5.—But that true religion, with a competency, is great gain, ver. 6.—Whereas money is not real gain: it will not contribute in the least to make men happy in the life to come: For, as we brought nothing with us into the world, so it is certain that we can carry nothing out of it, ver. 7.—Therefore, instead of eagerly desiring to be rich, having food and raiment, we ought to be contented, ver. 8.—Especially as experience teaches, that they who are bent on becoming rich expose themselves to innumerable temptations, not only in the pursuit, but in the enjoyment of riches, by the many foolish and hurtful lusts which they engender, ver. 9.—Hence, the apostle justly calls the love of money the root of all the evil affections and actions which are in the world, ver. 10.—Covetousness, therefore, being both criminal and disgraceful in all, but especially in the ministers of religion, the apostle ordered Timothy, as a servant of God, to flee from the inordinate love of money, and from all the vices which it occasions; and to pursue righteousness, piety, faith, charity, patience, and meekness, ver. 11.—and to combat strenuously the good combat of faith, by making and maintaining the good confession concerning Jesus Christ, that he is the Son of God, ver. 12.—Then charged him, in the sight of God and of Jesus Christ, who himself witnessed under Pontius Pilate that confession, ver. 13.—to observe this commandment concerning it in an unblamable manner, whereby he would do his part in preserving the good confession in the world, till it was rendered indubitable by the appearing of Jesus Christ himself on earth, ver. 14.—whom God, the only Potentate in the universe, will, at the proper time, shew to all as his Son, by the glory and power with which he will send him to judge the world, ver. 15, 16.

But lest Timothy, from the foregoing severe condemnation of the love of money, might have inferred that it was a crime to be rich, the apostle, to obviate that mistake, ordered him to charge the rich, not to trust in uncertain riches for their happiness, but in God, who always liveth, and who bestoweth on men all their enjoyments, ver. 17.—and to make a proper use of their riches, by relieving the necessities of the poor, and promoting every good work, ver. 18.—Because thus they will provide for themselves a firm foundation to stand on, during the wreck of the world, and at the judgment, ver. 19.—Lastly, to make Timothy sensible how earnest the apostle was that he should preserve the doctrines of the gospel pure, he renewed his charge to him; and cautioned him to avoid the vain babbling of the Judaizers, and those misinterpretations of the scriptures by which they opposed the doctrine of the apostles, and which they falsely dignified with the name of knowledge, ver. 20.

-NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. VI.—1 Let whatever servants are under the yoke, esteem their own masters worthy of all honour,¹ that the name of God and the doctrine OF THE GOSPEL be not evil spoken of.

2 And they who have believing masters, let them not despise THEM because they are brethren: But let them serve THEM more,¹ because they are believers and beloved—who receive the benefit.² These things teach and exhort.

3 If any one teach differently,¹ and consent not² to THE wholesome (λογικῆς, 60.) commandments which ARE our Lord Jesus Christ's,³ and to the doctrine according to godliness,

Ver. 1. Esteem their masters worthy of all honour. —By ordering Timothy to teach slaves to continue with and obey their masters, the apostle hath shewed, that the Christian religion neither alters men's rank in life, nor abolishes any right to which they are entitled by the law of nature, or by the law of the country where they live.

Ver. 2.—1. But let them serve them more. —Instead of encouraging slaves to disobedience, the gospel makes them more faithful and conscientious. And by sweetening the temper of masters, and inspiring them with benevolence, it renders the condition of slaves more tolerable than formerly. For in proportion as masters imbibe the true spirit of the gospel, they will treat their slaves with humanity, and even give them their freedom, when their services merit such a favour.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. VI.—1 Let whatever Christian slaves are under the yoke of unbelievers, pay their own masters all respect and obedience that the character of God whom we worship may not be calumniated, and the doctrine of the gospel may not be evil spoken of, as tending to destroy the political rights of mankind. See Eph. vi. 5.

2 And those Christian slaves who have believing masters, let them not despise them, fancying that they are their equals, because they are their brethren in Christ; for though all Christians are equal as to religious privileges, slaves are inferior to their masters in station. Wherefore, let them serve their masters more diligently, because they who enjoy the benefit of their service are believers and beloved of God. These things teach, and exhort the brethren to practise them.

3 If any one teach differently, by affirming, that under the gospel slaves are not bound to serve their masters, but ought to be made free, and does not consent to the wholesome commandments which are our Lord Jesus Christ's, and to the doctrine of the gospel, which in all points is conformable to true morality,

2. Who receive the benefit. —Eisner hath shewed, that although the word benefitarius literally signifies to take hold of a thing on the opposite side, it signifies likewise to partake of, to receive, to enjoy. This sense is more suitable to the subject in hand, than to understand it, as some do, of the slave's taking hold of the benefit of the gospel on the one side, and the master on the other. Besides, benefitarius, benefit, is nowhere used to denote the gospel. —Mill mentions one MS. which reads εὐσεβείας, of the service, as the Syriac translator seems to have also done; —Qui contenti sunt ministerio eorum.

Ver. 3.—1. If any one teach differently. —That the apostle had the Judaizers in his eye here, is evident from Th. i. 10. 'There are many unruly and foolish talkers and deceivers, especially they of the circumcision: 11. Whose mouth must be stopp'd, who subvert whole families, teaching things which they ought not, for the sake of sordid gain.¹

4 He is puffed up with pride, (see 1 Tim. iii. 6. note 2.), knowing nothing; but is *distempered*¹ about questions and debates of words,² whereof come envy, strife, evil speakings, unjust suspicions,³

2. And consent not.]—Bentley, in his Phileteuth. Lips. p. 71, 72. affirms, that the word συζητων is no good Greek author signifies to consent. Yet it is a natural sense of the word: for the Latins used accedit, which answers to the Greek συζητων, to denote one's agreeing to an opinion. Thus we find in Seneca, accedere opinioni, and in English we say, I accede to, or come into your opinion.

3. Which are our Lord Jesus Christ's.]—All the precepts which the apostle delivered by inspiration being the precepts of Christ, there is no occasion to suppose that he here referred to some precepts concerning slaves, which Christ, while on earth, delivered to his apostles, and which, though not recorded by the evangelists, were made known to Paul by revelation.

Ver. 4.—1. Is distempered.]—Nervus, literally, being sick; bravnick: Erasmus translates it, being mad: Doddridge, he raves:—Persons who are extremely addicted to any foolish frivolous pursuit, or who are excessively fond of any groundless opinion, are said to be sick with these things, because, like a bodily disease, they disorder the judgment.

2. About questions and debates of words.]—The questions which sickened the false teachers, were those concerning slavery and the duration of the law of Moses; and the words about which they debated, were those wherein the law and its statutes are declared to be statutes to them for ever, and through all generations: For, from these words they argued, that the law would never be abolished. The questions and debates of which the apostle speaks, are called, Tit. iii. 9. 'Strifes and fightings about the law'; and 2 Tim. ii. 14. 'fighting about words': and ver. 23. 'foolish and untaught questions.'

3. Whereof come envy, strife, evil speakings, unjust suspicions.]—On this clause Benson's remark is, "How frequently Christians have disputed about words only; what fierce anger and uncharitableness that has occasioned, and what fatal effects have followed, are very obvious, but withal very melancholly reflections, and ought for the future to put them on their guard."

Ver. 5.—1. Perverse disputings.]—Παρεστικα. A philosophical disputation, such as was held in the schools of the philosophers, was called παρεστικα, because it was thought an useful way of spending time. But the addition of the proposition περ converts the word into a bad meaning, and therefore it is fitly translated 'perverse disputings.'

2. Who reckon gain to be religion.]—It seems the Judaizers had no view in teaching but to draw money from their disciples. And the money which they got they spent in the gratification of their lusts. Hence the apostle calls 'their belly their god,' Philip. iii. 19.

3. From such withdraw thyself.]—This clause is wanting in some MSS. and versions; but the Greek commentators have explained it, which, as Eusebius observes, is a proof that the reading is at least ancient.

Ver. 6.—1. But godliness with a competency.]—So Diodati has translated μὲν θεοσεβειαν, following the Vulgate, which has οὐκ εὐσεβειαν. If the common translation is retained, the meaning will be, that godliness makes a man contented, whatever his circumstances are; consequently it is great gain.—Εὐσεβεια in this

4 He is puffed up with pride, and knoweth nothing either of the Jewish or of the Christian revelation, although he pretends to have great knowledge of both; but is distempered in his mind about idle questions and debates of words, which afford no foundation for such a doctrine, but are the source of envy, contention, evil speakings, unjust suspicions that the truth is not sincerely maintained,

5 Keen disputings carried on contrary to conscience, by men wholly corrupted in their mind, and destitute of the true doctrine of the gospel, who reckon whatever produces most money is the best religion. From all such impious teachers withdraw thyself, and do not dispute with them.

6 But godliness, with a competency of food and raiment, (ver. 8.), is great gain, as it makes us happy both in the present life and in that which is to come; neither of which riches can do.

7 For we brought nothing into the world with us; and plain it is, that neither can we carry any thing out of it. Things which we must leave behind us, cannot make us happy in the other world.

8 Wherefore, having food and raiment, and lodging, let us therewith be contented; banishing, as godly persons ought, immoderate desires of things not necessary, and which can be enjoyed only in this life.

9 But they who, not contented with food and raiment, are bent on being rich, fall into great temptations and snares in the pursuit; and, in the enjoyment of riches, into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which plunge men into destruction here, and into eternal perdition hereafter.

10 I have spoken thus sharply against covetousness, because the love of money is the root of all the sinful passions and actions of men; as may be seen in the false teachers, some of whom, eagerly desiring money, have wholly corrupted the doctrine of the gospel, and have pierced themselves all around with many sorrows, occasioned by the stings of conscience and the fears of punishment.

passage means, faith in the providence of God, resignation to his will, hope of reward in the life to come, and a constant endeavour to please God; for in these things piety or true religion consisteth.

2. Is great gain.]—Παρεστικα μυνη, from παρ, a passage; because gain, or riches, make every thing accessible to him who possesses them.

Ver. 7.—1. We brought nothing into the world.]—This is an allusion to Ecclesiast. v. 15. 'As he came forth of his mother's womb, naked shall he return, &c.—We brought nothing into the world but our existence, which, as our Lord tells us, Matt. vi. 26. 'being more than meat,' he who hath given the greater blessing will undoubtedly bestow the less.

2. Neither can we carry any thing out.]—Why then perplex ourselves with heaping up riches! We only need παρ, a free passage to our native country, and should not entangle ourselves in the snares mentioned ver. 9.

Ver. 8.—1. And raiment.]—The word εὐσεβειαν comprehends not only clothes but lodging; for it signifies coverings of every sort.

2. Let us be therewith contented.]—Having shewed that all the good things of this life are adventitious to men, that they can be enjoyed only during the few years of this life, and that they cannot be carried out of the world, the apostle advises, if we have the necessities of life, to be content; because, though we possessed ever so much of this world's goods, we must soon part with them all; consequently, to pursue them at the hazard of our salvation is extreme folly.

Ver. 9.—1. But they who will be rich fall, &c.]—Though in this the apostle may have had the corrupt teachers in view, ver. 10. I think it is a description of the pernicious effects of an immoderate pursuit of riches on all ranks of men, and is not to be confined to the ministers of religion.

2. Into many foolish and hurtful lusts.]—Foolish lusts are those which are below the dignity of human nature: Hurtful lusts are those which produce immediate evil to the person who indulges them.

3. Which plunge men into destruction and perdition.]—In this admirable picture, the apostle represents men who are actuated by the desire of riches, and with the lusts excited by the possession of them, as pursuing to the utmost verge of a precipice those shadowy phantoms, which, as Doddridge observes, owe all their semblance of reality to the magic of the passions which riches, and the desire of them, have excited in their mind; and as falling into a gulph, where they plunge so deep that they are irrecoverably lost.

Ver. 10.—1. The love of money is the root of all evil.]—The pernicious influence of the love of money hath been taken notice of, and painted in striking colours, by moralists and poets even among the heathens. But none of them have drawn the picture with such skill and effect as the apostle hath done in this and the preceding verse, where he hath set forth in the strongest colouring, and with the fewest words, the deformity of the passion, and the evils which it produceth, both in the body and in the mind of those who indulge it.

2. Have wholly erred from the faith.]—The teachers, of whom the apostle speaks, having no end in view but to make themselves rich, taught their disciples doctrines, by which they encouraged them in all manner of wickedness. Of this sort of teachers &c.

11 (26) Therefore do thou, O man of God,¹ see these things; and pursue righteousness, piety, faith, love, patience, meekness.

12 Combat the good combat¹ of faith: Lay hold on eternal life, to which also thou wast called; and confess the good confession² in the presence of many witnesses.³

13 I charge thee in the presence of God,¹ who maketh all alive, and of Christ Jesus, who witnessed under² Pontius Pilate the good confession,

14 That thou keep (τῷ, 71.) this commandment without spot, unblamable,¹ till the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ.²

15 Which in his own season the blessed (1 Tim. i. 11. note 2.) and only Potentate¹ will shew, even the King of kings, and Lord of lords.²

16 Who alone hath immortality,¹ AND dwell-

Hymeneus and Philetus, who, by affirming that the resurrection was already past, 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18. denied a future state, and thereby set their disciples free from every restraint: for if there are neither future rewards nor punishments, men may indulge themselves without scruple, in all kinds of sensual gratifications and wicked practices which are not forbidden by human laws.

3. And pierced themselves all around. The critics observe, that the original word περικύβητος properly signifies have stabbed themselves as it were from head to foot and all around, so as to be wholly covered with wounds.

Ver. 11. O man of God. The ancient prophets had this appellation given to them, to shew that their function was a service which God had appointed to them. For the same reason the ministers of the gospel are called men of God, 2 Tim. iii. 17. 'That the man of God may be perfect and thoroughly furnished.' Wherefore, by calling Timothy in this passage a man of God, the apostle suggested to him the strongest incitement to see covetousness. He was engaged in a work assigned him by God, far more noble than the pursuit of riches, and a work with which the immoderate pursuit of riches was incompatible. His business was to teach mankind the knowledge of God and of eternal life, and to persuade them to lay hold on eternal life, by avoiding covetousness, and pursuing righteousness, piety, faith, &c. and to be himself a pattern of all these virtues. Doddridge's reflection on this passage is worthy of a place here. "Happy," says he, "would it be for the church of Christ, if these important articles of practical religion were more inculcated, and less of the zeal of its teachers spent in discussing vain questions, and intricate strifes about words, which have been productive of so much envy, contention, obloquy and suspicion."

Ver. 12.—1. Combat the good combat. The phrase ἀγώνισμα, being general, may be understood of any of the Olympic combats. But the apostle seems to have had the combat either of boxing or wrestling in his eye, rather than that of the race; because wrestling and boxing requiring greater exertions of courage than the race, and being attended with more danger, were fitter images of the combat of faith, which was to be carried on by confessing the good confession in the presence of many witnesses, often with the hazard of the combatant's life.

2. Confess the good confession. ὁμολογία, being the second person of the first aorist of the indicative, it is put here for the imperative; as is evident from the preceding clauses, which are all in the imperative mood. This our translators have overlooked.—The translation I have given of this clause, shews what 'the good combat of faith' was, which Timothy was to carry on; it consisted in confessing before all mankind the principal article of the gospel, namely, that Jesus Christ is the Son of God and Judge of the world.

3. In the presence of many witnesses.—The witnesses before whom Timothy was to maintain the good combat of faith, by confessing the good confession, were not any particular assembly, like the general assembly of all Greece met to behold the Olympic combats, to which the apostle here alludes; but they were the whole human race; nay, the holy angels also, who, in the next verse, are represented as witnesses of his behaviour in this combat.

Ver. 13.—1. I charge thee in the presence of God.—The earnestness and solemnity with which the apostle addressed Timothy on this occasion, did not proceed from any suspicion of his fidelity as a minister, but from his own deep sense of the truths which Timothy was to confess and maintain. Hence the ministers of the gospel may learn, that these truths ought to be often and earnestly insisted on by them in their public discourses.

2. Who witnessed (τῷ) under Pontius Pilate. Though the preposition τῷ with the genitive sometimes signifies before, it is more elegantly used to signify under, as denoting time. Thus, Acts xi.

11 Therefore do thou, O servant of God, see these things; and pursue justice in all thy dealings, piety towards God, the firmest faith in the gospel, love to the souls of men, patience in afflictions, and meekness under provocations.

12 Since these virtues are not inconsistent with courage, combat the good combat of faith, by boldly maintaining the true doctrine of Christ against infidels and false teachers; and, as a conqueror in this combat, lay hold on eternal life, the prize, to the attainment of which thou wast called; and in particular, confess the good confession, that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, in the presence of all mankind.

13 I charge thee, in the presence of God, who raiseth all from the dead, to reward every one according to his works, and who, if thou lose thy life in the good combat, will give thee eternal life; and in the presence of Christ Jesus, who witnessed under Pontius Pilate the good confession, and sealed it with his blood, 14 That thou obey this commandment of confessing the good confession, without spot in respect of the commandment itself, and unblamable in respect of thy performance thereof, which will contribute to preserve the good confession in the world, till the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ himself, to raise the dead, and judge the whole human race.

15 Which appearing in his own season, the season which he himself hath fixed, the blessed and only Potentate in the universe will shew, even the King of kings, and Lord of lords; the King and Lord who rules with irresistible power all other kings and lords;

16 Who alone hath life without either beginning or ending, and

28. 'Which came to pass (τῷ Κλαυδίου Καίσαρος) in the days of Claudius Caesar.'—The good confession which Christ witnessed, and which is here referred to, was made in the presence of Calaphas and the Jewish council, (see note 3.), and often in the hearing of his own disciples, and of the people: And the report of it was the occasion of his being apprehended, tried, and put to death. All these things happened under the procuratorship of Pontius Pilate. However, as the confession which he so often made, was adhered to by him in the presence of Pontius Pilate, when he acknowledged himself the King of the Jews, John xviii. 33—37, that is, acknowledged that he was Messiah the prince, and suffered death, rather than conceal or retract that confession, the common translation is not wrong. Eustasius thinks the word μαρτυρῶντες, witnessed, implies that Christ sealed the good confession with his blood. But though this be the sense which the fathers ascribed to the title martyr or confessor, it is not certain that the apostle used the word μαρτυρῶντες in that sense here.

3. The good confession.—was made by our Lord most explicitly before Calaphas and the Jewish council, when, being asked, 'whether he was Christ the Son of the Blessed,' he acknowledged that he was; and added, 'Ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven,' Mark xiv. 61, 62. This the apostle called the good confession, because all our hopes of salvation are built upon the truth of it.

Ver. 14.—1. That thou keep this commandment without spot, unblamable, till the appearing, &c.—In ver. 12 the apostle had ordered Timothy, 'to confess the good confession'; in ver. 13 he declared what the good confession is: Here he ordered him, and in him all succeeding ministers, 'to preserve that confession without spot'; that is, to confess the whole doctrine concerning Christ, and particularly concerning his coming to judgment, in its genuine purity, till Christ himself should appear at the last day in person, to put the matter beyond all doubt. The coming of Christ to judgment was often to be asserted by Timothy, because of all considerations it is the most powerful for terrifying, not only false teachers, but infidels also, and for exciting faithful ministers to exert themselves strenuously in the good combat of faith.

2. Till the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ.—From this Grotius infers that Paul thought the appearing of Christ was to happen soon, and that Timothy might live till Christ appeared. But that Paul entertained no such thought, hath been clearly proved, Pref. to 2 Thess. sect. 3. Wherefore the meaning of the apostle's exhortation is, that Timothy, by keeping the commandment concerning the good confession without spot, was to hand it down pure to his successors in the ministry, and thereby to contribute his part in preserving it in the world till Christ's second coming.

Ver. 15.—1. The blessed and only (ὁ μόνος) potentate.—This title was given to kings and great men, on account of their power. But the apostle appropriates it to God, by calling him 'the only potentate,' and thereby insinuates that all other potentates derive their power from him, and hold it at his pleasure.

2. Will shew.—In calling the appearing of Christ, at the end of the world, his 'being shewed by the Father,' the apostle hath followed Christ himself, who referred all his actions to the Father.

3. King of kings, and Lord of lords.—These titles the apostle gave to God, because all who have dominion, whether in heaven or in earth, have derived it from him, and are absolutely subject to him.—The eastern princes affected these titles, but very improperly, being weak mortal men. The true 'King of kings, and Lord of lords,' hath immortality in himself, and is infinitely powerful. See the following note.

Ver. 16.—1. Who alone hath immortality.—By the attributes mentioned in this verse, God is distinguished from all created natures whatever. He alone hath life without beginning and ending.

eth in light inaccessible, (see 2 Pet. i. 17. note 1.), whom no man hath seen,² nor can see; to whom ex honour and might³ everlasting. Amen.

17 Charge the rich in the present world,¹ not to be elated in mind,² nor to trust in uncertain riches,³ but in God who liveth,⁴ AND who supplieth to us richly all things for enjoyment;

18 (Αγαθουργῶν) To work good; to be rich (εὐχάρις πολλοῖς, see 1 Tim. iii. 1. note 3.) in lovely works,⁵ (ἐμυσταδότης,) ready to distribute, (κυνεμαίς) communicative;

19 Providing for themselves a good foundation¹ for hereafter, that they may lay hold on eternal life.

20 O Timothy, guard the thing committed in trust¹ TO THEE, avoiding profane vain babblings,² and oppositions of knowledge³ falsely so named:

21 Which some professing, have erred with respect to the faith. Grace be with thee.¹ Amen. (Eph. vi. 24. note 2.)

If any other being hath life without end, it is by his gift. And as life without beginning and ending implies immutability, God only is immutable as well as immortal. Hence he is called, Rom. i. 23. ἀσάλευτος Θεός, 'the incorruptible or immutable God;' and 1 Tim. i. 17. ἀσάλευτος, 'incorruptible, unperishable.'

2. Whom no man hath seen, nor can see.—In the commentary I have explained this, of men's not being able in the present life to look on the light in which God dwells. Yet I am not certain whether the apostle does not mean, that although in the life to come men shall see that light, they shall not see God. God is absolutely invisible, and will always remain so. If this is the apostle's meaning, the seeing of God, promised to the pure in heart, must mean no more but their seeing the light in which God dwells, which may as properly be called the seeing of God, as our seeing the bodies of our acquaintance in which their souls reside, is called the seeing of them. From this text some of the ancient fathers inferred, that the Divine Person who appeared to the patriarchs, and to the Israelites in the wilderness, was not the Father, but the Son. Yet that notion is confuted by Augustine, De Trinit. lib. ii. c. 18.

3. And might.—Καταύξει. This word signifies the might necessary to the governing of the world, rather than the act of governing. Ver. 17.—1. The rich in the present world.—By adding the words 'in the present world,' the apostle lessens the value of riches. We can enjoy them only in the present world. We can carry no part of them out into the other world. And though we could, they would have no influence to make us happy there.—Besides, as the apostle observes in the following clause, our possession of them is uncertain; and without the blessing of God, they will give us little satisfaction even here.

2. Not to be elated in mind.—The word ὑψηλοφρονεῖν signifies to have an high opinion of one's self in comparison of others, and to have no regard to their happiness. To this bad temper of mind the rich are often led, by the court which their inferiors pay to them on account of their riches. The ministers of religion, therefore, ought frequently to caution the rich to beware of being elated with pride.

3. Nor to trust in uncertain riches.—Those who place their happiness in the enjoyment of sensual pleasures, naturally trust to their riches for their happiness, because by their money they can procure every pleasure of that kind; and so they lose all sense of their dependence on God and his providence for their happiness. Prov. x. 15. xviii. 11. To check this impley, the apostle ordered Timothy to charge the rich to employ themselves constantly in working good, and to be rich in praiseworthy works; a kind of riches more honourable, and more satisfactory to the possessors, than all the gold and silver in the universe.

4. But in God who liveth.—God alone, who liveth always, can continue the rich in the possession of their riches, and in their capacity of enjoying them. Besides, it is God alone who can bestow on the rich the happiness of the life to come; which is the only valuable and abiding happiness, a happiness which no riches whatever can purchase. Here the apostle insinuates, that dead idols cannot bestow on any one the happiness either of the present or of the future life.

Ver. 18. To work good, to be rich in lovely works, &c.—This charge, which Timothy was ordered to give to the rich at Ephesus, shews that the community of goods among the disciples mentioned in the history of the Acts, was confined to Judea; and that even there it lasted only for a short time dwelleth in light inaccessible to mortals, which therefore no man hath seen, or can see, in this mortal body; to whom be ascribed honour and might everlasting. And to shew that this is the truth concerning the nature of God, I say Amen.

17 Though riches often prove a great snare to the possessors, they may be retained innocently. Therefore, charge the rich in the present world, to beware of pride, and of seeking their happiness from riches, the possession of which is so uncertain: But to trust in God, who ever liveth to make them happy, and who supplieth to us plentifully all things really necessary for enjoyment.

18 And instead of employing their riches merely in gratifying their senses, rather to use them in doing good works, and to be rich in those lovely works whereby the happiness of society is promoted: To be ready to distribute a part of their riches to the poor, communicative of their time and pains for advancing the interests of truth and virtue in the world;

19 Providing for themselves, not money, which can be of no use to them in the other world, but what is infinitely better, a good foundation to stand on in the day of judgment, that they may lay hold on the prize of eternal life.

20 O Timothy, preserve the doctrine committed in trust to thee, avoiding the impious, noisy, senseless talking of the Judaizers, and the oppositions to the gospels, founded on wrong interpretations of the Jewish scriptures, which they dignify with the appellation of knowledge; but it is falsely so named.

21 Which knowledge of the scriptures, some teachers professing to have attained, (1 Tim. i. 6, 7.), have erred with respect to the true Christian faith. But may the grace of God be with thee, to preserve thee from error. Amen.

Ver. 19. Providing for themselves a good foundation.—Αποθεμενέμενοι τὴν αὐτοῖς. Because treasuring up a foundation is an unusual manner of speaking, Le Clerc proposes, instead of θεμελιόω, to read κυριεύω, a treasure. But as no reading ought to be introduced into the scriptures on conjecture, I think the Greek words may be translated, providing for themselves: a sense which θεμελιόω evidently hath, Rom. ii. 5. 'Treasure up to thyself,' that is, provide for thyself, 'wrath against the day of wrath.'—Benson thinks θεμελιόω here hath the signification of θεμελιόω, a deposit; and that the apostle alludes to Tobit iv. 9. LXX.

Ver. 20.—1. Guard the thing committed in trust to thee.—That this is the proper translation of τὴν παρατεταθήκεν, see 2 Tim. i. 12. note 2. The thing committed in trust to Timothy, which the apostle was so anxious that he should guard, and deliver to faithful men able to teach it to others, 2 Tim. ii. 2. was, the true account of our Lord's character as the Son of God, his descent from Abraham and David, his birth of a virgin, his doctrine, miracles, death, resurrection, and ascension into heaven, and his return to the earth to raise the dead and judge the world. Now as these things, at the time the apostle wrote this epistle, were all faithfully recorded in the writings of the evangelists, and were foretold in the writings of Moses and the prophets, these inspired writings were without doubt a principal part of the deposit committed to Timothy, to be kept by him, and delivered to faithful men able to teach others. Farther, as the apostle in his sermons and conversations had explained to Timothy many passages both of the ancient scriptures and of his own writings, these interpretations were to be kept by him, and followed, in all his discourses and exhortations to the Ephesians and others.—This injunction to Timothy, is an injunction to the ministers of the gospel in every age, to keep the writings of Moses and the prophets, and of the evangelists and apostles uncorrupted, as containing the whole of the gospel doctrine; and implies, that nothing is to be added to them nor taken from them; by any human authority whatever. Councils, therefore, whether general or particular, have no power to establish any new article of faith. The only thing such assemblies, however numerous or respectable, can do, is to express their opinion that such and such articles of faith are contained in the scriptures. And if they should happen to err, the inspired writings being preserved pure and entire, the errors of councils, as well as of individuals, are to be corrected by these infallible standards.

2. Avoiding profane vain babblings.—The word κενεαίαια signifies the emptiness of words; the noisy empty talking of the false teachers. The Vulgate version has here vacuum novitates, the novelties of words; the copy from which that version was made reading perhaps κενεαίαια, as some MSS. do at present.

3. And oppositions of knowledge.—In the enumeration of the different kinds of inspiration bestowed on the first preachers of the gospel, 1 Cor. xii. 8. we find the word of knowledge mentioned; by which is meant, that kind of inspiration which gave to the apostles and superior Christian prophets, the knowledge of the true meaning of the Jewish scriptures. This inspiration the false teachers pretending to possess, dignified their misinterpretations of the ancient scriptures with the name of knowledge, that is, inspired knowledge; for so the word knowledge signifies, 1 Cor. xiv. 6.—And as, by these interpretations, they endeavoured to establish the efficacy of the Levitical atonements, together with the perpetual and universal obligation of the rites of the law of Moses, the apos-the very properly termed these interpretations 'oppositions of knowledge,' because they were framed to establish doctrines contrary to and subversive of the gospel.—Withal, to destroy their credit, he affirmed that the knowledge from which they proceeded was 'falsely called inspired knowledge.' The Judaizers, who gave these interpretations, were not inspired with the knowledge of the true meaning of the scriptures, but falsely pretended to that gift. Ver. 21. Grace be with thee.]—This epistle being chiefly designed for Timothy's own use, no salutations were sent to any of the brethren at Ephesus.

II. TIMOTHY.

PREFACE.

SECT. I.—Of the Time when the Second Epistle to Timothy was written.

FROM various particulars in the second epistle to Timothy, it appears that it was written while the apostle was in confinement at Rome. But whether that confinement was the one mentioned by Luke in his history of the Acts, or an after imprisonment, learned men are not agreed. Estius, Hammond, Lightfoot, and Lardner, think it was the confinement mentioned by Luke, for the two following reasons:—

First, It is evident from 2 Tim. iv. 11. that when Paul wrote this letter Luke was with him. Wherefore, as Luke hath spoken of no imprisonment of Paul at Rome but the one with which his history of the Acts concludes, the learned men above-mentioned infer, that that must be the imprisonment during which the apostle wrote his second epistle to Timothy.—But the answer is, Luke did not propose in the Acts to give a history of the life of any of the apostles, but an account of the first preaching and propagation of the gospel. Wherefore, having related how the gospel was published, first in Judea by the apostles Peter, James, and John, and by the evangelists Stephen, Philip, and Barnabas; and after that in many heathen countries by Paul, Barnabas, Silas, Timothy, and others; and by Paul in his own hired house during his two years' confinement at Rome; he ended his history at that period, as having finished his design. It is evident, therefore, that although Luke hath written nothing farther concerning Paul, it is no proof that Paul's ministry and life ended then, or that Luke was ignorant of his after transactions, any more than his silence concerning Peter after the council of Jerusalem is a proof that his ministry and life ended then: or than his silence concerning many particulars mentioned in Paul's epistles is a proof that these things did not happen; or, if they happened, that they were not known to Luke.

Secondly, It is said, that if this epistle was written during an after imprisonment of Paul in Rome, Timothy must have been so old that the apostle could not, with propriety, have exhorted him to 'flee youthful lusts,' 2 Tim. ii. 22.—But, besides what is to be said in the note on that verse, it should be considered, that in the year 68, when the apostle is supposed to have been a prisoner at Rome the second time, Timothy may have been only 34 years of age; which, both by the Greeks and Romans, was considered as youth. See Preface to 1 Tim. sect. 2. Object. 1.

These are the arguments on which the writers above-mentioned have founded their opinion, that Paul wrote his second epistle to Timothy during his confinement at Rome, of which Luke hath given an account in his history of the Acts.

Other learned men hold, that the apostle wrote this epistle during a second imprisonment at Rome, and support their opinion by the following arguments:—

1. At the time the apostle wrote this epistle, he was closely imprisoned as one guilty of a capital crime: 2 Tim. ii. 9. 'I suffer evil (pergis duram) unto bonds, as a malefactor.' The heathen magistrates and priests considering Paul as an atheist, because he denied the gods of the empire; very probably also supposing him to be one of the Christians who, they said, had set fire to the city; they confined him in close prison, with his hands and feet in fetters, as a malefactor.—His situation was very different during his first confinement. For then, Acts xviii. 30. 'He dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came in unto him; 31. Preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus with all confidence, no man forbidding him.' This mild treatment probably was owing to the favourable account which Festus gave of him to the Emperor, Acts xxv. 25. xxvi. 31., and to what Julius the centurion, who brought him to Rome, said of him when he delivered him to the officer appointed to receive the prisoners from the provinces.—The centurion's esteem of Paul is mentioned Acts xxvii. 42, 43.

2. The Roman governors of Judea, by whom Paul was tried for his life, declared at his trials, that no crime was alleged against him, but only his holding opinions which his accusers said were contrary to their religion, Acts xxv. 18, 19. They likewise declared, that he had been guilty of no crime against the state, Acts xxvi. 11. Heresy, therefore, being the only thing laid to the apostle's charge, and that circumstance being made known by the governor of Judea to his judges at Rome, they must have had a favourable opinion of his cause. This appears likewise from what the apostle himself wrote to the Philippians, chap. i. 12. 'I wish you to know, brethren, that the things which have befallen me have turned out rather to the advancement of the gospel. 13. For my bonds on account of Christ are become manifest in the whole palace, and in all other places.' His being sent a prisoner to Rome, and his defending himself before his judges, either in person or by writings presented to them, had made the cause of his bonds well known in the palace, and all other places, to be not any crime, but his having preached salvation to the Gentiles through Christ, without requiring them to obey the law of Moses. He therefore 'was fully persuaded by the Lord, that even he himself should soon come to them,' Philip. ii. 24. 'and abide some time with them,' Philip. i. 25. and sent them the salutation of Caesar's household, Philip. iv. 22. by whose good offices he hoped to be set at liberty. But when he wrote his second epistle to Timothy, his judges, considering the things laid to his charge as crimes against the state, were so enraged against him, that he called his escaping condemnation, when he made his first answer, as being 'delivered out of the mouth of the lion,' 2 Tim. iv. 17. And having no hope of being acquitted at his next hearing, he looked for nothing but immediate death, 2 Tim. iv. 6. 'I am already poured out, and the time of my departure hath come.—7. I have finished the race.'

3. The boldness with which the apostle preached the gospel to all who came to him, during the confinement mentioned by Luke in the Acts, and the success with which he defended himself against his accusers, encouraged others to preach the gospel without fear; so that he had fellow-labourers then in abundance. Philip. i. 14.

'Many of the brethren in the Lord, being assuited by my bonds, have become much more bold to speak the word without fear.' At that time also he had the service of many affectionate friends; such as Mark, Timothy, Luke, Tychicus, Aristarchus and others, mentioned Col. iv. 7, 10, 11, 12, 14.—But when he wrote his second to Timothy, his assistants were all so terrified by the rage of his accusers and judges, that not so much as one of them, nor any of the brethren in Rome, appeared with him when he made his first answer, 2 Tim. iv. 16. And after that answer was made, all his assistants fled from the city, except Luke, 2 Tim. iv. 11.

4. During the apostle's confinement in Rome, of which Luke has given an account, Demas was with him, Phil. ver. 24. and Mark, as his fellow-labourers, Col. iv. 10, 11. Phil. ver. 24.—But when he wrote his second epistle to Timothy, Demas had forsaken him, 'having loved the present world,' 2 Tim. iv. 10.; and Mark was absent; for the apostle desired Timothy to 'bring Mark with him,' 2 Tim. iv. 11. From these circumstances it is evident, that the epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, and the second to Timothy, were written by the apostle during different confinements.

To invalidate these arguments, Lardner supposes, that on Paul's arrival at Rome from Judea, he was shut up in close prison as a malefactor, and expected nothing but instant death; that being in the greatest danger, all his assistants, except Luke, forsook him, and fled for fear of their own lives; that in this state of despondency he wrote his second to Timothy; that the Emperor having heard his first defence, mentioned 2 Tim. iv. 16. entertained a favourable opinion of his cause, and by a written order appointed him to be confined in the gentle manner described Acts xxviii. 16. 30.; that afterwards his assistants returned; and that he preached the gospel to all who came to him, and converted many.

But these suppositions are all directly contrary to the apostle's own account of the matter. For, 1. After making his answer, mentioned 2 Tim. iv. 16. instead of being allowed to live in his own hired house, he was so closely confined, that when Onesiphorus came to Rome, he had to seek him out diligently among the different prisons in the city, before he could find him, 2 Tim. i. 17.—2. After his first defence, his judges, instead of being more favourably disposed towards him, were so enraged against him that he looked for nothing but immediate condemnation at his next answer, 2 Tim. iv. 6, 7.—3. Luke, who was with the apostle during his first confinement, and who hath given an account of it, hath not said one word of any danger he was then in: He only tells us, that his confinement lasted two years, Acts xxviii. 30.—4. If the liberty which the apostle so soon obtained was the effect of his first answer, we must suppose that the persons deputed by the council at Jerusalem to answer his appeal, either were in Rome before he arrived, or came to Rome in the same ship with him; and that the Emperor gave him a hearing on the second day after his arrival. For Luke informs us, that, three days after his arrival, he had such liberty that he called the chief of the Jews to his own house, and spake to them what is mentioned Acts xxviii. 17. But such a speedy hearing, granted to a Jewish prisoner, by the head of so great an empire, who was either occupied in affairs of government or in pursuing his pleasures, and such a sudden alteration in the prisoner's state, are things altogether incredible.—5. The apostle being in a state of despondency when he wrote his second to Timothy, he must, as Lardner supposes, have written it before he made his first answer, since the alteration of his circumstances was the effect of that answer. Nevertheless, from the epistle itself, chap. iv. 16. we know, not only that it was written after the apostle had made his first answer, but that it produced no alteration whatever in his circumstances. For after making that answer, he wrote to Timothy, that the time of his departure was come. In short, he was in as much despondency after his first answer, as before it.

Upon the whole, the arguments to prove that Paul wrote his second epistle to Timothy during the confinement recorded in the Acts, being of so little moment, in comparison of the facts and circumstances which shew that it was written during a subsequent confinement, I agree in opinion with those who hold, that the apostle was twice imprisoned at Rome; once, when he was brought thither from Judea to prosecute his appeal; and a second time, when he came to Rome from Crete, in the end of the year 65, while Nero was persecuting the Christians; (See Preface to Titus, sect. 1. last paragraph); and that having made his first defence early in the year 66, he wrote his second to Timothy in the beginning of the summer of that year, as may be conjectured from his desiring Timothy to come to him before winter.

I have taken this pains in refuting the opinion of the learned men first mentioned, concerning the time of writing the second to Timothy, because on that opinion Lardner hath founded another notion still more improbable, but which, after what hath been said, needs no particular confutation; namely, that what is called the apostle's second epistle to Timothy, was written before the one which is placed first in the Canon, and which is generally believed to have been the first written.

SECT. II.—Of the place where Timothy was, when the Apostle wrote his Second Letter to him.

THAT Timothy was at Ephesus, when the apostle wrote his second epistle to him, may be gathered from the following circumstances. 1. Hymeneus and Alexander are mentioned in the first epistle, chap. i. 20. as false teachers, whom Timothy was left at Ephesus to oppose. In the second epistle, he is desired to 'avoid the vain babbling of Hymeneus,' chap. ii. 16, 17, 18., and chap. iv. 15. to be 'on his guard against Alexander.' We may therefore conjecture, that Timothy was in Ephesus, the place where these false teachers abode, when the apostle's second letter was sent to him.—2. As it was the apostle's custom to salute the brethren of the churches to which his letters were sent, the salutation of Prisca and Aquila, and of the family of Onesiphorus, 2 Tim. iv. 19. shew that Timothy was in Ephesus when this letter was written to him. For that Ephesus was the ordinary residence of Onesiphorus, appears from 2 Tim. i. 18.; and considering that Prisca and Aquila had, before this, abode some time in Ephesus, (Rom. xvi. 3. note), the salutation sent to them in this letter makes it probable, that they had returned to that city.—3. From Titus iii. 12. where the apostle says, 'When I shall send Artemas to thee, or Tychicus, make haste to come to me,' it appears to have been the apostle's custom, to send persons to supply the places of those whom he called away from the stations he had assigned them. Wherefore, since in his second epistle, chap. iv. 9. he thus wrote to Timothy, 'Make haste to come to me;' then added, ver. 12. 'Tychicus I have sent to Ephesus;' may we not infer, that Timothy was then in Ephesus, and that Tychicus was sent by the apostle to supply his place after his departure?—4. The errors and vices which the apostle, in his second epistle, ordered Timothy to oppose, are the very errors and vices which, in the first, are said to have been prevalent among the teachers at Ephesus, and which Timothy was left in Ephesus to oppose. See Pref. to 1 Tim. sect. 2. note 4.

These arguments make it probable, that Timothy remained in Ephesus, from the time the apostle left him there as he was going into Macedonia, until, in compliance with his desire signified in this letter, he set out for Rome; consequently, that Timothy received in Ephesus both the letters which the apostle wrote him.

SECT. III.—Of the Occasion on which the Second Epistle to Timothy was written: And of the Time of St. Paul's Death.

In the Preface to Paul's first epistle to Timothy, sect. 3. the reader will find a brief history of the apostle's travels with Timothy, from the time he was released from his first confinement at Rome, till he left Timothy in Ephesus to oppose the false teachers, as mentioned 1 Tim. i. 3. But in regard that history will be given more fully in the Pref. to Titus, sect. 1. penult paragraph, it is only needful in this place to relate, that after the apostle left Timothy at Ephesus, he went into Macedonia to visit the churches there, according to his promise, Philip. ii. 24. then went to Nicopolis in Epirus, with an intention to spend the winter, Tit. iii. 12. and to return to Ephesus in the spring, 1 Tim. iii. 14. But having ordered Titus to come to him from Crete to Nicopolis, Tit. iii. 12. on his arrival he gave him such an account of the state of the churches in Crete, as determined him to go with Titus, a second time, into that island. While in Crete, hearing of the cruel persecution which the Emperor Nero was carrying on against the Christians, (see the last paragraph of this section), the apostle speedily finished his business and sailed with Titus to Italy, in the end of the autumn 65, rightly judging, that his presence at Rome would be of great use in strengthening and comforting the persecuted brethren in that city.

Paul, on his arrival at Rome, taking an active part in the affairs of the Christians, soon became obnoxious to the heathen priests, and to the idolatrous rabble, who hated the Christians as atheists, because they denied the gods of the empire, and condemned the established worship. Wherefore, being discovered to the magistrates, probably by the unbelieving Jews, as the ringleader of the hated sect, he was apprehended, and closely imprisoned as a malefactor, 2 Tim. ii. 9. This happened in the end of the year 65, or in the beginning of 66.

The apostle hath not informed us directly, what the crime was which the heathen magistrates laid to his charge. If it was the burning of the city, which the emperor falsely imputed to the Christians in general, his absence from Rome when the city was burnt being a fact he could easily prove, it was a sufficient exculpation of him from that crime. Probably, therefore, the magistrates accused him of denying the gods of the empire, and of condemning the established worship. In this accusation, it is natural to suppose, the unbelieving Jews joined, from their hatred of Paul's doctrine; and among the rest Alexander the Ephesian coppersmith, who having, as it would seem, apostatized to Judaism, had blasphemed Christ and his gospel; and on that account had been lately delivered by the apostle to Satan, 1 Tim. i. 20. This virulent Judaizing teacher happening to be in Rome when Paul was apprehended, he, in resentment of the treatment received from the apostle, appeared with his accusers when he made his first answer, and, in the presence of his judges, contradicted the things which he urged in his own vindication. So the apostle told Timothy, 2 Epist. iv. 14. 'Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil. 15. For he greatly opposed our words.' The rest of the unbelieving Jews were not a little enraged against Paul, for preaching that Jesus Christ, being lineally descended from David, was heir to his throne; that being raised from the dead, his right to rule the Gentiles was thereby demonstrated; and that the Gentiles were to be saved through faith in him, without obeying the law of Moses. These things they urged against Paul as crimes worthy of death, on pretence that they subverted, not only the law of Moses, but the laws of the empire. The hints which the apostle hath given us of the things laid to his charge, and of the particulars which he urged in his own vindication, lead us to form these conjectures: 2 Tim. ii. 8. 'Remember Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, was raised from the dead, according to my gospel. 9. For which I suffer evil unto bonds, as a malefactor. 10. For this cause I patiently bear all things on account of the elected;' the Gentiles elected to be the people of God instead of the Jews; 'that they also may obtain the salvation which is by Jesus Christ, with eternal glory.' Such were the crimes of which St. Paul was accused by his enemies.—The answers which he made to their accusations are insinuated 2 Tim. iv. 17. 'However, the Lord stood by me, and strengthened me, that through me the preaching might be fully declared, and all the Gentiles might hear.' The Lord strengthened him fully to declare in the presence of his judges and accusers, what he had preached concerning the supreme dominion of Christ; his right to rule all the Gentiles as the subjects of his spiritual kingdom; his power to save them as well as the Jews, together with the nature and method of their salvation. He likewise told Timothy, that the Lord had strengthened him thus fully to declare what he had preached, that all the Gentiles might hear of his courage and faithfulness in maintaining their privileges.—To this bold declaration of his preaching concerning Christ, the apostle told Timothy he was animated, by considering, 'That if we die with him, we shall also live with him. If we suffer patiently, we shall also reign with him. If we deny him, he also will deny us,' 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12.—To conclude, the evident reasonableness of the things which the apostle advanced in answer to the accusations of his enemies, and the confidence with which he urged them, made, it seems, such an impression on his judges, that notwithstanding they were greatly prejudiced against him, and shewed themselves determined to take his life, they did not then condemn him, but sent him back to his prison, thinking it necessary to give him a second hearing.

How long the apostle remained in prison, before he was allowed to make his first answer, doth not appear. Neither do we know what length of time elapsed between his first and second answers. Only, from his desiring Timothy, after making his first answer, to come to him before winter, we may conjecture that he made his first answer early in the summer of the year 66, and that he thought it might be a considerable time before he would be brought to a second hearing.

Soon after his first answer, therefore, in the year 66, the apostle wrote his second epistle to Timothy, to inform him of what had happened to him since his coming to Rome; namely, that he was closely imprisoned as a malefactor; and that he had spoken for himself in the hearing of his judges. Also he gave him some hints of the crimes which his enemies laid to his charge, and of the answers which he had made to their accusations, and of the principles by which he was emboldened to make these answers. Moreover he told him, that, although his judges had not yet condemned him, he had not the smallest hope of escaping when he should be brought to a second hearing: That his accusers and judges had shewed themselves so enraged against him, before he made his first answer, that when he was brought into the court, neither any of the Roman brethren, nor any of the brethren from the provinces, nor any of his own fellow-labourers, who were then in the city, appeared with him; but all forsook him: That, during the trial, his judges shewed such an extreme hatred of the Christians, and of their cause, that all his assistants, except Luke, had fled from the city, fearing that they likewise would be apprehended and put to death: That being thus deserted by his friends and fellow-labourers, and having no hope of escaping, he had a great desire to enjoy Timothy's company and services during the short time he had to live. He therefore requested him to come to him before winter. Yet being uncertain whether he should live so long, he gave him in this letter a variety of advices, charges, and encouragements, with the solemnity and affection of a dying parent; because if he should be put to death before Timothy came, the loss would in some measure be made up to him by the things written in this letter.

These particulars, which are all either expressed or insinuated in the apostle's second epistle to Timothy, shew clearly, that it was written not long before the apostle's death; the time of which may be determined with a good degree of probability by the following circumstances. The Emperor Nero having set fire to the city on the 10th of July, A. D. 64, to remove the odium of that nefarious action, which was generally imputed to him, he endeavoured to make the public believe it was perpetrated by the Christians, who at that time were become the objects of the popular hatred on account of their religion. For, as if they had been the incendiaries, he caused them to be sought out, and put to death in the most barbarous manner. So Tacitus informs us, Annal. lib. xv. c. 44., and Suetonius, Ner. c. 16. This is what is commonly called the first general persecution of the Christians. Wherefore, as the ancients, with one voice, have reported that the apostle Paul was put to death at Rome by Nero in this persecution, we cannot be much mistaken in supposing that his death happened in the end of the year 66, or in the spring of 67, in the 13th year of Nero's reign.

SECT. IV.—Shewing that the Facts recorded in the Gospels, and preached by the Apostles, are strongly confirmed by St. Paul's Second Epistle to Timothy.

THIS epistle being written by Paul, to an intimate friend and companion in the work of the gospel, under the miseries of a jail, and in the near prospect of death, it is natural to think, that if the facts which he had everywhere preached concerning Christ had been falsehoods, and the gospel scheme of salvation, which he and his brethren apostles had built thereon, were a delusion, he would, at such a time as this, have made reparation to mankind for the injury he had done them in persuading them to believe on Jesus of Nazareth, for whose name so many had already suffered, and were likely to suffer death; and that he would have made this reparation by acknowledging to Timothy, that the things which he had related concerning the character, miracles, and resurrection of Jesus, were fables; and by ordering him to undeceive the world. Or, if vanity, or a regard to his own fame, or obstinacy in wickedness, or any other cause, prevented him from doing justice to the world and to truth, it might have been expected, that, in this private correspondence with so intimate a friend and associate, some expression would by accident have dropped from his pen, betraying the falsehood and wickedness of the cause they were engaged in; or that some word or circumstance would have escaped him, which might have led to a discovery of the fraud.

Nothing, however, of either kind appears throughout the whole epistle. On the contrary, almost every sentence in it exhibits the most unambiguous proofs of the apostle's strong conviction of the truth of our Lord's pretensions, and of all the things he had told concerning him.—For example, he begins his letter with affirming, that, by preaching the gospel, he served the God of his forefathers with a pure conscience; and says, he thanked God in his private prayers continually for Timothy's faithfulness in preaching the gospel.—Then ordered him to stir up the spiritual gift which he had conferred on him; and to be courageous in the work he was engaged in, because the effect of that gift was not to fill those who possessed it with fear, but with courage, and love, and self-government; and not to be ashamed of the testimony of the Lord, 'nor of me (said he) the Lord's prisoner,' but to suffer evil jointly with me for the gospel, of which I am an herald, and for which I suffer such things.—Next, he expressed the highest satisfaction in suffering for Christ, because he knew he was really the Son of God, and would reward him in the end. And ordered Timothy to guard, by the power of the Holy Ghost which dwelt in him, the good doctrine concerning Christ which had been committed to him in trust; and to be strong in the honourable office of an evangelist which was bestowed on him; and to deliver all the particulars of the doctrine concerning Christ, which he had heard from the apostle confirmed by many witnesses, to faithful men capable of teaching that doctrine to others, that it might be continued in the world to the end. And more especially to publish and affirm everywhere, that Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, was raised from the dead, and thereby proved to be the Son of God; for preaching which facts, he himself was now suffering as a malefactor, even unto bonds. But he told him, it was not in the power of the enemies of the gospel to keep it in bonds. Do what they would, they could not hinder it from being preached and believed in the world.—And with respect to himself, he assured Timothy that he suffered imprisonment and every evil patiently, and with the greatest joy, for the gospel, because he knew that if he were put to death with Christ, he would also be raised from the dead with him, and reign with him in the life to come. Whereas, any preacher of the gospel, who, from the love of ease, or the fear of death, either concealed or denied the things concerning the Lord Jesus, him will Christ deny at the day of judgment.—Then charged Timothy to put the teachers at Ephesus in mind of these things; and, in the mean time, to strive to present himself to God an approved unashamed workman in the gospel. And being deeply impressed with a sense of the importance of the gospel doctrine to the happiness of the world, the apostle severely condemned two false teachers, whom he mentioned by name, whose corrupt doctrine concerning Christ, he told Timothy, was as destructive to the souls of men as a gangrene is to their bodies.—What stronger proofs can any one desire of the apostle's sincerity in the things which he preached? If he had been carrying on an imposture, would not these wicked teachers, one of whom he had enraged by delivering him to Satan for blaspheming Christ, have published the imposture to the world!—In the mean time, that Timothy and others might not entertain harsh thoughts of God for permitting corrupt teachers to arise in his church, he told him, that in the church, as in a great house, there are vessels appointed to a dishonourable use; thereby insinuating, that these corrupt teachers, when driven out of the church for their wicked practices, not being able to make any discoveries to the prejudice of the gospel, or of its ministers, that circumstance, though originating in the vices of these men, and dishonourable to them, was a strong proof of the truth of the gospel, and of the sincerity of its ministers in what they preached.—Next, that Timothy might not follow the corrupt teachers, but strenuously oppose them, the apostle commanded him to flee youthful lusts, and to practise assiduously the duties of piety and morality; and put him in mind, that the servant of the Lord must use no violent nor improper methods with those who oppose themselves; but be gentle to all men, meekly instructing the enemies of the gospel, if by any means God will give them repentance.—And that posterity might have undoubted evidence of the apostle's inspiration, he foretold the state in which the church would be, in after ages, through the base practices of hypocritical teachers; but that a stop would, in due time, be put to their devisions.—Then, conscious of his own faithfulness as an apostle, he appealed to Timothy's perfect knowledge of his doctrine, his manner of life, his purpose in teaching that doctrine, the virtues which he exercised, and the persecutions which he suffered for the gospel; particularly at Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra; but that God delivered him out of them all. So that if Timothy shewed himself equally faithful, he might expect the like deliverances.—And having informed him, that all who adhered to truth should, in that age, suffer persecution, he charged him, notwithstanding, to continue in the profession of the things which he had learned of him, and had been assured of; knowing from whom he had learned them, and that they were agreeable to the ancient scriptures, in the knowledge and belief of which he had been educated from his childhood.—Then solemnly charged him, in the presence of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ the judge of the world, to preach all the things he had mentioned, without considering whether the doing thereof was seasonable or unseasonable with respect to himself; because the church was soon to lose the benefit of the apostle's labours, the time of his departure being come. This charge the apostle accompanied with an high expression of joy, on the reflection that he had combated the good combat, had finished the race, and preserved the faith, and was sure of a crown of righteousness from Christ his master, at the day of judgment.—And to encourage Timothy to follow his example, he informed him, that though no man appeared with him when he made his first answer, yet the Lord Jesus stood by him, and strengthened him to declare boldly the doctrine concerning the salvation of the Gentiles by faith, which was so offensive to the Jews; and that though he had no hope of deliverance at his next hearing, yet he was sure the Lord Jesus would deliver him from betraying his cause, and from every evil work; and would preserve him safe to his heavenly kingdom: In which persuasion, he directed to Jesus a doxology, which, on other occasions, he ascribed to God the Father.

These strong asseverations of the truth of the things which Paul had all along preached, these earnest charges to Timothy to preach the same things openly and plainly to the world, these high expressions of joy in the suffering which he had endured for preaching them, and these confident expectations which he expressed, of receiving a full reward in the life to come for all his labours and sufferings, being the apostle's dying words to his intimate friend and companion in the ministry of the gospel, conveyed in a private letter, no person, who is a judge of human nature and human actions, can read them, without being impressed with the strongest conviction of the apostle's own thorough persuasion of the things which, from the time of his conversion, he constantly preached, without the least variation. And seeing the most important of these things were matters of fact, of which his own senses and experience had informed him; such as the appearing of Jesus to him on the road to Damascus, after his resurrection; his endowing him with supernatural powers; his revealing to him all the particulars of his history, and of the gospel doctrine; his having enabled him, by the power of miracles, to persuade multitudes in many countries to embrace and profess the gospel;—I say, the apostle's own persuasion of these facts, clearly and repeatedly displayed in this private letter, is such a proof of their reality, and of the truth of the gospel history, as never will be shaken by all the sophistry of infidels united.—This excellent writing, therefore, will be read by the disciples of Christ to the end of the world, with the highest satisfaction. And the impression which it must have on their minds will often be recollected by them with the greatest effect, for the confirmation of their faith in the gospel, and their consolation under all the evils which their adherence to the gospel may bring upon them.

CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Particulars contained in this Chapter.

THE apostle begins this epistle with a delicate praise of Timothy. He told him, that he gave thanks to God that he had unceasing remembrance of him in his prayers, as a faithful minister of Christ, ver. 3.—And that, recollecting the sensibility and gratitude which he discovered, by the tears of joy which he shed when the apostle instructed him in the doctrines of the gospel, he had a strong desire to see him once more, now that he was in prison for their common master, ver. 4.—That this desire was increased, when he called to remembrance the unfeigned faith which first dwelt in his grandmother Lois, and then in his mother Eunice, and he was persuaded in him also; also that Timothy was come of a pious race, ver. 5.—The apostle's thanksgiving to God, in his secret prayers, for Timothy's faithfulness as a minister of Christ, I call delicate praise, because being bestowed in the presence of God, out of the hearing of the world, it was a praise in which there was neither insincerity nor flattery. The apostle, it is true, mentioned this to Timothy himself, along with the other particulars which were so honourable to him: But he did it in a private letter to him, and with no view, except to stir him up strenuously to exercise the spiritual gifts which were imparted to him, for the purpose of defending and spreading the gospel, ver. 6.—Moreover, to excite Timothy the more effectually to exercise his spiritual gifts for these ends, the apostle put him in mind, that, together with the spiritual gifts, God communicated to his faithful servants, fortitude, benevolence, and temperance, to enable them to exercise these gifts without fear, and in a prudent manner, for the benefit of mankind, ver. 7.—He, therefore, desired him not to be ashamed of the things he was to preach concerning Christ; namely, that he is the Son of God, and Saviour of the world; neither to be ashamed of him his spiritual father, although a prisoner, for preaching these things; but courageously to suffer evil jointly with him for the gospel, through the assistance of God, ver. 8.—who hath saved both Jews and Gentiles; having called both into his kingdom by the gospel, not on account of their good works, as the Judaizers affirmed concerning their own calling, but merely from God's free grace, bestowed on them through Christ, agreeably to the promise of pardon and salvation made to the first parents of mankind at the fall, long before the Jewish dispensation began, ver. 9.—This promise, the apostle observed, was now published to all, through the appearing of Christ in the flesh; in so much that the Gentiles, by the gospel, had obtained a clear knowledge of the immortality of the soul, and of an eternal state of happiness hereafter for good men of all nations, who, before the gospel was published, had no certain knowledge of these great truths, ver. 10.—Farther, the apostle assured Timothy, that to publish these joyful doctrines he was himself appointed a herald, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles, ver. 11.—And that for preaching these doctrines to the Gentiles, and not for any crime, he now suffered the miseries of a jail. Nevertheless, he was not ashamed of his imprisonment, because he knew in whom he had believed, that he is the Son of God, and Governor of the world, ver. 12.—He therefore ordered Timothy, to hold fast the form of sound words in which he had delivered the doctrines of the gospel to him, as well as these doctrines themselves, which had been revealed to him by Christ, ver. 13.—Then mentioned the desertion of the Judaizing teachers in Asia, ver. 15.—And spake with the warmest gratitude of the kindness of Onesiphorus, who had gone among the different prisons of Rome seeking him; and, when he found him, had ministered to him with the greatest affection, as he had done to him formerly in Ephesus, as Timothy well knew, ver. 16, 17, 18.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. I.—1 Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ (see 1 Tim. i. View) by the will of God, (1 Cor. i. 1. note 1. ἐκ, 228.) on account of the promise of life¹ which is by Christ Jesus,

2 To Timothy, my beloved son: Grace, mercy, and peace, from God the Father, and from Christ Jesus our Lord.

3 I give thanks to God, (whom from my forefathers I serve¹ with a pure conscience),² that I have unceasing remembrance of thee in my prayers, night and day.³

4 Remembering thy tears,¹ I greatly desire to see thee,² that I may be filled with joy:

5 Calling to remembrance ALSO the unfeigned faith which is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois,¹ and in thy mother Eunice, and I am persuaded that IT DWELLETH in thee also.

6 For which cause I put thee in mind to stir up the spiritual gift of God¹ which is in thee through the imposition of my hands, (see 1 Tim. iv. 14. note 3.)

7 For God hath not given us a spirit of cowardice, but of power, and of love,¹ and of self-government.²

8 Wherefore, be not thou ashamed of the testimony¹ of our Lord, nor of me his prisoner:

Ver. 1. On account of the promise of life which is by Christ Jesus.—The preposition κατά, in this verse, as in Tit. i. 2. denotes the end for which Paul was made an apostle; namely, to publish to Jews and Gentiles the promise of eternal life, which is to be obtained through Christ Jesus. The law of Moses did not promise eternal life to them who obeyed its precepts: It promised nothing but a long and happy life in Canaan. See Rom. x. 5. note. The promise of eternal life was made, first at the fall, and after that more explicitly in the covenant with Abraham. See Titus i. 2. note 1.

Ver. 2.—1. I give thanks to God, whom (καὶ προσκύνησιν) from my forefathers I serve.—Because the Jews affirmed that in preaching eternal life to the Gentiles through obedience to Jesus Christ, and not through obedience to the law, the apostle had apostatized from the faith of his forefathers, he said to Timothy, in thus preaching, I serve God with a pure conscience, because I preach according to the knowledge of the scriptures which I received from my forefathers, to whom the salvation of the Gentiles through faith was made known in the covenant with Abraham.—Or the clause may be translated, after my forefathers, after their example.

2. With a pure conscience.—By mentioning a pure conscience as maintained by him in his preaching salvation through faith, the apostle obliquely condemned the Judaizing teachers as having put away a good conscience, 1 Tim. i. 5, 6, when they preached that salvation could be had only by obeying the law of Moses.

3. Night and day.—Benson says, the evening and morning are pointed out by nature for our devotions; “for what more reasonable than that in the morning men should commit themselves to the divine direction; and in the evening, gratefully review God’s goodness, and recommend themselves to his care?”

Ver. 4.—1. Remembering thy tears.—Lardner thinks these tears were shed by Timothy on the occasion mentioned Acts x. 37. But there it is said that the Ephesian elders, and not Timothy, wept sore.—Others think the apostle refers to the tears which Timothy shed when he left him in Ephesus to go into Macedonia.—I think the tears spoken of were shed when the apostle first instructed Timothy in the Christian faith. Thereby this pious youth showed that he was deeply affected with the doctrines of the gospel, and that he felt the warmest gratitude to his spiritual father, while communicating these joyful doctrines to him.

2. I greatly desire to see thee.—The common translation of ver. 3, 4. seems to represent the apostle as greatly desiring to see Timothy, only while he was praying to God. But as that cannot

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. I.—1 Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, on account of publishing the promise of eternal life, which, being made to believers of all nations in the covenant with Abraham, is to be obtained, not by obeying Moses, but Christ Jesus,

2 To Timothy, my beloved son in the faith: May gracious dispositions, merciful deliverances, and inward peace, be to thee, from God the Father of Jews and Gentiles, and from Christ Jesus our common Lord.

3 I give thanks to God, (whom, according to the knowledge received from my forefathers, I serve with a pure conscience, when I preach to all the promise of life through Christ), that I have unceasing remembrance of thee in my prayers, evening and morning, as a faithful minister of Christ.

4 Remembering thy tears, I greatly desire to see thee, that I may be filled with joy in conversing with thee, and in giving thee my dying charge and blessing.

5 This desire is increased by my calling to remembrance also the unfeigned faith in the gospel which is in thee since I instructed thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, and in thy mother Eunice, and I am persuaded that it dwelleth firmly fixed in thee also, through the instructions of thy pious parents, as well as through my care.

6 Because I believe thy faith to be unfeigned, I put thee in mind to stir up the spiritual gift of God which thou possessest through the imposition of my hands: Improve thy gift, by boldly exercising it in preaching and defending the doctrines of the gospel against all false teachers.

7 For God hath not infused into us a spirit of cowardice which shrinks at danger, but of courage, such as becometh those who possess the gifts of inspiration and miracles, and of benevolence, which disposes us to communicate the gospel to all mankind, and of self-government, to behave with prudence on every occasion.

8 Wherefore, be not thou, like many in this city, ashamed of testifying the things which concern our Lord Jesus, neither be thou be the apostle’s meaning, the verse must be construed and translated as I have done. See chap. iv. 9. note.

Ver. 5. Which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois, &c.—In scripture language, to dwell signifies to abide permanently. Here it is insinuated, to the great praise of Timothy’s grandmother Lois, that having embraced the Christian faith herself, she persevered in it, and persuaded her daughter Eunice to do the same; and that the instructions and example of these pious women prepared their son for receiving the gospel when it was preached to him by the apostle.—The pains which these worthy persons took to impress the mind of their son in his childhood with sentiments of piety and virtue, is a fit example for the imitation of all mothers, who, if they take the same pains with their children, may hope that, by the blessing of God, their care will be followed with the same happy effects.

Ver. 6. Stir up the spiritual gift of God.—For the meaning of this exhortation, see 1 Thess. v. 19. note. Timothy was here directed to lay hold on the opportunities which his station at Ephesus afforded him for improving his spiritual gifts, by boldly exercising them in confirming and defending the doctrines of the gospel; as is plain from the next verse.

Ver. 7.—1. And of love.—The ministers of the gospel were not animated with the selfish and bigoted spirit of the Jews and Judaizing teachers, who hated all mankind but those of their own nation and religion, and confined salvation to the disciples of Moses.

2. And of self-government.—Σωφροσύνην. Scapula translates this by the word castigatio, correction; Estius, by moderatio, government. It comes from σώφρων, ad sanam mentem reduco; consequently it signifies a habit of self-government acquired by frequently restraining our passions. See Tit. ii. 12. note 3.

Ver. 8.—1. The testimony of our Lord.—This is the genitive of the object, Ess. iv. 24.—The great business of the first preachers of the gospel was, to testify to the world the things concerning the Lord Jesus of which they had been eye-witnesses, or which had been reported to them by the eye-witnesses: Such as, the doctrines which he preached, and the miracles which he wrought in proof of his being the Son of God; his calling himself ‘Christ the Son of God,’ even in presence of the chief priests and elders of the Jews; his condemnation and crucifixion on that account; his resurrection from the dead, whereby he was demonstrated to be the Son of God; his ascension into heaven; his shedding down the Holy Ghost on his disciples; and his promise to return to judge the world.—That the apostles were to testify these things

But do thou jointly suffer evil FOR the gospel,² according to the power (see ver. 7.) of God,

9 Who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not (αὐτῶν, 228.) on account of our works, but on account of his own purpose and grace,³ which was given us through Christ Jesus (πρὸς ἡμᾶς αἰώνιος) before the times of the ages : (See Tit. i. 2. note 2.)

10 (Δε, 101.) And is now made manifest by the appearing¹ of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath indeed made death ineffectual,² and hath made life and immortality clear³ (δε) through the gospel ;

11 For which I am appointed an herald, and an apostle, and a teacher of the Gentiles.

12 For which cause I suffer even such things.¹ Nevertheless I am not ashamed ; for I know in whom I have believed,² and I am persuaded that he is able to preserve (την ψυχάν μου) what is committed in trust to me³ until that day.

13 The form¹ of wholesome words which appears from our Lord's command, recorded John xv. 27. 'And ye shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning.' Acts i. 8. 'Ye shall be witnesses unto me, both in Jerusalem, &c. and to the uttermost parts of the earth.'

2. But do thou jointly suffer evil for the gospel.]—The dative case in the Greek, is often governed by a preposition understood. Here the preposition understood is in, for, and not with, because 'to suffer evil with the gospel,' would be too bold a figure. The proper meaning of with in the compound word συνμαρτυρία is, jointly suffer evil with me, and the other faithful servants of Christ.

Ver. 9. And grace which was given us.]—This (χαρίσ) grace or gift is that which was given to all mankind after the fall, in the promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent, and which, according to the apostle's account of it, Rom. v. 17, was a promise of deliverance from death by a general resurrection, and of eternal life to all who at the judgment are found capable of it.

Ver. 10.—1. By the appearing.]—The word φανερώσας properly signifies brilliance, splendour ; and by the Greeks was applied to the appearing of a god. See Parkhurst's Dictionary. I think the apostle alludes to Christ's calling himself 'the light of the world.' See Tit. ii. 11. note 2.—The manifestation of God's purpose and grace, and the making death ineffectual, and life and immortality clear, were accomplished, not merely by Christ's appearing, but by his appearing and continuing on earth in the flesh, and by his rising from the dead in the body in which he died.

2. Who hath indeed made death ineffectual.]—The word καταργήσας signifies, to render a thing inoperative, to deprive it of its power, Rom. iii. 31. note 1.—Christ hath not abolished temporal death to any one, since all without exception die. But he hath deprived death of its power to continue mankind in the state of the dead. By submitting to die, he hath procured for all men a resurrection from the dead ; and for the righteous, an eternal life in the body after the resurrection. Hence the apostle telleth us, Heb. ii. 14. The Son of God 'partook of flesh and blood, that through death (καταργήσας) he might destroy him who had the power of death' ; that is, render his malicious contrivances for destroying the human species ineffectual, agreeably to the promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the head of the serpent.

3. Hath made life and immortality clear.]—This is commonly supposed to be an Hebraism for immortal life. But though I have so explained it in the commentary, perhaps the word αἰωνίου should be translated, not immortality, but incorruption ; in which case the meaning will be, 'hath made the life or existence of the soul after death, and the incorruption of the body after the resurrection, clear.' So that the salvation of believers, mentioned ver. 9. includes not only a resurrection from the dead, but an immortal bodily life in heaven.—The word φανερώσας, which I have translated made clear, is explained by Scapula, lucidum reddo ; illuminio, illustro ; I make a thing, which was formerly dark, clear and plain. This is more proper than the common translation, brought to light. For the Israelites had an obscure knowledge of the immortality of the soul, and of the resurrection of the body, given them in the writings of Moses, as is plain from our Lord's words, Luke xx. 37. and from what is related, 2 Maccab. vii. 9. 14. 23. See Ess. v. sect. 3. Nevertheless, as these things were but obscurely revealed in the ancient oracles, the far more clear discovery of them in the gospel, but especially Christ's express promise to raise the dead, and give eternal life to believers, might with the greatest propriety be called a making these things clear.—The heathens also had some confused hopes of the immortality of the soul, and of the resurrection of the body. But, as they had no ground for these hopes but uncertain tradition and ashamed of me who am a prisoner on his account : But do thou come and jointly suffer evil with me for the gospel which I preach to the Gentiles, according to the power of God bestowed on thee ;

9 Who hath resolved to save us, and for that purpose hath called us into his kingdom with an holy calling ; a calling whose object is to make us holy ; and hath thus called us, not on account of our works as meriting it, but in accomplishment of his own purpose and gift, which was given us through Christ Jesus in the covenant made with mankind at the fall, long before the times of the Mosaic dispensation.

10 And this gift of salvation is now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ in the flesh, who, through his own death and resurrection, hath indeed made death ineffectual, and hath made an immortal life after death, and the nature of that life, clear through the gospel, which assures us that we shall live for ever in the body, after the resurrection.

11 For proclaiming which good news I am appointed an herald, and an apostle, and furnished with spiritual gifts to make me a successful teacher of the Gentiles.

12 For publishing the promise of eternal life through Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, I suffer even such things as have now befallen me. Nevertheless, I am not ashamed either of my doctrine or of my sufferings. For I know in whom I have believed, that he is the Son of God ; and I am persuaded he is able to defend the doctrine of the gospel which is committed in trust to me, against infidels and false teachers, till the end of the world.

13 The form of wholesome words in which thou hast heard from their own wishes, they were much in the dark as to these things. And therefore, concerning these important subjects, the apostle might justly say, that in former ages they were not made known to the sons of men, as they are now revealed to the holy apostles and prophets, by the Spirit, Eph. iii. 5.

Ver. 12.—1. For which cause I suffer even such things.]—By assigning his preaching salvation to the Gentiles through Christ, without obedience to the law of Moses, as the cause of his second bonds in Rome, he hath insinuated, that the unbelieving Jews were active in getting him imprisoned, and tried for his life as a criminal.

2. I know in whom I have believed.]—By appearing to Paul on the road to Damascus, and by bestowing on him the spiritual gifts, Jesus convinced him that he was risen from the dead, and that he was Christ the Son of God. Therefore, he could say with the greatest confidence, 'that he knew in whom he had believed.' He knew that Jesus was no impostor, but the Son of God, the Governor of the world, and the judge of the living and the dead.

3. I am persuaded he is able to preserve what is committed in trust to me.]—Παραθήκεν μου, literally, my deposit. This may signify either something which the apostle had deposited, or committed in trust to Christ, to be preserved and restored to him at the last day ; or something which Christ had committed in trust to him to be preserved. They who understand the phrase in the first sense, think the apostle speaks of his committing to Christ his bodily life, to be preserved till he should restore it to him at the last day. This doubtless is a good sense of the phrase, being parallel to 1 Pet. iv. 19. 'Let those who suffer according to the will of God, (παρεστήσαντες τὰς ψυχὰς ἑαυτῶν), commit in trust their lives to him in well doing, as to a faithful Creator ;' for certainly it was a great encouragement to the servants of Christ to suffer death on account of the gospel, to know that he would restore their bodily life to them at the resurrection. Nevertheless, seeing, by saying to Timothy, ver. 14. 'The good deposit preserve by the Holy Ghost who dwelleth in us,' the apostle represents the doctrine of the gospel as a deposit committed to him, and to the other faithful ministers of Christ, to be preserved in purity ; (see ver. 14. note 1.) ; I am of opinion, that παρεθήκεν μου, in this verse, means the true doctrine of the gospel committed in trust to the apostle, and to the faithful men mentioned 2 Tim. ii. 2.—It is true, that in ver. 14. and in 1 Tim. vi. 20. where the same injunction is given, the word used is not παρεθήκεν, as in this verse, but παρέστατο ; but these words have the same meaning, being both of them derived from παράσταναι, which signifies to commit a thing in trust to another to be kept ; and it is applied in particular to doctrines : 2 Tim. ii. 2. 'What things thou hast heard from me by many witnesses, these (παρέστω) commit in trust to faithful men, who shall be fit also to teach others.'—It being the great duty of the ministers of Christ, in that, and in every age, to preserve in purity the doctrines of the gospel committed in trust to them, the apostle, to encourage them, declared here, that notwithstanding the attacks of infidels, and the arts of false teachers, and the endeavours of persecutors to extinguish the Christian religion by putting those to death who preached and professed it, he was persuaded that Christ is able to defend it, and will defend it, until the day of his second coming.

Ver. 13.—1. The form.]—Ἐκτύπωσις, here translated form, comes from τυπύνω, which signifies to draw a sketch or first draught of a thing, as painters do when they begin a picture.—Wetstein hath showed from the Greek writers, that εἰκονισμός denotes a sketch or concise representation of any thing. It signifies also the likeness of a thing, especially that which is made by impression. See 1 Tim. i. 16. note 2. The word, therefore, is properly enough translated form.

thou hast heard from me¹ hold fast, with the faith and love which ARE in Christ Jesus.

14 The good deposit¹, guard by the Holy Ghost, who dwelleth in us.²

15 Thou knowest this, that all they who ARE in Asia have turned me off;¹ of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes.²

16 May the Lord grant mercy to the family of Onesiphorus, (see v. 18. note), for he often refreshed¹ me, and was not ashamed of my chain; (see ver. 8.)

17 But being in Rome, he sought me out very diligently, and found me.

18. May the Lord grant to him to find mercy (ἔλεος) from the Lord¹ in that day. And how many things he ministered TO ME in Ephesus, thou knowest well.

me the doctrines of the gospel, hold fast with that fidelity to Christ, and that love to those who err, which become a minister of Christ.

14 Also the good deposit of the gospel doctrine itself, guard by the assistance of the Holy Ghost, who dwelleth in us.

15 To guard the good deposit among the Ephesians is the more necessary, because thou knowest this, that all the Judaizing teachers who are in Asia have turned me off, denying that I am an apostle; of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes.

16 May the Lord grant mercy to the family of Onesiphorus. For he continued his attachment to me, and often comforted me in my imprisonment, by his visits and friendly offices, and was not ashamed of me though chained as a malefactor;

17 But being come to Rome, he searched for me with great diligence among the different prisons in the city, and at last found me.

18 For that good man himself I pray, May the Lord reward him for his kindness to me, and grant to him to find pardon from the Lord Jesus in the day of judgment. Besides, how many things he supplied to me while I abode in Ephesus, thou, being a witness thereof, knewest well.

2. Of wholesome words which thou hast heard from me.]—This is an intimation that the false teachers had proudly and impudently introduced into their discourses a variety of high-sounding mysterious words and phrases of their own invention, (called 'foolish talking,' 1 Tim. i. 6.), on pretence that they expressed the Christian doctrines better than those used by the apostles. This bad practice Timothy was to resist, by adhering closely to the words and phrases in which the apostle had taught him the doctrines of the gospel, and which he terms 'wholesome words,' because, being dictated by the Spirit, 1 Cor. ii. 13. they are more fit for expressing the doctrines of Christ, than any words of human invention.—The teachers in modern times, who, in explaining the articles of the Christian faith, use phrases different from the scripture phraseology, would do well to attend to this apostolical injunction.—If the above interpretation of ὡς ἠκούσας λόγον is not admitted, the clause may be thus translated, 'The form of wholesome doctrines—hold fast.'

Ver. 14.—1. The good deposit.]—This is the literal translation of τὸ καλὸν παράθετον δέμας. See 2 Tim. i. 12. note 3.—The Cambridge MS. reads παραθήκη here.—What the deposit was of which the apostle speaks, see 1 Tim. vi. 20. note 1.—Our translators have added the words to these, which are not in the original, and besides are unnecessary; because the apostle is speaking of a deposit committed in trust to himself as well as to Timothy; as is plain from the last words of the verse, 'Guard by the Holy Ghost who dwelleth in us.'—As 'the form of wholesome words,' mentioned ver. 13. was a part of the deposit, an exhortation to guard them was extremely necessary before the writings of the apostles and evangelists were published, in which the doctrines of the gospel are expressed in words taught by the Holy Ghost. And now that these inspired writings are in our possession, this exhortation implies, that we ought to preserve them pure without any alteration; and that all the translations which are made of them ought to exhibit, as nearly as possible, the very words which were dictated to the inspired writers by the Spirit of God. See 1 Cor. ii. 13. note 1.

2. The Holy Ghost who dwelleth in us.]—The apostle means the gift of discerning spirits, which was bestowed by the Holy Ghost on many of the first Christians, to enable them to judge of teachers pretending to inspiration, and of their doctrines.

Ver. 15.—1. All they who are in Asia have turned me off.]—According to the Greek commentators, the apostle is here speaking of the Judaizing teachers, who had followed him from Asia to Rome. But if this were his meaning, it must be translated by the word from, which is a very unusual sense of that preposition. I agree with the ancients in thinking the Judaizing teachers, and not the brethren in Asia, are here meant; because it is not to be thought that all the brethren either from or in Asia turned Paul off from being their apostle or teacher, by denying his apostolical commission. Benson conjectures that Onesiphorus informed the apostle of the defection of the Judaizing teachers in the province of Asia; and that the apostle mentioned it as a thing which Timothy, who was on the spot, knew, to stir him up to the greater diligence in guarding the deposit.

2. Of whom are Phygellus and Hermogenes.]—Of these corrupt teachers we know nothing. Only from their being mentioned particularly as having turned off the apostle, it may be presumed that they opposed his doctrine with great virulence, and had spoken calumniously of him. Whether they were authors of any particular sect, is not known. Some fabulous stories are told of them in the apocryphal books of the sufferings of the apostles, which merit no credit.

Ver. 16. He often refreshed me.]—Ἀντιψύει, literally, He cooled me. The apostle in this manner expressed the consolation which he received from the friendly visits of Onesiphorus, because the Hebrews represented any great affliction under the idea of a scorching or burning heat. See 1 Pet. iv. 12.—Perhaps the apostle meant likewise that Onesiphorus ministered to his wants at this time in Rome, as he formerly did in Ephesus. See ver. 18.—Offices of kindness done to Paul, especially when in distress, made a deep impression on him, and filled him with gratitude.

Ver. 18. To find mercy from the Lord.]—If the Lord in this latter clause does not mean the Lord Jesus, it is a common Hebraism for 'May the Lord grant him mercy.' See Gen. ix. 16. xix. 24. Exod. xxiv. 1, 2.—By praying, first for the family of Onesiphorus, ver. 16. the apostle intimated that Onesiphorus was at a distance from his family. Next, by praying for that good man himself, he intimates that he was not dead.—Blackwall observes, that there is great beauty in the style of this passage. He thinks the interruptions and repetitions found in it, shew the writer's impatience to express his fervent gratitude to Onesiphorus, for whose family he first prays; then suspend the sentence, to repeat his acknowledgments; after that, with renewed fervency and gratitude, he prays, 'The Lord grant unto him to find mercy from the Lord in that day.' Blackwall adds, among the many parentheses and interruptions of style to be met with in the most elegant authors, we find few written in a more pathetic and lively manner, or for a more substantial reason.—Concerning the salutation sent to the family of Onesiphorus, chap. iv. 19. from which the Papists infer that Onesiphorus was dead when this epistle was written; and concerning the lawfulness of praying for the dead, which the Papists have founded on the prayer in this 18th verse, taken in connexion with that salutation, see chap. iv. 19. note 2.

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Instructions given to Timothy in this Chapter.

BECAUSE the Judaizing teachers in Asia had all cast off Paul as an apostle, and because it would not be in his power, after this, to oppose their corrupt doctrines in person, he ordered Timothy to be strong in the exercise of his spiritual gifts, and in preaching the unspeakable benefits bestowed on Jews and Gentiles without distinction through Christ, and not through the law of Moses, ver. 1.—and the things concerning Christ; namely, that he is the Son of God; that he died for our sins; that he arose from the dead, ascended into heaven, and now sitteth at the right hand of God governing the world; and that he will return to judgment; all which Timothy had heard from the apostle, as facts confirmed by the testimony of many witnesses: These he ordered him to commit to faithful men, capable of inculcating them on others, who, in their turn, should hand them down in like manner; that the knowledge of them might be continued among mankind to the end of the world, ver. 2.

But in regard Timothy, by preaching these things, would expose himself to much persecution, the apostle exhorted him to endure evil, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ, ver. 3.—imitating ordinary soldiers, who hold themselves in constant readiness to march and fight, that they may please their commanders, ver. 4.—Imitating also those who contend in their games, who do not expect to be crowned unless they observe all the rules of the combat, ver. 5.—and husbandmen, who must labour, before they partake of the fruits of the ground which they cultivate, ver. 6, 7.—Farther, he desired him faithfully to do the work of an evangelist, by frequently calling to remembrance, and preaching, that Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, though put to death by the Jews as a deceiver, was raised from the dead, and thereby demonstrated to be the Son of God, according to the apostle's gospel, ver. 8.—for the preaching of which he was now bound in chains as a malefactor, ver. 9.—But he bore his sufferings with joy, for the sake of the Gentiles elected to be the people of God, that they might obtain salvation through the preaching of the gospel, ver. 10.—And to encourage Timothy, and all the ministers of religion who should read this letter, to faithfulness in preaching the gospel, and to courage in suffering for it, he set before them this greatest of all motives, That if they suffer death with Christ, they shall also live with him, ver. 11.—Whereas, if through fear of persecution and death they deny him, by concealing or misrepresenting the things concerning him, he will, at the day of judgment, deny that they are his servants, ver. 12.—This Christ had expressly declared, Matt. x. 33. and he certainly will do it; for he cannot deny himself, ver. 13.—All these things the apostle ordered Timothy to represent to the Judaizing teachers, who perverted the doctrines of the gospel to render them conformable to the prejudices of the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles, hoping thereby to avoid persecution. Also he ordered him earnestly to testify to them, as in the presence of the Lord, not to fight about the meaning of detached words and sentences in the law, from which nothing could result but the subversion of the hearers, ver. 14.—And with respect to Timothy's own conduct, the apostle ordered him to present himself to God an approved unashamed workman, who rigidly divided the word of truth among his hearers, ver. 15.—Then counselled him to shun the profane empty babbling of the Judaizers, in their discourses about the law, because such a method of talking led to more impiety, ver. 16.—and was of an infectious nature, corrupting the mind as a gangrene does the body; and mentioned Hymeneus and Philetus, two bigoted Judaizers, whose vain babbling led to more and more impiety, ver. 17.—For by affirming that the resurrection was accomplished when men believed, they denied the resurrection of the dead, and overturned the faith of some, who had expected a future eternal life in the body, in consequence of their resurrection, ver. 18.—But although these and other ungodly teachers, by opposing the doctrine of the apostles, denied their inspiration and authority, the apostles remained firmly placed, as the foundation on which the church of God is built, ver. 19.—Farther, that Timothy and the faithful at Ephesus might not entertain wrong thoughts of God, for permitting false teachers in his church, the apostle observed, that it is in the church as in a great house, where there are vessels made of different materials, some for an honourable and some for a dishonourable use, ver. 20.—but that, if any teacher cleanse himself from false doctrine and bad practices, he will be in the house of God a vessel sanctified and meet for the master's use, ver. 21.—And that Timothy might be such a teacher, the apostle gave him a variety of directions and advices, respecting his behaviour and method of teaching, ver. 22–25.

CHAP. II.—1 Because there has been such a general defection among the teachers in Asia, my son, be strong in preaching the grace which is bestowed on mankind through Christ Jesus.

2 And what things thou hast heard from me concerning Christ, confirmed by many witnesses who saw and conversed with him both before and after his resurrection, these commit in trust to men of approved fidelity, who shall be fit also to teach them to others, that the knowledge of them may be continued in the world to the end.

Ver. 1. Be strong in grace.]—Grace here may signify the office of an evangelist bestowed on Timothy by the grace of Christ; for it is used to signify the office of an apostle, Rom. i. 5: or it may signify the spiritual gifts bestowed on Timothy to fit him for his office. In this sense, the exhortation will be the same with that given him 1 Tim. iv. 14. 2 Tim. i. 6.—Or grace may signify the gospel itself, as it does Tit. ii. 11; and the apostle's meaning may be, that Timothy should strongly set forth the great blessings bestowed on mankind through Christ, as they are revealed in the gospel.

Ver. 2.—1. What things (see 1 Tim. vi. 20. note 1.) thou hast heard from me by many witnesses.]—Grotius thinks these witnesses are the ancient prophets who foretold our Lord's coming in the flesh; and particularly his death and resurrection. But I rather think the witnesses here spoken of were the apostles and other eye-witnesses who attended our Lord during his ministry on earth, and saw him alive after his resurrection, to whose testimony St. Paul often appealed in the course of his preaching and conversation. See 1 Cor. xv. 5–8. Heb. ii. 3.—If this is the apostle's meaning, the things which Timothy had heard from him were those mentioned ver. 8, namely, Christ's descent from David, and his resurrection from the dead; also the other articles of the gospel, mentioned 1 Tim. vi. 20. note 1.; for many of these being matters of fact, their credibility depends on the testimony of those who were eye and ear-witnesses of them.—In our Bible the translation of the clause under consideration is, 'heard from me among many witnesses;' meaning, I suppose, that Paul himself was one among many witnesses from whom Timothy had heard the things concerning Christ above-mentioned. But the translation I have given is more proper.

2. These (vs. vs.) commit in trust.]—For this translation of the Greek word, see 2 Tim. i. 12. note 3.—Though Christ promised that the gates of hell should not prevail against his church, means are to be used by his servants for securing it against the power of hell. And therefore St. Paul, by inspiration, ordered the ministers of the gospel in every age to instruct a number of capable men in the true gospel doctrine, who were to preach that doctrine faithfully to others, who, in like manner, were to deliver it in purity to their successors. In obedience to this injunction, a succession of teachers hath been perpetuated in the Christian church, by whose labours the knowledge of the doctrines and precepts of true religion having been widely diffused, the morals, especially of the lower classes of mankind, who, till this order of teachers was established, were exceedingly ignorant and profligate, have been greatly mended.—Farther, by placing the evidences of the gospel in a proper light, and by repelling the objections of infidels, the ministers of the gospel have maintained the Christian religion in the world: so that it hath continued, and will continue to the end.—The gospel ministry, therefore, being of divine institution, and admirably adapted to the necessities of mankind, he who undertaketh that function from just motives, and who exerciseth it with understanding and diligence, performs a work most acceptable to Christ, and highly beneficial to the world.

Eusebius, E. H. l. 3. c. 4. speaking of the churches founded by Paul and Peter, saith, "But how many, and who, having become genuine imitators of these," (apostles), "were esteemed fit to feed the churches founded by them, it is not easy to say; unless it be such as any one may easily collect from the writings of Paul."—If in the days of Eusebius the succession of pastors in the churches founded by the apostles was so uncertain, these successions must now be much more uncertain, considering the many ages which have elapsed since Eusebius wrote. Nevertheless, as in his time the authority of the ministry was not called in question, on account of the intrusions of pastors into particular churches without due warrant, so the authority of the ministry can as little be called in question now on that account, in regard it is nowhere promised in scripture that the succession of pastors in the church should be uninterrupted.

Ver. 4. Entangleth himself with the business of this life.]—In his note on this passage Grotius hath shewed, that the legionary soldiers among the Romans were not suffered to engage in agriculture, merchandize, mechanical employments, or any business which might he may please him who hath chosen him to be a soldier.

7 Consider what I say, ($\gamma\alpha\epsilon$, 97.) and may the Lord give thee understanding in all things.

8 Remember Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, raised from the dead,¹ according to my gospel:²

9 (Ev. i., 164.) For which I suffer evil unto bonds, as a malefactor. But the word of God is not bound.¹

10 For this cause I patiently bear all things ($\delta\iota\alpha$, 112.) on account of the elected, that they also may obtain the salvation which is by Christ Jesus with eternal glory.

11 ($\text{O } \lambda\omicron\gamma\omicron\varsigma$, 71.) This saying is true, ($\kappa\alpha\iota$) That if we die with HIM,¹ we shall also live with HIM:

12 If we suffer patiently, we shall also reign¹ with HIM: If we deny HIM, he also will deny us. (See Matt. x. 33.)

13 (Et, 130. 2.) Though we be unfaithful, he abideth faithful. He cannot deny himself.

14 Put THEM in remembrance of these things, earnestly testifying TO THEM, in the presence of the Lord, not to fight about words¹ for nothing useful, BUT ($\kappa\alpha\iota$) to the subverting of the hearers.

15 Strive to present thyself to God an approved unashamed workman, who rightly divideth¹ the word of truth.

divert them from their profession. The apostle, by applying the Roman law respecting soldiers to the ministers of the gospel, hath established a scripture canon, whereby all who undertake the office of the ministry are prohibited from following such secular businesses as engross their attention, and require much time to execute.

Ver. 5.—1. If one contend in the games.]—This is the proper signification of the word $\alpha\delta\gamma\alpha$. Hence the combatants were called athletes.

2. Unless he contend according to the laws.]—One of the laws of the games was, that the combatants should contend naked. But whether the apostle had that law in view here, and meant to insinuate that the ministers of the gospel, while combating the excellent combat of faith, in those times of persecution, were to divest themselves of the love and of the cares of the world, I will not pretend to say. The preceding verse contains that sentiment.

Ver. 6. Labour before he partaketh.]—The word $\pi\alpha\rho\epsilon\rho\epsilon$ is often used as an adverb, in which sense I have taken it here, and have construed the sentence thus— $\delta\iota\alpha$ τὸν $\pi\alpha\rho\epsilon\rho\epsilon$ κοπιῶντα πρὸς τὸν $\mu\iota\sigma\theta\omicron\varsigma$ τὸν $\kappa\epsilon\rho\alpha\iota\sigma\mu\omicron\varsigma$.

Ver. 8.—1. Remember Jesus Christ, of the seed of David, raised from the dead.]—Of the false teachers, some, I suppose, were Greeks, or persons addicted to the Grecian philosophy; others were Jews, who retained many of their ancient prejudices. The Greeks had a great attachment to fables and allegories. This was the case with the Platonists more especially. Of the Jewish false teachers, two are mentioned by name in this chapter, ver. 17. who having denied the reality of Christ's resurrection, considered the doctrine of the resurrection as an allegory, and affirmed that it had already happened. See ver. 17. note. But to preserve himself and others from that error, Timothy was ordered often to recollect, and consequently to preach, the resurrection of Jesus Christ the true Messiah from the dead; because, being a real resurrection, it was an example, and proof and pledge of the resurrection of all the faithful, and of their obtaining the reward of eternal life promised to believers by Christ. See the Illustration prefixed to 1 Cor. xv.—Timothy was also to preach that Jesus Christ is of the seed of David, because that circumstance was as necessary as his resurrection, to his being the true Messiah, Isa. xl. 1.

2. According to my gospel.]—Eusebius, E. H. l. 3. c. 4. saith, "It was reported by some, that the gospel according to Luke was commonly meant by Paul, when writing as concerning a gospel of his own, he saith, according to my gospel." This however could him to be a soldier. The same rule ought a minister of the gospel to follow, that he may please Christ who hath called him.

5 And also, if one contend in the Grecian games, he is not crowned unless he contend according to the laws of the combat. As little can thou expect to be rewarded, unless thou fulfil thy ministry in the manner prescribed by Christ.

6 It becometh the husbandman to labour his field before he partake of the fruits of it. How much more oughtest thou to labour in the ministry before thou art rewarded?

7 Consider what I say concerning the necessity of devoting thyself wholly to the ministry, and of enduring evil, and may the Lord Jesus give thee a just discernment in all religious matters.

8 Often recollect and preach, that Jesus Christ really descended from David, was raised from the dead, and thereby demonstrated to be the true Messiah, according to the gospel which I preach.

9 For which gospel I suffer evil even to bonds, as a malefactor. But though my enemies may bind me, they cannot bind the word of God. It will spread itself in spite of all opposition.

10 For this cause I patiently bear all things on account of the Gentiles elected to be the people of God, (see 1 Pet. i. 1. note 3.), that they also may obtain the salvation from sin and death which is procured by Christ Jesus, and which will be accompanied with eternal glory.

11 Suffering for Christ is not so great a misfortune as the world imagines: For this affirmation is true, that if we die with Christ, as martyrs for religion, we shall also live with him eternally.

12 If, like Christ, we suffer persecution patiently, we shall also reign with him: But if, when brought before kings and councils, we from fear deny our relation to him, he will, at the judgment, deny that he knows us.

13 Though we be unfaithful in denying him, he abideth faithful to all his promises and threatenings. He cannot act contrary to his own essential perfections.

14 Put the Ephesians in mind of these great motives, earnestly testifying to them in the presence of Christ, and as they shall answer to him, not to fight about words, (see 1 Tim. vi. 4. note 2.), as the Judaizers do, to no manner of use, but to the subverting of the faith and morals of the hearers.

15 Strive to behave so as at last thou mayest present thyself to God an approved unashamed workman, who hath rightly distributed the doctrine of the gospel to all, according to their need.

not be his meaning in every instance where he useth that expression; for we find it in some of his epistles which were written before Luke's gospel was published. See Rom. ii. 16. xv. 26.

Ver. 9. But the word of God is not bound.]—This short sentence is a beautiful display of the apostle's character. The evils which he was suffering for the gospel, though great, he reckoned as nothing, because of the joy which he felt from his persuasion that the honour of Christ and the happiness of mankind would be promoted by his sufferings; and because he knew that all the opposition which Infidels were making to the gospel would not hinder it from being preached and believed. They have bound me in chains, said he, and may put me to death, but the word of God they cannot bind.—Not only the strength of the apostle's reasoning here, but the energy of his expression, is admirable.

Ver. 11. This saying is true, That if we die with him, &c.]—Til- lotson thought this a noted saying among the first Christians: But whether they had it by tradition from Christ, or whether it was in familiar use among the apostles, he could not determine. St. Paul introduces several remarkable sayings of his own in this manner, in order to excite attention.—The saying mentioned here, from whomsoever derived, was no doubt of singular use in exciting the Christians of that age to the steadfast profession of their religion.

Ver. 12. We shall also reign with him.]—I do not think there is here any reference to the Millennium, as Benson fancies. In other passages of scripture, the future felicity of the righteous is represented by their reigning with Christ, Rev. iii. 21.

Ver. 14. Not to fight about words.]—Bengelius translates $\mu\epsilon$ $\lambda\omicron\gamma\omicron\mu\alpha\chi\epsilon\iota\sigma\theta\epsilon$, not to fight with words. The pernicious effects of those disputes about words are described 1 Tim. vi. 4. 'Whereof cometh envy, strife, &c.—The same bad consequences flow from most religious disputes, as they are commonly managed; so that they tend to nothing but to the subverting of the faith and morals of those who engage keenly in them.—They ought therefore to be carefully avoided, agreeably to the apostle's advice.

Ver. 15. Who rightly divideth.]— ὀρθῶς κομῶντα , literally, who rightly cutteth up the word; in allusion to the action of the priest who opened and divided the sacrifice: or rather, of one who carves at table, and distributes meat to the guests, according to their ages and their state of health. In this manner, the apostle himself divided the word to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. iii. 2. 'Milk I gave you and not meat, for ye were not then able to bear it.' The Vulgate version paraphrases this very well, 'recte tractantem—rightly handling.'

16 But profane empty babblings (argutus, circumaste) resist, for they will increase to more ungodliness;

17 And their word will eat as a gangrene: of whom are Hymeneus and Philetus,¹

18 Who concerning the truth have erred, affirming that the resurrection hath already happened,¹ and overturn the faith of some.

19 (Moros) Nevertheless, the foundation of God standeth firm,¹ having this seal,² The Lord will make known them who are his:³ And, Let every one who nameth the name of Christ, depart from iniquity.

20 But in a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earthenware,¹ and some to honour, and some to dishonour.²

21 If, then, a man will cleanse himself well from these things, he will be a vessel APPOINTED to honour, sanctified, and very profitable for the master's use, prepared for every good work.

22 Flee (ῥα, 106.) therefore youthful¹ lusts: But pursue righteousness,² faith, love, AND peace, with them who call on the Lord from a pure heart.

Ver. 17. Of whom are Hymeneus and Philetus.]—The apostle mentions these two by name, as profane empty babblers whom the faithful were to resist, because their errors were of the most dangerous nature: as is evident from the account which the apostle gives of them in the next verse. And because Hymeneus, in particular, had spoken disrespectfully of Christ, the apostle found it necessary to deliver him to Satan, 1 Tim. i. 20.—Philetus is mentioned nowhere else in scripture.—Perhaps these teachers denied that Jesus Christ came in the flesh, see 1 John iv. 2, consequently denied the reality both of his death and of his resurrection. See Pref. to 1 John, sect. 3.

Ver. 18. Affirming that the resurrection hath already happened.]—They affirmed, that the only resurrection Christ promised was a spiritual resurrection from ignorance and error by believing the gospel; and that that resurrection having already happened, no other is to be expected. See Irenæus, lib. ii. c. 56. This doctrine, the Judaizers founded, I suppose, on Christ's words, John v. 24, 26, where doubtless a spiritual resurrection is spoken of. But they overlooked the other parts of his discourse, ver. 28, 29, in which he promised expressly the resurrection of the body.—By explaining the doctrine of the resurrection in a figurative sense, Hymeneus and Philetus endeavoured to recommend the gospel to the Greek philosophers, who considered the resurrection of the body not only as impossible in itself, but as a thing highly disadvantageous, had it been possible. See Pref. to 1 Cor. sect. 4. These Judaizers, however, carried the matter farther than even the Greek philosophers. For, being Sadducees, who held that there is nothing in man but what is material, by denying the resurrection of the body, they denied the future existence of the man. The heresy of Hymeneus was that which Irenæus ascribes to the Gnostics, lib. 2. c. 37. "Esse resurrectionem a mortuis agnitionem ejus, quæ ab ipso dicitur veritas." This heresy seems afterwards to have been espoused by Marcion, who said, "Non carnis sed animæ resurrectionem esse credendum.—We are not to believe the resurrection of the body, but of the soul." Epiphanius Heres. 42.

Ver. 19.—1. Nevertheless (ὅμως) the foundation of God standeth firm.]—The apostle, speaking of the temple of God, the Christian church, consisting of believers, says, Eph. ii. 20, 'Ye are built upon (ἐπὶ θεμελίῳ) the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the bottom corner-stone.' Wherefore it is probable, that by 'the foundation of God,' in this passage, he means the apostles and prophets, on whom, as on a foundation, the church is built. And when he told Timothy that 'the foundation of God standeth firm,' his meaning is, that the apostles were so firmly placed as the foundation of the church, that they could not be removed by any attempts of those who denied their inspiration and authority.—Because we find this expression, Heb. vi. 1, 'Not laying again the foundation of repentance,' &c. Benson, by 'the foundation of God,' understands the chief doctrines of the gospel. But I do not see how what follows can be applied to doctrines.

2. Having this seal.]—In common language, a seal signifies not only the seal itself with its inscription, but the figure that is made by the seal when impressed on some soft substance. A seal, in the sense of ἑρμηνεία with an inscription, was no unusual thing on a foundation-stone, even in ancient times: Zech. iii. 9. 'For behold the stone that I have laid before Joshua; upon one stone shall be seven eyes; behold I will engrave the graving thereof.'

16 But irreligious empty declamations resist, for they who use such discourses will increase to more ungodliness; they will proceed to deny the most essential articles of the Christian faith;

17 And their doctrine will eat, will destroy the souls of men, as a gangrene destroys the body. Of this sort of ungodly talkers are Hymeneus and Philetus, 18 Who from the true Christian doctrine have wandered, affirming that the resurrection hath already happened; and by this impious babbling have overturned the faith of some concerning the resurrection of the body, and a future life in the body.

19 These false teachers, by denying the doctrine of the apostles, make themselves greater than the apostles. Nevertheless, the apostles being the foundation of God's church, (Eph. ii. 20.), stand firm in that honourable place, having this inscription as a confirmation of their authority, The Lord will make known them who are his: And, Let every one who nameth the name of Christ as his Lord, depart from wicked teachers, lest with them he be destroyed.

20 Think it not strange that God permits wicked teachers to be in his church. In a great house there are not only vessels of gold and of silver, but also of wood and of earthenware, and some of these vessels are destined to an honourable, and some to a dishonourable use.

21 If, then, a teacher will cleanse himself well from these things, namely, from false doctrine, corrupt affections, and sinful actions, he will be a vessel appointed to an honourable use in the church, consecrated, and very profitable for God's use, who is the master of the house or church, being prepared for every good work.

22 Flee, therefore, those youthful lusts which young men placed over others are prone to indulge, and which render them unfit for the master's use: But pursue righteousness, fidelity, love, and peace, especially with them who worship the Lord from a pure heart.

3. The Lord will make known them who are his, &c.]—The apostles and prophets, as the foundation-stones of the temple of God, the Christian church, have this inscription graven upon them, 'The Lord will make known them who are his.' These are nearly the words which Moses spake to Korah and his company, who endeavoured to overturn his authority, Numb. xvi. 5. 'The Lord will shew who are his;' which the LXX. have translated as the apostle hath done: Εγὼ κείνους τοὺς ἄντας ἀντὶς αὐτοῦ, 'The Lord will make known them who are his.' This inscription is said to be written on 'the foundation of God,' that is, on the apostles; and is called a seal, or confirmation of their authority, in allusion to the common use of seals.—The remaining part of the inscription, 'Let every one who nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity,' is an allusion to the command which Moses gave to the Israelites, Numb. xvi. 26, 'Depart from the tents of these wicked men.'—The opposition of the heretical teachers to the apostle, was as real a rebellion against God as the opposition of Korah and his company to Moses, and was certainly to be punished. Wherefore, to the safety of the faithful, it was as necessary that they should depart from these heretical teachers, as it was to the safety of the Israelites that they should depart from the tents of Korah and his accomplices. To shew this, and to make the heretical teachers sensible of the destruction that was coming upon them, the apostle represents a command, similar to that given by Moses to the Israelites, as written on the apostles, the foundation-stones of the church of God: 'Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity;' let them depart from wicked teachers, lest they be involved in their punishment.

Ver. 20.—1. And of earthenware.]—The word οἰκεῖνα denotes vessels of clay, such as potters make, and which are appropriated to meaner uses than those made of gold and silver. They are called οἰκεῖνα, because, being burnt in the fire, they are hard like shells.

2. And some to dishonour.]—The application of the comparison begun in this verse is wanting, as in the comparison Rom. v. 12 and other instances. But the member wanting here may be thus supplied:—Just so in the church, which is the house of God, there are teachers of different characters and capacities; and some of them, being faithful, are employed in the honourable work of leading men in the path of truth and goodness; but others, being unfaithful, are permitted to follow the dishonourable occupation of seducing them who love error, that the approved may be manifest. See Pref. sect. 4. penult. paragr. at the middle.

Ver. 22.—1. Flee therefore youthful lusts.]—The apostle does not mean sensual lusts only, but ambition, pride, love of power, rashness, and obstinacy; vices which some teachers who are free from sensual lusts are at little pains to avoid.—At the time this epistle was written, Timothy, being about 39 years of age, was in the season of life which is most susceptible of ambition, pride, love of power, &c.

2. But pursue righteousness, &c.]—Human nature is so constituted, that what men are accustomed to becomes pleasant, although at first it be disagreeable. The apostle's advice, therefore, may be considered as implying, that we should, for the most part, employ our selves in the exercise of the virtues here mentioned, that we may acquire a relish for them, and not too frequently indulge ourselves even in innocent diversions and entertainments. For, 'the mind may insensibly fall off from the relish of virtuous actions, and by 23 (Δε) Moreover, foolish and untaught questions (Tit. iii. 9.) reject, knowing that they beget fightings.

24 (Δε) And the servant of the Lord must not fight,¹ but be gentle towards all men, fit to teach, (see 1 Tim. iii. 2.), patiently bearing evil:

25 In meekness instructing those who set themselves in opposition; (μωροὶ) if, by any means, God will give them repentance (ω) to the acknowledgment of truth.

26 And being¹ caught alive² by him out of the snare³ of the devil, they may awake (ω) to DO the will of God.⁴

degrees exchange that pleasure which it takes in the performance of its duty, for delights of a much more inferior and unprofitable nature." Spectator, No. 447.—The Judaizers seem to have been remarkably deficient in the virtues mentioned by the apostle, being men of immoral lives.

Ver. 24. And the servant of the Lord must not fight.—In this and the following verse, the apostle seems to have had Christ's example as a teacher in his eye, proposing it as a model to all who are employed in teaching. The virtues here mentioned, our Lord generally exercised in teaching: Yet, on some occasions, he departed from his usual mildness, and with great severity reprobated notorious sinners, such as the scribes and pharisees. In the same manner, the prophets and apostles used strong speech in checking obstinate offenders; while those who shewed any candour and honesty in their opposition to the gospel, they instructed with the greatest meekness, agreeably to the canon mentioned ver. 25.

Ver. 26.—1. And being, &c.]—The translation which I have given of this verse, arises from pointing and construing it in the following manner: Καὶ ἐ-γενε-μαι ἐν σου-τις αἰ-μα-σι τοῦ δια-βόλου, ἐν ᾧ ἡμεῖς ἠ-κολούθη-μεν. According to this construction, in which I have followed Benson, all the words of the sentence have their proper signification, particularly the two pronouns; for σου-τις, the relative, means the servant of the Lord, and ἡμεῖς, the demonstrative, refers to God, mentioned ver. 15.

2. Caught alive.]—Ζω-γι-σθαι denotes the action of a fisher or hunter

23 Moreover, those foolish questions which the Judaizers are so fond of, and which were never proposed by the apostles, reject; knowing that they beget contentions.

24 And the servant of Christ must use no violent methods with those he instructs, but must be gentle towards all men, shewing an example of the meekness which he recommends: He must also be able and desirous to teach, patiently bearing every kind of ill treatment.

25 Having the command of his own temper, he must in meekness instruct those who set themselves in opposition to the doctrines of the gospel, if, by any means, God will give them a sense of their errors, so as to bring them to the acknowledgment of truth.

26 And being caught alive by the servant of the Lord, out of the toils of the devil, in which they were sleeping through the intoxication of sin, they may awake from that intoxication to do the will of God, by believing and obeying the gospel.

who takes his prey alive, in opposition to one who kills it in order to catch it. This sense Benson hath proved by various examples. According to this sense of the word, it is used by the apostle with great propriety: for the purpose of the devil's ensnaring men being to kill them, the servant of God, who takes the wicked alive out of his snare, saves their life, by giving them an opportunity of escaping and returning to God.

3. Out of the snare of the devil.]—The snare of the devil, out of which the opposers of the gospel are to be taken alive by the servant of the Lord, signifies those prejudices and errors, and habits of sensuality, which hindered both Jews and Gentiles, in the first age, from attending to the evidences of the gospel.

4. They may awake to do the will of God.]—The word ἀναιψύσθαι properly signifies to awake sober out of a deep sleep occasioned by drunkenness. In this passage wicked men are represented as asleep, or deprived of the use of their faculties through the intoxication of sensuality. During this sleep of their reason, they are caught in the toils of error by the devil; but, being laid hold on by the servant of the Lord, they are taken alive out of that snare by his representing to them the danger of their state, and are at length roused to do the will of God.—If to this construction and translation of this passage, given above, it be objected, that ἐ-γενε-μαι αἰ-μα-σι is an uncommon phrase, I answer, that Benson, it is not more uncommon than ἀναιψύσθαι αἰ-μα-σι, the phrase admitted by our translators.

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Prediction concerning the Apostasy, and of the other Matters contained in this Chapter.

THE apostle, in the end of the preceding chapter, having informed Timothy, that for wise reasons false teachers were suffered to arise, he in the beginning of this chapter foretold, that in future times, through the pernicious influence of the corrupt doctrines propagated by false teachers, many in the Christian church, and among the rest the false teachers themselves, would become so wicked, that it would be dangerous to the faithful to live among them, ver. 1.—Men would be unmeasurably selfish, scandalously covetous of money, boasters of being high in favour with God, insolent on that account, blasphemers of God by the injurious representations which they would give of his character and will, disobedient to parents, ungrateful to benefactors, unholy in their dispositions, ver. 2.—without the affections natural to mankind, avowed covenant-breakers, slanderers of those who maintained the truth, immoderately addicted to venereal pleasures, furious against those who oppose their corrupt practices, having no love to good men, ver. 3.—betrayers of trusts, headstrong in their errors, swollen with pride, and lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God, ver. 4.—And to shew that in this description the teachers of religion were comprehended, the apostle added, that the persons of whom he spake, in order to conceal their enormous wickedness, would make loud pretensions to superior sanctity; they were to have the outward appearance of godliness, but in practice they would deny its power. And because some teachers of this character were then beginning to shew themselves, the apostle ordered Timothy to avoid them, ver. 5.—Of this sort, he told him, those teachers were, who, on pretence of instructing the female part of families, introduced themselves into houses, and led captive silly women laden with sins, by assuming the direction of their conscience, ver. 6.—and who detained them in bondage, by keeping them always learning, and never leading them to the knowledge of the truth, ver. 7.

This part of the chapter is generally, and I think justly, considered as a prediction of the apostasy from the true faith and practice of the gospel which early began to take place in the Christian church, but which was not carried to its height, till the Roman empire in the west was overturned by the incursions of the barbarous northern nations.—Of that apostasy St. Paul had prophesied twice before; namely, 2 Thess. ii. 3–12. and 1 Tim. iv. 1–5. In the first of these passages, the blasphemous claims of the corrupters of Christianity in later ages, their feigned miracles, and other base arts by which they were to establish their usurped authority in the church, are described: In the second passage, the impious doctrines and superstitious practices, which, by virtue of that authority, they were to introduce, are particularly set forth. But in this epistle, the influence of the ungodly doctrines and superstitious practices of the promoters of the apostasy, in corrupting the morals both of the teachers and of the people, are foretold.—These three prophecies taken together, exhibit such a striking portrait of the characters, pretensions, and practices of the promoters of the apostasy, that no intelligent reader, who is acquainted with the history of the church, can doubt that the erroneous doctrines and superstitious practices which were early introduced, and which, under mistaken notions of sanctity, were supported by persons of the greatest reputation, are in these prophecies foretold to end in that monstrous fabric of spiritual tyranny, which the bishops of Rome, assisted by their clergy, erected; and in that universal corruption of manners which it occasioned. As little can he doubt, that the predictions of these evils recorded in scripture, were designed by the Spirit of God to convince the faithful in after-times who were to be witnesses of the apostasy, that it had happened by the permission of God, who often makes the wickedness of men instrumental in accomplishing his greatest purposes.

Next, however, the knowledge of that great and universal corruption which was to take place in the church, might have led Timothy and the brethren at Ephesus to fear that the church would never recover from such a sad state, the apostle observed, that the opposition of the authors and promoters of the apostasy to the truth, was of the same nature, and would end in the same manner, as the opposition of Pharaoh's magicians to Moses. For as Jannes and Jambres resisted him by false miracles, so the promoters of the apostasy, being men corrupted in mind, would resist the true doctrines of the gospel by feigned miracles and other base arts, ver. 8.—But they would not be permitted to go on in their deceits longer than the time determined. Their wicked practices would at length be made plain to the deluded themselves, as the wicked practices of Pharaoh's magicians were made plain both to the Israelites and to the Egyptians, ver. 9.—Then, to shew what he had done for repressing error and wickedness in the world, the apostle appealed to Timothy's knowledge of his doctrine, manner of life, purpose in preaching, faith, long-suffering, love, patience, persecutions in various places, and deliverances. Wherefore, Timothy having been taught the true doctrines of the gospel by the apostle, and being animated by his example to encounter danger, he was both qualified to detect and strengthened to oppose error, ver. 10, 11.—Besides, he was to consider, that all the faithful servants of Christ in the first age were appointed to suffer persecution, ver. 12.—whereas evil men and false teachers, instead of suffering for the truth, will give up every article thereof, and become more and more corrupt; seducing not only others, but themselves also, through their immoderate love of gain, ver. 13.—In short, the apostle ordered Timothy to maintain with firmness the doctrine he had learned from him, knowing that he had learned it from an apostle of Christ, ver. 14.—and the rather, that from his childhood he had been brought up in the knowledge of the Jewish scriptures, which, by leading him to believe on Christ, were able to make him wise to salvation, ver. 15.—For these scriptures being given by the inspiration of God, they are in all respects agreeable to the gospel revelation, and may be used profitably by Christian ministers, in teaching, correcting, and instructing their people in righteousness, ver. 16.—Properly understood, therefore, the Jewish scriptures are of great use in fitting the Christian preacher for every part of his duty, ver. 17.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. III.—1 Besides what I formerly told thee concerning the apostasy, (1 Eph. iv. 1.), this also know, that in the latter days, through the extreme wickedness both of the teachers and of the people, times dangerous to live in will come:

2 For men will be selfish, covetous of money, boasters of their being in favour with God, and proud on that account, blasphemers of God, by the injurious representation which they give of him, disobedient to parents, ungrateful to benefactors, unholy,

Ver. 1. In latter days.—The phrase εσχάταις ημεραις is the same with Gen. xlix. 1. εσχάταις ημεραις, which signifies future days or time, without marking whether these days were far off or near at hand. And therefore it does not signify the last days of the world, as in our English Bibles, but future times in general, being of the same import with εσχάτοις χρόνοις, latter times, 1 Tim. iv. 1. where also the apostasy is foretold.

Ver. 2.—1. For all men will be.—The word men includes both teachers and people. The apostle seems to have had the teachers principally in his eye here, as is plain from ver. 6. where he represents them as 'going into houses, and leading captive silly women'; and ver. 8. where he likens them to Jannes and Jambres, on account of their resisting the truth, by the false miracles which they pretended to work.

2. Self-lovers.—The extreme selfishness of the teachers of religion in future times, the apostle mentioned first of all in this prophecy, because their other vices were to originate from and terminate in selfishness.—The vices mentioned in this and the two following verses have always existed in the world: But being spoken of here as characteristic of the latter days, it implieth, that besides being common in the latter days, they would be openly avowed and defended.—Accordingly it is well known, that in the dark ages the clergy defended all the enormities mentioned by the apostle, encouraged the people by their false doctrine to commit them, and went before them in the practice of these enormities.

3. Money-lovers.—The Romish clergy have carried their love of money to such an height, that they pretend to sell heaven for money, even to the wickedest of men, under the name of indulgences.

4. Disobedient to parents.—In the language of the Hebrews, parents signified superiors of every denomination. The disobedience of the Romish clergy to princes and magistrates, and even their dethroning princes, is well known. It may also signify their encouraging children to become monks and nuns, contrary to the will of their parents.

Ver. 3.—1. Without natural affection.—The Romish clergy being forbidden to marry, can have neither wives nor children openly; so are without the affections natural to mankind; at least they dare not avow their having these affections.—It may likewise be meant of the laity, who were to shut up their female children in nunneries, on pretence of superior sanctity, but in reality from interested motives.

2. Covenant-breakers.—The Roman Catholic clergy have been remarkable covenant-breakers. For, not long ago, they professedly held it as a principle of religion, that no faith is to be kept with heretics, and set subjects free from their oaths of allegiance to their princes.—Or, εχθροί, may signify persons who, being offended, will enter into no treaty of reconciliation; so it may be translated implacable, as in Rom. i. 31.

3. Slanders.—The authors and abettors of the apostasy will impute all manner of crimes to those who resist their corruptions. How exactly this hath been fulfilled in the Romish clergy, all who are acquainted with their history know well.

Ver. 4.—1. Betrayers.—Πεσέρας. If this word is translated traitors, as in our Bible, it may signify, that they would deliver up their nearest relations to death who opposed their corruptions. See Mark xiii. 12.

2. Lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God.—It is observable, that this description begins with mentioning extreme selfishness as the root, and concludes with the excessive love of sensual pleasure as the end, of all the corruptions that were to prevail in latter times. Hence we may learn, what a pernicious thing the excessive love of sensual pleasure is. It hath been the source of those monstrous perversions of religion which took place among Christians in the dark ages; and governed by it, many in every age destroy their health, their fortune, their reputation, the comfort of their families, and every thing valuable in life, for the sake of gratifying their appetites.

the power of it. (Και, 204.) Now, from these turn away.¹

6 (Εκ τῶν γὰρ, 94.) Of these indeed they are, who go into houses¹ and lead captive silly women laden with sins, led away² by divers lusts;

7 Always learning, but never able to come to the knowledge of truth.

8 (Δε) Now, in the manner that Jannes and Jambres¹ resisted Moses,² so these also resist³ the truth; men wholly corrupted in mind, undiscerning⁴ concerning the faith.

9 However, they shall not proceed farther:¹ For their foolishness² shall be very plain to all, as theirs also was.³

10 But thou hast fully known¹ my doctrine, manner of life, purpose, faith, meekness, love, patience, 11 Persecutions, sufferings, such as befell me in Antioch, in Iconium, in Lystra:¹ Such persecutions I endured; but out of THEM all the Lord delivered me.

12 (Καὶ πάντες δέ, 107.) And all indeed who wish to live godly in Christ Jesus shall be persecuted.

13 (Πονεῖς δέ, 103.) Now wicked men and (γάρ) sorcerers¹ will wax worse and worse, deceiving, and being deceived.

14 But continue thou in the things which thou hast learned, and WITH WHICH thou hast more effectually, will have an appearance of godliness, by their care in performing the external duties of religion, but they will be utterly void of real piety. Now, from these turn away.

6 Of these teachers indeed they are, who go into houses, and, having the appearance of godliness, take the direction of the consciences and pursues of ignorant women, who, being laden with sins, and led away by divers lusts, gladly embrace doctrines which reconcile the practice of sin with the hope of salvation.

7 These are devoted to the false teachers, on pretence of always learning; but they are never able to come to the knowledge of truth, because their teachers industriously hide it from them.

8 Now, in the manner that Jannes and Jambres resisted Moses, so by false miracles (ver. 13.) these teachers also, contrary to their conscience, will resist the truth; being men wholly corrupted in mind, and utterly incapable of discerning the true faith of the gospel.

9 However, after deluding mankind for a while, they shall not proceed further: For their imposture shall be made very plain to all; as the imposture of Pharaoh's magicians also was to the Israelites, and even to the Egyptians themselves.

10 But what I have done for detecting and opposing deceivers thou knowest, who hast fully known my doctrine, manner of life, purpose in preaching, fortitude in danger, meekness under provocation, love to mankind, patience under sufferings, 11 Persecutions and sufferings, such as befell me in Antioch, (Acts xiii. 50.), in Iconium, (Acts xiv. 2, 5, 6.), in Lystra, where I was stoned and left as dead, (Acts xiv. 19, 20.): Such persecutions I endured; but out of them all the Lord Jesus delivered me.

12 I do not complain of my sufferings, as if I was the only persecuted servant of Christ. All indeed who wish to live godly in the Christian church, shall be persecuted in this age.

13 Now the wicked teachers and sorcerers, of whom I speak, who by false miracles seduce the people, will for a while wax worse and worse, deceiving others, and being deceived themselves, till they are stopped, ver. 9.

14 But, instead of acting like these wicked teachers, continue thou in the belief of the things which thou hast learned, and with

Ver. 5. From these turn away.]—Some think the phrase τῶν σοφιστῶν may be translated these turn away;—turn out of the church all teachers who have any resemblance to the persons I have mentioned. They are introducing the corruptions, which, in after-times, their successors will carry to the height I have described.

Ver. 6.—1. Of these, indeed, they are who go into houses, and lead captive silly women, &c.]—This, with the two subsequent verses, is thought by some a prophetic description of the practices of the Romish monks and friars of the dark ages, who, by hypocritical pretensions to extraordinary sanctity, and by auricular confessions and other wicked arts, deluded and corrupted their female votaries. But practices similar to these began very early in the church, and by a gradual progress were at length, under the Romish hierarchy, formed into a regular system of deceit. We may therefore suppose, that as in the prophecies which foretell the political state of the world, so in the prophecies concerning the apostasy in which its religious state is represented, the general course of things, through a succession of ages, is foretold, rather than the state of things in any particular age. This I think will be allowed, when it is considered, that not the rise only, but the progress and downfall of the apostasy, is foretold in these prophecies. So that their subject being a series of things which were to happen throughout a long course of years, and which were gradually to produce a widely extended and confirmed state of corruption in the church, there is no reason for limiting their fulfilment to any particular period.

2. Led away by divers lusts.]—The word ἀγχαλιστῶν, led away, being properly applied to beasts who are led in halters whither-ever their owners please, it signifies that these women were slaves to their lusts.

Ver. 8.—1. Jannes and Jambres.]—It is generally believed that these were Pharaoh's chief magicians, whose names, though not recorded by Moses, being handed down by tradition, are preserved in Jonathan's Chaldee paraphrase on Exod. vii. 11. and on Numb. xxii. 22. In the latter passage these two magicians are absurdly said to have been Balaam's servants.—Jannes and Jambres are mentioned likewise by Numenius the Pythagorean, as Origen informs us, Cont. Cels. lib. 4. p. 198. 199. Spencer's edit.

2. Resisted Moses.]—We are told, Exod. vii. 11. 22. that Pharaoh's magicians imitated three of Moses' miracles by their enchantments, incantationibus; that is, by repeating a form of words known only to themselves, in which they invoked certain demons, and, as they fancied, constrained them to do the thing desired. By thus pretending to work miracles equal to those of Moses, they resisted him in his attempt to persuade Pharaoh to let the Israelites go.

3. So these also resist the truth.]—Resist the truth in the manner Jannes and Jambres resisted Moses; namely, by false miracles. In the early ages the heretical teachers were much addiced to the study of magic. Clem. Alexand. Strom. lib. v. p. 104. tells us, that some of the Gnostics pretended to have the secret books of Zoroaster. We know likewise, that in later times the monks and friars were great pretenders to miracles. Hence they are called, ver. 13. σοφιστῆς, magicians. The apostle, therefore, in prophesying of the heretical teachers who were to arise in the church in after-times, with great propriety compared them, both in their character and punishment, to Pharaoh's magicians.

4. Undiscerning concerning the faith.]—As, Rom. i. 28. ἀδοκίμου νοῦν signifies a mind incapable of distinguishing right from wrong, ἀδοκίμου in this passage may signify persons incapable of distinguishing truth from falsehood; consequently incapable of discerning the true doctrines of the gospel.

Ver. 9.—1. However, they shall not proceed farther.]—How exactly the whole of this prophecy hath been fulfilled, they know who are acquainted with the history of the ancient heretics, and of the Romish church, and of the Reformation.

2. For their foolishness shall be very plain to all.]—Αἰσῶν, their want of understanding. The apostle might justly call the errors of the authors of the apostasy, and the base arts by which they established their authority, foolishness, because, though they thought themselves superlatively wise in the methods which they devised for obtaining power and wealth, their doctrines and practices were as void of reason as are the imaginations and actions of fools: Or, foolishness here may signify imposture.

3. As theirs also was.]—The vile arts by which the corrupters of Christianity established their errors being discovered, their folly and wickedness shall be very plain to the people, even as the folly and wickedness of Pharaoh's magicians was made plain to the Israelites, by the stop which God put to their enchantments. And thus the truth being set in a more clear light, the wisdom and righteousness of God, in permitting these corruptions to take place for a while, will be demonstrated.

Ver. 10. Hast fully known.]—The word παρακολούθῃς is applied to one who follows another in walking, so as to keep pace with him. Metaphorically it signifies, to attain the complete knowledge of a thing. In this sense it is used Luke i. 3.

Ver. 11. In Lystra.]—Timothy being a native of Lystra, and the apostle's disciple and companion, when the apostle was stoned in that city, and dragged out of the street as one dead, he may, as Benson supposes, have been present on that occasion, and may have been one of those who stood round him when he revived, Acts xiv. 20.

Ver. 13. But wicked men and sorcerers.]—Γάρ. This word properly denotes sorcerers, enchanters, magicians, who, deceiving the vulgar by false miracles, make them believe what they please.—The apostles gave to the false teachers, who introduced and continued the apostasy, the name of sorcerers, with great propriety, and termed their vile arts sorceries, Rev. xvii. 23. because they were to resist the truth in the very manner Pharaoh's magi-been intrusted,¹ knowing from whom thou hast learned them:

15 And that from a child thou hast known the sacred scriptures,¹ which are able to make thee wise to salvation by the faith which is in Christ Jesus.

16 The whole scripture¹ is divinely inspired,² and is profitable for teaching,³ for confutation,⁴ for correction, for instruction in righteousness; which thou hast been intrusted, knowing from whom thou hast learned them—even from me an inspired apostle;

17 That the man of God may be perfect,¹ AND thoroughly fitted for every good work.

15 And that from thy childhood thou hast known the sacred scriptures, which having foretold the doctrine, miracles, death, resurrection, and ascension of the Christ, exactly as they have come to pass, are able to make thee wise to salvation, by confirming thee in the faith which hath Christ Jesus for its object.

16 I am calumniated as contradicting Moses and the prophets; but I believe, that the whole sacred scripture is divinely inspired, and is profitable for teaching the doctrines of the gospel, for confuting those who err therefrom, for correcting those who sin, for instructing all in righteousness;

17 That the Christian minister, by the light derived from the Jewish revelation, may be perfect in the knowledge of the things he is appointed to teach, and thoroughly fitted for discharging every part of the good work he is engaged in.

clians resisted Moses. For, as St. Paul told the Thessalonians, 2 Epist. ii. 9. their coming was to be 'after the inworking of Satan, with all power, and signs, and miracles of falsehood, 10. and with all the deceit of unrighteousness.'—In ver. 9. the apostle had foretold that a stop would be put to their delusions. Here he foretells that they themselves would not be reclaimed.

Ver. 14. Thou hast been intrusted.]—That this is the true translation of the word ἐντολῆς, appears from Gal. ii. 7. 'When they saw (ὅτι πιστεύουσιν) that I was intrusted with the gospel of the uncircumcision.'—1 Tim. i. 11. 'The gospel of the blessed God, with which (ἐν ᾧ) I am intrusted.'

Ver. 15. Hast known the sacred scriptures.]—The apostle calls the writings of the Old Testament sacred, because of their divine inspiration, mentioned ver. 16.—Timothy's mother and grandmother being Jewish women of great piety, had trained him up from his childhood in the knowledge and belief of the writings of Moses and the prophets. And their care in thus instructing him being commended by the apostle, it shows us that little children ought to be made acquainted with the scriptures as early as possible; and that they may derive much benefit, even from that imperfect knowledge of the scriptures and of the principles of religion, which they are capable of attaining in their tenderest years. See 2 Tim. i. 5. note.

Ver. 16.—1. The whole scripture.]—Here, the critics observe, scriptura is put for liber.—The word scriptura without any epithet, is used to denote the writings of Moses and the Prophets, Matt. xxii. 29. John v. 39. x. 35. But in the commentary I have added the epithet sacred from verse 15. to shew the unlearned reader that the apostle is speaking of those writings only which the Jews esteemed of divine authority.

2. Is divinely inspired.]—Grotius translates this, 'all divinely inspired scripture is even profitable;' or, 'is certainly profitable,' &c. But this translation, though framed to comprehend the writings of the evangelists and apostles, is rather forced; because the discourse is concerning the Jewish scriptures only. It is however abundantly just as a translation of the Greek text.

3. And is profitable for teaching.]—διδασκαλίας signifies the act or office of teaching, Rom. xii. 7. 1 Tim. iv. 13. v. 17. Tit. i. 9. ii. 7.

4. For confutation.]—The word ἀντιλογία comes from ἀντι, to confute, 2 Tim. iv. 2. Titus i. 9.; so may properly be translated confutation.—Benson's note on this passage is,—'As to the inspiration of the books of the Old Testament I find two opinions—

1. That the writers of the several books had all the thoughts, and even the very words suggested to them by the Spirit of God; and that they were the penmen of the Spirit, to commit to writing just what he dictated.—2. Others think with more latitude; and allow indeed that Moses received the Law from God; and that the prophets were inspired by the Spirit to foretell future events which lay out of the reach of human foresight; but that they were left to express themselves in their own words and phrases, in which they give a faithful account of what the Spirit dictated to them, 2 Pet. i. 20, 21. But as to what was handed down by authentic tradition, or the facts with which they themselves were thoroughly acquainted, they could, as faithful historians, commit them to writing, and that without any extraordinary inspiration: And their account, as far as our present copies are exact, may be depended upon as satisfactory and authentic." He adds, "If the Spirit presided, strengthened their memories, and preserved them from mistakes, this last opinion may not be much amiss." See 1 Cor. ii. 13. note 1. 2 Tim. i. 13. note 2. and Esai. i. note 2.

Ver. 17. That the man of God (see 1 Tim. vi. 11. note) may be perfect, &c.]—The apostle's encomium on the Jewish scriptures consists of two parts—their divine inspiration, and their usefulness for illustrating the gospel revelation; so that a Christian minister, who rightly understands them, is thereby well fitted for every part of his work. Our Lord also, on various occasions, bore testimony to the Jewish scriptures, and to their connexion with the gospel: Luke xxiv. 27. 'And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, he expounded unto them in all the scriptures, the things concerning himself.' Also he commanded his disciples to 'search these scriptures, because they testified of him,' John v. 39.; see ver. 46. What then are we to think of those teachers, who are at so much pains to disjoin the Christian revelation from the Jewish, as if the latter were not of divine original, and had no connexion with the gospel; and instead of illustrating and confirming the gospel, were rather an encumbrance to it? In this encomium of the Jewish scriptures the duties of a Christian minister are declared to be—1. To teach the people the true doctrine of the gospel: 2. To confute all errors contrary to true doctrine: 3. To correct, by proper admonitions, reproofs, and censures, those who openly transgress the precepts of the gospel: 4. To direct and encourage all to follow a righteous course of life: Lastly, in this encomium of the Jewish scriptures the apostle contradicted the Judaizers, who affirmed that the law was contrary to the gospel.

CHAPTER IV.

HAVING in the preceding chapter explained to Timothy the duties of his office as an evangelist, the apostle now solemnly charged him, in the presence of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ, who is to judge the living and the dead at his second coming, to be diligent and faithful in all the duties of his ministry, by preaching true doctrine, confuting gainsayers, rebuking sinners, and exhorting, both the teachers and the people under his care, to behave properly in every respect, ver. 1, 2.—because the time was approaching in which the people would not endure wholesome doctrine; but having itching ears which required to be tickled with the elegancies of language, would for that purpose multiply to themselves teachers, ver. 3.—and would listen to fables, loathing the solid doctrine of the gospel, ver. 4.—Next, he exhorted Timothy to watch at all times to oppose the entrance of false doctrine and corrupt practices, without being intimidated by the evils to which he might expose himself by his fidelity; and to do the work of an evangelist in such a manner as to shew himself an approved minister of Christ,

ver. 5.—Then told him, that he was thus earnest in his exhortations to him, because the time of his departure was come, ver. 6.—and because he himself had combated the good combat, had finished the race, and had all along preserved the faith pure, ver. 7.—and was to be rewarded as a conqueror in the good combat with a crown of righteousness, by Christ the righteous judge of the world; so that if Timothy proved equally courageous and faithful in discharging the duties of his ministry, he might expect the same reward from Christ, who will bestow a crown of righteousness on all who, conscious of their own integrity, long for his appearing to judge the world, ver. 8.

In the remaining part of the chapter the apostle gave Timothy a particular account of his own affairs, and of the behaviour both of his friends and enemies, ver. 9–18.—Then desired him to salute Prisca and Aquila, and the family of Onesiphorus, ver. 19.—And because he had left Erastus at Corinth, and Trophimus at Miletus, and all his assistants had fled from the city, he begged him to come to Rome before winter. Then give him the salutations of Eubulus, Pudens, Linus, and Claudia, Christians of singular eminence, and the salutations of all the brethren in Rome with whom he was allowed to have any intercourse, ver. 20, 21.—and concluded with giving him, and the brethren at Ephesus, his apostolical benediction, ver. 22.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. IV.—1. I charge THEE, therefore, *in the presence of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ,*¹ who will judge the living (1 Thess. iv. 15.) and the dead, (αὐτὰ) at his appearing and his kingdom,

2 Preach the word; be instant in season, out of season; confute, rebuke, exhort, with all long-suffering,¹ (αὐτοδίκην, 210. 39.) when teaching.

3 For there will be a time¹ when they will not endure wholesome teaching;² but having itching ears, they will, according to their own lusts, heap up to themselves teachers.³

4 And from the truth indeed they will turn away THEIR ears, and be turned aside to fables.

5 But watch thou at all TIMES; bear evil treatment; do the work of an evangelist; fully perform thy ministry: (see ver. 17. note 1.)

6 For I am already poured out,¹ and the time of my departure hath come.

7 (Τὸν ἀγῶνα τοῦ καλοῦ κρητισμοῦ) I have combated the good combat, I have finished the race,¹ I have preserved the faith.

8 Henceforth there is laid aside for me a crown of righteousness,¹ (Phil. iii. 14. note 2.), which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will deliver to me at that day; and not to me only, but to all them also who love his appearing.

9 Make haste to come¹ to me soon:

10 For Demas,¹ having loved the present

Ver. 1. In the presence of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ.]—The persons in whose presence the apostle gave this charge, Timothy could not but exceedingly revere, as they were always present with him beholding his conduct, and were to be his judges at the last day.—This solemn charge the apostle gave to Timothy, not because he suspected him of any unfaithfulness, but to shew his own extreme solicitude for the preservation of true doctrine, and for the prosperity of the church of Christ; also to leave on record an injunction to the ministers of Christ in succeeding ages, to be faithful and diligent in all the duties of their function. They ought therefore to consider it with attention, and should make a due application of it to themselves.

Ver. 2. With all long-suffering.]—This virtue the apostle often recommended to Timothy, 2 Tim. ii. 20. iii. 16.; whereas, in directing Titus how to teach, he does not mention long-suffering or patience. Perhaps Timothy, being younger than Titus, was of a more ardent spirit which needed to be restrained; or, as Benson suspects, the obstinacy of the persons with whom Titus had to do, might occasion this difference in the apostle's exhortations.

Ver. 3.—1. For there will be a time.]—The apostle means the time in which the apostasy would work more effectually than it was then doing. He therefore desired Timothy to be diligent in preaching, while he might be heard.

2. When they will not endure wholesome teaching.]—This prophetic description of the temper of Christians during the apostasy, hath been verified to an astonishing degree. For then the generality of the people nauseated the wholesome doctrines of true piety and sound morality inculcated in the gospel: Then the monks and friars, in all their sermons, spake of nothing but of miracles performed at the tombs of martyrs and confessors, or by their relics: And then the people delighted to hear nothing from their teachers but fables of that sort, as the apostle foretold, ver. 4.: because by these they were confirmed in the belief that the superstitious practices which their teachers recommended would procure them the pardon of their sins, however atrocious, and admission into heaven, notwithstanding they continued in sin to the end of their lives. See 1 Tim. iv. 2. note 1.

3. According to their own lusts, heap up to themselves teachers.]—Some have quoted this text as a proof that the people ought not to have the choice of their own ministers. And it must be ac-

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. IV.—1. I have fully instructed thee in thy duty, and thou art well acquainted with the Jewish scriptures, in which the gospel is both explained and confirmed; I charge thee, therefore, in the presence of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ, who will judge the living and the dead at his second appearing, when his kingdom shall be displayed in all its glory,

2 Preach the gospel doctrine in purity; be constant and earnest in preaching it, whether it be seasonable or unseasonable to thyself; confute false teachers, rebuke sinners, exhort all under thy care, with the greatest patience when teaching them.

3 Thou oughtest to be very faithful and diligent in these duties now; for there will be a time when the people will not endure wholesome teaching, but having itching ears, which must be tickled, they will, by the motions of their own peculiar lusts, multiply to themselves teachers, who, to gain their favour, will soothe them in their vices.

4 And thus indeed they will turn away their ears from the true doctrine of the gospel, and, by their teachers, they will be turned aside to believe fables, concerning miracles wrought in support of the greatest errors.

5 But watch thou at all times, and withstand the beginnings of these corruptions; patiently bear the ill treatment which the enemies of the gospel will give thee; do the work of an evangelist diligently; fully perform the duties of thy ministry:

6 For the church is soon to lose the benefit of my ministry: I am already poured out on the sacrifice of the faith of the Gentiles, and the time of my departure hath come.

7 I have combated the good combat of faith, (1 Tim. vi. 12.), I have finished the race of an apostle, I have preserved the faith uncorrupted, for which I have combated.

8 All fears of death vanish when I think of the glorious reward which awaits me. Henceforth there is laid aside for me a crown, not of olive leaves, but of righteousness, which, with all its honours and privileges, the Lord Jesus, the righteous Judge, will deliver to me at the last day; and not to me only, but to all them also who, like me, conscious that they have served him faithfully, long for his appearing to judge the world.

9 As I have a great desire to see thee, make haste to come to me soon.

10 For Demas in particular, having loved the present world knowledge, that when the people are of the character here described, such a power would be most hurtful to them.—In the expression, 'heap up to themselves teachers according to their lusts,' it is insinuated, 1. That the people would choose those teachers whose doctrines rendered the gratification of their lusts consistent with their hope of salvation: 2. That there would be a great number of this sort of corrupt teachers in the church, in the time of the apostasy.

Ver. 6. I am already poured out.]—This the apostle said, because, as he told the Philippians, chap. ii. 17. he considered the shedding of his blood as necessary to the completing the sacrifice and service of the faith of the Gentiles.—Some think the word εὐχρησμένος may be translated, I am poured upon; in allusion to the custom of pouring wine on the head of the animal to be sacrificed, immediately before it was slain: so that by this expression the apostle intimated, that he was soon to be put to death.

Ver. 7. I have finished the race.]—The apostle likens his labour in the gospel not only to the combat of wrestling, but to that of the race, which also was one of the Olympic exercises.

Ver. 8. A crown of righteousness.]—Having compared his labours as an apostle to the exertions of the combatants in the games, he represents his reward under the idea of a crown; because that was the reward bestowed on the victors in these combats. See 1 Cor. ix. 25. note 2. It was not however a crown of leaves, like theirs, but of righteousness, which Christ was to bestow on him, by counting his faith to him for righteousness. According to the apostle's representation, this crown, though laid aside for him, was not to be bestowed on him, even at death. It was to be given him at the day of Christ's appearing to judge the world; and in consequence of his being judged and acquitted by Christ.

Ver. 9. Make haste to come to me soon.]—The apostle, now about to leave the world, wished to enjoy Timothy's company and conversation for a little while. He desired this visit likewise on Timothy's own account, that he might give him his dying advice and blessing; and that, by his example, Timothy might be strengthened to suffer death courageously, when called to do so. Accordingly it is said by some, that Timothy actually suffered martyrdom at Ephesus.

Ver. 10.—1. Demas, having loved the present world, hath forsaken me, and is gone into Thessalonica.]—By calling the departure world, hath forsaken me, and is gone to Thessalonica, Crescens into Galatia,² and Titus into Dalmatia.

11 Only Luke is with me.¹ Take Mark and bring him with thee,² for he is very useful to me in the ministry.

12 But Tychicus I have sent to Ephesus.

13 The bag¹ which I left at Troas with Carpus,² bring when thou comest, and the books,³ especially the parchments.

14 Alexander the copper-smith¹ hath done me many evil things.² The Lord reward him according to his works.³

15 Of whom be thou also aware;¹ for he hath greatly opposed our words. (See Pref. sect. 3.)

16 (R.) At my first answer¹ no one appeared with me, but all forsook me.² May it not be laid to their charge!³

of Demas to Thessalonica a forsaking him, the apostle intimates that he departed without his permission.—This person is generally supposed to have been the Demas who sent his salutation to the Colossians, chap. iv. 14. And because in mentioning that salutation the apostle did not accompany it with any mark of his esteem, as he did in mentioning the salutation of Luke, which was sent at the same time, Col. iv. 14. Bengelius conjectures, that Demas was the apostle's amanuensis in writing his epistle to the Colossians. But he may have avoided commending Demas to the Colossians, if at that time he observed something in his character which he did not approve. His behaviour during the apostle's second imprisonment justified such a supposition. For when he found the apostle was to be condemned, becoming afraid of losing his own life, he forsook him in the hour of danger, and retired to Thessalonica, on pretence of taking care of his worldly affairs; but in reality, because he hoped to remain there in greater safety than in Rome. This the apostle justly termed his loving the present world.—Whether Demas afterwards returned to his duty, is not known. Gregory, in his edition of the Greek New Testament, printed at Oxford in 1703, quotes an ancient Scholiast, who saith Demas apostatized to heathenism, and became an idol priest. But of this there is no evidence, as the apostle does not insinuate that he renounced the gospel.—See Philemon, ver. 24. note 2.

2. Crescens into Galatia.]—The apostle does not say either of Crescens or of Titus, that their departure, like the departure of Demas, was owing to their love of the present world. We may therefore, in charity, suppose that the one went into Galatia, and the other into Dalmatia, by the apostle's order, or at least with his permission.

Ver. 11.—1. Only Luke is with me.]—The apostle meant, that, of his fellow-labourers and assistants in Rome, Luke alone remained with him. For from ver. 21. where the salutations of some of the Roman brethren by name are mentioned, it appears that the apostle had many friends still in Rome, members of the church there, with whom he was allowed to have some intercourse.—For the character of Luke, see Col. iv. 14. note 1.

2. Take Mark and bring him with thee.]—Although the apostle was once exceedingly displeased with Mark, for deserting him and Barnabas in Pamphylia, Acts xv. 38, 39. that grudge was long ago removed by his subsequent faithful labours in the gospel. See Philemon, ver. 24.—The Mark mentioned in this passage, is by some thought to be a different person from the writer of the gospel which bears his name. See 1 Pet. v. 13. note 3.

Ver. 13.—1. The bag.]—The word σακκος signifies either a cloak or a bag.—If the apostle meant a cloak, his sending for it at so great a distance, is a proof, as Grotius observes, of his poverty. The Syriac translator understood it of a bag in which books were kept; for his version is, Domum scriptorum.

2. Which I left at Troas with Carpus.]—Paul, who was several times at Troas, may have lodged some of these times with Carpus; and knowing him to be a person of probity, he had left with him the valuable things here mentioned.

3. And the books, especially the parchments.]—What the books were which the apostle left with Carpus, commentators have not attempted to conjecture. But Benson fancies the parchments were the letters which he received from the churches, and the autographs of his own letters to the churches. For that he employed persons to transcribe his letters, is probable from Rom. xvi. 22. where the name of the amanuensis of that epistle is inserted. In these fair copies, the apostle wrote the salutation with his own hand, 1 Cor. xvi. 22. Gal. vii. 11. Col. iv. 8. Philemon, ver. 19. and thereby authenticated them as his letters. So he told the Thessalonians, 2 Epist. iii. 17.—If these autographs were a part of the parchments which Timothy was to bring with him to Rome, we may suppose the apostle's intention in this order was, after acknowledging them to be his autographs of the letters which he wrote to the churches, to give them to Timothy to be kept; or he may have had it in view to desire Timothy to deliver them to the churches and persons to whom the fair copies of them had been more than was fit, hath forsaken me, and is gone to Thessalonica, expecting to be in more safety there than at Rome; Crescens is gone into Galatia, and Titus into Dalmatia.

11 Only Luke is with me. His attachment to me, and his zeal for the cause of Christ, are the more remarkable, that all my other assistants have left me. In thy way call on Mark, and bring him with thee, for he will be very useful to me in the ministry of the gospel.

12 But when Tychicus comes to thee, do not think he hath behaved like Demas: I have sent him to Ephesus to supply thy place.

13 The bag which I left at Troas with Carpus, in my way from Ephesus after parting with thee, bring when thou comest, and the books contained in that bag, but especially the parchments.

14 Alexander the copper-smith hath done me many ill offices here. In particular, he hath stirred up both the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles in Rome against me. The Lord reward him according to his works.

15 Of that wicked person be thou also aware, wherever thou happenest to meet with him, for he hath greatly contradicted the things which I advanced in my first answer.

16 At my first answer my fellow-labourers were so terrified that no one of them appeared with me in the court, but all forsook me. I pray God not to lay it to their charge!

sent, that they might preserve them with care, as the originals of the letters in their possession.—B. Pearson observes, that the bag with the books and parchments, of which the apostle speaks, were not left with Carpus at the time mentioned Acts xx. 6, 7.: for then he had many attendants, who no doubt assisted him in carrying his things, not to speak of the ship which waited on them, Acts xx. 13. to transport them. Pearson therefore concludes that the bag with the books and parchments were left at Troas, in some journey which the apostle made through the Lesser Asia, after he was released from his first confinement at Rome.

Ver. 14.—1. Alexander the copper-smith.]—This seems to be the person mentioned in the history of the riot at Ephesus, Acts xix. 38. and whom the enraged multitude would not hear, when they knew he was a Jew.—Probably he was one of the Judaizing teachers who violently opposed the true doctrine of the gospel, and was by that time become the apostle's enemy. The unbelieving Jews at Ephesus knowing this, pushed him forward into the theatre to harangue the people, in expectation that he would vindicate them from having any connexion with the Christian teachers. Alexander is mentioned likewise, 1 Tim. i. 20.

2. Hath done me ill offices, hath shewed me, see Psal. iv. 6.) many evil things.]—Benson is of opinion, that these evil things were done to the apostle by Alexander in Ephesus. But, on that supposition, there was no occasion to inform Timothy of them, who was a witness to all the ill offices which Alexander had done to the apostle in Ephesus. I therefore think these ill offices were done to him recently, and in Rome. See the preface to this epistle, Sect. 3. paragr. 3.

3. The Lord reward him according to his works.]—The Alexandrian and six other MSS., the Syriac and the Vulgate versions, and some of the fathers, read here εὐδοκίαν, 'the Lord will reward.' Perhaps the ancient transcribers and translators thought it more agreeable to the apostle's character to foretell, than to wish evil to this wicked teacher. See Mill and Whitby. But why might not St. Paul, who had the gift of discerning spirits, and by that gift knew the malice which was in Alexander's heart, wish that such a malicious false teacher might be punished, if he did not repent? This limitation is implied in the words, 'according to his works.' Nay, it is implied in the very nature of the wish; at least in the mouth of a virtuous person. A wish of the same kind Nehemiah expressed with respect to Sanballat and Tobiah. Nehem. iv. 5. 'Cover not their iniquity, and let not their sin be blotted out, for they have provoked thee to anger.'

Ver. 15. Of whom be thou also aware.]—This being written after the apostle had made his first answer, at which Alexander had greatly opposed or contradicted his words, he judged it necessary to inform Timothy of that wicked teacher's malice. And as he suspected that Alexander would soon return to Ephesus, he cautioned Timothy to be on his guard against him.

Ver. 16.—1. At my first answer.]—The apostle's first answer was that which he made some time after he was imprisoned. He called it his first answer, not because he had made, but because he expected to make a second answer.

2. But all forsook me.]—When the apostle made his first answer, Demas and the rest had not left the city: otherwise he could not have complained of them, as he does in this verse, for not attending on him at his trial. The cruelty which Nero, or his prefect Helius Cressarianus, (see ver. 17. note 3.) was now exercising against the Christians, so terrified the apostle's fellow-labourers, that, though they were in Rome when he made this answer, none of them appeared with him in the court.

3. May it not be laid to their charge.]—This prayer shews the excellence of the apostle's disposition. He was sensible of the danger to which his assistants would have exposed themselves by appearing with him at his trial: he knew likewise the infirmity of human nature; and therefore he made great allowances for their yielding in such circumstances, and prayed that they might be forgiven, as Christ prayed his Father to forgive those who crucified him.

17 (Δε, 100.) However, the Lord stood by me, and strengthened me, that through me the preaching might be fully declared,¹ and all the Gentiles might hear;² and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion.³

18 And the Lord will deliver me from every evil work, and will preserve me to his heavenly kingdom. To whom be glory for ever and ever.¹ Amen.

19 Salute Prisca¹ and Aquila, and the family of Onesiphorus.²

21 Make haste to come before winter. Eubulus¹ saluteth thee, and Pudens, and Linus,² and Claudia,³ and all the brethren.

22 The Lord Jesus Christ be with thy spirit. Grace be with you.¹ Amen.

17 However, though men forsook me when brought to my trial, the Lord Jesus, according to his promise, Luke xxi. 15. stood by me and strengthened me, that on such an occasion, and before such personages, through me the preaching concerning Christ might be fully declared, and that all the Gentiles might hear that it was so declared; and I escaped with such difficulty, that I cannot describe it better than by saying, I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion.

18 And the Lord Jesus will deliver me from every evil work, so that I shall do nothing for the preservation of my life inconsistent with my former preaching; and he will preserve me to his heavenly kingdom. To whom I gratefully ascribe the glory of faithfulness, goodness, and power, for ever and ever. Amen.

19 In my name wish health to Prisca, and her husband Aquila, and to the family of Onesiphorus.

20 Erastus, who accompanied me in my way to Crete, abode in Corinth. But Trophimus I left at Miletus sick, when I departed from Crete.

21 Make haste to come to me before winter, sailing being then dangerous. Eubulus wisheth thee health. So do Pudens, and Linus; and Claudia, and all the brethren with whom I have any intercourse.

22 May the Lord Jesus Christ be with thy spirit, to strengthen thee in all difficulties and dangers, as he hath strengthened me, (ver. 17.) Grace be with you in Ephesus who maintain the truth. Amen.

Ver. 17.—1. The preaching might be fully declared.]—The word ῥηματιζέμενος, literally signifies, might be carried with a full sail, (1 Thes. i. 5. note 3.); that is, fully and boldly declared. Accordingly, Chrysostom and Theophylact have paraphrased this word ῥηματιζέμενος; for the meaning of which see Rom. xv. 19. note 4. In this passage the apostle told Timothy, that, contrary to the expectation of his enemies, he had declared in the hearing of Nero, or his prefect, the supreme dominion of Christ, his right to all the Gentiles as his subjects, his power in their salvation, together with the nature and method of that salvation; and that he had done so, that all the Gentiles in the provinces might hear of his courage in maintaining their privileges.

2. And all the Gentiles might hear.]—The apostle justly supposed, that what was said and done at the emperor's tribunal in Rome, where there was such a confluence of strangers from all quarters, would quickly fly abroad on the wings of fame, and be heard by all the Gentile converts every-where.

3. I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion.]—By the lion, some think Nero is meant, or rather his prefect, Helius Caesarianus, to whom Nero committed the government of the city in his absence, with power to put whosoever he pleased to death. See Pearson, Annal. Paulin. Ann. Chr. 57. Others understand the expression proverbially, as denoting an escape from the greatest danger; in which sense it is used Psal. xxii. 21. This interpretation they adopt, because they think the apostle would not give so disrespectful an appellation, either to Nero or to his prefect.

Ver. 18. To whom be glory for ever and ever.]—This doxology, addressed to the Lord Jesus, is in other passages addressed to God the Father, Rom. xvi. 27. 1 Tim. i. 17. By introducing it here, the apostle declared the greatness of his trust in the goodness and power of the Lord Jesus, and his sincere gratitude to him for having honoured him to be his apostle, and for promising him a place in his heavenly kingdom.

Ver. 19.—1. Salute Prisca.]—This is a contraction of the name Priscilla, unless, as Estius supposes, Priscilla be the diminutive of Prisca. This woman, with her husband Aquila, now resided in Ephesus. See Rom. xvi. 3. note.

2. And the family of Onesiphorus.]—Because the apostle does not salute Onesiphorus himself, the Papists argue, that at the time this epistle was written he was dead; and from the apostle's praying for him, chap. i. 18. they infer the lawfulness of praying for the dead. But Onesiphorus at this time was with the apostle in Rome, 2 Tim. i. 16, 17; or, if he was gone from Rome, he might not be in Ephesus.

Ver. 20.—1. Erastus abode at Corinth.]—This is supposed to be the chamberlain of Corinth, mentioned Rom. xvi. 23. He is likewise mentioned Acts xix. 22. as one who ministered to Paul.

2. Trophimus I left at Miletus sick.]—Trophimus being an Ephesian, Acts xxi. 29, if he had been left at Miletus near Ephesus, Timothy could not have been ignorant of it. We may therefore believe he was left at Miletus in Crete, a city mentioned by Homer, Iliad B. lin. 649. and by Strabo, a native of Crete; and by Pliny, Nat. Hist. Lib. iv. 12. 'Oppida ejus insignia Miletos,' &c.

Ver. 21.—1. Eubulus saluteth thee, and Pudens.]—Though none of the Roman brethren appeared with the apostle at his first answer, they did not, like his fellow-labourers, flee from the city, nor desert him altogether, but visited him in his prison, and desired him to send their salutation to Timothy.

2. And Linus.]—This person is said, by the ancients, to have been the first bishop of Rome after the apostles Paul and Peter. See Pref. to 1 Tim. Sect. 5. No. 4. But Theodoret speaks of this only as a tradition, Oper. Tom. iii. p. 506. "They say this is the Linus who succeeded the great Peter."

3. And Claudia.]—Martial, Lib. xiv. Epigr. 13, mentions a Pudens and a Claudia, who by some are thought to be the persons of whom the apostle speaks in this epistle. But they are represented as young: when Martial wrote, so could not be mentioned by the apostle. It is said of Claudia, that she was a British lady whom St. Paul converted, and that she first carried the gospel into Britain. But of this there is no evidence.—According to tradition, the apostle Peter was now in Rome, and suffered martyrdom at the same time with St. Paul. But seeing Paul says, ver. 11, 'Only Luke is with me;' and ver. 16, 'at my first answer no one appeared with me;' also, seeing Peter's salutation was not sent to Timothy, his being in Rome at the time this letter was written may justly be doubted.—If he suffered martyrdom along with Paul, as the ancients affirm, he must have come to Rome after Paul wrote his second letter to Timothy.

Ver. 22. Grace be with you.]—This being a benediction, distinct from the one bestowed on Timothy, it was designed for such of the brethren in Ephesus as maintained the truth of the gospel in purity.

TITUS.

PREFACE.

SECT. I.—The History of Titus, collected from Paul's Epistles.

ALTHOUGH Titus was a person of such eminence among the first preachers of the gospel, that St. Paul wrote to him the letter in the canon of scripture which bears his name, for the purpose of directing him how to discharge the duties of his office, his name is not so much as once mentioned by Luke in his book of the Acts. His history, therefore, must consist of such particulars as are related of him in the apostle Paul's epistles, where indeed he is often mentioned with great respect, and of such probable conjectures as these particulars naturally suggest.

That Titus was converted by Paul, appears from his calling him 'his genuine son by the common faith.' Tit. i. 4. Yet at what time, and in what place, Paul converted him, he hath nowhere told us. They who think Titus was a religious proselyte before his conversion, are of opinion that he was converted at Antioch, soon after Paul and Barnabas came to that city from Tarsus, as mentioned Acts xi. 25. But others, supposing him to have been originally an idolatrous Gentile, conjecture that his conversion happened in some of the countries of the Lesser Asia, through which Paul travelled in the course of his first apostolical journey; the history of which is given, Acts, chapters xiii. xiv. What is certain is, that Titus was with Paul in Antioch before the Council of Jerusalem; and that having distinguished himself, after his conversion, by his piety and zeal, he was one of those whom the church at Antioch sent to Jerusalem, to consult the apostles and elders concerning the circumcision of the converted proselytes, fourteen years after Paul's own conversion; that is, in the year 49. Gal. ii. 1, 2.—When the messengers from the church of Antioch came to Jerusalem, the apostles, elders, and brethren assembled, and, after reasoning on that question, decreed that it was not necessary to circumcise the converted Gentile proselytes. Nevertheless, the Judaizers in Jerusalem zealously endeavoured on that occasion to have Titus circumcised. So the apostle insinuates, Gal. ii. 3. where he saith, 'Not even Titus who was with me, being a Greek, was compelled to be circumcised.'—Here it is proper to remark, that the Jews called all the idolatrous Gentiles Ελληνες, Greeks; for in their manner of speaking, Jews and Greeks comprehended the whole of mankind. See Rom. i. 16. note 3. According to this interpretation of the appellation, from the apostle's calling Titus a Greek it may be inferred, that before his conversion he was an idolatrous Gentile. The same thing appears likewise from the attempt of the Judaizers to force him to be circumcised. For after the decree of the Council was passed freeing the converted proselytes from obedience to the laws of Moses, if Titus, before his conversion, had been one of that denomination, the Judaizers could not with any show of reason have insisted on his circumcision. Yet, as the Council had determined nothing respecting the converts from among the idolatrous Gentiles, some of the zealous Judaizers, who by stealth introduced themselves into the private meeting in which Paul explained to James, Peter, and John, the gospel which he preached among the Gentiles, when they found out that Titus, before his conversion, was an idolater, might insist to have him circumcised, on pretence that he was not freed from circumcision by the Council's decree. But this attempt to subject a Gentile convert to the law of Moses, Paul resolutely withstood, 'that the truth of the gospel might remain with the Gentiles,' Gal. ii. 5.

After the Council, when Paul and Barnabas, accompanied by Judas and Silas, returned to Antioch, to give the brethren an account of what had happened at Jerusalem, Titus, I suppose, returned with them; and, from that time forth, seems to have accompanied Paul in his travels as one of his assistants. For when the apostle set out from Antioch, to visit the churches which he had gathered among the Gentiles in his first apostolical journey, and to confirm them by delivering to them the decrees of the Council, Titus went with him all the way to Corinth, and laboured with him in the conversion of the inhabitants of that city. This appears from 2 Cor. viii. 23. 'If any inquire concerning Titus, he is my partner and fellow-labourer in the gospel towards you.' The reason is, the apostle, before he wrote to the Corinthians, having not visited them since their conversion, the fellow-labouring of Titus with him towards the Corinthians must have happened at the time they were converted.—If this reasoning be just, we must suppose, that after the Council, when Paul set out from Antioch with Silas to visit the churches, Titus either went with them, or was sent away before them with the apostle's letter to the Galatians, which I think was written from Antioch soon after the Council. See the Preface to Galatians, Sect. 2. In that case, when the apostle went through Galatia with the decrees, he may have met Titus, and have taken him along with him: Or, during his eighteen months' abode at Corinth, he may have sent for Titus to come and assist him in converting the Corinthians.

After the apostle had planted the gospel in Corinth, he went to Jerusalem. But whether Titus abode at Corinth, or accompanied him to Jerusalem, is not said. This, however, we know, that he came to the apostle, as many others did, during his long residence at Ephesus, mentioned Acts xix. 10. For by him he sent his first epistle to the Corinthians, which was written in Ephesus about the time of the riot of Demetrius. This service the apostle assigned to Titus, because being well known to, and much respected by the Corinthians, on account of his former labours among them, he hoped he might have influence in composing the disturbances which had taken place in their church. On his return from Corinth, Titus met the apostle in Macedonia, and gave him such an account of the good disposition of the Corinthians as filled him with joy, and induced him to write them a second letter, which he employed Titus likewise to carry. At the same time, he requested him to excite the Corinthians to finish their collections for the saints in Judea, which they had begun during Titus's former visit to them. In prosecution of this design, Titus abode at Corinth till the apostle himself came and received their collections, and the collections of the other churches of Achaia.—On that occasion, Paul spent three months at Corinth, Acts xx. 3., then set out for Jerusalem, taking Macedonia in his way. His companions in his journey to Jerusalem are mentioned Acts xx. 4., and though Titus is not named as one of them, it does not follow that he was not of the number.—He is not said by Luke to have been with the apostle in Macedonia, in his way to Corinth. Yet, from the apostle's sending him from Macedonia to Corinth with his second epistle to the Corinthians, we learn that he was one of his chief assistants at that time. Wherefore, notwithstanding Luke, in his account of the apostle's return from Greece, hath not mentioned Titus among those who accompanied him to Jerusalem with the collections, he may have been one of them; and having gone with him to Jerusalem, he may have ministered to him during his imprisonment there, and in Cæsarea; nay, he may even have sailed with him to Rome. These, however, are only conjectures; for from the time Titus delivered the apostle's second letter to the Corinthians, in the year 58, we hear nothing of him till the year 62, when he was left by the apostle in Crete, 'to set in order the things that were wanting, and to ordain elders in every city,' Tit. i. 4.

The leaving of Titus in Crete is supposed to have happened some time in the year 62, after the apostle was released from his first confinement in Rome.—In the letters which he wrote about that time to the Philippians, Colossians, Philemon, and the Hebrews, having promised to visit them, we may believe, that, when at liberty to fulfil his promise, he sailed in spring 62 from Italy for Judea, accompanied by Titus and Timothy. In their way, touching at Crete, they went through the cities, and preached the gospel to the idolatrous inhabitants with such power and success, that great numbers of them were converted. See sect. 2. of this Pref. However, although the apostle's success was so great in Crete, and his converts were not formed into churches, he did not judge it proper to remain in Crete; but, committing the care of the disciples there to Titus, with an order to ordain elders in every city, he sailed into Judea in spring 63, accompanied by Timothy. The brethren in that country being greatly distressed by the troubles which preceded the war with the Romans, the apostle, if he heard in Crete of their distress, might think it necessary to hasten his visit to them. Accordingly, as soon as he landed in Judea, he and Timothy went up to Jerusalem, and spent some time with the Hebrews, after which they proceeded to Antioch; and, in their progress through the churches, comforted and established them.—From Antioch the apostle set out on his fifth and last apostolical journey, in which he and Timothy travelled through Syria and Cilicia, then came to Colosse in Phrygia early in the year 64. And seeing he had desired Philemon to provide him a lodging in Colosse, it is reasonable to think he abode there some time. On that occasion, as Benson and others conjecture, he may have written his epistle to Titus in Crete, in which he desired him to come to him at Nicopolis, because he proposed to winter there, Tit. iii. 12.—From Colosse the apostle went with Timothy to Ephesus, where, having inquired into the state of the church in that city, he gave the Ephesian brethren such exhortations as he judged necessary, then departed to go into Macedonia, leaving Timothy at Ephesus to charge some teachers not to teach differently from the apostles, 1 Tim. i. 3.

In passing through Macedonia the apostle no doubt visited the Philippians and the other brethren in that province, according to his promise, Philip. ii. 24. After that, he went forward to Nicopolis to winter there, as he proposed; being accompanied by Erastus and Trophimus, who, it seems, had joined him either at Ephesus or in Macedonia.—In the beginning of the year 65, while the apostle abode at Nicopolis, taking into consideration the weight of the charge which he had devolved on Timothy, he wrote to him that excellent letter in the canon called The First Epistle to Timothy, in which he taught him how to discharge the duties of his function properly.—It seems that, at parting with Timothy, St. Paul had promised to return soon to Ephesus from Nicopolis, 1 Tim. iii. 14. But he was disappointed in his resolution. For not long after writing his letter to Timothy,

Titus came from Crete to Nicopolis, according to the apostle's order, Tit. iii. 12., and gave him such an account of the state of the churches in that island, as determined him to visit them immediately; so that, laying aside his purpose of returning to Ephesus, he left Nicopolis early in the year 65, accompanied by Titus, Trophimus, and Erastus; the latter of whom went no farther with him than to Corinth, 2 Tim. iv. 20.—At his arrival in Crete he no doubt visited the churches, and rectified the disorders which had taken place in them. But while employed in that work, hearing of the persecution which Nero was carrying on against the Christians in Rome, on pretence that they had set fire to the city, (see Pref. to 2 Tim. sect. 3. last paragraph), and judging that his presence in Rome might be of use to the brethren in their distress, he resolved to go thither. I suppose the apostle sailed for Italy with Titus in the end of summer 65, leaving Trophimus sick at Miletus, a city of Crete, 2 Tim. iv. 20. For that Titus was in Rome with Paul during his second imprisonment, is certain from 2 Tim. iv. 10., where the apostle informed Timothy, that Titus was one of those who had fled from the city through fear, and had gone into Dalmatia; but whether with or without his approbation, the apostle doth not expressly say.—What became of Titus afterwards, is nowhere told us in scripture. But some ancient writers, mentioned by Whitby in his Preface to Titus, say, that he died in the 94th year of his age, and was buried in Crete: From which they conjecture, that he returned to Crete after St. Paul's death; for the time of which, see Pref. to 2 Tim. sect. 3. last paragraph.

SECT. II.—Of the Introduction and Progress of the Christian Faith in Crete.

AMONG the three thousand who were converted by Peter on the memorable day of Pentecost, Creteans, that is, Jews natives of Crete, who had come up to Jerusalem to worship, are mentioned, Acts ii. 11. These, being of the same disposition with the Jewish converts, who, after the death of Stephen, 'preached the word to none but to the Jews only,' Acts xi. 19. would, after their return home from Jerusalem, confine their preaching to the Jews, who, as Josephus informs us, were very numerous in Crete. We may therefore believe, that the first Christians in Crete were mostly of the Jewish nation.—It is true Barnabas went into Cyprus after he separated himself from Paul. But it is not said that he went into Crete either on that or on any other occasion. And even though he had preached in Crete, as he had not the power of imparting the spiritual gifts to his converts, it cannot be thought that his preaching in that country would be attended with very great success. The same may be said of any other evangelist or Christian prophet who happened to preach the gospel to the Cretians. I therefore think the numerous conversions of the inhabitants of Crete, which made it necessary that elders should be ordained in every city, must be ascribed to the labours of some apostle, who, by working miracles and conferring the spiritual gifts on his converts, made such an impression on the minds of the Cretians, that many of the idolatrous inhabitants and some of the Jews embraced the Christian faith.

Now, that St. Paul was this apostle, seems probable from his leaving Titus in Crete, 'to set in order the things wanting' among the Christians there, 'and to ordain elders in every city.' The modelling and governing the Christian churches, certainly belonged to the persons who had planted them. Accordingly, most of the churches in the Gentile countries having been planted by the apostle Paul, he modelled, corrected, and governed the whole, either in person or by his assistants, without any interference from his brethren apostles; just as the apostles of the circumcision modelled, corrected, and governed the churches planted by them, without any interference from him.

If the foregoing reasoning is just, the account given in sect. 1. may be admitted; namely, that St. Paul sailed into Crete, after he was released from his first confinement at Rome; that, at his landing in Crete, he went through the different cities, and converted many of the inhabitants; and that, being in haste to perform his intended visit to the Hebrews, he committed the care of modelling and settling the churches in Crete to Titus, and then set out with Timothy for Judea.—These transactions I think happened after the apostle's release from his first confinement at Rome, because, though he touched at Crete in his voyage to Rome to prosecute his appeal to the Emperor, being a prisoner, he would not be allowed to go through the island to preach; consequently, if he made any converts on that occasion, they must have been but few.

SECT. III.—Of the Island of Crete, and of the Character and Manners of its Inhabitants.

CRETE, where Titus exercised his ministry when the apostle wrote his letter to him, is one of the largest islands in the Mediterranean, and lies to the south of the Archipelago. In length from west to east, it is about 250 miles, in breadth about 50, and in circuit about 600.—Anciently it was famous for its hundred cities; for the arrival of Europa on a bull from Phœnicia; for the laws of Minos, one of its kings; for the loves of Pasiphae, the wife of Minos, and of his daughter Ariadne; for the labyrinth, the work of Dædalus; for the destruction of the Minotaur; but above all, for the sepulchre of Jupiter, with his name inscribed upon it. See Titus i. 12. note 2. And to finish the mythological history of Crete, it was famous for Mount Ida, where Jupiter is said to have been preserved from his father Saturn, and educated by the Curetes, Corybantes, or Idaei Dactyli.

According to ancient authors, Crete was originally peopled from Palestine. This fact Bochart hath rendered probable, by observing, (Canaan, lib. i. c. 15.), that that part of Palestine which lies on the Mediterranean was by the Arabs called Keritha, and by the Syrians Crethi; and that the Hebrews called the inhabitants Crethi or Crethim, which the LXX. have translated Kerææ, Cretians, Ezek. xxv. 16. Zeph. ii. 5. That these prophets do not speak of the island of Crete, is plain from their joining the Philistim with the Crethim, as one and the same people. Accordingly it appears, that the Crethim were a part of the Philistim; Crethi, or, as it is in the Chaldee paraphrase, Creth, being declared, 1 Sam. xxx. 14–16. to be the land of the Philistines. Bochart adds, That the Crethi in Palestine were noted archers, and that some of them were employed by King David as his life-guards. See 2 Sam. viii. 18. xv. 18. xx. 23. 1 Kings i. 38. 1 Chron. xviii. 17. in all which places they are called in our translation Cherethites; but the original word is Crethi, which the Chaldee paraphrast interprets Archers.—These Crethi of Palestine, it is thought, had their name from a Hebrew word which signifies to destroy, because they made a great havoc with their arrows; to which there is an elegant allusion, Ezek. xxv. 16. 'Vehicrath eth Crethim,' which our translators have rendered, 'I will cut off the Cherethites;' but the literal translation is, 'I will cut off the cutters off,' namely, the Crethim.

Sir Isaac Newton also is of opinion that Crete was peopled from Palestine, as appears from his Chronology, page 13. where he saith, "Many of the Phœnicians and Syrians, in the year before Christ 1045, fled from Zidon, and from King David, into Asia Minor, Crete, Greece, and Lybia; and introduced letters, music, poetry, the Octasteteris, metals and their fabrications, and other arts, sciences, and customs of the Phœnicians.—Along with these Phœnicians, came a sort of men skilled in the religious mysteries, arts, and sciences of Phœnicia, and settled in several places under the names of Curetes, Idaei Dactyli," &c.

The Crethi from Palestine who settled themselves in Crete, seem to have given their own name to that island. In their new habitation they continued to be famous archers, (see Tournefort, vol. i. page 83.), and to exercise all the arts which they formerly practised in Palestine; especially that of navigation, which they employed in piracy. They brought with them likewise all the vices of the Canaanites, being exceedingly addicted to gluttony, drunkenness, and lust. Withal they were extremely covetous, and notorious liars; in so much that to speak like a Cretian, became a proverb for telling lies and deceiving; and a Cretian lie, signified the greatest and most impudent lie.—Epimenides, one of their own poets, and Strabo, a native of Crete, have branded the Cretians as notorious liars; particularly Epimenides, who, in a verse quoted by Paul, Tit. i. 12. charged them not only with lying, but with gluttony and idleness. And the apostle, ver. 13. declared, that these vices constituted their true character.—In fine, Polybius, lib. vi. tells us, that the Cretians were the only people in the world who found nothing sordid in money, whatever way it was gained.—This account of the character of the Cretians, shews the propriety of the apostle's injunction to Titus, chap. i. 13. 'Rebuke them sharply, that they may be healthy in the faith.' Mr. Tournefort, who visited Crete in the beginning of this century, tells us, vol. i. page 84. that its present inhabitants are more virtuous. The gospel, it seems, hath led them to change their manners.

Crete is now called Candia, from its chief city, which bears that name. In the year 1204 the Venetians took Canea, the second greatest city in Crete, and with it the whole island. That city they held till the year 1645, when the Turks conquered it, and almost entirely expelled the Venetians from Crete, which they have kept possession of ever since.

After the gospel was planted in Crete by the apostle, and his assistant Titus, it took such deep root there, and spread itself so widely through the island, that it hath subsisted there ever since; and is at present the religion of the natives, who are in general of the Greek church. These, on payment of a stated tribute to the Turks, are allowed the exercise of their religion without molestation.

Tournefort saith, vol. i. p. 23. The environs of Canea are exceedingly beautiful. From the city, to the nearest mountains, there are large forests of olive trees, interrupted by fields, vineyards, gardens, and rivulets, bordered with myrtles; but two-thirds of the country are mountains. Crete, however, in respect of its size, climate and soil, is one of the finest islands in the Mediterranean; and, were it cultivated with as much care as it was in former times, it would produce all the necessaries and luxuries of life in the greatest abundance; so that the accounts which ancient authors have given of the number of its cities, and of the multitude of its inhabitants, is by no means exaggerated.

SECT. IV.—Of the Time and Place of writing the Epistle to Titus.

BECAUSE the apostle desired Titus to come to him at Nicopolis, chap. iii. 12. when he should send to him Artemas or Tychicus to supply his place in Crete, the transcriber, who added the postscript to this letter which our translators have turned into English, hath dated it from Nicopolis in Macedonia; following in that conjecture Chrysostom and Theodoret. But if the apostle had been in Nicopolis when he wrote to Titus, he would not have said, I have determined to winter there, but he would have said, to winter here. This circumstance, together with the apostle's not mentioning his bonds in any part of his letter to Titus, shews that he was at liberty when he wrote it. I therefore agree in opinion with those who think the apostle wrote his epistle to Titus from Colosse, while he abode there in the course of this his last apostolical journey, which ended in his second imprisonment at Rome.—Benson says, “the Syriac version, at the conclusion of this epistle, hath intimated, that it was sent to Titus by the hands of Zenas and Apollos. But that conjecture hath been added by a later hand, and is not well grounded. For from chap. iii. 13, they seem to have been coming to the apostle from a distant country, and not to have been lately with him.”

SECT. V.—Of the Purpose for which the Epistle to Titus was written.

THE first converts to the Christian faith in Crete, being, as was observed sect. 2. those Cretian Jews to whom Peter preached on the memorable day of Pentecost, and those Jews in Crete to whom Peter's converts preached the gospel on their return from Jerusalem, they were all, or most of them, very zealous of the law of Moses. Wherefore, when Paul came into Crete, and converted numbers of the idolatrous inhabitants, we may believe, that the more early Christians in Crete would address the new converts with great warmth, and insist on their obeying the law of Moses, as absolutely necessary to their salvation. Moreover, to render the law acceptable to these new converts, they no doubt followed the course in which their brethren in other churches walked. They amused the new converts with vain talking, and Jewish fables, and commandments of men, and foolish questions about the law. Nay, they went so far as to affirm, that the sacrifices and purifications enjoined by the law, duly performed, would procure pardon for them, though they continued in the practice of sin. To this doctrine the Cretians, many of whom were very wicked, lent a willing ear; in so much, that these corrupt teachers, who seem to have been natives of Crete, and to have been infected with the vices of their countrymen, subverted whole families, Tit. i. 11.

The errors and bad practices of the Judaizing teachers, and of their disciples, the apostle, when he came into Crete, observed, and opposed by wholesome instructions and sharp rebukes. But well knowing how diligent they were in spreading their errors, Paul left Titus in Crete to restrain them. And that he might have a number of fit persons, clothed with proper authority, to assist him in opposing the Judaizers, and in maintaining the truth, he ordered him, at parting, to ordain elders, that is, bishops and deacons, ‘in every city.’ But that he might be at no loss to know who were fit to be invested with these offices, and what line of conduct he himself was to pursue in discharging the duties of his ministry, the apostle, when he came to Colosse, wrote to him this letter, in which he described the qualifications of the persons who were worthy to be ordained elders, commanded him to rebuke the Judaizers sharply, and mentioned the errors he was particularly to oppose, the doctrines he was earnestly to inculcate, and the precepts he was constantly to enjoin; that none of the Cretians, whether teachers or people, might fail in their duty through want of information.

By comparing the epistle to Titus with the two epistles to Timothy, we learn, that the Judaizing teachers were every-where indefatigable in propagating their erroneous doctrine concerning the necessity of obedience to the law of Moses, as the only means of obtaining salvation; and that in the most distant countries they uniformly taught the same doctrine, for the purpose of rendering the practice of sin consistent with the hope of salvation; and that, to draw disciples after them, they encouraged them in sin, by the vicious practices which they themselves followed, in the persuasion that they would be pardoned through the efficacy of the Levitical sacrifices. Only, from the apostle's so earnestly commanding Titus in Crete, and Timothy in Ephesus, to oppose these errors, it is probable that the Judaizing teachers were more numerous and successful in Ephesus and Crete than in other places. However, as Titus was a Gentile convert, whose interest it was to maintain the freedom of the Gentiles from the law of Moses, and a teacher of long standing in the faith, the apostle was not so full in his directions and exhortations to him as to Timothy; neither did he recommend to him meekness, lenity, and patience in teaching, as he did to Timothy, but rather sharpness, chap. i. 13. ii. 13. Perhaps Titus was a person of a soft and mild temper; whereas Timothy, being a younger man, may have been of a more ardent spirit, which needed to be somewhat restrained.

CHAPTER I.

IN the inscription of this epistle, St. Paul asserted his apostleship, not with a view to raise himself in the estimation of Titus, but to make the false teachers in Crete, and all in every age who shall read this letter, sensible that every thing he ordered Titus to inculcate was of divine authority, ver. 1, 2.—And by calling Titus his genuine son by the common faith, he insinuated to the Cretians, not only that he had converted him, but that he was a teacher of the same virtuous dispositions with himself, and as such he gave him his apostolical benediction, ver. 3, 4.—Next, he put Titus in mind that he had left him in Crete, to ordain elders in every city where churches had been planted, ver. 5.—And to direct him in that important business, he described to him the character and qualifications necessary in bishops and deacons, that ordaining to these offices none but persons of that description, they might be able both to instruct the people, and to confute gainsayers, ver. 6–9.—Especially them of the circumcision in Crete, whose character the apostle explained, ver. 10.—and whose mouths he told them it was necessary to stop, because they subverted whole families, by teaching the efficacy of the Jewish sacrifices and purifications to obtain pardon for sinners, even while they continued in their sins, ver. 11.—Wherefore, the apostle ordered Titus sharply to reprove both the teachers and the people who held such doctrines, and to charge them no longer to give heed to Jewish fables and precepts of men, calculated to support that pernicious error; particularly the precepts concerning meats and sacrifices, taught by men who turned away the truth, when it offered itself to them, ver. 13, 14.—Withal, to give the faithful an abhorrence of such teachers, the apostle observed, that both their understanding and their conscience was polluted, ver. 15.—They professed to know God, but in works they denied him, ver. 16.

7 For a bishop should be blameless, as the steward of God; not self-willed, not prone to

Ver. 1.—1 Paul, a servant of God.]—In some of his other epistles Paul calls himself δούλος θεοῦ Χριστοῦ, a bondman of Jesus Christ. But the present is the only one in which he calls himself δούλος θεοῦ, a bondman of God. This appellation he took, probably because the Judaizers in Crete affirmed that he had apostatized from God, when, as an apostle of Christ, he received into God's church the uncircumcised Gentiles, and thereby freed them from obeying the law of Moses as a term of salvation.

2 An apostle of Jesus Christ.]—To distinguish himself from other good men, who are all servants of God, Paul calls himself an apostle of Jesus Christ; one clothed with authority to teach mankind true religion.

3 In order to the faith.]—So I translate the preposition κατὰ, after Theophylact and Oecumenius; because the common translation, which implied that Paul was made an apostle 'according to the faith of God's elect,' is hardly sense. Besides, the preposition κατὰ, in the end of this verse, and in 2 Tim. i. 1. signifies in order to.

4 Of the elect of God.]—The Gentiles are called 'the elect,' 2 Tim. ii. 10, and 'an elected generation,' 1 Pet. ii. 9, for a reason assigned 1 Pet. i. 1. note.—Paul was made an apostle of Jesus Christ for the purpose of persuading the Gentiles to believe the gospel.

5 Acknowledgment of the truth which is in order to godliness.]—The doctrine of the gospel in general is here called 'the truth which is in order to godliness,' to distinguish it from the falsehoods of heathenism, which tended to promote vice; and even to distinguish it from the ordinances of the law of Moses, which were only shadows and obscure representations of true religion, and whose only influence was to purify the flesh.—Some are of opinion that by the truth, in this passage, the apostle meant the true doctrine of the gospel concerning the salvation of the Gentiles by faith.

Ver. 2.—1. Which God, who cannot lie, promised.]—The promise here referred to is that which God made to Adam and Eve and their posterity at the fall, when, in passing sentence on the serpent, He said of the seed of the woman, 'It shall bruise thy head.' The same promise was renewed in the covenant with Abraham: 'In thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed.'—That this was a promise of eternal life to all believers, see proved Ess. v. sect. 6. See also 2 Tim. i. 9.

2 Before the times of the ages.]—Παροχρονίων αἰώνων. Supposing the word αἰώνων, in this clause, to signify eternal, the literal translation of the passage would be 'before eternal times.' But that being a contradiction in terms, our translators, contrary to the propriety of the Greek language, have rendered it 'before the world began.'—As Locke observes on Rom. xvi. 26, the true literal translation is 'before the secular times;' referring us to the Jewish feasts, by which times were computed among the Hebrews, as among the Gentiles they were computed by generations of men. Hence, Col. i. 26. 'The mystery which was kept hid (ἀπό τῶν αἰώνων καὶ ἀπό τῶν γενεῶν) from the ages and from the generations,' signifies the mystery which was kept hid from the Jews and from the Gentiles. See this explained Rom. xvi. 26. note 3.

Ver. 3.—1. His promise.]—Τὸ ῥηγόν, literally his word; namely, of promise. We have the expression complete Rom. ix. 9. ἐπαγγελίας γὰρ ἡ ῥηγὸν ἔσται, 'For the word of promise was this.'

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. I.—1 Paul, (δοκ., see Rom. i. 1. note 1.), a servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ, sent forth by him in order to promote the faith of the Gentiles, the elected people of God, and to persuade them to acknowledge the gospel, whose end is to make men godly and virtuous in every respect;

2 In hope that they shall also obtain that resurrection to eternal life, which God, who cannot lie, promised to believers of all nations in the persons of Adam and Abraham, long before the Jewish dispensation began.

3 The knowledge of God's promise was long confined to the Jews; but he hath manifested to all, in its proper season, his promise, by the preaching of the gospel, with which I am intrusted by Christ, according to the commandment of God, the original contriver of the method of our salvation;

4 To Titus, my genuine son by the common faith, the faith in Christ which the Gentiles are permitted to have in common with the Jews, I wish gracious assistances, merciful deliverances, and eternal life, from God the Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ, the accomplisher of our salvation.

5 For this purpose I left thee in Crete, that thou mightest supply the things wanting in the churches there, and in particular ordain, in every city where there are churches, elders, as I commanded thee. I will therefore describe the character and qualifications of the persons thou oughtest to make elders.

6 If any one be in the eye of the world blameless, the husband of one wife at a time, having children who are Christians, and who are not accused of riotous living, nor are disobedient to their parents; persons of this character ordain bishops, that they may assist thee in opposing the Judaizers, ver. 10, 11.

7 For a bishop should be free from blame, as becomes the steward of the mysteries of God, 1 Cor. iv. 1. He should not be headstrong

2. I am intrusted according to the commandment of God.]—By affirming that Christ intrusted him with the preaching of the gospel according to the commandment of God; or, as it is expressed 1 Cor. i. 1. 2 Cor. i. 1. 'By the will of God,' the apostle hath carried his own authority to the highest pitch. Jesus Christ made him an apostle: But he did it by the commandment of God, from whom, therefore, as well as from Christ, Paul received his apostleship.

3. Our Saviour.]—The title of Saviour is given to the Father in other passages, Luke i. 47. 1 Tim. i. 1. Jude ver. 24. for the reasons mentioned Tit. iii. 4. note.

Ver. 5.—1. Set in order the things wanting.]—ἵνα τὰ λείποντα συμπληρώσῃς: This Estius translates, 'that thou mightest rectify the things which were left,' namely, uncorrected at my departure. Erasmus, to express the force of the preposition κατὰ in συμπληρώσῃς, hath here pergas corrigere.

2. And ordain in every city.]—The apostle did not mean that elders were to be ordained in every city of Crete; but only in every city where the converts were so numerous as to form a church.—The Greeks used the word Πόλις, to denote a city or village indiscriminately: here it signifies both.

3. Elders.]—that is, bishops and deacons. For the name elder being given to all who held sacred offices in the church, 1 Tim. v. 17. note 1. the ordaining of elders here, as Acts xiv. 23. signifies the ordaining both of bishops and deacons. Jerome, in his commentary on this passage, as well as in his letter to Evagrius, Ep. 86, affirms, that, in the first age, bishop and presbyter or elder was one and the same; and quotes this and other passages in support of his opinion; but that afterwards, to remove schisms, it was universally agreed that one chosen from among the presbyters should be raised above the rest, to whom the whole care of the church was to belong. Hence Jerome inferred, that the pre-eminence of bishops above presbyters is owing more to the custom of the church than to the command of Christ.

Ver. 6.—1. Having believing children.]—The apostle required, that the children of him who was to be ordained a bishop should be Christians, and of a sober behaviour; because the infidelity and vices of children, at least in the eyes of the vulgar, bring some blame on their parents. And therefore it is added, in the next verse, 'for a bishop must be blameless.'

2. Riotous living.]—Ασώτως. This signifies not only the gratification of venereal desires, but the luxury of the table, and all intemperance in the enjoyment of sensual pleasures. Thus of the prodigal son it is said, Luke xv. 13, that 'he wasted his substance, (ὅτι ἀσώτως) living riotously.'

3. Not unruly.]—Ανευτακτος. This in the Syriac version is, 'neque immorgeri prae crapula, —not refractory through full feeding,' in allusion to brute animals, which, the hotter they are fed, become the more ungovernable.—Seeing a minister's reputation and usefulness depend, in some measure, on the good behaviour of all the members of his family, his children especially ought carefully to avoid every indecency of conduct from that consideration, as well as from the consideration of the advantages for religious improvement which they enjoy by living with him.

anger, not given to wine, not a striker, not one who makes gain by base methods;

8 But hospitable, (1 Tim. iii. 2. note 7.), a lover of good men, prudent,¹ just, holy, temperate;

9 Holding fast¹ the true doctrine (αληθινὴ διδασκαλία, 89.) as he hath been taught, that he may be able, by the teaching which is wholesome, both to exhort and to confute the gainsayers.

10 For there are many unruly and foolish talkers¹ and deceivers,² especially those of the circumcision, 11 Whose mouths must be stopped, who subvert¹ whole families, teaching things which they ought not,² for the sake of sordid gain.

12 One of themselves, a prophet¹ of their own, hath said,² The Cretians are always liars, evil wild beasts, lazy bellies.³

13 This testimony is true; for which cause rebuke them sharply,¹ that they may be healthy in the faith;

14 Not giving heed to Jewish fables, and precepts of men¹ who turn away the truth.²

15 All MEATS indeed ARE pure to the pure;¹ but to the polluted and unfaithful² nothing is pure; (αλλὰ, 78.) for both their understanding and conscience is polluted.

16 They profess to know God,¹ but by works

nor ready to fall into a passion, nor addicted to wine; not a striker of those who displease him; not one who loves money so much that he makes gain by base methods; (1 Tim. iii. 3. note 2.)

8 But, instead of loving money, hospitable, a lover of good men, prudent in conduct, just in his dealings, holy in speech, and temperate in the use of every sensual pleasure.

9 He should hold fast the true Christian doctrine as he hath been taught it by the apostles, that he may be able, by wholesome teaching, both to instruct them who desire instruction, and to confute false teachers who speak against the truth to overturn it.

10 For there are many teachers, who, being unsubjected to us, talk in a foolish manner concerning genealogies and fables, and deceive others; of this sort especially are the Jewish teachers, 11 Whose mouths must be stopped, neither by persecution nor force, but by clear and strong reasoning, because they carry off whole families to Judaism, teaching things which they ought not, for the sordid purpose of drawing money from their disciples.

12 The Judaizers in this are true Cretians, agreeably to what one of themselves, a prophet of their own, hath said, The Cretians are exceedingly addicted to lying, and of a savage noxious disposition, and lazy gluttons.

13 This testimony concerning the Cretians is just; for which cause I order thee to rebuke them and their disciples sharply, that, laying aside their wicked principles and practices, they may be healthy in the faith;

14 Not giving heed to Jewish fables concerning the law, and to precepts concerning meats, enjoined by men who turn away true doctrine from themselves and others as a thing noxious.

15 All meats indeed are pure to the well informed and well disposed: But to those who are polluted by intemperance, and who are unfaithful to Christ, no kind of meat is pure; for both their understanding and conscience is polluted by their intemperance use of the meats which the law reckons clean.

16 They of the circumcision profess to know the will of God

Ver. 8. Prudent.]—Ζηῆλον. This quality consists in the government of our angry passions, so that on all occasions we behave with prudence. It differs from ἐνσώφρων, temperate, which signifies one who bridle his lusts, especially those which are gratified by meat, and drink, and women.

Ver. 9. Holding fast the true doctrine.]—So ἀσπασσάμενος τὸν αἰσιν λέγον should be translated. For αἰσιν, in the sense of faithful, is only applicable to persons; and λόγος is a word of very general meaning. See Eze. iv. 60.—There is a great beauty in the word ἀσπασσάμενος as here used. It signifies the holding fast the true doctrine, in opposition to those who would wrest it from one. By this character all the Judaizers in Crete were excluded from being bishops; and in Ephesus from being deacons, 1 Tim. iii. 9.

Ver. 10.—1. Foolish talkers.]—Ματαίολογοι are persons who utter a multitude of foolish and trifling things on the subjects concerning which they speak.

2. And deceivers.]—ἑξαπατάται, mentium deceptores; teachers who delude the minds of their disciples with false opinions, in order to reconcile their consciences to wicked practices.

Ver. 11.—1. Who subvert whole families;—that is, make whole families go over to Judaism, by wresting the true Christian doctrine from them. The metaphor is taken from those who overturn houses by undermining their foundations.

2. Teaching things which they ought not, for the sake of sordid gain.]—The things which the false teachers, contrary to their conscience, inculcated for the sake of drawing money from the Jewish converts, were, the necessity of obeying the law of Moses in order to salvation; the efficacy of the Levitical statements to procure pardon for those who continued in their sins; and the merit of being descended from Abraham, whereby all his children, without exception, were thought entitled to eternal life. Hence the Jews were so extremely anxious about their genealogies: Hence also the apostle in this, and in his epistles to Timothy, severely condemned genealogies, and the fables therewith connected. See Tit. iii. 9. note 1.

Ver. 12.—1. One of themselves, a prophet.]—This was the poet Epimenides, who, among the Romans, was reputed to have foretold future events. Cicero, speaking of him, Divinat. lib. i. says, he was "futura præsciens, et valde inanis per furorē,"—one who foreknew and foretold things future by ecstasy." Besides, as all poets pretended to a kind of inspiration, the name prophet and poet were used as synonymous, both by the Greeks and Romans. Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. vi. informs us, that the Egyptians called those prophets who presided over their sacred rites; and that the apostle did not scruple to give that title to Epimenides, because he was esteemed a prophet by the Greeks.

2. Hath said, the Cretians, &c.]—Epimenides said this in his book Περὶ Κρητικῶν, concerning oracles. Glasius hath quoted the passage entire, page 2075.—The Cretians were universally hated and branded as liars by the other Greeks, because, as Warburton remarks, Divine Legat. vol. i. p. 189, by shewing in their island the tomb of Jupiter the father of gods and men, they published what the rest of the Greeks concealed in their mysteries; namely, that their gods were dead men.—The character given of the Cretians by Epimenides was applied with propriety by the apostle to the Judaizers, because they were natives of Crete.

3. Evil wild beasts, lazy bellies.]—By calling the Cretians evil wild beasts, the poet insinuated, that they were of a fierce, ravenous, noxious disposition; and by adding lazy bellies, he signified that they were lazy gluttons—as averse to action, as wild beasts are after gorging themselves with their prey.

Ver. 13. For which cause rebuke them sharply.]—Ασπασσάμενος. This metaphor is taken from surgeons, who, in curing their patients, are sometimes obliged to cut their flesh in such a manner as to give them great pain. Titus was to reprove the Cretians cuttingly or sharply. But the sharpness of his reproofs was not to consist in the bitterness of the language which he used, nor in the passion with which he spoke. Reproofs of that sort have little influence to make one healthy, either in faith or practice. It was to consist in the strength of the reasons with which he enforced his reproofs, and in the earnestness and affection with which he delivered them, whereby the conscience of the offenders, being awakened, would sting them bitterly.

Ver. 14.—1. Precepts of men.]—From the following ver. 15. it appears, that the apostle had now in his eye the precepts of the Judaizers concerning meats clean and unclean; which, although originally the precepts of God, were now abolished under the gospel: Wherefore, if these were any longer enjoined as obligatory, they were not enjoined by God, but were 'the precepts of men.'

2. Who turn away the truth.]—The apostle, by a beautiful figure, represents the truth as offering itself to the Judaizers, and the Judaizers as turning it away with contempt.

Ver. 15.—1. All meats are pure to the pure.]—The word meats is wanting in the original, but must be supplied, the expression being elliptical. See 1 Cor. vi. 12. note.—As the Jews reckoned themselves the only holy people on earth, it must have been extremely displeasing to the false teachers of that nation to find themselves represented as polluted like the Gentiles. In other passages also, the apostle gives these teachers the opprobrious names with which they stigmatized the Gentiles. See Philip. iii. 2.—If the reader thinks the apostle is not speaking, in this and the preceding verse, of the Judaizers, who insisted that the precepts of the law of Moses concerning meats were still obligatory, he may be supposed to have had in his eye those Pythagorean Gentiles and Essene Jews, who, before their conversion, thought it sinful to eat any kind of animal food, and who, since their conversion, still continued in the same persuasion.

2. And unfaithful.]—This is the proper translation of the word ἀπιστοί, because the apostle is not speaking of unbelievers or heathens, but of such believers as were unfaithful to Christ, by living in intemperance and debauchery.

Ver. 16. They profess to know God.]—They boast of having the true knowledge of God's will from the Mosiac revelation, and on that pretence they set their doctrine in opposition to and above the doctrine of the apostles; but by the wickedness of their lives they shew themselves to be utterly ignorant of God, and of every thing that is good; consequently they deserve no credit from the disciples of Christ, as teachers.

they deny him, being abominable and disobedient, and (εἰς, 290.) concerning every good work (ἀναιδέα, Rom. i. 28. note 3.) without disparagement.

better than others; but by their works they deny him—being abominable on account of their sensuality, and disobedient to the express commands of God, and to every good work without discernment: They neither know nor approve of any good work.

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the things contained in this Chapter.

THE apostle having directed Titus to ordain elders in every city, and described the character and qualifications of the persons he was to invest with offices in the church; also, having laid open the bad character and evil practices of the Judaizers in Crete, and ordered him to rebuke them sharply, he in this chapter gave him a short view of the duties of his office, as superintendant both of the teachers and of the people in Crete. He was, in opposition to the Judaizers, to inculcate on the people such precepts only as were suitable to the wholesome doctrine of the gospel, ver. 1.—And with respect to the aged men who held sacred offices, he was to enjoin them to be attentive to the behaviour of those under their care; to be grave in their own deportment; prudent in giving admonitions and rebukes; and spiritually healthy by faith, love, patience, ver. 2.—In like manner, those aged women who were employed to teach the young of their own sex, he was to exhort to a deportment becoming their sacred character. They were neither to be slanderers nor drunkards, but to be good teachers, ver. 3.—In particular, they were to persuade the young women who were married to do their duty to their husbands, their children, and their families, that the gospel might not be evil spoken of through their bad behaviour, ver. 4, 5.—On young men he was to inculcate the government of their passions, ver. 6.—But above all, both in teaching and behaviour, Titus was to make himself a pattern of the virtues which he enjoined to others, ver. 7, 8.—And because the Judaizers, to allure slaves to their party, taught that under the gospel slaves are free, Titus was to inculcate on slaves obedience to their masters, diligence in their work, and honesty in every thing committed in trust to them, ver. 9, 10.—Withal, to make the Cretian bishops and people sensible of the impiety of the doctrine of the Jewish teachers, concerning the efficacy of the Levitical sacrifices in procuring pardon for impenitent sinners, the apostle declared, that the gospel was given for this very purpose, to teach men that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, they should live soberly, &c. in expectation of a future judgment, ver. 11–14.—These things the apostle ordered Titus to teach in the plainest and boldest manner, agreeably to the authority with which he was invested as an evangelist, ver. 16.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. II.—1 The fables and commandments of men taught by the Judaizers sicken the soul: But do thou inculcate the practices which are suitable to the wholesome doctrine of the gospel:

2 That aged men, who hold sacred offices, be attentive to the behaviour of their people, venerable in their own manners, prudent in their behaviour, spiritually healthy by faith, love, patience;

3 That the aged women, whom the church employs to teach the young of their own sex, in like manner, be in speech and behaviour as becometh persons employed in sacred offices; not slanderers, not enslaved to much wine, but good teachers:

4 That they may persuade the young women under their care to be lovers of their husbands, performing the duties of marriage from affection, and lovers of their children, by bringing them up religiously;

5 To be of a calm disposition, chaste, attentive to the affairs of their families, good to their domestics, obedient to their own husbands, that the gospel may not be evil spoken of, as encouraging wives to neglect their husbands and children, on pretence of their attending on the offices of religion.

Ver. 1. Wholesome doctrine.]—Τῆς ὑγιεινῆς. True doctrine is called wholesome, because it invigorates all the faculties of the soul, and keeps them in a healthy state.

Ver. 2. That aged men.]—ἡλικιωνῶν; the word used here, commonly signifies an old man. But Le Clerc, in his addition to Hammond, hath shewed that the LXX. use it to denote an office of dignity. Wherefore εἰσεύρηται; being of the same signification with ἡλικιωνῶν, it may be translated in this passage elders. In support of this translation, I observe, that the virtues which Titus was to inculcate on aged men, are the same with those which Timothy was to inculcate on bishops and deacons. They were to be ὑπογένητοι, εὐσεβεῖς, ὑγιεῖς, vigilant, grave, prudent. See 1 Tim. iii. 2, 8.

Ver. 3.—1. That aged women.]—Though the word εἰσεύρηται; commonly signifies aged women indiscriminately, it evidently denotes in this verse such aged women as were employed by the church in teaching the young of their own sex the doctrines and precepts of the Christian religion: For they were to be in speech and behaviour ὑπογένηται; as became sacred persons; and καλοῦς διδασκαλούς, good teachers. These characters, especially the last mentioned, did not belong to aged women in general, but only to such of them as were employed in teaching. The things which these persons were to teach the young under their care, are mentioned ver. 4, 5. See 1 Tim. iii. 11. note 1.

2. In deportment.]—The word κατανενομήσθαι denotes, not only the dress, but the carriage of the body; so is fitly translated deportment.

3. As becometh sacred persons.]—The aged women employed by the church to teach the young are fitly called sacred persons, because the office they were employed to discharge was a sacred office; as was shewed 1 Tim. v. 16. note 1.

4. Not slanderers.]—This was required in the same order of female teachers, 1 Tim. iii. 11.

5. Not enslaved to much wine.]—This is a qualification required in the deacons, 1 Tim. iii. 8.

Ver. 4. That they may persuade.]—ἵνα πεισθώσιν may be translated. See 2 Tim. i. 7. note 2.

Ver. 5.—1. Careful of their families.]—The word οἰκονομῶντες signifies both those who keep at home, and those who take proper care of their families. In this latter sense I understand it here, with Klesner and the Vulgate.

2. That the word of God may not be evil spoken of.]—The exhortation to be good wives and mothers, which aged women were ordered, in this passage, to give to the young under their care, is not to be considered merely as a rule by which these are to govern themselves who are intrusted with the office of teaching others; but young women are more especially to consider it as a rule for directing their own conduct; that by their conjugal affection, their care in educating their children, their chastity, their prudent economy, their sweetness of disposition, and subjection to their husbands, all founded on the principles of religion, they may do honour to the gospel which they profess to believe and obey.

6 The young men, in like manner, exhort (σφοδρῶς) to govern their passions.

7 (Παρ.) In all things make thyself a pattern of good works, (ἀδελφῶν, see 2 Tim. iii. 16.), in teaching SHW incorruptness,¹ gravity, sincerity,

8 *Wholesome speech*¹ which cannot be condemned; that he who is on the opposite *SIDE*² may be ashamed, having nothing bad to say concerning you.³

9 Servants EXHORT to be subject to their own masters, AND in all things to be careful to please, not answering again;

10 Not secretly stealing,¹ but shewing all good fidelity; that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things:

11 For the grace of God,¹ which bringeth salvation, (σωτηρίαν) hath *shone forth*² to all men,

12 Teaching us, that denying ungodliness¹ and worldly lusts,² we should live soberly,³ righteously,⁴ and godly,⁵ in this present world,⁶

13 Expecting the blessed hope,¹ (ἐλπί, 221.) namely, the appearing of the glory of the great God,² and our Saviour Jesus Christ;³

6 The young men, in like manner, exhort to govern their passions, (ver. 12. note 3.), that they may behave soberly in the giddy season of youth.

7 To give weight to thy exhortations, in all things make thyself a pattern of those good works which thou enjoimest to others. In teaching, shew incorruptness of doctrine, gravity of speech, and sincerity with respect to the motives by which thou art influenced,

8 In conversation, and in reproving offenders, use clear and strong, but temperate speech, which cannot be found fault with even by the offenders themselves; that he who is not a Christian may be ashamed of his opposition to thee, and to the elders thy assistants, having nothing bad to say concerning you as teachers.

9 Slaves exhort to continue subject to their own masters, and in all things lawful, to be careful to please; especially by performing their service cheerfully; not insolently answering again, even though they may be reproved unjustly or with too much severity. See 1 Pet. ii. 18.

10 Not secretly stealing any part of their master's goods, but shewing the greatest fidelity and honesty in every thing committed to them; that, by the whole of their behaviour in their low station, they may render the doctrine of the gospel amiable, even in the eyes of their heathen lords.

11 These things I command, because the gospel of God, which bringeth both the knowledge and the means of salvation, hath shone forth to all men, to Jews and Gentiles, rich and poor, masters and slaves, without distinction,

12 Teaching us, that renouncing ungodliness, especially atheism and idolatry, and putting away worldly lusts, we should live temperately, righteously, and godly in this present world,

13 Expecting not any temporal rewards, such as the law promised, but the accomplishment of the blessed hope of the appearing of the glory of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who will bestow eternal life on all who deny ungodliness and worldly lusts;

Ver. 7. Shew (ἀδελφῶν) incorruptness, gravity, (σφοδρῶς) sincerity.—Some ancient MSS. and versions want the word which I have translated sincerity: But it is found in the Alex. MS., in the Arabic version, and in some of the Greek commentators. Mill thinks it was first placed on the margin as an explication of ἀδελφῶν, incorruptness, and afterwards was inserted in the text. But though both words come from the same original, being differently compounded, they may be distinguished in the following manner: Incorruptness, ἀδελφῶν, may signify that Titus's doctrine was to be free from all corrupt mixtures, taken whether from Judaism or from heathenism; whereas sincerity, σφοδρῶς, may signify that his motives in teaching were to be incorrupt,—he was not to teach from the love of money, or fame, or power.

Ver. 8.—1. Wholesome speech.—Ver. 8. Speech strong but temperate, that is, free from all bitterness. For, as the commentators observe, Titus, who was a converted Gentile, having seen so much of the obstinate, uncharitable, bigoted spirit of the Judaizers, might have been in danger of using harsh language in reproving them, if he had not been thus cautioned by the apostle.

2. He who is on the opposite side.—ἑξ ἑναντίας, supply χρῆμα. He means infidels, whether Jews or Gentiles.

3. Having nothing bad to say concerning you.—Πᾶσι ἡμῶν. Some MSS. and versions have here πᾶσι ἡμῶν, concerning us. Either reading shows, as Benson observes, how anxious the apostle was that the gospel might not be evil spoken of, on account of the misbehaviour either of its teachers or of its professors; see ver. 10. and 1 Pet. ii. 12.

Ver. 10. Not secretly stealing.—The word κρυπτικῶς signifies the stealing a part of a thing; the thief not daring to take the whole, for fear of being discovered. It is applied to the fraud of Ananias and Sapphira, Acts v. 3. who abstracted a part of the price of their land.

Ver. 11.—1. For the grace of God.—Here, and Gal. v. 4. the gospel is called 'the grace of God,' either because it is the greatest favour which God hath bestowed on men, or because it teaches the doctrine of God's great grace or favour to men.

2. Hath shone forth to all men.—The word ἐξηγήσατο properly signifies the shining of the sun, or of the stars, Acts xxvii. 20. The gospel, like the sun, hath shone forth to all men, and giveth light to all. Hence Christ, the author of the gospel, is called, Luke i. 78. ἡ ἀνατολὴ τοῦ ἡλίου, 'the day-spring from on high'; and Mal. iv. 2. 'the sun of righteousness.' Hence also Christ called himself, John viii. 12. 'the light of the world.'—The shining forth of the gospel to all men is an high recommendation of it, and shews it to be entirely different from the heathen mysteries, which, if they contained any thing valuable for reforming mankind, being confined to the initiated, the vulgar were left in ignorance, idolatry, and vice.—The gospel likewise differs from the law of Moses, as taught of the Judaizers, who, by inculcating the rites and ceremonies of that law as the whole of religion, encouraged their disciples to neglect the duties of piety and morality altogether: Whereas the gospel teaches us, 'that denying ungodliness,' &c.

Ver. 12.—1. Ungodliness.—consists, not only in denying the existence of God, but in denying his perfections, his government of the world, and the retributions of a future state. Also, it consists in neglecting to worship God; in worshipping him by images; in blasphemy, or speaking disrespectfully of his providence, in perjury; in profaning the name of God by cursing and swearing; and in disregarding the manifestation which he hath made of his will in the gospel revelation.

2. Worldly lusts;—namely, gluttony, drunkenness, lasciviousness, anger, malice, revenge, together with the immoderate love of riches, power, fame, and the rest. These lusts being productive of nothing but misery to those who indulge in them, the gospel, God's gracious gift, was bestowed on men to rescue them from the dominion of worldly lusts, by teaching them to live soberly, &c.

3. Should live soberly.—Σοφίᾳ. Sobriety is a habit of self-government, whereby one is able to restrain his appetites, his passions, and his affections, as often as the gratification of his appetites, and the yielding to the impulses of his passions and affections, are in any respect sinful. See 2 Tim. i. 7. note 2.

4. Righteously.—Righteousness consists in abstaining from injuring others in their person, reputation, or fortune; in discharging all the duties belonging to the relations in which one stands to those with whom he is connected, and to the station in which he is placed; in carrying on one's trade and commerce fairly; in performing covenants and promises faithfully; and, in short, in rendering to every one his due. The Hebrews held it to be a part of righteousness also, to do works of charity to the poor. Psal. cxli. 9. 'He hath dispersed, he hath given to the poor, his righteousness endureth for ever.'

5. And godly.—Goddiness being the opposite to ungodliness, described ver. 12. note 1. needs no explanation.

6. In this present world.—Here the apostle insinuates, that the present world in which we live is a state of probation for the future world; as is plain likewise from ver. 13.

Ver. 13.—1. Expecting the blessed hope.—If this is different from the expectation of the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, as in this clause must be translated by the word and; in which case the blessed hope will mean the hope of eternal life mentioned chap. i. 2. But as this hope is included in the hope of the appearing of Jesus Christ to raise the dead, and to carry his people with him into heaven, the translation which I have given seems more emphatical.

2. Namely, the appearing of the glory of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ. This, which is the exact literal translation of the clause, καὶ ἐπιφανίσειας τὸ δόξας τοῦ μεγάλου Θεοῦ καὶ σωτῆρος ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, is adopted both by the Vulgate and by Beza.—Considered as an Hebraism, the clause may be translated, as in our Bible, 'The glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ.' Nevertheless, the literal translation is more just, as the apostle alludes to our Lord's words, Luke ix. 26. 'Of him shall the Son of man be ashamed, (ὅταν ἔλθῃ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου καὶ τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἀποκρίσκειν), when he shall come in his own glory, and in the glory of the Father, and of the holy angels.'—Matt. xvi. 27. 'For the Son of man will come (ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἔλθει) in the glory of his Father, with his angels; and then he will render to every one according to his works.'—But if 14 Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem (1 Tim. ii. 6. note 1.) us from all iniquity, and purify to himself a peculiar people,¹ zealous of good works.

15 These things¹ inculcate, and exhort,² and confute, (see 2 Tim. iv. 2.), with all authority. Let no one despise thee.³

14 Who, during his first appearing on earth, gave himself to death for us, that he might redeem us from the power, as well as from the punishment, of all iniquity, and purify to himself a peculiar people, not by circumcisions and other ceremonial observances, but by being zealous of good works.

15 These things inculcate as necessary to be believed, and exhort all who profess the gospel to live suitably to them. And such as teach otherwise, confute with all the authority which is due to truth, and to thee as a teacher commissioned by Christ. Let no one have reason to despise thee.

Jesus is to appear at the last day, in his own glory, and in the glory of the Father, that event may fitly be termed 'the appearing of the glory of the great God, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ.'—It is true, the article is wanting before ἐπιφανείας; yet it may be supplied, as our translators have done here before ἐπιφανείας; and elsewhere, particularly Eph. v. 6. 'In the kingdom (τῆς βασιλείας καὶ τῆς δόξης) of Christ and of God.' See Esa. iv. 69. Besides, as ἐπιφανείας is in the genitive case, it will bear to be translated of our Saviour, although the article is wanting. Yet I have not ventured to translate it in that manner, because the meaning of this text hath been much disputed.—At the appearing of Jesus Christ, the rank of all men will be determined, and their precedence settled, and every one placed in a station suitable to the real worth of his character, and continue in that station for ever.

2. The great God.]—In giving the title of great to God, the apostle followed the custom of the Jews, who gave that title to the true God, to distinguish him from the gods of the heathens: Thus, Psal. lxxvii. 13. 'Who is so great a God as our God?'—I do not think there is any allusion here to the Dii Cabiri, the great gods worshipped in Samothrace and Crete, as some commentators imagine.

3. And our Saviour Jesus Christ.]—Because the article prefixed to μεγάλου Θεοῦ is not repeated before ἐπιφανείας, Beza is of opinion that one person only is spoken of; namely, Jesus Christ, to whom he thinks the title of The great God is given in this verse. Accordingly some translate the clause thus, 'The great God, even our Saviour Jesus Christ.' And in confirmation of that opinion they observe, that we never read in scripture of the appearing of the Father. But the answer is, The apostle does not speak of the appearing of the Father, but of the appearing of the glory of the Father; agreeably to what Christ himself declared, that at his return to judgment, he will appear surrounded with the glory of his Father. See the first note on this verse.

Ver. 14. A peculiar people.]—ἑκλεκτοῦς. This is said in allusion to Exod. xix. 5. and Deut. vii. 6. where God calls the Jews 'a peculiar and a special people to himself;' because he had made them his property, by redeeming them from the bondage of Egypt, and had distinguished them from the rest of mankind as his, by rites and ordinances of his own appointment. Christ hath made believers his peculiar people, by giving himself for them, to redeem them from all iniquity, and to purify them to himself, a people zealous, not of rites and ceremonies, but of good works. This being the great end of Christ's death, how dare any person pretending to be one of Christ's people, either to speak or to think lightly of good works, as not necessary to salvation?

Ver. 15.—1. These things;—namely, concerning the universality of the gospel, and the excellent purpose for which it was given; the coming of Christ to judgment, the end for which he died during his first appearing on earth; and concerning the character of the people of Christ, as persons zealous of good works.

2. Inculcate and exhort.]—The Cretians being a sensual and obdurate people, and the Judaizing teachers having denied the necessity of good works, the apostle commanded Titus, both to affirm the necessity and to enjoin the practice of them, in the boldest and plainest manner.

3. Let no one despise thee.]—The apostle does not say, as to Timothy, 'despise thy youth,' 1 Tim. iv. 12. from which it may be inferred that Titus was an older man than Timothy. In the compound word κατακατενόησας, the preposition κατά, like κατά, alters the meaning of the word with which it is compounded.

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

BECAUSE the Judaizers affirmed, that no obedience was due from the worshippers of the true God to magistrates who were idolaters, and because by that doctrine they made not only the Jewish but the Gentile believers bad subjects, and exposed them to be punished as evil-doers, (see Rom. xiii. Illust.), the apostle commanded Titus to inculcate frequently on the Cretians to obey the magistrates under whose protection they lived, although they were idolaters, ver. 1.—and not to speak evil of any one on account of his nation or religion, ver. 2.—Because, said the apostle, even we of the Jewish nation, who now believe the gospel, were formerly in behaviour as bad as the heathens; being foolish, disobedient, &c., ver. 3.—and merely through the mercy of God, and not by our own endeavours, have been delivered from our former sinful state, by the bath of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost, ver. 4, 5, 6.—That being rescued from ignorance and wickedness by grace, we might become heirs of eternal life, ver. 7.—Next, the apostle ordered Titus strongly to affirm, that every one who hath believed on God is bound to practise good works; and that such works are really profitable to men, by rendering them acceptable to God, ver. 8.—Also he commanded him in his discourses to avoid the foolish questions and genealogies which the false teachers insisted on, ver. 9.—and to admonish heretical teachers, both concerning their doctrine and their practice; and, after a first and second admonition, if they did not amend, to cast them out of the church, ver. 11.—Withal, because the Cretians were disposed to be idle, Titus was to enjoin them to follow some honest occupation, whereby they might both maintain themselves and do works of charity to the afflicted, ver. 14.—The apostle concluded his epistle with salutations, and with a benediction to all in Crete who acknowledged his apostolical authority, ver. 13.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. III.—1 Put them in mind to be subject to governments and powers, to obey magistrates, to be ready to every good work;

2 To speak evil¹ of no one; to be no fighters, but equitable, shewing all meekness to all men:

3 For even we ourselves were formerly¹

Ver. 1. To obey magistrates.]—The word κατακατενόησας literally signifies to obey those who rule. The disposition of the Jews towards heathen rulers, see described Rom. xiii. View. 1 Tim. ii. 2.

Ver. 2. To speak evil of no man.]—The word κατακατενόησας, besides evil speaking, denotes all those vices of the tongue which proceed either from hatred or from contempt of others, and

CHAP. III.—1 Put the Cretians in mind of what I have taught them; namely, to be subject to the governments and powers established in Crete; to obey magistrates though they be heathens; to be ready to perform every good work enjoined by the laws of their country;

2 To speak evil of no one on account of his nation or religion, to be no fighters, but of an equitable disposition, (Phil. iv. 5. note). and to shew the greatest meekness to all men, even to enemies,

3 This behaviour, towards those who profess false religions, be-which tend to hurt their reputation, such as railing, reviling, knocking speeches, whisperings, &c.

Ver. 3. For even we ourselves were formerly foolish, &c.]—Because the 'pouring out of the Holy Ghost,' on those of whom the apostle speaks, is unmentioned ver. 6. Jerome, Estius, the author of Misc. Sacra, and Beauson, are of opinion, that the character of the foolish, disobedient, erring, slavishly serving divers (ποθυμους) inordinate desires and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hated, and hating one another.

4 But when the goodness and the philanthropy of God our Saviour¹ shone forth,

5 He saved us,¹ not (εξ, 156.) on account of works of righteousness which we had done, but according to his own mercy, (διὰ) through (αὐτου, Eph. v. 26. note 1.) the bath of regeneration,² and the renewing of the Holy Ghost,³

6 Which he poured out¹ on us richly through Jesus Christ our Saviour;

7 That being justified¹ by his grace,² we might be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life. (Tit. i. 2.)

8 (Ὁ λογος, 71. 60. 2.) This doctrine is true; (και, 211.) yet, concerning these HEIRS, I command thee strongly to affirm, that they, who have believed¹ in God should take care to promote² good works. These are (τα ελλα, 1 Tim. iii. 1. note 3.) the things honourable and profitable to men.

believing Jews before their conversion is described here; and among the rest the character of the apostle himself. But any reader who compares what he says of his own behaviour in his unconverted state, Acts xxiii. 1. Gal. i. 14. 2 Tim. i. 3. will hardly think the apostle speaks of himself. Only, being about to say things disagreeable to the Jews, he classed himself with them, according to his custom, to prevent their being offended with him. See 1 Thess. iv. 15. note. The sentiment in this passage is beautiful; namely, that the recollection of our own faults ought to make us equitable in judging of the faults of others, and prevent us from passing severe sentences on them when they fall into sin.

Ver. 4. Of God our Saviour.]—That the father is here called 'God our Saviour,' is evident from ver. 6 where the same person is said to have poured out the Holy Ghost richly on the Jews 'through Jesus Christ our Saviour.' The title of our Saviour justly belongs to the Father, because he formed the scheme of our salvation, and sent his Son into the world to accomplish it, John iii. 16. Rom. v. 8. 1 John iv. 2.; on which account the title of Saviour is given to the Son likewise.

Ver. 5.—1. He saved us.]—The word saved in scripture doth not always denote eternal salvation; but it signifies, sometimes the knowledge of salvation, Rom. xiii. 11. note 2. and sometimes the obtaining the means of salvation; see Rom. xi. 26. note 1. Here, saved us signifies, delivered us from the miserable and wicked state in which we were living before we believed the gospel. This deliverance is called justification, ver. 7. See the note there.

2. Through the bath of regeneration.]—through baptism; called 'the bath of regeneration,' not because any change in the nature of the baptized person is produced by baptism, but because it is an emblem of the purification of his soul from sin. Hence Ananias, in allusion to the emblematical meaning of baptism, said to our apostle, Acts xxi. 16. 'Arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins.' Be baptized in token of thy resolution to forsake thy sins, and among the rest thy sin in persecuting the disciples of Jesus.—In the term regeneration, when joined with baptism, there is an allusion to the phraseology of the Jewish doctors, who, when they admitted a proselyte into their church by baptism, always spoke of him as one born again. Nevertheless the real change in the nature of a believer, which entitles him to be called a son of God, is not effected by baptism, but by 'the renewing of the Holy Ghost,' mentioned in the next clause. Hence our Lord, whom the apostle hath followed here, joined the two together in his discourse to Nicodemus, John iii. 6. 'Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.'

3. And renewing of the Holy Ghost.]—The gift of the Holy Ghost, which on some occasions was shewn down on the believing Jews and Gentiles from heaven, and on others was imparted to them by the imposition of the apostles' hands, is with great propriety called 'the renewing of the Holy Ghost,' because by that gift their belief of the divine original of the gospel was greatly strengthened; so that the doctrines of the gospel, thus confirmed, must have had a powerful influence in producing such a change in their dispositions as made them new creatures.

Ver. 6. Which he poured out on us.]—Since, in the preceding verse, the Holy Ghost signifies the gift of the Holy Ghost, I have retained the common translation of the relative τις, namely which, to shew, that what is said to have been poured out was the gift, not the person, of the Holy Ghost. When the phrase poured out is used in scripture to signify the communication of the spiritual cometh us Jews: For even we ourselves were formerly foolish in our notions of religion, and in observing the traditions of the fathers, disobedient to God, erring from the truth, slavishly serving divers inordinate desires and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hated by the Gentiles, and hating one another.

4 But when the goodness and philanthropy of God our Saviour (σωτηρ, chap. ii. 11. note 2.) shone forth to all mankind, through the preaching of the gospel,

5 He saved us Jews from the miserable and wicked state in which we were living, not on account of any works of righteousness which we had done under the law to merit such a deliverance, but in prosecution of his own merciful purpose, which he accomplished through the bath (βαλνυσμους) of regeneration, and (ανανρωσιν) the renewing of the Holy Ghost,

6 Which he poured out on us richly, in his various gifts at our conversion, through Jesus Christ our Saviour, who procured these gifts for men;

7 That being delivered, by the mere favour of God, from the wickedness and misery of our former state, we might be made children and heirs, agreeably to the hope of eternal life given us by the promise of God.

8 This doctrine, that men are justified and made heirs merely by God's grace, is true; yet, concerning these heirs, I command thee strongly to affirm, that they who have believed in God should take care to promote good works. These are the things honourable and profitable to men: They are good for others, as making them happy; and most profitable to one's self, as productive of happiness both here and hereafter.

gifts, it denotes that these gifts were imparted, not by the imposition of the hands of men, but immediately from heaven, accompanied with some visible sign or token: of which we have instances, Acts ii. 2, 3, 4. and x. 44. Seeing the apostle speaks of himself here as one of those on whom the Holy Ghost was poured out, we are warranted to believe that he received the gift of the Holy Ghost by an immediate effusion from heaven, and not by the imposition of the hands of Ananias; and that Ananias's words to Saul, Acts ix. 17. 'The Lord Jesus hath sent me that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost,' though preceded by putting his hands on the apostle, do not mean that Ananias was sent to communicate the Holy Ghost to him by the imposition of his hands: for in that case Paul could not have said, 2 Cor. x. 1. 'I am in nothing behind the very greatest of the apostles.' But his meaning is, that he was sent to restore Saul's sight, and to baptize him, that after his baptism he might be filled with the gift of the Holy Ghost immediately from heaven, accompanied with the usual sensible sign, which Saul, having recovered his sight, was to see. Agreeably to this account of the matter, in Christ's commission to Ananias, Acts ix. 12. no mention is made of his communicating the Holy Ghost to Saul, but only of his putting his hands on him that he might receive his sight: Neither is any thing else mentioned by the apostle himself, Acts xxi. 13. 16.

Ver. 7.—1. Being justified.]—Concerning the forensic sense of the terms justify and justification, see Rom. ii. 13. note 2. The word justify signifies likewise to deliver one from evil, Rom. iv. 26. note 2.

2. By his grace.]—As the pronoun used in this passage is not the relative αυτου but the demonstrative αυτου, which commonly denotes the remote antecedent, it is probable that the grace, not of Christ, who is last mentioned, but of God, who is mentioned ver. 4. is meant. By ascribing men's justification to the grace of God, the apostle did not mean to insinuate that good works are not necessary to justification. For he tells us, chap. ii. 12. that the grace of God which bringeth salvation teacheth us to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world.

Ver. 8.—1. That they who have believed in God.]—Ὁ πιστευοντες, 'They who have believed, and who continue to believe;' according to the known use of the preterite tenses, Esai. iv. 10.

2. Take care to promote good works.]—Προσισταμενοι καλον εργον, literally, to preside over good works; that is, to practise them ourselves, and by our example and exhortation to encourage others to practise them, and to argue in their defence against those who speak of them slightly as not necessary to salvation. In this, as in other places of scripture, good works signify virtuous actions in general, but especially charitable and beneficent actions. Thus, Matt. v. 16. 'Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works.'—John x. 33. 'For a good work we stone thee not.'—1 Tim. v. 10. 'Borne witness to for good works: that she hath brought up children; that she hath lodged strangers; that she hath washed the saints' feet; that she hath relieved the afflicted; that she hath diligently followed every good work.'—1 Tim. vi. 18. 'That they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, &c. What a blessing, as Benson observes, would the ministers of the gospel be to the world, if all of them were careful strongly and often to urge their people to good works, and were themselves examples of such works! We have the phrase καλον εργον προσισταμενοι repeated ver. 14. But there the connexion leads us to adopt the translation mentioned in the margin of our Bible, 'to practise honest trades.'

9 But foolish questions and genealogies,¹ and strifes and fightings about the law,² resist; for they are unprofitable and false. (See 1 Tim. vi. 4. 3 Tim. ii. 14, 16, 23.)

10 An heretical man,¹ after a first and second admonition,² reject,³

11 Knowing that such a person is perverted,¹ and sinneth, being self-condemned.²

12 When I shall send Artemas to thee, or Tychicus,¹ make haste to come to me at Nicopolis,² for I have determined to winter there.

13 Diligently help forward on their journey Zenas the lawyer,¹ and Apollos, that nothing may be wanting to them.

14 And let ours also learn to practise honest trades, for necessary uses, that they may not be unfruitful.

15 All who are with me salute thee. Salute them who love us in the faith.¹ Grace be with all of you.² Amen.

9 But the frivolous questions proposed by the Judaizers, and the genealogies by which they pretend to prove individuals rightly descended from Abraham, and their strifes and fightings about the law, resist; for they are unprofitable, and destitute of foundation.

10 An heretical teacher, who, after a first and second admonition, continues in his evil courses, cast out of the church, and have no farther communication with him, because he is irreclaimable;

11 Knowing that such a teacher is utterly depraved, and in teaching false doctrine from worldly motives, sinneth, being self-condemned.

12 When I shall send either Artemas to thee, or Tychicus, to supply thy place in Crete, leave the churches there to his management, and as speedily as possible come to me at Nicopolis, for there I have determined to winter.

13 Diligently supply Zenas the lawyer, and Apollos, (see Acts xviii. 24-28.), with whatever is necessary for their journey, that, in coming to me, nothing which they need may be wanting to them.

14 And, that the expense necessary to such offices may be defrayed, let our disciples in Crete also learn to follow honest trades for supplying what is necessary to themselves, and that they may not be unfruitful in good offices to others.

15 All my fellow-labourers who are with me in Colosse wish thee health. Present my good wishes to them in Crete, who shew their love to me by maintaining the true faith of Christ. The favour and blessing of God be with all of you. Amen.

Ver. 9.—1. And genealogies.]—The genealogies condemned in this and other passages of scripture, in the opinion of Bengelius, are the absurd genealogies of the Æons, taught by the Gnostics. See Col. ii. 8. note. But as the genealogies of the Æons were not invented till long after this epistle was written, I prefer the account given of them in the commentary; the rather that the apostle hath joined genealogies with strifes and fightings about the law. See also 1 Tim. i. 4.

2. Fightings about the law.]—Μαχὰς νομικὰς are those disputes about the efficacy and necessity of obedience to the law in order to salvation, which the Judaizing teachers in Crete maintained, with great violence, against all who asserted that obedience to the gospel alone was sufficient to salvation.

Ver. 10.—1. An heretical man.]—See 2 Pet. ii. 1. note 2. where it is shewed, that an heretic is one who, from worldly motives, teaches doctrines which he knows to be false; as the Judaizers did, who made the rituals enjoined by the law more necessary to salvation than a holy life. He also is a heretic, who from the same motives makes a party in the church, in opposition to those who maintain the truth. In this latter sense some understand ἡρесь here; and think the phrase should be translated, 'A man who maketh a sect;' and that ἡρесь properly is a sect, either in philosophy or religion. In the first age, when the doctrines of the gospel were delivered by the apostles in person, under the guidance of inspiration, and when the true meaning of these doctrines was not liable to any doubt, because it was ascertained by the apostles themselves, if any teacher taught differently from them, and made a party in the church in opposition to them, he must have done these things contrary to his conscience, either from the love of money, or the lust of power, or from an immoderate propensity to sensual pleasure. Hence, Gal. v. 20. heresy is reckoned among 'the works of the flesh.' Doddridge, by heresy, understands the denying the fundamental doctrines of the gospel, and the maintaining of that denial with obstinacy, to the breaking of the peace of the church. But as the apostle saith the heretic 'sinneth, being self-condemned,' I rather think heresy is such an error in opinion as results from pravity in the will. For if a person, after prayer and sincere examination, embraces or rejects opinions in religion, according as they appear to him to be true or false, without being biased by vicious inclinations, can he be blamed, even although he should maintain these opinions with firmness, and suffer for them?

2. After a first and second admonition.]—Some copies want the words and second. But the best and greatest number of MSS., together with the Syriac and Vulgate versions, have these words. See Mill in loc. Νομίζω denotes an admonition which puts a right mind into the person admonished. Titus was not to reject an heretic, till he had tried by a first and second admonition to bring him to repentance, and on trial found him incorrigible.

3. Reject.]—ἡγῶμαι cast him out of the church. In this manner the apostle himself treated Hymenæus and Alexander, 1 Tim. i. 20. By this apostolical Canon, an obstinate heretic, after a first and second admonition without effect, is to be cast out of the church, to prevent the faithful from being led astray by his false doctrines and vicious example.—This method of treating heretics is worthy of attention: For, as Benson observes, the Spirit of God doth not order heretics to be banished, and their goods confiscated, far less doth he order them to be imprisoned, tortured, and burnt, if they will not retract their errors. He doth not even give allowance to rail at, or speak evil of them. Such methods of treating heretics never proceeded from the college of the apostles, but from the synagogue of Satan. To disown a wicked man as a brother Christian, and to avoid all familiar society with him, and to cast him out of the church by a public sentence of excommunication, is what the church, and every society, hath a right to do, agreeably to our Lord's rule, Matt. xviii. 15, 17. and is all that should be done in such a case. See 2 Thess. iii. 14. note 2.

Ver. 11.—1. Knowing that such a person is perverted.]—Estius says, the word εὐστρεφής is commonly applied to buildings, and signifies to be overturned from the foundation. According to others, it signifies to be turned out of the way. Wherefore, when it is said of an heretic that he is perverted, the meaning is, that he is so utterly depraved that there is no hope of his amendment.

2. Being self-condemned.]—Doddridge, who thinks heresy consists in denying the fundamental doctrines of the gospel, interprets self-condemned of the heretic's furnishing by his actions matter of condemnation against himself; just as some are said to condemn others, Matt. xii. 41, 42. Heb. xi. 7. who afford matter for condemning them.—Grotius, Barlow, Hammond, Hallet, Benson, &c. by the heretic's condemning himself, understand his cutting himself off from the church by separation, or otherwise; a punishment which the church inflicts on its faulty or unsound members.—I think this mark of an heretic, that he is self-condemned, implyeth that an heretic is one who teacheth erroneous doctrines knowing them to be erroneous. For as Whitby justly observes, no man who acts according to his judgment, how erroneous soever they may be, is self-condemned by that action.

Ver. 12.—1. When I shall send Artemas to thee, or Tychicus.]—Tychicus is often mentioned in St. Paul's epistles; but of Artemas we know nothing: only from this passage it appears that he was a faithful and able teacher, and fit to supply Titus's place in Crete.

2. Come to me at Nicopolis.]—There were cities of this name in Macedonia on the confines of Thrace, and in Ephesus and Pontus. The one in Ephesus was built opposite to Actium, and named Nicopolis, or the city of victory, in memory of the victory which Augustus obtained over Anthony and Cleopatra. L'Évêque is of opinion that this is the Nicopolis of which the apostle speaks; and that while he wintered there he visited his disciples in Illyricum, Rom. xv. 19. Other commentators think the apostle meant Nicopolis in Macedonia, situated near mount Hæmus on the confines of Thrace. But without settling that point, I observe, that the apostle's determination to winter in Nicopolis, wherever it was, shews that he was at liberty when he wrote this epistle; consequently that it was written in the interval between his first and second imprisonments.

Ver. 13. Zenas the lawyer, and Apollos.]—Zenas is mentioned in this passage only. He is called νομικος, the lawyer, which Jerome interprets Legis Doctorum, a teacher of the law, because he had formerly been of that profession among the Jews. Benson also is of the same opinion; and quotes Matt. xxii. 35. where one of that profession is called νομικος. But others think that Zenas was a Roman lawyer.—It would seem that Zenas and Apollos were to pass through Crete, either in their way to the apostle, or to some place whither he had sent them. He therefore desired Titus to help them forward on their journey, by supplying them with such necessaries as they were in want of, that they might not be retarded.

Ver. 15.—1. Salute them who love us in the faith.]—By this description of the persons in Crete to be saluted in his name, the apostle expressly excluded the Judaizing teachers, on whom he put that mark of disrespect, to make them sensible how much he disapproved of their conduct.

2. Grace be with all of you.]—By the expression 'all of you,' the apostle intimated that this epistle was intended, not for Titus alone, but for the churches in Crete; the members of which were to be taught the things in this letter, and to be exhorted, and even reproved, agreeably to the directions contained in it.

PHILEMON.

PREFACE.

SECT. I.—The History of Philemon.

PHILEMON, to whom this epistle was written, was no stranger to the apostle Paul: for in the first and second verses the apostle addressed all the members of Philemon's family, as well acquainted with them; and, ver. 19. he insinuates that Philemon himself was his convert. Nay, ver. 17. Philemon's respect for the apostle is mentioned. He was an inhabitant of Colosse, as appears from the epistle to the Colossians, chap. iv. 9, where Onesimus, Philemon's slave, is called 'one of them.' And ver. 17. the brethren of Colosse are desired to say to Archippus, (the person mentioned Philem. ver. 2.) 'Take heed to the ministry which thou hast received.'—Besides, the ancients believed that Philemon was an inhabitant of Colosse. So Theodoret says expressly in his commentary on this epistle, and tells us that his house was still remaining in Colosse in his time; that is, in the beginning of the fifth century. And Jerome also, in his commentary on this epistle, says, Philemon was of Colosse; and Theophylact calls him a Phrygian, Oper. tom. 2. p. 861.—For an account of Colosse, see Preface to Colossians.

Philemon seems to have been a person of great worth as a man, and of some note as a citizen in his own country: for his family was so numerous that it made a church by itself; or at least a considerable part of the church at Colosse, ver. 2.—He was likewise so opulent, that he was able, 'by the communication of his faith,' that is, by his beneficence, to refresh the bowels of the saints, ver. 6, 7.—According to Grotius, Philemon was an elder of Ephesus. But Beausobre speaks of him as one of the pastors of Colosse; in which he is followed by Doddridge.—From the apostle's employing Philemon to provide him a lodging in Colosse, Michaelis conjectures that he was one of the deacons there.—These authors were led to think Philemon a minister of the gospel, because in the inscription of this letter the apostle calls him his fellow-labourer. But that appellation is of ambiguous signification; being given not only to those who preached the gospel, but to such pious persons also, whether men or women, as assisted the apostles in any manner while they were employed in preaching. See Rom. xvi. 8. 3 John ver. 8.

The ancients differed as much as the moderns in their opinion concerning Philemon's station in the church. Some of them reckoned him a bishop: but others, fancying that Apphia was his wife, contended that he had no ecclesiastical character whatever; for they began very early to esteem celibacy in ecclesiastical persons. In particular, Hilary the deacon saith expressly that he was one of the laity. Theodoret, Occumenius, and Theophylact seem also to have been of the same opinion. See Whitty's preface to this epistle.

SECT. II.—Of the Occasion on which the Epistle to Philemon was written.

ONESIMUS, a slave, on some disgust, having run away from his master Philemon, came to Rome, and falling into want, as is supposed, he applied to the apostle, of whose imprisonment he had heard, and with whose benevolent disposition he was well acquainted, having, as it seems, formerly seen him in his master's house. Or the fame of the apostle's preaching and miracles having drawn Onesimus to hear some of the many discourses which he delivered in his own hired house in Rome, these made such an impression on him, that he became a sincere convert to the Christian faith: For the apostle calls him, ver. 9, 'his son, whom he had begotten in his bonds.' After his conversion Onesimus abode with the apostle, and served him with the greatest assiduity and affection. But being sensible of his fault in running away from his master, he wished to repair that injury by returning to him. At the same time, being afraid that on his return his master would inflict on him the punishment which, by the law or custom of Phrygia, was due to a fugitive slave, and which, as Grotius says, he could inflict without applying to any magistrate, he besought the apostle to write to Philemon, requesting him to forgive and to receive him again into his family. The apostle, always ready to do good offices, very willingly complied with Onesimus's desire, and wrote this letter to Philemon, in which, with the greatest softness of expression, warmth of affection, and delicacy of address, he not only interceded for Onesimus's pardon, but urged Philemon to esteem him, and put confidence in him, as a sincere Christian.—And because restitution, by repairing the injury that had been done, restores the person who did the injury to the character which he had lost, the apostle, to enable Onesimus to appear in Philemon's family with some degree of reputation, bound himself in this epistle, by his handwriting, not only to repay all that Onesimus owed to Philemon, but to make full reparation also for whatever injury he had done to him by running away from him.

To account for the solicitude which the apostle shewed in this affair, we must not, with some, suppose that Philemon was keen and obstinate in his resentments; but rather, that having a number of slaves, on whom the pardoning of Onesimus too easily might have had a bad effect, he might judge some punishment necessary for a warning to the rest. At least the apostle could not have considered the pardoning of Onesimus as a matter which merited so much earnest entreaty, with a person of Philemon's piety, benevolence, and gratitude, unless he had suspected him to have entertained some such apprehension.

Many are of opinion that Onesimus robbed his master before he ran off. But of this there is no evidence; unless we think the expression, ver. 18, 'If he hath injured thee any thing,' contains an insinuation of that sort. But the apostle might mean, injured thee by the loss of his service. The words will fairly bear that interpretation. Why then, as Lardner observes, impute crimes to men without proof!—What the apostle wrote to Philemon on this occasion is highly worthy of our notice; namely, that although he had great need of an affectionate honest servant to minister to him in his bonds, such as Onesimus was, who had expressed a great inclination to stay with him; and although, if Onesimus had remained with him, he would only have discharged the duty which Philemon himself owed to his spiritual father; yet the apostle would by no means detain Onesimus without Philemon's leave; because it belonged to him to dispose of his own slave in the way he thought proper. Such was the apostle's regard to justice, and to the rights of mankind!

Whether Philemon pardoned Onesimus, or punished him, is not known. Only, from the earnestness with which the apostle solicited his pardon, and from the generosity and goodness of Philemon's disposition, we may conjecture that he actually pardoned Onesimus, and even gave him his freedom, in compliance with the apostle's insinuation, as it is interpreted by some, that 'he would do more than he had asked.' For it was no uncommon thing, in ancient times, to bestow freedom on such slaves as had obtained the esteem and good-will of their masters by their faithful services.

SECT. III.—Of the Authenticity and Use of St. Paul's Epistle to Philemon.

JEROME, in his preface to this epistle, says, "Volunt aut epistolam non esse Pauli; ant etiam si Pauli sit, nihil habere quod nos edificare possit. Et a plerisque veteribus repudiatum, dum commendandi tantum scriberetur officio, non docendi." But Chrysostom in his preface hath shewed several excellent uses which may be made of this epistle; two of which, as they are of great importance, I shall mention.—The first is, In this epistle the apostle hath left to churchmen an excellent example of charity, in endeavouring to mitigate the resentment of one in a superior station towards his inferior, who had injured him; and in endeavouring to restore the inferior to the favour of the other, which he had lost through his unfaithfulness—and that not only by arguments drawn from reason, but by generously binding himself to repay all the loss which the superior had sustained by the injury of the inferior.—The second use which may be made of this epistle is equally excellent. It sets before churchmen of the highest dignity a proper example of attention to the people under their care, and of affectionate concern for their welfare, which, if it were imitated, would not fail to recommend them to the esteem and love of their people; consequently would give them a greater capacity of doing them good.—I add some other uses; namely, that although no article of faith be professedly handled in this epistle, and no precepts for the regulation of our conduct be directly delivered in it, yet the allusions to the doctrines and precepts of the gospel found in it, may be improved in various respects for regulating our conduct. For it is therein insinuated, 1. That all Christians are on a level. Onesimus the slave, on becoming a Christian, is the apostle's son and Philemon's brother.—2. That Christianity makes no alteration in men's political state. Onesimus the slave did not become a freeman by embracing Christianity, but was still obliged to be Philemon's slave for ever, unless his master gave him his freedom.—3. That slaves should not be taken nor detained from their masters, without their master's consent, ver. 13, 14.—4. That we should not condemn persons of low estate, nor disdain to help the meanest when it is in our power to assist them, but should love and do good to all men.—5. That where an injury hath been done, restitution is due, unless the injured party gives up his claim.—6. That we should forgive sinners who are penitent, and be heartily reconciled to them.—7. That we should never despair of reclaiming the wicked, but do every thing in our power to convert them.

The anxiety which the apostle shewed for the welfare of Onesimus, in return for his affectionate services, could not fail to cherish good dispositions in the breast of Philemon.—Nor is it possible, even at this day, so long after Philemon and his slave are both gone, to read this letter without experiencing, in some measure, the same happy effect.

In the mean time, if this epistle had served no other purpose but to shew the world what sort of man the apostle Paul was in private life, it would justly have merited a place in the canon of scripture. For in it the writer hath displayed qualities which by men are held in the greatest estimation; such as an high spirit arising from a consciousness of his own dignity, consummate prudence, uncommon generosity, the warmest friendship, the most skilful address, and the greatest politeness as well as purity of manners; qualities not to be found either in an enthusiast or in an impostor.—Doddridge observes, "That this epistle, considered as a mere human composition, is a masterpiece of its kind. For, if it is compared with an epistle of Pliny, supposed to have been written on a similar occasion, Lib. ix. epist. 21, that epistle, though penned by one who was reckoned to excel in the epistolary style, and though it has undoubtedly many beauties, will be found by persons of taste much inferior to this animated composition of the apostle Paul."

SECT. IV.—Of the Time and Place of Writing the Epistle to Philemon.

THAT this epistle was written from Rome about the time the epistle to the Colossians was written, may be gathered from the following circumstances:—Like the epistle to the Colossians, this was written when the apostle was in bonds, ver. 1. 10. 13. 23, and when he had good hopes of obtaining his liberty, ver. 22.—Timothy joined Paul in both epistles.—Epaphroditus, Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, and Luke, joined in the salutations in both.—Lastly, Onesimus, the bearer of this, was one of the messengers by whom the epistle to the Colossians was sent, Col. iv. 9.—But if the epistle to Philemon was written about the time the epistle to the Colossians was sent, it must have been written at Rome in the end of A. D. 61, or in the beginning of 62.

Onesimus, in the apostle's letter to the Colossians, having been particularly recommended to their notice, Col. iv. 9. it cannot be doubted, that they cheerfully received him into their church.—In the Apostolical Constitutions, Lib. viii. c. 4. 6, Onesimus is said to have been bishop of Beroa. But that writing is of little authority.—When Ignatius wrote his epistle to the Ephesians, their bishop's name was Onesimus; and Grotius thought he was the person for whom St. Paul interceded. But, as Lardner observes, that is not certain. Mill has mentioned a copy, in which, at the conclusion, it is said, that Onesimus died a martyr at Rome, by having his legs broken.

NEW TRANSLATION.

VER. 1. Paul, confined with a chain for Christ Jesus, and Timothy⁸ our brother,⁸ to Philemon the beloved, and our fellow-labourer,⁴

COMMENTARY.

VER. 1. Paul, confined with a chain for preaching Christ Jesus to the Gentiles, and Timothy our brother minister, to Philemon the beloved of us both, and our fellow-labourer in the gospel,

VER. 1.—1. Confined with a chain for Christ Jesus.]—Δεσμένος ὑπὲρ τοῦ Χριστοῦ. This is the genitive of the object, Ess. iv. 24.—Or it may be the genitive of possession, and be translated, 'a prisoner belonging to Christ Jesus.' But as the word prisoner does not convey a just idea of Paul's state at that time, detenus is more properly translated, 'confined with a chain.' For an account of the manner in which the apostle was confined at Rome, see Eph. vi. 20, note. In writing to Philemon, Paul did not call himself an apestle, because he wrote only in the character of a friend, to request a favour, rather than to enjoin what was fit, ver. 8, 9.

2. And Timothy.]—In the preface to St. Paul's epistle to the Colossians, sect. 1, it was shewed, that the Colossians were converted by Paul. Wherefore, if Timothy assisted him in that work, being known to Philemon, he very properly joined Paul in this letter, to signify that he joined him in this request, as well as in his testimony concerning the good disposition of Onesimus.

2 And to Apphia the beloved, and to Archippus our fellow-soldier,² and to the church (κκ) in thy house :

3 Grace be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and FROM the Lord Jesus Christ.

4 I give thanks to my God¹ always, when I make mention of thee in my prayers,

5 Having heard³ of thy love and faith which thou hast (αρε) toward the Lord Jesus, and (α) to all the saints.

6 I PRAY that the communication of thy faith may be effectual,¹ (α) to the acknowledgment of every good thing which is in you,² (α) toward Christ Jesus.

7 For we have much joy and consolation in thy love, because the bowels¹ of the saints are refreshed by thee, brother.²

8 (Δο) Wherefore, though I might be much bold in Christ to enjoin thee¹ what is fit ;

9 Yet, for love's sake I rather beseech, being such an one as Paul the aged,¹ and now also (δεσμε) one confined with a chain for Jesus Christ :

10 I beseech¹ thee for my son, whom I begat in my bonds, EVEN Onesimus ;²

2 And to Apphia the beloved of all who know her, and to Archippus our fellow-soldier, and to that part of the church at Colosse which is in thy house : (see Rom. xvi. 6. note 1.)

3 We wish increase of the favour of God, and of good dispositions to you, and happiness temporal and eternal, from God our Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ.

4 I Paul give thanks to my God always, when I make mention of thee, Philemon, in my prayers, (see 2 Tim. i. 3. note 3.)

5 Having heard of the increase of thy love and faith which thou hast towards the Lord Jesus, and to all who are styled saints, because they believe on and worship the true God in sincerity.

6 Also I pray, that the communication of the fruits of thy faith to the saints, in the many good offices which thou dost to them, may be effectual for bringing others to the acknowledgment of every good disposition which is in you towards the members of Christ.

7 For we ourselves have much joy and consolation in thy love, more particularly because the bowels of the saints are refreshed by thee, brother : Thy house is open to them ; thy riches are a relief to all the saints.

8 Wherefore, though I might be very bold, as an apostle in the church of Christ, to enjoin thee, his disciple, to do what is fit in the affair I am going to mention ;

9 Yet, instead of using my authority, by that love which thou bearest to the saints and to me I rather beseech thee, who am such an one as Paul, thy friend, grown old in the service of the gospel ; and now also confined with a chain for preaching Jesus Christ :

10 By all these considerations I beseech thee for my son, whom I begat in my bonds, and who, on that account, is very dear to me, even Onesimus ;

3. Our brother.]—So the apostle called Timothy, to add dignity to his character.

4. And our fellow-labourer.]—This sheweth that Paul and Philemon were personally known to each other.

Ver. 2.—1. And to Apphia the beloved, and to Archippus.]—These persons being mentioned after Philemon, and before the church in his house, it is a presumption, as the commentators observe, that they were his relations, lived in family with him, and made a part of the church in his house. Because Apphia is mentioned before Archippus a minister of the gospel, some of the fathers conjecture that Apphia was Philemon's wife. Lightfoot saith Archippus was his son.

2. Our fellow-soldier.]—See Philip. ii. 25. note 1. By addressing this letter, not only to Philemon, but to Apphia also, and Archippus, and to the church in Philemon's house, and by wishing them all manner of felicity, the apostle interested the whole of Philemon's family to aid him in his solicitation for Onesimus.

Ver. 4. I give thanks to my God, &c.]—By telling Philemon that he thanked God always in his prayers for his increasing faith and love, he in a very delicate manner prepared him for listening to the request he was about to make in behalf of Onesimus. For it was a telling him, in an indirect manner, that his own benevolent disposition would lead him to pardon Onesimus, although he had greatly offended him.

Ver. 5. Heard of thy love and faith, which thou hast toward the Lord Jesus and to all the saints.]—By a transposition not uncommon to the most elegant writings, love here refers to the saints, and faith to the Lord Jesus. See Matt. xii. 22. 1 Cor. vi. 11.—Mill mentions some ancient MSS. and versions which read in this verse, 'Heard of thy faith and love, which thou hast toward the Lord Jesus and to all the saints.' From the expression, 'Heard of thy love,' &c. some have inferred that the apostle was not personally acquainted with Philemon. But that no such inference can be drawn from this expression, see proved Ephes. i. 16. note 1.

Ver. 6.—1. I pray that the communication, &c.]—Benson and Bengelius are of opinion, that the words α to the saints do not mean Philemon's imparting the fruits of his faith to others, but his partaking of faith in common with other Christians. But if the words α to the saints, to the saints, are supplied from the foregoing verse, after the words thy faith in this verse, it will afford a meaning more agreeable to the scope of the apostle's discourse. For by a common metonymy, faith may signify the fruits of faith ; and α to the saints, construed with a dative of the person, often signifies the imparting of a thing to others. See 1 John i. 3. note 3. where the different meanings of α are given ; also Rom. xii. 13. Gal. vi. 6. where α signifies to distribute or impart to another.

2. To the acknowledgment of every good thing which is in you.]—By using the word you, the apostle praised all the members of Philemon's family for their works of charity to the saints ; but more especially Philemon himself ; as it is here insinuated, that his family were led to do these benevolent offices in imitation of him.

Ver. 7.—1. The bowels of the saints are refreshed.]—If by 'the bowels of the saints,' the apostle meant the saints themselves, the refreshment of which he speaks was produced by the relief which Philemon's works of charity brought to them in their distresses. And the saints who were thus refreshed, were not those alone who lived in Philemon's neighbourhood, but those also who were driven from their homes for the name of Christ, or who went about preaching the gospel. Perhaps also the apostle meant, that the knowledge of Philemon's charitable actions gave great joy, even to the saints who had no need of his good offices. This joy, as well as the relief above mentioned, is fitly compared by the apostle to the refreshment which a person faint with thirst receives from drink. See verse 20, note 2.

2. By thee, brother.]—The apostle calls Philemon his brother, not merely because he was a Christian, but because he was a Christian of the same good dispositions with himself, and one whom he tenderly loved. By placing this appellation in the end of the sentence, he gave it an engaging emphasis ; so that it could not fail to make a strong impression on Philemon's mind.

Ver. 8. Wherefore, though I might be much bold in Christ to enjoin thee, &c.]—The apostle's management in this part of his letter is excellent. He tells Philemon, that although, as an apostle of Christ, he might have commanded him to do what was fit in the affair he was about to mention, he would not use his authority, but rather beseech him as a friend to do it. And to persuade him, he suggested such things as one friend might with propriety mention to another, of whom he was asking a favour. The person who besought Philemon, was Paul, who, as we shall see immediately, was his spiritual father ; Paul grown old in the service of the gospel ; and Paul now also confined with a chain for preaching Christ : considerations which must have made a deep impression on Philemon, who, being himself a sincere Christian, could not but wish to gratify one who, at the expense of unspeakable labour and suffering, had done the greatest service to mankind, by communicating to them the knowledge of the gospel.

Ver. 9. Being such an one as Paul the aged.]—Although at the time of the stoning of Stephen, Paul is said to have been a young man, Acts vii. 58, it does not imply that he was then a mere youth. The witnesses laying their clothes at his feet, and his immediately taking an active part in persecuting the disciples, but especially his receiving a commission for that purpose from the chief priests, are proofs that he possessed both judgment and experience. Wherefore, at the stoning of Stephen he may have been thirty years old ; at which age he might very properly be called a young man. See Pref. to 1 Tim. sect. 2.—Between the death of Stephen and Paul's conversion some time elapsed. From the time of his conversion to the writing of this letter, he had laboured in the gospel near thirty years : So that, being now sixty years old or more, he was really an aged person. Benson following Theophylact says, α in this passage has the signification of α, as an ambassador ; and in support of his opinion he cites some passages from the LXX. and from the Apocrypha.

Ver. 10.—1. I beseech thee.]—There is a beautiful emphasis in the repetition of the words I beseech, which he had introduced in the preceding verse.

2. For my son, whom I begat in my bonds, even Onesimus.]—Onesimus's name in the end of this sentence has a fine effect, by keeping the reader in suspense. This every person of taste must perceive. The apostle would not so much as mention Onesimus's name till he had prepared Philemon for hearing it ; and when he does mention it, instead of calling him a fugitive slave, or even a slave simply, he calls him his own son ; to shew that he had a tender affection for him, and was much interested in his welfare. And then, by telling Philemon that 'he had begotten him in his bonds,' he insinuated, that Onesimus was not discouraged from becoming a Christian by the apostle's bonds. Being therefore a firm believer, he was not unworthy of the pardon the apostle so-litted for him.—In this beautiful passage there is a group of the most affecting arguments closely crowded together. On the one hand, we have Philemon's own reputation for goodness; his friendship to the apostle; his respect for his character: reverence for his age; compassion for his bonds; and at the same time an insinuation of that obedience which Philemon owed to him as an apostle. On the other hand, we have Onesimus's repentance, and return to virtue; his profession of the Christian religion, notwithstanding the evils to which it exposed him; and his being the object of his spiritual father's tenderest affection. In short, every word contains an argument. Philemon therefore must have been exceedingly affected by this moving passage.

Ver. 11.—1. Who formerly was to thee unprofitable.—The apostle, with admirable address, gives the softest name possible to Onesimus's misbehaviour; because he did not choose that Philemon should fix his thoughts on the heinous nature of his slave's offence, lest it might have inflamed his resentment too much.

2. But now will be very profitable to thee, even as to me.—To shew the sincerity of Onesimus's repentance, the apostle mentioned the experience which he himself had had of his good disposition, in the many affectionate services which he had received from him during his confinement. After such a proof, Philemon could have no doubt of Onesimus's virtue and fidelity.—Doddridge, Bengelius, and others, think the name Onesimus, which comes from the verb οὐνεω, signifying to profit, was given to slaves by way of good omen, to express the advantage they were to bring to their masters by their services; and that in this passage there is an allusion to the signification of Onesimus's name. See ver. 20. note 1.—But it is of more importance to observe, that the apostle, by mentioning the change wrought on Onesimus by the pains he had taken in converting him, insinuated to Philemon the obligation he lay under to him, for having made his unprofitable slave a faithful and affectionate servant to him for life.

Ver. 12. That is to say, mine own bowels;—one whom I consider as a part of myself.—As Bengelius observes, by laying aside his apostolical authority, St. Paul had brought himself to a level with Philemon. And now to exalt Onesimus, and to display that dignity which a man acquires by becoming a sincere Christian, he calls him not his own simply, but his own bowels; or, as it is expressed ver. 17, his very self.

Ver. 13. That in thy stead he might have ministered to me in these bonds for the gospel.—Here the apostle insinuated to Philemon, the obligation he was under to assist him with his personal services, who was his spiritual father; and more especially while he was confined with a chain for preaching the gospel of Christ.

Ver. 14.—1. But without thy mind I would do nothing.—From this we learn, that however just our title may be to beneficent actions from others, they must not be forced to perform them. They must do them voluntarily.

2. That thy good deed might not be as by constraint, but as voluntary.—If Onesimus had remained with the apostle in Rome, and Philemon had pardoned him at the apostle's intercession, that favour would not have appeared so clearly to have been bestowed voluntarily, as when Onesimus returned and put himself in his master's 11 Who, I acknowledge, formerly was to thee an unprofitable slave, but now, having embraced the gospel, he will, by his faithful affectionate services, be very profitable to thee, even as he has been to me since his conversion.

12 Him I have sent back to thee at his own desire. Do thou therefore receive him into thy family; that is to say, receive one who is mine own bowels; my son; a part of me.

13 Being so useful to me, I wished to detain him with myself, that, in thy stead, he might have performed those offices to me in these bonds for the gospel, which thou thyself wouldst have performed if thou hadst been in Rome.

14 But, whatever title I had to his service, on account of what thou owest to me as an apostle of Christ suffering for the gospel, without knowing thy mind, whose slave he is, I would do nothing to engage him to stay with me; that thy good deed in pardoning him might not be as extorted, but as proceeding from thy own good-will.

15 To mitigate thy resentment consider, that perhaps also for this reason he was separated from thee for a little while, (so πρὸς γὰρ signifies, 1 Thess. ii. 17. note 2.), that thou mightest have him thy slave for life;

16 No longer as a slave only, but above a slave, even a beloved Christian brother; especially to me who know his worth, and have been indebted to him for his services: How much more to thee, as a brother both by nation and by religion, who will serve thee with more understanding, fidelity, and affection, than before?

17 If then thou hold me as a partaker of thy affection, give him the same reception which thou wouldst give to myself.

18 And if he hath injured thee any thing by running away, or oweth thee in the way of borrowing, place it all to my account.

19 And to entitle thee to payment, I Paul have written with mine own hand, I will repay thee all. This I have done, that, in urging thee to pardon Onesimus, I may not say to thee, thou owest to me even thine own self besides.

power, and was received again into his family. The apostle, therefore, sent him back to Philemon, that his receiving him might be known to have proceeded from his own merciful disposition.

Ver. 15.—1. For this reason (ὡς γὰρ) he was separated:—A soft expression to denote Onesimus's running away from his master; for it contains an insinuation, that this had happened providentially. See the following note.

2. That thou mightest have him for ever.—The word ἀεὶ may be translated for life; which I take to be the apostle's meaning. But Estius thinks it signifies Philemon's having Onesimus as a brother for ever; the relation between Christians as brethren, being to continue in the next world.—The apostle here made the same kind of apology for Onesimus, which Joseph made for his brethren, Gen. xlv. 5. 'Now therefore be not grieved.—For God did send me before you to preserve life.'—The providence of God often brings good out of evil. Yet we should not for that reason do evil that good may come. By telling Philemon, that he would now have Onesimus for ever, the apostle intimated to him his firm persuasion, that Onesimus would never any more run away from him.

Ver. 16.—1. Above a slave, a beloved brother, especially to me.—That Philemon might not be offended at him for calling his fugitive slave his brother, the apostle acknowledged him for his own brother also; because, from the time of his conversion, Onesimus had the same father with the apostle, and with all believers. Next, he told Philemon, that he much more ought to acknowledge Onesimus as a brother, because he stood in that relation to him 'in the flesh,' as well as 'in the Lord.'—In this passage the apostle teaches us, that love is due to persons in the meanest stations who are eminently virtuous.

2. Both in the flesh and in the Lord.—By calling Onesimus Philemon's brother 'in the flesh,' the apostle meant that he was of the same nation with Philemon; or perhaps some way related to him: as by calling him his brother 'in the Lord,' he meant that he was now of the same religion with Philemon.

Ver. 18. If he hath injured thee any thing.—This is a soft way of expressing the loss which Philemon had sustained by being deprived of his slave's service. See Pref. sect. 2 paragr. 3.

Ver. 19.—1. I Paul have written with mine own hand, &c.—According to Jerome, this implies, that Paul wrote the whole letter with his own hand. And some moderns, who are of the same opinion, think he took that trouble to shew Philemon his earnestness to have Onesimus pardoned. But, be that as it may, the apostle's writing with his own hand, that he would repay Philemon for any injury his fugitive slave had done him, teaches us the necessity of restitution, in all cases of injury.

2. Thou owest to me even thine own self besides.—Πρὸς γὰρ ἐγώ, ταῦτα οὐκ ἔστιν: So Erasmus and Raphael translate the word. The apostle means, that besides pardoning Onesimus, Philemon owed him his very existence as a Christian. He had opened his eyes, and turned him from the darkness of heathenism to the light of the gospel, and from the power of Satan to be ruled by God, that he might receive the forgiveness of his sins, and an inheritance in heaven. What an immense obligation! Yet, rather than be constrained to solicit Onesimus's pardon on account of that obligation, he would

20 Yea, brother, let me have profit from thee in the Lord. Refresh my bowels in the Lord. (See ver. 7. note.)

21 Having confidence in thy obedience,¹ I have written to thee, knowing that thou wilt even do (ὡς ἐπαγγελία, 55.) more than I ask.²

22 But at the same time prepare me also a lodging:¹ for I hope that, through your prayers,² I shall be bestowed on you.³

23 There salute thee, Epaphras,¹ (ἐπαφρας;) my fellow-prisoner for Jesus Christ;²

himself pay to Philemon every thing Onesimus owed him. After all this, how ungrateful would Philemon have showed himself, if he had refused to grant the apostle's request!

Ver. 20.—1. Yea, brother, let me have profit from thee.]—ἵνα ὠφεληθῶ. Some commentators think the apostle here alludes to the signification of Onesimus's name, mentioned in note 2. on ver. 11. But such an allusion, in a sentence so pathetic, would have been absolutely trifling. The emphasis lies in the expression, 'Yea, brother,' for it means, what I say, brother, is true; thou owest to me thine existence as a Christian; 'let me have profit from thee in the Lord,' profit suitable to thy Christian profession. Perhaps the apostle in this insinuated, that if Philemon pardoned Onesimus, he would consider himself as overpaid for having brought him to the knowledge of God, although he should require him to fulfil his obligation to pay what Onesimus owed him. Others translate ναὶ, ἀδελφε, 'I beseech thee, brother.'

2. Refresh my bowels.]—ἀνακαταρτίσω τὰς σπλάγχνας; literally, appease or quiet my bowels. See Kas. iv. 34. My bowels yearn to Onesimus. Remove my anxiety concerning him whom I so tenderly love, by pardoning him, and receiving him again into thy family.—Because the apostle had called Onesimus 'his bowels,' ver. 12. some are of opinion that he here entreated Philemon to refresh Onesimus by cheerfully pardoning him. But the first interpretation is more natural.

Ver. 21.—1. In thy obedience.]—By this expression the apostle insinuated to Philemon, that being so good a Christian, and so generous a person, he hoped he would consider his doing what was requested of him as a duty which he owed to Christ, and would perform it with pleasure. Or, if this gloss is not admitted, obedience here may be translated compliance.

2. Thou wilt do even more than I ask.]—According to some commentators, it is here insinuated to Philemon, that it would be proper for him to give Onesimus his freedom: And many are of opinion that he actually did so. But to others it does not seem probable, that in a letter written to solicit a pardon for Onesimus, the apostle would so much as insinuate that Philemon ought to make him a freeman.

Ver. 22.—1. Prepare me also a lodging.]—The apostle having experienced the advantage of having a hired house of his own in Rome, where he preached the gospel to all who came to him, very prudently desired Philemon to provide for him such another house in Colosse, and not a lodging in Philemon's own house, as some suppose. It seems he proposed to stay awhile in Colosse, and wished to have a house in some frequented part of the city, to receive conveniently all who might be desirous of information concerning his doctrine.—Theodoret observes, that the apostle's resolution to visit Philemon soon, signified to him in this letter, naturally added weight to his solicitation in behalf of Onesimus.

2. Through your prayers.]—The efficacy which in scripture is ascribed to prayer, is a great encouragement to the people of God to have recourse to prayer in all their straits, agreeably to the exhortation and example of Christ and his apostles. But to render prayer effectual, it must, as James observes, chap. 1. 6. be offered in faith; that is, in a full persuasion of the goodness and power of God, and with an entire submission to his will. The apostle, by expressing his hope that God would grant him his liberty through the prayers of Philemon and his family, had insinuated that they were pious Christians and worthy persons, for whom God had a great regard. On this passage Whitby justly observes, that if the apostle believed the prayers of angels and departed saints were effectual for procuring blessings to the saints on earth, it is strange that he hath not, throughout the whole of his epistles, so much as once addressed any prayers to them, nor directed others to pray to them!

3. I shall be bestowed on you.]—I remark here, that as Paul expressed this hope likewise in his epistle to the Philippians, chap. ii. 23, 24. but not in his epistle to the Colossians, it is a presumption that Philemon was an inhabitant of Colosse, who would impart the good news to the brethren there. Because the apostle does not say to Philemon and the Christians in his house, as he said to the Hebrews, chap. xiii. 19. 'I shall be restored to you,' Estius infers that St. Paul never had been in Colosse. But the inference is not just. The apostle wrote in the same manner to the Philippians, whom he had visited often: Phil. ii. 24. 'I am fully persuaded by the Lord, that even I myself shall come soon.'

20 Yea, brother, it is really so. Let me have profit from thee as a sincere Christian: By forgiving Onesimus, refresh my bowels in the Lord. It is all the recompense I desire for having converted thee: I seek not thy money nor thy goods.

21 Do not, from my earnestness, fancy that I entertain any suspicion of thy goodness. On the contrary, having confidence in thy obedience, I have written this to thee, being persuaded that thou wilt even do more for Onesimus than I ask.

22 But at the same time that I beseech thee to pardon Onesimus, I request thee also to prepare me a lodging in Colosse; for I hope that, through the prayers of thee and thy family, I shall be released and bestowed on you: in which case I propose to stay some time at Colosse.

23 The following brethren send thee their salutation: Epaphras, who is a prisoner here, as I am, for preaching Christ Jesus to the Gentiles, 24 Mark, Barnabas's sister's son, (Col. iv. 10.), Aristarchus, Demas, and Luke, my fellow-labourers in the gospel.

Farther, since in this letter the apostle is not speaking to the Colossians, but to Philemon, if any inference were to be drawn from his not having said restored to you, it would not be, that he never had been in company with the Colossians, but with Philemon and his family. Yet even this inference, every one must be sensible, is ill-founded, who considers the style of the apostle's letter to Philemon, which is plainly that of a person well acquainted with Philemon, who had converted him to the Christian faith, and who was in intimate habits of friendship with him; as was observed, Preface to Philemon, sect. 1. Constrained by this argument, Estius found himself obliged to acknowledge that the apostle was acquainted with Philemon. Only, to support his favourite notion, that the apostle had not been in Colosse when he wrote this letter, he supposes, without a shadow of proof, that he converted Philemon in Ephesus.

Ver. 23.—1. There salute thee Epaphras.]—This person is called, Col. i. 7. 'the faithful minister of Christ,' from whom the Colossians, 'after they heard and knew the grace of God, had learned the gospel.' He is likewise called 'one of themselves,' chap. iv. 12. 'who had a great zeal for them,' ver. 13. I think therefore he was a converted Gentile, who had assisted the apostle in preaching at Colosse, and was ordained by him to the office of the ministry in that church.

2. My fellow-prisoner for Christ Jesus.]—The apostle mentioned his bonds, in this short epistle, no fewer than five times, ver. 1. 9. 10. 13. 23. to insinuate, that if he suffered such hardships in order to give mankind the knowledge of the gospel, Philemon should not think it a great matter if, for the honour of the gospel, he laid aside his resentment, and pardoned Onesimus.—The apostle informed Philemon that Epaphras was his fellow-prisoner, to raise him in Philemon's esteem; and perhaps to insinuate that he joined him in his request for Onesimus, as I suppose the others here mentioned as saluting Philemon likewise did.

Ver. 24.—1. Aristarchus.]—This person is one of those who sent their salutations to the Colossians. See Coloss. iv. 10. note 1. for his character. He is there called the apostle's fellow-prisoner. But as that particular is not mentioned here, it is conjectured that he had obtained his liberty about this time.

2. Demas.]—He afterwards forsook the apostle, during his second confinement, from love to the present world. See 2 Tim. iv. 10. note 1.

3. Luke.]—He is called the beloved physician, Col. iv. 14. For his character, see the note on that verse. He is generally believed to have been the author of the gospel which bears his name, and of the history of the Acts of the Apostles.—Having in Prelim. Observ. vii. prefixed to the Harmony of the Gospels, given an account of Luke's gospel, I think it may be useful to add here, concerning his history of the Acts of the Apostles, That, setting aside the consideration of its inspiration, as an history of the first planting of the Christian religion in the world, it is a valuable work, both on account of the variety and importance of the transactions recorded in it, and on account of the manner in which they are related. For the circumstances of each transaction are selected with judgment, and told in a simplicity and elegance of language truly admirable. And the whole is comprised in a short but conspicuous narration, which cannot fail to give pleasure to every reader who is a judge of elegant writing.—Further, the Acts being an history of persons who travelled through the most civilized and best known provinces of the Roman empire, for the purpose of preaching the gospel, the historian was naturally led to mention a variety of particulars relating to the geography of these countries, to their political state at that time, to the persons who governed them, and to the manners of the inhabitants. The learned, therefore, from the time of the publication of this history, have had an opportunity of examining all these particulars; and, on the most accurate investigation, they have found them confirmed by the contemporary heathen writers of the best credit, whose writings still remain. Nor is this all. In the Acts there are speeches recorded, said to have been pronounced by persons of the highest character and rank, which are not like the speeches in most other ancient histories, the production of the historian's own imagination, but the real speeches of the persons to whom they are attributed—such as the speeches delivered by the apostle Peter on different occasions; by Gamaliel, an eminent Jewish doctor; by the protomartyr Stephen, when arraigned before the Sanhedrim; by the apostle Paul in the synagogue of Antioch, and to the Lystrians, and to the senate of the Aroepagus at Athens, and to the Sanhedrim: also a letter of Clandius Lysias to the governor Felix; and a speech of the orator Tertullus in accusation of Paul, before the same Felix; Paul's answer to that accusation; Festus the governor's speech to king Agrippa, the chief captains, and principal men of Cæsarea, assembled to hear Paul; Paul's defence, pronounced in the hearing of that august assembly. In all which, the characters, and sentiments, and style of the different speakers, are so distinctly marked, that no one who reads them, and is capable to judge of such matters, can doubt their being genuine.—These circumstances united, form a convincing proof that the history of the Acts was written, as it professeth to be, by a person who was present at most of the transactions which he hath recorded. And with respect to such of the speeches as he had not an opportunity of hearing, they may have been made known to him by those who heard them, or by inspiration. However, not to insist on this, Luke's history of the Acts of the Apostles contains more internal marks of authenticity than any ancient heathen history extant. So that, considering it merely as an human composition, it is by far the most valuable ancient monument of the kind which the world at present is in possession of.

Ver. 26. Be with your spirit.]—If the interpretation of this expression given in the commentary is not admitted, it may mean be with you simply. The word vous, your, being plural, it signifies that the apostle's wish did not respect Philemon alone, but all the persons mentioned in the inscription of this letter.

HEBREWS.

PREFACE.

I AM authenticity of the epistle to the Hebrews having been disputed, both in ancient and modern times, it will be necessary, before other matters are introduced, to state fairly, and to examine impartially, the arguments on each side of the question, that we may know where the greatest weight of evidence lieth. This is the more necessary, not only because the chief doctrines of the gospel are more expressly asserted, and more fully explained in the epistle to the Hebrews than in any other of the inspired writings, but because these doctrines are confirmed in that epistle by testimonies brought from the writings of Moses and the Prophets. Wherefore, if the authenticity of the epistle to the Hebrews is established, and it is shewed to be the production of an inspired apostle, the peculiar doctrines of the gospel being confirmed therein by the Jewish, as well as by the Christian revelation, they will appear in so clear a light, that the controversies concerning them, which have so long divided the church, ceasing, greater unity of faith and love, it is to be hoped, will at length take place, than hath hitherto subsisted among the disciples of Christ.

SECT. I.—Of the Author of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

ALTHOUGH the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews hath in no part of it introduced his own name, we are certain, that the persons to whom it was sent were at no loss to know who he was. For in three passages of the epistle, as well as by the messenger who carried it, he made himself known to the Hebrews to be the apostle Paul. The first is, chap. x. 34. 'Ye suffered with me in my bonds;' alluding to some assistance which the Hebrews had given to Paul during his imprisonments in Jerusalem and Cæsarea. See, however, chap. x. 34. note 1.—The second passage is, chap. xiii. 18. 'Pray for us.—19. And I the more earnestly beseech you to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner.' A request of this kind, from an unknown person, would have been perfectly ridiculous.—The third passage is, chap. xiii. 23. 'Know that our brother Timothy is sent away, with whom, if he come soon, I will see you.' For, as Timothy was often called by Paul his brother, (2 Cor. i. 1. Col. i. 1.), and was known, not only in the Gentile countries, but in Judea, to be Paul's constant companion, by telling the Hebrews that his brother Timothy was sent away on some errand, and by promising, if he returned soon, to bring him with him when he visited them, this writer clearly discovered himself to be the apostle Paul. But if the Hebrews knew that the letter which they received was written by Paul, we may very well suppose, with Hallet, that as often as they had occasion to speak of their letter, they would speak also of its author; and that the persons to whom they spake of him would, in like manner, hand down his name to those who came after them.

Since, therefore, the writer of this epistle, from the time it was delivered to the Hebrews, must have been known by tradition to be Paul, it is reasonable to expect that it would have been quoted as his by some of the authors of the first age.—Nevertheless, in the most ancient Christian writings now remaining, this epistle is not quoted at all till the end of the second century; at which time it began to be mentioned by some, whilst it was overlooked by others. This silence of the ancients was in a great measure owing, I imagine, to the Hebrews themselves, who were at no pains to make their letter known to the Gentiles, supposing that it had little or no relation to them.—If the reader desires to know who of the ancients have quoted this epistle, and who have neglected to mention it, he will find a full account of both in Hallet's introduction to this epistle, and in Lardner on the Canon, vol. ii. p. 331.—To his account Lardner subjoins the following historical remark: "It is evident that this epistle was generally received, in ancient times, by those Christians who used the Greek language, and lived in the eastern parts of the Roman Empire.—In particular, Clement of Alexandria, before the end of the second century, received this epistle as Paul's, and quoted it as his frequently, and without any doubt or hesitation." Concerning the Latins, Lardner saith, "This epistle is not expressly quoted as Paul's by any of them in the first three centuries. However, it was known to Irenæus and Tertullian, as we have seen, and possibly to others also." Tertullian ascribed it to Barnabas; in which opinion he was singular. Lardner adds, "It is manifest that it was received as an epistle of St. Paul, by many Latin writers in the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries."

We are informed by the ancients themselves, that they were led to doubt the authenticity of the epistle to the Hebrews by three circumstances. 1. The want of the writer's name at the beginning of it, and throughout the whole epistle. 2. The elegance of the style in which it is written. 3. Some expressions in the epistle itself, which they thought unsuitable to the character of an apostle. Nevertheless, as the most ancient, and by far the most general tradition of the church, ascribed this epistle to the apostle Paul, the fathers, to remove these objections, supposed that it was originally written by Paul in the Syro-chaldaic language, commonly at that time called the Hebrews; but that Luke, or some other person, translated it into Greek. Accordingly, Eusebius, in his Eccles. Hist. b. vi. c. 14, saith, Clement of Alexandria "affirmed that the epistle to the Hebrews was Paul's, and that it was written to the Hebrews in the Hebrew language; but that Luke studiously translated it into Greek, and published it to the Greeks." The same Eusebius, Eccles. Hist. b. vi. c. 25, cites Origen as saying, in his Homilies on the Hebrews, "If I were to shew my opinion, I should say, that the thoughts are the apostle's, but the language and composition are another's, who committed to writing the apostle's sentiments, and who, as it were, reduced into commentaries the things spoken by his master. Wherefore, if any church holds this epistle to be Paul's, it is to be commended for so doing. For the ancients (οἱ Ἀγγέλικοι) did not (οὐκ) rashly hand it down as Paul's. But who actually wrote it, (Origen means, wrote the language), I think is known only to God. But an account hath reached to us from some who say that Clement, who was bishop of Rome, wrote this epistle; but from others, that it was Luke, the writer of the Gospel and the Acts."—Jerome, likewise, who was born in the year 342, in his book of illustrious men, Art. Paul, saith, "The epistle, called to the Hebrews, is not thought to be his, because of the difference of the argument and style: but either Barnabas's, as Tertullian thought; or the evangelist Luke's, according to others; or Clement's, bishop of Rome, who, as some think, being much with him, clothed and adorned Paul's sense in his own language. Moreover, he wrote as an Hebrew to the Hebrews, in pure Hebrew, it being his own language. Whence it came to pass, that being translated, it hath more elegance in the Greek than his other epistles."

Having thus laid before the reader the opinions of some of the ancients concerning the epistle to the Hebrews, I judge it proper now to transcribe, from the 8th page of Hallet's introduction to Pierce's paraphrase and notes on the Hebrews, the remarks which he hath made on Origen's testimony above recited; because they may be applied to all the ancients who have given their opinion concerning the epistle to the Hebrews. "The traditions which Origen mentions, are more to be regarded than his private opinion and reasonings. And as he positively says the ancients did in fact hand it down as Paul's epistle, so it is plain he laid vast stress on this tradition, since he would not give it up as false, though he had strong temptations so to do. For he was very hard put to it to reconcile this tradition with the style of the epistle, and with other traditions which named Clement or Luke as the writer of it. But rather than give up the former tradition, viz. that it was Paul's epistle, he would frame such an odd hypothesis as that just now mentioned." Hallet ought to have said, adept such an odd hypothesis; for it was framed before by Clement of Alexandria, who was Origen's master and predecessor in the Catechetical school of Alexandria. Hallet goes on: "It is very certain, then, that the churches and writers who were ancient with respect to Origen, had one common tradition, that St. Paul was the author of the epistle to the Hebrews. And their testimony to this matter of fact cannot but be of great weight, since those Christians who were ancients with respect to Origen, must have conversed with the apostles themselves, or at least with their immediate successors." Hallet adds, page 21, "Since this tradition was ancient in the days of Clement of Alexandria and Origen, about 130 years after the epistle was written, it must have had its rise in the days of St. Paul himself, and so cannot reasonably be contested."—Clement of Alexandria flourished about the year 193, that is, about 130 years after the epistle to the Hebrews was written. Origen flourished in the beginning of the third century, about 150 years after that epistle was written.—See, however, the remarks which Lardner hath made on the above passage from Hallet's Introduction, in the third volume of his Credibility part ii. page 252.

II. It follows now to be considered, whether the want of Paul's name in the epistle to the Hebrews, the elegance of its style, and the passages in it which are thought unsuitable to the character of an apostle, are sufficient reasons for concluding, either that it was not written originally by St. Paul, or that our present Greek copy is only a translation of an epistle which was written in Hebrew.

And, first, with respect to the want of Paul's name in this epistle, it may, notwithstanding, have actually been written by him. For in our Canon of the New Testament, there are epistles universally acknowledged to be the productions of an inspired apostle, notwithstanding his name is nowhere inserted in them. I speak of the three epistles of the apostle John, who, for some reasons now not known, hath omitted his name in all of them. His first epistle begins exactly like the epistle to the Hebrews: And in his other epistles he calls himself simply the Presbyter, or Elder.—It is true, Paul commonly inserted his name in the beginning of his letters; yet in this to the Hebrews he deviated from his usual manner, probably for the following reasons:—1. Because the doctrines which he set forth in it being wholly founded by him on the Jewish scriptures, the faith of the Hebrews in these doctrines was to stand, not on the authority of the writer who taught them, but on the clearness of the testimonies which he produced from the scriptures, the propriety of his application of these testimonies, and the justness of the conclusions which he deduced from them. See this explained in sect. 3.—2. As Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles, in writing to the Hebrews he did not assume his apostolical character, because it was little respected by the unbelieving Jews and the Judaizing Christians, who traduced him as one who taught the Jews living in foreign countries to forsake Moses, Acts xxi. 21. For which reason, instead of writing to the Hebrews with the authority of an apostle, he in the conclusion of his letter 'beseeched them to suffer the word of exhortation,' chap. xiii. 22, and protested, that in the whole of the doctrine delivered to them, he had maintained a good conscience, ver. 18.—3. This epistle, as shall be shewed by and bye, sect. 2. being designed, not for the believing Jews alone, but for the unbelieving part of the nation also, especially the learned doctors and scribes at Jerusalem, Paul might think it prudent not only to avoid assuming his apostolical character, but even to conceal his name; because, being regarded by the zealots as an apostate from the religion of their fathers, his name, instead of adding weight to the things which he was about to write, would have prejudiced the unbelieving part of the nation to such a degree, that in all probability they would not have read his letter.

2. With respect to the style of the epistle to the Hebrews, though it really were superior to the style of Paul's other writings, he may notwithstanding have been the author of it.—For, towards the conclusion of his first imprisonment at Rome, when the epistle to the Hebrews was composed, he may be allowed to have improved his style by use. To pass, however, from this, although both the ancients and moderns have praised the style of the epistle to the Hebrews as singularly beautiful, particularly Lardner, who saith, Can. vol. ii. p. 375, "That this epistle to the Hebrews is bright and elegant from the beginning to the end," its superiority to all the other epistles of Paul in point of style may justly be called in question. At least it may be doubted, that its superi-city is so great as to shew, that the person who wrote these was not capable of writing this. For, not to mention that the sublimest passages in the epistle to the Hebrews are those quoted from the Old Testament, I without hesitation affirm, that the epistles to the Ephesians, to the Colossians, and to Philemon, in respect of sentiment and language, will easily bear to be set in competition with the epistle to the Hebrews; especially the epistle to the Ephesians, concerning which Grotius hath said, that "it surpasseth all human eloquence." And yet, strange to tell! the same Grotius hath given it as his opinion, that the excellency of the style of the epistle to the Hebrews is a proof that it was not written by Paul. But, let any one who is a judge of composition and style, examine the examples of elegant, and even sublime writing, produced from Paul's epistles and discourses in Prelim. Est. iii., and let him candidly say, whether he thinks the person who wrote these noble passages, particularly the fifteenth chapter of the first epistle to the Corinthians, was not capable of writing any part of the epistle to the Hebrews. If our apostle was equal to such an undertaking, is there any thing unreasonable in supposing, that when he wrote a letter, which he hoped the learned Jewish doctors would read, he would be at more than ordinary pains in perfecting his style, to render it more the object of their attention? For he knew, that if they were convinced of the truth of the gospel by the reasonings in this letter, their conversion would smooth the way to the conversion of their brethren, and make the Judaizing Christians in particular, lay aside their attachment to the law of Moses, whereby they had so greatly disturbed the peace of the church.

3. The passages in the epistle to the Hebrews, which many have thought unsuitable to the character of an apostle, and which have been urged as proofs that this epistle cannot be Paul's, are the following.—Heb. ii. 1. 'On this account we ought to attend the more earnestly to the things which were heard, lest at any time we should let them slip.'—Ver. 3. 'How shall we escape if we neglect so great a salvation, which beginning to be spoken by the Lord, was confirmed to us by them who heard him?'—And chap. xii. 1. 'Laying aside every weight, and the sin easily committed, let us run with perseverance the race set before us.' In these passages, the writer of the epistle, it is said, speaks of himself as one not distinguished, in any respect, from Common Christians. And more particularly in the second passage, according to Grotius and Le Clerc, he speaks of himself as one of those who received the knowledge of the gospel, not from Christ, but from his apostles: Whereas Paul, in his epistle to the Galatians, hath repeatedly asserted, that he received his knowledge of the gospel, not from men, but immediately from Christ himself. To these things Wetstein, Pierce, Lardner and others, reply, that it is Paul's manner to join himself with those to whom he writes, especially when going to say any thing dishonourable to them. Thus, Ephes. ii. 3. 'With whom also we all had our conversation formerly, in the lusts of our flesh, doing the inclinations of the flesh, and of the imaginations, and were by nature children of wrath, even as others.' In some passages also of his epistles he ranks himself with the idolatrous Gentiles, Tit. iii. 3.; as doth the apostle Peter likewise, 1 Epist. iv. 3.—Farther, Grotius and Le Clerc are wrong in saying, that the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews speaks of himself, chap. ii. 3. as having received the knowledge of the gospel from them who heard Christ preach the great salvation. What he says is, that the great salvation, which was begun to be spoken by the Lord, was 'confirmed to him by them who heard Christ'; that is, the glad tidings of the great salvation given to Paul by Christ, were confirmed to him by the preaching of the apostles. Now, so far is this from being unsuitable to Paul's character as an apostle, that, in his other acknowledged epistles, he often appealed to the testimony of the eye-witnesses in confirmation of things made known to himself by revelation. For example, Acts xiii. 30, 31.; 1 Cor. xv. 5, 6, 7, 8.; 2 Tim. ii. 2.—In like manner, Peter appealed to the testimony of the other apostles, 1 Epist. i. 12. 'Which things have been reported to you by them who have preached the gospel to you with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven.' So also Jude appealed to the testimony of his brethren apostles, in confirmation of the things which he wrote in his epistle. See ver. 17.

What hath been advanced under the foregoing heads, must, I think, convince impartial readers, that the want of Paul's name in the epistle to the Hebrews, the elegance of its style, and the passages which are said to be unsuitable to the character of an apostle, afford no presumption that it was not written by him. Wherefore, if there is positive evidence that the epistle to the Hebrews was written by Paul, it ought to be received as his, notwithstanding some modern commentators, justly esteemed for their learning, have affected to doubt of it.

III. It therefore remains to propose the arguments by which St. Paul is proved to be the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews.

1. The first is, The most ancient, and by far the most universal tradition of the church, hath constantly ascribed this epistle to the apostle Paul.—But of this enough hath been said in the first article of the present section, to which the reader is referred.

2. The second argument is,—If an author's method of handling his subjects, together with his manner of reasoning, are sure marks by which he may be distinguished, as all good judges of composition allow, we shall, without hesitation, pronounce Paul the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews. For therein we find that overflowing of sentiment, briefly expressed, which distinguished Paul from all other writers.—Therein also are abrupt transitions from the subject in hand to something subordinate, but at the same time connected with it, which, having pursued for a little while, the writer returns to his subject, and illustrates it by arguments of great force, couched sometimes in a short expression, and sometimes in a single word; all which are peculiar to Paul.—In this epistle, likewise, contrary to the practice of other writers, but in Paul's manner, we meet with many elliptical expressions, which are to be supplied either from the foregoing or from the following clauses.—In it also, as in Paul's acknowledged epistles, we find reasonings addressed to the thoughts of the reader, and answers to objections not proposed, because, being obvious, the writer knew they would naturally occur, and therefore needed to be removed.—Lastly, after Paul's manner, the author of the epistle to the Hebrews hath subjoined to his reasonings many exhortations to piety and virtue; all which, to persons who are judges of writing, plainly point out the apostle Paul as the author of this epistle.

3. In the epistle to the Hebrews there are many sentiments and expressions which Paul hath used in the epistles acknowledged to be his.—For example, Heb. i. 2. 'Hair of all things,' and, ver. 3. 'an image of his substance,' are parallel to Col. i. 15. 'The image of the invisible God, the first-born of every creature.'—Heb. ii. 7. 'Thou hast made him for a little while less than angels; thou hast crowned him with glory and honour, and hast set him over the works of thy hands,' are sentiments parallel to Philip. ii. 8. 'Being in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, becoming obedient to death, even the death of the cross.' 9. And therefore God hath exceedingly exalted him, and hath bestowed on him a name which is above every name: 10. That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven,' &c. See also

Eph. i. 20, 21, 22.—What is said Heb. v. 12. about quilk as food for babes, but strong meat for full grown men, we have 1 Cor. iii. 2. 'Milk I gave you, and not meat, for ye were not then able to receive it.'—Heb. viii. 1. 'Who sat down at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens;' and, chap. xii. 2. 'Sat down at the right hand of the throne of God;' are expressions similar to Eph. i. 20. 'And set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places.'—Heb. x. 1. 'The law containing a shadow of good things to come,' is the same with Col. ii. 17. 'Which are a shadow of things to come.'—Heb. x. 33. 'Ye were made a spectacle, both by afflictions and reproaches.' 1 Cor. iv. 9. 'We are made a spectacle to the world.'—Heb. xiii. 16. 'But to do good and to communicate forget not, for with such sacrifices God is well pleased,' is similar to Philip. iv. 18. where Paul, after thanking the Philippians for having communicated to his necessities, calls that good work, 'A smell of a sweet savour, a sacrifice acceptable, and well pleasing to God.'—The writer of this epistle, chap. x. 30. quoting Deut. xxxii. 35. addeth the words, 'saith the Lord,' which are neither in the Hebrew, nor in the LXX., just as Paul hath done in two of his citations from the Old Testament, Rom. xiv. 11. 2 Cor. vi. 17.—Heb. xiii. 18. the writer of this epistle saith, 'We are fully persuaded we have a good conscience.' The same declaration Paul made before the council, Acts xxiii. 1. and before Felix, Acts xxiv. 16. and to the Corinthians, 2 Cor. i. 12.—Heb. xii. 14. 'Follow peace with all men.' Rom. xii. 18. 'Live peaceably with all men.'—Heb. xiii. 20. God is called 'The God of Peace.' This title is given to God nowhere but in Paul's writings, Rom. xv. 33. xvi. 20.; 2 Cor. xiii. 11.; Philip. iv. 9.; 1 Thess. v. 23.; 2 Thess. iii. 16. 'The Lord of peace.'—Heb. xii. 1, 2, 3, 12. there is a beautiful allusion to the athletic exercises, to which there are many similar allusions in Paul's other epistles.—This remarkable coincidence of sentiments and expressions in the epistle to the Hebrews, with the sentiments and expressions in Paul's acknowledged epistles, is no small presumption that this epistle is of his writing also.

4. In the epistle to the Hebrews there are interpretations of some passages of the Jewish scriptures, which may properly be called Paul's, because they are to be found only in his writings. For example, Psal. ii. 7. 'My son thou art; to-day I have begotten thee,' is applied to Jesus, Heb. i. 5. just as Paul, in his discourse to the Jews in the synagogue of Antioch in Pisidia, applied the same passage of scripture to him, Acts xiii. 33.—In like manner, the explication of Psal. viii. 4. and of Psal. cx. 1. given by Paul, 1 Cor. xv. 25. 27. is found Heb. ii. 7, 8.—So also the explication of the covenant with Abraham, given Heb. vi. 14. 18., is nowhere found but in Paul's epistle to the Galatians, chap. iii. 8, 9, 14, 18.

5. There are, in the epistle to the Hebrews, doctrines which none of the inspired writers have mentioned, except Paul.—In particular, the doctrines of the mediation and intercession of Christ, explained Heb. iv. 15, 16, vii. 22, 25. are nowhere found in the books of the New Testament except in Paul's epistles: Rom. viii. 34. Gal. iii. 19, 20.—The title of Mediator, which is given to Jesus Heb. vii. 23. viii. 6. ix. 15. xii. 24., is nowhere applied to Jesus except in Paul's epistles, 1 Tim. ii. 5.—In like manner, none of the inspired writers except Paul, Heb. viii. 1-4. have informed us, that Christ offered the sacrifice of himself in heaven: And that he did not exercise his priestly office on earth, but only in heaven.

tures, according to their ancient and true interpretation, which Paul, no doubt, learned from the celebrated doctors under whose tuition he studied in his younger years at Jerusalem; such a deep insight also into the most recondite meanings of these scriptures, and such admirable reasonings founded thereon for the confirmation of the gospel revelation, as, without disparagement to the other apostles, seems to have exceeded, not their natural abilities and education only, but even that degree of inspiration with which they were endowed. None of them but Paul, who was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, and who profited in the Jewish religion and learning above many of his fellow-students, and who, in his riper years, was intimately acquainted with the learned men of his own nation, Acts ix. 1, 2. 14. xxvi. 4, 5., and who was called to the apostleship by Christ himself, when for that purpose he appeared to him from heaven, nay, who was caught up by Christ into the third heaven, was equal to the subjects treated of in this most admirable epistle.

Before the controversy concerning the author of the epistle to the Hebrews is dismissed, it may be proper to mention the argument by which Grotius hath endeavoured to prove that it was written by Luke, or at least was translated by him into Greek from the apostle's Hebrew autograph. His argument is this: There are in the epistle to the Hebrews some Greek words used in a sense which they have not in Paul's other epistles, but which are found in that sense in Luke's writings.—Now, allowing this to be true, Grotius's conclusion by no means follows. For every one knows, that the use of a few words in an unusual sense, doth not constitute what is called a writer's style. Besides, Hallett hath shewed that there are also, in the epistle to the Hebrews, words used in an uncommon sense, which are not found in Luke's writings, but which Paul in his other epistles hath used in that sense. Wherefore, if in the former case it is argued that Paul was not the author of the epistle to the Hebrews, it may, in the latter case, be argued with equal reason, that Luke was neither the author nor the translator of that epistle. The truth is, as Hallett observes, "There is nothing in the argument either way; and if the argument had not been offered by so great a man as Grotius, it would not have been worth considering."

Upon the whole, let any one who hath impartially weighed the arguments on the one side and on the other, in this important question, say, whether the facts and circumstances above set forth do not, in a very convincing manner, shew that the tradition preserved in the church from the beginning, concerning Paul's being the author of the epistle to the Hebrews, is well founded: And whether the church hath not rightly received that epistle into the canon of scripture, as an inspired writing of the great apostle of the Gentiles?

SECT. II.—Of the Persons to whom the Epistle to the Hebrews was sent: Of the purpose for which it was written: And of the Language in which it was originally composed.

I. CLEMENT of Alexandria, Jerome, Euthalius, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact, and others, were of opinion, that the epistle to the Hebrews was sent to the Jews living in Judea, who in the apostle's days were called Hebrews, to distinguish them from the Jews in the Gentile countries, who were called Hellenists or Grecians, Acts vi. 1. ix. 29. xi. 20. In that opinion these ancient authors were well founded, because, as Lardner observes, this letter appears to have been written to persons dwelling in one place, Heb. xiii. 19, 23, 24., namely, to the inhabitants of Judea; and to those of them especially who lived in Jerusalem. For there only the Levitical worship, which is so accurately examined in this epistle, was performed: And there the chief priests, elders, and scribes resided, who were best qualified to explain and defend that worship:—best qualified also to judge of the meaning of the ancient oracles quoted in this learned letter, and to determine whether the author's reasonings therein were just and his doctrines true. Accordingly, this epistle was not directed, like the epistle of James, 'To the twelve tribes who are in the dispersion;' nor, like Peter's first epistle, 'To the sojourners of the dispersion of Pontus,' &c. But it begins without any address at all; so that not the believing Jews only, but those of the nation who had not believed the gospel, were invited to read and consider it, whether they resided in Jerusalem or elsewhere.

In confirmation of the supposition that the epistle to the Hebrews was written to the people of Judea, Lardner, Canon, vol. ii. p. 316. takes notice, that in it there are things which are more suitable to the Jews in Judea, than to the Jews in any other part of the world. For example, chap. ii. 9. 18. the persons to whom this letter was sent, are supposed to have been well acquainted with our Lord's sufferings and resurrection.—In like manner, chap. v. 12. 'For though ye ought to have been teachers, on account of the time,' with what follows, applies better to the believers in Judea than to others; because having enjoyed the gospel from the beginning, they were of longer standing in the faith than others.—Chap. x. 32. 'Call to remembrance the former days, in which, being enlightened, ye sustained a great combat of afflictions.' This leads us to the church at Jerusalem, which, after the death of Stephen, suffered a great persecution, Acts viii. 1.

The following passages likewise deserve particular attention: Chap. xiii. 7. 'Remember your rulers, who have spoken to you the word of God, of whose conversation attentively considering the ending, imitate their faith.' Theodoret's note on this verse is, "He intends the saints who were dead, Stephen the protomartyr, James the brother of John, and James called the Just. And there were many others who were taken off by the Jewish rage. Consider these, says he, and, observing their example, imitate their faith." And ver. 17. 'Obey your rulers, and submit yourselves, for they watch for your souls.' And ver. 24. 'Salute all your rulers.'—These directions imply, that this letter was sent to the multitude or laity of some particular church, whose rulers, as Theodoret observes on ver. 24. not needing the instruction contained in it, the writer doth not address them, but their disciples. Now what church could that be, but the church at Jerusalem which was ruled by the apostles, who certainly knew the truth concerning the law; that it was no rule of justification either to Jews or Gentiles; that its priesthood and sacrifices were utterly ineffectual for procuring the pardon of sin; and that the principal use of the Levitical worship was to prefigure the good things to come under the gospel dispensation. "For," to use Lardner's words, Canon, vol. ii. p. 320. "I am persuaded," that not only James and all the other apostles had exactly the same doctrine with Paul, but that all the elders likewise, and all the understanding men among the Jewish believers, embraced the same doctrine. They were, as I apprehend, the multitude only, (πληθος, plebs), or the men of lower rank among them, who were attached to the peculiarities of the Mosaic law and the customs of their ancestors. This may be urged from what James and the elders at Jerusalem say to Paul, Acts xxi. 20. 'Thou seest, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are who believe; and they are all zealous of the law.—What is it therefore! the multitude must needs come together.'—It is hence evident, that the zeal for the law which prevailed in the minds of many, was not approved by James or the elders. That being the case, those recommendations of a regard for their rulers, whether apostles or elders, were very proper in an epistle to the believers in Judea." For, as many of them differed in opinion concerning the law from their teachers, they might be apt to think lightly of them, and to disregard their instructions; for which reason the apostle desired them to obey their rulers. This circumstance, joined with those already mentioned, sufficiently proves that the epistle to the Hebrews, though designed for the Jews everywhere, was with great propriety directed and sent to the church at Jerusalem; as the ancients above-mentioned believed: in which opinion they have been followed by Beza, Lightfoot, Pearson, Whitby, Mill, Cappel, Hallet, Lardner, and other learned moderns.

To the opinion, that the epistle to the Hebrews was written to the Jews in Judea, some have objected the words found, Heb. xii. 4. 'Not yet unto blood have ye resisted, combating against sin.' This, they think, could not be said of the church at Jerusalem, where there had been two martyrs, namely, Stephen and James. But the answer is, the apostle is speaking of the laity of that church, to whom alone this letter was directed, and not to the rulers, as hath been shewed, sect. 2. paragr. 3. Of the common people, few, if any, had hitherto been put to death. But they had been imprisoned, and pillaged, and defamed; Acts viii. 1. 3. xxvi. 10, 11. 1 Thess. ii. 14.—Another objection is taken from Heb. vi. 10. 'For God is not unrighteous to forget your work and labour of love, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister.' "Here again," saith Wall, "we are put upon thinking to what church of Christians this is said. For, as to those of Jerusalem, we read much in Paul's former letters of their poverty, and of their being ministered to by the Gentile Christians of Galatia, of Macedonia, of Corinth; and in the Acts by the Antiochians: But nowhere of their ministering to any other saints. If it is of them that St. Paul speaks this, it must be meant of ministering to their own poor. For that, indeed, they were famous at first, when the rich men among them sold their lands, and brought the money to the apostles, and they had all things in common, and none lacked. But in the times that had been since that, they were very poor, and were relieved by other churches." But there is little force in this objection. Ministering to the saints in those days, did not consist solely in helping them with money. Attending on them in their imprisonment; doing them any little offices they stood in need of; speaking to them in a kind and consolatory manner, with such other services as may be performed without money, was and is as real a 'ministering to the saints,' as relieving them with money. And doubtless the church at Jerusalem ministered, in that manner, to one another in their afflictions. Further, although the generality of the members of the church at Jerusalem were reduced to poverty by the sufferings they had sustained, there certainly were among them some in better circumstances, who may have deserved the commendation, that 'they had ministered, and did still minister to the saints,' by giving them a share of their worldly goods.

II. With respect to the purpose for which the epistle to the Hebrews was written, I observe that the things contained in it lead us to understand, That it was written to prove what the learned doctors, and scribes, and elders in Jerusalem strongly denied; namely, that Jesus of Nazareth, whom they had lately put to death, is Christ the Son of God; and that the gospel, of which Jesus is both the subject and the author, is of divine original and universal obligation. For in this letter, as shall be shewed in sect. 3. all the arguments and objections by which those who put Jesus to death endeavoured to set his claim aside, and overturn the gospel, are introduced, examined, and confuted; his title and authority, as a lawgiver, to abolish the institutions of Moses, and to substitute the gospel dispensation in their room, is established; the absolute inefficacy of the Levitical atonements to procure the pardon of sin, is demonstrated; the reality of the sacrifice of himself which Christ offered for sin, together with its efficacy and its acceptableness to God, are clearly proved;—and on all these considerations, the unbelieving Jews were exhorted to forsake the law of Moses, and embrace the gospel; and such of the nation as had embraced it, were cautioned against apostasy. Farther, as the arguments made use of in this epistle, for explaining and proving the important matters of which it treats, are all taken from the Jewish scriptures, there can be little doubt that it was written for the purpose of persuading the unbelieving Jews every-where to renounce Judaism and embrace the gospel; as well as for establishing the believing Jews in the profession of Christianity. Being therefore a letter to the whole Jewish nation, the writer intended that the believing Hebrews in Judea, to whom it was sent, should communicate it to their unbelieving brethren every-where, who choosed to read it.

That a writing designed for the conversion of the Jewish nation, should have been calculated, in an especial manner, to convince the learned doctors and scribes who still adhered to the religion of their forefathers, and that it should have been sent to the Jews living in Judea, was highly proper. They were the principal part of the circumcision, from whom this letter could be circulated among the Jews of the dispersion.—Besides, the nation in general, it is reasonable to think, would be much guided in their judgment concerning the doctrine taught in this epistle, by the reception which it might meet with from their brethren in Judea; but especially from the scribes and elders at Jerusalem.

III. As to the language in which the epistle to the Hebrews was originally composed, many of the ancients speak of it as having been written by the apostle Paul in the Hebrew. This was the opinion of Clement of Alexandria, and of Jerome, as is plain from the passages quoted above, Sect. 1. paragr. 8.—Eusebius too was of the same opinion. For in his Ecc. Hist. lib. iii. c. 38. speaking of the epistle which Clement wrote in the name of the church of the Romans, to the church of the Corinthians, he saith, "In it he hath inserted many thoughts from the epistle to the Hebrews, sometimes using the very same words; plainly shewing that it is not a new writing. Wherefore it is justly ranked with the other writings of the apostle. Now Paul, who was conversant with the Hebrews, having wrote to them in their native language, some say Luke the evangelist, others, this very Clement, translated that writing; which seems the more true, that the epistle of Clement, and the epistle to the Hebrews, exhibit the same kind of style, and that the thoughts in both are not much different." Here it is proper to remark, that notwithstanding the fathers usually appealed to tradition in support of the ancient facts which they have reported, when they had it in their power to make such an appeal, neither Clement of Alexandria, nor Origen, nor Eusebius, nor Jerome, nor any Christian writer of the second and following centuries, who have told us that the epistle to the Hebrews was written by Paul in the Hebrew language, have said, or so much as insinuated, that they learned that important fact from tradition. They delivered it merely as an opinion of their own, formed on the circumstance of the epistle's being written to the Hebrews. This Eusebius acknowledges, in the passage last quoted from his history; as Jerome likewise doth, in the passage quoted from him, Sect. 1. where, speaking of Paul, he saith, "Moreover he wrote, as an Hebrew to the Hebrews, in pure Hebrew."

But, although the fathers who thought the epistle to the Hebrews was originally written in the Hebrew language, have professedly founded their opinion on its being composed for the instruction of the Hebrews, I am inclined to believe they were led into that opinion by the style also of the Greek epistle. For having been informed by tradition, that it was an epistle of Paul, and fancying its style to be more elegant than that of Paul's other epistles, to account for its supposed superior elegance, and at the same time to maintain the tradition which had handed down Paul as its author, they invented the strange hypothesis, that it was written by Paul in Hebrew, and translated by some other person, they could not tell who, into elegant Greek.

The opinion of the ancients, concerning the language in which St. Paul wrote his epistle to the Hebrews, being wholly founded on the supposed propriety of writing to the Hebrews in their own language, it will be necessary to inquire a little into that propriety.—And, first, If it was proper for the apostle to write this letter to the Hebrews in their own language, it must have been equally proper for him to write his letter to the Romans in their language. Yet we know that Paul's epistle to the Romans was not written in Latin, the language of Rome, but in Greek: Nay, that all Paul's epistles, and the epistles of the other apostles, were written in Greek, and not in the languages of the churches and persons to whom they were sent.—Secondly, The apostolical epistles being intended for the use of the whole Christian world in every age, as well as for the use of the persons to whom they were sent, it was more proper that they should be written in Greek than in any provincial dialect; because the Greek language was then universally understood, especially in the eastern provinces of the Roman empire. So Cicero informs us in his oration Pro Arch. Poet. "Græca leguntur in omnibus fere gentibus; Latina suis finibus, exiguis sane, continentur." It may perhaps be objected, that in many countries the common people, of whom the Christian churches were chiefly composed, did not understand the Greek language. True; but in every church there were numbers of persons endowed with the gift of tongues, and of the interpretation of tongues, who could readily turn the apostle's Greek epistles into the language of the church to which they were sent. In particular, the president, or the spiritual man, who read the apostle's Greek letter to the Hebrews in their public assemblies, could, without any hesitation, read it in the Hebrew language for the edification of those who did not understand Greek. And with respect to the Jews in the provinces, Greek being the native language of most of them, this epistle was much better calculated for their use written in the Greek language, than if it had been written in the Hebrew, which few of them understood.—Thirdly, It was proper that all the apostolical epistles should be written in the Greek language; because the principal doctrines of the gospel being delivered and explained in them, the explanation of these doctrines could with more advantage be compared so as to be better understood, being expressed in one language, than if, in the different epistles, they had been expressed in the language of the churches and persons to whom they were sent. Now what should that one language be, in which it was proper to write the Christian revelation, but the Greek, which was then generally understood, and in which there were many books extant, which treated of all kinds of literature, and which, on that account, were likely to be preserved, and by the reading of which Christians in after ages would be enabled to understand the Greek of the New Testament! This advantage none of the provincial dialects, used in the apostle's days, could pretend to. Being limited to particular countries, they were soon to be disused; and few if any books being written in them which merited to be preserved, the meaning of such of the apostle's letters as were composed in these provincial languages, could not easily have been ascertained.—Upon the whole, the argument taken from the propriety of St. Paul's writing to the Hebrews in their own language, is not well founded.

In addition to what hath been said to shew that the epistle to the Hebrews was written originally, not in the Hebrew, but in the Greek language, the reader, because this is a matter of great importance, is desired to attend to two particulars. The first is, In our Greek copy of the epistle, there are no internal marks of its being a translation from an Hebrew original. We find few of the Hebraisms which abound in the Greek versions of the Jewish scriptures; and such citations as are made from these scriptures, are made, not from the Hebrew original, but for the most part from the LXX. Greek version; as most of the citations from the old Testament in Paul's other epistles likewise are. Would this have happened, if the epistle to the Hebrews had been originally written in Hebrew!—Of this the following are examples.—Heb. viii. 9. 'And I regarded them not.' In the Hebrew text, Jer. xxxi. 32. it is, 'Although I was an husband to them.'—Heb. x. 5. 'Thou hast prepared me a body.' In the Hebrew, 'Mine ears thou hast opened.'—Chap. x. 38. 'If he draw back.' In the Hebrew, 'If he faint.'—Chap. xi. 21. 'Worshipped leaning on the top of his staff.' In the Hebrew, 'Israel bowed himself on the bed's head.'—In the Greek epistle, the writer hath interpreted the Hebrew names which he mentions. This he had no occasion to do, if he wrote his epistle in pure Hebrew. And even if he had written it in the Syro-Chaldaic, called in the apostle's days the Hebrew tongue, the names in the two languages are so little different, that there was no need to interpret them to those who understood the Syro-Chaldaic.—Lastly, there are in the Greek epistle to the Hebrews several paronomasias, or Greek words of like sound, placed near each other, which, in the opinion of Spanheim and Wetstein, shew that this epistle is an original writing, and not a translation.—In like manner, Matthew's gospel is shewed to have been originally written in Greek, and not in Hebrew, as some of the fathers thought, by two elegant paronomasias observed by Wetstein. The one is found, chap. v. 47, 48. 'Οι τάλαντοι ὑμῶν κειμένοι ἐν τῇ γῇ: that is, as Jerome saith, Be ye not τάλαντοι but τάλαντα. On this Wetstein remarks, "Videtur Mattheus vocem, τάλαντοι hic studio adhibuisse, ut τάλαντα opponeret."—The other paronomasia we have chap. vi. 16. Ἀρρῆξτε τὰ πτερόσχη ὅπως φανῇσι: on which Wetstein remarks, "Elegantior dicitur, Tegunt faciem, ut appareant, &c. It is elegantly said, They cover their face that they may appear."

The second circumstance which sheweth that the epistle to the Hebrews was not originally written in the Hebrew language, is this.—No one of the ancient Christian writers, who have told us that this epistle was written by the apostle Paul in Hebrew, has said that he ever saw an ancient Hebrew copy of it. Yet many such there must have been in Judea, and in the neighbouring countries, if it had been originally written in Hebrew. That being the case, is it to be supposed that Origen and Jerome, who were at great pains to procure and publish correct copies of the LXX. and Vulgate versions of the Jewish Scriptures, did not search these countries for a genuine copy of the Hebrew epistle to the Hebrews, which they considered as the original, that they might therewith compare the Greek copy which was in every one's hands; and which being thought by them a translation, it was necessary to know if it was a just one! But, notwithstanding the fathers had such strong inducements to search for a genuine copy of the Hebrew epistle, I repeat what I affirmed above, that neither Clement of Alexandria, nor Origen, nor Eusebius, nor Jerome, nor any of the ancients, who thought Paul wrote his epistle to the Hebrews in Hebrew, say they ever saw so much as one copy of that original. I therefore agree with Fabricius, Lightfoot, Beausobre, Wetstein, Spanheim, Mill, Whitby, Lardner, and other learned critics, in their opinion that Paul wrote his epistle to the Hebrews in Greek: And I am persuaded that our Greek copy of the epistle to the Hebrews is itself the apostle's original letter; consequently, that the same regard is due to it which is paid to all the other epistles of the apostle Paul.

SECT. III.—Of the Matters handled, and of the Reasonings and Proofs advanced, in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

As the Jews had been honoured with the keeping of all the former revelations of God to mankind, it might have been expected that the gospel, which was the explanation and completion of the whole of these revelations, would have been received by them with joy: But it happened otherwise. Most of the Jews adhered to the law of Moses with the greatest obstinacy, because God had spoken it at Sinai by the ministry of angels, in the hearing of their fathers, accompanied with great thunders, and lightnings, and tempest, and darkness. But the gospel they despised and opposed, because it was spoken in a private manner, by Jesus of Nazareth, a man whom the rulers at Jerusalem had put to death publicly as a deceiver.—Farther, in their attachment to the law, and their opposition to the gospel, the Jews were confirmed by observing, that in the law a variety of atonements for sin were prescribed by God himself, which they daily performed in the temple at Jerusalem, as a worship highly acceptable to the Deity: Whereas, in the Christian assemblies, they saw no worship of that kind presented to God; no sacrifices of any sort offered, nor any rites of purification performed, for obtaining the pardon of sin. For these reasons they detested the gospel as a manifest impiety; especially as it pretended to abolish the law of Moses, which they believed to be of unalterable and eternal obligation.

These arguments being very specious, were no doubt much insisted on by the lawyers and scribes, not only to hinder their countrymen from receiving the gospel, but to shake the faith of those who had embraced it. The apostle Paul, therefore, who was himself a doctor most learned in the law, wrote this excellent epistle to the Hebrews, to prove, That the same God who spake the former revelations to the fathers of the Jewish nation by the prophets, had in these last days spoken the gospel to all mankind by his Son: Consequently, That these revelations could not possibly contradict each other.—That although the Son, when he spake the gospel, was clothed with flesh, he was still the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of his substance.—That being appointed of God to expiate our sins by the sacrifice of himself, we are cleansed from our sins by that sacrifice, and not by the Levitical sin-offerings.—And that, after offering the sacrifice of himself, he sat down at the right hand of God, as High-priest of the heavenly holy place, and as Governor of the world.

But the appearing of the Son of God in the flesh, his dying as a sacrifice for sin, his officiating for mankind in heaven as an High-priest, and the inefficacy of the Levitical sacrifices, being, as was observed, things contrary to all the religious opinions of the Jews, the doctors, followed by the bulk of the nation, rejected them with abhorrence, on pretence that they overturned the former revelations. Wherefore, the only possible method by which the unbelieving Jews could be convinced of the truth of these things, was to prove them by testimonies from their own scriptures, in which the revelations of God are recorded. This method the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews hath actually followed: for he hath supported all the facts above-mentioned, and all his affirmations, by passages from the writings of Moses and the prophets. Only, to judge rightly of his arguments and conclusions, the reader ought to know, that the passages to which he has appealed were all understood by him in the sense in which the doctors and people of that age understood them. This I think the reader will acknowledge, when he considers that the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews neither assumes the character of an apostle, nor rests his explications of the passages which he hath quoted on the authority of his own inspiration, but delivers these explications as matters universally known and acknowledged, and reasons on the passages which he quotes according to that acknowledged sense. Nor could he with propriety do otherwise. For, if he had offered any novel interpretations, either literal or typical, of the Jewish scriptures, his arguments built on these interpretations would have had no weight whatever, either with the believing or unbelieving part of the nation.—This remark merits the reader's attention. For if the passages of the Old Testament, quoted in the epistle to the Hebrews, are therein applied to the persons and events to which they were commonly applied by the learned doctors of that age, and by the generality of the people, these interpretations and applications cannot be called in question by us. They are the ancient approved interpretations, given perhaps by the prophets themselves to their contemporaries, who handed them down to posterity. This at least is certain, that in the Chaldee paraphrases of Onkelos and Jonathan, written about the time of our Lord's birth, most of the passages of the Old Testament, which are applied to Jesus in the New, are interpreted of the Messiah. It is no objection to the foregoing remark, that the Jews now give a different interpretation of these passages. Their doctors, after the gospel began to prevail, wishing to deprive it of the evidence which it derived from the Old Testament prophecies, forsook the ancient and commonly received interpretation of these prophecies, and applied them to persons and events of which their fathers never so much as dreamed.—Upon the whole it is evident, that although we were really in doubt of St. Paul's being the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews, we could not call in question any of the doctrines taught in it; because their authority doth not depend on the character or credit of the writer who hath proposed them, but on the passages of the Old Testament by which he hath proved them; on his understanding these passages according to their true meaning; and on the justness of the conclusions which he hath deduced from them so understood. Nevertheless it must be acknowledged, that this epistle, as a part of the canon of the New Testament, will have a still greater authority with Christians, if it is known to have been written by an inspired apostle of Christ.

From the foregoing account of the matters contained in the epistle to the Hebrews, the reader must be sensible, that it exhibits doctrines of great and general use; that it contains profound discoveries concerning the most important articles of our faith; and that it opens to us the sources of our best hopes. Wherefore, like the other Catholic epistles of the New Testament, it might have been addressed, 'To all in every place who believe on the Lord Jesus Christ.' Or rather, because in this epistle some of the greatest objections against the gospel are answered, or obviated, it might have been addressed to mankind in general. Yet, being written professedly to prove, that all the essential doctrines of the gospel are either contained in the former revelations, though briefly and darkly, or are conformable to them, it was with great propriety addressed to the Jews in particular. For doctrines and proofs of that kind, submitted to the examination of the keepers of the former revelations, if approved by them, could hardly fail to be received by the rest of mankind, with the respect which is due to matters in themselves important, and which are so fully established by both revelations.

As the matters contained in the epistle to the Hebrews are highly worthy of our attention, so the manner in which they are handled is no less so. The arguments advanced in it for supporting the doctrines of the gospel, as we have said, are all taken from the Jewish scriptures. But they are not on that account the less, but rather the more worthy of general regard; being the very best arguments which can be used to convince rational unbelievers. The reason is, the doctrine concerning the dignity of Jesus as the Son of God, and the nature of that dignity; and concerning the sacrifice of himself which he offered to God, and the merit of that sacrifice; and concerning God's willingness to pardon sinners, and to bestow on them unspeakable rewards in the life to come;—I say these doctrines are all matters of fact, whose existence can neither be known nor proved but by revelation. And, that the proofs thereof subsist in the Jewish, as well as in the Christian revelation, is a point of admirable wisdom; because it shews, that the gracious purposes of the Deity respecting the human race, were all planned from the beginning; that in every age God gave mankind intimations of his merciful designs, and of the manner of their execution; and that there is a strict connexion between all his revelations and dispensations. Hence, when the Son of God appeared on earth, to lay a foundation for the new revelation in his own actions and sufferings, and to fulfil the prophecies relating to himself recorded in the Jewish scriptures, there was such a display made of the connexion subsisting between the divine dispensations, as hath added the greatest strength of evidence, not only to our Lord's character and pretensions as the Son of God, but to the divine dispensations themselves; which, though different, are not opposite or contradictory, but parts of a great plan formed from the beginning by the wisdom of God, and brought into execution in the different ages of the world, till the whole hath been illustriously completed in the gospel.

SECT. IV.—Of the Time when the Epistle to the Hebrews was written.

If the apostle Paul was the author of the epistle to the Hebrews, the time when it was written may easily be fixed. For the salutation from the saints of Italy, chap. iv. 24. together with the apostle's promise to see the Hebrews, ver. 23. plainly intimate, that his confinement was then either ended, or on the eve of being ended. It was therefore written soon after the epistles to the Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon, and not long before Paul left Italy, that is, in the year 61 or 62.

In the epistle itself there are passages which shew, that it was written before the destruction of Jerusalem; particularly chap. viii. 4. ix. 25. x. 11. xiii. 10. which speak of the temple as then standing, and of the Levitical sacrifices as still continuing to be offered. To these add chap. x. 32–37. where the apostle comforts the believing Hebrews under the persecution which their unbelieving brethren were carrying on against them, by the prospect of Christ's speedy advent to destroy Jerusalem, and the whole Mosaic economy.

upholding all things by the word (see Heb. xi. 3. note 3.) of his power,³ when he had made purification of our sins by himself, sat down⁴ at the right hand of the majesty in high PLACES.⁵

4. He is by so much better than the angels, by how much he hath inherited a more excellent name⁶ than they.

5 For to which of the angels did he at any time say, My son thou art; to-day I have begotten thee?¹ And again, I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son.²

may denote that manifestation of his Father's perfections which the Son makes to angels and men, and the latter what the Son is in himself. See John v. 26.

3. And upholding all things by the word of his power.]—Θεωρεῖται τὸ πάντα τὸ ἐκείναι τῆς δύναμει αὐτοῦ. This parallel to Col. i. 17. Τὰ πάντα ἡ αὐτοῦ ἐνέργεια. 'By him all things consist.' According to Pierce, the meaning of both passages is, That as the Son gave being to all things, so he maintains them in being. The same author contends, that the phrase, his power, means the power of God the Father. See his note on Colos. i. 17.

4. Sat down at the right hand.]—Among the Hebrews, from the earliest times, the right hand was the place of honour, Gen. xlviii. 13. 17. Hence they who were next in dignity and authority to the Prince, were placed at his right and left hands, Matt. xx. 21.

5. Of the Majesty (ἐν ὑψηλοῖς) in high places;—or, among high beings, namely angels. The divine spirituality and immensity not permitting us to think of any right or left hand of God, 'the right hand of the Majesty in high places,' is to be understood of the glorious manifestation of the presence of God in heaven among the angels.—Accordingly, what is here called 'the Majesty in high places,' is named, chap. vii. 1. 'The throne of the Majesty in the heavens.'—Script of the metaphor, the apostle's meaning is, that our Lord, after his ascension, having offered the sacrifice of himself in heaven, was invested in the human nature with that visible glory and power which he enjoyed with God before the world was, mentioned by himself, John xvil. 5. Our Lord's sitting down at the right hand of God, is affirmed in this epistle no less than five different times, (chap. i. 3. 13. vii. 1. x. 12. xii. 2.) because it presupposes his resurrection from the dead, and implies his being put in possession of the highest authority in heaven under the Father; consequently it is a clear proof that he is really the Son of God.

Ver. 4.—1. He is by so much better than the angels.]—Here I have supplied the pronoun αὐτοῦ, Ac, because this sentence doth not stand in connexion with what immediately goes before, but is the beginning of a new subject; and because there must be some noun or pronoun understood, with which the participle ἀσπίδων agrees. As the Jews glorified exceedingly in the law of Moses, on account of its having been given by the ministry of angels, Deut. xxxiii. 2. Acts vii. 53. Gal. iii. 19. the apostle proves by passages from the Jewish scriptures, that the Son is superior in nature and dignity to all the angelical hosts.

2. He hath inherited a more excellent name.]—The official name of the author of the gospel is not here spoken of, but the name which God gave him on account of his descent. His official names are many—such as Messiah, of which Christ is the Greek translation; Messiah the Prince; Jesus, or Saviour; The word of God. But on account of his descent he hath only one name given him, that of Son. The apostle's argument, taken from the name Son of God, is this: he hath that name by inheritance, or on account of his descent from God; and Jesus, by calling himself 'the only begotten of the Father,' hath excluded from that honourable relation angels, and every other being whatever. They may be sons by creation or adoption, but they do not inherit the names of sons.

Ver. 5.—1. My Son thou art; to-day I have begotten thee.]—The emphasis of this speech lieth in the word begotten, importing that the person addressed is God's Son, not by creation, but by generation. It was on account of this speech that the Jews universally believed the person, called, Psal. ii. 2. 'The Lord's Messiah,' or Christ, to be really the Son of God. And in allusion to this speech, our Lord took to himself the appellation of 'God's only begotten Son,' John iii. 16. It is true, because the angel said to his mother, Luke i. 35. 'The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee.—Therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee, shall be called the Son of God;' some contend that the words, 'My Son thou art,' &c. are a prediction of our Lord's miraculous conception. But on that supposition the argument taken from the name falls: for instead of proving Jesus superior to angels, his miraculous conception does not make him superior to Adam, who was as much the immediate work of God, as Christ's human nature was the immediate work of the Holy Ghost. The common and true interpretation of this passage Paul gave in the synagogue of Antioch: Acts xiii. 33. 'He hath raised up Jesus again, as it is also written in the second Psalm, My Son thou art,' &c.: from which it appears that Psal. ii. 7. is a prophecy of Messiah's resurrection; not however as importing, that by raising Messiah from the dead God begat him into the relation of a son; for, in that case, every person whom God raised from the dead would be his begotten son: but that, by raising him, God declared Messiah his son, whom the kings of the earth, and the rulers, had put to death as a blasphemer, for taking to himself that august name. Accordingly we are told, Rom. i. 4. that he was 'declared the Son of God with power, by his resurrection from the

and upholding all things (namely, the world, ver. 2.) by his powerful command, when he had made atonement for our sins by the sacrifice of himself, and not of beasts, sat down at the right hand of the manifestation of the divine presence in the highest heavens, by invitation from God, who thereby declared his ministrations as a priest both acceptable and effectual.

5 For although in your scriptures angels have been called the Sons of God, to which of the angels did God ever say, by way of distinguishing him from all other beings, My Son thou art; to-day I have begotten thee? See chap. v. 5. And again, I will declare myself his Father, and him my Son.

dead.' Besides, he was declared God's Son before his resurrection, by voices from heaven, particularly at his baptism. Nay, he is said to have been the Son of God before he was sent into the world, John iii. 17. If so, the angel's words above-mentioned may mean, that as the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, so his miraculous conception, would lead men to acknowledge and call him the Son of God.—See Pierce on this verse, who affirms that the second Psalm belongs wholly to Messiah; and proves by passages from the writings of the ancient Jewish doctors, that they applied it to Messiah; and that some of the later doctors have acknowledged "it advisable to apply that Psalm to David, in order to the better answering the heretics;" meaning the Christians.—Pierce's opinion concerning the second Psalm is confirmed by the apostle Peter, who applied the first three verses of it to Christ, Acts iv. 26.—The expression to-day, according to Pierce, refers to the 6th verse of the Psalm, 'Yet have I set my king on my holy hill of Zion;' and means the day on which 'all power was given to Christ in heaven and in earth,' Matt. xxviii. 18. If so, 'the begetting of God's Son,' mentioned in the Psalm, includes two things; the raising him from the dead, and the bestowing on him all power in heaven and on earth.

2. And again, I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son.]—Because these words, in the order in which they stand here, are found in the revelation made to Nathan, which is recorded 2 Sam. vii. 4.—17. and 1 Chron. xvil. 4.—16. I think, with Whiston and Pierce, they are taken from that revelation, and not from the revelation made to David, 1 Chron. xxi. 8. 10. xxviii. 6, 7. in both which places they stand in this order, 'He shall be my Son, and I will be his Father.' I likewise agree with Pierce in thinking the revelation to Nathan relates to Messiah alone; whereas the revelation to David relates to Solomon; and that for the following reasons:—First, because in the revelation to Nathan, 2 Sam. viii. it is said, ver. 12. 'When thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom. 13. He shall build an house for my Name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom for ever. 14. And I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son.' Or, as it is more fully expressed, 1 Chron. xvil. 11. 'And it shall come to pass, when thy days be expired that thou must go to be with thy fathers, that I will raise up thy seed after thee, which shall be of thy sons, and I will establish his kingdom. 12. He shall build me an house, and I will establish his throne for ever. 13. I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son; and I will not take my mercy away from him, as I took it from him that was before thee. 14. But I will settle him in mine house, and in my kingdom for ever, and his throne shall be established for evermore.' Now, as it is evident that Solomon was placed on the throne in David's lifetime, 1 Kings i. 34. and not after his days were fulfilled, and was a seed not raised up after him of his sons, and never was in any sense settled in God's house or temple, the person spoken of in the revelation to Nathan cannot be Solomon, but must be Messiah, who was settled both in God's house and in God's kingdom for ever, that is, was a priest as well as a king.—Secondly, in the revelation made to David, Solomon is mentioned by name, 1 Chron. xxi. 9. 'Behold a son shall be born to thee, who shall be a man of rest; and I will give him rest from all his enemies round about, for his name shall be Solomon, and I will give peace and quietness unto Israel in his days. 10. He shall build an house for my Name, and he shall be my Son, and I will be his Father, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom over Israel for ever.' This prophecy contains particulars which are not applicable to Messiah, who, instead of having rest from all his enemies round about, was persecuted and put to death by them: But every thing contained in it agrees to Solomon. Thirdly, the promise to establish the kingdom of David's seed, mentioned in the revelation to Nathan, is unconditional: whereas the promise to David to establish the kingdom of his seed is conditional, 1 Chron. xxi. 7. 'Moreover, I will establish his kingdom for ever, if he be constant to do my commandments and my judgments as at this day.' Accordingly, from this consideration David urged Solomon to serve the Lord, ver. 9. 'If thou seek him, he will be found of thee: but if thou forsake him, he will cast thee off for ever.—Fourthly, the angel who announced to the virgin that she was to bring forth the expected Messiah, applied the promise of the everlasting kingdom in the revelation to Nathan expressly to her Son: Luke i. 32. 'He shall be great, and shall be called the son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David. 33. And he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end.'

To the foregoing interpretation of the revelation to Nathan I have been objected, that what is mentioned 2 Sam. vii. 14. cannot be 6 But when he bringeth again¹ the first-born² into the world,³ he saith, (αὖτις) Yea, let all the angels⁴ of God worship him.

7 (Καὶ ἄγε, 224. 290.) Besides, of the angels indeed he saith, Who made⁵ his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire;

8 But (ἄγε) to the Son, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever:¹ The sceptre of thy kingdom, is a sceptre (ὡς θύρατος) of rectitude.²

9 Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated wickedness; therefore, (ὁ Θεός, ver. 8. note 1.), O God, thy God hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness³ above (τὸς μετόχους σου) thy associates.

10 And, Thou Lord, in the beginning found-

understood of Messiah. 'If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men. 15. But my mercy shall not depart away from him,' &c. To this objection Pierce replies, that the text ought to be translated, 'whosoever (namely of Messiah's people) committeth iniquity, I will chastise him with the rod of men,' &c.; and, in support of his translation, he produces various passages in which the Hebrew relative pronoun asher signifies whosoever. Besides, this passage is applied to Messiah's children, Psalm lxxxix. 30, 31, 32.

Farther, it hath been objected, that on supposition the revelation made to Nathan relateth solely to Messiah, the apostle's application of the promise, 'I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son,' for proving the Son superior to angels, is false reasoning; because the same promise was made in the revelation to David concerning Solomon, who certainly was not thereby proved superior to the angels. To this objection I reply, that the promise in question, as applied to Messiah, hath a very different meaning from what it hath when applied to Solomon. Speaking of Messiah, it is a prediction, that God would in the most public manner declare Jesus his Son, by voices from heaven, uttered on different occasions, and by the descent of the Holy Ghost on him after his baptism, and by his resurrection from the dead: Whereas the same promise spoken concerning Solomon, means only that he was to be the object of God's special affection and care. Accordingly it was so explained in the revelation to David himself, 'I will give him rest from all his enemies round about.'

Ver. 6.—1. When he bringeth again¹.—ἄγε here properly signifies the second time. Est. iv. 22.—The son of God was brought into our world, the first time, by his incarnation. But the angels were not then commanded to worship him. That command was given after his resurrection, which being, as it were, a second incarnation, is fitly called 'a bringing him a second time into our world'; when, as the reward of his having suffered death during his first residence in the world, he was made in the human nature the object of the worship, not only of men, but of angels. So Paul told the Philippians, chap. ii. 9, 10, 11.

2. The first-born².—Because πρωτογενής comes from πρῶτος, which signifies to begin (gigno) as well as to bring forth (pario), it may be rendered either the first-born or the first-begotten. I think it should here be translated first-born, answering to heir, ver. 2. See Col. i. 15. note 2. Rom. viii. 29.

3. Into the world³.—ὡς κατοικουμένη, the habitable world; our world. The first coming of the heir into the world is thus expressed, Heb. x. 5. Ἐπερχόμενος ὡς τὸν κόσμον, when coming into the world.

4. Let all the angels of God worship him. —In the Hebrew text it is ὅτι ἔλαλθον, which in our Bibles is rendered 'all ye Gods.' But the expression is elliptical, and may be supplied as the writer of this epistle hath done, 'all ye angels of God.' The LXX. likewise have supplied the word angels; but instead of ὅτι, answering to ἔλαλθον, they have put ὅτι.—Wall, in his note on Deut. xxiii. 43. where the LXX. have the apostle's words verbatim, saith this quotation is made from that passage in the LXX. For although in our Hebrew copy there is nothing answering to it, he thinks the corresponding clause is in the copy from which they made their translation.—In Psalm xvii. whence it is commonly thought this quotation is made, the establishment of the kingdom of Christ is foretold, together with its happy influence in destroying idolatry. Because, in a few instances, the word elohim denotes idols, this clause is translated by some, worship him all ye idols. But how can idols, most of whom are nonentities, worship the Son? See Beza.—This text is quoted by the apostle to prove, that even in the human nature the Son is superior to all the angels. See note 1. on this verse.

Ver. 7. Who made his angels spirits, &c. —'O αὖτις, being the participle of the imperfect tense, should be translated, not who maketh but who made. Some think the translation of the clause should run in this manner, 'Who maketh winds his messengers, and a flame of fire his ministers,' supposing that the Psalmist alludes to the agency of the angels, in forming the tempest and lightnings which accompanied the giving of the law.—Pierce is of opinion that the translation should be, 'who maketh his angels winds'; because the comparing the angels to a flame of fire, in the 6 But, instead of calling any of the angels his begotten Son, when God foretells his bringing a second time the first-born into our world, by raising him from the dead, to shew that he hath subjected the angels to him, he saith, Psalm. xcvi. 7. Yea, worship him, all ye angels of God.

7 Besides, of the angels indeed David saith, Psalm. civ. 4. Who made his angels spiritual substances, and his ministers a flame of fire;—that is, the greatest thing said of angels is, that they are beings not clogged with flesh, who serve God with the utmost activity;

8 But to shew that the Son is Governor of the world, he saith to him, Psalm. xlv. 6. Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever. And, Of this government thou art worthy, because the sceptre of thy kingdom is a sceptre of rectitude: thy government is exercised for maintaining truth and righteousness in the world.

9 By coming to destroy the devil and his works, thou hast shewed the greatest love of righteousness and hatred of wickedness; therefore, O God, thy God (John. xx. 17.) hath bestowed on thee as a king, and a priest, and a prophet, endowments whereby thou excellest all thy associates in these offices.

10 And, still farther to display the greatness of the Son above last clause of the verse, naturally leads to apprehend them as compared to winds in the first. I have adopted the common translation, in which the order of the original words is followed, because it shews that the apostle is speaking, not of winds, but of angels.

Ver. 8.—1. Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever.—Because ὁ Θεός is the nominative, some translate this clause 'God is thy throne'; that is, the support of thy throne. But the nominative was often used by the Attics for the vocative. It is so used by the LXX. likewise in many places of the Psalms; and by St. Paul, Rom. viii. 15. and in ver. 9. of this chapter. In the opinion of some commentators, the Psalm, from which the passage under consideration is quoted, was composed concerning Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughter. But could Solomon with any propriety be addressed by the title of God? Or could it be said of him, that his kingdom, which lasted only forty years, is eternal? It was not even eternal in his posterity. And with respect to 'his loving righteousness and hating wickedness,' it but ill applies to one who, in his old age, became an encourager of idolatry, through the influence of women. This Psalm therefore is applicable only to the Christ. Farther, Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughter being expressly condemned as contrary to the law, (1 Kings. xi. 2.), to suppose that this Psalm was composed in honour of that event, is certainly an ill-founded imagination. Estius informs us, that the Rabbin, in their commentaries, affirm that Psalm. xlv. was written wholly concerning the Messiah. Accordingly they translate the title as we do, A Song of Love: The LXX. ὡς τὸν κόσμον, a song concerning the beloved: Vulgate, pro dilecto; a title justly given to Messiah, whom God, by voices from heaven, declared his beloved Son.—Besides, as the word Maschil, which signifies for instruction, (LXX. ὡς ἐννοεῖν; Vulg. ad intellectum), is inserted in the title, and as no mention is made in the Psalm of Solomon, from an account of whose loves, as Pierce observes, the Jewish church was not likely to gain much instruction, we are led to understand the Psalm, not of Solomon, but of the Messiah only.

Pierce saith "They who imagine this Psalm is an epitaphium upon Solomon's marrying Pharaoh's daughter, must suppose that it is here foretold, that Solomon was to have a numerous progeny by her, whom he should set up for princes and rulers up and down the world, by one of whom he should be succeeded. Ver. 16. 'Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children, whom thou mayest make princes in all the earth.' But this cannot be true; for, beside that we read not of any children Solomon had by Pharaoh's daughter, it is certain that Rehoboam, who succeeded him, was the Son of Naamah an Ammonitess, 2 Chron. xii. 13.; and so far was he from being able to set up his sons to rule over other countries, that it was with great difficulty that his successors kept two tribes of the twelve steadfast to them," &c.—From all which Pierce concludes, 'Certainly a greater than Solomon is here.'

2. The sceptre of thy kingdom is a sceptre of rectitude.—Pierce understands this of the antecedent government of the Son, which he thinks extended only to the Jews. But whoever considers this and the following verse, will be sensible that they are a prophecy of the duration and righteousness of that universal kingdom which Christ was to administer after his resurrection; and that the following verse is a declaration, that he should receive the universal kingdom as a reward of that love of righteousness which he shewed in his incarnation and death. See Philip. ii. 8, 9.

Ver. 9. Hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness.—Anciently kings, priests, and prophets, were consecrated to their several offices by the ceremony of solemn unction with perfumed oil; called in the Psalm 'the oil of gladness,' because it occasioned great joy, both to the person anointed, and to those who were present at the ceremony. Wherefore, the Son being appointed of God to the high offices of universal King, Priest, and Prophet, among men, he is called by way of eminence, the Lord's Messiah, Christ, or anointed one. But the oil with which God anointed or consecrated him to these offices, was not any material oil; nor was the unction external; but internal, with the Holy Ghost. We may therefore understand the Psalm as a prediction of the descent of the Holy Ghost on Jesus at his baptism, whereby was signified God's giving him the Spirit without measure, John. iii. 34.

upholding all things by the word (see Heb. xi. 3. note 3.) of his power,³ when he had made purification of our sins by himself, sat down⁴ at the right hand of the majesty in high PLACES.⁵

4. HE is by so much better than the angels,¹ by how much he hath inherited a more excellent name² than they.

5 For to which of the angels did he at any time say, My son thou art; to-day I have begotten thee! And again, I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son.³

may denote that manifestation of his Father's perfections which the Son makes to angels and men, and the latter what the Son is in himself. See John v. 26.

3. And upholding all things by the word of his power.]—ὁ ὢντος τὰ πάντα τὰ ἐκρησται τῆς δυναμὸς αὐτοῦ. This parallel to Col. i. 17. Τὸ πάντα ἐν αὐτῷ συνίσταται. 'By him all things consist.' According to Pierce, the meaning of both passages is, That as the Son gave being to all things, so he maintains them in being. The same author contends, that the phrase, his power, means the power of God the Father. See his note on Colos. i. 17.

4. Sat down at the right hand.]—Among the Hebrews, from the earliest times, the right hand was the place of honour, Gen. xlviii. 13, 17. Hence they who were next in dignity and authority to the Prince, were placed at his right and left hands, Matt. xx. 21.

6. Of the Majesty (ἐν ὑψηλοῖς) in high places;—or, among high beings, namely angels. The divine spirituality and immensity not permitting us to think of any right or left hand of God, 'the right hand of the Majesty in high places,' is to be understood of the glorious manifestation of the presence of God in heaven among the angels.—Accordingly, what is here called 'the Majesty in high places,' is named, chap. viii. 1. 'The throne of the Majesty in the heavens.'—Script of the metaphor, the apostle's meaning is, that our Lord, after his ascension, having offered the sacrifice of himself in heaven, was invested in the human nature with that visible glory and power which he enjoyed with God before the world was, mentioned by himself, John xvii. 5. Our Lord's sitting down at the right hand of God, is affirmed in this epistle no less than five different times, (chap. i. 3, 13. vii. 1. x. 12. xii. 2.), because it presupposes his resurrection from the dead, and implies his being put in possession of the highest authority in heaven under the Father; consequently it is a clear proof that he is really the Son of God.

Ver. 4.—1. He is by so much better than the angels.]—Here I have supplied the pronoun αὐτός, he, because this sentence doth not stand in connexion with what immediately goes before, but is the beginning of a new subject; and because there must be some noun or pronoun understood, with which the participle ὑπερέχων agrees. As the Jews glorified exceedingly in the law of Moses, on account of its having been given by the ministry of angels, Deut. xxxiii. 2. Acts vii. 53. Gal. iii. 19. the apostle proves by passages from the Jewish scriptures, that the Son is superior in nature and dignity to all the angelical hosts.

2. He hath inherited a more excellent name.]—The official name of the author of the gospels is not here spoken of, but the name which God gave him on account of his descent. His official names are many—such as Messiah, of which Christ is the Greek translation; Messiah the Prince; Jesus; or Saviour; The word of God. But on account of his descent he hath only one name given him, that of Son. The apostle's argument, taken from the name Son of God, is this: he hath that name by inheritance, or on account of his descent from God; and Jesus, by calling himself 'the only begotten of the Father,' hath excluded from that honourable relation angels, and every other being whatever. They may be sons by creation or adoption, but they do not inherit the names of sons.

Ver. 5.—1. My Son thou art; to-day I have begotten thee.]—The emphasis of this speech lieth in the word begotten, importing that the person addressed is God's Son, not by creation, but by generation. It was on account of this speech that the Jews universally believed the person, called, Psal. ii. 2. 'the Lord's Messiah,' or Christ, to be really the Son of God. And in allusion to this speech, our Lord took to himself the appellation of 'God's only begotten Son,' John iii. 16. It is true, because the angel said to his mother, Luke i. 35. 'The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee—Therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee, shall be called the Son of God;' some contend that the words, 'My Son thou art,' &c. are a prediction of our Lord's miraculous conception. But on that supposition the argument taken from the name falls: for instead of proving Jesus superior to angels, his miraculous conception does not make him superior to Adam, who was as much the immediate work of God, as Christ's human nature was the immediate work of the Holy Ghost. The common and true interpretation of this passage Paul gave in the synagogue of Antioch: Acts xiii. 33. 'He hath raised up Jesus again, as it is also written in the second Psalm, My Son thou art,' &c.: from which it appears that Psal. ii. 7. is a prophecy of Messiah's resurrection; not however as importing, that by raising Messiah from the dead God begat him into the relation of a son; for, in that case, every person whom God raised from the dead would be his begotten son: but that, by raising him, God declared Messiah his son, whom the kings of the earth, and the rulers, had put to death as a blasphemer, for taking to himself that angelic name. Accordingly we are told, Rom. i. 4. that he was 'declared the Son of God with power, by his resurrection from the dead.' Besides, he was declared God's Son before his resurrection, by voices from heaven, particularly at his baptism. Nay, he is said to have been the Son of God before he was sent into the world, John iii. 17. If so, the angel's words above-mentioned may mean, that as the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, so his miraculous conception, would lead men to acknowledge and call him the Son of God.—See Pierce on this verse, who affirms that the second Psalm belongs wholly to Messiah; and proves by passages from the writings of the ancient Jewish doctors, that they applied it to Messiah; and that some of the later doctors have acknowledged "it advisable to apply that Psalm to David, in order to the better answering the heretics;" meaning the Christians.—Pierce's opinion concerning the second Psalm is confirmed by the apostle Peter, who applied the first three verses of it to Christ, Acts iv. 26.—The expression to-day, according to Pierce, refers to the 6th verse of the Psalm, 'Yet have I set my king on my holy hill of Zion;' and means the day on which 'all power was given to Christ in heaven and in earth,' Matt. xxviii. 18. If so, 'the begetting of God's Son,' mentioned in the Psalm, includes two things; the raising him from the dead, and the bestowing on him all power in heaven and on earth.

and upholding all things (namely, the world, ver. 2.) by his powerful command, when he had made atonement for our sins by the sacrifice of himself; and not of beasts, sat down at the right hand of the manifestation of the divine presence in the highest heavens, by invitation from God, who thereby declared his ministrations as a priest both acceptable and effectual.

5 For although in your scriptures angels have been called the Sons of God, to which of the angels did God ever say, by way of distinguishing him from all other beings, My Son thou art; to-day I have begotten thee? See chap. v. 6. And again, I will declare myself his Father, and him my Son.

2. And again, I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son.]—Because these words, in the order in which they stand here, are found in the revelation made to Nathan, which is recorded 2 Sam. vii. 4—17, and 1 Chron. xlvii. 4—15. I think, with Whiston and Pierce, they are taken from that revelation, and not from the revelation made to David, 1 Chron. xlii. 8, 10. xxviii. 6, 7. in both which places they stand in this order; 'He shall be my Son, and I will be his Father.' I likewise agree with Pierce in thinking the revelation to Nathan relates to Messiah alone; whereas the revelation to David relates to Solomon; and that for the following reasons:—First, because in the revelation to Nathan, 2 Sam. vii. it is said, ver. 12. 'When thy days be fulfilled, and thou shalt sleep with thy fathers, I will set up thy seed after thee, which shall proceed out of thy bowels, and I will establish his kingdom. 13. He shall build an house for my Name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom for ever. 14. And I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son.' Or, as it is more fully expressed, 1 Chron. xvii. 11. 'And it shall come to pass, when thy days be expired that thou must go to be with thy fathers, that I will raise up thy seed after thee, which shall be of thy sons, and I will establish his kingdom. 12. He shall build me an house, and I will establish his throne for ever. 13. I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son; and I will not take my mercy away from him, as I took it from him that was before thee. 14. But I will settle him in mine house, and in my kingdom for ever, and his throne shall be established for evermore.' Now, as it is evident that Solomon was placed on the throne in David's lifetime, 1 Kings i. 34. and not after his days were fulfilled, and was a seed not raised up after him of his sons, and never was in any sense settled in God's house or temple, the person spoken of in the revelation to Nathan cannot be Solomon, but must be Messiah, who was settled both in God's house and in God's kingdom for ever, that is, was a priest as well as a king.—Secondly, in the revelation made to David, Solomon is mentioned by name, 1 Chron. xlii. 9. 'Behold a son shall be born to thee, who shall be a man of rest; and I will give him rest from all his enemies round about, for his name shall be Solomon, and I will give peace and quietness unto Israel in his days. 10. He shall build an house for my Name, and he shall be my Son, and I will be his Father, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom over Israel for ever.' This prophecy contains particulars which are not applicable to Messiah, who, instead of having rest from all his enemies round about, was persecuted and put to death by them: But every thing contained in it agreeth to Solomon. Thirdly, the promise to establish the kingdom of David's seed, mentioned in the revelation to Nathan, is unconditional: whereas the promise to David to establish the kingdom of his seed is conditional, 1 Chron. xlvii. 7. 'Moreover, I will establish his kingdom for ever, if he be constant to do my commandments and my judgments as at this day.' Accordingly, from this consideration David urged Solomon to serve the Lord, ver. 9. 'If thou seek him, he will be found of thee; but if thou forsake him, he will cast thee off for ever.—Fourthly, the angel who announced to the virgin that she was to bring forth the expected Messiah, applied the promise of the everlasting kingdom in the revelation to Nathan expressly to her Son: Luke i. 32. 'He shall be great, and shall be called the son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David. 33. And he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end.'

To the foregoing interpretation of the revelation to Nathan it hath been objected, that what is mentioned 2 Sam. vii. 14. cannot be 6 But when he bringeth again¹ the first-born² into the world,³ he saith, (xai) Yea, let all the angels⁴ of God worship him.

10 And, Thou Lord, in the beginning found-

understood of Messiah. 'If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men. 15. But my mercy shall not depart away from him,' &c. To this objection Pierce replies, that the text ought to be translated, 'whoever (namely of Messiah's people) committeth iniquity, I will chastise him with the rod of men,' &c.; and, in support of his translation, he produces various passages in which the Hebrew relative pronoun asher signifies whoever. Besides, this passage is applied to Messiah's children, Psalm lxxxix. 30, 31, 32.

Farther, it hath been objected, that on supposition the revelation made to Nathan relateth solely to Messiah, the apostle's application of the promise, 'I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son,' for proving the Son superior to angels, is false reasoning; because the same promise was made in the revelation to David concerning Solomon, who certainly was not thereby proved superior to the angels. To this objection I reply, that the promise in question, as applied to Messiah, hath a very different meaning from what it hath when applied to Solomon. Speaking of Messiah, it is a prediction, that God would in the most public manner declare Jesus his Son, by voices from heaven, uttered on different occasions, and by the descent of the Holy Ghost on him after his baptism, and by his resurrection from the dead: Whereas the same promise spoken concerning Solomon, means only that he was to be the object of God's special affection and care. Accordingly it was so explained in the revelation to David himself, 'I will give him rest from all his enemies round about.'

Ver. 6.—1. When he bringeth again.—Πάλιν here properly signifies the second time. Est. iv. 270.—The son of God was brought into our world, the first time, by his incarnation. But the angels were not then commanded to worship him. That command was given after his resurrection, which being, as it were, a second incarnation, is fitly called 'a bringing him a second time into our world'; when, as the reward of his having suffered death during his first residence in the world, he was made in the human nature the object of the worship, not only of men, but of angels. So Paul told the Philippians, chap. ii. 9, 10, 11.

2. The first-born.—Because πρωτότοκος comes from τίκτω, which signifies to beget (gigno) as well as to bring forth (pario), it may be rendered either the first-born or the first-begotten. I think it should here be translated first-born, answering to heir, ver. 2. See Col. i. 15. note 2. Rom. viii. 29.

3. Into the world.—Οικουμενην, the habitable world; our world. The first coming of the heir into the world is thus expressed, Heb. x. 5. Ελθωντος εις τον κοσμον, when coming into the world.

4. Let all the angels of God worship him.—In the Hebrew text it is Coi Elohim, which in our Bibles is rendered 'all ye Gods.' But the expression is elliptical, and may be supplied as the writer of this epistle hath done, 'all ye angels of God.' The LXX. likewise have supplied the word angels; but instead of θeoi, answering to Elohim, they have put αγγελοι.—Wall, in his note on Deut. xxiii. 43. where the LXX. have the apostle's words verbatim, saith this quotation is made from that passage in the LXX. For although in our Hebrew copy there is nothing answering to it, he thinks the corresponding clause was in the copy from which they made their translation.—In Psalm xcvi. whence it is commonly thought this quotation is made, the establishment of the kingdom of Christ is foretold, together with its happy influence in destroying idolatry. Because, in a few instances, the word elohim denotes idols, this clause is translated by some, worship him all ye idols. But how can idols, most of whom are nonentities, worship the Son? See Beza.—This text is quoted by the apostle to prove, that even in the human nature the Son is superior to all the angels. See note 1. on this verse.

Ver. 7. Who made his angels spirits, &c.—Ο ποιητης, being the participles of the imperfect tense, should be translated, not who maketh but who made. Some think the translation of the clause should run in this manner, 'Who maketh winds his messengers, and a flame of fire his ministers'; supposing that the Psalmist alludes to the agency of the angels, in forming the tempest and lightnings which accompanied the giving of the law.—Pierce is of opinion that the translation should be, 'who maketh his angels winds'; because the comparing the angels to a flame of fire, in the last clause of the verse, naturally leads to apprehend them as compared to winds in the first. I have adopted the common translation, in which the order of the original words is followed, because it shews that the apostle is speaking, not of winds, but of angels.

Ver. 8.—1. Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever.—Because θeoi is the nominative, some translate this clause 'God is thy throne'; that is, the support of thy throne. But the nominative was often used by the Attics for the vocative. It is so used by the LXX. likewise in many places of the Psalms; and by St. Paul, Rom. viii. 15. and in ver. 9. of this chapter. In the opinion of some commentators, the Psalm, from which the passage under consideration is quoted, was composed concerning Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughter. But could Solomon with any propriety be addressed by the title of God? Or could it be said of him, that his kingdom, which lasted only forty years, is eternal? It was not even eternal in his posterity. And with respect to 'his loving righteousness and hating wickedness,' it but ill applies to one who, in his old age, became an encourager of idolatry, through the influence of women. This Psalm therefore is applicable only to the Christ. Farther, Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughter being expressly condemned as contrary to the law, (1 Kings xi. 2.), to suppose that this Psalm was composed in honour of that event, is certainly an ill-founded imagination. Estius informs us, that the Rabbins, in their commentaries, affirm that Psalm xlv. was written wholly concerning the Messiah. Accordingly they translate the title as we do, A Song of Loves: The LXX. αλληλουια τον αγαπητον, a song concerning the beloved: Vulgate, pro dilecto; a title justly given to Messiah, whom God, by voices from heaven, declared his beloved Son.—Besides, as the word Maaschil, which signifies for instruction, (LXX. ις εννοιαν; Vulg. ad intellectum), is inserted in the title, and as no mention is made in the Psalm of Solomon, from an account of whose loves, as Pierce observes, the Jewish church was not likely to gain much instruction, we are led to understand the Psalm, not of Solomon, but of the Messiah only.

Pierce saith "They who imagine this Psalm is an epithalamium upon Solomon's marrying Pharaoh's daughter, must suppose that it is here foretold, that Solomon was to have a numerous progeny by her, whom he should set up for princes and rulers up and down the world, by one of whom he should be succeeded. Ver. 16. 'Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children, whom thou mayest make princes in all the earth.' 2. The sceptre of thy kingdom is a sceptre of rectitude.—Pierce understands this of the antecedent government of the Son, which he thinks extended only to the Jews. But whoever considers this and the following verse, will be sensible that they are a prophecy of the duration and righteousness of that universal kingdom which Christ was to administer after his resurrection; and that the following verse is a declaration, that he should receive the universal kingdom as a reward of that love of righteousness which he shewed in his incarnation and death. Ver. 9. Hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness.—Anciently kings, priests, and prophets, were consecrated to their several offices by the ceremony of solemn unction with perfumed oil; called in the Psalm 'the oil of gladness,' because it occasioned great joy, both to the person anointed, and to those who were present at the ceremony. Wherefore, the Son being appointed of God to the high offices of universal King, Priest, and Prophet, among men, he is called by way of eminence, the Lord's Messiah, Christ, or anointed one. But the oil with which God anointed or consecrated him to these offices, was not any material oil; nor was the unction external; but internal, with the Holy Ghost. 14 Are they not all ministering spirits,¹ sent forth to minister for them² who shall inherit salvation?

Ver. 10. Thou, Lord, in the beginning foundedst the earth, &c.]—Some think this was addressed to the Father, and not to the Son. But as the former passages are directed to the Son, it is reasonable to suppose this is so likewise; especially as it would not have been to the apostle's purpose to quote it here, if it had been addressed to the Father. By affirming that these words were spoken to the Son, the apostle confuted the opinion of those Jews who held that the angels assisted in making this mundane system; an error which was afterwards maintained by some heretics in the Christian church.

Ver. 11.—1. They shall perish.]—Of the perishing of the earth, and heavens or atmosphere, Peter hath written, 2 Epist. iii. 10—13, where also he hath foretold, that there are to be new heavens and a new earth formed for the righteous to live in, after the old creation is destroyed.

2. But thou dost remain.]—ἀειστής, dost remain continually. This word may be either the present of the indicative or the future, according as it is written with or without the circumflex. In the common Greek copies it is written without the circumflex; for which reason our translators have rendered it, 'Thou remainest.' But Pierce contends that it should be rendered, 'Thou shalt remain,' because the other verbs in the verse are in the future tense.

Ver. 12.—1. And as an upper garment, or cloak.]—Βεζα thinks the word περικάλυμμα signifies the covering of a tent, which, when the tent is to be moved to another place, is taken down and folded up. 2. And they shall be changed.]—The word ἀλλάξω-μενται signifies both to change and to exchange. Here the meaning is, that the present earth and its atmosphere are to be exchanged for the new heavens and earth, of which St. Peter speaks 2 Ep. iii. 10.

all the angels, (see ver. 14.), it is said, Psal. cii. 25-27. Thou, Lord, in the beginning didst firmly build the earth, and the works of thy power are the heavens.

11 They, though firmly founded, shall perish, but thou, their maker, possessest an endless existence; and they all, as a garment become useless by long wearing, shall grow old, unfit for answering the purpose of their creation;

12 And then, as a worn-out upper garment, thou wilt fold them up, and lay them aside as useless, and they shall be changed for the new heavens and the new earth to be substituted in their place: but thou, their maker, art the same, without any change, and thy duration shall never have an end.

13 Moreover, none of the angels have any proper dominion over the world. For, to which of the angels did God at any time say, as he said to his Son in the human nature, Psal. cx. 1. Sit thou at my right hand; reign thou over the universe, till I utterly subject all thine enemies to thee?

14 Instead of exercising sovereign dominion, are not all the angels called, Psal. civ. 4., ministering spirits, subject to the Son, (ver. 6.), and by him, sitting at God's right hand, (ver. 13.), sent forth to minister for them who shall inherit immortality as the sons of God?

43. spake of it to the Pharisees as a thing certain, and allowed by all the Jewish doctors, that David wrote the cxiii Psalm by inspiration of the Spirit concerning Christ. This passage, therefore, is rightly applied to Christ by the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews. See chap. v. 10. note.

2. Till I make thine enemies the footstool of thy feet.]—The eastern princes used to tread on the necks of their vanquished enemies, in token of their utter subjection, Josh. x. 24. And some of the more haughty ones, in mounting their horses, used them as a footstool. This passage, therefore, is a prediction of the entire conquest of evil angels and wicked men, Christ's enemies.

Ver. 14.—1. Are they not all ministering angels?]—This is said, perhaps, in allusion to the Hebrew name of angels, which properly signifies messengers.—The word all here is emphatical, denoting, that even the highest orders of angels, Dominions, Thrones, Principalities and Powers, (Philip. ii. 10. Eph. i. 21. 1 Pet. iii. 22.), bow the knee, and are subject to Jesus; ministering in the affairs of the world according to his direction. But, although the scriptures speak of all the angels as thus ministering, the word all does not imply that every individual angel is actually employed in ministering for the heirs of salvation, but that every one of them is subject to be so employed.

2. Sent forth to minister (&c.) for them who shall inherit salvation.]—The apostle does not say minister to, but for them, &c. The angels are ministers who belong to Christ, not to men, though employed by him for the benefit of men. Therefore this passage affords no ground for believing that every heir of salvation has a guardian angel assigned to him. Of the ministry of angels for the benefit of the heirs of salvation, we have many examples, both in the Old and in the New Testament.

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration.

THE foregoing display of the greatness of the Son of God being designed, not only to give the objections of the Jews their full force, but to make mankind sensible of the obligation they are under to obey Jesus, and to hearken to his apostles, the writer of this epistle very properly begins his second chapter with an exhortation to the Hebrews, to pay the utmost attention to the things which they had heard from Jesus and his apostles, ver. 1.—For, says he, if our fathers, who disobeyed the command to enter into Canaan which God spake to them by angels, were justly punished with death, ver. 2.—how can we hope to escape eternal death, if we neglect the great salvation from sin and misery, together with the possession of heaven, which was first preached to us by the Lord himself, and which was afterwards confirmed to us by his apostles and ministers, who heard him preach and promise that salvation, ver. 3.—and whose testimony ought to be credited, since God bare witness with them, by the miracles which he enabled them to perform, and by the gifts of the Holy Ghost which he distributed to them, ver. 4.—But lest the Hebrews might despise the gospel because it was not preached to them by angels, the apostle told them, that God had not employed angels to lead believers into the future heavenly world, the possession of which is 'the great salvation,' whereof he spake.—By this observation he insinuated, that the tidings of the great salvation were not to be disregarded because they were preached to them by men and not by angels, since these men were commissioned by Christ and attested by God, ver. 5.

The Hebrews being thus prepared for listening with attention to the apostle, he proceeded to answer the different objections urged by the doctors against our Lord's pretensions to be the Son of God. These objections, it is true, he hath not formally stated, because they were in every one's mouth; but from the nature of the things which he hath written, it is easy to see what they were.—The first objection was taken from our Lord's being a man. This, in the opinion of the Jews, was sufficient to overthrow his claim altogether; because for a man to call himself 'the Son of God,' was so contrary to every idea they had formed of the Son of God, that even the common people thought it a blasphemy which deserved to be punished with death. John x. 33. 'For a good work we stone thee not, but for blasphemy, because thou, being a man, makest thyself God.' See also John v. 18. and 1 John v. 5. note. In this prejudice the people were confirmed by the sentence of the chief priests, elders, and scribes, who, after a solemn trial, pronounced Jesus guilty of blasphemy, and condemned him to death, because he called himself 'the Christ, the Son of the blessed' God; Mark xiv. 61. A sentence for which there was no foundation, since in their own scriptures it was expressly and repeatedly declared, that the Christ was to be the Son both of Abraham and of David. But the doctors, it seems, understood this in a metaphorical sense. For, when Jesus asked the scribes, how the Christ could be both David's Son and David's Lord, they were not able to answer him a word; being ignorant that the Christ was really to become man, by descending from Abraham and David according to the flesh.

A second objection raised against our Lord's being the Son of God and King of Israel, was taken from his mean condition; from his never having possessed any temporal dominion; and from his having been put to death. These things they thought incompatible with the greatness of the Son of God, and with his glory as the Christ, or king universal, described in their sacred writings. And therefore, when Jesus mentioned his being 'lifted up,' the people objected, John xii. 34. 'We have heard out of the law, that the Christ abideth for ever; how sayest thou, the Son of man must be lifted up? Who is this Son of man?' Their notions concerning the temporal dominion of the Christ, and his abiding on earth for ever, the doctors founded on Dan. ii. 44., where the empire of the Christ was foretold under the idea of 'a kingdom which the God of heaven was to set up, and which was never to be destroyed;'—but 'which should break in pieces and consume all kingdoms.' Also on Dan. vii. 13, 14. Where 'one like the Son of man' is represented as 'coming in the clouds of heaven,' and receiving 'dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him.' Likewise in other passages, the kingdom and victories of the Christ are described by ideas and expressions taken from the kings and kingdoms of this world: And the Christ himself is called God's king, whom he would 'set on his holy hill of Zion;' and Messiah, or Christ, the Prince. These things led the Jews to fancy, that the Christ was to be a great temporal prince, who would set the Jews free from foreign tyranny, and subject all nations to their dominion; that Jerusalem was to be the seat of this universal empire; and that every individual Jew would have some share in the administration of it. Wherefore, when Jesus of Nazareth refused to be made a king, and disclaimed all temporal dominion, and lived in the greatest privacy, subject to poverty, persecution, and death, they derided his pretensions to be the Christ, Mark xv. 31. 'The chief priests, mocking, said among themselves, with the scribes, He saved others, himself he cannot save. 32. Let Christ, the king of Israel, descend now from the cross, that we may see and believe.' These learned men were ignorant that the kingdom of the Christ is not of this world; that it is established, not by force, but by the power of persuasion, Psal. cx. 3.; that it has for its object the destruction of sin, and of all its abettors, and the establishment of righteousness in the earth; that the victories by which these grand events are brought to pass are all of a spiritual kind; and that the greatness of the Christ consists in ruling, not the bodies, but the spirits of men, by drawing their affections, and influencing their wills. And as the Jews had no conception of these things, so neither did they know that the felicity which the subjects of the Christ are to enjoy is not of this world, but of the heavenly country which was promised to Abraham and to his seed by faith.

The ideas which the Jews had formed of the Christ, and of his kingdom, being founded in ignorance of their own scriptures, though pretended to be derived from that source, it became necessary, by clear testimonies out of these very scriptures, to prove, That from the beginning God determined to send his Son into the world, clothed with flesh, so as to be the Son of man as well as the Son of God; that he was to possess no worldly dominion while on earth, but to be subject to all the evils incident to men, and at length to be killed; after which he was to arise from the dead, and in the human nature to be invested with the government of the world, for the purpose of destroying all the enemies of God, and of putting the righteous in possession of the kingdom promised to the saints of the Most High:—I say it was necessary to prove all these things by clear testimonies from the Jewish scriptures; because no other proofs would be regarded by the unbelieving Hebrews.

With this view, therefore, the apostle quoted Psal. viii. 4., where it is foretold, that God would make his Son 'for a little while less than angels,' by sending him into our world made flesh, and subject to death; after which he would 'crown him with glory and honour,' by raising him from the dead, and placing him, in the human nature, 'over the works of his hands,' ver. 6, 7.—and by subjecting all things under his feet. On this the apostle remarks, that we do not yet see all things subdued by him, and put under him, ver. 8.—But we have seen Jesus for a little while made less than angels, that by the grace of God he might taste death for every man; and, for the suffering of death, be crowned with glory and honour, by his resurrection from the dead, his ascension into heaven, his sitting at the right hand of God, and his sending down the gifts of his Spirit upon men. This, certainly is evidence sufficient, that all enemies shall at length be put under his feet. No just objection, therefore, lies against Jesus as the Christ, for his having had no temporal kingdom, ver. 9.—Next, by informing us, that the Son was made flesh that he might die for every man, the apostle hath removed the offence occasioned by the death of the Son of God. His death was necessary for procuring pardon to them who believe; and this appointment, the apostle tells us, is to be resolved into the sovereign will of God, because it belonged to him who is offended by the sins of men, to prescribe the terms on which he will pardon them. And therefore, when he determined, in bringing many sons into glory, to make the Captain of their salvation a perfect or effectual Captain through suffering death, he only exercised the right which belonged to him, ver. 10.—Then, to shew more fully that God determined to send his Son into the world made flesh, the apostle subjoins more quotations from the scriptures, in which the Christ is spoken of as a man, ver. 11–13.

A third objection to our Lord's claim, was taken from his being born of a woman in the weak helpless state of an infant. This the scribes thought incompatible with the greatness of Christ the Son of God. Hence, in confutation of our Lord's pretensions to be the Christ, the Jews said to one another, John vii. 27. 'We know this man whence he is: But when the Christ cometh, no man knoweth whence he is.' Farther, because the Christ was foretold, Dan. vii. 13, 14., to come with the clouds of heaven to receive dominion, the Jews expected that he would make his first appearance among them in the clouds. This they called 'a sign from heaven,' and desired Jesus to shew it, Matt. xvi. 1. But, to remove these false opinions, the apostle observed, that since the children or disciples given to Messiah to be saved, partake of flesh and blood, by being born of parents who are flesh and blood, Messiah also partook of the flesh and blood of men by being born of a woman, that through death he might, according to God's promise concerning the seed of the woman recorded by Moses, destroy the devil who had the power of death, ver. 14.—and deliver mankind from the fear of death, by giving them the assurance of pardon and resurrection from the dead, ver. 15.—So that our Lord's claim to be the Christ, instead of being overthrown, was strongly established by his birth of a virgin.

A fourth objection was taken from our Lord's being subject to all the miseries and calamities incident to men. This the Jews thought inconsistent with the divine nature of the Christ. But, in answer, the apostle told the Hebrews, that Jesus did not lay hold on angels to save them, but on the seed of Abraham, ver. 16.—For which reason it was necessary that in all things he should be made like his brethren whom he was to save; that being their brother, and having the affection of a brother for the whole human race, he might exercise the office of an high-priest mercifully towards men, as well as faithfully towards God, by making propitiation for their sins through his death, ver. 17.—This, however, is not all. He was subjected to affliction and temptation like his brethren, that he might have such a fellow-feeling of their infirmity, and of the difficulty of their trial, as would dispose him, in the exercise of his kingly power, not only to succour them when tempted, but, in judging them at last, to make them such gracious allowances as the weakness of their nature, and the strength of the temptations to which they were exposed, may require, ver. 18.—These being considerations of great importance, they are suggested a second time, chap. iv. 15.

Such are the answers made by the writer of this epistle to the objections whereby the scribes endeavoured to confute the claim of Jesus of Nazareth to be the Christ the Son of God, taken,—1. From his being a man; 2. From his never having possessed any kingdom, and from his having suffered death; 3. From his having become man by being born in the helpless state of an infant; 4. From his having been liable to all the miseries and calamities incident to men.—Wherefore, after hearing these answers, the offence of the cross ought, with the Jews, to have ceased for ever. And if any others reject the gospel, on account of the high titles given therein to Jesus, fancying his greatness as the Son of God is inconsistent with his manifestation and sufferings in the flesh, the reasonings in this chapter are highly worthy of their consideration, as they afford a satisfactory solution of their doubts.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. II.—1 Because the Son, by whom God hath spoken to us in these last days, is greatly superior to all the angels, both in his nature and office, we ought to pay the more attention to the things which the ministers of the word heard him speak, (ver. 3.), lest at any time we should let them slip out of our minds.

2 For, if the law which God spake to the Israelites, by the ministry of angels, was so confirmed by the miracles which accompanied it, that every presumptuous transgression and disobedience received a just punishment,

3 How shall we escape unpunished, if we disbelieve and despise the news of so great a salvation? which began to be preached by the Lord himself, and hath been fully published and confirmed to us Jews, not by a vague report, but by the credible testimony of the apostles and others who heard him;

4 God himself bearing joint witness to the salvation preached of the Lord and his apostles, both by signs and wonders, and miracles of diverse kinds, which he enabled these preachers to perform, and by distributions of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, which they bestowed, not according to their will, but according to his own pleasure?

5 For although the angel (Exod. xxiii. 20.) who conducted the Israelites had Canaan subjected to him, to the angels God hath not

Ver. 1. Let them slip. — ἵνα μὴ ἀφίσχουσιν; literally, should run out, as leaky vessels. This word is used in the same sense, Prov. iii. 21. LXX. ἵνα μὴ ἀφίσχουσιν, 'my son, let them not depart.'

Ver. 2.—1. For if the word. — Ὁ λόγος, the word, signifies the law of Moses, and all the other commands given to the Israelites, but especially the command to enter into Canaan; as is plain from the contrast, in this passage, between the salvation of believers by their introduction into heaven, and the salvation of the Israelites by their introduction into Canaan.

2. Spoken by angels. — That the law of Moses was spoken by angels, is affirmed likewise by Stephen, Acts vii. 53. and by Paul, Gal. iii. 19. And that one angel in particular spake to Moses from the bush, and on Mount Sinai, the same Stephen informs us, Acts vii. 30—38. Yet we are told, Heb. i. 1. xii. 25. that the law was spoken by God himself. To reconcile these seemingly opposite accounts, we may suppose, that as Moses, afterwards, was employed to speak to the Israelites, in the name of God, the words which God spake to him, so when the ten commandments were spoken, an angel was employed to repeat, in a loud and terrible voice, the words which God pronounced, 'I am the Lord thy God,' with what follows. And that other angels, as Chrysostom observes, excited the thunderings, the lightnings, the smoke, the earthquake, and the sounding of the trumpet, which preceded God's speaking.

3. Transgression and disobedience. — Ἐκτροπή, is the leaping over the bounds which the law hath set, by doing the things it forbids.—Ἀπειθεία, is the refusing to do the things it enjoins.

Ver. 3.—1. Neglect so great a salvation. — As the salvation preached in the gospel, consists in delivering mankind from their spiritual enemies, and in putting them in possession of rest in the heavenly country, it justly merits the epithet of great, being unspeakably greater than the salvation which God wrought for the Israelites; which consisted in their deliverance from the Egyptian bondage, Exod. xx. 2. and in their being made to rest in Canaan from all their enemies round about.

2. Which beginning to be spoken by the Lord. — Jesus is called the Lord, because, as maker and governor of the world, he is Lord of all, Acts x. 36.; consequently he is able both to reward those who obey him, by bestowing on them eternal salvation, and to punish with everlasting destruction those who disobey him. This salvation was formerly preached to the Israelites in the covenant with Abraham, under the figure of giving them the everlasting possession of Canaan; but was preached plainly by the Lord, and by his apostles, in the gospel.

3. Was confirmed to us by them who heard him. — The apostle having observed in ver. 2. that the law spoken by angels was confirmed by the miracles which accompanied its delivery, he judged it proper to mention, that the gospel was equally confirmed by the great miracles which accompanied the preaching, both of Jesus himself and of his apostles. Wherefore, such of the Hebrews as had not heard Jesus preach the great salvation, were nevertheless bound to give heed to the things which he had preached, since they were sufficiently declared and proved to them by the apostles, and the other ministers of the word, who had heard him preach these things. Though the writer of this epistle ranks himself among those to whom the apostles confirmed the preaching of Jesus, it does not follow that he was himself no apostle. See this proved, Pref. sect. 1. art. 2. paragr. 3.

Ver. 4. And distributions of the Holy Ghost. — Moses wrought many signs and wonders and miracles, Deut. xxxiv. 11. But the 'distributions of the Holy Ghost' he knew nothing of. They were peculiar to the gospel dispensation, and consisted of the internal gifts of wisdom, knowledge, prophecy, faith, the discernment of spirits, tongues, and the interpretation of tongues. These are called 'distributions of the Holy Ghost,' because he divided them to every one as he pleased, 1 Cor. xii. 11.

Ver. 5. Hath not subjected the world which is to come. — Ὁ κόσμος ὁ ἐρχόμενος αἰὼνας. The gospel dispensation is called αἰὼνας μέλλωντος, the age to come, Heb. vi. 5. but never οἰκουμένη μέλλουσα,

6 Now one in a certain place¹ plainly testified, saying,² What is man that thou shouldst remember him? or the son of man, that thou shouldst look upon him?

7 Thou hast made³ him⁴ for a little while⁵ less than angels, thou hast crowned him with glory and honour,⁶ and hast set him over the works of thy hands.

8 Thou hast subjected all things under his feet. (Tag. 93.) Wherefore, by subjecting all things to him, he hath left nothing unsubjected.¹ (Nur &c.) But now, we do not yet see all things subjected to him:

9 But we see Jesus, who for a little while was made less than angels,² that, by the grace the habitable world to come. That phrase, if I mistake not, signifies the heavenly country promised to Abraham and to his spiritual seed. Wherefore, as ἐκ κοίτης, the world, Luke ii. 1. and elsewhere by an usual figure of speech, signifies the inhabitants of the world, the phrase ἐκ κοίτης may very well signify the inhabitants of the world to come, called Heb. i. 14. 'Them who shall inherit salvation.' If so, the apostle's meaning will be, that God hath not put the heirs of salvation, who are to inhabit the world to come, the heavenly Canaan, in subjection to angels, to be by them conducted into that world, as the Israelites were conducted into the earthly Canaan by an angel, Exod. xxiii. 20. They are only ministering spirits sent forth by the Son to minister for the heirs of salvation, but not to conduct them. The heirs who are to inhabit the world to come, God hath put in subjection to the Son alone. Hence he is called 'the Captain of their salvation,' Heb. ii. 10. And, having introduced them into the heavenly country, he will deliver up the kingdom to God the Father, as we are told I Cor. xv. 24.

Ver. 6.—1. Now one in a certain place.—The place here referred to is Psalm viii., which hath been generally understood of that manifestation of the being and perfections of God, which is made by the ordination of the heavenly bodies; and by the creation of man in the next degree to angels; and by giving him dominion over the creatures. But this interpretation cannot be admitted, because, at the time the Psalmist wrote, God's name was not rendered excellent in all the earth by the works of creation, as is affirmed in the first verse of the Psalm. The true God was then known only among the Israelites in the narrow country of Canaan. Neither had God displayed his glory, above the manifestation thereof made by the heavens. Wherefore, the first verse of the Psalm must be understood as a prediction of that greater manifestation of the name and glory of God, which was to be made in after-times by the coming of the Son of God in the flesh, and by the preaching of his gospel.—Next, our Lord, Matt. xxi. 15, 16, hath expressly declared, that the second verse of this Psalm foretells the impression which the miracles wrought by his Son in the flesh would make on the minds of the multitude, called babes and sucklings on account of their openness to conviction, as well as on account of their want of literature. Struck with the number and greatness of Messiah's miracles, the multitude would salute him with hosannas as the Son of David. And thus his praise, as Messiah, would be perfected out of their mouth. Farther, it is declared in the Psalm, that this strong proof of his Son's mission was to be ordained by God for the confutation of infidels his enemies, and that he might still or restrain the devil, the great enemy of mankind, called in the Psalm the avenger, because he endeavours to destroy mankind, as the avenger of blood endeavoured to destroy the man-slayer, before he fled into the city of refuge. With respect to the 6th and following verses of this Psalm, they are not to be interpreted of the manifestation which God hath made of his glory by the creation of man, in regard St. Paul hath assured us, that these verses are a prediction of the incarnation, and death, and resurrection of the Son of God, and of his exaltation to the government of the world. For, having quoted these verses, he thus explains and applies them: Heb. ii. 8. 'By subjecting all things to him, he hath left nothing unsubjected. But now, we do not yet see all things subjected to him.' 9. But we see Jesus, who for a little while was made less than angels—for the suffering of death crowned with glory and honour.' Wherefore, according to the apostle, the person who, in the Psalm, is said to be made for a little while less than angels, and whom God crowned with glory and honour, and set over the works of his hands, and put all things under his feet, is not Adam, but Jesus. And whereas, in the Psalm, 'the beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, and the fish of the sea,' are mentioned as subjected, they were with great propriety subjected to Jesus, that he might support and govern them for the benefit of man, his chief subjects on earth; seeing the happiness of man, in his present state, depends, in part, on the sustentation and government of the brute creation. Here it is proper to remark, that if τὰ πάντα, the expression in the Psalm, includes all things without exception, as the apostle affirms Heb. ii. 8. I Cor. xv. 27, angels as well as men being subjected to the person spoken of in the Psalm, Adam cannot be that person, since no one supposes that the angels were subjected, in any manner, to him.

subjected the world which is to come, the possession of which is the salvation of which we speak.

6 Now, that the Son of God was to be made flesh, and, in the flesh, was to be appointed King universal, David in a certain place, Psal. viii. 4. plainly testified, saying, What is the first man that thou shouldst remember him; or the posterity of the first man, that thou shouldst take such care of them?

7 For, to save them from perishing, thou wilt make him, who is thy Son, for a little while less than angels, by clothing him with flesh, and subjecting him to death: After that, thou wilt crown him with glory and honour, by raising him from the dead, and wilt set him over the works of thy hands, as Ruler and Lord of all.

8 Thou wilt put all things under his feet. See Eph. i. 22. note. Wherefore, by subjecting all things to him, God will leave nothing unsubjected; consequently, there is nothing over which his power will not at length finally prevail. But at present we do not yet see all things subjected to him; for evil angels and wicked men are still unsubdued by him:

9 But we see Jesus, who for a little while was made less than angels, by appearing in the flesh, that, through the gracious ap-

The foregoing view of the meaning of Psalm viii., founded on the interpretation given of it by our Lord and his apostles, will still more clearly appear to be just, if the import of the several expressions and phrases used in it is attended to, as explained in the following notes.

2. Plainly testified, saying, &c.]—The 6th and 6th verses of Psalm viii. quoted in this passage, were produced by the apostle in confutation of the Jewish doctors, who affirmed, that in regard Jesus of Nazareth was a man, and, instead of possessing kingly power, had been put to death for calling himself Christ the Son of the blessed God, he can neither be the Son of God, nor the Messiah whom God promised to set on his holy hill of Zion, Psal. ii. 6. to rule his people. For in these verses of Psalm viii. according to their true meaning, it was foretold, that the Son of God was to be made, for a little while, less than the angels, by becoming a man; and that, after suffering death in the flesh, he was to be crowned with the glory of universal dominion.—Nor can these verses be otherwise understood. For if they were interpreted of the creation of man, they would have no relation to the apostle's design in this passage of his epistle, which was to establish the claim of Jesus of Nazareth to be the Son of God and King of Israel. Because David, who wrote the viiith Psalm, mentions his looking to the heavens, and to the moon and stars, and particularizes sheep and oxen as subjected to the person who was for a little while made less than the angels, Estius conjectures, more ingeniously perhaps than truly, that he wrote it while he watched his father's flocks in the field by night.

Ver. 7.—1. Thou hast made.]—Here, and in what follows, the preterite tense is put for the future, as is often done in the prophetic writings, to show the certainty of the events foretold.—'Thou wilt make him; thou wilt crown him.'

2. Him.]—The pronoun him, in this place, doth not refer to the immediate antecedent man, or the son of man, but to a person not mentioned in the Psalm, of whom the Psalmist was thinking; namely, the Son of God. Of this use of the relative pronoun see examples Ess. iv. 64.

3. For a little while.]—So ἐκ κοίτης properly signifies, and is translated in our Bible, Luke xxi. 33. ἐκ κοίτης, 'and after a little while.'—Acts v. 34. 'And commanded to put the apostles forth (ἐκπορεύειν) a little space' or while.—That ἀσθενέστερος ἀγγέλων is weaker than angels, in the Psalm, doth not signify 'thou hast made him a little less than angels, but 'hast made him for a little while less;' and that it is to be understood, not of the creation of man, but of the humiliation of the Son of God, is plain, because μᾶλλον, both in his nature and in his rank among the creatures, is greatly inferior to the angels.

4. Thou hast crowned him with glory and honour.]—This, no doubt might be said of Adam, to whom God gave dominion over the creatures. Nevertheless, as St. Paul hath expressly affirmed, ver. 9. that the person who is said in the Psalm to have been made for a little while less than angels, &c. is Jesus, we must understand the glory and honour with which he was crowned, of the things which happened to him after he was made less than angels. See ver. 9. note 4.—Jesus was covered with the greatest ignominy when he was crucified by the Jews as a deceiver, for calling himself Christ the Son of God. But, by his resurrection and subsequent exaltation, that ignominy was entirely removed; and his fame, and name, and honour as the Son of God, were in the most illustrious manner restored to him. See Philip. ii. 9—11.

Ver. 8. He hath left nothing unsubjected.]—Though the apostle's argument requires us to attend only to the subjection of angels and men to Jesus, the universality of the expression sheweth that the material fabric of the world, together with the brute creation, are put under his government. Accordingly, in the Psalm, 'the beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, and the fish of the sea,' are mentioned as subjected to the Son, for the reason mentioned in note 1. on ver. 6. of this chapter, at the end.

Ver. 9.—1. We see Jesus, who for a little while was made less than angels.]—Here the apostle informs us whom the him or person is of whom the Psalmist spake, Psal. viii. 5, 6. He is not the first man, nor the Son, that is, the posterity of the first man; but the person whom God made for a little while less than the angels, is Jesus.

2. That by the grace of God he might taste of death.]—The Syriac translation of this clause is, 'Ipse enim, excepto Deo, per benevoof God he might taste of death² (θνήσκει) on account of every one,³ (ὑπὲρ πάντων) for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honour.⁴

10 For it became him, for whom all things, and by whom all things,¹ when bringing many sons into glory,² to make the Captain of their salvation perfect³ through sufferings.⁴

11 (Tag. 93.) Wherefore, both he who sanctifieth, and they who are sanctified,¹ are all of one FATHER:² For which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren,

12 Saying, (Ps. xxii. 22.), I will declare thy name to my brethren: In the midst of the congregation I will sing praise to thee.³

13 And again, (Isa. viii. 17.), I will put my trust in him.¹ And again, Behold I and lentiam suam, pro quovis homine gustavit mortem.' It seems the copy from which this translation was made, instead of καὶ ἐγὼ, read καὶ ὁ θεὸς; which is the reading also of some MSS. mentioned by Mill, who says the sound sense of that reading is, that Christ died, not as to his divine, but as to his human nature. —Tasting of death, and seeing death, are Hebrew forms of expression, signifying dying, without regard to the time one continues dead, or to the pain he suffers in dying. See Matt. xvi. 28. John viii. 52.—Chrysostom, however, and others of the ancients, were of opinion, that the phrase imports our Lord's continuing only a short time in the state of the dead.

3. On account of every one.]—As this discourse is concerning God's bringing many sons into glory through the death of Christ, the phrase ὁ θεὸς may be thus supplied, ὁ θεὸς καὶ ὁ υἱὸς, 'on account of every son,' namely of God, who is to be brought into glory.—It is true, however, that Christ died on account of every one, in the largest sense of the expression; in as much as all men, without exception, derive great and manifold advantages from his death, although all are not to be saved thereby, as was shewed 2 Cor. v. 15. note 1.—Since the apostle hath declared in this passage that Jesus was made for a little while less than angels, that he might be capable of dying for the salvation of mankind, it is evident that his being 'made for a little while less than angels,' consisted in his being made flesh, in his appearing in the flesh on earth in the form of a servant, and in his dying on the cross.

4. For the suffering of death crowned with glory and honour.]—In the original these words are placed after the clause, 'We see Jesus, who for a little was made less than angels;' and before the clause, 'that by the grace of God he,' &c. This inverted order the Greek language admits, by reason of its peculiar structure. But, in translating such passages into a language which, like the English, sparingly admits an inverted position of the words, they must be arranged according to their natural order, as is done in the new translation. The propriety of this arrangement even the unlearned reader will perceive, if he attends to the translation of the verse given in our Bible, which, by following the order of the words in the original, absurdly represents Jesus as crowned with glory and honour, that by the grace of God he might taste of death for every one. Jesus was crowned with glory and honour by his resurrection from the dead, whereby God demonstrated him to be his Son, by his ascension into heaven, and by his sitting down at the right hand of God as the ruler of the world. All his glory, we are in this passage told, Jesus received as the reward of his having suffered death for the salvation of mankind. The same sentiment is delivered Philip. ii. 9, 10, 11.—The apostles, and all the eyewitnesses of his resurrection, and every one who received the gifts of the Holy Ghost which Jesus shed down from heaven, or who beheld them in others, saw Jesus thus crowned with glory and honour.—So Peter told the Jews, Acts ii. 32, 33.

Ver. 10.—1. It became him, for whom are all things, &c.].—This is a description of the sovereignty of God. The like description we have Rom. xi. 36. The apostle in this passage simply affirms, that it belonged to the sovereignty of God to determine that mankind should be saved through the death of his Son. See the last note on this verse. But, chap. x. 7—10. he proves, from the Jewish scriptures, that God actually determined to save us in that manner, and in no other.

2. When bringing many sons into glory;]—namely believers, called God's sons, John i. 12. This is an allusion to the introduction of Israel (whom God dignified with the title of his son) into Canaan, which was a type of heaven, called glory, because there God manifests his presence, by a light far more bright than that by which he manifested his presence among the Israelites.

3. To make the Captain of their salvation perfect.]—The word ἀρτυροῦ, here translated captain, is rendered a prince, Acts iii. 15. ἀρτυροῦ τοῦ ζῶντος, 'the Prince of life;' that is, the Captain who conducts men to eternal life.—Acts v. 31. 'Him hath God exalted with his right hand to be (ἀρτυροῦ καὶ σωτῆρα) a Leader and a Saviour.'

pointment of God, he might die, not for the Jews only, but on account of every one: Him we see, for the suffering, of death, crowned with glory and honour, by his resurrection and ascension. And these are sufficient proofs, that all his enemies shall finally be subdued by him.

10 The salvation of mankind through the death of the Christ need not surprise you: For it belonged to God, who is the last end as well as the first cause of all things, when bringing his many sons into heaven, to make the Captain of their salvation an effectual Saviour, through sufferings ending in death.

11 Wherefore, that he might be a perfect Saviour, both he who with his own blood sanctifieth, or fitteth men for appearing in the glorious presence of God, (ver. 10.), and they who are sanctified, are all of one father, namely, Abraham, (ver. 16.) that, being his brethren, he might have a strong affection for them: for which cause, though Jesus be the Son of God, he is not ashamed to love mankind, and to call them his brethren, 12 Saying to his Father, when I appear in the human nature on the earth, I will declare thy perfections to my brethren of mankind: In the midst of the congregation of my brethren I will sing praise to thee for thy goodness to men.

13 And again Messiah is introduced, saying, I will put my trust in him. And again, in the same prophecy, Behold I and —Heb. xii. 2. ἀρτυροῦ τοῦ πιστεύοντος, 'the Captain of the faith,' that is, of the faithful; faith being put for those who have faith.—Micah, speaking of Lachish, saith, chap. i. 13. 'She is the beginning of the sin of the daughter of Zion.' In the LXX. it is, ἀρτυροῦ ἀναστάντος αὐτῆς ἐπὶ τοὺς πυλῶνας Σιών, 'She is the captain or leader of sin to the daughter of Zion.' Lachish marched in the front, like a captain in the way of sin, and led on Zion in the same path, as Hallet explains it in his note on Heb. xii. 2.—Wherefore, in the clause under consideration, ἀρτυροῦ τοῦ σωτῆρος αὐτῶν, 'the Captain of their salvation,' signifies the captain who leads them to salvation, or who saves them.—Pierce, in his note on this clause, saith ἀρτυροῦ signifies the first inventor, publisher, adviser, or procurer of any thing. In this sense our translators understood the word, Heb. xii. 2. where they have rendered ἀρτυροῦ τοῦ πιστεύοντος, 'the author of the faith.'—According to this meaning of the word, ἀρτυροῦ τοῦ σωτῆρος may be translated, 'the author of our salvation.' But I prefer the common translation; because the salvation of which the apostle is speaking here, means the introduction of the sons of God into glory, or heaven. See ver. 3. note 1.—The other word, καταβέβαιος, translated to make perfect, properly signifies, to make a thing complete, by bestowing upon it, in the highest degree, that perfection which is suitable to its nature. See Heb. v. 9. note 1. Applied to the Captain of our salvation, it signifies his being made an effectual Captain of salvation, that is, an effectual Saviour.

4. Through sufferings.]—This verse contains an argument for the doctrine of the atonement, which ought to stop all mouths which reason against it. It belongs to the sovereignty of the Deity to fix the conditions on which he will pardon sinners. Wherefore, having determined that they are to be pardoned through the death of his Son, Gal. i. 4. and having expressly declared his determination, Paul. cx. 4. Heb. v. 10. note, our duty is to rest satisfied with the knowledge of the fact, and thankfully to acquiesce in the appointment, although God hath neither made known the reasons which induced him to save mankind through the death of his Son, rather than in any other method, nor explained to us in what manner the death of his Son, as a sin-offering, hath accomplished our salvation. See Esa. vii. sect. 1. and Heb. x. 10. note 2.

Ver. 11.—1. They who are sanctified,]—namely, by the sacrifice of Christ, as is plain from Heb. ix. 14. x. 14. 29. xii. 12. As the Mosaic sacrifices and rites of purification cleansed the Israelites from ceremonial defilement, and qualified them for worshipping God with the congregation, so the blood of Christ, which cleanseth believers from the guilt of sin, qualifies them for worshipping God with his people on earth, and for living with him in heaven eternally.

2. Are all of one Father.]—I have supplied here the word Ἰταρὸς, Father, because the apostle is speaking of our Lord's becoming flesh, by being born, like other men, of parents who conveyed to him the human nature; that, as is observed ver. 17. being made like his brethren in all things, he might be a merciful and faithful high-priest.

Ver. 12.—1. I will declare thy name to my brethren.]—Paul. xxi. from which this passage is cited, was a prophetic description of the sufferings of Christ. For the apostles and evangelists have applied many passages of that Psalm to him. Also, by repeating the first words of it from the cross, our Lord appropriated the whole of it to himself.—The ancient Jewish doctors likewise interpreted the xxiii. Psalm of Messiah.

3. I will sing praise to thee.]—This our Lord did often during his ministry on earth, when he joined his brethren the Jews in the synagogue worship.

Ver. 13.—1. I will put my trust in him.]—ἐμπιστευόμενος πιστεύοντι αὐτῷ. Because this is not precisely the LXX. translation of Isa. viii. 17. Pierce supposes that the quotation is made from 2 Sam. xxii. 3. where the LXX. have the same words as here.—Our translators have rendered Isa. viii. 17. 'I will look for him,' which, though different in words from those used by the apostle, is the same in sense, 'To look for a person' to help one, being the same as to trust in him for help.—Now, since the Son, in his original state, could be in no situ-

the children whom God hath given me.³

14 Since, then, the children (συναίματοι) participate of flesh and blood, even he (παρεκλήσας) in like manner partook of these, that through death he might render ineffectual¹ him who had the power of death,² that is, the devil;

15 And deliver them, who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage.¹

16 (Tag, 91.) Moreover, by no means doth he take hold¹ of angels, but of the seed of Abraham he taketh hold.

the children, that is, the disciples, whom God hath given me, 'are for signs and for wonders in Israel.' This likewise shews, that he was to appear in the flesh among the Israelites.

14 Since, then, the children given to the Son to be saved, participate of flesh and blood, by being born of parents who are flesh and blood, even he, to be capable of dying for them, in like manner partook of flesh and blood, by being born of a woman, that through death (the very evil which the devil brought on mankind by sin) he might render ineffectual the malicious designs of him who had the power of bringing death into the world, that is, the devil.

15 And deliver from eternal death, these penitent persons who, through the fear of future punishment, have passed the whole of their life in a grievous bondage.

16 Moreover, by no means doth he take hold of the angels who sinned, to save them; but of those who are the seed of Abraham by faith he taketh hold, to deliver them from death, and to conduct them to heaven.

ation which rendered looking for God to help him necessary, this passage is quoted with much propriety to prove, that Messiah was to appear on earth in the flesh, and to be afflicted; and, under his affliction, to behave as a devout man in distress: just as the former passage from Psal. xxii. 22. in which he is represented as calling believers his brethren, was quoted to prove that he was to be born into the world after the manner of other men, and to be made like them in all things.—Pierce, imagining that the quotation in this verse was intended to prove Messiah a son of Abraham, considers it as a predication of his faith in God, whereby he became a son of Abraham spiritually. But I rather think, Messiah's relation to Abraham as his son, which is spoken of in the 11th verse, was his relation to him according to the flesh, for the reason mentioned in the commentary on that verse.

2. Behold I and the children which God hath given me.]—This passage being well known to the Hebrews, the apostle cites only the first part of it, notwithstanding his argument is founded on what immediately follows, namely, 'are for signs and for wonders in Israel.'—The opposers of Christianity affirm, that the prophecy from which this is taken doth not relate to Messiah, and that, in applying it to Jesus, the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews hath erred; and from this they infer that he was not inspired. But in answer, be it observed, that the application of this prophecy to Messiah doth not rest on this writer's testimony alone. The 14th verse of the prophecy is applied to Jesus, both by Paul, Rom. ix. 33. and by Peter, 1 Pet. ii. 6. 8. and by Simeon, Luke ii. 34.; nay, our Lord hath applied the 15th verse to himself, Matt. xxi. 44. So that if the writer of the epistle to the Hebrews hath erred in the application of that prophecy, all the others have erred in the same manner. Wherefore, to vindicate Christ and his apostles from this heavy charge, be it observed,—1. That it rests solely on an assumed meaning of the words quoted by Paul, 'Behold I and the children whom God hath given me, are for signs and for wonders in Israel.' This passage, it is said, must be understood of Isaiah and his children, Bear-jashub and Maher-shalah-hash-baz. But if so, the whole of the prophecy must be understood of them. Now, though it be true that Shear-jashub, Isa. vii. 3. 16, and Maher-shalah-hash-baz, Isa. viii. 3. 4. were signs in Israel, where is it said that they were for wonders in Israel? And where is it said that Isaiah himself was for a sign and for a wonder in Israel? It is therefore not at all probable that they are the subjects of this prophecy. Whereas, understood of Jesus and his disciples, it was exactly fulfilled. He was a sign which was spoken against, Luke ii. 34.; and his disciples wrought many wonders in Israel.—2. Let it be observed, that the manner in which the prophecy is introduced at ver. 5. sheweth that it is a distinct prophecy from the one in the beginning of the chapter, concerning Isaiah and his Maher-shalah-hash-baz; consequently, from its being placed after that prophecy, no argument can be drawn to prove that it relates to the same persons.—3. If Isaiah, or, as some pretend, Hezekiah, is the subject of the prophecy, it ought to be shewed how either of them could be a sanctuary, and at the same time 'a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence to both houses of Israel,' as the person who is the subject of the prophecy is said to be, ver. 14.—In Messiah this part of the prophecy was exactly fulfilled. He was 'a sanctuary' to the believing Gentiles and to a remnant of the Israelites. He was also 'a stone of stumbling to both houses of Israel;' that is, to the greatest part of the Israelites, who were broken or cast off for their unbelief.—4. If Isaiah spoke of himself and of his two sons, when he said, 'Behold I and the children whom God hath given me,' &c. he must have spoken the whole prophecy, and particularly the 16th verse, in his own name, 'Bind up the testimony, and seal the law among my disciples.' Now, who were Isaiah's disciples, among whom the testimony was to be bound up, and the law sealed? Certainly not the two houses of Israel: for they were Isaiah's disciples neither by right nor in fact. This part of the prophecy, therefore, was spoken by Messiah, whose disciples all who believe the gospel are. And it is a predication, that the testimony would be bound up, and the law sealed among them, by Christ and by his apostles, who were the children of God, 'whom God hath given to him.' See John xvi. 6. And as the testimony was to be bound up, in order to its being laid aside, so the law was to be sealed for the same purpose. This appears from Dan. ix. 24. LXX, where the phrase σφραγίσαι τὰς γραφάς, to seal up, is used to denote the removing or abolishing of sins. Wherefore, 'the binding up the testimony,' and 'the sealing up the law,' signify, that the whole Mosaic economy was to be laid aside, as of no further use, having answered its end. But it was to be laid aside in such a manner as not to invalidate the law and the prophets as revelations from God, on which that economy was at first established. Accordingly, in this manner the testimony was actually bound up, and the law sealed by Messiah. So our Lord told his hearers, Matt. v. 17. 'Think not that I am come to destroy the law and the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil.' I am not come to destroy the authority of the law and the prophets as revelations from God; but to put an end to the economy which was founded on them, after shewing them to have been from God, by fulfilling every thing written in them. That this is our Lord's meaning is evident from his adding, ver. 18. 'I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass away, one jot or one tittle shall in no way pass from the law, till all be fulfilled.'—5. If Isaiah spoke of himself and of his sons, in the verse quoted by the writer to the Hebrews, as the opposers of Christianity affirm, they ought to shew, what influence their being placed, for signs and wonders in Israel had in binding up the testimony and sealing the law. Surely the prophet and his sons had no hand in bringing about these events? But it was accomplished by Christ and his apostles, who were for 'signs and for wonders in Israel;' that is, wrought great miracles, which excited wonder among the Israelites; and were signs or proofs to them that he was the Christ the Son of God, and had power to abolish the law. These signs, however, as Simeon foretold, when he had the child Jesus in his arms, would be spoken against, Luke ii. 34., particularly the great sign of his resurrection, called 'the sign of the prophet Jonah.'—To conclude, after considering this prophecy in all its parts, it appears, that the writer to the Hebrews hath not erred in applying it to Jesus, as Messiah.

Ver. 14.—1. That through death he might render ineffectual.]—So ἀναιμάτως properly signifies. See Rom. iii. 31. note 1.—Since the Son of God is said to have partaken of the flesh and blood of the children in the same manner that they themselves partake of these, namely, by being born of a woman; and since he was born into the world in that manner to render him capable of dying, that, through his death in the flesh, he might frustrate the malicious contrivance of him who first introduced death into the world, that is, the devil; we are thereby taught, that he is the seed of the woman which at the fall was promised to bruise the head of the serpent; and that the serpent who deceived Eve was not a natural serpent, but the devil, who, because he assumed the form of a serpent on that occasion, is called, Rev. xx. 2. 'the great dragon' or serpent; and 'that old serpent the devil.' See 2 Cor. xi. 3. note 1.—The intention of the devil in seducing our first parents, was to destroy them, and thereby to put an end to the human species. This malicious design the Son of God rendered ineffectual, by assuming our nature, and in that nature dying as a sacrifice for sin.

2. Him who had the power of death.]—In this passage τοῦ θανάτου is the participle of the imperfect of the Indicative, and is rightly translated, 'Him who had the power of death.' For the apostle's meaning is, that the devil, at the beginning of the world, had the power of bringing death on all mankind, by tempting their first parents to sin. Hence he is called 'a murderer from the beginning;'—and a liar, and the father of it, John viii. 44.—It is observable, that the power of death ascribed to the devil is called ἐξουσία, and not δύναμις, because he had no right to it. It was a power usurped by guile.—All the baneful effects of this power Christ at the resurrection will remove, at least so far as they relate to the righteous.

Ver. 15. Deliver them who through fear of death, &c.]—Here the apostle had the pious Gentiles especially in his eye, who, having lived without any written revelation from God, were grievously enslaved by the fear of death, because they had no assurance of the pardon of sin, nor any certain hope of a blessed immortality.

Ver. 16. Doth he take hold of angels, but of the seed of Abraham he taketh hold.]—In this translation I have followed the Vulgate, 'Nequaquam enim angelos apprehendit, sed semen Abrahamæ apprehendit.'—The word συνέλαβεν signifies the taking hold of a thing with one's hand, in order to support or to carry it away. Accordingly it is so translated in the margin of our Bible, and in Luke ix. 47. xx. 26.—If the sin of the angels who, as Jude tells us, ver. 6. 'kept not their own office,' consisted in their aspiring after higher stations and offices than those originally allotted to them by God, as Jude's expression insinuates, we can see a reason why the Son of God did not take hold of them to save them, but took hold

17 (28th) *Hence it was necessary he should be made like his brethren in all things, that he might be a merciful and faithful high-priest, in matters PERTAINING to God. (ut ro) in order to expiate the sins of the people.*²

18 (12^g, 91.) *Beside, by what he suffered himself when tempted, he is able (Ess. iv. 30.) to succour them who are tempted.*³

17 Hence it was necessary he should be made like his brethren (ver. 11.) in all things, and particularly in afflictions and temptations, that, having a feeling of their infirmity, and being capable of dying, he might become a merciful as well as a faithful high-priest in matters pertaining to God, in order, by his death, (ver. 14.), to expiate the sins of the people, and to intercede with God in their behalf.

18 Besides by what he suffered himself when tempted, he knows what aids are necessary to our overcoming temptations, so that he is able and willing, in the exercise of his government as king, mentioned ver. 9. to succour them who are tempted.

of the seed of Abraham, that is, of believers of the human species. The first parents of mankind sinned through weakness of nature and inexperience; and by their lapse brought death on themselves and on their posterity, notwithstanding their posterity were not accessory to their offence: Whereas the angels, through discontentment with their own condition, and envy of their superiors, perhaps also animated by pride, rebelled presumptuously against God. Wherefore, since they could not plead weakness of nature and inexperience in excuse of their sin, nor complain that the sin for which they were doomed to punishment was the act of another, they were justly left by the Son of God to perish in their sin.

Ver. 17.—1. A merciful and faithful high-priest.—The Son of God, who made men, no doubt had such a knowledge of their infirmity as might have rendered him a merciful intercessor, though he had not been made flesh. Yet, considering the greatness of his nature, it might have been difficult for men to have understood this. And therefore, to impress us the more strongly with the belief that he is most affectionately disposed, from sympathy, to succour us when tempted; and, in judging us at the last day, to make every reasonable allowance for the infirmity of our nature, he was pleased to be made like us in all things, and even to suffer by temptations.

2. The sins of the people;—not the people of the Jews, but the people of God of all nations, whether Jews or Gentiles, called in the foregoing verse 'the seed of Abraham.' Hence John tells us, 'he is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world,' 1 John ii. 2. 9. See note 2. on ver. 9. of this chapter.

Ver. 18.—1. Being tempted.—That our Lord's life was a continued scene of temptation, we learn from himself, Luke xxi. 28. 'Ye are they who have continued with me in my temptations.'—Christ's temptations, like those of his brethren, arose from the persecutions and sufferings to which he was exposed, as well as from direct attacks of the devil by evil suggestions—such as those mentioned in the history of his temptation in the wilderness.

2. To succour them who are tempted.—Virgil hath expressed the same sentiment in the passage of the Æneid when he makes Didon say, "Non ignara mali miseris succurrere disco." Lib. i. lin. 634.

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Reasonings in this Chapter.

THE apostle, in the first chapter of this epistle, having affirmed that Jesus of Nazareth, the person by whom God spake the gospel revelation to mankind, is 'God's son.' Also, in the same chapter, having proved from the Jewish scriptures, that God constituted his Son 'the Heir or Lord of all things,' because 'by him he made the worlds.' Moreover, in the second chapter, having answered the objections urged by the Jewish doctors for invalidating the claim of Jesus to be God's Son, and having thereby given full effect to the direct proofs which established his claim, and which were well known to the Hebrews living in Judea, where they were publicly exhibited;—he in this third chapter proceeds to shew what is implied in Christ's being 'the Heir or Lord of all things,' which is the third fact on which the authority of the gospel revelation depends.

A proper account of this matter was necessary, First, Because the title of Jesus to remove the Mosaic economy, and to substitute the gospel dispensation in its place, was founded on the power which he possessed as the Son of God and heir of all things. Secondly, Because many of the Jews, in the persuasion that the law of Moses was of perpetual obligation, and that its sacrifices were real atonements for sin, rejected Jesus as an impostor for pretending to abolish these institutions.—Wherefore, to shew the unbelieving Jews their error, the apostle, who, in the first and second chapter had proved the Son of God to be the heir or lord of all things, exhorted the unbelieving Hebrews, in this chapter, to consider attentively Christ Jesus, the apostle and high-priest of our religion; that is, to consider how great a person he is, that, knowing him to be the Son of God, and heir of all things, they might be sensible that it belonged to him to form and govern the house or church of God, ver. 1.—Next, to convince them that, in forming and governing God's house, Jesus acted agreeably to the will of his Father, the apostle affirmed, that when he excluded the law of Moses and the Levitical priesthood from the new house or church of God which he built, he was as faithful to God, who appointed him his apostle or lawgiver in his church, as Moses was, when he established the law and the priesthood in God's ancient house, the Jewish church.

The proof of this affirmation the apostle did not produce on the present occasion, because the Hebrews were well acquainted with it. By voices from heaven, uttered more than once in the hearing of many of them, God had declared Jesus 'his beloved son, in whom he was well pleased,' and had commanded the Hebrews 'to hear him.' This God would not have done, if Jesus had acted unfaithfully in excluding the law and the priesthood from the house of God which he built, ver. 2.—Farther, the apostle told the Hebrews, that although the faithfulness of Jesus was not greater than the faithfulness of Moses in building their respective churches, God counted him worthy of more glory than Moses; he bestowed on him more power in the Christian church than Moses possessed in the Jewish; inasmuch as he who hath built the house or church of God, not for his own salvation, but for the salvation of others, hath more honour than the house—is a more excellent person than all the members of the church which he built. These things cannot be said of Moses. He built the Jewish church for his own sanctification, as well as for the sanctification of his brethren; and so, being a member of his own church, he was obliged to have recourse to its services, especially its atonements, equally with the rest of the Israelites, where-by he was shewed to be a sinner like them; consequently he had not, like Christ, more honour than the house, ver. 3.—This, however, is not all. To make the Hebrews sensible of the great power of Jesus, as 'the heir or lord of all things,' the apostle observed, that although every society, civil and religious, is formed by the ministry of some person or other, the original of all just power, and the governor of all righteous societies, is God, who, by constituting his Son the heir or lord of all things, hath delegated his authority to him, and empowered him to model and govern these societies as he pleaseth, ver. 4.—More particularly, to shew that Jesus, as a lawgiver, is superior to Moses, the apostle observed, that the faithfulness of Moses in building the Jewish church, was not that of a legislator who himself framed the laws which he established, but it was the faithfulness of a servant who established the laws which were dictated to him by his master, without adding to or diminishing aught from them; and who formed the tabernacles, and appointed their services, not according to any plan of his own, but according to a pattern which God shewed to him in the Mount, without presuming to deviate from it in the least, Heb. viii. 5. This faithfulness in building all the parts of the ancient house or church of God, was required of Moses, in order that the things afterwards to be spoken by Jesus and his apostles might be confirmed by the attestation given to them in the figures, and ceremonies, and services of the law, ver. 5.—But the faithfulness of Jesus in building the new house of God, the Christian church, was that of a Son in his Father's house, who, being the heir or lord of all, was entitled to remove the Jewish church after it had answered the end for which it was established, and to erect the Christian church on a more enlarged plan, so as to comprehend believers of all nations. Wherefore Jesus, in the exercise of that authority which belonged to him as the lord or governor of all things, having actually abolished the Mosaic economy, and established the gospel dispensation, the apostle, to confirm the Hebrews in the profession of the gospel, assured them, that all who believe in Jesus are as really members of the house or church of God, and as fully entitled to the privileges of the house of God, as the Israelites were who believed in Moses during the subsistence of the Jewish church; provided they firmly held, and boldly professed to the end of their lives, that hope of pardon and resurrection to eternal life through Christ which they professed at their baptism, ver. 6.

Thus it appears, that the authority of Jesus as a lawgiver is greater than the authority of Moses. He was a lawgiver in his own right; whereas, in establishing the law, Moses acted only ministerially. His institutions therefore might be abolished by God's Son, who, being the heir of all things, hath all power in heaven and earth committed to him, Matt. xxviii. 18. If so, the Jewish doctors fell into a grievous error, when, from some ambiguous expressions in the law, they inferred that it was never to be abolished, and rejected Jesus as a false Christ, because his disciples affirmed that he had put an end to the law and to the priesthood.

The writer of this epistle having thus displayed the greatness of Jesus as the heir or ruler of all things, addressed the unbelieving Hebrews, as an apostle of Jesus, in the words which the Holy Ghost spake to their fathers by David: 'Wherefore, as saith the Holy Ghost,

To-day, when ye shall hear his voice,' the voice of God by his Son Jesus commanding you to believe on his Son, and to enter into his church; 'harden not your hearts as in the bitter provocation,' &c. ver. 7-11. This exhortation of the Holy Ghost to the Israelites in David's days, the apostle with great propriety applied to the Hebrews of his own time; because if, rejecting Jesus, they refused to enter into the Christian church, God would as certainly exclude them from the rest of heaven, as he excluded their fathers from the rest in Canaan for their unbelief and disobedience.—He therefore requested them to take heed that none of them shewed an evil unbelieving heart, either by refusing to obey Jesus, or by apostatizing from him after having believed on him. This, he assured them, would be a real departing from the living God, ver. 12.—Then ordered them to exhort one another daily to believe and obey Christ, ver. 13.—assuring them, that they should be partakers of his rest in heaven only if they held fast their begun confidence in him to the end, ver. 14.—and told them, that they might know this by its being said to the Israelites in David's time, 'To-day, when ye shall hear his voice, harden not your hearts.' For such an exhortation evidently shews, that faith and obedience are necessary at all times to secure the favour of God, ver. 15.—Withal, to make the Hebrews sensible that unbelief and rebellion are extremely offensive to God, he put them in mind, that by these sins their fathers provoked God, ver. 16. to such a degree, that he destroyed the whole congregation of the disobedient in the wilderness, ver. 17.—after swearing that they should not enter into his rest, ver. 18.—Thus, says the apostle, we see that they could not enter in, because of unbelief, ver. 19.—and by making the observation he hath shewed, in the clearest light, the contagious fatal nature of unbelief; that it is the cause of the disobedience and punishment of sinners in all ages; and so he hath put us on our guard against such an evil disposition.

I have only to add, that the apostle, by exhorting the Hebrews to obey Christ, after describing his supreme authority in the church as its lawgiver, and by setting before them the punishment of the Israelites in the wilderness, hath insinuated, that Christ is judge as well as lawgiver, consequently he hath both authority and power to render to all men according to their works; as will appear likewise from the things set forth chap. iv. 11-13.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. III.—1 Wherefore, holy brethren,¹ partakers of the heavenly² calling, consider attentively the Apostle³ and High-priest of our confession,⁴ Christ Jesus;

2 Who was faithful to him who appointed him,¹ even as Moses also was (w) in all his house.²

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. III.—1 Since the author of the gospel is the Son of God, I exhort you, holy brethren, who by the preaching of the gospel (chap. ii. 8.) are partakers of the calling to enter into the heavenly country, (Eph. i. 18.) to consider attentively the dignity and authority of the Lawgiver and High-priest of our religion, Christ Jesus;
2 Who, in forming the gospel church, was faithful to God who appointed him his apostle or lawgiver, even as Moses also was faithful in forming all the parts of the Jewish church, God's house at that time.

Ver. 1.—1. Holy brethren.]—That the apostle addressed the unbelieving Jews more especially, in this and the following chapter, I think probable.—1. Because the idea of abrogating the law by Christ was peculiarly offensive to them: 2. Because, if the believing Hebrews had been addressed, the apostle would have said, 'Consider the High-priest of your confession.'—The unbelieving Jews are called holy, in the same sense that the whole nation anciently were called saints.

2. Heavenly calling.]—This may signify, as in the commentary: also it may signify, a call given from heaven. See chap. xii. 25.

3. The apostle.]—Jesus, as a prophet like to Moses, that is, as a lawgiver, is called 'the apostle of our confession,' agreeably to the meaning of the word apostle, which denotes one sent forth to execute any affair of importance. Perhaps also in this name there is an allusion to Christ's own saying, John xvii. 18. 'As thou (απεσταλμένος) hast sent me into the world, I also (απεσταλμένος) have sent them.' Jesus, therefore, was his Father's apostle, in the same manner that the twelve were his apostles. 'He was sent forth by his Father to deliver to mankind the new law, and thence to build the church of the first-born which is to continue through all eternity. Hence he often spake of himself as 'sent of his Father,' John v. 38. vi. 29. 39. viii. 42.

4. Of our confession.]—As confession is sometimes put for the thing confessed, 'our confession' may mean our religion, of which Jesus is called the Apostle, because he was sent by God to reveal it; and the High-priest, because we receive its blessings through his mediation. See chap. xiii. 15.

Ver. 2.—1. To him who appointed him.]—Τὸν ποιστάντι. In other passages also, the word ποισίν signifies to appoint: 1 Sam. xii. 6. 'The Lord that (Heb. made) appointed Moses and Aaron,' namely to be leaders.—Mark iii. 14. Επεστειλε δίδωκεν, 'He ordained (or appointed) twelve.' See also Acts ii. 36.

2. Even as Moses also was in all his house.]—This is an allusion to the testimony which God bare to Moses, Numb. xii. 7. 'My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house.' The Jewish church, which Moses was employed to form, being called by God himself his house, because he was present with it, and was worshipped in it, the apostle Paul was well authorised to call the Christian church, which Jesus was appointed to form, the house of God, 1 Tim. iii. 16. See ver. 6. of this chap. note 1. The faithfulness of

3 (Tag, 88.) But he¹ was counted worthy of more (δὲ) glory than Moses, in as much as he who hath formed the house,² hath more (τιμὴν) honour than the house.³

4 (Tag, 91.) Besides, every house is formed¹ by some one; but he who hath formed all² is God.

5 (Kai, 204.) Now Moses (μω) indeed was faithful in all his house as a servant,¹ for a testimony² of the things which were to be spoken;

6 But Christ as a son (υἱ) over his house;¹ whose house we are, if indeed we hold fast the boldness² and the glorying of the hope, firm to the end.

7 Wherefore, as saith the Holy Ghost,¹ To-day (σὺ, 124.) when ye shall hear his² voice,

8 Harden not your hearts,¹ as in the bitter provocation,² (αὐτὰ, 232.) in the day of temptation in the wilderness,

Moses in forming the Jewish church consisted in this, that he did not conceal any of the divine laws on account of their disagreeableness to the Israelites; nor did he alter them in the least to make them acceptable; but delivered the whole law as it was spoken to himself, and formed the tabernacles and the ritual of the worship, exactly according to the pattern shewed him. In like manner, Christ's faithfulness consisted in his teaching the doctrines, appointing the laws, and establishing the worship, which his Father had ordained for the church.

Ver. 3.—1. But he.]—The demonstrative pronoun ὅς, which I have translated he, is sometimes used for αὐτός, and is so rendered in our Bible: Acts x. 36. 'Οὗτος, 'He is Lord of all.' If it were necessary in this passage to supply any substantive agreeing with ὅς, αὐτός, and not αὐτὸς, should be the noun supplied; 'this apostle or lawgiver was counted,' &c.

2. He who hath formed the house.]—'Ὁ κατασκευάσας. The verb κατασκευάζω signifies to set things in order, Heb. ix. 6. It signifies likewise to form a thing as an artificer doth; in which sense it is applied to Noah's forming the ark, Heb. xi. 7.—In this passage it signifies the forming a church or religious society, by bestowing on it privileges, and by giving it laws for the direction of its members.—The relative ὅς, in this clause, being put for αὐτός, it is properly enough translated the house.

3. Hath more honour than the house.]—As the apostle is speaking of the forming of the Christian church, called ver. 2. 'God's house,' it is evident when he saith, 'He who hath formed it hath more honour than the house,' his meaning must be, that Jesus who hath formed the Christian church, is a more honourable or greater person than all the members of that church collectively; consequently greater than any particular member of it. By making this observation, the apostle insinuated, that Moses being a member of the Jewish church, which he formed as God's servant, and needing its services and privileges equally with the rest of the Israelites, he was not to be compared to Jesus, who stood in need of none of the privileges of the church which he formed, nor of its services.

Ver. 4.—1. Every house is formed by some one.]—As the discourse is not concerning a material edifice, but concerning the Jewish and Christian churches, every house must mean every church or religious society. Perhaps also, every community, state or government, righteously established, is included in this general expression.

2. He who hath formed all is God.]—According to Beza, Bengel, and others, he, in this passage, is Christ, who hath created all things, and is God. But there is nothing in the context leading us to think that the apostle is speaking of the creation of the world. Neither doth his argument require such a sense of the clause. Besides, I do not know that the word κατασκευάσας is ever applied in scripture to the creation of the world.—As the apostle is evidently speaking of the forming of churches, or religious societies, I am of opinion that αὐτός in this clause refers to them: He who hath formed all religious societies, namely, the Jewish and Christian churches, is God: For both Moses and Jesus formed their respective churches in subordination to God the supreme Ruler. It is true, αὐτός, to which αὐτός is thus made to refer, is masculine, whereas αὐτός is neuter. But the neuter gender is often put for the masculine. See Est. iv. 21. 2.

Ver. 5.—1. As a servant.]—In describing the faithfulness of Moses when he built the Jewish church, God called him, Numb. xii. 7. 'My servant Moses.'—From this the apostle justly inferred that Moses was not a legislator, but only a messenger from the Legislator.

2. For a testimony of the things which were to be spoken.]—This shews that Moses's faithfulness consisted, not only in forming the

3 But although the faithfulness of Jesus was not greater than that of Moses, he was counted by God worthy of more power than Moses, in as much as he who hath formed the services of the church, not for his own benefit, but for the benefit of others, is a more honourable person than any member of the church; such as Moses was, who needed the services of the Jewish church equally with the people.

4 Besides, every religious society is formed by some one: But he who hath formed all righteous communities and religious societies, is God; who having delegated his authority to his Son, hath made him Lord of all.

5 Now Moses indeed was faithful in forming all the parts of the Jewish church, as a servant who acted according to the directions which he received from God, without deviating from them in the least; because the Jewish church was designed for a testimony of the things which were afterwards to be spoken by Christ and his apostles.

6 But Christ, in erecting the gospel church, was faithful as a son set over his father's house as its lawgiver: of whose house we who believe, whether we be Jews or Gentiles, are members, if indeed we hold fast the bold glorying in the hope of resurrection to eternal life through Christ firm to the end, which we professed at our baptism.

7 Since the Son is the Father's faithful apostle or lawgiver in his church, I, by commission from him, say to you, as said the Holy Ghost to the Jews by David, To-day when ye shall hear God's voice by his Son, commanding you to enter into the rest of heaven, tabernacle and its services according to the pattern shewed him by God, but in recording all the preceding revelations exactly as they were discovered to him by the Spirit. For these revelations, equally with the types and figures of the Levitical ritual, were proofs of the things afterwards to be spoken by Christ. Hence our Lord told the Jews, John v. 46. 'Had ye believed Moses ye would have believed me, for he wrote of me;' namely, in the figures, but especially in the prophecies of his law, where the gospel dispensation, the coming of its author, and his character as Messiah, are all described with a precision which adds the greatest lustre of evidence to Jesus and to his gospel. See Luke xxiv. 44.

8 Be not faithless and obstinate as your fathers were in the bitter provocation at Kadesh, where they refused to go into Canaan, in the day of temptation in the wilderness.

Ver. 6.—1. As a son over his house.]—In the common version it is over his own house. This Pierce thinks a wrong translation; first, because if the church is Christ's own house, to speak of him as a son was improper, by reason that he would have presided over it as its master.—2. Because the apostle's argument requires that Christ be faithful to the same person as a Son, to whom Moses was faithful as a servant. Wherefore, his house, in this verse, is God's house, or church.—To shew Christ's superiority to Moses, the apostle observes, that Moses was faithful only as a servant in God's house, but Jesus was faithful as a Son over his house. He makes this observation likewise to shew, that when he demolished the house reared by Moses, and formed the new house of God, the gospel church, on a plan capable of receiving men of all nations, he used the right which belonged to him as the Son of God, appointed by his Father lawgiver in his church.—If we read in this clause with our translators his house, his own house, it will signify, that the church is his, having purchased it with his blood.

2. If indeed we hold fast the boldness.]—Properly παρρησία signifies liberty of speech. Here it denotes that bold profession of the Christian faith, which in the first age was so dangerous, but which was absolutely necessary to the continuance of the gospel in the world; and therefore it was expressly required by Christ, Matt. x. 32, 33. See Heb. x. 22, 23.—Our translators have rendered παρρησία by the word confidence; but παρρησία is used by the apostle, ver. 14, to express that idea.

Ver. 7.—1. As saith the Holy Ghost.]—These words are quoted from Psal. xciv. 7, which the apostle tells us, Heb. iv. 7, was written by David. Wherefore, seeing he here calls David's words, a saying of the Holy Ghost, he teaches us that David wrote his Psalms by inspiration; as our Lord likewise testifies, Matt. xli. 43.—The judgments of God executed on sinners in ages past, being designed for the reproof and instruction of those who come after, the Holy Ghost, by David, very properly founded his exhortation to the people in that age, upon the sin and punishment of their fathers in the wilderness. And the apostle for the same reason fitly applied the words which the Holy Ghost spoke to the people by David, to the Hebrews in his day, to prevent them from hardening their hearts, when they heard God's voice speaking to them in the gospel by his Son.

2. To-day, when ye shall hear his voice.]—His voice is God's voice, ordering the Israelites in David's time to enter into his rest. For though God is not mentioned in the beginning of the verse, he is mentioned, ver. 11, as swearing, 'They shall not enter into my rest.'—Besides, the apostle, Heb. iv. 8, expressly affirms, that in the command given by David, God spoke of the Israelites entering into his rest at that time.

Ver. 8.—1. Harden not your hearts.]—The heart being the seat of the affections and passions, they are said to harden their hearts, who by sensual practices and irreligious principles bring themselves into such a state, that neither the commands nor the threatenings of God make any impression on them. See ver. 12 note.

2. As in the bitter provocation.]—So πικρὸς ἐκπαλι should be translated, on account of the preposition ἐκ, which increases the sense of the word with which it is compounded.—The Israelites provoked God, first in the wilderness of Sin (Pelusium), when they murmured for want of bread, and had the manna given them, Exod. xvi. 4.—From the wilderness of Sin they journeyed to Rephidim, where they provoked God a second time, by murmuring for want of water, and insolently saying, 'Is the Lord among us or not?' Exod. xvii. 2-9; on which account the place was called Massah and Meribah: see 1 Cor. x. 4. note 1.—From Rephidim they went into the wilderness of Sinai, where they received the law, in the beginning of the third year from their coming out of Egypt. Here they provoked God again, by making the golden calf, Exod. xxxii. 10.—After the law was given, they were commanded to go directly to Canaan, and take possession of the promised land, Deut. i. 6. 'God spake unto us in Horeb, saying, Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount: 7. Turn you and take your journey, and go to the mount of the Amorites, and unto all the places nigh thereunto, in the plain, in the hills, and in the vales, and in the south, and by the sea-side to the land of the Canaanites, and unto Lebanon, unto the great river the river Euphrates.' The Israelites having received this order, departed from Horeb, and went forward three days' journey, Numb. x. 33. till they came to Taberah, Numb. xi. 3. where they provoked God the fourth time, by murmuring for want of flesh to eat; and for that sin were smitten with a very great plague, ver. 33. This place was called Kibroth-hataavah, because there they buried the people who lusted.—From Kibroth-hataavah they went to Hazeroth, Numb. xi. 35; and from thence into the wilderness of Paran, Numb. xii. 16. to a place called Kadesh, chap. xlii. 26. Their journey from Horeb to Kadesh is thus described by Moses: Deut. i. 19. 'And when we departed from Horeb, we went through all that great and terrible wilderness, which we saw by the way of the mountain of the Amorites, as the Lord our God commanded us; and we came to Kadesh-barnea. 29. And I said to you, Ye are come unto the mountain of the Amorites, which the Lord our God doth give unto us; 21. Behold the Lord thy God hath set the land before thee, go up and possess it.' But the people proposed to Moses to send spies, to bring them an account of the land, and of its inhabitants, ver. 22. These, after forty days, returned to Kadesh; and, except Caleb and Joshua, they all agreed in bringing an evil report of the land, Numb. xli. 25-32; whereby the people were so discouraged, that they refused to go up, and proposed to make a captain and return into Egypt, Numb. xiv. 4. Wherefore, having thus shewed an absolute disbelief of all God's promises, and an utter distrust of his power, he swore that not one of that generation should enter Canaan except Caleb and Joshua, but should all die in the wilderness, Numb. xiv. 29. Deut. i. 34, 35; and ordered them to 'turn and get into the wilderness by the way of the Red Sea.' In that wilderness the Israelites, as Moses informs us, sojourned thirty-eight years: Deut. ii. 14. 'And the space in which we came from Kadesh-barnea until we were come over the brook Zered, was thirty and eight years: until all the generation of the men of war were wasted out from among the host, as the Lord swore unto them.' Wherefore, although the Israelites 'provoked God to wrath in the wilderness, from the day they came out of the land of Egypt until their arrival at Canaan,' as Moses told them, Deut. ix. 7. their greatest provocation, the provocation in which they shewed the greatest degree of evil disposition, undoubtedly was their refusing to go into Canaan from Kadesh. It was therefore very properly termed the bitter provocation, and the day of temptation, by way of eminence; and justly brought on them the oath of God excluding them from his rest in Canaan. To distinguish this from the provocation at Rephidim, it is called Meribah-Kadesh, Deut. xxxii. 51.

Ver. 9. Where your fathers tempted me.—This, which is the Syriac and Vulgate translation, is more just than our English version, 'When your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my works forty years;' for the word saw implies, that at the time of the bitter provocation the Israelites had seen God's works forty years; contrary to the history, which sheweth that the bitter provocation happened in the beginning of the third year from the Exodus. Whereas the translation in the Vulgate, agreeably to the matter of fact, represents God as saying by David, that the Israelites tempted God in the wilderness during forty years, notwithstanding all that time they had seen God's miracles. This and the following verse differs a little from our present Hebrew copy of Psal. xcv. 9. which runs thus: 'Your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my works. 10. Forty years long was I grieved with this generation, and said, It is a people that do err in their heart.'—In like manner the LXX. Psal. xcv. 10. Τριηκοντα ετη πικρὸς ἔσθην τὴν γενεάν σου. But Pierce is of opinion, that in the Hebrew copy used by the apostle this passage was written as the apostle hath translated it. Ver. 11.—I. So I swear.—Vulgate, 'Quibus juravi,'—To whom I swear,' as in Psal. xcv. 11. But the Syriac hath, 'Adeo ut juraverim,' agreeably to the epistle.

2. In my wrath.]—In scripture, human parts and passions are ascribed to God, not as really in God, but to give us some idea of his attributes and operations, accommodated to our manner of conceiving things. Wherefore, when God said that 'he swore in his wrath,' we are not to fancy that he felt the passion of wrath, but that he acted, on that occasion, as men do who are moved by anger. He declared, by an oath, his fixed resolution to punish the unbelieving Israelites, by excluding them for ever from his rest in Canaan, because they refused to go into that country when he commanded them. And, to shew that this punishment was not too severe, God, by the mouth of David, mentioned their tempting him all the forty years they were in the wilderness.

3. They shall not enter.]—Σι σιναλισθησιν, literally, 'If they shall enter.' The expression is elliptical, and is thus to be supplied: 'If they shall enter into my rest, I am not God.'

4. Into my rest.]—This oath of God is written at large, Numb. xiv. 28-35. But the account given of it in Psal. xcv. 7., expresseth its meaning; being formed on the words of Moses, Deut. xii. 9. 'Ye are not as yet come to the rest, and to the inheritance which the Lord your God giveth you.'—God called Canaan his rest, because it was his land, and because there he was to rest from his work of introducing the Israelites into it; and they were to repose themselves after the fatigues they had undergone in the wilderness, and to live in safety under his protection. But the Sabbath also is called God's rest, because on that day he rested from his work of Creation. See chap. iv. 10. note. And heaven hath the same appellation given it, because there God enjoys unspeakable felicity in the contemplation of his own perfections and works. See chap. iv. 9. note.—I suppose the first of these rests only was meant, when God swore that none of the rebellious Israelites, save Caleb and Joshua, should enter into his rest. For it is reasonable to think that some of them repented of their rebellion before they died, and are to be admitted into heaven.

Ver. 12.—1. Brethren, take heed, &c.]—To understand the propriety of the exhortation to the believing Hebrews to beware of renouncing the gospel, founded on the behaviour of the Israelites in the wilderness, their condition must be compared with that of the Israelites. The latter, after receiving the law, were ordered to take possession of Canaan, that having a fixed abode there, they might preserve the knowledge and practise the worship of God according to the law. And to encourage them, God promised to drive out the inhabitants before them. Nevertheless, from not believing God's promises, and from fear of the inhabitants, they refused to enter, and proposed to return to Egypt. In like manner, the Hebrews having received the gospel, were ordered to profess and publish it; and to encourage them to do so, God promised that the gospel would at length overcome all opposition; and that he would reward those with the rest of heaven, who professed and published it boldly. But the profession and publication of the gospel, in that age, being attended with greater danger to individuals, than that which attended the Israelites' entry into Canaan; and the establishment of the gospel in the world being an event more improbable, in that age, than the conquest of Canaan in Moses's days, the Hebrews to whom this epistle was directed, had greater temptations to renounce the gospel, and return to Judaism, than the Israelites had to refuse going into Canaan, and to return into Egypt. Wherefore, as their renouncing the gospel must have proceeded from their disbelieving God's promise, and from their distrusting his power, the apostle had good reason to caution them against an evil heart of unbelief.

2. By departing from the living God.]—Apostasy from the gospel which God spake to the Hebrews by his Son, is termed 'a departing from the living God,' in allusion to the speeches of the Israelites, who said one to another, Numb. xiv. 4. 'Let us make a captain, and let us return into Egypt.' For as the returning of the Israelites into Egypt would have been a real departing from the living God, who resided among them in the pillar of cloud and fire which covered the tabernacle, and who shewed himself to be the living God by the continued exertions of his power in their behalf, ἡμέραν) every day, while it is called to-day; lest any of you should be hardened! (see ver. 8. note 1.) through the deceitfulness of sin.

14 For we are partakers of Christ's house,¹ (οἰκῶν) if indeed we hold fast the begun confidence² firm unto the end;

15 As YE MAY KNOW (ὡς τὸ μαρτυρεῖται, 9.) by the saying, To-day, when ye shall hear his voice, harden not (see ver. 8. note 1.) your hearts as in the bitter provocation.

16 For (τινι, 54.) many, when they heard,¹ bitterly provoked GOD. However, not all they who went out of Egypt² (ἄν, 119.) with Moses.

17 But with whom was he displeased¹ forty years? was it not with them who sinned, whose carcases² fell in the wilderness? (Numb. xiv. 29.)

18 And to whom did he swear that they should not enter into his rest, but to them who did not believe?

19 (καί, 219.) So we see that they could not enter in because of unbelief.¹

so the renouncing of the gospel, in that age, would have been in the Hebrews a real departing from the living God, who resided among them by the miraculous gifts and operations of the Holy Ghost.

Ver. 13. Hardened through the deceitfulness of sin.—Mark xvi. 14. 'He upbraided them for their unbelief and hardness of heart.'—The unbelief of his disciples was termed by Christ 'hardness of heart,' to shew that the proofs which he had given of his power and veracity had not made a proper impression on the heart or mind of his disciples. Acts xii. 9. 'But when divers were hardened, and believed not.' See ver. 8. note 1.

Ver. 14.—1. Partakers of Christ's house.—I have supplied the word house in this clause, because the apostle in ver. 3. tells us that Christ formed the house or church of God under the gospel dispensation. If that word is rightly supplied, 'partakers of Christ's house' will signify, as in the commentary, partakers of all the blessings which Christ hath promised to the members of his house, or church; namely, the assistance of his Spirit, the pardon of sin, resurrection from the dead to a glorious immortality, and introduction into heaven, there to live with God in eternal happiness. Of these blessings the apostle told them the members of Christ's house or church will become partakers, only on condition of their holding fast their begun faith in him to the end of their lives. See the following note.

2. The begun confidence.—Ἀρξάντες τὴν ἐμπροσθεν, literally, the beginning of the confidence; an Hebraism for the begun confidence or faith: as is plain from Heb. xi. 1. where faith is said to be (ἀρξάντων τὴν ἐμπροσθεν) the confidence or firm persuasion of the reality of things hoped for.

Ver. 15.—1. Many when they heard.—This, according to Pyle, is, 'heard the report of the spies.' But I prefer the interpretation in the commentary, because 'the voice of God' is mentioned in the clause immediately preceding.

2. However, not all who went out of Egypt.—Before the Israelites began their march towards Canaan, God ordered Moses to number such of them as were able to go forth to war, Numb. i. 3. 45. But the Levites were not numbered, ver. 49., because being consecrated to the service of the tabernacle, they were not to fight their way into Canaan. Wherefore, while Caleb and Joshua were excepted by name in the oath, because they were willing fathers, to depart from the living God, e. hort one another every day to obey Christ, while he calls you to-day to enter into the rest of heaven, lest any of you should be hardened against his call, through the deceitful suggestions of an unbelieving, timorous, sinful disposition, which magnifies the hardship of suffering for the gospel.

14 For we are partakers of the blessings of Christ's house, the gospel church, only if we hold fast the faith we have begun to exercise on him as our Saviour (chap. v. 9.) firm unto the end of our lives.

15 Perseverance in faith and obedience is requisite to your enjoying the privileges of Christ's house; as ye may know by the saying of the Holy Ghost to the Israelites in David's days, To-day, when ye shall hear his voice commanding you to enter into his rest, harden not your hearts as your fathers did in the bitter provocation.

16 For many, when they heard the command to enter into Canaan, bitterly provoked God by their disobedience, and were excluded from his rest in Canaan. However, not all who went out of Egypt with Moses provoked God by their rebellion, and were so punished.

17 But, to shew you the infectious nature of disobedience, I ask you, with whom was God displeased forty years? was it not with them who rebelled, (Josh. v. 6.), even all the men of war who were numbered, whose carcases fell in the wilderness?

18 Farther, to make you sensible of the evil of disobedience, to whom did God swear that they should not enter into his rest, but to them who, notwithstanding they had seen God's miracles, did not believe he was able to bring them into Canaan, and absolutely refused to enter?

19 Thus we see that the Israelites could not fight their way into Canaan, because they did not believe the promises of God.

to go into Canaan, the Levites were also excepted, because, making no part of the army which was to subdue the Canaanites, they were not considered as disobedient to God's command; consequently were not comprehended in the oath. Accordingly it appears from Numb. xxxiv. 17. Josh. xiv. 83. that Eleazar the son of Aaron was one of those who took possession of Canaan.—The excepting of Caleb and Joshua by name, in the oath, shews how acceptable faith and obedience are to God.

Ver. 17.—1. But with whom was he displeased?—Bengelius observes, that the word ἐνεδίκεται is often used by the LXX. but seldom by other authors; and that Eustathius derives it from ἐξδίκη or ἐξδίκη, which signifies any high place, and particularly the bank of a river. Wherefore the word ἐνεδίκη or ἐξδίκη, applied to the mind, may signify its being raised or excited by any passion; consequently ἐνεδίκεται here may be translated as I have done, was he displeased, or rather, greatly displeased.

2. Carcases.—Κάρκας, literally limbs or bones; a part of the body being put for the whole.

Ver. 18. But to them who did not believe.—That the crime of the Israelites which brought the oath of God upon them, consisted in their not believing that God was able to give them the possession of Canaan, is plain from the history, Deut. i. 6. 8. 32. and from God's words, Numb. xiv. 11. 'How long will it be ere they believe me, for all the signs which I have shewed among them?' Ver. 19. They could not enter in because of unbelief.—As the cowardice of the ancient Israelites proceeded entirely from their not believing the promises of God, they were greatly to blame for it, considering the many astonishing miracles which God had wrought for them, before he gave them the command to enter into Canaan.

—The conclusion of the apostle's reasoning, concerning the sin and punishment of the ancient Israelites, contained in this verse, ought to make a deep impression on every reader, since it shews in the strongest colours the malignity of unbelief, and teaches us that it is the source of all the sin and misery prevalent among mankind. Our first parents sinned through their not believing God, when he said, 'In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die.' And their posterity sin, through their not believing what God hath suggested to them by their own reason, and by revelation, concerning the rewards and punishments of a future state.

View and Illustration of the Discoveries contained in this Chapter.

THE apostle in this chapter enforces his exhortation to the Hebrews, chap. iii. 12. to beware of an evil heart of unbelief, by entering into the deep meaning of those passages of the Jewish scriptures, which describe the sin and punishment of the rebellious Israelites in the wilderness, who flatly refused to go into Canaan. For, with the sagacity worthy of the inspiration by which he was guided, he proves from the oath by which the Israelites were excluded from Canaan, that the promise to give to Abraham and to his seed the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, was really a promise to give believers of all nations the everlasting possession of the heavenly country of which Canaan was the emblem; and, that the oath which excluded the rebellious Israelites in the wilderness from Canaan, likewise excluded all from the heavenly country who continue in their sins. So that in this ancient oracle, a future state, with its rewards and punishments, was actually made known to the Jews.

But to understand the reasoning by which the apostle hath established this important fact, the reader ought to know, what all the Hebrews who understood their own scriptures well knew, and what the apostle expressly declared, Rom. iv. 16. namely, That in the covenant with Abraham God promised him two kinds of seed, the one by natural descent, and the other by faith; and that the promise, to give to him and to his seed the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, being made to both the kinds of his seed, it was to be fulfilled, not only to his natural progeny, by giving them the possession of the earthly Canaan, but also to his seed by faith, by giving them the possession of the heavenly country, of which Canaan was the emblem and pledge.

Upon these principles the apostle affirms, that notwithstanding Abraham's natural seed have obtained the possession of Canaan, there is still left to his seed by faith, consisting of believers in all ages, whether they be Jews or Gentiles, a promise of entering into God's rest; for which reason he exhorted the Hebrews in his own time, to be afraid lest any of them should fall short of that rest, as their fathers in the wilderness fell short of the rest in Canaan, ver. 1.—His affirmation, that in the covenant there is still left to Abraham's seed by faith a promise of entering into God's rest, the apostle establishes by observing, that the promise of the everlasting possession of Canaan being made to Abraham's seed by faith, as well as to his natural seed, his seed by faith have received the good tidings of a rest in the heavenly country, typified by Canaan, as really as his natural seed have received the good tidings of a rest in Canaan. Only, these good tidings did not profit the natural seed in the wilderness, because they did not believe them, ver. 2.—More particularly, to shew that all Abraham's seed by faith shall enter into God's rest in the country typified by Canaan, the apostle appealed to the words of God's oath, by which he excluded the unbelieving Israelites in the wilderness from his rest: 'So I swear in my wrath, They shall not enter into my rest.' For, seeing this oath was sworn, notwithstanding the works of God were finished at the formation of the world, and the seventh day rest was then instituted, ver. 3.—also seeing that rest was called God's rest, in the passage of scripture where Moses hath said concerning the seventh day, 'And God rested on the seventh day from all his works,' ver. 4.—it follows, that the rest into which God swore the Israelites in the wilderness should not enter, was not the seventh day rest, in regard they were in possession of that rest when the oath was sworn, Exod. xvi. 23. xx. 8.

Next, the apostle observes, that God's oath concerning the rebellious generation in the wilderness, was again mentioned by the Holy Ghost to the Israelites at the time they were in possession of Canaan, when he said to them by David, Psal. xcv. 11. 'They shall not enter into my rest,' ver. 5. Now, though the apostle hath not declared the purpose for which he mentioned this repetition of the oath by the Holy Ghost, the strain of his reasoning sheweth that his design therein was to prove, that, notwithstanding the people were then in possession of Canaan, they had not entered into God's rest, according to the full meaning of his promise to give to Abraham's seed the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession; but that there still remained a rest of God to be entered into, of which Canaan was only the emblem and pledge.

This fact the apostle supposes he hath proved to the conviction of his readers; for in the next verse he says, Since, after the Israelites were in possession both of the seventh day rest and of the rest in Canaan, it still remained for some in David's days to enter into God's rest; also, since they who first received the good news of a rest in Canaan, namely, the Israelites in the wilderness, did not enter into that rest through unbelief, ver. 6.—it follows, That if the seed, who in the promise have received the good tidings of a rest in the heavenly country, do not believe these tidings, they are excluded from that rest by the oath which excluded the unbelieving generation in the wilderness from the rest in Canaan.

Next, the apostle observes, that in the xxvth Psalm the Holy Ghost, by the mouth of David, mentioned a particular time, namely, the time then present, for the entering of the Israelites into God's rest, 'Saying, To-day,' so long a time after they were in possession of the rest in Canaan, 'when ye shall hear his voice' commanding you to enter into his rest, 'harden not your hearts,' ver. 7.—His design in mentioning the exhortation of the Holy Ghost to the Israelites, in David's days, not to harden their hearts when they should hear God's voice commanding them to enter into his rest, the apostle hath not declared. But the strain of his reasoning leads us to believe he mentioned that exhortation to teach us, 1. That the command to the Israelites in the wilderness to enter into God's rest, was not confined to them, but is a command to men in every age to enter into the rest which was typified by the rest in Canaan. 2. That neither the Israelites, nor any of mankind in this life, enter into that rest of God which is principally intended in the covenant.—Wherefore, having only insinuated these things hitherto in his premises, he now expresses them more directly, by observing, that if Joshua, by introducing the Israelites into Canaan, 'had caused them to rest,' according to the full meaning of God's promise, the Holy Ghost would not after that have spoken of another day for their entering into God's rest, ver. 8.

The reader no doubt hath observed, that in the foregoing reasoning the apostle hath not drawn the conclusions which followed from his premises, but hath left them to be supplied by the reader, either because they were obvious, or, because the general conclusion which he was about to draw from the whole of his reasoning, comprehends them all; namely, 'Therefore there remaineth a sabbatism to the people of God:' in other words—Seeing it appears from the oath, that the rest promised to Abraham and to his seed, according to its principal meaning, was neither the seventh day rest, nor the rest in Canaan, there certainly remains to believers of all nations, the true seed of Abraham and people of God, a better rest, of which the seventh day rest and the rest in Canaan were only the emblems, ver. 9.—Withal, to shew that the remaining rest is not to be enjoyed by the people of God in this life, but in the life to come, and to give us some idea of its nature, the apostle adds, 'He who hath entered into God's rest, hath himself also rested from his own works of trial, even as God rested from his works of creation:' consequently, he enjoys a happiness like to God's in the contemplation of his past works, ver. 10.—Then, as the improvement of his discourse concerning the rest of God, he took occasion, from the sin and punishment of the Israelites in the wilderness, to exhort all who read this epistle to strive to enter into the rest which remaineth to the people of God, lest they fall or die eternally through unbelief, as the unbelieving Israelites died in the wilderness, ver. 11.—Withal, to enforce his exhortation, he described first the perfection of the gospel, by which men are to be judged before they enter into God's rest, ver. 12.—and next, the omniscience of Christ the Judge, who will render to all men according to their deeds, ver. 13.

Such is the account which the writer of this epistle hath given of the Author of the gospel, as the Creator of the world, as the Lawgiver in God's church, as the Conductor of the spiritual seed of Abraham into the heavenly country, the rest of God, and as the Judge of the whole human race.—He next proceeds to speak of him as the High-priest of our religion, and to shew, that as an High-priest he hath cleansed us from our sins by the sacrifice of himself. This, as was formerly observed, is the fourth fact whereby the authority of the gospel, as a revelation from God, is supported.

They who are acquainted with the history of mankind know, that from the earliest times propitiatory sacrifices were offered by almost all nations, in the belief that they were the only effectual means of procuring the pardon of sin, and the favour of the Deity. In this persuasion, the Jews more especially were confirmed by the law of Moses, in which a variety of sacrifices of that sort, as well as free-will offerings, were appointed by God himself. And as the heathens offered these sacrifices with many pompous rites, and feasted on them in the temples of their gods, they became extremely attached to a form of worship, which at once eased their consciences and pleased their senses. Wherefore, when it was observed that no propitiatory sacrifices were enjoined in the gospel, and that nothing of the kind was offered in the Christian temples, Jews and Gentiles equally were very difficultly persuaded to renounce their ancient worship for the gospel form, in which no atonements appeared, and which, employing men's reason alone for exciting their affections, was too naked to be, to such persons, in any degree interesting.

It is true, this supposed defect in the gospel worship was concealed for a while by the doctrine of the Judaizers, who affirmed, that the law of Moses being of perpetual obligation, its sacrifices and purifications were still to be performed, even under the gospel. To this doctrine many of the Gentile converts had no objection; for, as they had always expected the pardon of their sins through the offering of sacrifice, it must have appeared to them a matter of indifference, whether these sacrifices were offered according to the heathen or according to the Jewish ritual. But the doctrine of the Judaizers being utterly subversive of the gospel, all the apostles strenuously opposed it, by declaring to the Jews as well as to the Gentiles, that if they sought the pardon of their sins through the sacrifices of the law of Moses, Christ would profit them nothing, Gal. v. 2.

The zeal with which St. Paul in particular inculcated this doctrine, and the strong arguments by which he supported it, opening the eyes of many, they became at length sensible, that neither the sacrifices of heathenism, nor the atonements of Judaism, had any real efficacy in procuring the pardon of sins. Nevertheless, in proportion to their knowledge of the inefficacy of these sacrifices, their prejudices against the gospel must have become more violent, because its supposed effect more clearly appeared. And it must be acknowledged, that if in the new dispensation there were neither a priest nor a sacrifice, the prejudices both of the Jews and Gentiles would have been well founded: For mankind, conscious of guilt, can hardly bring themselves to trust in repentance alone for procuring their pardon, but naturally fly to propitiatory sacrifices, as the only compensation in their power to make to the offended Deity.

Wherefore, to give both Jews and Gentiles just views of the gospel, the apostle, in this passage of his epistle, affirmed, that although no sacrifices are offered in the Christian temples, we have a great High-Priest, even Jesus the Son of God, who at his ascension passed through the visible heavens into the true habitation of God, with the sacrifice of himself; and from these considerations he exhorted the believing Hebrews in particular, to hold fast their profession, ver. 14.—Then, to shew that Jesus is well qualified to be an High-priest, he observes, that though he be the Son of God, he is likewise a man, so cannot but be touched with a feeling of our infirmity, since he was in all points tempted as we are, yet without sin, ver. 15.—On which account we may come boldly to the throne of grace, well assured that, through the intercession of our great High-priest, we shall obtain the pardon of our sins, and grace to help us in time of need, ver. 16.—These being the doctrines which the apostle is to prove in the remaining part of his epistle, the 14th, 15th, and 16th verses of this chapter may be considered as the proposition of the subjects he is going to handle in chapters v, vi, vii, viii, ix, and x. And as his reasonings on these, as well as on the subjects discussed in the foregoing part of the epistle, are all founded on the writings of Moses and the prophets, it is reasonable to suppose, as was formerly remarked, that his interpretations of the passages which he hath quoted from these writings, are no other than the interpretations which were given of them by the Jewish doctors and scribes, and which were received by the people, at the time he wrote. See Pref. sect. 2. parag. 3.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. IV.—1 Wherefore, since the Israelites were excluded from Canaan for their unbelief and disobedience, let us be afraid, lest a promise of entrance into God's rest being left to all Abraham's seed in the covenant, any of you should actually fall short of obtaining it.

2 For we also who believe, being Abraham's seed, have in that promise received the good tidings of a rest in the heavenly country, even as the Israelites in the wilderness received the good tidings of a rest in Canaan. But the good tidings which they heard had no influence on their conduct, because they did not believe what they heard.

3 Wherefore, according to God's promise, we, the seed of Abraham who believe, shall enter into the rest of God. But it is a rest different from the seventh day rest, seeing he said, concerning the unbelieving Israelites in the wilderness, So I swear in my wrath, they

Ver. 1. Any of you.]—Some MSS., instead of ὅσων, you, have here ἡμῶν, us; which agrees very well with the context. But the common reading is supported by the Syriac and Vulgate versions.—To understand the commentary on this and the following nine verses, the reader should examine the illustration of these verses given in the View.

Ver. 2.—1. We also have received the good tidings.]—In the original it is, we have been evangelized; which is a phrase used likewise Matt. xi. 5. Luke vii. 22.—The word εὐαγγέλιον in the passive voice, signifies to receive any kind of good news. But by long use it hath been appropriated to one's receiving the good news of salvation given in the gospel. The persons who in this verse are said to have received the good news of a rest in the heavenly country, are called in the next verse 'we who believe.' Wherefore the apostle is speaking of Abraham's seed by faith, to whom the possession of the heavenly country was promised in the covenant, under the type of promising the earthly country to Abraham's natural seed. See Essay v. sect. 3.

2. The word which they heard.]—The word, or good tidings, which the Israelites heard contained not only a promise but also a command. It is recorded Deut. i. 20. 'I said unto you, Ye are come unto the mountain of the Amorites which the Lord your God doth give unto us: 21. Behold the Lord thy God hath set the land before thee; go up and possess it, as the Lord God of thy fathers hath said unto thee. Fear not.' See also Numb. xiv. 1—4.

3. Did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them who heard it.]—Many MSS. and some of the Greek commentators read μὴ συνημνησμένους, agreeing with αἰνέοντες: 'The word did not profit them, they not being mixed with those who heard it with faith.' But as Caleb and Joshua were the only persons who heard this word with faith, we cannot suppose that the apostle would speak of the mixing of the whole congregation with them. I therefore think the common is the genuine reading; especially as it is warranted by the Syriac and Vulgate versions.

Ver. 3.—1. We who believe (πιστεύοντες) enter.]—Here the present tense is put for the future, to shew the certainty of believers entering into the rest of God. See Fas. iv. 12. Besides, the discourse is not concerning any rest belonging to believers in the present life, but of a rest remaining to them after death, ver. 9.

2. Seeing he said,—They shall not enter into my rest.]—The aposstanding the weeks were finished from the formation of the world.³ (Απὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου, see Heb. xi. 11. note.)

4 For he hath spoken somewhere concerning the seventh day thus: And God (ἐπεμύνην) completely rested on the seventh day¹ from all his works:

5 (Καὶ, 224.) Moreover, in this PSALM again, (Ὁ ὠκυνοῦνται ἐν τῇ κατασκευῇ μου) They shall not enter into my rest.¹ (See Heb. iii. 11. note 3.)

6 Seeing then it remained for some to enter into it, and SEEING they who first received the good tidings¹ did not enter in (εἰς) on account of unbelief:

7 (Παύλ., 267.) Moreover, SEEING he limiteth a certain day,¹ saying (σ, 165.) by David, To-day, after so long a time; as it is said, To-day, when ye shall hear his voice, harden not your hearts.

8 For, if Joshua¹ had caused them to rest, he would not, after that, have spoken of another day.

9 (Ἀρὰ ἀπολαμβάνει) Therefore, a sabbatism remaineth to the people of God.¹

10 For he who is entered into his rest¹ hath himself also rested from his own works, (ὥσπερ) like as God RESTED from his.

11 Wherefore, let us carefully strive to enter into that rest, lest any one should fall (σ) die's argument is to this purpose.—Seeing men are by the oath of God excluded from God's rest on account of unbelief, this implies that all who believe shall enter into his rest.

3. Notwithstanding the works were finished from the formation of the world.—God's swearing that the rebellious Israelites in the wilderness should not enter into his rest, notwithstanding the works of creation were finished, and the seventh day was instituted from the beginning, is mentioned in this place, to shew that the rest from which the Israelites were excluded was not the seventh day rest which they were then enjoying, but a future rest into which they might have entered by believing and obeying God.

Ver. 4. God completely rested on the seventh day.—[This Moses hath said, Gen. ii. 3. 'And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, because that in it he had rested from all his works which he had created and made.' These words the apostle quotes, because they shew that the seventh day rest is fitly called God's rest; and that the seventh day rest was observed from the creation of the world.—God's resting on the seventh day Bengelius thus explains; 'Se quasi receipt in suam eternam tranquillitatem.' God's ceasing from his works of creation, is called 'God's resting from all his works,' because, according to our way of conceiving things, he had exerted an infinite force in creating this mundane system. See ver. 10. note.

Ver. 5. They shall not enter into my rest.—[These being the words of the oath, God's rest, in this verse, signifies the rest in Canaan, called God's rest, 1. Because, after the Israelites got possession of that country, God rested from his work of introducing them; 2. Because they were there to observe God's Sabbaths, and to perform his worship, free from the fear of their enemies, Luke i. 68. 74.

Ver. 6. And seeing they who first received the good tidings did not enter in on account of unbelief.—[This the apostle had observed before, ver. 2. Here he sheweth in what manner we are to improve our knowledge of that fact. See the commentary.

Ver. 7. Seeing he limiteth a certain day, &c.—[The apostle's argument is this: Seeing the Holy Ghost, so long after the Jews were in possession of Canaan, said to them by David, When ye shall hear God's voice commanding you to enter into his rest, and by so saying specified that very day as a time for entering, it is evident that the command to the people in the wilderness was not confined to them, but is really a command to men in every age, to enter into the rest typified by the rest in Canaan; and that neither the Israelites nor any of mankind in this life enter into the rest principally intended in the covenant. It is remarkable, that in the course of his reasoning concerning the oath, the writer to the Hebrews hath in three instances omitted mentioning the conclusion which follows from his premises. But as this is exactly in Paul's manner, it is no inconsiderable proof of his being the author of this epistle. See Rom. v. 12. note 1.

shall not enter into my rest, notwithstanding the works of creation were finished, and the seventh day rest was instituted, from the formation of the world: consequently the Israelites had entered into that rest before the oath was sworn.

4 That the seventh day rest is God's rest, and that it was instituted at the creation, is evident, for Moses hath spoken somewhere concerning the seventh day rest thus: And God completely rested on the seventh day from all his works.

5 Moreover, in this ninety-fifth Psalm, the Holy Ghost said again to the unbelieving Israelites in David's time who were living in Canaan, They shall not enter into my rest. This shews, that another rest besides that in Canaan was promised to Abraham's seed, which would be forfeited by unbelief, but be obtained by believing.

6 Seeing, then, after the Israelites were living in Canaan, it still remained for them to enter into God's rest through believing, and seeing they who first received in the wilderness the good tidings of the rest in Canaan did not enter in on account of their unbelief, it follows, that they who receive, or have received the good tidings of the rest in the heavenly country, shall not enter into it if they do not believe.

7 Moreover, seeing the Holy Ghost specifieth a particular time for entering in, saying to the people by David, To-day, so long a time after the nation had taken possession of Canaan; as it is written, To-day, when ye shall hear God's voice commanding you to enter into his rest, harden not your hearts against entering.

8 For if Joshua, by introducing the Israelites into Canaan, had caused them to rest according to the full meaning of God's promise; the Holy Ghost would not after that, in David's time, have spoken of another day for entering into God's rest.

9 Therefore, seeing the Israelites did not, in Canaan, enter fully into God's rest, the enjoyment of another rest remaineth to the people of God, in which they shall rest completely from all the troubles of this life.

10 For the believer who is entered into God's rest, hath himself also rested from his own works of trial and suffering, Rev. xiv. 13. like as God rested from his works of creation.

11 Since there remaineth such a happy rest to the people of God, let us carefully strive to enter into that rest, by obeying Jesus, lest

Ver. 8. For, if Joshua.—[So ἵνα in this place signifies, being the name given to Joshua in the LXX. translation of the Hebrew scriptures.

Ver. 9. Therefore a sabbatism remaineth to the people of God.—[The apostle having established this conclusion, by just reasoning on the sayings of the Holy Ghost uttered by the mouth of David, they misrepresent the state of the Israelites under the Mosaic dispensation who affirm, that the Jews had no knowledge of the immortality of the soul, nor of future retributions, given them in the writings of Moses: they had both discovered to them in the covenant with Abraham, as recorded by Moses and explained by the prophets. The apostle in his conclusion hath substituted the word Σαββατισμός, Sabbatism, for the word καταπαύσις, rest, used in his premises: But both are proper, especially the word sabbatism in this place, because, by directing us to what is said verse 4. it sheweth the nature of that rest which remaineth to the people of God. It will resemble the rest of the Sabbath, both in its employments and enjoyments. For therein the saints shall rest from their work of trial, and from all the evils they are subject to in the present life; and shall recollect the labours they have undergone, the dangers they have escaped, and the temptations they have overcome: and by reflecting on these things, and on the method of their salvation, they shall be unspeakably happy. See chap. ix. 4. note 2. at the end. To this add, that being admitted into the immediate presence of God to worship, they shall, as Doddridge observes, "pass a perpetual Sabbath, in those elevations of pure devotion which the sublimest moments of our most sacred and happy days can teach us but imperfectly to conceive."—Here it is to be remarked, that the Hebrews themselves considered the Sabbath as an emblem of the heavenly rest; for St. Paul reckons Sabbaths among those Jewish institutions which were shadows of good things to come, Col. ii. 17.

Ver. 10. He who is entered into his rest hath himself, &c.—[God having on the seventh day rested from his work of creation, and having on that day surveyed the whole, and found it good, by sanctifying and blessing it he appointed men to rest on the seventh day, not only in commemoration of his having rested on that day, but to teach them, that their happiness in a future state will consist in resting from their work of trial, and in reviewing it after it is finished. Hence, our entering into God's rest, because we enter into a happiness similar to his. And this instruction, in both its parts, was of so much importance to the world, that the Israelites were settled in Canaan chiefly for the purpose of observing God's Sabbaths, Exod. xxxi. 13–17. From the account given in this verse of the rest which remaineth to the people of God, namely, that they do not enter into it till their works of trial and suffering are finished, it is evident that the rest which remaineth to the people of God is the rest of heaven; of which the seventh day rest is only an emblem.

12 For (ὁ λόγος Θεοῦ) the word of God¹ is living² and effectual,³ and more cutting than any two-edged sword,⁴ piercing even to the parting both of soul and spirit,⁵ and of the joints also and marrows, and is a discernor of the devices and purposes of the heart.

13 And there is no creature unapparent in his sight, for all things are naked and open to the eyes of him to whom we must give an account.⁶

14 (Ov, 262.) Now,¹ having a great High-priest² who hath passed through the heavens,³ Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our confession. (See chap. iii. 1. note 4.)

15 For we have not an High-priest who cannot sympathize with our weakness:¹ But

Ver. 11. Fall after the same example of unbelief.]—The unbelief here said to be the cause of men's falling under the wrath of God, is that kind of it which respects the immortality of the soul, the reality and greatness of the joys of heaven, the power of Christ to conduct the people of God into the heavenly country, the greatness and certainty of future punishments, the authority of Christ to judge the world, and his power to dispense rewards to the righteous and to inflict punishments on the wicked.—The unbelief of these great truths, revealed to us in the gospel, being the source of that wickedness which prevails among Christians, we ought carefully to cherish the faith of these things, lest, by the want of a firm conviction of them, we be led to live after the manner of the wicked, and God be provoked to destroy us by the severity of his judgments.

Ver. 12.—1. For the word of God.]—The apostle having said, ver. 2. λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ, 'the word which they heard did not profit them,'—'the word of God,' in this verse, I think signifies the preached gospel; understanding thereby its doctrines, precepts, promises, and threatenings, together with those examples of the divine judgments which are recorded in the scriptures, by all which the gospel operates powerfully on the minds of believers.

2. Is living.]—In our common version of 1 Pet. i. 23. the word of God is said to be living. So also Christ, John vi. 63. 'The words that I speak to you they are spirit, and they are life.'—Moreover, in the last clause of the verse under consideration, actions are ascribed to the word of God which imply life; namely, 'is a discernor of the devices and purposes of the heart.'

3. And effectual.]—Εἰς τὸν σκοπόν. This efficacy is described by Paul, 2 Cor. x. 4. 'The weapons of our warfare are not fleshly, but exceeding powerful for the overturning of strong holds,' &c. See also 1 Thess. ii. 13. where the word of God is said 'to work effectually in them who believe.'

4. And more cutting than any two-edged sword.]—In illustration of this expression Pierce hath cited the following verse of Poylides:—'Ὁ λόγος τοῦ Θεοῦ ὡς ἡ μάχαιρα διείρηται τὴν ψυχὴν καὶ τὸ πνεῦμα, ὡς ἡ μάχαιρα διείρηται τὸν ἄνθρωπον.'—Eph. vi. 17. we have 'the sword of the Spirit' used to denote the doctrine of the gospel, called 'a sword,' because it is of great use to repel the attacks of our spiritual enemies; and 'a sword of the Spirit,' because it was dictated by the Spirit of God.—Rev. i. 16. The word of God is represented as 'a sharp two-edged sword, which went out of the mouth of Christ.'—Isa. xl. 4. It is said of Christ, 'He shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth;' LXX. τῷ λόγῳ σου σμῆναι.

5. Piercing even to the parting both of soul and spirit, &c.]—Here the writer proceeds on the supposition that man consisteth of three parts, a body, a sensitive soul which he hath in common with the brutes, and a rational spirit. The same doctrine is espoused by Paul, 1 Thess. v. 23. See note 2. on that verse.—The power of the word of God, 'in piercing to the parting both of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrows,' is understood by some of the efficacy of the punishments threatened in the gospel, utterly to dissolve the whole human frame.—In representing the word or gospel as a person who shall judge the world at the last day, the apostle hath followed his master, who thus spake to the Jews, John xii. 48. 'He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my (ἐμὰς) commands, hath one that judgeth him; the word (ὁ λόγος) that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day.' But to raise the figure, the apostle ascribes to the word of God life, and strength, and discernment, and action, qualities highly necessary in a judge. Nor is this manner of speaking peculiar to Paul; Peter hath likewise represented the word of God as 'living and abiding for ever.' 1 Pet. i. 23.; and Plato, by a like rhetorical figure, in his Crito, has personified the laws of Athens. See Rom. x. 6. note 1.

Ver. 13.—1. In his sight.]—Ενώπιον αὐτοῦ. Here the pronoun σου, his, is put, not for any person mentioned before in this discourse, but for him to whom, in the end of the verse it is said, we must give an account; namely to Christ.—The apostle, in what any of us should fall, after the example of the Israelites, through unbelief.

12 For the word of God, the preached gospel whereby we are now called to enter into God's rest, and are to be judged hereafter, is a living and powerful principle, and more cutting than any two-edged sword, piercing not into the body but into the mind, even to the separating between both soul and spirit; shewing which of the passions are animal and which spiritual; and to the separating of the joints also and marrows, laying open the most concealed parts of the animal constitution; and discernor of the devices and purposes of the heart.

13 But, not to insist farther on the rule of judgment, consider the omniscience of the Judge himself: there is no creature unapparent in his sight, for all things, the most secret recesses of the heart, are stript of every covering, both outwardly and inwardly, before the eyes of him to whom we must give an account.

14 Now the unbelieving Jews, on pretence that the gospel hath neither an high-priest nor any sacrifice for sin, urge you to return to Judaism: but as we have a great High-priest, who hath passed through the visible heavens into the true habitation of God, chap. ix. 11, 12. there to officiate for us, even Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast our religion.

15 To this constancy we Christians are encouraged by the character of our High-priest: For, though he be the Son of God, we goeth before, having described Christ's character as lawgiver in the house of God, and having exhorted the unbelieving Hebrews to obey his call to enter into the heavenly country by believing on him, and shewed them the dangerous nature and fatal consequences of unbelief, in the example of the disobedience and punishments of the Israelites in the wilderness, he here, in the conclusion of his exhortation, with great propriety, speaks of Christ in his character of Judge of the world, and sets forth his knowledge of men's most secret thoughts and actions. And by calling him the person 'to whom we must give an account,' he insinuates, that he hath authority to exclude unbelievers from heaven, and power to punish them with everlasting destruction.

2. For all things are naked and open.]—Γυμνὰ καὶ τετραχάλωμενα. This is an allusion to the state in which the sacrifices called burnt-offerings were laid on the altar. They were stripped of their skins, their breasts were ripped open, their bowels were taken out, and their backbone was cleft. This is the import of the original word τετραχάλωμενα. Then they were divided into quarters; so that outwardly and inwardly they were fully exposed to the eye of the priest, in order to a thorough examination, Lev. i. 5, 6. And being found without blemish, they were laid in their natural order on the altar, and burnt, ver. 8. The apostle's meaning is, that infidelity and hypocrisy, however secretly they may lurk in the mind, cannot be concealed from our Judge.

3. To whom we must give an account.]—This is the true translation of the clause, πρὸς ὃν ἔμμεν ὁ λόγος. For the word λόγος has evidently this signification, Matt. xii. 36. xviii. 23. Luke xvi. 2. Rom. xiv. 12. 'So then every one of us (ὁ ἕκαστος ἡμεῶν) shall give an account of himself to God.'—Heb. xiii. 17. 'They watch for your souls (ὡς ἡμεῖς ὡς σωτῆρας) as those who must give an account.'—Others translate the clause, 'of whom we speak.'

Ver. 16.—1. Now.]—Ἔτι οὐκ ἔστιν ἔτι λέγειν. So we may be translated here, because although the apostle has affirmed, chap. i. 3. that the Son of God 'made purification of our sins by the sacrifice of himself;' and hath told us, chap. ii. 17. that he was made like his brethren in all things, that he might be a merciful and faithful High-priest; and hath called him 'the High-priest of our religion,' chap. iii. 1. he hath not hitherto attempted to prove that Jesus is really an High-priest, nor that he hath offered any sacrifices to God for the sins of men. The proof of these things he deferred till he discussed the other topics of which he proposed to treat. And having finished what he had to say concerning them, he now enters on the proof of Christ's priesthood, and treats thereof, and of various other matters connected with it, at great length, to the end of chap. x.

2. Having a great High-priest.]—The writer of this epistle had exhorted the unbelieving Hebrews, chap. iii. 1. to consider attentively the dignity of Christ Jesus, the Apostle and High-priest of the Christian religion. Wherefore, after describing his office as God's apostle, appointed to form his new house or church, he now proceeds to treat of his office as an High-priest, for the purpose of removing that great prejudice which both Jews and Gentiles entertained against the gospel, on account of its supposed want of an High-priest, and of a sacrifice for sin.—It is to be observed, that the apostle calls 'Jesus the Son of God a great High-priest,' because in chap. i. 4. he had proved him to be greater than the angels; and in chap. iii. 1.—4. to be worthy of more praise than Moses.

Theodore, who hath divided this epistle into sections, begins his second section with this verse, because it introduceth a new subject. This verse, therefore, should be the beginning of chap. v. according to our division of the epistle.

3. Who hath passed through the heavens.]—Ὁ διελθὼν διὰ τῶν οὐρανῶν, literally signifies. The meaning is, he hath passed through the visible heavens, and entered into that place where the Deity resides, which, therefore, is the true holy place, and is called Heaven itself, Heb. ix. 24. See Heb. ix. i. note 2.—Into that holy place Jesus entered, to offer the sacrifice of himself.

Ver. 15.—1. Sympathize with our weakness.]—The Son of God

ONE WHO was tempted in all points according to the likeness² OF HIS NATURE TO OURS, without sin. (Heb. ii. 17, 18.)

16 Let us therefore approach with boldness to the throne of grace, that we may receive mercy, and obtain grace for the purpose of seasonable help.¹

being made flesh, experienced all the miseries and temptations incident to men: consequently he must always have a lively feeling of our infirmity. See Heb. ii. 17. note 1.

2. Tempted in all points according to the likeness.—Κατ' ὁμοιότητα. The likeness of our Lord's nature to ours was not an exact likeness; for he was free from that corruption which, as the con-have not in him an High-priest who cannot sympathize with us in our weaknesses, but one most compassionate, who, being made flesh, was tempted in all points as far as the likeness of his nature to ours would admit, yet never committed any sin.

16 Let us, therefore, through his mediation as our High-priest, approach with boldness to the throne of grace on which God is seated to hear our addresses, that we may receive pardon; and, when tempted or persecuted, obtain the gracious assistance of his Spirit to help us seasonably in such times of distress.

sequence of Adam's sin, has infected all mankind; as is intimated likewise in the expression, Rom. vii. 5. 'sending his Son in the likeness of sinful flesh.'

Ver. 16. Seasonable help.—Εἰς ὥραν βοήθειαν. The word βοηθία signifies help obtained in consequence of crying aloud, or strong crying for it.

CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Doctrines explained and proved in this Chapter.

THE priesthood and sacrifice of the Son of God, and the pardon procured for sinners thereby, together with the many happy effects of the pardon thus procured, being matters of the utmost consequence to mankind, the apostle, in this chapter, and what follows to the nineteenth verse of the tenth chapter, hath proposed at great length the proofs by which they are established. And it was very proper that he should be copious, not only in his proofs of these important subjects, but also in his comparison of the priesthood of Christ with the Levitical priesthood, that while he established the merit of the sacrifice of Christ, he might shew the inefficacy of the Levitical atonements, and of all other sacrifices whatever. For as the unbelieving Jews did not acknowledge his apostleship, St. Paul knew that his affirmation of these matters would not be held by them as sufficient evidence.

His proof of the priesthood of Christ, the apostle begins in this chapter with describing the office of an High-priest. He is one taken from among men, and is appointed to perform for men all the parts of the public worship of God; and, in particular, he is appointed to offer both gifts and sacrifices for sin, ver. 1.—Next, he is a man clothed with infirmity, that from sympathy he may have a proper measure of compassion for the ignorant and erring, ver. 2.—And, because he is clothed with infirmity, he must offer propitiatory sacrifices for himself, as well as for the people, ver. 3.—This account of the designation, character, and office of an High-priest, the apostle applies to Messiah, by observing, that as in the gospel church no man can take the dignity of an High-priest to himself, but only the person who is called to the office by God, like Aaron in the Jewish church, ver. 4.—so the Christ did not, by his own authority, assume the office of High-priest in the house of God; but He bestowed that dignity upon him, who declared him his Son by raising him from the dead, ver. 5.—and who, by so doing, confirmed all the doctrines which he taught, and particularly the doctrine of his shedding his blood for the remission of the sins of many. Farther, that God bestowed on Messiah the office of an High-priest, is evident from his saying to him, after he invited him to sit at his right hand, Psal. cx. 4. 'The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedec,' ver. 6.—These clear testimonies from their own scriptures left the unbelieving Hebrews no room to doubt, that Jesus of Nazareth, who by his resurrection from the dead was declared to be 'the Christ the Son of God,' was by his Father's appointment a real Priest.

Having thus proved to the unbelieving Hebrews, that Jesus was made of God an High-priest, the apostle shewed in the next place, that notwithstanding he was the Son of God, he possessed the other qualification necessary to an High-priest mentioned ver. 2. namely, That he was 'able to have a right measure of compassion on the ignorant and erring, because he himself also,' by living in the flesh subject to the temptations and afflictions incident to men, 'was surrounded with infirmity.' In proof of this proposition, the apostle appealed to two facts well known. The first is, That while he lived on earth in the flesh 'he prayed, with strong crying and tears, to him who was able to save him from death.' The second is, That 'he was delivered from fear.' These facts the apostle mentioned, because the one was a proof that Jesus experienced the infirmity and temptations incident to men: the other, that he received help from God, ver. 7.—Wherefore, although he was the Son of God, yet being also the Son of man, he learned how difficult obedience is to men, by the things which he himself suffered in the flesh while he obeyed God; consequently, he is well qualified, as an High-priest, to have a right measure of compassion on the ignorant and erring, ver. 8.—And being thus made a perfect High-priest, he became, by his dying as a sacrifice for sin, to all them who obey him, the author of eternal salvation, ver. 9.—as is plain from his being saluted by God 'an High-priest after the order of Melchizedec,' on his return from the earth to heaven, ver. 10.

By calling the speech of the Deity, recorded Psal. cx. 4. 'The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedec,' a salutation of Messiah as an High-priest, the apostle hath discovered to us a variety of important matters implied in, or connected with, that memorable speech; such as,—1. That being directed to Messiah, it was a declaration, on the part of God, that he had made Jesus an High-priest, not simply like Aaron, but with an oath; that is, in the most solemn manner, and irrevocably.—2. In as much as Messiah was thus saluted on his sitting down at the right hand of God, in consequence of his being invited to do so, Psal. cx. 1. the salutation was given after he had offered the sacrifice of himself, by presenting his crucified body before the presence of God in heaven. See Heb. viii. 3. note 3.—3. This salutation, on such an occasion, being given to Messiah in the hearing of the angelical hosts assembled around the throne of God, to do honour to him on his return from the earth after finishing his ministrations there as a Prophet, and to witness the offering of the sacrifice of himself, as an High-priest, for the sins of the world, it was a declaration from God, that he accepted that sacrifice as a sufficient atonement for the sins of the penitent; that his intercession for such, founded on the merit of that atonement, would be heard; and that God fully approved all his ministrations.

tions on earth.—4. Seeing, in the salutation, the Deity called Messiah 'a Priest after the order of Melchizedec,' who was a king as well as a priest, he, by that appellation, and by placing him at his right hand, declared him to be not only an High-priest, but the Governor and Judge of the world: So that there can be no doubt of his procuring salvation for his obedient subjects, through the merit of his death as an atonement. Wherefore, those passages of scripture in which his death is spoken of as a sacrifice for sin, being all literally meant, should by no means be considered, either as figures of speech or as accommodations to the prejudices of mankind concerning the efficacy of propitiatory sacrifices. See chap. ix. 18. note, and Ess. vii. sect. 2.—Such are the important meanings comprehended in the expression, 'saluted of God an High-priest, after the order of Melchizedec;' as we learn from the apostle's reasonings in the subsequent parts of this epistle.

Accordingly, that mankind may enjoy all the consolations which flow from the right apprehension and belief of the sacrifice and intercession of Christ, the apostle judged it necessary to search into the deep meaning of the oath by which God constituted Messiah 'a Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedec.' And to excite the Hebrews to attend to what he was to write in chapter vii. 11–28. concerning the import of the oath, he told them he had many things to say concerning Melchizedec, after whose order Messiah was made a Priest, by which Messiah's priesthood would be illustrated and confirmed. But he found it difficult to make them understand these things, because they were of slow apprehension in spiritual matters, ver. 11.—Wherefore, to make them more diligent than they had hitherto been in gaining religious knowledge, he told them plainly, their ignorance of their own scriptures was such, that notwithstanding they ought to have been teachers of others, considering the length of the time they had professed the gospel, they needed to be again taught some of the first principles of the ancient oracles of God; consequently they required to be fed with milk, and not with strong meat, ver. 12.—This, he told them, was a very imperfect state, because every one who uses milk, that is, who knows nothing but the obvious sense of the ancient revelations, and does not enter into their deep meaning, must be very unskilful in the doctrines of the gospel, and is a mere babe in Christianity, ver. 13.—Whereas, the doctrines concealed under the types and figures of the ancient revelations, being difficult to be understood, may be likened to strong meat, the food of grown men, because, when rightly apprehended, they greatly strengthen men's faith, by the light which they throw on the doctrines of the gospel, ver. 14.

CHAP. V.—1 (Tag) Now, every high-priest taken from among men is appointed to PERFORM for men the things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts¹ and sacrifices for sins:

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. V.—1 Now, to shew that Christ is a real High-priest, I will describe the designation, the duties, and the qualifications of an high-priest. Every high-priest taken from among men is appointed, by persons having a right to confer the office, to perform for men the things pertaining to the public worship of God, and especially that he may offer both free-will offerings and sacrifices for sins.

2 He must be able to have a right measure of compassion on the ignorant, and those who err through ignorance, because he himself also is clothed with infirmity; so that he will officiate for them with the greater kindness and assiduity.

3 And because he himself is a sinner, he must, as for the people, so also for himself, offer sacrifices for sins. (Lev. xvi. 6.)

4 Now, to apply these things to the Christ, I observe, first, that as in the gospel church no one can take this honourable office to himself but he who is thereto called of God, as Aaron was in the Jewish church;

5 So also the Christ did not glorify himself by making himself an High-priest, but He glorified him with that office, who, after his ascension into heaven, said to him, My son thou art; to-day I have demonstrated thee to be my Son by raising thee from the dead. (See this argument explained in the Illustration.)

6 As also He glorified the Christ to be an High-priest, who in another psalm saith to him, Thou art a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchizedec: thou art a human priest, not like Aaron, but Melchizedec.

7 Secondly, as an High-priest, he can commiserate the ignorant and erring. For though he be the Son of God, he was subject to

Ver. 1. Offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins. — Gifts, or free-will offerings, as distinguished from sacrifices for sins, were expressions of gratitude to God for his goodness in the common dispensations of his providence. And because the priests offered both kinds, Paul speaks of himself as 'exercising the priesthood according to the gospel,' by offering the Gentiles in an acceptable manner, through the sanctification of the Holy Ghost, Rom. xv. 16.

Ver. 2. Able to have a right measure of compassion on the ignorant. — Beza thinks the word μετριομενης signifies to feel compassion in proportion to the misery of others; but, according to Estius, it signifies to be moderately affected: in which sense Aristotle uses the word, when he says, A wise man ought (μετριομενης μεν παισι, αυτων εις την αρετην) to have moderate passions, but not to be without passions, as the stoics prescribed. The apostle's meaning is, That an high-priest who is not touched with a feeling of the miseries and weaknesses of others, is unfit to officiate for them, because he will be apt to neglect them in his ministrations, or be thought by the people in danger of so doing.

Ver. 3. For himself offer sacrifices for sins. — From this Grotius infers, that Christ offered for himself a sacrifice for sin. But his notion is without foundation, as the apostle hath repeatedly affirmed, that Christ was absolutely free from sin, Heb. iv. 15. vi. 26, 27. ix. 14.

Ver. 6. According to the order of Melchizedec. — Melchizedec having neither predecessor nor successor in his office, his priesthood could not be called an order, if by that phrase is understood a succession of persons executing that priesthood. Wherefore κατα ταυτην must mean 'after the similitude of Melchizedec,' as it is expressed chap. vii. 15. Besides, in the Syriac version κατα ταυτην in this verse is rendered 'secundum similitudinem.' The words of God's oath, recorded Psal. cx. 4. are very properly advanced by the apostle as a proof of Messiah's priesthood, because the Jews in general acknowledged that David wrote the cxth Psalm by inspiration concerning the Christ. See Heb. v. 10. note.

Ver. 7.—1. He, in the days of his flesh. — The things mentioned in this verse not being applicable to Melchizedec, who is spoken of in the preceding verse, it is not the relative, but the personal pronoun, and denotes Christ, who is mentioned ver. 5. I have therefore translated it by the word he, to lead the reader to that idea.

2. In the days of his flesh. — that is, while he lived in the flesh on earth, subject to the infirmity of the human nature. See Ess. iv. 40.

applications,⁴ with strong crying and tears, to him who was able to save⁵ him from death; and (ωρμηθεὶς ἀπὸ τῆς φόβου) being delivered from fear;⁶

8 Although he was a son, he learned obedience by the things which he suffered.

9 And being made perfect,¹ he became to all them who obey him, (αὐτός) the author of eternal salvation;² (ἐνταῦθα αὐτός.)

10 (Προσχορευθεὶς) Being saluted¹ by God an High-priest, according to the order of Melchizedec:

11 Concerning whom we have much speech, (αὐτὸν, 219.) which is difficult to be

3. Both deprecations. — See 1 Tim. ii. 1. where ἱκετικαί, the word used here, signifies deprecatory prayers against evil.

4. And supplications. — ἱκετικαί, supplicatory prayers for assistance. — They were said to supplicate, who fell down at the feet of the persons they addressed, and took hold of their knees. Supplications, therefore, are prayers uttered with great earnestness and humility.

5. To him who was able to save him from death. — I cannot think with most commentators, that there is a reference here to our Lord's prayer in the garden; because, if in saying, 'O my Father, if it be possible let this cup pass from me,' he had prayed to be delivered from dying, the apostle could not have said, as in the common version, 'He was heard in that he feared;' nor, as others translate the clause, 'He was heard for his piety.' The cup which his Father gave him, whatever it was, he drank. I therefore conjecture, that the apostle, in this verse, refers to some other prayers which our Lord offered up to be saved from lying under the power of death; and I observe, that the text in the original agrees well with this conjecture. For the word σωζέω, to save, signifies either to preserve one from an evil of which he is in danger, or to deliver one from an evil into which he hath fallen. In this latter sense the word is used, Matt. i. 21. 'He shall save (that is, deliver) his people from their sins.' So likewise in this verse, 'To him who was able (σωζέω αὐτὸν ἐκ θανάτου) to deliver him out of death,' namely, by raising him from the dead. According to this meaning of his prayer, our Lord was 'heard in that he feared;' or 'was delivered from fear.' For in answer to his prayers, his Father assured him that he would raise him from the dead, and thereby delivered him from his fear of lying under the power of death.

6. And being delivered from fear. — So Whitby translates the clause σωζομένου ἀπὸ φόβου; and appeals to the LXX, who used the word σωζομένου to denote the act of delivering: Psal. liv. 2. 3. 'Attend unto me, (καὶ σωζομένου με ἀπὸ φόβου ἐξέσῃς), and deliver me from the voice of the enemy.' And though the word φόβος, translated fear, often denotes religious fear, Heb. xi. 7. it sometimes signifies fear of any kind; of which Beza, among other examples, gives the following one from Diphilus, quoted by Stobæus, Στάτης σφόδρα φοβούμενος τὸν θεόν. — So also, Acts xxiii. 10. 'The chief captain (κυβερνήτης) fearing.' — Josh. xxi. 24. LXX, 'We did this (ἐν τῇ φόβῳ) out of fear.' — Eusebius thinks the apostle here refers to our Lord's prayer on the cross; My God, &c. — The fear from which Christ was delivered, is explained in the 5th note, which see. — Some of the fathers accounted for the fear from which Jesus is said to have been delivered, by supposing that his divinity for a season withdrew its influence from his human nature.

Ver. 9.—1. And being made perfect. — ὁμοιωθεὶς. Since the apostle is speaking here of Christ as an High-priest, his 'being made perfect,' is his being made a perfect or effectual High-priest. For τελειοῦμαι, τελειοῦμαι, τελειοῦμαι, and τελειοῦμαι, denoting perfection, the kind of perfection meant by these words is, the highest degree of the qualities which are peculiar to the person or thing which is the subject of the discourse. Thus, the sacrifice by which the high-priesthood was completely conferred on Aaron, is called, Exod. xxix. 34. θυσία τελειωτική, 'the sacrifice of perfection.' — Eph. iv. 15. ἄνθρωποι τελειοί, 'a full grown man.' — Heb. ii. 10. Τελειοῦμαι, 'to make the Captain of our salvation perfect through sufferings.' — Heb. vi. 1. 'Leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on (καὶ τελειωθῶμεν) to perfection,' to the right interpretation and application of the figures and prophecies of the law, which is the highest degree of Christian knowledge. — Heb. vii. 11. ὁμοιωθεὶς, 'If perfection were by the Levitical priesthood, what farther need, &c. As men expect pardon through the sacrifices offered by their priests, perfection, in this passage, must signify complete pardon, with its concomitants, the favour of God, and eternal life. — Heb. vii. 19. Οὐδὲν γὰρ ἐτελείωσεν ὁ νόμος, 'For the law made no one perfect;' it neither gave pardon to sinners by its sacrifices, nor did it sanctify them by its precepts. — Heb. vii. 28. 'The law hath made men high-priests who have infirmity, but the word of the oath, which was after the law,' hath constituted 'the Son (καταλειψαμένου) who is perfected for ever;' who, by the excellence of his nature, and his endless life in the body, will continue for ever an effectual High-priest. — Heb. xi. 40. speaking of the departed saints, 'God having foreseen some better things for us, that they without us (καταλειψαμένους) should not be perfected;' should not be completely rewarded, by the infirmity of the human nature, and particularly to the fear of death, as is plain from this, that he in the days of his flesh, having offered up both deprecations and supplications, with strong crying (Psal. xxii. 1.) and tears, to him who was able to save him from death, by raising him from the dead; and being delivered from fear,

8 Although he was the Son of God, he learned how difficult obedience is to men, by the things which he suffered in the flesh while he obeyed God; and also what need men have of help to enable them to bear their trials and sufferings.

9 And being thus qualified to have a right measure of compassion on the ignorant and erring, he was made perfect as an High-priest; and he became, to all who obey him, the author of eternal salvation, by offering himself a sacrifice for their sins:

10 As is evident from his being saluted by God, on his return from the earth, an High-priest, according to the order of Melchizedec.

11 Concerning Melchizedec I have much to say for the illustration of Christ's priesthood, which is difficult to be explained when the reunion of their bodies with their souls, and by inheriting the heavenly country. See also Heb. xii. 23.—Luke i. 45. Blessed is she who believed; for there shall be (καταλειψαμένου) a performance of those things which were told her of the Lord.—Lastly, among the Greeks, those who were completely instructed in the mysteries were called τελειοί, perfect men.—From these examples it appears, that when τελειοῦμαι, Exod. xxix. 9. is translated to consecrate, and θυσία τελειωτική, ver. 34. is translated the sacrifice of consecration, these words are rightly translated, not because their etymology leads to that signification, but because Aaron and his sons by that sacrifice were 'made perfect as priests,' that is, were completely invested with the priest's office.

2. He became to all them who obey him, the author of eternal salvation. — In this verse three things are clearly stated. First, That obedience to Christ is equally necessary to salvation with believing on him. Secondly, That he was made perfect as an High-priest, by offering himself a sacrifice for sin, chap. vii. 3. Thirdly, That, by the merit of that sacrifice, he hath obtained pardon and eternal life for them who obey him.

Ver. 10. Being saluted by God an High-priest. — As our Lord in his conversation with the Pharisees, recorded Matt. xxii. 43. spake of it as a thing certain in itself, and universally known and acknowledged by the Jews, that David wrote the cxth Psalm by inspiration concerning the Christ or Messiah, the apostle was well founded in applying the whole of that Psalm to Jesus. Wherefore, having quoted the fourth verse, 'Thou art a priest for ever, after the order of Melchizedec,' as directed to Messiah, David's Lord, he justly termed that speech of the Deity a salutation of Jesus, according to the true import of the word προσχορευθείς, which properly signifies, to address one by his name, or title, or office. Accordingly, Heyschius explains προσχορευθείς by ἀνταρτάσσει. — Now, that the deep meaning of this salutation may be understood, I observe first, that by the testimony of the inspired writers, Jesus sat down at the right hand of God when he returned to heaven, after having finished his ministry on earth, Mark xvi. 19. Acts vii. 56. Heb. i. 2. viii. 1. 1 Pet. iii. 22. Not however immediately, but after he had offered the sacrifice of himself in heaven, by presenting his crucified body before the presence of God, Heb. i. 3. x. 10.—Secondly, I observe, that God's saluting Messiah a priest after the order of Melchizedec, being mentioned in the Psalm after God is said to have invited him to sit at his right hand, it is reasonable to think, the salutation was given him after he had offered the sacrifice of himself, and had taken his seat at God's right hand. Considered in this order, the salutation of Jesus as a priest after the similitude of Melchizedec, was a public declaration on the part of God, that he accepted the sacrifice of himself, which Jesus then offered, as a sufficient atonement for the sin of the world, and approved of the whole of his ministrations on earth, and confirmed all the effects of that meritorious sacrifice. See the illustration of ver. 10.—And whereas we are informed in the Psalm, that after God invited his Son in the human nature to sit at his right hand as Governor of the world, and foretold the blessed fruits of his government, he published the oath by which he made him a priest for ever before he sent him into the world to accomplish the salvation of mankind, and declared that he would never repent of that oath: 'The Lord hath sworn and will not repent, thou art a Priest for ever, after the similitude of Melchizedec.' — It was in effect a solemn publication of the method in which God would pardon sinners, and a promise that the effects of his Son's government as a King, and of his ministrations as a Priest, shall be eternal. See Heb. vi. 20. note 2.—Moreover, as this solemn declaration of the dignity of the Son of God, as a King and a Priest for ever in the human nature, was made in the hearing of the angelical hosts, it was designed for their instruction, that they might understand their subordination to God's Son in the human nature, and pay him that homage which is due to him as Governor of the world, and as Saviour of the human race, Phil. ii. 9. 10. Heb. i. 6.—The above explanation of the import of God's saluting Jesus a Priest for ever, is founded on the apostle's reasonings in the seventh and following chapters, where he enters into the deep meaning of the oath by which that salutation was confirmed.

The attentive reader no doubt hath remarked, that in Psal. cx. 4. the appellation given to Messiah David's Lord is, a Priest; and that the apostle in ver. 10. hath changed it into an High-priest.—This he hath done, not because there are other priests in the house of God over whom Jesus presides, but because the minis-tions on earth.—4. Seeing, in the salutation, the Deity called Messiah 'a Priest after the order of Melchizedec,' who was a king as well as a priest, he, by that appellation, and by placing him at his right hand, declared him to be not only an High-priest, but the Governor and Judge of the world: So that there can be no doubt of his procuring salvation for his obedient subjects, through the merit of his death as an atonement. Wherefore, those passages of scripture in which his death is spoken of as a sacrifice for sin, being all literally meant, should by no means be considered, either as figures of speech or as accommodations to the prejudices of mankind concerning the efficacy of propitiatory sacrifices. See chap. ix. 18. note, and Ess. vii. sect. 2.—Such are the important meanings comprehended in the expression, 'saluted of God an High-priest, after the order of Melchizedec;' as we learn from the apostle's reasonings in the subsequent parts of this epistle.

Accordingly, that mankind may enjoy all the consolations which flow from the right apprehension and belief of the sacrifice and intercession of Christ, the apostle judged it necessary to search into the deep meaning of the oath by which God constituted Messiah 'a Priest for ever after the order of Melchizedec.' And to excite the Hebrews to attend to what he was to write in chapter vii. 11–28. concerning the import of the oath, he told them he had many things to say concerning Melchizedec, after whose order Messiah was made a Priest, by which Messiah's priesthood would be illustrated and confirmed. But he found it difficult to make them understand these things, because they were of slow apprehension in spiritual matters, ver. 11.—Wherefore, to make them more diligent than they had hitherto been in gaining religious knowledge, he told them plainly, their ignorance of their own scriptures was such, that notwithstanding they ought to have been teachers of others, considering the length of the time they had professed the gospel, they needed to be again taught some of the first principles of the ancient oracles of God; consequently they required to be fed with milk, and not with strong meat, ver. 12.—This, he told them, was a very imperfect state, because every one who uses milk, that is, who knows nothing but the obvious sense of the ancient revelations, and does not enter into their deep meaning, must be very unskilful in the doctrines of the gospel, and is a mere babe in Christianity, ver. 13.—Whereas, the doctrines concealed under the types and figures of the ancient revelations, being difficult to be understood, may be likened to strong meat, the food of grown men, because, when rightly apprehended, they greatly strengthen men's faith, by the light which they throw on the doctrines of the gospel, ver. 14.

CHAP. V.—1 (1st) Now, every high-priest taken from among men is appointed to PERFORM for men the things pertaining to God, that he may offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins:

2 Being able to have a right measure of compassion¹ on the ignorant and erring, because he himself also is surrounded with infirmity.

3 And for that reason he must, as for the people, so also for himself, offer SACRIFICES for sins.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. V.—1 Now, to shew that Christ is a real High-priest, I will describe the designation, the duties, and the qualifications of an high-priest. Every high-priest taken from among men is appointed, by persons having a right to confer the office, to perform for men the things pertaining to the public worship of God, and especially that he may offer both free-will offerings and sacrifices for sins.

2 He must be able to have a right measure of compassion on the ignorant, and those who err through ignorance, because he himself also is clothed with infirmity; so that he will officiate for them with the greater kindness and assiduity.

3 And because he himself is a sinner, he must, as for the people, so also for himself, offer sacrifices for sins. (Lev. xvi. 6.)

4 Now, to apply these things to the Christ, I observe, first, that as in the gospel church no one can take this honourable office to himself but he who is thereto called of God, as Aaron was in the Jewish church;

5 So also the Christ did not glorify himself by making himself an High-priest, but He glorified him with that office, who, after his ascension into heaven, said to him, My son thou art; to-day I have demonstrated thee to be my Son by raising thee from the dead. (See this argument explained in the Illustration.)

6 As also He glorified the Christ to be an High-priest, who in another psalm saith to him, Thou art a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchizedec: thou art a human priest, not like Aaron, but Melchizedec.

7 Secondly, as an High-priest, he can commiserate the ignorant and erring. For though he be the Son of God, he was subject to

Ver. 1. Offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins. — Gifts, or free-will offerings, as distinguished from sacrifices for sins, were expressions of gratitude to God for his goodness in the common dispensations of his providence. And because the priests offered both kinds, Paul speaks of himself as 'exercising the priesthood according to the gospel,' by offering the Gentiles in an acceptable manner, through the sanctification of the Holy Ghost, Rom. xv. 16.

Ver. 2. Able to have a right measure of compassion on the ignorant. — Beza thinks the word μετριοπαθης signifies to feel compassion in proportion to the misery of others; but, according to Estius, it signifies to be moderately affected: in which sense Aristotle uses the word, when he says, A wise man ought (μετριοπαθης ειναι δεβει, αρετης ειναι) to have moderate passions, but not to be without passions, as the stoics prescribed. The apostle's meaning is, That an high-priest who is not touched with a feeling of the miseries and weaknesses of others, is unfit to officiate for them, because he will be apt to neglect them in his ministrations, or be thought by the people in danger of so doing.

Ver. 3. For himself offer sacrifices for sins. — From this Grotius infers, that Christ offered for himself a sacrifice for sin. But his notion is without foundation, as the apostle hath repeatedly affirmed, that Christ was absolutely free from sin, Heb. iv. 15. vii. 26, 27. ix. 14.

Ver. 6. According to the order of Melchizedec. — Melchizedec having neither predecessor nor successor in his office, his priesthood could not be called an order, if by that phrase is understood a succession of persons executing that priesthood. Wherefore κατα ταυτην must mean 'after the similitude of Melchizedec,' as it is expressed chap. vii. 15. Besides, in the Syriac version κατα ταυτην in this verse is rendered 'secundum similitudinem.' The words of God's oath, recorded Psal. cx. 4. are very properly advanced by the apostle as a proof of Messiah's priesthood, because the Jews in general acknowledged that David wrote the cxth Psalm by inspiration concerning the Christ. See Heb. v. 10. note.

Ver. 7.—1. He, in the days of his flesh. — The things mentioned in this verse not being applicable to Melchizedec, who is spoken of in the preceding verse, it is not the relative, but the personal pronoun, and denotes Christ, who is mentioned ver. 5. I have therefore translated it by the word he, to lead the reader to that idea.

2. In the days of his flesh; — that is, while he lived in the flesh on earth, subject to the infirmity of the human nature. See Ess. iv. 43.

supplications,⁴ with strong crying and tears, to him who was able to save him from death; and (μεμωσμένος εἰς τὴν θάνατον) being delivered from fear.⁵

8 Although he was a son, he learned obedience by the things which he suffered.

9 And being made perfect,¹ he became to all them who obey him, (ἀρχιερέως) the author of eternal salvation;² (ἐκτελεστὴς αἰωνίου.)

10 (Προερχομένου) Being saluted¹ by God an High-priest, according to the order of Melchizedec:

11 Concerning whom we have much speech, (καὶ, 219.) which is difficult to be

3. Both deprecations. — See 1 Tim. ii. 1. where interces, the word used here, signifies deprecatory prayers against evil.

4. And supplications. — ὑπομνήσεις, supplicatory prayers for assistance. — They were said to supplicate, who fell down at the feet of the persons they addressed, and took hold of their knees. Supplications, therefore, are prayers uttered with great earnestness and humility.

5. To him who was able to save him from death. — I cannot think with most commentators, that there is a reference here to our Lord's prayer in the garden; because, if in saying, 'O my Father, if it be possible let this cup pass from me,' he had prayed to be delivered from dying, the apostle could not have said, as in the common version, 'He was heard in that he feared;' nor, as others translate the clause, 'He was heard for his piety.' The cup which his Father gave him, whatever it was, he drank. I therefore conjecture, that the apostle, in this verse, refers to some other prayers which our Lord offered up to be saved from lying under the power of death; and I observe, that the text in the original agrees well with this conjecture. For the word σωτήριον, to save, signifies either to preserve one from an evil of which he is in danger, or to deliver one from an evil into which he hath fallen. In this latter sense the word is used, Matt. i. 21. 'He shall save (that is, deliver) his people from their sins.' So likewise in this verse, 'To him who was able (σωτήριον αὐτὸν ἐκ θανάτου) to deliver him out of death,' namely, by raising him from the dead. According to this meaning of his prayer, our Lord was 'heard in that he feared;' or 'was delivered from fear.' For in answer to his prayers, his Father assured him that he would raise him from the dead, and thereby delivered him from his fear of lying under the power of death.

6. And being delivered from fear. — So Whitby translates the clause ἐκ τῆς φόβου into delivered from fear; and appeals to the LXX, who used the word ἐκ τῆς φόβου to denote the act of delivering: — Psal. li. 2. 3. 'Attend unto me, (καὶ ἐκ τῆς φόβου με ἀποφύγετε ἰσχυροί), and deliver me from the voice of the enemy.' And though the word ἐκ τῆς φόβου, translated fear, often denotes religious fear, Heb. xi. 7. it sometimes signifies fear of any kind; of which Beza, among other examples, gives the following one from Diphilus, quoted by Stobæus, Σπύριος θειοῦς μὴ ἐκ τῆς φόβου τῆς θείας. — So also, Acts xxiii. 10. 'The chief captain (κρίνος) fearing.' — Josh. xii. 24. LXX, 'We did this (κρίνος) out of fear.' — Eusebius thinks the apostle here refers to our Lord's prayer on the cross; My God, etc. — The fear from which Christ was delivered, is explained in the 5th note, which see. — Some of the fathers accounted for the fear from which Jesus is said to have been delivered, by supposing that his divinity for a season withdrew its influence from his human nature.

Ver. 9. — 1. And being made perfect. — Τελειωθῆς. Since the apostle is speaking here of Christ as an High-priest, his 'being made perfect,' is his being made a perfect or effectual High-priest. For τελειωθῆς, τελειώσθης, τελειότης, and τελείωσις, denoting perfection, the kind of perfection meant by these words is, the highest degree of the qualities which are peculiar to the person or thing which is the subject of the discourse. Thus, the sacrifice by which the high-priesthood was completely conferred on Aaron, is called, Exod. xxix. 34. ὑπερτελειωθήναι, the sacrifice of perfection. — Eph. iv. 15. ἄρτιον τελειόν, a full grown man. — Heb. ii. 10. Τελειώσθης, to make the Captain of our salvation perfect through sufferings. — Heb. vi. 1. 'Leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on (ἐκ τῆς τελειότητος) to perfection,' to the right interpretation and application of the figures and prophecies of the law, which is the highest degree of Christian knowledge. — Heb. vii. 11. Ἐκ τῆς τελειότητος, If perfection were by the Levitical priesthood, what farther need, &c. As men expect pardon through the sacrifices offered by their priests, perfection, in this passage, must signify complete pardon, with its concomitants, the favour of God, and eternal life. — Heb. vii. 19. Οὐδὲν γὰρ ἐκ τῆς τελειότητος ἔσται, For the law made no one perfect; it neither gave pardon to sinners by its sacrifices, nor did it sanctify them by its precepts. — Heb. vii. 28. 'The law hath made men high-priests who have infirmity, but the word of the oath, which was after the law, hath constituted (the Son (τελειωθῆναι)) who is perfected for ever;' who, by the excellence of his nature, and his endless life in the body, will continue for ever an effectual High-priest. — Heb. xi. 40. speaking of the departed saints, 'God having foreseen some better things for us, that they without us (καὶ τῶν ζώντων) should not be perfected;' should not be completely rewarded, by the infirmity of the human nature, and particularly to the fear of death, as is plain from this, that he in the days of his flesh, having offered up both deprecations and supplications, with strong crying (Psal. xxiii. 1.) and tears, to him who was able to save him from death, by raising him from the dead; and being delivered from fear,

8 Although he was the Son of God, he learned how difficult obedience is to men, by the things which he suffered in the flesh while he obeyed God; and also what need men have of help to enable them to bear their trials and sufferings.

9 And being thus qualified to have a right measure of compassion on the ignorant and erring, he was made perfect as an High-priest; and he became, to all who obey him, the author of eternal salvation, by offering himself a sacrifice for their sins:

10 As is evident from his being saluted by God, on his return from the earth, an High-priest, according to the order of Melchizedec.

11 Concerning Melchizedec I have much to say for the illustration of Christ's priesthood, which is difficult to be explained when the reunion of their bodies with their souls, and by inheriting the heavenly country. See also Heb. xii. 23. — Luke i. 45. 'Blessed is she who believed; for there shall be (τελειότης; ἀκαταρτήτης) a performance of those things which were told her of the Lord.' — Lastly, among the Greeks, those who were completely instructed in the mysteries were called τελειοί, perfect men. — From these examples it appears, that when τελειωθῆς, Exod. xix. 9. is translated to consecrate, and ὑπερτελειωθῆς, ver. 34. is translated the sacrifice of consecration, these words are rightly translated, not because their etymology leads to that signification, but because Aaron and his sons by that sacrifice were 'made perfect as priests,' that is, were completely invested with the priest's office.

2. He became to all them who obey him, the author of eternal salvation. — In this verse three things are clearly stated. First, That obedience to Christ is equally necessary to salvation with believing on him. Secondly, That he was made perfect as an High-priest, by offering himself a sacrifice for sin, chap. vii. 3. Thirdly, That, by the merit of that sacrifice, he hath obtained pardon and eternal life for them who obey him.

Ver. 10. Being saluted by God an High-priest. — As our Lord in his conversation with the Pharisees, recorded Matt. xxii. 43. spake of it as a thing certain in itself, and universally known and acknowledged by the Jews, that David wrote the cxix Psalm by inspiration concerning the Christ or Messiah, the apostle was well founded in applying the whole of that Psalm to Jesus. Wherefore, having quoted the fourth verse, 'Thou art a priest for ever, after the order of Melchizedec,' as directed to Messiah, David's Lord, he justly termed that speech of the Deity a salutation of Jesus, according to the true import of the word προερχομένου, which properly signifies, to address one by his name, or title, or office. Accordingly, Hesychius explains προερχομένου by ἀντιφωνῆσαι. — Now, that the deep meaning of this salutation may be understood, I observe first, that by the testimony of the inspired writers, Jesus sat down at the right hand of God when he returned to heaven, after having finished his ministry on earth, Mark xvi. 19. Acts vii. 55. Heb. i. 3. viii. 1. 1 Pet. iii. 22. Not however immediately, but after he had offered the sacrifice of himself in heaven, by presenting his crucified body before the presence of God, Heb. i. 3. x. 10. — Secondly, I observe, that God's saluting Messiah a priest after the order of Melchizedec, being mentioned in the Psalm after God is said to have invited him to sit at his right hand, it is reasonable to think, the salutation was given him after he had offered the sacrifice of himself, and had taken his seat at God's right hand. Considered in this order, the salutation of Jesus as a priest after the similitude of Melchizedec, was a public declaration on the part of God, that he accepted the sacrifice of himself, which Jesus then offered, as a sufficient atonement for the sin of the world, and approved of the whole of his ministrations on earth, and confirmed all the effects of that meritorious sacrifice. See the illustration of ver. 10. — And whereas we are informed in the Psalm, that after God invited his Son in the human nature to sit at his right hand as Governor of the world, and foretold the blessed fruits of his government, he published the oath by which he made him a priest for ever before he sent him into the world to accomplish the salvation of mankind, and declared that he would never repent of that oath: 'The Lord hath sworn and will not repent, thou art a Priest for ever, after the similitude of Melchizedec;' — it was in effect a solemn publication of the method in which God would pardon sinners, and a promise that the effects of his Son's government as a King, and of his ministrations as a Priest, shall be eternal. See Heb. vi. 20. note 2. — Moreover, as this solemn declaration of the dignity of the Son of God, as a King and a Priest for ever in the human nature, was made in the hearing of the angelical hosts, it was designed for their instruction, that they might understand their subordination to God's Son in the human nature, and pay him that homage which is due to him as Governor of the world, and as Saviour of the human race, Phil. ii. 9. 10. Heb. i. 6. — The above explanation of the import of God's saluting Jesus a Priest for ever, is founded on the apostle's reasonings in the seventh and following chapters, where he enters into the deep meaning of the oath by which that salutation was confirmed. The attentive reader no doubt hath remarked, that in Psal. cx. 4. the appellation given to Messiah David's Lord is, a Priest; and that the apostle in ver. 10. hath changed it into an High-priest. — This he hath done, not because there are other priests in the house of God over whom Jesus presides, but because the ministrations of the Levitical high-priests in the inward tabernacle, were all typical of Christ's ministrations in heaven.

14 But strong meat belongeth to (τολμαρ, see chap. v. 9. note) them who are full grown, who by use have their senses¹ exercised² to discern both good and evil. (Deut. i. 39. Isa. vii. 16, 15.)

Ver. 11. Dull of hearing.—The word ωσθη signifies persons who walk tardily. Applied to the mind, it signifies persons of slow understanding; also slothful, sluggish, idle persons, Heb. vi. 12.

Ver. 12. Certain first principles of the oracles of God.—Τίμα τα αρχαία της αρχης των λόγων του Θεου. Here τιμα is not the nominative plural, as our translators supposed, but the accusative, governed by του διδασκουντος. Wherefore, the literal translation of the clause is, 'teach you certain elements of the beginning of the oracles of God.'—For the meaning of αρχαία, see 2 Pet. iii. 10. note 5.—'The oracles of God,' are the ancient revelations contained in the writings of Moses and the prophets, Rom. iii. 2. Some of the first principles of these oracles the apostle had formerly explained to the Hebrews. But being blinded by the doctrine of the scribes, they had not understood his explications, or they had forgotten them; and so needed to be taught these first principles a second time.

Ver. 13.—1. Unskilful in the word of righteousness.—The apostle calls the gospel 'the word of righteousness,' because therein is revealed 'the righteousness of God by faith.' But Pierce, by 'the word of righteousness,' understands those passages in the Old Testament which describe the righteousness of faith, or the way of the spoken, not on account of the darkness of the subject, but because ye are of slow apprehension in spiritual matters.

13 For though ye ought to have been able to teach others, considering the time ye have professed the gospel, ye have need of one to teach you, a second time, some of the fundamental principles of the ancient oracles of God concerning the Christ; and have become such as have need of being taught the easiest doctrines, and are not capable of receiving the higher parts of knowledge.

13 Now every one who uses milk only, who knows nothing but the letter of the ancient revelations, is unskilled in the doctrines of the gospel: For he is a babe in Christianity. (See the Illustration of ver. 12, 13, 14.)

justification of sinners by faith, and which are quoted in the epistles to the Romans, chap. x. 6, 7, 8. and to the Galatians, chap. iii. 24.

2. For he is a babe.—The apostle compared the Hebrews to babes, not on account of their innocence, simplicity, and teachableness, qualities which Christ recommended to all his disciples; but on account of their weakness and ignorance, for which, considering the advantages which they had so long enjoyed, they were much to blame. In this sense the word νηπιος is used, 1 Cor. iii. 1–3. as it is likewise Gal. iv. 3. to denote the Jews living under the institutions of Moses.

Ver. 14.—1. Have their senses.—The word αισθησεις properly signifies the organs of sense, the eyes, ears, &c. Here it denotes the inward senses, the senses of the mind.

2. Exercised.—εξουσιασμενοι. See chap. xii. 11. note 2. This metaphor is borrowed from the Athletes, who, by often exercising themselves in the mock fight, became fit for engaging in the real combat. Grown Christians, by often exercising their spiritual faculties, become able to distinguish true doctrine from that which is false. These spiritual faculties the apostle calls senses, because he had been speaking of babes, who, being unexperienced, were not able, by their senses, to distinguish wholesome food from that which is pernicious.

CHAPTER VI.

ALTHOUGH in the latter verses of the preceding chapter the apostle had reproved the Hebrews for their ignorance of the first principles of the oracles, or ancient revelations, of God, in which the fundamental doctrines of the gospel are contained, he told them here, that he would not now discourse of the principles of the doctrine of Christ, but would carry them on to the perfection of Christian knowledge, by explaining to them the deep meaning of some of the chief ancient oracles; not laying a second time the foundation of repentance from dead works, &c. as taught in the writings of Moses and the prophets, ver. 1, 2.—And because the Hebrews were in danger of being drawn away from the profession of the gospel by their unbelieving brethren, who founded their opposition to Jesus on misinterpretations of the Jewish sacred writings, the apostle told them, he would immediately lead them to the true meaning of the principal parts of these writings, if God permitted him to do it by preserving them from apostatizing till they should have an opportunity to read and consider this letter, ver. 3.—In the mean time, to make them sensible of their danger, and to rouse their attention to those discoveries of the hidden meaning of the ancient oracles which he was about to make to them, he shewed them the pernicious nature of apostasy, and the severe punishment to which apostates are doomed, ver. 4–8.—Lest, however, his reprehension of the Hebrews, and his anxiety to preserve them from apostasy, might have led them to think he suspected they were going to renounce the gospel, he mitigated the severity of his reproof, by telling them he hoped better things of them, and things connected with salvation, ver. 9.—founding his hope on the righteousness of God, who would not forget those works of love which, with so much labour and danger, they had performed, and were still performing, to the persecuted disciples of Christ in Judea; nor withhold from them the aids of his grace necessary to their perseverance, ver. 10.—Nevertheless he earnestly besought them to shew the same diligence as formerly, in performing charitable offices to their afflicted brethren, that his hope concerning them might remain firm to the end, ver. 11.—and not to be slothful in the work of their salvation, but to imitate the converted Gentiles, who, through faith in Christ and patience under persecution, were inheriting, in the Christian church, the blessings promised to the seed of Abraham, in the covenant which God made with that father of believers, ver. 12.

Having affirmed, that the converted Gentiles in the Christian church were inheriting the promises in the covenant with Abraham, the apostle, to carry the Hebrews on to perfection, took occasion to enter into the deep meaning of that ancient oracle. And, first of all, by his account of God's covenant with Abraham, it appears that the blessings promised in it, although expressed in types and figures, are the very blessings which are plainly promised in the gospel. Moreover, his care in this particular hath been of no small use in silencing the adversaries of revelation. For by rightly explaining the covenant with Abraham, the apostle hath demonstrated, that the method of salvation by faith, the resurrection of believers from the dead, the general judgment, and the rewards and punishments of a future state, were all made known to the patriarchs and to the Jews, in that greatest of all the ancient oracles of God.

God's covenant with Abraham is often mentioned by Moses. But the fullest account of it is that which he hath recorded, Gen. xvii. 4-8. where all the articles of it are related at large. The apostle, however, did not on this occasion call the attention of the Hebrews to that complete account, but to one more shortly expressed, which he says was confirmed with an oath. His words are, 'When God made promise to Abraham, because he could swear by no one greater, he swore by himself, saying, In blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thee.' This account of the covenant is evidently that recorded Gen. xvii. 16-18. where we are told that God spake these things to Abraham, after he had laid Isaac on the altar with an intention to sacrifice him. For in no other passage of the writings of Moses is God said to have confirmed any part of his covenant with Abraham by an oath, ver. 13, 14.—Concerning the promise, 'In blessing I will bless thee,' it is to be remembered, that in the third and fourth chapters of this epistle, the apostle by a deep train of reasoning hath shewed, that in the covenant God promised to Abraham and to his seed, a rest not only in the earthly Canaan, but in an heavenly country also, of which Canaan was a type. But if Abraham and his seed were to be rewarded with the inheritance of heaven, it certainly implieth that they were to be blessed with having their faith counted to them for righteousness. Wherefore it was not necessary that the apostle should enter more particularly into the meaning of the promise, 'In blessing I will bless thee.' But, for the illustration of the promise, 'In multiplying I will multiply thee,' he observed, that Abraham, after having patiently waited many years for its accomplishment, at length obtained it, namely, by the birth of Isaac. Nor was it necessary to say any thing more for the illustration of that promise; because, by leading the Hebrews to recollect the supernatural procreation of Isaac, they were taught that Abraham was to have a numerous seed by faith, as well as a numerous seed by natural descent. The reason is, the supernatural procreation of Isaac was both an emblem and a pledge, that the power of God would be exerted in making Abraham the father of many nations, by producing in them the same spirit of faith with his; by the participation of which they would be more truly his children, than those whose relation to him was constituted merely by natural descent, ver. 15.

Farther, it is necessary to remark, that the apostle's design in mentioning the two promises which we have been considering, was not to give a full explanation of them, but that he might have an opportunity of declaring what God's intention was in confirming these promises with an oath, ver. 16.—namely, to shew to Abraham's seed by faith, whom the apostle calls the heirs, the immutability of his purpose to bless them by counting their faith to them for righteousness, and by bestowing on them the inheritance of the heavenly country, ver. 17.—that by two immutable things, the promise and the oath of God, in either of which it was impossible for him to lie, the heirs who, by the covenant made with mankind after the fall, have escaped from the curse of the law to lay hold on the hope of pardon and eternal life set before them, might have strong consolation under the convictions of sin and the fears of punishment, ver. 18.—This hope, the apostle assures us, believers of all nations have in every age of the world, as Abraham's seed, for an anchor of the soul firmly fixed in heaven, called the place within the veil, because that place of the Mosaic tabernacle represented heaven, ver. 19.—Lastly, to shew that the great blessings of pardon and eternal life promised in the covenant, are bestowed on the heirs through Christ, Abraham's seed, the apostle told the Hebrews, that Jesus, as our forerunner, hath gone into heaven, there to plant our hope of these blessings on the sure ground of that effectual and acceptable atonement which he made for the sin of the world by his death: and, that he was well qualified to perform such a service for us, because, by the oath of God, being made an High-priest after the order of Melchizedec, he was commissioned to enter into the holy place where the Deity manifests his presence, to make that effectual atonement for believers which God himself had prescribed, ver. 20.

The intelligent reader, no doubt, hath observed, that the discourse in this chapter is a proper sequel to the discourses concerning the sin and punishment of the rebellious Israelites in the wilderness, and concerning the rest which remaineth to believers, the true people of God, delivered in the preceding third and fourth chapters of this epistle; and that the three discourses, taken together, contain such an explanation of the covenant with Abraham, as leaves us no room to doubt, that therein the principal articles of the gospel revelation were preached to Abraham and to the Jews, as the apostle Paul indeed hath expressly affirmed, Gal. iii. 8. Heb. iv. 2. The covenant with Abraham, therefore, may with great propriety be termed, 'The gospel of the Patriarchs and of the Jews.'

Ver. 1.—1. The discourse of the principles of Christ.]—So τῶν θεμελίων τοῦ Χριστοῦ λόγον must be translated here, being parallel to σοφία τῆς μετάνοιαι τοῦ λογισμοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ, chap. v. 12. For I take τῶν θεμελίων λόγον, literally, 'the discourse of the beginning,' in this, to be the same in sense with σοφία τῆς μετάνοιαι, 'the first elements or principles,' in that verse: And I agree with Pierce in thinking 'the principles of Christ' mean the principles of the doctrine of Christ as contained in the writings of Moses and the prophets. Accordingly the Christian doctrines, mentioned in this and the following verse, are all taught in the Jewish scriptures.

2. Let us proceed to perfection.]—The apostle calls the knowledge of the doctrines and promises of the gospel, as typically set forth in the covenant with Abraham, and darkly expressed in the figures and prophecies of the law, πάλιν, perfection, either in allusion to the Greeks, who termed the complete knowledge of their mysteries πάλιν, and πάλιν, perfection; or in allusion to what he had said, chap. v. 14. that strong meat belonged to πάλιν, full grown men. If the last mentioned is the allusion, the writer's meaning

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. VI.—1 Wherefore, since ye ought by this time to have been capable of strong food, dismissing the discourse concerning the principles of the Christian doctrine, as contained in the ancient revelations, let us proceed to the deep meaning of these revelations, and of the figures and prophecies in the law, which is the perfection of Christian knowledge, not explaining a second time the fundamental principles of repentance from works which merit death; and of faith in God;

2 Of the doctrine of baptisms, as emblematical of that purity of is, that he would proceed to treat of those hidden doctrines of religion contained in the ancient oracles, which, when rightly understood, have as great an influence in strengthening the faculties of the mind, as strong meat hath in invigorating the bodily powers of full grown men. See chap. v. 9. note 1.

3. The foundation of repentance from dead works.]—In the expression, 'repentance from dead works,' it is insinuated, that true repentance consisteth in turning from dead works. Now as the necessity of repentance in order to forgiveness was taught by Moses, and more especially by the prophets, it is termed 'the foundation of repentance,' and is justly reckoned one of the Christian principles taught in the ancient oracles.

4. And of faith towards God.]—As the apostle is speaking of the Christian doctrines taught in the ancient oracles, he mentions faith in God rather than faith in Christ, because it was more directly enjoined in these oracles than faith in Christ, as is plain from our Lord's saying to his apostles, 'Ye believe in God, believe also in me.'

Ver. 2.—1. Of the doctrine of baptisms.]—In the Levitical ritual

ing on of hands,² and of resurrection of the dead,³ and of eternal judgment.⁴

3. And this we will do, if God permit.

4 For it is impossible to renew again,¹ by repentance, those who have been once enlightened,² and have tasted (see chap. ii. 9. note 2.) of the heavenly gift,³ and have been made partakers of the Holy Ghost,

5 And have tasted the good word of God, and the powers¹ of the age which was to come, many baptisms, or immersions of the body in water, were enjoined, as emblematical of that purity of mind which is necessary to the worshiping of God acceptably. The same doctrine being emblematically inculcated by the Christian baptism, the baptisms enjoined in the law may justly be reckoned Christian principles. See Heb. x. 22. Besides, the baptism which the Spirit foretold, Joel ii. 28. was a Christian principle.

6 (Kai, 211.) And yet have fallen away;¹ crucifying again in themselves,² and making a public example (for this translation of παράδειγμα, see Matt. i. 19.) of the Son of God.

2 And of laying on of hands.]—Pierce is of opinion, that it refers to the laying of the offerer's hands on the head of the sin-offerings, in token that he laid his sins on the animal which was to be sacrificed, and that he expected to be pardoned through the atonement to be made by that sacrifice. But I rather think, the person who brought a sacrifice to the altar, by laying his hands on its head confessed himself a sinner, who for his transgressions deserved to be put to death like the animal to be sacrificed, but who hoped to be pardoned through the atonement to be made by that offering. Wherefore, the laying on of hands on the head of the sin-offering, was the same with the confession of sins enjoined in the gospel as necessary to the obtaining of pardon.

3. And of resurrection of the dead.]—The resurrection of the dead was taught in the covenant with Abraham, and in the revelations made to the prophets; as was shewed in Ess. v. sect. 1. No. 2. which see.

4. And of eternal judgment.]—The apostle Jude, in ver. 14, 15. of his epistle, informs us, that Enoch prophesied of the general judgment of the world. The other prophets likewise foretold the same grand event, particularly Daniel, chap. xii. 2.

Ver. 4.—1. For it is impossible to renew again by repentance.]—The learned reader knows, that κατανοήσας, with the other accusatives in this and the following 5th verse, are all governed by the verb ἀποστασάντων in the beginning of ver. 6; and that to render the translation of this passage exact, the word in our language answering to ἀποστασάντων must be placed, as I have done, before these accusatives. ἀποστασάντων is the same form of expression as ἀποστασάντων in ἐπιστροφῆς, Col. iii. 10. 'renewed by knowledge.' And both expressions are formed on the idea, that persons converted to Christianity become new men, or new creatures. The apostle does not mean, that it is impossible for God to renew a second time by repentance an apostate; but that it is impossible for the ministers of Christ to convert a second time to the faith of the gospel, one who, after being made acquainted with all the proofs by which God hath thought fit to establish Christ's mission, shall allow himself to think him an impostor, and renounce his gospel. The apostle, knowing this, was anxious to give the Hebrews just views of the ancient oracles, in the hope that it would prevent them from apostatizing.

2. Who have been once enlightened.]—ἐπιφωτισθέντας. We have this word Heb. x. 32. where it is used to denote persons said, ver. 26. to have 'received the knowledge of the truth.' It is used in the same sense, Eph. i. 18. iii. 9. as is ἐπιφωτισμός; likewise, 2 Cor. iv. 4. 6.—The ancient fathers called baptism ἐπιφωτισμός, illumination. But that does not seem to be the meaning of the word here.

3. And have tasted of the heavenly gift.]—Our Lord called himself, John vi. 51. 'The living bread which came down from heaven,' not on account of his doctrine only, but on account of all the other blessings which he came down to dispense to men. Hence Peter speaks of 'tasting that the Lord is gracious.' 1 Pet. ii. 3. Wherefore, 'the heavenly gift,' as distinguished from the other spiritual blessings here mentioned, may be that described in the commentary. By 'tasting the heavenly gift,' Bengelius understands men's partaking of the Lord's supper.

Ver. 5. And the powers.]—The word δυνάμεις often denotes those miraculous powers which were bestowed on the first Christians for the confirmation of the gospel, and to enable them to edify each other in their religious assemblies. But as the gifts of the Holy Ghost are mentioned in the preceding verse, I think the word δυνάμεις, in this verse, denotes the efficacy of the ordinances of religion dispensed in the Christian church for converting sinners, called 'the age to come,' in conformity to the phraseology of the Jews, who termed the age of Messiah 'the age to come.'—See Isa. ix. 6. where the Hebrew phrase, which in our English Bible is translated 'the overruling Father,' is rendered by the LXX., Πατήρ τοῦ μέλλοντος αἰῶνος, 'the Father of the age to come.'

mind which the worshippers of God ought to possess; and of the laying on of hands on the sacrifices, as an acknowledgment that the offerer deserved death for his sins; and of the resurrection of the dead; and of the eternal judgment, so called because its sentences will never be reversed.

3 And this more perfect instruction I will give you, if God permit, by preserving you from apostatizing till ye have an opportunity to read and consider this letter.

4 For it is impossible for us to restore a second time, by repentance, those who have been once enlightened by believing the gospel; and have tasted of the heavenly gift of freedom from the yoke of the law of Moses, and from the grievous superstitions of heathenism, which is bestowed on Jews and Gentiles under the gospel; and have been made partakers of the gifts of the Holy Ghost at their baptism;

5 And have perceived the excellence of the word of God, the doctrines and promises of the gospel; and have seen the efficacy of the powers of the gospel dispensation in reforming sinners;

6 And yet have renounced the gospel, in the imagination that Jesus was justly punished with death as an impostor, crucifying a second time in their own mind, and making a public example of the Son of God, by inwardly approving of, and consenting to his punishment.

Ver. 6.—1. And yet have fallen away.]—The verbs ἐπιστρέψαντες, γευσάμενοι, and ἐπιφωτισθέντες, being aorists, are rightly rendered by our translators in the past time, Who were enlightened, have tasted, were made partakers. Wherefore ἀποστασάντων, being an aorist, ought likewise to have been translated in the past time, have fallen away. Nevertheless our translators, following Beza, who without any authority from ancient MSS. hath inserted in his version the word Si, If, have rendered this clause, If they fall away; that this text might not appear to contradict the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints. But as no translator should take upon him to add to, or alter the scriptures, for the sake of any favourite doctrine, I have translated ἀποστασάντων in the past time, have fallen away, according to the true import of the word as standing in connexion with the other aorists in the preceding verses. Farther, as ἀποστασάντων is put in opposition to what goes before in the 4th and 5th verses, the conjunction καί, with which it is introduced, must here have its adversative signification, exemplified Ess. iv. 211. 'And yet have fallen away.'—Wall in his note on this verse saith, 'I know of none but Beza whom the English translators could follow. The Vulgate hath, Et prolapsi sunt: The Syriac, Qui rursum peccaverunt: Castalio, Et tamen relabuntur.' The word ἀποστασάντων literally signifies, have fallen down. But it is rightly translated have fallen away, because the apostle is speaking not of any common lapse, but of apostasy from the Christian faith. See Heb. x. 29. where a farther display of the evil of apostasy is made.

Pierce in his note on this verse saith, 'The reason why our author speaks so severely of such apostates, may be taken partly from the nature of the evidence which they rejected. The fullest and clearest evidence which God ever designed to give of the truth of Christianity, was these miraculous operations of the Spirit; and when men were not only eye-witnesses of these miracles, but were likewise themselves empowered to work them, and yet after all rejected this evidence, they could have no farther or higher evidence whereby they should be convinced; so that their case must in that respect appear desperate. This may be partly owing to their putting themselves out of the way of conviction. If they could not see enough to settle them in the profession of the Christian religion, while they made a profession of it, much less were they like to meet with any thing new to convince and reclaim them, when they had taken up an opposite profession, and joined themselves with the inveterate enemies of Christianity.—And finally, this may be resolved into the righteous judgment of God.' &c.

2. Crucifying again in themselves.]—Raphelus and Alberti have shewed that the word ἀνασταυρώσαντες sometimes signifies to crucify simply. But I prefer the common translation of the word, as more agreeable to the context.—Apostates are said to 'crucify in their own mind the Son of God a second time,' and 'to expose him to infamy,' because, by speaking of him as an impostor, and inwardly approving of the punishment which was inflicted on him, they shewed that they would have joined his persecutors in putting him to death, if they had an opportunity to do it.—On the authority of this text chiefly, the Novatians excluded from their communion those who in the time of the Diocletian persecution delivered up their copies of the scriptures, and renounced the profession of the gospel. But the character and circumstances of the apostates of whom the apostle speaks, were very different from the character and circumstances of the apostates in the Diocletian persecution. The Hebrew apostates had seen the miracles of Jesus and his apostles, and had been themselves partakers of the Holy Ghost, and thereby had been enlightened, or persuaded to embrace the gospel; yet, through the influence of their passions and lusts, they had lost their conviction of its divine original, and had returned to Judaism; and to vindicate themselves had spoken of Jesus as an impostor, who was justly put to death for his crimes. Persons acting in that manner, in opposition to all the evidences of the gospel, could not in the ordinary course of things be converted a second time to the Christian faith, because no farther evidence could be offered to them. Besides, their apostasy, proceeding from the corruption of their heart, was wilful, Heb. x. 26.—The case of the apostates in the Diocletian persecution was very different. Through fear of torture, they had delivered up the scriptures,

7 For the land which drinketh in the rain which often cometh upon it, and bringeth forth herbs fit for them by whom it is cultivated, receiveth a blessing from God :

8 But that which produceth thorns and briars is reprobated, and nigh to a curse ;¹ whose end is to be burned.²

9 But, beloved, we are persuaded better things of you, even things which are connected with salvation,³ though we thus speak.

10 For God is not unrighteous, to forget your work and labour of love which ye have shewed toward his name, in that ye have ministered to the saints, and do minister.

11 Yet we earnestly desire every one of you to shew the same diligence, in order to the full assurance of our hope to the end :

12 That ye may not be slothful, (chap. v. 11. note 2.), but imitators of them who through faith and patience (μετὰ συνέσεως) are inheriting¹ the promises.

13 For when God made promise to Abraham, (αὐτῷ) since he could swear by (ὑπό) no one greater, he swore by himself.¹

14 Saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee,¹ and multiplying I will multiply thee.³ (See Ess. vi. sect. 2. No. 3, 4.)

15 And so, having patiently waited, he obtained the promise.¹

16 (ῥα) For men verily swear by the

in token of their renouncing Christianity ; yet, being convinced of its truth, they were still Christians in their hearts. Now, however culpable these men may have been for their cowardice and hypocrisy, there was nothing in their case, as in the case of the others, which made it impossible for the ministers of Christ to persuade them to repent. The Novatians therefore shewed great ignorance, as well as great uncharitableness, in contending that the apostle had declared the repentance of such persons impossible ; and that for their sin, as for the sin of those mentioned Heb. x. 29. no atonement was provided in the gospel.

Ver. 8.—1. Is nigh to a curse.—As in the blessing mentioned ver. 7. there is an allusion to the primitive blessing whereby the earth was rendered fruitful, Gen. i. 11. so, in the curse here mentioned, there is an allusion to the curse pronounced on the earth after the fall, Gen. iii. 17.

2. Whose end is to be burned.—A principal part of the eastern agriculture consists in leading fields of water from ponds, fountains, and brooks, to render the fields fruitful. When this is neglected, the land is scorched by the heat and drought of the climate, and so being burned up is altogether sterile. The apostle's meaning is, that as land which is unfruitful under every method of culture, and at length is deserted by the husbandman, and burnt up with drought ; so those who apostatise from the gospel, after having believed it to be from God on the evidence mentioned ver. 4, 5, will be justly given up by God and man as incorrigible.

Ver. 9.—1. We are persuaded better things of you.—This, as Pierce observes, is exactly in St Paul's manner of softening the harsh things he found himself obliged to write. See 2 Thess. ii. 13. Eph. iv. 20.

2. Which are connected with salvation.—So the words ἐκ πίστεως σωτηρίας signify, as Elmer hath shewed. See Parkhurst.

Ver. 12. Are inheriting the promises.—The promises made to Abraham and to his seed were,—1. That Abraham should have a numerous seed by faith, as well as by natural descent. 2. That God would be a God to him and to his seed in their generations, by being the object of their worship and their protector. 3. That he would give them the everlasting possession of Canaan. 4. That he would bless all the nations of the earth in him ; that is, bless believers of all nations, in the manner he was to bless him, by counting their faith for righteousness. 5. That he would thus bless the nations through Christ, Abraham's seed. 6. That through Christ, likewise, he would bless the nations with the gospel revelation. See Ess. v. sect. 4, 5, and 6.—Four of these promises the believing Gentiles were inheriting at the time the apostle wrote this letter. For, 1. They were become Abraham's seed by faith. 2. God was become the object of their worship and their protector. 3. They were enjoying the knowledge of God in the gospel church, and

7 In giving up such wilful sinners as incorrigible, we act as men do in cultivating their fields. For the land which drinketh in the rain which often falleth upon it, and produceth fruits fit for the use of them by whom it is cultivated, continueth to be cultivated, and receiveth a blessing from God : (See ver. 8. note 2. toward the end.)

8 But that which, being duly cultivated and watered, produceth only thorns and briars, is reprobated by the husbandman as not worthy of culture, and soon will fall under the curse, and in the end will be burnt up with drought.

9 But, beloved, we are persuaded better fruits than those of apostasy will be produced by you, even such a firm adherence to the gospel as is connected with salvation, though we thus speak to put you on your guard.

10 For God, who hath promised to assist his sincere servants in time of temptation, is not unrighteous to forget, either his own promise or the laborious and dangerous work by which ye shewed your love to him, when ye assisted and comforted the persecuted disciples of Christ in Judea, and do still assist them.

11 Yet I earnestly desire every one of you to shew the same diligence as formerly in assisting and comforting your brethren, in order that my hope concerning your perseverance in the faith of the gospel may continue to the end of your lives.

12 This I desire, that ye may not be sluggards, but imitators of the believing Gentiles in their good works, who through faith in Christ, and patience under persecution, are, as Abraham's spiritual seed, now inheriting the promises in the gospel church.

13 I say the believing Gentiles, who without doubt are heirs of the promises equally with the Jews : For when God made the promises to Abraham, after he had offered up Isaac, since he could swear by no one greater, he swore by himself,

14 Saying, Surely I will greatly bless thee, by counting thy faith for righteousness ; and I will greatly multiply thee, by giving thee a numerous spiritual seed, whose faith I will in like manner count to them for righteousness.

15 And so, having for many years, patiently waited, Abraham, in the supernatural birth of Isaac, obtained the beginning of the accomplishment of the promise concerning his numerous seed.

16 For men verily swear by greater persons than themselves, the gifts of the Spirit, Gal. iii. 4. All these blessings were bestowed on them through Christ.—The other promises none of Abraham's spiritual seed, not even the Old Testament saints, were inheriting. None of them had attained to the possession of the heavenly country, typified by Canaan ; nor was the faith of any of them actually counted to them for righteousness. These blessings can only be obtained after the resurrection and general judgment : Heb. xi. 29, 40.—By observing that the believing Gentiles 'were actually inheriting the promises,' that is, were enjoying, in the Christian church, the four promised blessings above mentioned, the apostle appealed to an undeniable fact, in proof that the believing Gentiles, equally with the believing Jews, were heirs of the promises made to Abraham and to his seed. Withal, to give the Gentiles the greater assurance of this, he shewed them in what follows, that all the promises of the covenant were unalterably confirmed to them by the oath which God swore to Abraham, after he had lifted up Isaac upon the altar.

Ver. 13. For when God made promise to Abraham—he swore by himself.—The promise referred to here, is that which God made to Abraham after he had lifted up Isaac on the altar, Gen. xxii. 16, 17. For on no other occasion did God confirm any promise to Abraham with an oath ; as was observed in the illustration prefixed to this chapter.

Ver. 14.—1. Saying, Surely blessing I will bless thee.—The blessing promised to Abraham on this occasion, was not only that his faith should be counted to him for righteousness, but that the faith of his spiritual seed should likewise be counted to them for righteousness, as is evident from Gal. iii. 8. 'The scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the nations by faith, preached the gospel before to Abraham, saying, Surely in thee all the nations shall be blessed.' See this more fully explained, Ess. v. sect. 6.

2. And multiplying I will multiply thee.—In the oath, the expression is, 'I will multiply thy seed ;' but the meaning is the same, for Abraham could be multiplied only by the multiplication of his seed. He was to have both a numerous natural progeny, and a numerous spiritual seed. The apostle quotes only the first words of the oath ; but his reasoning is founded on the whole, and particularly on the promise, Gen. xxii. 18. 'And in thy seed all the nations of the earth shall be blessed.' They shall be blessed, by having their faith counted for righteousness, through thy seed Christ. See Ess. v. sect. 6.

Ver. 15. And so, having patiently waited, he obtained the promise.—Here, by an usual figure of speech, the promise is put for the thing promised. For the promise itself Abraham obtained when God swore to him, 'Surely blessing I will bless thee, and multiplying I will multiply thee,' ver. 14.—In the birth of Isaac, Abraham obtained the beginning of the accomplishment of God's greater, and an oath (vs. 147.) for confirmation! is to them an end of all (ἀντιρρῶν) contradiction.

17 (Β, Δ) Therefore! God, willing more abundantly to shew to the heirs of promise the immutability (ἡ ἀμεταβολή) of his purpose, (ἐπεὶ ὁ θεὸς ἰσχυρῶς ἠγάπησεν) confirmed IT with an oath: 2

18 That by two immutable things, in which IT WAS impossible for God to lie, WE might have strong consolation, who have fled away to lay hold on the hope set before US,

19 Which we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, (καὶ, 207.) because fixed into the PLACE within the veil, 20 Where a forerunner! hath entered on our account, xviii Jesus, 2 made an High-priest for ever, according to the order of Melchizedec.

promise concerning his numerous natural progeny. Moreover, as the birth of Isaac was brought about supernaturally by the divine power, it was both a proof and a pledge of the accomplishment of the promise concerning the birth of his numerous spiritual seed. Wherefore, in the birth of Isaac, Abraham may truly be said to have obtained the accomplishment of the promise concerning his numerous spiritual seed likewise. In any other sense, Abraham did not obtain the accomplishment of that promise. See the illustration of ver. 15.

Ver. 16. An oath for confirmation, &c.]—This observation teaches us, that both promissory oaths concerning things lawful and in our power, and oaths for the confirmation of things doubtful, when required by proper authority and taken religiously, are allowable under the gospel.

Ver. 17.—1. Therefore.]—Theophylact saith vs. 4 is equivalent to ita, or ita tute, therefore. Accordingly the Syriac hath here Quapropter; and Castalio, Itaque.

2. Confirmed it with an oath.]—The Vulgate, which is followed by Castalio, translates ἐπεὶ ὁ θεὸς ἰσχυρῶς ἠγάπησεν, interposuit iuramentum. But as the expression is ἰσχυρῶς and not ἰσχυρῶς, that translation cannot be admitted. To remove this difficulty, our translators have put in the margin, 'He interposed himself by an oath:' with which, Pierce saith, the Italian, French, and Low Dutch translations agree.—Besa hath 'Adejuisset iurejurando, he undertook for it by an oath.'—Syriac, 'obstrinxit cum iuramento.' Tremellius, in the margin of his translation of the Syriac, hath, ad verbum 'Ligavit quasi fas-whose vengeance they imprecate if they swear falsely: and so an oath for the confirmation of any doubtful matter, is held by them a proper method of ending all contradiction.

17 Therefore, in accommodation to the sentiments of men, God willing more fully to shew to all, in every age and nation, who are the heirs of promise, the immutability of his purpose to count their faith for righteousness, and to bestow on them the inheritance of the heavenly country, confirmed the declaration of his purpose with an oath:

18 That by two immutable things, the promise and the oath of God, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation under the convictions of sin and the terrors of punishment, who have fled away from the curse of the law, like the manslayer from the avenger, to lay hold on the hope of pardon set before us in the promise confirmed by God's oath;

19 Which hope we have as an anchor to which our soul is fastened in this stormy sea of life, both strong and steadfast, because fixed into the place within the veil; that is, into heaven, whither we shall be drawn, by this anchor, as ships are drawn to the place where their anchors are fixed;

20 Into which place a forerunner hath entered on our account, to fix our hope of pardon and eternal life as an anchor, even Jesus, who, being made an High-priest for ever like Melchizedec, can procure pardon for us as a priest, and save us eternally through his power as a king.

cla.'—Pierce, 'he placed his counsel (or promise) in the middle of an oath.'—But as none of these translations correspond to the words of the original, I think its meaning is better represented in our English translation, which I have adopted, 'he confirmed it with an oath:' for ἐπεὶ ὁ θεὸς ἰσχυρῶς ἠγάπησεν literally signifies, 'he mediated it with an oath.' He made an oath the mediator, surety, or ratifier of his counsel. This sense of the word μεσολαβῆναι merits attention, because it suggests a fine interpretation of chap. ix. 15. which see in note 2. on that verse.

Ver. 20.—1. Where a forerunner hath entered on our account.]—Ἰησοῦς. A forerunner is one who goes before, to do some service for another who is to follow; in which sense also the Latin word anteceursor is used. Cass. Bel. lib. i. 18. Here the allusion is to one sent from a ship to fix its anchor in the place to which it is to be drawn.

2. Even Jesus.]—Jesus is called our forerunner, first, Because he is gone before us into heaven, to open it to us by the sacrifice of himself, and to plant our hope of eternal life there, as an anchor of the soul. Secondly, Because, having opened heaven, he remains there as the High-priest of that holy place, to introduce all believers into the presence of God. This shews in what sense Jesus is 'an High-priest for ever.' He is so, not by offering sacrifice for ever in behalf of his people, but by interceding for them always, Rom. vii. 34. note 3. and by introducing them into the presence of God by the merit of the one sacrifice of himself, which he offered to God without spot in heaven.

CHAPTER VII.

View and Illustration of the Facts and Reasonings in this Chapter.

In the preceding chapter, the apostle proposed to go on with the Hebrews to the perfection of Christian knowledge, as exhibited in the ancient oracles of God; and accordingly in part he executed his purpose by shewing them, That, in the covenant with Abraham, God promised him a numerous seed, both by natural descent and by faith; that he promised to bless him, and his seed by faith, with the pardon of their sins, and with the inheritance of that heavenly country of which Canaan was the type; that he confirmed these promises with an oath, to shew the immutability of his purpose to bestow on them the promised blessings; and that their hope of these blessings was firmly fixed in heaven, as an anchor of the soul, by Jesus, who had entered heaven for that purpose, being made by the oath of God an High-priest for ever, according to the similitude of Melchizedec. To this oath the apostle had appealed, chap. v. 6. in proof that Jesus is a real High-priest; but its import he did not then fully explain. Wherefore, in the last verse of chap. vi. having mentioned a second time that Jesus was made an High-priest according to the similitude of Melchizedec, he, in this viith chapter, for the purpose of proceeding with the Hebrews still farther on towards the perfection of Christian knowledge, searched into the deep meaning of the oath, recorded Psal. cx. 4. 'The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a Priest for ever according to the order of Melchizedec;' and, by accurately examining the particulars concerning Melchizedec related in the Mosaic history, he shewed, that Melchizedec was a far more excellent priest than Aaron and all his sons, consequently, that Jesus, whom God made 'an High-priest for ever according to the similitude of Melchizedec,' exercised a priesthood more acceptable to God, and more effectual for procuring the pardon of sin, than the priesthood which the sons of Aaron exercised under the law.

The first particular concerning Melchizedec, mentioned by Moses, and taken notice of by the apostle, is, That Melchizedec was a priest of the Most High God. This implies, that he was appointed to the office in such a public manner, that all the worshippers of the true God in Canaan knew him to be a priest of the Most High God. And seeing, at that time, there was no visible church of God erected in which Melchizedec could officiate, his designation to the priest's office by God, authorized him to officiate for all the worshippers of the true

God every-where who applied to him. In this respect, therefore, Melchizedec was a greater priest than Aaron, and than any of his sons; their priesthood being confined to the single nation of the Israelites.—The second particular mentioned by Moses, and referred to by the apostle, is, That Melchizedec was a king as well as a priest; so had authority to make laws for regulating the morals of the people for whom he officiated as a priest, and power to punish them for their faults. Accordingly, by the righteous exercise of his power as a king, he trained his people to virtue so successfully, that by his neighbours he himself was called Melchizedec, which signifies King of Righteousness, and the city in which his people lived was, on account of their virtuous and peaceable disposition, called Salem, which signifies Peace. Whereas the sons of Aaron, being simply priests, had no authority to make laws, nor power to correct the vices of the Israelites, for whom they officiated. Besides, many of them, instead of being righteous, were persons of a vicious and turbulent disposition, ver. 2.—The third particular concerning Melchizedec which the apostle taketh notice of is, That neither his father, nor his mother, nor his genealogy, is mentioned by Moses. From this it follows, that Melchizedec did not derive either his priesthood, or his fitness for the priesthood, from his parents, but had the office conferred on him by God on account of the excellence of his character. It was otherwise with the Levitical priests: For although Aaron himself was specially called of God, his sons were made priests, neither by any particular designation, nor on account of the excellence of their character; but merely by their descending in a right manner from parents who were priests, Levit. xxi. 7. 14. and by their being free from bodily imperfections, Levit. xxi. 17–21.—The fourth particular concerning Melchizedec taken notice of by the apostle is, That in the account given of him by Moses, he had neither beginning of days nor end of life, as a priest, fixed by any law of God; so that he did not begin to exercise the priest's office at a determined age, nor cease to be a priest when superannuated, as was the case with the sons of Aaron, but exercised the priest's office all his life; in which respect his priesthood was well fitted to be a type of the perpetual priesthood of the Son of God, ver. 3.—This circumstance, that Melchizedec was a priest all his life, joined with the former, that he was made a priest by God on account of the excellence of his character, shews that his priesthood had for its object to purify the minds of his subjects from sin; an office to which strength of body was not necessary, but maturity of judgment. Whereas the sons of Aaron, having for the object of their ministrations to cleanse the bodies only of the Israelites from ceremonial pollution, by services which required great bodily strength, they were not permitted to begin their ministry till they were thirty years old, nor to continue therein beyond the age of fifty. See Heb. vii. 16. note 1.—The fifth particular concerning Melchizedec, mentioned by Moses, and taken notice of by the apostle, is, That Abraham gave him the tenth of all the spoils of the vanquished kings, notwithstanding he was himself both a prince and a priest. This is a proof from fact, that Melchizedec's priesthood was not confined to one family or nation, but, for any thing we know, being the only specially appointed priest of the Most High God then in the world, he was an universal priest, ver. 4.—The case was different with the sons of Aaron. For they could not tithe all the worshippers of the true God every-where, nor even all the Israelites, by virtue of their being priests; but they took tithes from their brethren the Levites only, and that by virtue of a particular commandment, mentioned Num. xviii. 24–30. and they did this notwithstanding the Levites were descended from Abraham equally with themselves; all which shewed the limited nature of their priesthood, ver. 5.—But Melchizedec having no relation to the ancestors of the Levitical priests, was not authorized, by any connexion which he had with Abraham, either natural or political, to take tithes of him. Wherefore he received the tithes, merely because by the divine appointment he officiated as a priest for all the worshippers of God in Canaan, of whom Abraham was one.—The sixth particular concerning Melchizedec, mentioned by Moses, and taken notice of by the apostle, is, That Melchizedec, after receiving the tithes, blessed Abraham, notwithstanding he was at that time possessed of the promises, ver. 6.—And, as the less is blessed of the better person, Abraham, by receiving the blessing from Melchizedec, acknowledged him to be his superior, both as a priest and as a king, ver. 7.—Farther, to shew the superiority of Melchizedec to the Levitical priests, the apostle observes, that here, under the Mosaic economy, priests who die, that is whose priesthood expieth when they arrive at a certain time of life, receive tithes; but there, under the patriarchal economy, Melchizedec received tithes, of whom it is testified, that he lived a priest continually, ver. 8.—Likewise he observes, that Melchizedec's superiority to the Levitical priests was shewed by this, that Levi and his descendants may be said to have paid tithes to Melchizedec in Abraham, ver. 9.—because Levi was yet in the loins of his father when Melchizedec met him. And since Levi derived all his dignity from his father Abraham, if, by paying tithes and receiving the blessing, Abraham himself was shewed to be inferior to Melchizedec, certainly his son Levi was in like manner shewed to be inferior to him, ver. 10.

Here the apostle ends his account of Melchizedec, without having pointed out any of the particulars in which he resembled the Son of God, except the one mentioned ver. 3. that he was a priest all his life. Wherefore, that the reader may know in what respects Christ is a priest according to the similitude of Melchizedec, and be sensible of the propriety of God's making the priesthood of Melchizedec the pattern of the priesthood of his Son, it will be fit in this place to compare the character of Christ with that of Melchizedec, as described by the apostle in this chapter.

And, 1. Like Melchizedec, Christ is a king as well as a priest. Being the Son of God, and the Maker of the worlds, he is the Heir or Lord of all; consequently he hath a right to govern mankind by the laws of his gospel, and power to reward or punish every one according to his deserts.—2. Like Melchizedec, Christ exercises his government for promoting moral righteousness among his subjects. Accordingly, by his gospel he hath reformed many of his subjects; and will continue to reign till he make truth and righteousness prevail universally among them; and such as are irreclaimable he will destroy. Wherefore, as his government is founded on a better authority than Melchizedec's, and is carried on with more success, the title of king of righteousness belongs more properly to him than Melchizedec: Also, he is well entitled to be called king of peace, as he came from heaven to produce peace on earth, by reconciling sinners to God and to one another; and to make the reconciled live with God for ever, in a state of perfect peace in heaven.—3. Like Melchizedec, Christ was not descended from parents who were priests, but he was made a priest by the special designation of God. And his priesthood is of a nature so excellent, that as he had no predecessor, so he can have no companion nor successor in his priesthood. Nor is any such needed; seeing he ever liveth to execute the priest's office himself.—4. Christ's priesthood, like that of Melchizedec, not requiring bodily strength, but maturity of judgment, to execute it properly, it was not limited to the prime of his life; but, like Melchizedec, he is a priest for ever, who exercises his priesthood as long as his people have any need of the priest's office.—5. As Melchizedec was appointed to exercise his priesthood in behalf of all the worshippers of the true God in the countries where he lived, so Christ was appointed to exercise his priesthood, not for any particular nation or race of men, but for all mankind: He is an universal priest. And having offered himself a sacrifice for the sin of the whole world, he hath thereby procured pardon and eternal life for all who repent of their sins; and maketh continual intercession for them in heaven, upon the strength of that meritorious sacrifice. So Christ himself hath declared in his prayer to his Father, recorded John xvii. 2. 'Thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give life to as many as thou hast given him.'

The apostle, in the preceding fifth chapter, to shew that Jesus the author of the gospel hath made atonement for the sin of the world, which is the fourth fact on which the authority of the gospel revelation resteth; having proved that Jesus is a priest; also in this seventh chapter having displayed his greatness as a priest, by describing the character and office of Melchizedec, according to whose similitude he was made a priest, proceeds, in what follows, to answer the argument advanced by the doctors for proving the efficacy and perpetuity of the Levitical priesthood, together with the unalterable obligation of the law of Moses. They affirmed the Levitical sacrifices to be real atonements which never would be abolished, because the law was given solely for the purpose of establishing and regulating them; consequently that the law itself would always remain in force. But to shew the fallacy of this argument, the apostle, entering into the deep meaning of the oath whereby Messiah was made a priest, reasoned thereon in the following manner. If perfection, that is, the complete pardon of sin, is to be had through the services of the Levitical priesthood, and if these services are always to continue, together with the law by which they were established and regulated, what need was there that another priest should arise of the order of Melchizedec, and not of the order of Aaron? ver. 11.—Certainly the introduction of a priesthood of a different kind from that of Aaron implieth, that the services of the sons of Aaron are ineffectual for procuring the pardon of sin, and on that account are to be abolished. But if the priesthood is to be changed, it necessarily followeth that the law is also to cease; since its principal use was to regulate the services of the priesthood, ver. 12.—Now, that God resolved to change the priesthood, which by the law was conferred on the sons of Aaron, cannot be doubted, seeing the person to whom God said, 'Thou art a priest for ever,' was of a tribe of which no one ever officiated at the altar, ver. 13.—For it is very plain from Psal. cx. that our Lord Messiah, to whom God said, 'Thou art a priest,' being David's son, hath sprung from Judah, to which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning the priesthood as belonging to it, ver. 14.—Further, that the priesthood of the new priest who was to arise, was to be different from that of the sons of Aaron, is still more exceedingly plain from God's swearing, that according to the similitude of Melchizedec a different priest ariseth, ver. 15.—who is made a priest, not according to the carnal commandment of the law, which obliged the sons of Aaron to lay down their priesthood when fifty years old, because at that age they were not able to undergo those laborious services by which the bodies of the people were to be cleansed from ceremonial defilements; but who is made a priest according to the power of that endless life as a priest which is bestowed on him; because his ministrations being appointed for the purification of the minds of his people from the defilement of sin, required maturity of judgment and experience rather than great bodily strength, ver. 16.—This God himself testified by saying to Messiah, David's Lord, 'Thou art a priest for ever according to the order of Melchizedec,' ver. 17.—From these well known facts the apostle justly concluded, that it was always God's intention to abolish the law of Moses, after the weakness of its precepts to reform mankind was made evident, and the unprofitableness of its sacrifices for procuring the pardon of sin was shewed, ver. 18.—The truth is, the law made no one perfect in respect either of sanctification or of pardon; but the introduction of a better law and priesthood maketh us perfect in both these respects; by which law and priesthood we have access to worship God acceptably, at all times and in all places, ver. 19.

Further, to shew that the gospel with its priesthood is a better covenant than the law with its priesthood, and that it was justly substituted in place of the law, the apostle, entering still further into the deep meaning of God's oath constituting Messiah a priest for ever, reasoned in the following manner:—In as much as Jesus was made a priest with an oath, importing that God would never abolish his priesthood, ver. 20. whereas the sons of Aaron being made priests without any such oath, their priesthood was liable to be abolished, ver. 21.—it is plain, that by the immutability of his priesthood, Jesus hath become the Mediator or High-priest of a more excellent covenant than the law. For if the weakness of the law, and the unprofitableness of the Levitical priesthood, were manifested by God's declaring his intention to abolish them, certainly the greater excellence of the gospel, and the greater efficacy of its priesthood, are shewed by God's having declared them unchangeable, ver. 22.—This the apostle illustrates more fully, chap. viii. by comparing the two covenants together.—I have only to add, that the apostle's reasoning on this subject is of such a nature, that while it sheweth the excellence of the gospel covenant and priesthood, it removes an objection which might naturally occur to the reader; namely, that since the law of Moses and the Levitical priesthood, which were as really of divine appointment as the gospel covenant and priesthood, have been abolished, what security is there that the latter shall not in their turn be abolished likewise! The greatest security possible! With a solemn oath God declared, in the hearing of the angelical host, that he had made both the one and the other absolutely unchangeable.

In what follows, the apostle observes, that as the weakness of the Levitical ordinary priesthood was shewed by the priests quitting their office and giving place to others after their bodily vigour was gone, so the weakness of the Levitical high-priesthood was shewed by the high-priests being many in number, because they were hindered by death from continuing in their office, ver. 23.—But Jesus, because he liveth for ever in the body, possesseth a priesthood which doth not pass from him to any successor, ver. 24.—Hence he is for ever able to save all, from the beginning to the end of the world, who come to God through his mediation; ever living as an High-priest to make intercession for them with God, ver. 25.—Lastly, He is such an High-priest as the character and circumstances of sinners required, who, being absolutely free from sin, ver. 26.—hath no need annually to make atonement for his own sins, as the Levitical high-priests were obliged to do, ver. 27.—For the law made men high-priests who were sinners; but the oath, which was declared after the law was given, constituted the Son an High-priest, who is in every respect perfect, for evermore, ver. 28.

These great discoveries concerning the dignity of Jesus as a king and a priest, and concerning the power of his government and the efficacy of his priesthood, the apostle was directed by inspiration to make, that by the frequent recollection of them we may gladden and strengthen our hearts, under all the trials to which we are exposed during our present probationary state.

Ver. 1.—1. King of Salem.]—According to Josephus, Ant. L. i. c. xi. Salem, the city of Melchizedec, was Jerusalem; but according to Jerome, who saith he received his information from some learned Jews, it was the town which is mentioned Gen. xxxiii. 18. as a city of Shechem, and which is spoken of, John iii. 23. as near to Enon, where John baptized. This city being in Abraham's way as he returned from Damascus to Sodom, after the slaughter of the kings, many are of Jerome's opinion, that the northern Salem was Melchizedec's city, rather than Jerusalem, which was situated farther to the south.

2. Priest of the most high God.]—By calling Melchizedec 'the priest of the most high God,' Gen. xiv. 18. Moses hath informed us, that there was a priest divinely appointed to officiate for the worshippers of the true God in Canaan, long before the days of Aaron, and before God formed to himself a visible church from any particular family or nation of mankind.—The Hebrew word translated a priest, sometimes signifies a prince: But the historian hath removed the ambiguity, by adding the words, 'of the most high God.'

3. And blessed him.]—In his manner of blessing Abraham, Melchizedec shewed himself a priest of the only true God: 'Blessed be Abraham of the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth.'

Ver. 2.—1. A tenth of all;]—namely, of all the spoils of the vanquished kings, ver. 4. and not a tenth also of the goods that had been taken from the king of Sodom and from Lot. For of these Abraham took nothing to himself.—By paying tithes to Melchizedec, Abraham acknowledged him to be a priest of the true God.—It seems his being supernaturally appointed a priest by God, was known through all that country.

2. Being first indeed, by interpretation, king of righteousness, and next also, &c.]—In ancient times, especially among the people whose history is recorded by Moses, it was usual to give names to persons and places expressive of their qualities, or in commemoration of some remarkable events. Thus Abram's name was changed into Abraham, to signify that he was made the father of many nations; and Sarai was named Sarah, because she was made the mother of nations; and Jacob obtained the name of Israel, because 'he had power with God.' See also Ruth i. 13, 20. This being the ancient practice, it cannot be doubted that the neighbourhood gave to this excellent king and to his subjects the names which they bear in the history, because they expressed the real and well known characters of both. Viewed in the light of this ancient practice, the apostle's argument from the name is conclusive, to shew what an excellent person Melchizedec was, and how fit to be made a type of the Son of God, who, in allusion to that type, was declared to love righteousness and hate wickedness, Psal. xiv. 7. and was foretold by Isaiah under the title of the Prince of Peace, Isa. ix. 6.

Ver. 3.—1. Without father, without mother.]—The apostle's meaning is, that Melchizedec did not derive his priesthood from his parents, but was made a priest of the most high God by a particular appointment. And, as there was no visible church of God existing at that time in which he could officiate, the appointment of God certainly authorized him to officiate as a priest for all the worshippers of the true God in those countries. Of this number his own subjects undoubtedly were. So likewise was Abimelech king of Gerar, Gen. xx. 3. xxi. 22. and Abraham with his domestics. Melchizedec, therefore, was an universal priest.

2. Without genealogy.]—Αγενεαλογητος here answers to μη γενεαλογουμενος ες αυτον, ver. 6. and implies, that, by not giving

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. VII.—1 Now, that ye may know the nature of Melchizedec's priesthood, to which God likened the priesthood of his Son, I observe, that this Melchizedec, king of Salem, and priest of the Most High God, who met Abraham as he returned from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him;

2 To whom Abraham imparted even a tenth of all the spoils, (ver. 4.), being first, according to the interpretation of his name, king of righteousness, a most righteous king, and next also, king of Salem, which, by interpretation, is king of peace, king of a peaceable and virtuous people;

3 Was without father without mother as a priest, so that he was not a priest by descent; and without genealogy in the scripture, consequently there is no evidence of his being related to Abraham in any respect. Moreover, having neither beginning of days nor end of life as a priest, but being made a type of the Son of God, he remained a priest all his life.

4 Now, consider how great this priest was, to whom, without being either his kinsman or subject, or being commanded by God to do so, even Abraham the father of our nation gave a tenth part of the spoils of the conquered kings:

5 For they verily of the sons of Levi who receive the priesthood by descent from Aaron, have a commandment to tithe the people of Israel only according to the law, that is by tithing the tithes taken from the people by their brethren the Levites, although they have come forth of the loins of Abraham, and in that respect are equal in dignity to the priests;

6 But Melchizedec, who did not derive his pedigree from the progenitors of the sons of Aaron, (see ver. 3. note 2.), and who,

Melchizedec's pedigree, Moses intimated that he was not related to Abraham in any respect, nor to the priests who descended from him by Aaron.

3. Having neither beginning of days nor end of life.]—The time of the priests' ministration was called their days, Luke i. 23.—The service of the sons of Kohath, and among the rest the service of the priests, who were all Kohath's sons, was appointed, Numb. iv. 2, 3. 16. to begin when they were thirty years old, and to end when they arrived at the age of fifty. Wherefore, when it is said of Melchizedec, that he had neither beginning of days nor end of life, the meaning I think is, that neither the beginning of his days, nor the end of his life as a priest, was limited by any law of God, as the days of the service of the Levitical priests were. For in any other sense it is not true, that Melchizedec had neither beginning of days nor end of life. By thus continuing a priest all his life, Melchizedec greatly excelled the Levitical priests, and was qualified to represent the Son of God, the happy effect of whose ministrations as a priest is not confined to any one age of the world, but reached backward to the beginning, and forward to the end of time.

4. All his life.]—So the original phrase εως τε θανατου, signifies, being used by Apollon to express the perpetual dictatorship of Sulla, Bell. Civ. 316. It is used likewise to denote the whole of Christ's life, Heb. x. 12. See also chap. x. 1.

Ver. 4.—1. Abraham the patriarch.]—Πατριάρχης. This word is very well translated in the Syriac version, 'Caput patrum, the Head of the fathers.'

2. The tenth of the spoils.]—Though the word δεκάτη signifies the best, whether of the fruits of the earth or of the spoils taken in war, the apostle does not mean that Abraham gave only the tenth of the chief spoils: He gave the tenth of all, ver. 2. But that tenth he gave out of the best of the spoils. Abraham was himself a priest, for he offered sacrifice when God entered into a covenant with him, Gen. xv. 9, 10. Wherefore, by giving Melchizedec the tenth of all, Abraham acknowledged, that in respect of the extent of his priesthood, as well as in respect of the manner in which the office was conferred on him, Melchizedec was a greater priest than he himself was. Further, seeing among the spoils there were probably cattle, Melchizedec may have offered some of them in sacrifice for Abraham as a thank-offering.

Ver. 5.—1. Have a commandment to tithe the people according to the law, that is, their brethren.]—The brethren of the priests whom they tithed were the Levites. This is called a tithe the people, because the portion of the Levites which the priests tithed, consisted wholly of the tithes which the Levites had taken from the people, Numb. xviii. 24—31.

2. Although they have come forth of the loins of Abraham.]—The apostle mentions this with what goes before, to shew that the priests were allowed to tithe the Levites, not because they were superior to them in respect of their descent, but because these tithes were allotted to the priests as a part of their maintenance, just as the tithes of the people were given to the Levites for their maintenance: for the tribe of Levi had no part of Canaan assigned to them in the division of the land; the Lord's part was their portion.

Ver. 6.—1. Tithed Abraham;]—namely, without any particular command from God so to do; and, being king of Salem, he had no occasion to take tithes of Abraham for his maintenance; but he took them as a priest, who by divine appointment officiated in holy things for all the worshippers of the most high God in Canaan. In and blessed² (τοῦ ἑστηκότος) the holder of the promise.³

7 (Aa, 103.) Now, without all contradiction, the less¹ is blessed of the better.

8 (Ka, 224.) Besides, here verily men who die take tithes; but there one testified of, (οὗ ζῆ, 12.) that he lived! A PRIEST ALL HIS LIFE. (Psal. cx. 4.)

9 And as one may say, even Levi, who receiveth tithes, was tithed (δα, 117.) in Abraham:

10 For he was yet in the loins of his father,¹ when Melchizedec met him.

11 (Ov, 263.) Moreover, if indeed perfection¹ were through the Levitical priesthood, (τα, 90.) because (αὐτῷ, 190.) on account of it the people received the law,² what farther need was there that a different³ priest should arise, according to the order of Melchizedec, and not be called according to the order of Aaron?

12 (Ta, 83.) Wherefore, the priesthood being changed, of necessity there is a change also of the law.¹

13 (Ta, 90.) For HE (οὗ ἐστίν, 191. 2.) to whom these things are said, partook¹ of a different tribe, of which no one gave attendance at the altar.

this respect, therefore, he was a fit type of the Son of God, through whose priesthood all the nations of the earth are to be blessed.

2. And blessed.]—Melchizedec was directed of God to bless Abraham on this occasion, as an emblem of the blessing of the nations by Christ, who, like Melchizedec, was to be a king as well as a priest, for the purpose of effectually blessing mankind.

3. The holder of the promises.]—This circumstance is mentioned to shew, that notwithstanding God highly honoured Abraham by making the promises to him, as the father or head of all the faithful, yet he was inferior to Melchizedec as a priest; for it is added in the next verse, 'the less is blessed of the better.'

Ver. 7. The less is blessed of the better.]—The blessing here spoken of, is not the simple wishing of good to others, which may be done by inferiors to superiors; but it is the action of a person authorized to declare God's intention to bestow good things on another. In this manner Isaac and Jacob blessed their children, under a prophetic impulse. In this manner the priests under the law blessed the people. In this manner likewise Melchizedec, the priest of the most high God, blessed Abraham.

Ver. 8. One testified of, that he lived.]—The Greek verb ζῆ here is not the present, but the imperfect of the indicative. See Ctenard's grammar in voce.—It is not testified, Psal. cx. 4. that Melchizedec 'now liveth,' far less that he 'liveth as a priest.' It is only testified, 'Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedec,' which the apostle terms a testifying that Melchizedec lived a priest all his life; because that was one of the particulars which distinguished his priesthood from that of Aaron, and which rendered it a fit type of the priesthood of the Son of God.—See ver. 3. where this is expressly affirmed.

Ver. 9. And as one may say.]—Grotius and Raphellus have shewed, that the phrase αὐτῷ ἐστίν was used by the Greeks to soften any seemingly harsh expression which was not to be pressed too far, in the same manner as the Latins used their phrase, ut dicam. Le Clerc, however, hath endeavoured, Art. Critic. vol. i. p. 167. to prove that this phrase should be translated 'and to say the truth.' But as the apostle's affirmation, that 'Levi was tithed in Abraham,' is not to be taken strictly, I think it more proper, with Grotius and Raphellus, to understand αὐτῷ ἐστίν as a softening of that assertion.

Ver. 10. He was yet in the loins of his father.]—This might be justly said of Levi, who descended from Abraham in the ordinary course of generation; but it cannot be said of Christ, who was born in a miraculous manner without any human father. While therefore the apostle's argument, taken from Abraham's paying tithes to Melchizedec, and his receiving the blessing from him, proves that both Abraham and the Levitical priests, his natural descendants, were inferior to Melchizedec, it does not apply to Christ at all.

Ver. 11.—1. Moreover, if indeed perfection.]—Perfection, applied to priests and sacrifices, denotes the highest degree of those blessings which men seek by the use of priests and sacrifices; namely, the pardon of sin and the favour of the Deity. See Heb. vii. 1. note 1.

2. On account of it the people received the law.]—Εἰς αὐτῷ ἕνεκα; being a king as well as a priest, did not take tithes for his maintenance, tithed Abraham a stranger, and blessed him, although he was the possessor of the promise.

7 Now, without all doubt, the inferior is blessed of his superior. Wherefore, by this transaction also, Melchizedec was shewn to be greater than Abraham, both as a king and as a priest.

8 Besides, under the law verily men who at a certain age, cease to be priests, as if they were dead, take tithes: but under the patriarchal dispensation one took tithes, of whom it is testified by God, that he lived a priest all his life.

9 And as one may say, even Levi, whose children receive tithes from Abraham's children, was tithed by Melchizedec in the person of Abraham:

10 For Levi was yet in the loins of his father Abraham, when Melchizedec met Abraham: So that the consequences of Levi's father's paying tithes and receiving the blessing, extended to Levi and to his children.

11 Moreover, to shew you the inferiority of the Levitical priesthood to the priesthood of Christ, I ask, If the pardon of sin were really to be obtained through the ministrations of the Levitical priesthood, because on account of establishing that priesthood the Israelites received the law; what farther need was there that a different priest should arise according to the order of Melchizedec, and not to be called according to the order of Aaron? Is not the prediction, of the raising up of a priest of a different order from that of Aaron, a declaration of the inefficacy of the Levitical priesthood, and of God's intention to change it?

12 Wherefore, the priesthood, on account of which the law was given, being changed, of necessity there must be a change also of the law itself.

13 Now, God certainly intended to change the priesthood from the tribe of Levi: For he to whom he said, Thou art a priest, was of a different tribe, of which no one ever officiated as a priest at the altar; nor by the law could officiate.

ΠΡΟΣΕΠΙΤΗΡΗΣΙΣ. The common translation of this clause, 'under it the people received the law,' is not true in fact: For the law was prior to the priesthood, being given for the purpose of forming and establishing the priesthood. Nay, the Jewish people themselves were separated from the rest of mankind, and made a people by the law, merely that they might as a nation worship the only true God according to the Levitical ritual, in settling which most of the precepts of the law were employed. This being the case, is it any wonder that such of the Jews as looked no farther than the outside of the priesthood and law, imagined that perfection in respect of pardon and acceptance with God, was to be obtained by the Levitical priesthood and sacrifices, and in that persuasion believed they never would be abolished? Nevertheless, if they had understood the true meaning of the law, they would have known that it was a typical oracle, in which, by its services, the priesthood and sacrifice of the Son of God were prefigured; and that by calling his Son a priest, not after the order of Aaron, but after the order of Melchizedec, God declared that his services as an High-priest, and the sacrifice of himself which he was to offer, were entirely different, both in their nature and effects, from the Levitical services and sacrifices; and that they were to be substituted in the room of these services, for which there was no occasion after the Priest and sacrifice which they prefigured were come.

3. That a different priest should arise.]—The apostle does not mean a priest numerically or individually different from the Levitical priests; for that was not to the purpose of his argument: but he means, a priest different from them in his character and ministrations, and in the effects of his ministrations. They were priests after the order of Aaron, that is, priests by descent; he was a priest after the order of Melchizedec, being immediately appointed to the office by God himself, as Melchizedec was: Their ministrations sanctified only to the purifying of the flesh; his sanctified to the purifying of the soul from sin: By their ministrations the offending Israelites were delivered only from temporal death; but by his ministrations penitents are delivered from eternal death.

Ver. 12. The priesthood being changed, of necessity there is a change also of the law.]—Under the law the offices of the priesthood consisted in offering the sacrifices of beasts; and in performing various rites for purifying the bodies of the worshippers from ceremonial defilement, that they might be fit to join the congregation in the public worship of God. But when the priesthood was changed, by raising up from another tribe a priest after the order of Melchizedec, whose services had for their object to purify the conscience of the worshippers, not by the sacrifice of beasts but by the sacrifice of himself, the whole law concerning the sacrifices of beasts, and concerning the sanctifying of the flesh of the Israelites by washing, &c. was of necessity changed, that is, abolished entirely.

Ver. 13. Partook of a different tribe.]—Μετέσχευ. This leads us to chap. ii. 14. where it is said of our Lord, that (μετέσχευ) 'he partook of flesh and blood.' He partook of the flesh and blood of a different tribe.

14 For it is very plain,¹ that our Lord hath sprung up from Judah;² (α, 142. 1.) to which tribe Moses spake nothing (α, 142. 1.) concerning the priesthood.

15 (Κα, 224.) Moreover, it is still more exceedingly plain, (α, 127.) that according to the similitude (see chap. v. 6. note) of Melchizedec, a different priest ariseth,

16 Who (α, 127.) is made, not according to the law of a carnal¹ commandment, but according to the power of an endless life.² (See ver. 24.)

17 For he testifieth, Thou art a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchizedec. (Syriac, secundum similitudinem, see ver. 15.)

18 (Μα, 228. 93.) Well, then, there is a disannulling of the precedent commandment, because of its weakness¹ and unprofitableness.²

19 For the law made (α, 21. 2.) no one perfect, (see ver. 11. note 1.), but the after introduction¹ of a better hope, by which we draw near² to God.

20 (Κα, 224.) Moreover, in as much as not without an oath¹ JESUS WAS MADE A PRIEST; (from ver. 21.)

21 For they verily were made priests without an oath, but he with an oath, by him who said to him, The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent,¹ Thou art a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchizedec;

22 By so much was Jesus made (α, 224.) the mediator¹ of a better covenant.² (See Heb. viii. 6. note.)

14 For it is very plain from the scriptures, that our Lord Messiah, called by David, (Psalm cx. 1.) his Lord, and to whom God said, 'Thou art a priest,' was to spring up from Judah; to which tribe Moses spake nothing concerning their obtaining the priesthood.

15 Moreover, it is still more exceedingly plain from God's oath, that, according to the similitude of Melchizedec, a different kind of priest from the Levitical ariseth, who, like Melchizedec, will be also a king;—wherefore, since the law was given for the purpose of establishing the priesthood, (ver. 11.), the priesthood being changed, the law must be changed likewise, ver. 12.;—

16 Who is made, not according to the law, whose commandment concerning the priests hath a respect only to their bodily strength, but according to the power of that endless life which he possesses, and by which he can minister as a priest for ever.

17 For God testifieth concerning him, Thou art a priest for ever according to the order of Melchizedec. Like Melchizedec, thou art a priest and a king, and shalt continue the only priest of the people of God, so long as they have any need of the priest's office.

18 Well, then, the priesthood being changed, there is a total abrogation of the precedent commandment, the law of Moses, because of its weakness in reforming mankind, and its unprofitableness in procuring pardon for sinners;

19 For the law by its priesthood made no one perfect in respect of pardon and access to God: But the after introduction of a better priesthood, as the foundation of a better hope, maketh men perfect in these respects; by which priesthood we worship God acceptably. (See Eph. ii. 18.)

20 Moreover, that the gospel is a better and more effectual covenant than the law, is evident; for in as much as not without an oath Jesus the mediator of the gospel covenant was made a priest;

21 For Aaron and his sons verily were made priests without an oath; but Jesus was made a priest with an oath, in which an unchangeable priesthood was conferred on him by God, who said to him, The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent of the appointment, Thou art a priest for ever, according to the order of Melchizedec:

22 I say, in as much as by the oath of God an unchangeable priesthood was conferred on him, by so much was Jesus made the mediator of a more permanent and effectual covenant than the Sinaitic.

Ver. 14.—1. For it is very plain.]—Pierce is of opinion, that the preposition α, in the word α, 142. 1., hath the same signification as in the word α, 142. 1., ver. 18. and that it may be translated, it is plain before he appeared: a sense which our translators have given to α, 142. 1. Tit. v. 24. 25. But if this translation is adopted, α, 142. 1. must be rendered was to spring up, contrary to the propriety of the tense.

2. That our Lord hath sprung up from Judah.]—That Messiah was to spring up from Judah, is very plain from the prophecies concerning his descent. And it is likewise plain, that this part of Messiah's character was verified in our Lord, whose genealogy Matthew and Luke have traced up to king David, from the public tables. For that such tables of their descent were kept by the Jews, Josephus testifieth, Vita, Sect. 1. at the end: "I give you these successions of our family, as I find them written in the public tables."—By these tables Paul knew himself to be of the tribe of Benjamin.

Ver. 16.—1. Who is made, not according to the law of a carnal commandment.]—The commandment of the law, appointing the sons of Aaron to begin their ministrations at thirty years old, and to leave them off at fifty, (see ver. 3. note 3.), is called a carnal commandment, because it regarded the bodily strength of the priests, as the only personal qualification necessary to their ministry. The truth is, the services of the tabernacle were so laborious, that none but persons in the vigour of life were capable of performing them.

2. But according to the power of an endless life.]—To the ministrations of Christ's priesthood, bodily strength was not necessary. They were intended for sanctifying, not the bodies but the souls of the worshippers, and required vigour of mind rather than of body. Wherefore, possessing an endless life, our Lord was fitly made a Priest for ever.—It is true, being a Sacrifice, as well as a Priest, it was necessary that he should die. But as he continued only a short while in the state of the dead, and arose never to die any more, he may justly be said to have an endless life. Besides, it should be considered, that his life as a priest did not begin till after his ascension, when he passed through the heavens into the holiest of all, with the sacrifice of his crucified body; see Heb. viii. 5. note 3.; and having offered that sacrifice there, he sat down at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens, (viii. 1.), where he remains the minister of that true tabernacle, making continual intercession for his people: And thus abides, in the heavenly holy place, a Priest for ever, according to the power of his endless life as a priest.

Ver. 18.—1. Because of its weakness.]—The weakness of the law in reforming sinners arose from this, that whilst it required perfect obedience to all its precepts under the penalty of death, it gave the Israelites no encouragement to obey, either by promising them the assistance of God's Spirit to enable them to obey, or by giving them assurance of pardon upon their repentance in case of failure. The only source from which the Israelites derived their hope of these things, was the covenant with Abraham.

2. And unprofitableness.]—Though the apostle affirms, that the law of Moses was unprofitable for the purpose of pardoning sinners, it answered many valuable ends, which he has explained in his epistle to the Galatians, chap. iii. 19–24.

Ver. 19.—1. The after introduction.]—Beza tells us, that the word α, 142. 1., signifies the bringing in of a thing from a different quarter. But that translation does not express the force of the preposition α in this compounded word.

2. Draw near to God.]—Under the covenant of the law, old priests, by virtue of the Levitical sacrifices, but not the people, were permitted in their acts of worship to draw near to the manifestation of the divine presence in the tabernacle; but under the gospel covenant, by the sacrifice of Christ, all believers equally are permitted, in their acts of worship, to draw near to the presence of God in the great temple of the universe.

Ver. 20. Not without an oath.]—The apostle's reasoning here is founded on this, that God never interposed his oath, except to shew the certainty and immutability of the thing sworn. Thus he swears to Abraham, Gen. xxii. 16–18, that in his seed 'all the nations of the earth should be blessed'; and to the rebellious Israelites, that 'they should not enter into his rest,' Deut. i. 34. 35.; and to Moses, that 'he should not go into Canaan,' Deut. iv. 21.; and to David, that 'his seed should endure for ever, and his throne unto all generations,' Psalm lxxxix. 4. Wherefore, since Christ was made a priest not without an oath that he should be a priest for ever after the similitude of Melchizedec, that circumstance shewed God's immutable resolution never to change or abolish his priesthood, nor to change or abolish the covenant which was established on his priesthood: whereas, the Levitical priesthood and the law of Moses being established without an oath, were thereby declared to be changeable at God's pleasure.

Ver. 21. The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent.]—The immutability of Christ's priesthood depends, not only on God's oath making him a priest for ever, but on God's swearing that he will never repent of making him a priest for ever.

Ver. 22.—1. By so much as Jesus made the mediator.]—Eph. vi. 19. The Greek commentators explain this word very properly by α, 142. 1., mediator, which is its etymological meaning; for it comes from α, 142. 1., near, and signifies one who draws near, or who 23 (Καὶ 224.) Besides, they indeed are become many priests, because they are hindered by death from continuing;

24 But he, (ὁ μόνος) because he liveth for ever, hath a priesthood which doth not pass from HIM.

25 (Ὅθεν καὶ οὐκ ἔστιν ἡς το πᾶντας;) Hence he is even for ever able to save them who come to God through him; always living to make intercession for them.

26 (Tag, 97.) Now such an High-priest became us, WHO, (ἁγιος) being holy, harmless, undefiled, separated from sinners, and higher than the heavens;

27 He hath not, like the high-priests, need from time to time to offer sacrifices, first for his own sins, then FOR those of the people: for this LATTER he did once when he offered up himself.

28 For the law constituteth men high-priests who have infirmity; but (ὁ λόγος, 60.) the word of the oath, which was after the law, CONSTITUTED the Son, (ὑπακούμενος, Heb. v. 9. note 1.) who is perfected for evermore.

causes another to draw near. Now, as in this passage a comparison is stated between Jesus as an high-priest and the Levitical high-priests; and as these were justly considered by the apostle as the mediators of the Sinaitic covenant, because through their mediation the Israelites worshipped God with sacrifices, and received from him as their king a political pardon, in consequence of the sacrifices offered by the high-priest on the day of atonement; it is evident that the apostle in this passage calls Jesus 'the High-priest or Mediator of the better covenant,' because through his mediation, that is, through the sacrifice of himself which he offered to God, believers receive all the blessings of the better covenant. And as the apostle had said, ver. 16. that 'by the introduction of a better hope (ὑποπόμις) we draw near to God,' he in this verse very properly called Jesus ὑποπόμις rather than μεσσίας, to denote the effect of his mediation. See ver. 25.—Our translators, indeed, following the Vulgate and Beza, have rendered ὑποπόμις by the word surety, a sense which it hath Ecclesiasticus xlix. 16, and which naturally enough follows from its etymological meaning. For the person who becomes surety for the good behaviour of another, or for his performing something stipulated, brings that other near to the party to whom he gives the security,—he reconciles the two. But in this sense the word ὑποπόμις is not applicable to the Jewish high-priests. For, to be a proper surety, one must either have power to compel the party to perform that for which he hath become his surety, or, in case of his not performing it, he must be able to perform it himself. This being the case, will any one say that the Jewish high-priests were sureties to God for the Israelites performing their part of the covenant of the law? or to the people, for God's performing his part of that covenant?—As little is the appellation surety of the new covenant applicable to Jesus. For, since the new covenant doth not require perfect obedience, but only the obedience of faith, if the obedience of faith is not given by men themselves, it cannot be given by another in their room, unless we suppose that men can be saved without personal faith. I therefore infer, that they who speak of Jesus as the surety of the new covenant, must hold that it requires perfect obedience, which not being in the power of believers to give, Jesus hath performed it for them. But is not this to make the covenant of grace a covenant of works, contrary to the whole tenor of scripture? For these reasons, I think the Greek commentators have given the true meaning of the word ὑποπόμις in this passage, when they explain it by μεσσίας, mediator.

2. Of a better covenant.]—The common translation of εὐαγγελίου διαθήκης, of a better testament, I think is wrong; for it implieth that the law of Moses is likewise a testament, which it cannot in any sense be called, as shall be shewed Heb. ix. 15. note 1.—The apostle's reasoning here is to the following purpose: The covenants of which I speak, being founded each on its own priesthood, the covenant which is founded on a temporary priesthood must itself be temporary, and so never can be the means of conferring an eternal pardon: whereas the covenant which is established on an eternal priesthood must be eternal, and have the greatest efficacy at all times in procuring salvation for sinners. See ver. 20. note.

Ver. 24. Hath a priesthood which doth not pass from him.]—The apostle makes this remark on Christ's priesthood, because an office which is held for ever renders the possessor more extensively powerful than if it were held only for a time. See ver. 25.

Ver. 25. Always living to make intercession for them.]—The nature of the apostle's argument requires, that by Christ's 'always living,' we understand his always living in the body. For it is thus

23 Besides, Jesus our High-priest is more powerful than the Levitical high-priests in this respect, that they indeed are many priests, because they are hindered by death from continuing;

24 But he, because he liveth for ever in the body, (see ver. 25. note), hath a priesthood which shall never pass from him to any other person on account of incapacity.

25 On which account he is even for ever able to save all who approach to God through his mediation; always living an High-priest (ver. 8. 24.) to make affectionate intercession with God for them.

26 Now such an High-priest as Christ was suited to our exigencies, who being holy in affection, harmless in conduct, undefiled by those with whom he conversed, separated from sinners, and higher than all the inhabitants of the heavens, the angels;

27 He hath not, like the Levitical high-priests, need from time to time to offer sacrifices, first for his own sins, and then for the sins of the people. For himself he offered no sacrifice; and for the sins of the people he offered sacrifice only once, when he offered up himself.

28 The sons of Aaron needed to offer sacrifice for themselves, because the law constituteth men high-priests who are sinners; but the declaration of the oath, which happened after the law was given, constituted the Son an High-priest, who is perfectly fitted for executing the office for evermore, by his absolute freedom from sin, and by his endless life.

that he is an affectionate and sympathizing high-priest, who, in his intercession, pleads the merit of his death to procure the salvation of all who come to God through him. Agreeably to this account of Christ's intercession, the apostle, ver. 27. mentions the sacrifice of himself, which Christ offered for the sins of the people, as the foundation of his intercession. Now, as he offered that sacrifice in heaven, chap. viii. 2, 3, by presenting his crucified body there, (see chap. viii. 5. note), and as he continually resides there in the body, some of the ancients were of opinion, that his continual intercession consists in the continual presentation of his humanity before his Father; because it is a continual declaration of his earnest desire of the salvation of men, and of his having, in obedience to his Father's will, made himself flesh, and suffered death to accomplish it. See Rom. viii. 34. note 3. This opinion is confirmed by the manner in which the Jewish high-priest made intercession for the people on the day of atonement, and which was a type of Christ's intercession in heaven. He made it not by offering prayers for them in the most holy place, but by sprinkling the blood of the sacrifices on the mercy-seat, in token of their death. And as by that action he opened the earthly holy places to the prayers and worship of the Israelites during the ensuing year; so Jesus, by presenting his humanity continually before the presence of his Father, opens heaven to the prayers of his people in the present life, and to their persons after the resurrection.

The appointment of Jesus to be our intercessor with the Father, being agreeable to the general method in which the scriptures represent God as dealing with mankind, Gen. xviii. 26. Job xlii. 8. it is no proof of God's unwillingness, but rather of his great inclination, to be merciful to us. At the same time, it is an illustrious manifestation of Christ's worthiness. And being the reward of that worthiness, it not only encourages sinners in their approaches to the Deity, by giving them assurance of pardon, but it animates them powerfully to become in like manner worthy and good, seeing persons of that character are held in such estimation by God, and so highly rewarded.

Ver. 26.—1. Who being holy.]—Because the English word holy is not different in sense from undefiled, which follows, and because the Hebrew word answering to ἁγιος, holy, is by the LXX. rendered ἁγιασμένος, merciful, Campbell, in one of his Dissertations prefixed to his Translation of the Gospels, gives it as his opinion, that in this verse ἁγιος may be translated merciful.

2. Separated from sinners.]—This is thought an allusion to the separation of the high-priest, seven days before he made the annual atonement, Levit. xvi. 17.—Jesus, our high-priest, had no need of any particular separation before he offered the sacrifice of himself; he was always separated from sinners in character and behaviour.

Ver. 27. Hath not, like the high-priests, need from time to time.]—So the phrase καὶ ἡμεῖς must be translated, being equivalent to καὶ ὅτι ἡμεῖς, chap. x. 1. from year to year. For the high-priests offered sacrifice only one day in the year, namely, on the tenth of the seventh month. Besides, the word ἡμέρας, days, is used to denote any part of time; as when it is said of the passover, Exod. xlii. 10. 'Thou shalt keep this ordinance (Heb. from days to days) from year to year.' See also 1 Sam. i. 3.—In this passage the apostle takes notice of three particulars, which distinguish the sacrifice offered by Christ from the sacrifices offered by the Jewish high-priests: First, He offered no sacrifice for himself, but only for the people; Secondly, He did not offer that sacrifice annually, but once for all; Thirdly, The sacrifice which he offered for the people was not of calves and of goats, but of himself.

CHAPTER VIII.

View and Illustration of the Discoveries in this Chapter.

THE apostle, in what goeth before, having shewed that Jesus, as an High-priest, is superior to all the Levitical high-priests, in as much as, like Melchizedec, he is a king as well as a priest; nay, a more righteous king than even Melchizedec, being absolutely free from sin; he, in this and the following chapter, for the farther illustration of the glory of Jesus as an High-priest, compares his ministrations with the ministrations of the Levitical high-priests, both in respect of the place where he officiates, and in respect of the efficacy of his ministrations.

His discourse on these subjects the apostle begins with observing, that they are matters of greater importance to mankind as sinners, than any hitherto treated of by him; namely, that we have in Jesus such an High-priest as our sinful state required, and as he had described, chap. vii. 26. namely, an High-priest absolutely sinless, and greater than all the angels, who, having offered one effectual sacrifice for the sins of the people, even the sacrifice of himself, sat down at the right hand of the manifestation of the divine presence in heaven, ver. 1.—as the abiding minister or High-priest of the true holy places which the Lord hath formed and not man, ver. 2.—This sitting down of the Son of God, our High-priest, at the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens, after offering the sacrifice of himself, the apostle hath mentioned chap. 1. 3.; but it was only as a subject to be afterwards handled. He therefore introduceth it in this place, in order to a full discussion; and calls it the chief of all the things he had hitherto mentioned, because it implied, first, That the sacrifice of himself which Jesus offered, on his entering heaven after his resurrection, was accepted of God as a sufficient atonement for the sins of the world. Secondly, The sitting of our great High-priest at the right hand of God implies, that he possesses all power in heaven and on earth next to God; so that he is able to defend the people for whom he officiates from their enemies, and is authorized by God to acquit and reward them at the judgment.—Thirdly, That our High-priest did not, like the Levitical high-priests, depart out of the most holy place after finishing the atonement, but abideth there always, as the minister or High-priest thereof, to open that holy place to the prayers and other acts of worship performed by his people on earth, and to their persons after the general judgment.

Of the first of these important matters implied in our High-priest's sitting down at the right hand of God, namely, that he offered the sacrifice of himself in heaven, and that that sacrifice was accepted by God as a sufficient atonement for the sins of the world, the apostle treats in this chapter. Of the second, namely, that he possesseth power, as governor of the world, to save his people, and to give them eternal life, he speaks chap. ix. 28. And of the third, that he is the abiding minister of the heavenly holy place, he discourses chap. x. 19–22.

That Christ hath offered an effectual sacrifice for sin, the apostle proves in the following manner: Since every high-priest is constituted to offer both gifts and sacrifices, Messiah, who was constituted by the oath of God an High-priest after the similitude of Melchizedec, must of necessity have had some sacrifice to offer, ver. 3.—And that he must have offered that sacrifice in heaven is certain; because, if the oath of God had respected his being a priest on earth, he could not have been a priest at all: for the only temple of God on earth where he could offer sacrifice, being occupied by priests who officiated according to the law of Moses, which confined the priest's office to the sons of Aaron, Numb. iii. 10. these priests would have hindered Messiah, who was of the tribe of Judah, from ministering as a priest among them. It is plain, therefore, that if Messiah was not appointed to exercise his priesthood in heaven, and did not offer sacrifice there, he never acted as a priest at all; and the oath of God constituting him a priest, hath not taken effect, ver. 4.—Farther, to prove that Messiah was to offer sacrifices in heaven, the apostle appealed to the services which the Levitical priests performed according to the law in the inward tabernacle, whose chief use, he tells us, was to be shadows or typical representations of the services to be performed by Christ in heaven. And this affirmation he founds on God's command to Moses,—to make all things, not the tabernacles only with their furniture, but the services of the tabernacles also, exactly according to the pattern shewed him on the Mount, ver. 5.

Next, with respect to the efficacy of Christ's ministrations as an High-priest, the apostle observes, that they are as much more excellent than the ministrations of the Levitical high-priests, as the covenant or dispensation of religion of which he is the Mediator or High-priest, by its better promises, excels the covenant or dispensation of the law, ver. 6.—which the apostle proves to be not without fault, from this circumstance, That if it had contained all the discoveries and promises which God judged necessary to the sanctification and salvation of sinners, he would not have introduced a second covenant or dispensation of religion, ver. 7.—Yet, that a second covenant or dispensation was to be introduced, is evident from God's own words, Jeremiah xxxi. 31–34. in which he promised a new covenant, ver. 8.—altogether different from that which he made with the Israelites after bringing them out of Egypt, ver. 9.—For in the new covenant, Judah and Israel are to have the knowledge of God and of his will set forth, not by dark shadows, as in the old covenant, but in the clearest manner. And the pardon they are to receive under that covenant, is not a political, but an eternal pardon. So that, as was observed ver. 6. it is a covenant established on better promises than the law, ver. 10, 11, 12.—Lastly, the apostle observes, that by saying a new covenant, God hath made the covenant of the law old, and thereby hath intimated, that, as a thing decayed and useless, it is to be put out of sight altogether, ver. 13.—Thus it appears, that the prophet Jeremiah, in the most express terms, hath borne testimony to the superior excellence of the new covenant or dispensation of religion, of which Christ is the minister, mediator, or high-priest; and to God's intention of abrogating the former covenant or dispensation, even the whole body of the law of Moses, with all its ineffectual sacrifices and services.—An argument of this sort, founded on their own scriptures, being so cogent, could not fail to make an impression on the unbelieving Hebrews; and must have reconciled such of them to the gospel as retained any candour or love of truth.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. VIII.—1 Now, (now) of the things spoken (spoken) the chief is, We have such hood of Christ, the chief is, That in him we have such an High-ver. 1.—1. The chief is.]—So Chrysostom and Theophylact interpret the word κεφαλαιον. In like manner the Syriac, 'Caput autem omnium eorum'; and the Vulgate, 'Capitulum autem super ea,' &c. See the illustration, for the reason why the sitting down of Christ at the right hand of God, is called the chief of the things hitherto spoken by the apostle. See also Heb. v. 10. note.

an High-priest³ as BECAME US, (from chap. vii. 26.), who sat down at the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens,³

2 A minister of the holy places,¹ (αἱ, 221.) namely, of the true tabernacle,² which the Lord pitched, and not man :

3 For every high-priest is constituted to offer both gifts and sacrifices. Hence IT WAS necessary that this HIGH-PRIEST also should have something which he might offer IN HEAVEN.¹

4 For verily if he were on earth TO OFFER SACRIFICE, (from ver. 3.), he could not be a priest, there being priests who offer gifts¹ according to the law.²

5 ('Orme, 67) These serve with a representation and shadow of the heavenly things,¹ (αἱ, 221.) since Moses, when about to construct the tabernacle,² was admonished of God :³ See now, saith he, THAT thou make all things according to the pattern⁴ which was shewed thee in the mount.⁵

2. Such an High-priest.]—Τοιοῦτος here answers to τοιοῦτος, chap. vi. 26. and brings to the reader's recollection the description there given of the high-priest who could effectually officiate for us.

3. The right hand of the Majesty in the heavens;—that is, at the right hand of the visible glory, whereby the divine presence is manifested to the angels in heaven. For, as the ark in the inward tabernacle was called the mercy-seat, or throne of the Majesty on earth, because the glory of the Lord, which appeared between the cherubim, rested on it to dispense to the Israelites the pardon of the offences which they committed against God as the king of their commonwealth, so the place where the glory of God is manifested in heaven is called here 'the throne of the Majesty in the heavens;' and chap. xii. 2. 'the throne of God.' Of this throne, and of Jesus as the right hand of God, Stephen had a sight, Acts vii. 55. 'And he, being full of the Holy Ghost, looked up stedfastly into heaven, and saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing at the right hand of God; 56. And said, I see the heaven opened, and the Son of man (Jesus in the human nature) standing at the right hand of God.' This sight, it is probable, the apostle himself enjoyed, when he was caught up into the third heaven. That the Deity manifests his presence to his intelligent creatures to a sensible manner, somewhere in the universe, is a notion which hath been entertained by all mankind. See Heb. ix. 5. note.

Ver. 2.—1. A minister of the holy places.]—With Christ's sitting down at the right hand of God, the apostle justly connects his becoming the abiding minister or high-priest of heaven; because in Psalm cx. 1. where his sitting down at the right hand of God is foretold, it is also foretold, ver. 4. that God would salute him 'a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedec;' and, by so doing, declare him to be, like Melchizedec, both a priest and a king for ever.

2. The true tabernacle.]—See chap. ix. 11. note 2. Heaven, or rather the universe, is called the 'true tabernacle,' or habitation of God, to distinguish it from the Mosaic tabernacle, which was only its representation or shadow, by means of the inhabitation of the glory of the Lord.

Ver. 3. Something which he might offer in heaven.]—That the words in Heaven are rightly supplied here, is evident from the following verse, where we are told, that if Christ were constituted by God's oath a priest on earth, he could not have executed his office; the priesthood in God's only temple on earth being by God himself limited to the tribe of Levi. From this it follows, that the oath which made him a priest, made him a priest in heaven, and authorized him to offer sacrifice in heaven. Also it follows, that the sacrifice he was appointed to offer was not the sacrifice of goats and calves, for they could not be offered in heaven, but the sacrifice of himself. Accordingly, that sacrifice he actually offered in heaven, by appearing before the throne of God in the body wherein he suffered, as shall be shewed, ver. 5. note 5. at the end. And that this was a real offering of himself a sacrifice to God, is evident from Heb. ix. 24. where we are told that Christ, after suffering death on earth, 'did not enter into the holy places made with hands, the likenesses of the true holy places, but into heaven itself, there to appear before the face of God on our behalf.' And to shew that, by so appearing, Christ offered himself a sacrifice to God, the apostle adds immediately, ver. 26. 'not, however, that he should offer himself often.' Wherefore, Christ's presenting himself in his crucified body before the throne of God, being a real offering of himself a sacrifice to God for us, we are said, Heb. x. 10. to be 'sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once.'

Ver. 4.—1. Offer gifts.]—Gifts signify not only free-will offerings, but propitiatory sacrifices. See Heb. xi. 4.

2. According to the law.]—By the law the priest's office was strictly limited to the sons of Aaron; and if any others intruded priest as described chap. vii. 26., who, after offering the sacrifice of himself for us in the true tabernacle, sat down at the right hand of the manifestation of the divine presence in the heavens, (chap. ix. 5. note), as having by that sacrifice made a complete atonement.

3 And as an abiding minister of the real holy places, namely, of the heavenly tabernacle, which, being erected by the Lord and not by man, must be unpeepably more magnificent than the Mosaic tabernacle.

3 The sitting down of Christ at the right hand of God, as the minister of the true holy places, is a demonstration that he offered an acceptable sacrifice for sin in heaven: For every high-priest being constituted to offer both free-will offerings and propitiatory sacrifices, it was necessary that this High-priest, who was constituted by an oath, should have some sacrifice which he might offer in heaven, the only place where he could officiate.

4 For verily if he were by the oath of God constituted a priest on earth to offer sacrifice, he, who was of the tribe of Judah, could not be a priest, there being, in the only temple of God on earth, priests who offer sacrifices according to the law, which limits the priest's office to the sons of Aaron.

5 Farther, that Christ exercises his priesthood in heaven appears from this also, that these priests perform the services of the tabernacles with sacrifices which are a representation and shadow of the sacrifice and intercession of Christ in heaven; as is plain from this, that Moses, when about to construct the tabernacle, and appoint its services, was admonished of God: See now, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern which was shewed thee in the mount.

themselves into it, they were to be put to death, Numb. iii. 10. Wherefore Jesus, being of the tribe of Judah, could not possibly offer sacrifice in the temple of Jerusalem.

Ver. 5.—1. Serve with a representation and shadow of the heavenly things.]—Here υπακούει is the dative, not of the object, but of the instrument. The common translation, 'serve into the example and shadow of heavenly things,' makes the tabernacle, most absurdly, the object of the worship of the Levitical priests. So also the Vulgate: 'Qui exemplari et umbræ deservunt cultum.' Wherefore, as the translation which I have given is equally literal, it is certainly more just.—According to Theophrastus the word υπακούει, which I have translated representation, signifies obscure delineation of a thing. For the meaning of υπακούει, see chap. x. 1. note.

2. Since Moses, when about to construct the tabernacle.]—So I translate καὶ αὐτὸς ὁμοιωσάτω τὸ σκηνώμα, because, although σκηνώμα commonly signifies to finish a thing which is begun, it is sometimes used to denote simply the doing of a thing: Heb. ix. 6. 'These things being thus set in order, the priests go at all times indeed into the first tabernacle, (τὰς ἀρχαίας σκηνάς), performing the services.' And that the word must be so translated in the passage under consideration, is plain from this, that God's admonition was given to Moses before he began to make the tabernacle.—Parkhurst has produced a passage from Herodotus, in which σκηναί signifies simply to perform worship, ceremonies, &c. Pierce thinks καὶ αὐτὸς has here the signification of esse, to be, and translates the clause thus: 'Seeing Moses, who was to finish the tabernacle, was admonished, &c. And for this use of καὶ αὐτὸς he quotes Acts x. 7.

3. Was admonished of God.]—The word καταμαρτυρεῖς sometimes signifies to receive an oracle, or a revelation, or a divine direction. Thus Heb. xi. 7. 'By faith Noah, (καταμαρτυρούμενος) when he received a revelation.' Sometimes it denotes a direction from an angel: Acts x. 22. 'Cornelius (καταμαρτυρούμενος καὶ ἀγγέλου λόγου) being directed by an holy angel to send for thee.' In the active voice it signifies to deliver an oracle: Heb. xii. 25. 'If they did not escape who refused (τὸν καταμαρτυροῦντα) him who delivered an oracle.' See Parkhurst's Diction. where it is observed that Josephus and Diod. Siculus use this word in the active voice, to denote the delivering an oracle.

4. See, saith he, that thou make all things according to the pattern.]—Τύπος denotes a pattern to be exactly imitated, Rom. v. 14. 1 Pet. iii. 21. notes. The strictness of this charge, as shall be shewed in the next note, implying that the tabernacles and their services were intended to be representations of heavenly things, may we not suppose that this purpose was discovered to Moses as the reason of the exactness required, and that the knowledge thereof was preserved among the Jews by tradition? How else could they fancy that the tabernacles were a representation of the world or universe? See chap. ix. 1. note 2.

5. Shewed thee in the mount.]—God's direction to Moses, to make all things according to the pattern shewed him in the mount, is here appealed to by the apostle with great propriety, as a proof that the Priests worshipped God in the tabernacle with a representation and shadow of heavenly things; that is, with sacrifices, which were a representation and shadow of the sacrifice which Messiah was to offer in heaven. For since by this admonition Moses was required, not only to make the tabernacle and all the vessels of the ministry exactly according to the pattern shewed him in the mount, but also, and indeed chiefly, to appoint the services of the priests in the tabernacles according to that pattern; the strictness of the injunction implied, that there was some important reason for this exactness. Now what could that reason be, unless the one assigned by the apostle? namely, that the tabernacles were intended to be shadows of the heavenly holy places, and the services of the tabernacles to be representations of the ministrations of Messiah as a

6 (Δε, 91.) Besides, he hath now obtained a more excellent ministry, in as much (xii, 209.) as he is the mediator of a better covenant, which is established upon better promises.

7 For if that first COVENANT¹ had been faultless, a place would not have been sought for a second:²

8 But finding fault, he saith to them, Behold the days¹ come, saith the Lord, when I will complete² a new covenant with the house of Israel,³ and with the house of Judah;

6 Besides, Jesus our High-priest hath now obtained a more excellent ministry, than the Levitical high-priests, in as much as he is the mediator of a better covenant than the Sinaitic, of which they were the mediators; because it is established on better promises—promises better suited to our exigencies as sinners. See ver. 7. note 1.

7 For if the Sinaitic covenant had been faultless; if sinners could have been sanctified and pardoned thereby; there would have been no need of introducing a second covenant:

8 But finding fault with the first covenant, and to shew its inefficacy for sanctifying and pardoning sinners, God saith to the Israelites, Jerem. xxxi. 31. Behold the days come, saith the Lord, when I will complete a new covenant with the whole of the spiritual Israel among the Gentiles, and with believers among the Jews;

priest in heaven. Accordingly the tabernacles are called, Heb. ix. 23. τα σκηνώματα, 'the representations of the holy places in the heavens;' and, ver. 24. 'the holy places made with hands' are called σκηνή, 'antitypes of the true.'—Farther, the ministry of the priests in the earthly tabernacles is represented as typical of the ministrations of Christ in heaven: 'For it is observed, chap. ix. 7. that 'into the inward tabernacle the high-priest alone went once every year, not without blood;' and that by the absolute exclusion of the priests and people from the most holy place, the representation of heaven, ver. 8. 'the Holy Ghost signified, That the way of the holy places,' (the way into heaven), 'was not yet laid open, while the first tabernacle,' (that is, the thing signified by the outward tabernacle, the present world), 'still standeth:' and, ver. 9. that the outward tabernacle, with its services, was 'a parable concerning the time which is present, during which both gifts and sacrifices were offered, which could not, in respect of conscience, make him perfect who worshipped only with meats and drinks, &c. By this parable, therefore, the Jews were taught the inefficacy of all the atonements made by men on earth for cleansing the conscience.—To all this add, that Christ is called, ver. 11. 'an High-priest of the good things which are to be, through the greater and more perfect tabernacle not made with hands;' and is said, ver. 12. 'to have entered once into the holy places, not indeed by the blood of goats and of calves, but by his own blood;' and 'to have obtained for us an eternal redemption.' These things shew, that the ministrations of the Levitical high-priests in the inward tabernacle on earth were typical of the ministrations of Christ in the true tabernacle, that is, in heaven: consequently, that the apostle's affirmation, in this 6th verse, is well founded; namely, that the sacrifices with which the priests performed the service of the Mosaic tabernacles, were all shadows of the sacrifices which Christ was to offer in heaven.

This doctrine being allowed, in order to have a just idea of the sacrifice of himself which Christ offered in heaven, it will be useful to understand the manner in which the sacrifices were offered by the Levitical priests in the tabernacles on earth.—1. And, first of all, it is to be observed, that the animals appointed for the burnt-offerings and sin-offerings, not excepting those whose blood was carried into the inward tabernacle, were all killed at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and on the north side of the altar.—2. These sacrifices were killed, not by the priests, but by the persons for whom they were to be offered. And if the sin-offering was to be made for a priest, he was to kill it, as any other private person was obliged to do, and another priest was to make the atonement for him. These things appear from Exod. xii. 6. Levit. i. 5. 11. iii. 2. iv. 24. 29. 33. xvi. 11. 15. 2 Chron. xxv. 11. Now, as the outward tabernacle with its court was a representation of the world, (Heb. ix. 1. note), these particulars, relative to the killing of the sacrifices at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, shew, that notwithstanding Christ offered the sacrifice of himself in heaven, his death was to be accomplished on earth; and that, as the killing of the sacrifice was no part of the sacrificial action, it was not necessary he should put himself to death, but only allow himself to be put to death by the Jews, who, in putting him to death, did not act as priests, but as the sinners for whom Christ was to offer himself a sacrifice.—3. The sacrifice for sin was not offered, nor the atonement made, by the killing of the animal, but by the priest's bringing its blood, on ordinary occasions, into the outward tabernacle, and sprinkling it before the veil: and on the day of atonement, by the high-priest's carrying its blood into the inward tabernacle which represented heaven, and there 'sprinkling it on the floor and on the mercy-seat,' in the view of the symbol of the divine presence which rested above the mercy-seat between the cherubim. For as the life of the animal lay in its blood, its death was manifested by these sprinklings, as really as if its dead carcass had been presented before the divine presence in the inward tabernacle. Wherefore, the sacrifice was not offered, nor the atonement made, till these sprinklings were finished.—All these facts evidently appear from the passages above quoted.

Now, in the services performed by the priests in the earthly tabernacle, the manner in which Christ was to offer himself a sacrifice for sin to God was distinctly prefigured. He was not to put himself to death, but was to be put to death by those for whom he was to offer himself a sacrifice. In that action, therefore, the Jews represented all their brethren of mankind. And as the high-priest carried the blood of the victim into the inward tabernacle, to make atonement therewith, so Christ, after continuing a while dead, arose in the body wherein he had been put to death, and entered, not into the earthly inward tabernacle, but into heaven itself, Heb. ix. 24. 'not indeed by the blood of goats and calves, but by his own blood,' or death, Heb. ix. 12. which he manifested by offering, that is, by presenting, in the presence of God, 'his body,' Heb. x. 10. bearing the marks of the violence whereby he had been put to death on earth, that being the only method in which his death on earth could be manifested in heaven to the angelic hosts. And having in this manner offered himself to God a sacrifice for sin, he hath, as we are assured Heb. ix. 12. 'obtained an eternal redemption,' or pardon, for all who by faith and repentance have an interest in his sacrifice. See Heb. ix. 6. note, last paragraph. That Christ actually appeared before the presence of God in heaven in the body wherein he suffered, and that his body had then the wounds which occasioned his death, may be gathered from his shewing to his disciples, on the day he arose from the dead, his hands and his feet, Luke xxiv. 40. and his side, John xxi. 20.; and from his saying to Thomas, eight days after he arose, John xx. 27. 'Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands, and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side, and be not faithless but believing.' For if the continuance of the wounds in our Lord's body, during his abode on earth after his resurrection, was necessary to prove the truth of his resurrection to his disciples, may we not suppose, that for manifesting his death to the angels in heaven, when he appeared in the presence of God, it was necessary his body should bear the marks of the violence which occasioned his death? How, otherwise, could the apostle say, Heb. x. 10. 'We are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once?'—I have only to add, that the opinion I have endeavoured to establish is not novel. Ambrose, in his tenth book of Luke, quoted by Estius in his note on Heb. viii. 3. saith, the wounds which Christ's body received on the cross were kept open, in order to its being presented before the Father as crucified and slain. If so, we may suppose, that the atonement being thus made, it was changed into its glorious form, mentioned Philip. iii. 2.

Ver. 7.—1. For if the first covenant had been faultless.—Although the Sinaitic covenant was well calculated to preserve the Jews from idolatry, and to give them the knowledge of their duty, it was faulty or imperfect in the following respects:—1. The rites of worship which it enjoined, sanctified only to the purifying of the flesh, but not the conscience, of the worshippers. 2. These rites could be performed nowhere but in the tabernacle or in the temple; consequently they could not be the religion of mankind. 3. This covenant had no real sacrifice for sin; consequently it granted no pardon to any sinner. 4. Its promises were all of a temporal kind. 5. It required an unsinning obedience, which, in our present state, no one can give; and threatened death for every offence. See Gal. iv. 3. note.

2. A place would not have been sought for a second.—Since the first covenant is that which God made with the Israelites at Sinai by the publication of the law, the second covenant must be that which was made with mankind in general, by the publication of the gospel. Accordingly, the publication of the gospel was foretold, Jer. xxxi. 31. under the idea of 'making a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah;' and the gospel itself is called, Isa. li. 3. 'the law which went forth from Zion.' But it is to be observed, that the law of Moses is called the first covenant, not merely because it was prior to the gospel, but also because it was in reality the same with the first covenant, under which Adam was placed in paradise; for, like it, it required perfect obedience under the penalty of death, and allowed no pardon to any sinner however penitent. It is likewise to be observed, that the gospel is called the second covenant, not merely because it was posterior to the law, but also because it is actually the same with the second covenant, under which Adam was placed after the fall; for it requires, not a sinless, but a sincere obedience, and grants pardon to sinners on their repentance; see Gal. iii. 10. note 2. However, though the rigour of the first covenant, which, properly speaking, was the law of nature written on Adam's heart, was mitigated under the second or gospel covenant by the abolition of its curse, Gal. iii. 13. its obligation, as a rule of life, never was, nor ever could be cancelled, but its precepts have constantly remained in force. Hence, all the sins which men commit, and which are pardoned under the second covenant, are very properly called transgressions of the first; as in the following passage, Heb. ix. 18. 'Of the new covenant he is the Mediator, that his death being accomplished for the redemption of the transgressions of the first covenant, the called may receive the promise of the eternal inheritance.'

Ver. 8.—1. Behold the days come.—Some of the Jewish doctors understood this as a promise of the restoration of the law by Ezra. Yet most of them thought this promise was to be fulfilled in the days of Messiah.

2. When I will complete.—The LXX. have here διατελέσει, it will make a new covenant. In translating this passage the apostle

9 Not according to the covenant which I made with their fathers, at the time of my taking them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt, (ver. 259.) when they did not abide in my covenant, and I neglected them,¹ saith the Lord.

10 For this is the covenant which I will make with the house of Israel, after these days, saith the Lord: I will put my laws into their mind,¹ and write them upon their hearts,² and I will be to them a God, and they shall be to me a people: (Rev. xxi. 3.)

11 And they shall not teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord; for all shall know me,¹ from the least of them to the greatest of them.

12 ('Or, 254.) Because¹ I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities² I will remember no more.

13 By saying, A new COVENANT, (ver. 8.), he hath made the former old.¹ Now that which decayeth and waxeth old, is ready to vanish.

used the word fulfilled, I will finish or complete, probably because the new covenant being obscurely intimated in what God said at the fall concerning the seed of the woman, it might be said to be completed when it was fully published in the gospel.

3. With the house of Israel.]—At the time this promise was accomplished, no house of Israel existed separately from the house of Judah. For, after the captivity of the ten tribes who composed the house of Israel, such of them as joined themselves to the house of Judah were so mixed with them, as not to be distinguished from them. Wherefore, 'the house of Israel,' in this prophecy, as distinguished from the house of Judah, must, I think, be the spiritual seed of Abraham among the Gentiles, called 'the Israel of God,' Gal. vi. 16. But Pierce is of opinion, that the houses of Israel and Judah mean the whole Jewish nation, and that this is a prediction of the general conversion of the Jews to the Christian religion.

Ver. 8. And I neglected them.]—The passage here quoted from Jeremiah runs thus: 'Which my covenant they brake, although I was an husband to them, saith the Lord.' The apostle's translation of this passage is that of the LXX. And to reconcile it with the Hebrew text, Pococke, in his Miscellan. chap. i. observes, that, in the eastern languages, letters of the same organ, as they are called, being often interchanged, the Hebrew word daghal is the same with the Arabic word bahal, which signifies to refuse, despise, nauseate. So that the Hebrew clause will bear to be translated, as the apostle and the LXX. have done, 'I neglected them, I nauseated them,' on account of their multiplied idolatries and rebellions.

Ver. 10.—1. And I will put my law into their mind.—Here the participle posui, by a common ellipsis of the substantive verb posui, hath the signification of the future, I will put. In this and the following verses, the prophet, to shew the superior excellence of the new covenant, explains its nature and efficacy. In it God promises to 'put his laws into the minds of the people.' These are not the laws of Moses but of Christ; for the laws of Moses were the laws of the old covenant. This promise therefore implies, that under the new covenant the people of God, by means of the gospel revelation, are to have the clearest knowledge of their duty and of the way of salvation.

2. And write them upon their hearts.]—The Hebrews, to denote the fullest and clearest knowledge, and to shew that that knowledge is easily attained, and remembered, and hath a strong influence on the affections, represent it as 'in the heart,' Deut. xxx. 14; and 'written on the heart,' Rom. ii. 15. Wherefore, God having promised in the new covenant, not only to put his laws into the mind of his people, but to write them on their hearts, this latter promise implies, that, in consequence of their knowledge of God's laws, his people are to acquire a strong love of them, and to be governed by them.—These promises have been amply accomplished under the new covenant. For by the multi-

9 Even a covenant entirely different from the covenant which I made with their fathers, (w. iniqua, chap. vii. 27. note) at the time of my taking them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt into Canaan, when they did not abide in my covenant, but brake it repeatedly by their idolatries. Therefore I neglected them; I suffered them to be carried into captivity; saith the Lord.

10 For, agreeably to my promise that in Abraham's seed all nations shall be blessed, this is the covenant which I will make with believers of all nations in future times, saith the Lord: Under the gospel dispensation I will put my laws into their mind, and write them upon their hearts, instead of writing them on stones as under the former covenant; and I will be the object of their worship, and their protector, and they who believe shall become my obedient people, whom I will bless through all eternity:

11 And, comparatively speaking, there shall be no occasion for what was commanded under the former covenant, in which no constant public instruction was provided: They shall not need to teach each other to know the Lord, (Deut. vi. 8.), for all shall know me, from the lowest of them to the highest of them.

12 These things I will bring to pass, because I will pardon the unrighteousness of my people, and their sins and their iniquities I will remember no more, as I did under the former covenant, by appointing annual atonements for them.

13 By saying, I will make a new covenant, God hath declared the former covenant old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old, is ready to be laid aside as useless. Wherefore, by promising a new covenant, God hath intimated the abrogation of the whole Mosaic dispensation.

plication of the copies of the scriptures, the translation of them into many different languages, the preaching of the word, the regular performance of the public worship of God, and by the pains which the ministers and teachers of religion take in instructing the people, the knowledge of the doctrines, precepts, and promises of the gospel, by the blessing of God, is far more widely diffused, and its influence on the hearts of the people of God is greater, than under any former dispensation.—This happy state of the church under the new covenant Isaiah hath foretold, chap. liv. 13. 'All thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children.'

Ver. 11. For all shall know me, from the least of them to the greatest of them.]—Here the effects of God's putting his laws into the mind of his people, and of his writing them on their hearts, are foretold. The knowledge of God and of his will, under the new covenant, is to prevail so generally through the labours of the ministers of the gospel, that there will be no occasion for what was commanded under the old covenant, namely, that every man should teach and exhort his neighbour to know the Lord.—This great prevalence of the knowledge of God under the gospel dispensation Isaiah hath likewise foretold, chap. xi. 9. 'The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea.'

Ver. 12.—1. Because I will be merciful to their unrighteousness.]—As the particle ergo, with which this verse begins, is often used to introduce a new sentiment, it might here be translated besides.

2. And their sins and their iniquities I will remember no more.]—In the Hebrew this passage runs thus; 'I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more.' Perhaps the apostle translated the prophet's words freely, to shew that under the new covenant every kind of sin is to be forgiven on repentance; which was not the case under the former covenant.

Ver. 13. He hath made the former old.]—The Sinaitic covenant, before it was abrogated by Christ, was become old, see chap. i. 11. or useless, in three respects:—1. By its curse condemning every transgressor to death without mercy, it was designed to shew the necessity of seeking justification from the mercy of God. But that necessity being more directly declared in the gospel, there was no reason for continuing the former covenant, after the second covenant was fully and universally published. 2. The covenant of the law was introduced to prefigure the good things to come under the covenant of the gospel. But when these good things were actually bestowed, there was no longer any use for the typical services of the law. 3. The Jewish doctors, by teaching that pardon was to be obtained only by the Levitical sacrifices, and the Judaizing Christians, by affirming that under the gospel itself men are pardoned only through the efficacy of these sacrifices, both the one and the other had corrupted the law; on which account it was fit to lay it aside, as a thing whose tendency now was to nourish superstition.

CHAPTER IX.

View and Illustration of the Doctrines contained in this Chapter.

To shew that the Sinaitic covenant was justly laid aside, the apostle judged it necessary to enter into a particular examination of the religious services which it enjoined, and to prove that these were designed, not for cleansing the conscience of the worshippers, but to prefigure the services and blessings of the new or gospel covenant: so that, the latter being come, there was no longer occasion for continuing the former to prefigure them. This chapter, therefore, is an illustration of chap. viii. 5. where the apostle affirms, that the priests worshipped God in the tabernacle 'with the representation and shadow of the heavenly services.' And it was proper to explain this matter copiously, because it must have had a great influence in weaning the Hebrews from the Levitical services, and in reconciling them to the abrogation of a form of worship, which, though of divine appointment, was now become useless, having accomplished its end.

The apostle begins with acknowledging that the covenant made at Sinai, of which the Levitical priests were the mediators, had ordinances of worship appointed by God himself, and a sanctuary which was a representation of the world or universe, ver. 1.—In particular, the outward tabernacle with its furniture, and the court belonging to it where the ordinary priests daily ministered, were so disposed as to represent the earth and the air, the habitation of men: And the services of that tabernacle, by sacrifices, washings, and other purifications of the flesh, were an example of the rites of worship which men perform on earth for procuring the pardon of sin and admission into heaven, ver. 2.—But the inward tabernacle, called the holy of holies, or most holy place, was so disposed as to be an image of heaven, the invisible habitation of Deity, ver. 3.—And in it was the ark of the covenant, and the pot with manna, and Aaron's rod, ver. 4.—and the cherubim overshadowing the mercy-seat, or throne of God; over which, and between the cherubim, the visible glory, which was the symbol of the divine presence, rested, ver. 5.

The tabernacles being thus set in order, the ordinary priests entered daily into the outward tabernacle, performing the service of God, and directing all their acts of worship towards the symbol of the divine presence in the inward tabernacle, hidden from their eyes by the veil: So that the services of the outward tabernacles were a fit image of the worship which men on earth pay to the invisible Deity in heaven, ver. 6.—But into the inward tabernacle, the representation of heaven, the high-priest alone entered, and that only one day in the year; but never without blood, which he offered for his own sins, and for the people's sins of ignorance, ver. 7.—the Holy Ghost, who appointed this service, thereby signifying, that the way into the immediate presence of God in heaven, the true holy place represented by the inward tabernacle, is not opened to men by any worship offered on earth, nor while the present state of things, represented by the outward tabernacle, subsisteth, ver. 8.—Which constitution of the tabernacles, and of the worship performed in them, was a parable, or figurative instruction concerning the time then present, when both gifts and sacrifices were offered; which could not make the offerer acceptable to the Deity, ver. 9.—because he worshipped only with meats, and drinks, and divers immersions, and rites whose efficacy was to cleanse, not the conscience, but the body of the worshipper, to fit him for the society of the people of God on earth; and which were imposed only until the worship of God should be reformed, ver. 10.—Thus, by the inefficacy of the services performed in the Jewish tabernacles, the Holy Ghost has taught us, that all the rites of atonement, and all the acts of worship which men perform on earth, have no efficacy in the way of merit, to procure for them the pardon of sin and admission into the presence of God in heaven.

Next, in opposition to the ineffectual services performed by the Levitical priests in the holy places on earth, the apostle sets the things which they prefigured; namely, the effectual services performed by Christ in the holy places in heaven.—These services he describes as follows: Christ being come into the world, as the High-priest appointed by the oath of God, to procure for us the blessings of pardon and salvation, which are to be bestowed through his ministration in the greater tabernacle, ver. 11.—hath entered into the holy place of that great tabernacle, even into heaven itself, neither by the blood of goats nor of calves, but by his own blood or death; and through the merit of that great sacrifice, which he offered by the appointment of God, he hath obtained for us an everlasting remission of sin, ver. 12.—Now, that the shedding of Christ's blood should have this efficacy, is most reasonable. For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer sprinkling the unclean, did, by the appointment of God, redeem the bodies of the offending Israelites from temporal death, and cleanse them in such a manner as to fit them for the tabernacle worship, ver. 13.—how much more reasonable is it, that the shedding of the blood of Christ, who in the whole of his obedience to God was faultless, should have merit sufficient to cleanse the conscience of penitent sinners from the guilt of works which deserve death, and fit them for worshipping God in heaven? ver. 14.—This passage being a description of Christ's ministry as an High-priest in the true habitation of God, it may be considered as an illustration of chap. viii. 2. where Christ is called 'a minister of the holy places, even of the true tabernacle which the Lord pitched, and not man.'

The apostle had affirmed, chap. viii. 6. that Jesus is the Mediator or High-priest of a better covenant or dispensation than the law: But the proof of his assertion he deferred to this place, where it naturally comes in. For, having shewed that the death of Christ hath sufficient merit to procure for penitent sinners the pardon of sin, he subjoins,—For this reason, that his death is so meritorious, he is appointed by God the Mediator of the new covenant, that by dying to procure the pardon of the sins committed under the law of nature, believers of all ages and nations, the called seed of Abraham, may obtain the eternal inheritance, ver. 15.—Accordingly, to shew that the new covenant, in which pardon is promised to penitent sinners, is procured by the death of Christ, the apostle observes, that in every case where God entered into a covenant with men, he made the death of an appointed sacrifice necessary to its ratification; to teach sinners, that all his intercourses with them are founded on the sacrifice of his Son, ver. 16.—Wherefore, authorized by so great an example, men anciently made their covenants firm over dead sacrifices; in so much that a covenant was never of force, while the sacrifice appointed for its ratification lived, ver. 17.—Hence, not even the covenant at Sinai was made without blood, ver. 18–20.—Hence, likewise, the tabernacles when set up, and the whole vessels of the ministry, were at first consecrated for the worship of God, by sprinkling them with the blood of the sacrifices, ver. 21.—and ever after that, all these things were, by appointment of the law, annually cleansed with the blood of the sacrifices offered on the day of expiation. In short, without the shedding of blood, the law allowed no remission on the day of the annual atonement, ver. 22.—Wherefore, seeing God determined not to pardon sinners, nor to open heaven to them without the shedding of the blood of his Son, it was necessary for shewing this, that the Mosaic tabernacles which are the figures of the holy places in the heavens, should be cleansed or opened to the worshippers by the sacrifices of bulls and goats, as emblems of the sacrifice of Christ: But heaven itself was to be cleansed, or opened to believers, by the actual offering of that sacrifice of which the others were the types, ver. 23.—And this was the reason that Christ our High-priest did not enter into the Jewish tabernacles, but into heaven itself, not with the blood of goats and of calves, but with his own blood, now to appear continually, as our High-priest, before the face of God; and by so doing, to make continual intercession in our behalf, ver. 24.—To this purpose, however, it was not necessary that Christ should offer himself often, as the Jewish high-priest every year made atonement for the sins of the people, by entering into the earthly holy places with the blood of the appointed sacrifices, ver. 25.—For, in that case, Christ must have suffered often since the foundation of the world. But now, at the conclusion of the Mosaic dispensation, he hath appeared upon earth to put an end to the typical sin-offerings of the law by the one sacrifice of himself, ver. 26.—And to the obtaining of our pardon, his dying once was sufficient. For, since God hath appointed men to die but once, as the punishment of the sin of the first man, and after death to be judged but once for their own sins, ver. 27.—so Christ being once offered, in order to carry away the sin committed in the world from the beginning to the end of it, (ver. 26.), that one offering is held by God as a sufficient expiation. And by virtue of that one sacrifice, he will, to them who wait for him, appear a second time on earth without offering any more sacrifice for sin; and he will thus appear to acquit and save his own people by his own sentence as judge, ver. 28.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. IX.—1 (Εἰς αὐτὴν) Now verily the first COVENANT¹ (see chap. viii. 7. note 2.) had both ordinances of (λατρεία) worship, and a worldly holy place.²

2 For the first tabernacle,¹ which is called Holy, was set in order, in which was both the candlestick, and the table and the shew-bread.³

3 And behind the second veil (Exod. xxvi. 33, 34.) the tabernacle, which is called Most Holy,¹ WAS SET IN ORDER: (from ver. 2.; see also ver. 6.)

4 Having the golden censer,¹ and the ark of the covenant² covered every-where with gold, in which WERE the golden pot having the manna,³ and the rod of Aaron which budded, and the tables of the covenant;

Ver. 1.—1. The first covenant.]—Many copies read here πρώτη σκηνή, the first tabernacle, which is adopted in the printed editions. But, as that reading doth not agree with ver. 2. Beza and Mill prefer the reading of the Alexandrian and other MSS. of good authority, which have πρώτη, leaving the reader to supply σκηνή from the preceding verse.—This reading our translators likewise have adopted.

2. And a worldly holy place.]—The Mosaic tabernacle is called ἁγίον κοινόν, a worldly holy place, not because it was a holy place on earth, and made of materials furnished from the earth, but because it was a representation of the world, or universe. This appears from ver. 23. where the tabernacles are said to be ὁμοιωματα, 'representations of the holy places in the heavens:' and from ver. 24. where the holy places made with hands are called ἀντίτυπα, 'antitypes (or resemblances) of the true holy places.' This is confirmed by Josephus, who tells us, Antiq. lib. 3. c. 11. that the Mosaic tabernacles were figures of the universe; that the outward tabernacle, which was accessible at all times to the priests, represented the earth and the sea, which are accessible to men; but the inward tabernacle, from which the priests were excluded, represented heaven, the invisible habitation of the Deity. See Heb. ix. 5. note.—In like manner Philo, Leg. Alleg. lib. 2. says, "the tabernacle was a shadow (σκιὰ) of the original heavens." It is true, this account of the tabernacles is not found in the writings of Moses. Nevertheless, since it was generally received among the Israelites, the presumption is, that it was discovered by God himself to Moses, at the time he shewed him the pattern of the tabernacles in the mount. But, be this as it may, certain it is that this emblematical meaning of the tabernacles and of their services was adopted by the apostle Paul. For he tells us, Heb. ix. 7, 8. that by the absolute exclusion of the priests and people from the inward tabernacle, the Holy Ghost signified, that the way into heaven, typified by the most holy place, was not open to mankind, whilst the first or outward tabernacle was standing; that is, while the earth, typified by the outward tabernacle, subsisted.—The emblematical meaning of the tabernacles, handed down among the Jews by tradition, seems to have led them to fancy, that every thing relating to the Levitical worship had an emblematical meaning likewise. For Josephus, Antiq. lib. 3. c. 11. affirms, that the parts of the high-priest's robes were representations of the different parts of the mundane system. But, by these refinements, the Jews, and some Christians who follow them, have discredited the ancient traditionary account of the meaning of the tabernacles, and of their services.

Ver. 2.—1. For the first tabernacle.]—Here it is proper to observe, that the whole of the apostle's reasoning in this epistle concerning the Levitical worship, is founded on the original institution of the tabernacle services by Moses, and not on the temple service, as appointed by David and Solomon. See Exod. xl. throughout.

2. The candlestick, and the table and the shew-bread.]—Though the apostle does not explain the emblematical meaning of the furniture of the two tabernacles, because, as he tells us

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. IX.—1 Now verily, although the first covenant is to be laid aside, I acknowledge it had both ordinances of worship, and a worldly holy place appointed by God. But the former being merely an emblem of the services of Christ in heaven, and the latter a shadow of the world or universe, the covenant of which they are the ordinances is become useless, now that Christ hath performed the services of heaven.

2 For the outward tabernacle, which is called Holy, was built and furnished so as to represent the earth and the visible heavens, having both the golden candlestick towards the south, and the table with the shew-bread towards the north, Exod. xxvi. 35.

3 And behind the innermost veil, the tabernacle, which is called the Most Holy Place, was in like manner built and furnished according to a pattern formed by God, so as to be a representation of heaven, the invisible habitation of the Deity;

4 Having the golden censer, on which the high-priest burned incense when he entered the most holy place, and the ark of the covenant, which was covered both on the inside and the out with gold; in which were the golden pot, having an omer of the manna wherewith the Israelites were fed in the wilderness, and Aaron's rod which blossomed and bare almonds, and the tables of the covenant from which the ark had its name;

ver. 5. it would have lengthened his discourse too much; yet that they had an emblematical meaning, may be gathered from the apostle's allusion, Heb. x. 20. note 2. to the emblematical meaning of the miraculous rendering of the veil of the temple at the death of Christ. Since, then, the outward tabernacle was a representation of the mundane system, we may suppose, with Josephus, that the seven lumps of the candlestick were emblems of the seven planets, whereby our world is enlightened; and that the table with the shew-bread placed on it, was a representation of the productions of the earth, by which the lives of men and beasts are sustained.

Ver. 3. And behind the second veil the tabernacle, which is called Most Holy.]—This tabernacle represented heaven, not only because in it the glory of the Lord, or visible symbol of his presence, rested between the cherubim whereby the angelical hosts surrounding the throne of God in heaven were typified, but because this tabernacle, by a thick veil, was hidden from the eyes of all who frequented the outward tabernacle; even as heaven, the habitation of God, is hidden by the veil of their flesh from the eyes of all who live on the earth.

Ver. 4.—1. Having the golden censer.]—The apostle may have learned from the priests, that the censer used by the high-priest on the day of atonement was of gold, and that it was left by him in the inward tabernacle, so near to the veil, that, when he was about to officiate next year, by putting his hand under the veil he could draw it out to fill it with burning coals, before he entered into the most holy place to burn the incense, agreeably to the direction, Levit. xvi. 12, 13.

2. And the ark of the covenant.]—The ark was so called, because the tables of stone on which the covenant, that is, the ten commandments engraven by God himself, were put therein, as a memorial of God's having spoken these commandments from Mount Sinai in the hearing of all the people. These tables of the law being as it were hidden from the glory of the Lord, which rested between the cherubim, by the cover of the ark called the mercy-seat, the Jews were thereby figuratively taught, that, in the exercises of the divine mercy towards sinners, the law will not be regarded as the rule of their justification: For, at the judgment, men shall not be tried by the rigour of law, but by the gracious new covenant, in which pardon is promised to the penitent.

3. In which were the golden pot having the manna.]—Because it is said, 1 Kings viii. 9. 'There was nothing in the ark save the two tables of stone which Moses put there at Horeb,' the words αὐτὴν, used by the apostle, may be translated αὐτὴν τὴν ἑλκίδα. See Isa. lv. 170.—Or the difficulty may be removed by supposing, that the pronoun αὐτὴν relates to σκηνή, the remote antecedent, 'in which tabernacle also, was the golden pot,' &c.—Or, because it is said, Deut. xxxii. 26. 'Take this book of the law, and put it in the side of the ark,' we may conjecture that the book was put into some repository fixed to the side of the ark; and that the pot with manna, and Aaron's rod, were laid up before the Lord in the same manner, according to the injunctions, Exod. xvi. 34. Numb. xvii. 10. So that the whole being

5 And above it the cherubim of glory,¹ overshadowing the mercy-seat; concerning which things we cannot at present speak particularly.

6 Now these things being thus set in order, the priests go at all times indeed into the first tabernacle, performing the services;¹

7 But into the second TABERNACLE the high-priest alone GOETH once¹ every year, not without blood, which he offereth for his own, and the people's sins of ignorance.²

8 The Holy Ghost signifying this, that the way of the holy places was not yet laid open, while the first tabernacle still standeth;¹ (see chap. x. 19, 20. xi. 40. note.)

9 Which was (παράβολον) a parable,¹ (or, 142.) concerning the time which IS present, during which² both gifts and sacrifices are offered, which cannot, with respect to conscience,³ make HIM perfect who worshippeth

5 And above the ark the cherubim of glory, overshadowing the mercy-seat, and forming a magnificent throne for the glory of the Lord which rested between them, (Exod. xxv. 22.); concerning the meaning of which things I have not time at present to speak particularly, my design being to explain what was signified by the services of the tabernacles.

6 Now the tabernacles with their utensils being thus constructed and arranged, the ordinary priests go at all times indeed into the first tabernacle, performing the services; of which the chief is their sprinkling the blood of the sin-offerings before the veil which concealed the symbol of the divine presence from their view:

7 But into the inward tabernacle, which represents heaven, the high-priest and no one else goeth; and he only one day in the year; not however without the blood of different sacrifices, which he offereth for his own, and for the people's sins of ignorance.

8 By the absolute exclusion of the priests and people from the inward tabernacle, the Holy Ghost, who formed the pattern of the tabernacles and of their services, shewed this, that the way into the true holy places, represented by the inward tabernacle, was not yet laid open to men, while this world, represented by the outward tabernacle, still subsisteth;

9 Which tabernacle with its services, whereby the worshipper was not brought into the immediate presence of the Deity, was a parabolical instruction concerning the time which is present, during which both gifts and sacrifices are offered, which cannot, by banishing the fear of punishment, make him perfect, with respect to conscience, who worshippeth God thus united, and carried by the Levites at once, might be considered as the ark.

The pot with the manna, and Aaron's rod, being placed before the testimony, stood full in the view of the cherubim, whose faces were turned toward the mercy-seat. By introducing these things into the inward tabernacle which represented heaven, and by placing them in the manner described, the Holy Ghost may be supposed to have signified, that in heaven the knowledge and memory of the divine dispensations to mankind, and of God's interpositions in behalf of nations and individuals, will be preserved, and be the subject of devout contemplation, not only to the redeemed, but to the angelical hosts, represented by the cherubim overshadowing the mercy-seat. Hence, in allusion to what was signified by the placing of the cherubim with their faces toward the mercy-seat, the apostle Peter, speaking of the sufferings of Christ and of the glory to follow, says, 'Into which things angels earnestly desire to look,' 1 Pet. i. 12; and Paul, Ephes. iii. 10. 'That now to the governments, and to the powers, in the heavenly regions, the manifold wisdom of God is made known, through the church.'

Ver. 5. And above it the cherubim of glory.—Cherubim being the name of an order of angels, Gen. iii. 24. the figures called cherubim, placed on the sides of the mercy-seat, with the glory of the Lord resting between them, represent the angels who surround the manifestation of the divine presence in heaven. These figures, therefore, were fitly termed 'the cherubim of glory;' that is, the cherubim which had the visible glory of God, in the inward tabernacle, resting between them. By this glory constantly abiding in the inward tabernacle, and by the figures of the cherubim, that tabernacle was rendered a fit image of heaven.

On supposition that the Mosaic tabernacles, in which the worship of God was performed according to a ritual of divine appointment, were a representation of the universe, it is probable they were set in order for the purpose of teaching us this important lesson,—that the whole universe is the temple of God; that in this vast temple, there is the most holy place, where the Deity resides, and manifests his presence to the angelical hosts who surround him; and that all the intelligent beings who inhabit this vast temple, are placed in it to be happy by worshipping the great Creator, each kind according to the faculties which they possess, Psal. cxlviii.

That the Deity resides in a particular part of the universe, where he makes his presence known to his intelligent creatures by some transcendent visible glory, is a notion which, as the Spectator observes, No. 580. has prevailed, not among the Jews and Christians only, but among the Greeks and Romans also, who spoke of their Jupiter as residing in Olympus surrounded with inferior deities, among whom the Muses were represented as singing around his throne. In short, the idea of their gods inhabiting a particular place, having prevailed among all nations, whether barbarous or civilized, the universal agreement of mankind in such a notion is, I think, a proof that they derived it from tradition, or that it is a dictate of reason. Either supposition shews its truth; and being confirmed by revelation, why should it be called in question?

Into this most holy place, the habitation of the Deity, Jesus, after his ascension, entered, as the apostle assures us, ver. 12; and, by presenting his crucified body there, chap. x. 10. before the manifestation of the divine presence, called 'the throne of the Majesty in the heavens,' chap. viii. 1. he offered the sacrifice of himself to God, chap. viii. 5. note 5. And having thus made atonement for the sins of the world, he procured for penitent sinners an eternal pardon, chap. ix. 12 and opened heaven for their reception in the body, after the resurrection and judgment, chap. ix. 23. note 1.

Ver. 6. Performing the services;—namely, of that tabernacle, which consisted in the burning of the incense at the morning and evening sacrifice, in dressing the lamps, in removing the old and placing the new shew-bread, which was a continued offering of the fruits of the earth to God for the whole congregation. Lastly, as the principal part of the service of this tabernacle, the priests brought into it the blood of the sin-offerings, and sprinkled it before the veil Lev. iv. 6. At all other times they entered into it without blood; for the blood of the burnt-offerings was sprinkled about the altar, Lev. i. 11.

Ver. 7.—1. Into the second tabernacle the high-priest alone goeth once every year.—From Lev. xvi. it appears that the high-priest entered several times into the most holy place on the day of atonement. Wherefore, αὐτός must be understood to signify one day, rather than one time.

2. And the people's sins of ignorance.—The law of Moses enjoined those who had injured their neighbours, either by deceitful dealing, or robbery, or lying, or perjury, to restore to the injured party all they had gotten by these base methods, together with a fifth part more; and, after such restitution, to offer the appointed trespass-offering to the Lord as their king, on which conditions they were to be pardoned, Lev. vi. 1-7. But this was only a political pardon, granted by God as the head of the Israelitish commonwealth, whereby the offender was freed from the civil punishment which his crime merited. Accordingly the atonement was made for him by the ordinary priests, God's ministers, by whom his government as king in Israel was carried on. The sacrifices offered by the high-priest on the day of expiation had a quite different effect. They were offered for the whole nation, to make atonement for the sins which they had ignorantly committed during the preceding year, and to open the tabernacles to their acts of worship during the succeeding year. And to shew this, the high-priest carried the blood of these sacrifices into the inward tabernacle, and sprinkled it before the symbol of the divine presence.

Ver. 8. While the first tabernacle still standeth.—As both the tabernacles were destroyed long before this epistle was written, the first tabernacle must mean the thing represented by the first tabernacle, namely the present world; consequently the standing of the first tabernacle means, the continuance of this world. If so, the thing which the Holy Ghost signified by the exclusion of the priests and people from the inward tabernacle as long as the outward tabernacle stood, was, that the righteous are not to be admitted to the immediate presence of God in heaven, till after the resurrection and general judgment, when this world is to be destroyed.—Farther, by the rites of worship performed in both tabernacles, the Israelites were taught, that the true God, the only object of men's worship, though always present with them, is absolutely invisible to them while they remain on the earth; consequently, that the visible gods worshipped by the heathens, were all of them, without exception, false gods.

Ver. 9.—1. Which was a parable.—Παράβολον signifies an information, either by speech or action, in which one thing is put for another. See chap. xi. 19. note 2.

2. During which.—That this is the proper translation of αὐτός, is evident from the gender of the pronoun, which doth not permit it to stand for αὐτός, but for αὐτῆς, time.—The Alex. MS. and the Vulgate read here αὐτός, in which tabernacle. And that reading our translators have followed.

3. Which cannot, with respect to conscience, make him perfect.—As Pierce remarks, "Ceremonial impurities (and some civil punishments) were done away by these gifts and sacrifices; but moral evils, which burdened the conscience, upon which a sense of guilt was left, could not be removed thereby." This doctrine Paul preached; Acts xiii. 39. 'By him all who believe are justified from all things, from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses.'

10 Only with meats and drinks,¹ and divers (καρπῶν) immersions and ordinances concerning the flesh,² imposed³ until the time of reformation.

11 But Christ being come,¹ an High-priest of the good things which are to be through the greater and more perfect tabernacle,² not made with hands, that is to say, not of this creation,

12 Hath entered once into the holy places, (wh) not indeed by the blood of goats (Lev. xvi. 15.) and of calves,¹ (Lev. xvi. 3.), but by his own blood,² having obtained for us an eternal redemption.³ (See Eph. i. 7.)

13 For if the blood of bulls and of goats, and the ashes of an heifer, sprinkling the polluted, (Numb. xix. 9.), sanctify to the cleansing of the flesh,¹

* 14 How much more shall the blood of Christ, who, through the eternal Spirit,¹ offered himself without fault to God, cleanse your conscience from dead works to worship the living God!² (See ver. 9. note 3.)

15 (καὶ διὰ τούτο) And for this reason—of

Ver. 10.—1. Only with meats and drinks;—that is, worshipped only with sacrifices, which consisted of the flesh of such clean animals as might be eaten, and with the fruits of the earth; and both accompanied with drink-offerings. Agreeably to this account of the gifts and sacrifices with which God was worshipped in the tabernacle, they are called 'the meat of God's house.'—In translating καρπῶν with meats, I have followed Pierce.—καὶ hath this signification, Luke i. 22. Matt. iv. 4. Col. iii. 9.

2. Ordinances concerning the flesh;—δικαιοῦσαι σαρκί, literally, righteousness of the flesh; things which make the flesh, not the spirit, righteous.

3. Imposed;—ἀναγκάζουσιν cannot agree with δικαιοῦσαι, which is in the dative case, we must with Pierce supply ἐπὶ τῇ σκηνῇ, which ordinances were laid on the Jews as a burden. Hence Peter said to the Jews, Acts xv. 10. 'Now therefore why tempt ye God (ἐπειράετε) to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples.'—These ordinances respecting the purifying of the flesh, were imposed and continued until the time of reformation, to shew that all the gifts and sacrifices which were offered on earth, could not introduce the sinner, as a pardoned person, into the presence of the Deity.

Ver. 11.—1. But Christ (ἡ ἀληθινή) being come;—The particle καὶ, at the beginning of this verse, being used in its adversative sense, sheweth, that the apostle here states a comparison between the Levitical high-priests and Christ.

2. An High-priest of the good things which are to be through the greater and more perfect tabernacle;—In this translation I have followed the order of the words in the original; because, in that order, they afford a sense suitable to the apostle's design; which was to shew, that Christ's ministrations as an High-priest are greatly superior to those of the sons of Aaron, both in respect of the tabernacle in which he officiates, and in respect of the efficacy of his ministrations. He officiates in 'the greater and more excellent tabernacle not made with hands,' called, Heb. viii. 2. 'the true holy place which the Lord pitched and not man.' And, 'the good things' of which Christ is the High-priest or Mediator, are all the blessings included in eternal redemption. See ver. 12. note 3. These blessings are here said to be 'through the greater and more excellent tabernacle;' that is, as I understand it, through the services of the greater and more excellent tabernacle which Christ as an High-priest performed; namely, his dying on earth, and his presenting his crucified body before the throne of God in heaven, as a sacrifice for sin.—But Beza, Pierce, and others, reading the first clause of the verse by itself, thus, 'But Christ being come, an High-priest of good things to come,' join what immediately follows with the beginning of ver. 14. in this manner: 'through a greater and more perfect tabernacle—hath entered into the holy place:' understanding by the greater and more perfect tabernacle, our Lord's human nature. In support of this notion, Beza saith, that his human nature may as properly be called a tabernacle, as his flesh is called a vail, Heb. x. 24. But not to dispute about the propriety of the figure, it appears an absurdity to say, that Christ entered into the holy place through his own human nature as through a tabernacle. He entered into heaven clothed in his human nature, and not through it as through a place; for, on that supposition, he did not carry his human nature with him into heaven.

Ver. 12.—1. And of calves;—Pierce observes, that the Hebrew word (Lev. xvi. 3.) here translated calves, properly signifies bullocks of the second year: and that being so young, they might be called 10 With nothing but meats and drinks, and diverse immersions and ordinances respecting the purifying of the body, imposed only until the time of the reformation of the worship of God by Christ, who was to abolish the Levitical services, and to introduce a worship in spirit and in truth, which may be performed in every place.

11 But Christ being come, who is made an High-priest or Mediator of the blessings which are to be bestowed through the services of the greater and more excellent tabernacle, not made like the Mosaic tabernacle, with the hands of men, that is to say, a tabernacle not in this lower world,

12 Hath entered once for all into the holy places where God resides, (see Heb. ix. 6. note), not indeed by the blood of goats and of calves, but by his own blood, or death, as a sacrifice for sin; having thereby obtained for us, not redemption for a year, as the high-priest did by entering the holy places on earth, but everlasting redemption; so did not need to offer himself a second time.

13 That Jesus, by his death, should procure an eternal pardon for sinners is reasonable; for if the blood of bulls and of goats, offered by the high-priest, and the ashes of an heifer, sprinkling the polluted, did, by the appointment of God, sanctify to the cleansing of the flesh, so as to fit the offender for joining in the tabernacle worship, 14 How much more reasonable is it that the blood of Christ, who in obedience to God suffered death, and through the eternal Spirit, being raised from the dead, offered himself a victim without fault to God, should have merit sufficient to cleanse your conscience from the guilt of works which deserve death; that is, banish from your mind the fear of punishment, that ye may be fit to worship the living God with the hope of acceptance?

15 And for this reason, that the death of Christ is so efficacious, calves, which is the LXX. translation. Besides, we have 'calves of a year old' mentioned Micah vi. 6.; and the apostle, in the following verse, calls this blood 'the blood of bulls.' See chap. ix. 13. note 1.

2. But by his own blood;—The essence of the sacrifice consisted in its death. But because its death was effected by the shedding of the animal's blood, and was shewed by sprinkling it in the holy places, the high-priest was said to enter into the inward tabernacle by the efficacy of the blood, that is, of the death of the victim, manifested by its blood which he carried with him.—In like manner Christ is said to have entered, as an High-priest, into the holy places in heaven by his own blood; that is, by the merit of his own sufferings taken complexly. For he shed his blood when he suffered in the garden, when he was scourged, and when he was crowned with thorns, as well as when the nails were driven into his hands and feet on the cross, and the spear was thrust into his side.

3. Having obtained for us an eternal redemption;—namely, from the grave, and from future punishment, followed by admission into heaven, there to live eternally with God in unspeakable felicity. These are the good things said, ver. 11. to be through the service of Christ in 'the greater and more perfect tabernacle.'

Ver. 13. Sanctify to the cleansing of the flesh;—The things mentioned, sanctified the bodies of the polluted, not by any natural efficacy, for they rather defiled them, but by the appointment of God, who, considering them as acts of obedience, was pleased on their account to remit the civil punishment which, as their political ruler, he had a right to inflict on the polluted. But the shedding of the blood of Christ, both by the appointment of God and by its own efficacy, availeth to the procuring an eternal pardon for penitent sinners. See Ess. vii. sect. 1. art. 2., and Whitby's note on Heb. x. 14.—The sentiment expressed in this and the following verse deserves attention, not only for its strength in the proof, but because it is a beautiful illustration of the apostle's doctrine, Heb. viii. 5. that the Levitical services were all shadows of heavenly things. For, the sanctification effected by the legal rites, being the sanctification of nothing but the body, it was in a religious light of little use, unless it was a representation and pledge of some real expiation. Now what real expiation of sin is there in the whole universe, if the sacrifice of Christ is excluded? We must therefore acknowledge that the Levitical rites which sanctified the flesh, derived their whole virtue from their being, as the apostle affirms, figurative representations of the real atonement which Christ was to make in heaven for sanctifying the soul of the sinner.

Ver. 14.—1. Who, through the eternal Spirit, offered himself;—A number of MSS. together with the Vulgate version, instead of πνεύματος, ἀποστολῆς have πνεύματος, ἀποστολῆς. But the Syriac hath here, 'spiritum qui est in eternum.' Besides, the common reading is found in most MSS.—Christ is said to have offered himself through the eternal Spirit, because he was raised from the dead by the Spirit, 1 Pet. iii. 18.; consequently he was enabled by the Spirit to offer himself to God; that is, to present his crucified body before the throne of God in heaven. See Heb. viii. 5. note 5.

2. To worship the living God;—The epithet living is given in scripture to God, to signify the greatness of his power, which might deter sinners from approaching him in acts of worship, if they were not assured of pardon through the sacrifice of Christ.—To give the blood or death of Christ this efficacy, was a proper reward of his obedience to death.

the new covenant¹ he is the mediator,² that HIS death being accomplished for the redemption (ver. 12.) of the transgressions (ver. 186. 2.) of the first covenant,³ the called may receive the promise of the eternal inheritance.

16 For where a covenant,¹ THERE IS a necessity that the death (τὸ θάνατον) of the appointed² SACRIFICES be brought in.³

of the new covenant he is the Mediator or High-priest, by whom its blessings are dispensed; and also the sacrifice by which it is procured and ratified; that his death being accomplished for obtaining the pardon of the transgressions of the first covenant, believers of all ages and nations, as the called seed of Abraham, (Rom. viii. 48. note), may receive the promised eternal inheritance.

16 For, to show the propriety of Christ's dying to ratify the new covenant, I observe, that where a covenant is made by sacrifice, there is a necessity that the death of the appointed sacrifice be produced.

17 For, according to the practice both of God and man, a covenant is made firm over dead sacrifices; seeing it never hath force whilst the goat, calf, or bullock, appointed as the sacrifice of ratification, liveth.

Ver. 15.—1. Of the new covenant.]—See Heb. viii. 7. note 2. The word διαθήκη, here translated covenant, answers to the Hebrew word berith, which all the translators of the Jewish scriptures have understood to signify a covenant. The same signification our translators have affixed to the word διαθήκη, as often as it occurs in the writings of the evangelists and apostles, except in the history of the institution of the supper, and in 2 Cor. iii. 6. and Heb. vi. 22. and in the passage under consideration: in which places, copying the Vulgate version, they have rendered διαθήκη by the word testament. Bona, following the Syriac version, translates διαθήκη everywhere by the word foedus pactum, except in the 16th, 17th, and 20th verses of this chapter, where likewise, following the Syriac version, he hath testamentum. Now if διαθήκη, the new testament, in the passages above mentioned, means the gospel covenant, as all interpreters acknowledge, καὶ αὐτὴ διαθήκη, the old testament, 2 Cor. iii. 14. and ἡ παλαιὰ διαθήκη, the first testament, Heb. ix. 15. must certainly be the Sinaitic covenant, or law of Moses, as is evident also from Heb. ix. 20.—On this supposition it may be asked, 1. In what sense of the Sinaitic covenant, or law of Moses, which required perfect obedience to all its precepts under the penalty of death, and allowed no mercy to any sinner, however penitent, can be called a testament, which is a deed conferring something valuable on a person, who may accept or refuse it as he thinks fit? Besides, the transaction at Sinai, in which God promised to continue the Israelites in Canaan, on condition they refrained from the wicked practices of the Canaanites and observed his statutes, Lev. xviii. can in no sense be called a testament.—2. If the law of Moses is a testament, and if, to render that testament valid, the death of the testator is necessary, as the English translators have taught us, ver. 16. I ask, Who was it that made the testament of the law? was it God or Moses? And did either of them die to render it valid?—3. I observe, that even the gospel covenant is improperly called a testament; because, notwithstanding all its blessings were procured by the death of Christ, and are most freely bestowed, it lost any validity which as a testament it is thought to have received by the death of Christ, when he revived again on the third day.—4. The things affirmed in the common translation of ver. 15. concerning the new testament, namely, that it hath a mediator; that that mediator is the testator himself; that there were transgressions of a former testament, for the redemption of which the mediator of the new testament died; and, ver. 19. that the first testament was made by sprinkling the people in whose favour it was made with blood; are all things quite foreign to a testament. For was it ever known in the practice of any nation, that a testament needed a mediator? Or that the testator was the mediator of his own testament? Or that it was necessary the testator of a new testament should die to redeem the transgressions of a former testament? Or that any testament was ever made by sprinkling the legatees with blood? These things however were usual in covenants. They had mediators who assisted at the making of them, and were sureties for the performance of them: They were commonly ratified by sacrifices, the blood of which were sprinkled on the parties: What, if any former covenant was infringed by the parties, satisfaction was given at the making of a second covenant.—5. By calling Christ 'the mediator of the new testament,' our thoughts are turned away entirely from the view which the scriptures give us of his death as a sacrifice for sin. Whereas if he is called 'the Mediator of the new covenant,' which is the true translation of διαθήκη καὶ τοῦ νέου, that appellation directly suggests to us, that the new covenant was procured and ratified by his death as a sacrifice for sin. Accordingly Jesus, on account of his being made a priest by the oath of God, is said to be 'the Priest or Mediator of a better covenant' than that of which the Levitical priests were the mediators.—I acknowledge that, in classical Greek, διαθήκη commonly signifies a testament; yet since the LXX. have uniformly translated the Hebrew word berith, which properly signifies a covenant, by the word διαθήκη, in writing Greek, the Jews naturally used διαθήκη for συνθήκη, as our translators have acknowledged by their version of Heb. x. 16.—To conclude, seeing in the version under consideration διαθήκη may be translated a covenant, and seeing, when so translated, these verses make better sense, and agree better with the scope of the apostle's reasoning, than if it were translated a testament, we can be at no loss to know which translation of διαθήκη in these verses ought to be preferred. Nevertheless, the absurdity of a phraseology to which readers have been long accustomed, without attending distinctly to its meaning, I am sensible does not soon appear.

2. He is the mediator.]—Here it is remarkable, that Jesus is not called διασώτης, the Testator, but μεσίτης, the Mediator, of the new covenant.—First, because he procured the new covenant for mankind, in which the pardon of sin is promised: for, as the apostle tells us, his death as a sacrifice for sin is the consideration on account of which the pardon of the transgressions of the first covenant is granted: Secondly, because the new covenant having been ratified as well as procured by the death of Christ, he is fitly called the Mediator of that covenant, in the same sense that God's oath is called, Heb. vi. 17. 'the mediator or confirmor of his promise.' Thirdly, Jesus, who died to procure the new covenant, being appointed by God the High-priest thereof to dispense its blessings, he is on that account also called, Heb. viii. 6. 'the Mediator of that better covenant.'

3. Of the first covenant.]—See Heb. viii. 7. note 2. where this verse is explained.

Ver. 16.—1. For where a covenant.]—This elliptical expression must be completed as in the commentary, i.e. as is probable, the apostle had now in his eye the covenants which God made with Noah and with Abraham. His covenant with Noah is recorded Gen. viii. 20. where we are told, that, on coming out of the ark, Noah 'offered a burnt-offering of every clean beast and fowl.' And the Lord smelled a sweet savour. And the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground, neither will I again smite any more every living thing as I have done.' This promise or declaration, God called 'his covenant with men, and with every living creature,' Gen. ix. 9, 10.—In like manner God made a covenant with Abraham by sacrifice, Gen. xv. 9. 18. and with the Israelites at Sinai, Exod. xxiv. 8.—See also Psal. i. 5.—By making his covenants with men in this manner, God taught them, that his intercourse with them were all founded on an expiation afterwards to be made for their sins, by the sacrifice of the seed of the woman, the bruising of whose heel, or death, was foretold at the fall.—On the authority of these examples, the practice of making covenants by sacrifices prevailed among the Jews, Jerem. xxxiv. 18. Zech. ix. 11. and even among the heathens; for they had the knowledge of these examples by tradition. "Stabant at cæca, jungent federa porca," Virgil. Eneid. viii. 641: hence the phrases, foedus ferre, and percussore.

2. There is a necessity that the death (τὸ θάνατον) of the appointed.]—Here we may supply either the word θύματα, sacrifices, or ζῶον, animal; which might be either a calf, a goat, a bull, or any other animal which the parties making the covenant choose.—Διασώτης is the participle of the second sort of the middle voice of the verb διασώζω, constitute, I appoint; wherefore, its primary and literal signification is, of the appointed. Our translators have given the word this sense, Luke xlii. 20. Καὶ οὗτος διασώτης ἐμὴν, αὐτὸς διασώζων με ὡς θύματός σου, διατίθειαι: 'And I appoint to you a kingdom, as my Father hath appointed to me a kingdom.'

3. Be brought in.]—Θεωροῦντες ἀναγὰρ θεωροῦντες, —Eisner, vol. ii. p. 351. hath shewed, that the word θεωροῦντες is sometimes used, in a forensic sense, for what is produced and proved, or made apparent in a court of judicature: wherefore the apostle's meaning is, that it is necessary the death of the appointed sacrifice be brought in or produced, at the making of the covenant. In the margin of our Bibles, this clause is rightly translated, 'be brought in.' See Acts xxv. 7. where θεωροῦντες is used in the forensic sense.

Ver. 17.—1. A covenant is firm over dead sacrifices.]—Ἐπὶ νεκροῖς, being an adjective, it must have a substantive agreeing with it, either expressed or understood. The substantive understood in this place I think is θύματα, sacrifices; for which reason I have supplied it in the translation. Perhaps the word νεκροῖς, animals, may be equally proper; especially as in the following clause διασώτης, is in the gender of the animals appointed for the sacrifice. Our translators have supplied the word ἀνθρώπων, and have translated ἀνθρώπων, 'after men are dead,' contrary to the propriety of the phrase.

2. It never hath force whilst the appointed liveth.]—Οὐκ ἔστι διασώτης, (supply περὶ, or περὶ, or τινος), whilst the calf, or goat, or bull, appointed for the sacrifice of ratification, liveth. The apostle having, in ver. 16. shewed that Christ's death was necessary as a sacrifice, the Mediator, that is, the procurer and ratifier of the new covenant, he in the 16th and 17th verses observes, that since God's covenants with men were all ratified by sacrifices, to shew that his intercourse with them are founded on the sacrifice of his Son, it was necessary that the new covenant itself should be ratified by his Son's actually dying as a sacrifice.

The faultiness of the common translation of the 16th, 16th, 17th, 18th, and 20th verses of this chapter, having been shewed in note 1. on ver. 15. nothing needs to be added here, except to call the reader's attention to the propriety and strength of the apostle's reasoning, as it appears in the translation of these verses which I have given, compared with his reasoning as represented in the common version. The learned reader needs not to be informed, that I have followed Pierce in translating διαθήκη, in these verses, by the word

16 Hence not even the first COVENANT¹ (see chap. viii. 7. note 2.) was dedicated² without blood.

19 For when Moses had spoken every precept¹ (απα, 333.) in the law to all the people, taking the blood of calves and of goats,² with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop,³ he sprinkled both the book⁴ itself, and all the people,⁵

20 Saying, This is the blood of the covenant,¹ which God hath commanded ME TO MAKE with you.

21 (Δα, 104.) Moreover, both the tabernacle, and all the vessels of the ministry, he in like manner sprinkled with blood.¹

22 And almost¹ all things, (απα) according to the law, are cleansed with blood, (see ver. 23. note 1.) ; and without the shedding of blood there is no remission.²

23 There was a necessity, therefore, that (καὶ ὁ ἱερεὺς, 333.) the representations indeed of the HOLY PLACES (from ver. 24.) in the heaven; and that in every other respect I differ from him, both in translating and in explaining this difficult, and, if I may be permitted to say it, this hitherto ill understood passage.

Ver. 18.—1. Not even the first covenant.]—In the original, the word covenant is wanting; and our translators, by supplying the word testament, have made the Sinaiic covenant, or law of Moses, of which the apostle is speaking, a testament; than which nothing can be more incongruous. See chap. ix. 15. note 1. The word to be supplied is not testament, but covenant.

2. Was dedicated.]—Εὐαγγελισμός, literally, was renewed. See Heb. x. 20. note 1. By using this word, the apostle perhaps intended to signify, that the Sinaiic covenant was a renewal of the covenant under which our first parents were placed at their creation. See Heb. viii. 7. note 2. However, as the common translation is sufficiently literal, I have retained it; though some, perhaps, may prefer Chrysostom's interpretation, ἀνακαινισμός, renewed.

Ver. 19.—1. Every precept, &c.]—The precepts of the law which Moses read to the people on this occasion, were those contained, Exod. x. xxi. xlii. xlii. as is evident from Exod. xiv. 5.

2. The blood of calves and goats.]—That calves and goats were sacrificed at the making of the Sinaiic covenant, may be gathered from Exod. xxiv. 5. where it is said, 'they offered burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings of oxen, (ΙΕΛΕ, 333, calves), unto the Lord.' For cattle of that sort, in their second year, may be called calves or oxen indifferently. See chap. ix. 12. note 1.—And with respect to the goats, though they are not mentioned by Moses, yet as these animals were used in the annual atonements, the apostle may have inferred that they were offered on this occasion, as well as calves; or he may have been informed of it by tradition.

3. With water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop.]—Because much blood was needed to sprinkle the people, it is supposed that water was mixed with it to increase its quantity, and that the apostle learned this, with the other particulars here mentioned, from tradition.—Wool tied on hyssop, which in the eastern countries is a shrub, rendered the dispersion more easy. Besides, on other occasions, the blood of the sacrifices was ordered to be sprinkled in that manner, Lev. xiv. 4. 6.

4. He sprinkled both the book itself.]—I suppose the book contained the precepts which Moses read in the audience of the people, Exod. xxiv. 7. and that it was laid on the altar and sprinkled, to represent God as a party to the covenant. This not being mentioned in the history, the apostle must have learned it either from tradition or from inspiration.

5. And all the people.]—In Exodus it is 'the people.' Neither of these expressions, however, means, that every individual Israelite was sprinkled; but that those who stood round the altar, and nearest to Moses, were sprinkled, and that this was considered as a sprinkling of the whole. Or, since we are told, Jerem. xxiv. 13. that when covenants were made, 'they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof,' we may suppose the covenant at Sinai was made in the same manner; and that the people, or some of each tribe, passed between the parts of the sacrifices, and were sprinkled as they passed, in token that they all consented to the covenant.

Ver. 20. This is the blood of the covenant.]—In allusion to these words of Moses, when our Lord instituted his supper to preserve the memory of his dying as the sacrifice by which the new covenant is ratified, he said, 'This is my blood of the new covenant which is shed for many, for the remission of sins,' Matt. xvi. 28. Wherefore, in representing Christ's death as a sacrifice for procuring the remission of sins, and for ratifying the new covenant, Paul followed his Master, when he called Christ's blood, Heb. x. 29. 'The blood of the covenant, wherewith we are sanctified,' or fitted to appear in the presence of God as pardoned persons.

18 Because from the beginning God ratified his covenant by sacrifice, to preserve among men the expectation of the sacrifice of his Son, hence not even the covenant of Sinai was made without sacrifice.

19 For when Moses had read every precept in the book of the law to all the people, taking the blood of the calves and goats which had been offered as the sacrifices of ratification, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, he sprinkled both the book of the law itself as representing God, and all the people, in token of the consent of both parties to the covenant,

20 Saying, while he sprinkled the people, This is the blood whereby the covenant which God hath commanded me to make with you is ratified, both on his part and on yours. See ver. 15. note 1.

21 Moreover, to prefigure the efficacy of the sacrifice of Christ to render our acts of worship acceptable, both the tabernacle, and the altar, and mercy-seat, and all the vessels used in the worship of God, Moses in like manner sprinkled with blood, after they were made and set in order.

22 And, for the same reason, almost all things, according to the law, are annually fitted for the worship of God by sprinkling them with blood. See Lev. xvi. 16. 19. 33. In short, to shew that pardon is procured through the blood of Christ, without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin granted by the law.

23 Seeing God would not admit sinners into heaven without shedding the blood of his Son, to make the Israelites sensible of this, it was necessary that the tabernacles, the representations of the

Ver. 21. He in like manner sprinkled with blood.]—The apostle speaks here of the sprinkling of the tabernacle and vessels of the ministry, when they were first consecrated; the order for which we have Exod. xi. 9. And though there it is only appointed that they should be anointed with oil, yet Lev. viii. 15. where the execution of the order is related, seeing we are told that Moses purified the altar by putting blood on its horns, and 'by sprinkling it round about with blood,' ver. 24. we may believe all the other vessels were purified in like manner. Besides, Josephus, who was himself a priest, and who no doubt was informed by his predecessors, says expressly, Antiq. lib. iii. c. 8. Huds. edit. 'Moses consecrated for God's service the tabernacle and all the vessels of it, anointing them with oil, and the blood of bulls and rams.'

Ver. 22.—1. Almost all things.]—This qualified expression is used, because some things were cleansed with water, and some with fire, Numb. xxi. 23. and some with the ashes of the red heifer, Numb. xix. 9—10.

2. And without the shedding of blood there is no remission.]—The apostle means, no remission granted on the day of atonement.

Because some, who do not understand the nature of the law of Moses, fancy that a real pardon of sin was obtained by its atonements, it will be proper to inquire into that matter. The atonements on the 10th of the 7th month were made for the people, and for the holy places. And the effect of the atonement then made for the people is thus described: Lev. xvi. 30. 'On that day shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the Lord.' But this cleansing of the people from all their sins could not possibly have any reference to the punishments of the life to come, because the atonement was made 'for all the people of the congregation,' ver. 33. indiscriminately, whether penitent or not; consequently it could not be a cleansing of the people's conscience, but of their body; redeeming them from those civil penalties which God in the character of their chief magistrate would have inflicted on them for breaking the laws of the state, unless these atonements had been made. A remission of that kind all the people of the congregation might receive; and it was the only remission which in a body they could receive through the sacrifices mentioned.—Besides, the shedding of the blood of beasts could have no influence in procuring an eternal pardon for sinners, in the way either of substitution or of example. Being void of reason, beasts are not capable of being punished; and far less of being punished in the room of mankind. In like manner, beasts being incapable of sinning, their sufferings can never be considered as examples of punishment. The apostle, therefore, had good reason to say, Heb. x. 4. 'It is impossible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins.' Yet the shedding of their blood was fitly prescribed in the Levitical ritual, as it prefigured the real atonement through which God was to forgive mankind their transgressions. From the inefficacy of the annual atonements, made on the 10th of the 7th month by the high-priest, to procure for the people the eternal pardon of their sins, it follows that the daily atonements made by the ordinary priests had no greater efficacy in procuring the pardon of sins. The efficacy which the annual atonements had in cleansing the holy places, is described ver. 23. See note 1. on that verse.

Ver. 23.—1. Should be cleansed.]—The apostle speaks of the annual cleansing of the tabernacles, which was performed in the following manner: The high-priest carried the blood of the appointed sacrifice into the inward tabernacle, where he sprinkled it on the mercy-seat seven times, and seven times before the mercy-seat on the door. This is termed, Lev. xvi. 18. 'a making atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel.' By the same rite the tabernacle of the congregation was cleansed, and the altar, ver. 16. 18. But the tabernacles and altar being in a vens, should be *crowned*¹ by these SACRIFICES; but the heavenly HOLY PLACES (from ver. 24.) themselves, by sacrifices² better than these.

24 (Ou γαγ, 93.) *Therefore Christ hath not entered into the holy places made with hands, (αὐτοῦ) the images¹ of the true HOLY PLACES; but into heaven itself, now to appear before the face of God, on our account.*²

25 (Ou δ, 100.) Not, however, that he should offer himself often,¹ as the high-priest entereth into the holy places every year with other blood;

26 For then he must often have suffered since the foundation of the world:¹ But now once, at the conclusion (ῥα ἅμα) of the ages, he hath been manifested to abolish sin-offering² by the sacrifice of himself.

27 And, for as much as it is appointed to men once¹ to die, and, after that, the judgment,

28 Even so Christ being once offered, (chap. viii. 3. note), in order to carry away the sins of many,¹ will, to them who wait for him, appear² a second time, without sin-offering, in order to salvation.

sable of moral pollution, their uncleanness must have been of a ceremonial kind, contracted, as it is expressed ver. 16. 'by their remaining among the people in the midst of their uncleanness;' that is, contracted by the worship performed in them by the priests during the preceding year. Wherefore, the cleansing and reconciling of these things imported their being fitted anew for the worship of God; and, in particular, that the tabernacles were opened to the prayers and other acts of religious worship, to be performed by the priests and people during the course of the succeeding year.—In these cleansings, thus understood, there was the greatest propriety. For, agreeably to God's general design in giving the law, by purifying with blood these copies of the holy places in heaven, men were taught, that heaven itself is opened to them through the blood of Christ; that on account of the shedding of his blood, God hath from the beginning accepted, and will to the end of the world accept, the worship which pious men anywhere on earth offer to him; and that he will receive them into heaven after the general judgment.

2. But the heavenly holy places themselves, by sacrifices better than these.—The one sacrifice of Christ, by which heaven is opened, (see ver. 22. note 2. at the end), being here meant, to give dignity to that sacrifice, the plural is used instead of the singular; for the apostle hath everywhere taught, that Christ offered but one sacrifice, chap. x. 12.

Ver. 24.—1. The images of the true holy places.—Αὐτοῦ, the antitypes. See 1 Pet. iii. 21. note 2.—In the Mount, Moses had ἑστῶς, the type or model of the tabernacle, and of the services to be performed in them, shewed to him. Hence the tabernacles, with their services, which he formed according to that model, are called antitypes or images of that model; consequently images of heaven itself, and of the services to be performed by Christ as the high-priest of the heavenly holy places; of all which the model shewed to Moses in the Mount was a shadow or dark representation.

2. Now to appear before the face of God on our account.—That Christ's appearing in the body in which he suffered death, before the manifestation of the divine presence in heaven, was a real offering of himself a sacrifice for us, is evident from the apostle's adding, in the following verse, that it was not necessary that he should offer himself often, as the high-priest entered into the holy places annually. Wherefore, according to St. Paul, the ministration of the Jewish high-priest in the Mosaic tabernacles from year to year was a continued emblem of Christ's entering once for all into heaven with the sacrifice of himself; and of his continually officiating there for us by virtue of that sacrifice; and of his procuring us access to worship God acceptably while on earth, together with the pardon of our sins and admission into heaven after the general judgment.

Ver. 25. Not, however, that he should offer himself often.—The atonement made by Christ being founded on the sovereign pleasure of God, Heb. ii. 10. note, it was to be made according to the appointment of God. Wherefore, Christ having made that atonement only once, it follows, that no more atonement was required by God, in order to his pardoning the sanctified, in all ages and nations. See the following note.—That Christ offered himself a sacrifice, not on the cross, but in heaven, by presenting his crucified body there, before the manifestation of the divine presence, see proved Heb. viii. 3. note; and ver. 8. of that chapter, note 5. at the end.

Ver. 26.—1. For then he must often have suffered since the foundation of the world.—Here the apostle supports his affirmation, that it is not necessary to the pardoning of sinners, and to their holy places in the heavens, (see chap. ix. 1. note 2.), should be annually cleansed, that is, opened to the priests and people, by the sacrifices of bulls and goats, as types of the sacrifice of Christ; but the heavenly holy places themselves, by a sacrifice more effectual than these.

24 Therefore Christ, our High-priest, hath not entered with the sacrifice of his crucified body (Heb. x. 10.) into the holy places made with the hands of men, the images of the true holy places; but into heaven itself, now to appear with that sacrifice before the manifestation of the divine presence, to officiate as the high-priest of these holy places on our account.

25 Though it was necessary that Christ should open heaven to us by offering the sacrifice of himself, it was not necessary that he should offer himself often in the heavenly holy places for that purpose, as the high-priest entereth into the earthly holy places every year with other blood than his own;

26 For then he must often have suffered death on earth, since the beginning of the world: But that this was not necessary, appeareth from the fact itself; for now once, at the conclusion of the Mosaic dispensation, Christ hath been manifested in the flesh, to abolish the Levitical sin-offerings by the sacrifice of himself.

27 And, for as much as it is appointed by God, that men shall die but once as the punishment of the sin of the first man, and that, after death, every one shall be judged and punished but once for his own sins.

28 Even so Christ, being once offered in order to carry away the guilt of the sins of many, justice required no more sin-offering for them: and therefore he will, to them who wait for him, appear a second time on earth, without dying as a sin-offering, in order, as their king and judge, to bestow on them salvation.

admission into heaven, that Christ should offer himself in heaven often, that is, annually, as the high-priest entered every year into the holy places on earth with the blood of bulls and of goats to make atonement for the people; because, saith he, in that case, Christ must often, that is, every year, have suffered death since the foundation of the world, which is absurd.—This reasoning merits the reader's particular attention, because it supposeth two facts which are of great importance. The first is, that from the fall of Adam to the end of the world, no man will be pardoned but through Christ's having offered himself to God a sacrifice for sin. The apostle's reasoning evidently implies this. For if sinners may be pardoned without Christ's offering himself a sacrifice, his offering himself so much as once would not have been necessary; and far less his offering himself often, as the apostle affirms.—The second fact implied in the apostle's reasoning is, That although Christ offered himself only once, and that at the conclusion of the Mosaic dispensation, that one offering is in itself so meritorious, and of such efficacy in procuring pardon for the penitent, that its influence reacheth backwards to the beginning of the world, and forwards to the end of time; on which account Christ is with great propriety termed, Rev. xiii. 8. 'A lamb slain from the foundation of the world.' The phrase, 'from the foundation of the world,' in this passage, is not to be taken strictly, because the necessity of Christ's offering himself a sacrifice for sin did not take place immediately at the creation, but at the fall. Besides, we have the phrase in this limited sense, Luke x. 60.

2. To abolish sin-offering.—Ἐξολοθίσαι. Beza saith, this Greek word is used to denote the removing of laws after they are abrogated.—ἄφεσις, sin, in this verse signifies sin-offering, as it doth likewise ver. 22. See 2 Cor. v. 21. note 1. After Christ offered the sacrifice of himself, the typical sin-offerings of the law being no longer of any use, were abolished. This great event was expressly foretold, Dan. ix. 24.

Ver. 27. It is appointed to men once to die.—The apostle does not say appointed to all men once to die: Because such as are alive at the coming of Christ to judgment, are not to die, but to be changed. Besides, Enoch and Elijah did not die, but were translated in the body to heaven.—In this passage of scripture, as in many others, though the expressions are universal, they describe only the general course of things.

Ver. 28.—1. To carry away the sins of many.—So I translate ἀφαιρέσει, supposing that the apostle alludes to the scape-goat, 'which bare all the iniquities of the congregation unto a land not inhabited.'—If ἀφαιρέσει is translated bear the sins, as it is 1 Pet. ii. 24. the meaning will be the same in effect; namely, that Christ was once offered 'to make atonement for the sins of many.' See 1 Pet. ii. 24. note 1.

2. Will, to them who wait for him, appear a second time.—The return of Christ from heaven to the earth at the last day, is here compared to and was typified by the return of the high-priest from the inward tabernacle. For after appearing there in the presence of God, and making atonement for the people in the plain dress of an ordinary priest, Lev. xvi. 23, 24, he came out, arrayed in his magnificent robes, to bless the people who waited for him in the court of the tabernacle of the congregation. Now, as Doddridge observes, no image, for expressing the grand idea which the apostle intended to convey, could be presented more suitable than this would be to a Jew, who knew well the solemnity to which it referred. But there will be this difference between the return of Christ to bless his people, and the return of the high-priest to bless the congregation:

The latter, after coming out of the most holy place, made a new atonement, in his pontifical robes, for himself and for the people, Lev. xvi. 34., which shewed, that the former atonement was not real, but only typical; whereas Jesus, after having made atonement in heaven with his own blood, will not return to the earth for the purpose of making himself a sacrifice a second time; but, having procured an eternal redemption for his people by the sacrifice of himself once offered, he will return for the purpose of declaring to them who wait for him, that they are pardoned, and of bestowing on them the great blessing of eternal life. Which absolution and reward, he, being surrounded with the glory of his Father, Matt. xvi. 27. will give them in the presence of the assembled universe, both as their king and their priest. And this is the great salvation which Christ himself began to preach, and which was confirmed to the world by them who heard him, Heb. ii. 3.

The form in which the high-priest and the ordinary priests were to bless the people after burning the incense in the tabernacle, is prescribed Numb. vi. 23-26. And that they were in use to bless the people after they burned the incense, we learn from Luke i. 8. where it is said, while Zacharias 'executed the priest's office before God in the order of his course, 9. According to the custom of the priest's office, his lot was to burn incense when he went into the temple of the Lord. 10. And the whole multitude of the people were praying without at the time of incense. 21. And the people waited for Zacharias, and marvelled that he tarried so long in the temple;'—they waited to receive from him the prescribed blessing.

CHAPTER X.

View and Illustration of the Discoveries and Exhortations contained in this Chapter.

IN the preceding chapter, the apostle, for displaying Christ's dignity as an High-priest, having illustrated his affirmation, chap. viii. 7. that the Levitical priests worshipped God in the tabernacle, with the representations of the services to be performed by Christ in heaven; also, having contrasted the ineffectual services performed by these priests in the tabernacle on earth, with the effectual services performed by Christ in heaven; and the covenant of which they were the mediators, with the covenant of which Christ is the Mediator; and the blessings procured by the services of the Levitical priests in the earthly tabernacles, with the blessings procured by the services performed by Christ in heaven; he, in the beginning of this tenth chapter, as the necessary consequence of these things, infers, That since the law containeth nothing but a shadow, or emblematical representation, of the blessings to come through the services of the greater and more perfect heavenly tabernacle, and not these blessings themselves, it never can, with the same emblematical sacrifices which were offered annually for ever by the high-priests on the day of atonement, make those who came to these sacrifices perfect in respect of pardon, ver. 1.—This important conclusion the apostle established still more strongly by observing, that if these sacrifices had made the worshippers perfect in respect of pardon, they would have ceased to be offered; because the worshippers being once cleansed, that is, pardoned, would no longer have been distressed with the consciousness of their sins, and with the fear of punishment, ver. 2.—Nevertheless, that the consciousness of their sins as unpardoned still remained, even after these sacrifices were offered, is evident from this, that in the annual repetition of these sacrifices, the people's sins for which atonement had formerly been made, were remembered; that is, confessed as still unpardoned, ver. 3.—Moreover, in farther proof of his conclusion, the apostle affirmed it to be impossible in the nature of things, that the shedding of the blood of bulls and of goats, creatures not capable of sinning, should, either as substitutions or as examples of punishment, (see Heb. ix. 22. note 2.,) take away the sins of moral agents, ver. 4.—Wherefore, after the Israelites believed that the sacrifices of beasts were real atonements, the Deity, to shew them the folly of that notion, inspired the writer of Psalm xl. to foretell what his Son was to say to him when coming into the world to make a real atonement for the sins of men; namely this, The sacrifices of bulls and of goats, and the offerings of the fruits of the earth, though of thine own appointment, thou dost not command any longer, on account of their inefficacy, and on account of the superstitious use which hath been made of them: But thou hast prepared me a body, that I may die a real sacrifice for sin, ver. 5.—Whole burnt-offerings and sin-offerings thou hast no pleasure in now, ver. 6.—Wherefore I said, Behold I come into the world, to do, O God, thy will, in bruising the head of the serpent, which is written concerning me in the beginning of the book of the law, ver. 7.—On these words of Messiah the apostle remarks, that having first said to God, Sacrifice, and offering, and whole burnt-offerings, and sin-offerings, which are offered according to the law, thou dost not command, neither art thou pleased with them, ver. 8.—And next, seeing he hath said, Behold I come to do, O God, thy will, by dying as a sin-offering; it is evident that God hath taken away his first command appointing the sacrifices of the law, and hath abolished these sacrifices, that he might establish his second command, appointing his Son to die in the human nature as a sin-offering, to render the malicious purpose of the devil abortive, ver. 9.—By which second command, therefore, we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once, ver. 10.—From this memorable passage of the xth Psalm we learn, that the only real expiation for sin which God ever appointed, is the sacrifice of his Son in the human nature; that all the sacrifices which he appointed to the Israelites, were nothing but emblems of the sacrifice of Christ; and that the sacrifice of Christ being offered, the emblems of it are now fitly laid aside, that under the gospel dispensation there might remain in the view of mankind no sacrifice having any pretension to take away sin but the sacrifice of Christ, expressly established by God himself, as the meritorious cause of our pardon.

In what follows, the apostle applied to the sacrifices offered by the ordinary priests daily in the outward tabernacle, the argument by which he had proved the inefficacy of the sacrifices offered annually by the high-priest in the most holy place; namely, that the repetition of them shewed their inefficacy, ver. 11.—Whereas Christ, through the whole of his life, having offered but one sacrifice for sin, sat down at the right hand of God, as having completely finished the expiation, and as taken possession of the government of the universe, ver. 12, 13.—Wherefore, by the one sacrifice of himself, Christ hath perfected for ever the sanctified; that is, hath obtained an eternal pardon, together with admission into heaven, for all them who have an interest in that sacrifice by faith and repentance, ver. 14.—This the Holy Ghost testifies in the before-mentioned account of the covenant of which Christ is the Mediator, ver. 15.—where, among other things, God promises that the sins and iniquities of his people he will remember no more, ver. 17.—Now, where a complete pardon is granted, certainly no more offering for sin is needed, ver. 18.

Here the apostle concludes his admirable reasonings concerning the priesthood and sacrifice of Christ. But, before we dismiss the subject, it may be proper to remark, that although the apostle's arguments are formed principally to shew the inefficacy of the sacrifices of Judaism, yet being equally applicable to the sacrifices of heathenism, they must have been of great use for convincing the Gentiles, that those atonements on which they had hitherto relied were utterly ineffectual for procuring the favour of the Deity.—Moreover, the apostle having proved that the Levitical sacrifices and services were instituted to be representations of the sacrifices which Christ was to offer, and of the services which he was to perform in heaven, may we not infer, that the sacrifices of beasts were instituted by God at the beginning of the world for the same purpose? See Heb. xi. 4. note 4. And therefore, although these sacrifices could not take away sin, the appointment of them at the beginning, and the regulation of them afterwards in the Levitical ritual, were matters not unworthy of God: Being shadows of the priesthood, sacrifice, and intercession of Christ, they preserved the knowledge and expectations of these great subjects among mankind, and more especially among the Israelites. Besides, when Christ, the High-priest appointed by the oath of God, actually came, a great lustre of evidence was thrown on his character and ministrations, by their having been prefigured in the Levitical institutions.—In short, though the apostle had denied that the sacrifices of the law were real atonements, yet, by shewing the Jewish institutions in their true light, he hath preserved to them their whole importance; and by comparing them with the better institutions of the gospel, he hath made us sensible how preferable the substance is to the shadow, which therefore was with propriety done away under the gospel.

The apostle having finished the doctrinal part of his letter, proceeds, in the remaining part, to shew what influence the belief of Christ's dignity and power as the Son of God, and of the efficacy of his mediation as the Apostle and High-priest of our confession, ought to have on our temper and conduct. Having by the sacrifice of himself not only made a sufficient atonement for our sins, but procured for us the new covenant, we have, through the blood of Jesus, boldness in death, which is now become the entrance into the true holy places where God dwells, ver. 19.—This entrance Jesus hath made for us, a way new and living into the holy place, the habitation of God, through the veil of his flesh: so that death, instead of leading us away for ever from the presence of God, as it was originally intended to do, carries us into his presence to live with him eternally in unspeakable happiness. Wherefore, being a new and living way into the presence of God, death is stripped of all its terrors; and believers need not be afraid to die, ver. 20.—Also, having now a great Priest always residing in heaven, the true house or temple of God, to present the prayers and other acts of worship which we offer on earth, ver. 21.—we ought to approach God with a truly devout heart, in the full assurance of being accepted through the mediation of Christ, so be our hearts are cleansed by repentance from an evil conscience, ver. 22.—Besides, our bodies having been washed with the pure water of baptism, we ought to hold fast that confession of the hope of pardon through Christ which we then so solemnly made, without regarding the evils which such a confession may bring on us, ver. 23.—And when in danger of being drawn away from the profession of the gospel, by the false reasonings and corrupt example of unbelievers, we should consider attentively the behaviour of our brethren, who have suffered for their faith and for their love to Christ and to his people, that we may excite one another to love and good works, ver. 24.—and should not, through the fear of our persecutors, leave off the assembling of ourselves together for the worship of God, as the custom of some is; but rather exhort one another to persevere in the profession of the gospel: the rather, because we see the day of our deliverance from our persecutors approaching, ver. 25.—The apostle was the more earnest in this exhortation, because, if one wilfully renounces the gospel after having openly professed it, there remaineth no sacrifice by which that sin can be pardoned, ver. 26.—To such apostates there remaineth nothing but a dreadful expectation of the judgment and fiery indignation of God, which will devour them as his adversaries, ver. 27.—For if the despisers of Moses' law were put to death without mercy, although it was only a political law, ver. 28.—of how much sorer punishment, think ye, shall he be counted worthy, who, by renouncing the gospel, tramples under foot the Son of God? &c. ver. 29.—The punishment of such an apostate will be heavy and inevitable: for we know the irresistible power of him who hath said, The punishment of the wicked belongeth to me: I will repay them according to their deeds. Moreover, God having promised to avenge his people of their oppressors, he will certainly punish severely those who have insulted his Son and Spirit, ver. 30.—And it is a terrible thing to fall into the hands of the living God as an enraged enemy, ver. 31.

This exhortation to beware of renouncing the gospel, the apostle with great propriety pressed on the Hebrews in this part of his epistle, notwithstanding in the preceding sixth chapter he had displayed the heinous nature and dangerous consequences of apostasy. For after that display, having at great length described the efficacy of Christ's death as a propitiation in procuring the pardon of sin, and explained the gracious nature of the new covenant procured by Christ's death, he naturally supposed that the Hebrews were sensible of the guilt which they would contract, if they renounced the gospel in which these great blessings were made known and offered to mankind. Withal, having described the terrible punishment which awaits apostates, he could not doubt of their being sensible of their danger. Wherefore, to strengthen the good impressions which he charitably supposed his discourse had made on them, he desired them to call to mind the joy which they felt when they first believed the gospel; the courage and constancy with which they then suffered for their faith; the kindness which they shewed to their persecuted brethren; their sympathizing with him in his bonds; and the heavenly temper with which they took the spoiling of their goods, ver. 32, 33, 34.—and exhorted them, after having suffered so much for their faith, not to cast away their courage, which, he told them, would secure to them a great reward in heaven, ver. 35.—provided they continued to suffer patiently while they were doing the will of God by maintaining their Christian profession, ver. 36.—Besides, their troubles would not be of long continuance; for Christ, according to his promise, would in a little time come and destroy the Jewish state, whereby the power of their persecutors would be broken, ver. 37.—And, to give his exhortation the greater weight, he put them in mind of what God had said by Habakkuk, namely, 'The just by faith shall live: But if he draw back, my soul will not be well pleased with him,' ver. 38.—Lest, however, the Hebrews might have inferred, from the earnestness of his exhortation, that he suspected they were about to apostatize, he expressed his hope that they would not be of the number of those who draw back to their eternal perdition, but of the number of those who would continue to believe to the saving of their soul, ver. 39.

CHAP. X.—1 (Eg. 93.) Wherefore! the law containing a shadow? ONLY of the good things

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. X.—1 Wherefore, since the law, in the services of the high-priests in the inward tabernacle, contains a shadow only of the

Ver. 1.—1. Wherefore.—As the things mentioned in this verse are no proof at all of the doctrine contained in the preceding chapter, but an inference from that doctrine, our translators, by giving the particle γάρ, in the beginning of the verse, its causal signification, have entirely altered the scheme of the apostle's discourse, and have led the reader away from its true meaning. See the illustration.

2. The law containing a shadow.—The word εἰκὼν, shadow, image.

to come, AND NOT the very (same) image of these things, never can, with the same sacrifices which they offer yearly for ever, make (τὸς προσερχομένων) those who come to THEM perfect.

2 Since, being offered, would they not have ceased? because the worshippers, being once cleansed, should have had no longer conscience of sins.

3 (ΑΛΛΑ, 81.) Nevertheless, in these a remembrance of sins is made yearly. (See ver. 17.)

4 (ΤΑΓ, 91.) Besides, IT is impossible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins. (See chap. ix. 22, note 2.)

5 (ΑΝ) Wherefore, when coming into the world, he saith, (Psalm. xl. 6.), Sacrifice and offering (καὶ θυσίαι, ἡ Τιμ. ii. 4. note) thou dost not command, but a body thou hast prepared me.

6 Whole burnt-offerings and sin-offerings thou art not pleased with.

7 Then I said, Behold I come to do, O God, thy will, (supply o) WHICH is written concerning me in the volume of the book.

Times denotes the outlines of a picture rudely drawn with chalk, such as painters make before they apply the pencil to produce an exact resemblance, called here εἰκὼν, the image, of what they intend to represent. But others more justly think the word shadow is used in the sense which it has Col. ii. 17. 'which are (σκιαι) a shadow of things to come; but (σῶμα) the body is Christ's.' According to this sense of the word, a shadow is that obscure resemblance of any body which it makes by the interruption of the rays of the sun; whereas εἰκὼν, image, denotes the substance or body itself which occasions the shadow. Wherefore σῶμα τὸν εἰκὼνα, the very image, in the subsequent clause, denotes the things themselves which are to come through the ministration of Christ. Accordingly, in the Syriac version it is, 'Et non substantia ipsarum rerum.' This also is the interpretation which Chrysostom and Theophylact have given of the passage. The good things of which the law contained only a shadow were,—1. The cleansing of the minds of believers from evil dispositions, by the doctrines of the gospel, and by the influences of the Spirit of God. Of this the washings and purifications of the bodies of the Israelites enjoined in the law were a shadow.—2. That real atonement for sin which was made by the offering of the body of Jesus Christ in heaven, Heb. x. 10. Of this the Levitical atonements made by the offering of beasts were a shadow.—3. The eternal pardon of sin, procured for believers by the atonement which Christ made by the sacrifice of himself. Of this the political pardon obtained for the Israelites, by the atonement which the priests made by the sacrifice of beasts, was a shadow.—4. Access to worship God on earth through the blood of Christ, with the hope of acceptance. Of this the drawing nigh of the Israelites to worship in the court of the tabernacle of the congregation, through the blood of the Levitical sacrifices, was a shadow.—5. The eternal possession of the heavenly country, through believing and obeying the gospel. Of this the continued possession of Canaan, secured to the Israelites by their obedience to the law, was a shadow. Wherefore, the good things which Christ hath obtained for believers, through his ministrations in the heavenly tabernacle, being not procured, but only typified by the ministrations of the high-priests in the tabernacle on earth, it was fit that these shadows should be done away after the things of which they were the shadows were accomplished.

3. Same sacrifices which they offer yearly.]—The circumstance of their offering these sacrifices yearly, shews that the apostle had in his eye the sacrifices which the high-priest offered annually on the tenth of the seventh month.

Ver. 2.—1. Would they not have ceased?—That this is the proper translation of the clause Mill has shewed; in which he follows Oecumenius and Theophylact, who affirm that it ought to be translated interrogatively.—The Syriac and Vulgate want the negative particle here.

2. Because the worshippers.]—Τοὺς λατρεύοντας. These were the people who came to the tabernacle to worship on the fast of the seventh month, called τὸς προσερχομένων, ver. 1.

Ver. 4. It is impossible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins.]—Micah formerly taught the Jews the same doctrine, and even insinuated to them that the heathens, being sensible of the impossibility of making atonement for sins by shedding the blood of beasts, had recourse to human sacrifices, in the imagination that they were more meritorious: Micah vi. 7. 'Will the Lord be pleased with thousands of rams, or with ten thousands of rivers blessings which were to come through the services of Christ in the heavenly tabernacle, and not the very substance of these blessings, it never can, with the same kind of sacrifices which the high-priests offer yearly for ever, make those who come to these sacrifices perfect in respect of pardon.

2 Since, if these sacrifices could have made the worshippers perfect in respect of pardon, being once offered, would they not have ceased from being again offered? because the worshippers, being once pardoned, should have had no longer any uneasiness in their conscience on account of the sins for which the atonement was made.

3 Nevertheless, in these sacrifices annually repeated, and in the confession of sins made over the scape-goat, a remembrance of all the sins of the people is made yearly, as not pardoned. Lev. xvi. 21.

4 Besides, it is impossible, in the nature of things, that the blood of bulls and of goats should procure the pardon of sins, either in the way of substitution or by example. (See Ess. vii. sect. 1. art. 2, 3 and Whitty's note on Heb. x. 14.)

5 Wherefore, to shew this, when coming into our world, Messiah saith to God, The sacrifice of bulls and of goats, and the offering of the fruits of the earth, thou dost not now command, but a body thou hast prepared me, that by dying I might make the atonement prefigured by these sacrifices.

6 The whole burnt-offerings, and the sin-offerings, appointed in the law, having become the occasion of superstition, thou art not pleased with them.

7 Then I said, Behold I come into the world, to do, O God, thy will with respect to the bruising of the head of the serpent, by dying as a sin-offering, which is written concerning me in the volume of the book of the law. Gen. iii. 15.

of oil? shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?'

Ver. 5.—1. When coming into the world, he saith.]—Because the apostle here affirms, that Messiah, when coming into the world, spake the 6th and the following verses of Psalm. xl. and because David could in no sense say that God did not desire sacrifice and offering from him, it is the general opinion that the Psalm is a prophecy of Christ, and that it cannot be applied to David at all. For though it be said, ver. 12. 'Mine iniquities have taken hold of me,' these iniquities may be 'the iniquities of us all,' laid on him by the Lord, Isa. liii. 6; so that they became his by imputation. Or, by a metonymy of the cause for the effect, they may be the sufferings which Christ bore for the sins of the world. To this sense the precedent and subsequent expressions in the Psalm naturally lead us, ver. 12. 'Innumerable evils have compassed me about.'—Therefore my heart is filled with me.—That Messiah's coming into the world means his coming from heaven into our world, we learn from himself, John xvi. 28. 'I came forth from the Father, and am come into the world.' Also he hath told us for what end he came into our world, Matt. xviii. 11. 'The Son of man is come to save that which was lost;' namely, by giving himself to die for lost sinners; as is insinuated likewise in the passage under consideration.

2. But a body thou hast prepared me.]—Σῶμα ἡ κατασκευασμένον μοι. This is the LXX. translation; but in the Hebrew it is, ἡμῶν εἰς τὸν ἅγιον. Thou hast made me perfectly obedient to thee. So the phrase signifies Isa. l. 5. 'The Lord hath opened mine ears; and I was not rebellious, neither turned away back.' And seeing the Son of God, by being made flesh, took on him the form (εἰκὼν) of a slave, Philip. ii. 7., or obedient servant, the expression, 'Thou hast prepared me a body,' is equivalent to 'mine ears thou hast opened;' and both phrases signify, 'Thou hast made me thy obedient servant.' This reconciliation of the passage is founded on the ancient phraseology, in which slaves were called σῶματα, bodies, because they were as implicitly directed by the will of their masters as the body is directed by the mind. See Rev. xviii. 13. The LXX. therefore, have given the true sense of Psalm. xl. 6. in what may be called a free translation, which the apostle hath adopted for the sake of perspicuity. If this solution is not admitted, we must suppose that the Hebrew copies, which the LXX. and the apostle used, had a reading in this passage different from that found in the copies now existing.

Ver. 6. Whole burnt-offerings.]—These were such sacrifices as were wholly consumed by fire on the altar, without the priests receiving any share thereof.

Ver. 7.—1. Which is written concerning me.]—It was written concerning Christ in the book of the law, Gen. iii. 15. 'The seed of the woman shall bruise thy head;' the serpent's head. It was also written, 'And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed.'

2. In the volume of the book.]—Ἐν βιβλίῳ. The word βιβλίον properly signifies the head or top of a pillar; and sometimes the pillar itself, as Weiststein has shewed on this verse. Hence it was used by the LXX. to denote a volume, or roll of a book, on account of its cylindrical form. In the common translation of this verse, Messiah is represented as saying, 'In the volume of the book it is written of me, Behold I come to do thy will, O God.' But as this speech is nowhere written in the book of the law, the translation which I have given, arising from the right construction of the words, should be

8 (Ἀνωτέρω) Above, having said, (ἐν, 260.) Certainly sacrifice and offering, and whole burnt-offerings, and sin-offerings, (which are offered according to the law),¹ thou dost not will, neither art pleased with;

9 (Τότε) Next, (supp. &c.) SEEING he hath said, Behold I come to do, O God, thy will; He taketh away the first WILL, (from ver. 10.), that he may establish the second.

10 By which will (ἡ ἰσχυρὸς ὡς) we are the sanctified, through the offering of the body¹ (ver. 6.) of Jesus Christ once.²

11 And indeed every priest standeth daily ministering, and offering often the same sacrifices, which never can take away sins. (See ver. 2. 4.)

12 But he,¹ having offered ONLY one sacrifice for sins through his whole life,² sat down (ω) at the right hand of God;

13 (Το λοιπὸν) Thenceforth waiting till his enemies be made the footstool of his feet.

14 (Γὰρ, 93.) Wherefore, by one offering, he hath perfected (see Heb. v. 9. note 1.) for ever the sanctified. (53.)

15 And even the Holy Ghost testifieth THIS to us, (μὴτα γὰρ, 94.) according indeed to what was before mentioned; (chap. viii. 10. 12.)

16 This is the covenant which I will make with them after these days, saith the Lord: I will put my laws in their hearts, and write them upon their minds;

17 And their sins and their iniquities I will remember no more.

18 Now, where remission of these is, no more offering for sin IS NEEDED.¹

19 Well then, brethren, having (παραγινώσκοντες us adopted; namely, 'Then I said, Behold I come to do, O God, thy will (supply ἡ) which is written concerning me in the volume (or, as others translate ἡ κεφαλὴ, in the top or beginning) of the book,' namely, of the law.

Ver. 8. Which are offered according to the law.]—This clause is not in the Psalm; but it is added by the apostle, to shew that, notwithstanding these offerings were originally of divine appointment, they were all to be laid aside when Messiah came into the world and offered himself as a sin-offering. Wherefore, that the reader may be sensible that they are the apostle's words, and not the words of the Psalm, they must be read in a parenthesis, before the clause, 'thou dost not will,' to shew that that clause refers to the four kinds of offerings mentioned in the Psalm.

Ver. 10.—1. Sanctified by the offering of the body.]—The Levitical sanctifications were made by the frequent offering or sprinkling of the blood of the sacrifices in the holy places. But the sanctification of believers is made by the offering or presenting of the crucified body of Jesus Christ in heaven once, whereby his death on earth was manifested. See chap. viii. 5. note 5. last part of the note.

2. Of Jesus Christ once.]—Thus by the express testimony of the Jewish scriptures, the apostle hath proved, that as the Levitical sacrifices were at first established by divine authority, so they are now abolished by the same authority. Also, that, by the express will of God, the sacrifice of Christ was appointed from the beginning the only propitiation for the sins of men. And it must ever be remembered, that the will of God is the true foundation on which any propitiation for sin can be established. Wherefore, since the death of Christ is by God made the propitiation for the sin of the world, it rests on the foundation of his will, secure from all the objections raised against it, either by erring Christians or by obstinate Infidels, on account of our not being able to explain the reasons which determined God to save sinners in that method, rather than in any other. See Heb. ii. 10. note 4.

8 On the foregoing remarkable passage I reason thus:—The only begotten, who knew the will of his Father, (John i. 18.), on coming into the world, first having said, Certainly sacrifice, and offering, and whole burnt-offerings, and sin-offerings, notwithstanding they are offered according to the law, thou dost not now will, neither art pleased with, being abused to the purpose of superstition:

9 Next, seeing he hath said, Behold I come into the world, to do, O God, thy will, by offering myself a sacrifice for sin; he hath shewed, that God hath abolished his former will or command concerning the Levitical sacrifice, that he may establish his second will or command concerning the sacrifice of his Son.

10 By establishing which second will of God, we are persons who being pardoned are fitted for worshipping God here, and for entering heaven hereafter, through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once; that being sufficient to procure us an eternal pardon. (See Heb. ix. 26. note 1.)

11 And indeed every ordinary priest standeth morning and evening ministering and offering the same sacrifices, which sheweth that these sacrifices never can take away sins.

12 Whereas Christ, having offered only one sacrifice for sins through his whole life, sat down at the right hand of God, 'a priest upon his throne,' Zech. vi. 13. to whose glory as High-priest in heaven, that of royal dignity and certain conquest was added;

13 Thenceforth waiting till his ministry as High-priest, and government as King, shall issue, according to God's promise, Psal. cx. i. in the utter destruction of his enemies.

14 Wherefore it is evident, that, by one offering of himself, Christ hath procured an everlasting pardon for them who by faith and repentance are sanctified; that is, prepared to receive the benefit of that offering.

15 And even the Holy Ghost testifieth this to us, according indeed to what was before cited, chap. viii. 10. 12.; namely,

16 This is the covenant which I will make with my people, the spiritual Israel of all nations, in the latter days, saith the Lord: I will give them a strong love to my laws, and a clear knowledge of them; (see Heb. viii. 10–12. notes.)

17 And their sins and their iniquities I will never more call to remembrance, as I did under my former covenant, by the repetition of the annual expiation.

18 Now, where God forgives iniquities, so as never to remember them more, no farther atonement is needed: Thus hath the Holy Ghost testified, that, by one offering, Jesus has perfected for ever the sanctified, ver. 14.

19 Well then, brethren, as the improvement of the doctrine of Ver. 12.—1. But he.]—Αὐτὸς δὲ answers to πρὸς μὲν in ver. 11.

2. Through his whole life.]—ἕως το δεικνύει. See Heb. vii. 3. note 4. This clause may be joined with what goes before, as I have done, to express the efficacy of Christ's sacrifice; or it may be joined, as our translators have done, with what follows, so as to express his sitting for ever at the right hand of God.

Ver. 18. No more offering for sin is needed.]—If, after remission is granted to the sinner, there is no need of any more sacrifice for sin, as the apostle here affirms; and if Christ, by offering himself once, 'hath perfected for ever the sanctified,' as it is observed ver. 14. the sacrifice of the mass, as it is called, about which the Romish clergy employ themselves so incessantly, and to which the Papists trust for the pardon of their sins, in proportion to the number of the masses which, either by favour, or money, or legacies, they procure to be said for them after their death, hath no foundation in scripture. Nay, it is an evident impety, as it proceeds on the supposition, that the offering of the body of Christ once is not sufficient to procure the pardon of sin, but must be frequently repeated.—If they reply, that their mass is only the representation and commemoration of the sacrifice of Christ, they give up the cause, and renounce an article of their faith, established by the Council of Trent, which, in Sess. xlii. Can. 1. 3. declared 'the sacrifice of the mass to be a true and proper propitiatory sacrifice for sin.' I say give up the cause; for the representation and commemoration of a sacrifice is not a sacrifice.

Farther, it cannot be affirmed that the body of Christ is offered in the mass, unless, as Whitby observes, it be said, that as often as it is offered Christ hath suffered death. For the apostle saith expressly, Heb. ix. 25. 26. that if Christ offered himself often, 'he must often have suffered since the foundation of the world.'

Theodoret, who has divided this epistle into three sections, ends his second section with this verse very properly, as it is the conclusion of the doctrinal part of the epistle.

Ver. 19.—1. Having boldness.—The word παρρησια properly signifies freedom of speech; and, by an easy figure, boldness. Here it signifies boldness arising from a firm persuasion of our title to appear before God as pardoned persons through the blood of Christ.

2. In the entrance of the holy places.—Εισαγωγη properly signifies a way into a place. By the 'holy places' here mentioned, the apostle does not mean the Jewish holy places: for into the outward tabernacle none but priests were allowed to enter; and into the inward the high-priest alone went, and that but one day in the year. The holy places, therefore, of which the apostle speaks, is heaven itself, the true holy place where the Deity dwells or manifests his presence. And the entrance into that holy place is not a figurative, but a real entrance. The figurative entrance, by prayer and other acts of worship, was enjoyed by believers from the beginning of the world; but actual admission into heaven none can have till the general judgment, Heb. ix. 8. And as it is by dying that we enter into the invisible world, death, which brings believers into that world, is fitly called the entrance or passage into the heavenly holy places; in which entrance we have obtained boldness through the blood of Jesus.—'Boldness through the blood of Jesus,' is an allusion to the boldness which the high-priest had in the entrance of the inward tabernacle, through the blood of the sacrifices which he carried in his hand. Death, considered as the way which leadeth us into the presence of God infinitely holy, to whom we must give an account of all our actions, would be very terrible to us indeed, did we not know that Jesus, by shedding his blood, hath procured the pardon of our sins. For, to use the Spectator's words, No. 513. "I must confess that I think there is no scheme of religion besides that of Christianity, which can possibly support the most virtuous person under this thought, (the thought of the judgment.) Let a man's innocence be what it will, let his virtues rise to the highest pitch of perfection attainable in this life, there will be still in him so many secret sins, so many human frailties, so many offences of ignorance, passion, and prejudice, so many unguarded words and thoughts, and, in short, so many defects in his best actions, that, without the advantage of such an expiation and stonement as Christianity has revealed to us, it is impossible that he should be cleared before his Sovereign Judge, or that he should be able to 'stand in his sight.' Our holy religion suggests to us the only means whereby our guilt may be taken away, and our imperfect obedience accepted."

Ver. 20.—1. Which entrance he hath dedicated.—Εκεινη. This word is used, Heb. ix. 18, to express the solemn ratification of the Sinaitic covenant by sacrifice. Eustatius, following the Greek commentators, says, it denotes the action of one who first applies to its use that which is new and just finished; or who restores it to its use. Accordingly he translates it, initiates, dedicates; and supposes the apostle's meaning to be, that Christ first passed this way in the body into the presence of God. But, since Christ passed into the presence of God with his body, how could he so pass through the veil of his flesh? I therefore think the apostle's meaning is, that by rending the veil of his flesh, Christ opened a way, not for himself, but for believers, to go into the presence of God after the general judgment.

2. A way new and living.—Οδον νεωτατην και ζωντανην. The word νεωτατη signifies newly slain. Here, applied to a way, it signifies newly made; consequently a way which no person had trodden till Christ prepared it. Death, as reformed by Christ, is with great propriety called a new way into the presence of God; because originally it was a way which led us from the presence of God for ever. It is also called a living way, because its nature is utterly altered,

Christ's priesthood, all believers having boldness in death, the entrance into the habitation of God, by the blood of Jesus;

20 Which entrance (εκεινη) Christ hath dedicated for us Jews and Gentiles, by making it a way new and life-giving, into the true holy place, through the veil, that is, through his flesh, by the rending of which he hath opened to us this new way;

21 Also, having a great Priest officiating in heaven, the true house of God, who presents our addresses to the Father, and is able to help us when tempted;

22 Let us worship God with a sincere heart, in full assurance of acceptance through faith in Christ's death as an effectual sin-offering; being cleansed, not in the body by the legal sprinklings, but in hearts from the terrors of an evil conscience, by repentance and by the blood of Christ;

23 And being washed in body with the clean water of baptism, whereby we professed our faith in Christ as our only High-priest, let us hold fast the confession of our hope of salvation through his ministrations, unmoved by the threats of our persecutors; for faithful is he who hath promised us pardon through Christ.

24 And, when in danger of being seduced, by the arguments, examples, and threatenings of unbelievers, let us attentively consider one another's virtues, and failings, and circumstances, that by proper motives we may excite one another to love and good works;

25 Not leaving off the assembling of ourselves together for worshipping God, as the custom of some is who are afraid of persecution from unbelievers, but exhorting one another; and this so much the more, as from the signs of the times ye see the day approaching, in which the power of your unbelieving brethren will be broken.

26 For if, terrified by the evils which attend the profession of being made by Christ the way to eternal life, instead of the way to eternal death. Astonishing! Death is become a living way; that is, a life-giving way, a way which leads to a never-ending life.

3. Through the veil, that is, his flesh.—The flesh or body of Christ is called the veil, in allusion, I suppose, to the emblematical meaning of the veil, whereby the inward tabernacle, which represented heaven the habitation of the Deity, was separated from the outward tabernacle with its court, which represented the earth the habitation of men. For, as by that veil all who frequented the outward tabernacle and its court were excluded from the inward tabernacle, so by their body or flesh all who live on earth are excluded from the habitation of the Deity. Now, since it is by virtue of our Lord's death that we, in the body, shall be admitted into the presence of God as sanctified and pardoned persons, the apostle had good reason to say, that Christ hath 'made a new and living way for us into the holy places, through the veil, that is, his flesh.'—If the miraculous rending of the veil of the temple, when our Lord expired on the cross, Matt. xxvii. 51, was intended to signify that heaven was opened to his people through the rending of his body, that circumstance likewise might lead the apostle to call Christ's body, or flesh, the veil.

Ver. 21. Priest in the house of God.—Our translators have rendered this, 'over the house,' to mark Christ's power over the church as king. But the translation I have adopted agrees better with the context, in which we are exhorted to draw nigh to God, from the consideration of our having a great Priest in heaven, the true house of God, to present our prayers, and to intercede for us.

Ver. 22. Being sprinkled in hearts from an evil conscience.—When the bodies of the Israelites were ceremonially polluted, they were to be cleansed by sprinkling them with 'the water of separation,' described Numb. xix. 2—10. But the sprinkling or cleansing here recommended by the apostle, is not of the body from ceremonial pollution, but of the heart from the terrors of a guilty conscience. This cleansing is effected, neither by water nor by the blood of beasts, but by Christ's blood shed as a sin-offering, whereby the repenting sinner hath a full assurance of pardon.

Ver. 23.—1. Being washed.—Απολουμεν. This word is commonly applied to the washing of the whole body; but καθαρομεν is to the washing of a part, such as the hands or feet. See John xiii. 10. Greek. This is an allusion to the high-priest's washing his body with water before he entered the inward tabernacle, Levit. xvi. 4. In that manner also the Levites were purified, Numb. viii. 7.

2. Confession of the hope.—The English translators, on the authority of one MS. only, read here πιστις, faith. See Mill.—The apostle in this exhortation referred to that confession of their hope of salvation through Christ, which the primitive Christians made at baptism.

Ver. 25. As ye see the day approaching.—The article in the Greek, added to the word day, shews that some illustrious day is meant; generally supposed to be the day of the destruction of the Jewish state. That day the Hebrews saw approaching, by the appearing of those signs which our Lord hath mentioned in his prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem.

Ver. 26.—1. If we sin wilfully, after having received the knowledge of the truth, &c.—Many pious but weak Christians have been greatly terrified by this text, not knowing that the apostle speaks, not of wilful sin in general, but of deliberate apostasy, manifested by the apostate's forsaking the Christian assemblies. For the description which the apostle hath given, ver. 29, of the wilful sin of which he speaks, agrees only to deliberate apostasy, which, in the first ceived the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice² for sins,

27 But some dreadful expectation of judgment,¹ and a fiery anger which shall devour the adversaries.²

28 (Τα) Any one who disregarded the law of Moses died without mercy, (Numb. xv. 30.), by two or three witnesses: (Deut. xvii. 6.)

29 Of how much sorer punishment,¹ think ye, shall he be counted worthy, who hath trampled under foot² the Son of God, and reckoned the blood of the covenant wherewith he was sanctified³ an unclean thing, and hath insulted the Spirit of grace!⁴

30 For we know him who hath said, (Deut. xxxii. 35.), Vengeance belongeth to me, I will repay,¹ saith the Lord.² And again, (ver. 36.) The Lord (αὐτος) will judge his people.³

31 It is a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.¹

32 But call to remembrance the former days, in which, being enlightened, ye sustained a great combat¹ of afflictions;

33 Partly, indeed, whilst ye were made a spectacle both by reproaches and afflictions; and partly whilst ye became companions of them who were so treated.

the gospel, we renounce it contrary to our conscience, after having attained to the knowledge and belief of the gospel, there remaineth to such persons no more sacrifice for sins;

27 But some dreadful apprehension of the judgment remaineth, and a punishment by fire, the effect of God's anger, to devour all the adversaries of God, whether secret or open.

28 The justice of never pardoning them who wilfully apostatize from the gospel, will appear to you, Hebrews, from this, That any one who presumptuously disregarded the law of Moses, though but a political law, was put to death without mercy, if convicted by two or three witnesses.

29 If so, of how much sorer punishment, think ye, shall he be counted worthy, who, by wilfully renouncing the gospel, hath trampled under foot the Son of God as an impostor, and reckoned his blood, whereby the new covenant was ratified, and the apostate himself was separated to the worship of God, the blood of one justly crucified; and hath maliciously opposed the Spirit, the author of the miraculous gifts.

30 The character of God makes the punishment of apostates certain: For we Jews know how powerful and terrible he is who hath said, Punishment belongeth to me, I will repay, saith the Lord. And again, The Lord will avenge his people of their oppressors. If so, will he not avenge his Son, and Spirit, and the disciples of his Son, of those who insult them?

31 To fall into the hands of an enraged enemy is dreadful; but it is far more dreadful to fall into the hands of the living God, whose power no enemy can resist.

32 Be not terrified by your persecutors; but, to encourage yourselves, call to remembrance the former days, in which, being newly enlightened with the gospel, ye courageously sustained, with God's assistance, a grievous persecution from your unbelieving brethren;

33 Partly, indeed, whilst ye were made a public spectacle, (see 1 Cor. iv. 9. note 2.), as malefactors in a theatre, both by the reproaches cast on you as atheists for deserting the institutions of Moses, and by the afflictions which befell you on that account; and partly, whilst ye kept company with and comforted them who were treated in the same cruel manner.

age, was of so heinous a nature, that Christ declared, he will deny the person before his Father, who hath denied him before men, Matt. x. 33.

2. There remaineth no more sacrifice for sins.]—As the apostle, in the former part of the epistle, hath proved that the sacrifices of the law were all abolished, and that the only sacrifice for sin remaining is the sacrifice of Christ, it follows, as Pierce justly observes, that apostates, who wilfully renounce the benefit of that sacrifice, have no sacrifice for sin whatever remaining to them.

Ver. 27.—1. But some dreadful expectation of judgment.]—Here the apostle lays it down as certain, that God will not pardon sinners without some sacrifice or satisfaction: For otherwise it would not follow, from there remaining to apostates no more sacrifice for sin, that there must remain to them a dreadful expectation of judgment. See Heb. ix. 26. note 1.

2. And a fiery anger which shall devour the adversaries.]—This is an allusion to the fire that came out from the Lord, and consumed the 250 men, who, in the rebellion of Korah, intruded themselves into the priest's office, Numb. xvi. 36.; and whose destruction is an emblem of the destruction of the wicked by fire at the day of judgment. 2 Thess. i. 7, 8.

Ver. 29.—1. Of how much sorer punishment.]—The sorer punishment which God will count apostates worthy of, is eternal death.

2. Trampled under foot.]—Trampling under foot is an expression of the greatest contempt; and also of rage and fury, Dan. viii. 10. Isa. lxi. 3. LXX.

3. The blood of the covenant wherewith he was sanctified.]—See Ex. iv. 8. The covenant at Sinai was made, by sprinkling the book of the law, and all the people, with the blood of the sacrifices which were offered for its ratification. When thus sprinkled, the Israelites were sanctified, or separated from idolaters, to worship the true God. In like manner, the new covenant is made on our part, by our drinking the symbol of the blood of Christ in the supper, which therefore he called 'his blood of the new covenant,' Mark xiv. 24.; and with that blood Christians were sanctified, or separated to the worship of God. Of this outward sanctification, or separation from heathens and infidels to be the visible church of God, the apostate had partaken equally with others. Some commentators, however, not understanding in what sense apostates are sanctified by the blood of the covenant, think the apostle speaks here of Christ, who they say was sanctified or separated to his mediatorial offices by his own blood or death. But in this I think they are mistaken. For Christ was made a priest after the similitude of Melchizedec by the oath of God, long before he died, that by offering himself as a sacrifice he might make atonement for the sins of the world. Farther, as Christ was not made a priest by his death, so neither was he made the mediator of the new covenant by his death. That honour was not the necessary consequence of his death; but it was bestowed on him by God as the reward of his dying to procure the new covenant.—To conclude, there are some who think the apostle in this passage speaks of the sanctification of believers by their baptism, the water of which they may represent the blood of Christ. But to this it may be replied, that nowhere else in scripture is the water of baptism spoken of as an emblem of Christ's blood.

4. Hath insulted the Spirit of grace.]—The apostle means the Holy Spirit, whose gifts were bestowed, in the first age, on believers, for the confirmation of the gospel. See Heb. vi. 4—6. Wherefore, if one apostatized, in the first age, after having been witness to the miraculous gifts, much more after having possessed them himself, he must, like the Scribes and Pharisees, have ascribed them to evil spirits; than which a greater indignity could not be done to the Spirit of God.

Ver. 30.—1. Vengeance belongeth to me, I will repay.]—Though this was originally said of the idolatrous nations who oppressed the Israelites, it was very properly applied by the apostle to apostates, being a general maxim of God's government, according to which he will act in all cases where vengeance or punishment is due.

2. Saith the Lord.]—These words are neither in the Hebrew text nor in the LXX. translation; but they are added by the apostle, to shew that they were spoken by God.—Examples of this method of quoting the scriptures, we have Rom. xiv. 11. 2 Cor. vi. 17.

3. The Lord will judge his people.]—The context in the Old Testament leads to the explanation given in the commentary, ver. 36. 'The Lord shall judge his people, and repent himself for his servants, when he seeth that their power is gone.' Besides, in other passages, to judge signifies to avenge. Thus, when Rachel bare Dan, she said, Gen. xxx. 6. 'God hath judged me.' In like manner David, Psal. xlii. 1. 'Judge me, O God, and plead my cause against an ungodly nation.'

Ver. 31. Hands of the living God.]—Commentators observe, that the epithet of living is given to God in this passage, where his vengeance is spoken of, to shew, that as he lives for ever, he can punish for ever; a consideration which adds to the terribleness of his vengeance.

Ver. 32. A great combat of afflictions.]—There were various persecutions of the Christians in Judea; particularly the great persecution after the death of Stephen, Acts viii. 1. and Herod's persecution, Acts xii. 1. Perhaps the apostle here refers to the persecution mentioned 1 Thess. ii. 14. in which the Hebrews shewed great love to their suffering brethren, Heb. vi. 10.—Their enduring this persecution with fortitude and patience, the apostle calls πάλαν ἀσκήσις, a great combat; to signify, that the combat which the disciples of Jesus maintained against their persecutors, was more difficult and dangerous, and at the same time more honourable, than any of the combats in the games.

34 For ye even suffered with me in my bonds,¹ and the spoiling of your goods ye took with joy, knowing in yourselves² that ye have a better substance in heaven, even a permanent SUBSTANCE.

35 Wherefore, cast not away your boldness, which hath a great retribution.

36 Ye have need, however, of perseverance, (see 1 Thess. i. 3. note), that when ye have done the will of God, ye may receive the promise.

37 For yet a very little while, and he who is coming¹ will come, and will not tarry.

38 Now, the just by faith shall live.¹ (Kai eis) But if he draw back, my soul will not be well pleased with him.²

39 But we are not of them who draw back unto destruction, but of faith (αἱ ἀγαθὰς) to the salvation of the soul, Matt. x. 39.

Ver. 34.—1. Ye even suffered with me in my bonds.]—To suffer with others, is to feel grief on account of their sufferings, and to expose one's self to trouble in relieving them. These charitable offices the Jewish believers performed to the apostle, during his two years imprisonment in Jerusalem and in Cæsarea.—The Alexandrian, and Clermont MSS., two of Stephen's MSS., and the St. Germ. Lat. read here τὸν Ἰησοῦν, 'with the prisoner.' The Syriac version hath 'Et doluit vobis propter eos qui vincit erant.' Also the Vulgate, 'Et vinctis compassi estis.' This reading Estius, Grotius, Wetstein, Mill, Bengelius, and others, approve. Nevertheless, as the common reading is supported by the greatest number of ancient MSS., the other reading, though found in the MSS. and versions above mentioned, is of the less authority, that the Alexandrian, St. Germain, and some other copies, were very early corrected by the Vulgate version, as was shewed, Gen. Pref. p. 2.—For these reasons I think the common reading is genuine, and ought to be retained: especially as the other reading may have been introduced into the Vulgate and other versions by some one in the early ages, who thought St. Paul was not the author of the epistle to the Hebrews.

2. Knowing in yourselves.]—This may be explained by Rom. viii. 16, 17. Or the translation may run thus: 'Knowing that ye have for yourselves a better substance, better goods and possessions, in heaven.'

Ver. 37. He who is coming will come.]—Though the apostle in this verse uses some words of the prophet Habakkuk, chap. ii. 3. he doth not introduce them as a quotation from him containing a prophecy of any coming of Christ. This being the case, the commentators might have spared the pains they have taken to shew that these words, as they stand in Habakkuk, may be interpreted of Christ's coming to destroy Jerusalem. In the passage where they are found, the prophet exhorted the Jews to trust in God for deliverance from the Chaldeans, by putting them in mind of the faithfulness of God in performing his promises concerning the continuance of their nation, and of his power to preserve them during the Babylonish captivity, and to restore them to their own land. Wherefore, as the faithfulness and power of God are a source of consolation, to which good men at all times may have recourse in 34 For ye even suffered with me in my bonds, both at Jerusalem and at Cæsarea, and the loss of your goods ye took with joy, because ye were inwardly persuaded that ye have a better substance laid up for you in heaven, even a permanent substance, which cannot be taken from you either by force or by fraud.

35 Wherefore, having formerly behaved so bravely, cast not away your boldness now, as cowardly soldiers cast away their shields, and run in the day of battle; which courage, maintained to the end, will have a great reward in heaven.

36 Ye must however have perseverance as well as courage, that when ye have done the will of God, by enduring to the end, ye may receive the accomplishment of Christ's promise, Matt. xxiv. 13. to save you from your enemies.

37 The persecution will not last long: For, to use the words of Habakkuk, ii. 3. in a very short time he who is coming will come, and destroy the Jewish state, and will not tarry; and then your brethren shall cease from persecuting you.

38 Live in the firm belief of these things, for (Hab. ii. 4.) the just by faith shall live. But if he draw back, if he loseth his faith, God's soul will not be well pleased with him.

39 But I am persuaded we are not of the number of those who draw back from Christ, unto their own destruction; but of those who live by faith, so as to obtain the salvation of the soul.

their distresses, the apostle might with great propriety apply Habakkuk's words, by way of accommodation, to Christ's coming to destroy Jerusalem and the Jewish state. Christ had promised to come for that purpose, before the generation then living went off the stage. Now, as the believing Hebrews could entertain no doubt of his faithfulness and power to perform his promise, the apostle, to encourage them to bear their afflictions with patience, very fitly put them in mind of that event in the words of the prophet Habakkuk, because it assured them that the power of their persecutors would soon be at an end.—It is observed by commentators, that ὁ ἐρχόμενος, he who is coming, is the appellation given by the Jews to Messiah: Matt. xii. 3. 'Art thou he (ὁ ἐρχόμενος) who should come? or look we for another?'—Matt. xxi. 9. 'Blessed is he (ὁ ἐρχόμενος) who cometh in the name of the Lord.'

Ver. 38.—1. Now, the just by faith shall live, &c.]—See Rom. i. 17. note 3.—In Habakkuk the passage is, 'Himne guphla lo jasher naphabo bo, vetzaddick beemunatho jilje;' which our translators have rendered thus: 'Behold, the soul which is lifted up is not upright within him; but the just shall live by his faith.' Pococke however affirms, that the apostle hath given the true translation of the passage; for one of the senses of guphla is, he who faints. Thus, Jonah, iv. 8. vejaithnaleph signifies 'he fainted, or his spirit withdrew.'—Isaiah li. 20. 'My sons (gnullepha) have fainted.' Farther, he observes that jasher, among other things, signifies to please; and that the LXX. have translated it by the word εὐαρεστησεν, to please, Numb. xxiii. 27. and elsewhere. See Kircher's Concord. According to these remarks, the passage may be translated as the apostle hath done: 'Behold, he who faints (so εὐαρεστησεν signifies, Scap) shall not please his (God's) soul: But the just by his faith shall live.'—In this passage, the prophet, as well as the apostle, speaks of the efficacy of faith to support and comfort a man under temptations and afflictions, in such a manner, that he neither faints in the combat, nor withdraws from it. See Rom. i. 17. note 3.

2. My soul will not be well pleased with him.]—In Habakkuk's prophecy this clause stands before the clause, 'the just by faith shall live.' But the apostle altered the order of the clauses, for the sake of subjoining the observation in ver. 39.

CHAPTER XI.

View and Illustration, of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

THE apostle, in the end of the foregoing chapter, after mentioning the persecutions to which the Hebrews were exposed, had comforted them by suggesting a remarkable saying of the prophet Habakkuk; 'The just by faith shall live.' In this chapter he illustrates that saying, by bringing into the view of the Hebrews examples from their own scriptures, of persons who, by a strong faith in God and in his promises, resisted the greatest temptations, sustained the heaviest persecutions, were preserved in imminent dangers, performed the most difficult acts of obedience, and at length obtained a distinguished reward. This beautiful discourse, therefore, may be considered as an animated display of the triumphs of faith over the allurements and terrors of the world.

And, first of all, to shew that this noble grace of faith is attainable by men in every age and country, the apostle tells us, that it consists in such a firm persuasion of the things which God hath declared and promised, as clothes them with an evidence equal to that of sense, ver. 1.—and as examples of this faith in the declarations of God, Abel, Enoch, and Noah, are mentioned, who were all so firmly persuaded of the truth of the things made known to them by God, that they regulated the whole tenor of their lives by them, ver. 3-7.—Next, as an illustrious example of faith in the promises of God, the apostle mentions Abraham, who left his native country and kindred at God's command, and set out for a land which he was afterwards to inherit, not knowing whither he was going. And being come into the promised country, he lived there all his life, with his children Isaac and Jacob, the joint heirs of the same promise, as in a land belonging to other people; because he knew that it was promised to him chiefly as the type and pledge of a better country, ver. 9, 10.—In like manner Sarah, Abraham's wife, to whom God promised that she should be 'the mother of nations,' lived long in the faith of that promise, though it was not performed to her till she was ninety years old, when she brought forth Isaac, who became the father of children innumerable, ver. 11, 12.—All these patriarchs died without receiving the country that was promised to them, yet they died in the faith that they should receive it; and, by confessing themselves strangers and pilgrims on the earth, they declared, that in the promise they looked for a better country than Canaan, even an heavenly country; consequently, that they expected to be raised from the dead to enjoy that better country. See Essay v. Sect. 3. art. 4. ver. 13-16.—Moreover, Abraham, when tried by the command to offer up Isaac, the very son for whom he had waited so long, and by whom he was to have the numerous seed, obeyed without hesitation, firmly believing that after his son was burnt to ashes on the altar, God would raise him from the dead, ver. 17-19.—The same Isaac, and his son Jacob, and his grandson Joseph, when dying, expressed the strongest faith in the promise of God. Particularly Joseph did so: For before his death he commanded the Israelites, at their departure from Egypt, to carry his bones with them into Canaan, ver. 20-23.

Farther, the apostle describes the faith of the Israelites in Egypt; and especially of Moses, who, although educated in the court of Egypt, when he came of age, through the faith which he had in God's promises to Abraham and to his seed, refused to be called any longer the son of Pharaoh's daughter, and thereby at once renounced all the grandeur and pleasures of the court of Egypt, which, as the son of Pharaoh's daughter, he might have enjoyed; choosing rather to be evil treated with the people of God, than to enjoy the temporary pleasures of sin, ver. 23-26.—By faith Moses carried the Israelites out of Egypt, not afraid of the wrath of Pharaoh, who pursued them with the armies of Egypt, ver. 27, 28.—By the same principle, the Israelites were emboldened to pass through the Red Sea, which the Egyptians essaying to do, were drowned, ver. 29.—And with respect to the Israelites who entered into Canaan, although their fathers disbelieved and disobeyed God in the wilderness, they went round Jericho sounding their trumpets, in the firm faith that the walls thereof would fall down by miracle, according to God's promise, ver. 30.—By faith also Rahab received the Israelitish spies in peace, and did not perish with the unbelievers when Jericho was sacked, ver. 31.

Many likewise of the Israelitish judges, prophets, and kings, were most remarkable for their faith. But because to speak of every individual separately would have been tedious, the apostle introduces them in one group; and, in a noble strain of eloquence, celebrates their fortitude, their victories, and their rewards, all obtained through the influence of their faith, ver. 32-34.—Not forgetting to mention some women, whose faith was honoured with particular marks of the divine approbation, ver. 35.—And having thus praised the ancient worthies, for the great actions which they performed through faith in God and in his promises, and for the signal deliverances which they obtained, the apostle speaks with equal rapture of the reproaches, afflictions, persecutions, tortures, and deaths, which others in later times endured for the sake of religion; so that they were as illustrious for their passive, as the former were for their active virtues, ver. 35-38.

His animated description St. Paul finishes with observing, that the patriarchs, and kings, and prophets, and righteous men, whose heroic actions, and suffering virtues, and great deliverances, he had celebrated, have not yet obtained the promised inheritance. But he accounts for the delay by informing us, that it is God's intention to reward the whole spiritual seed of Abraham at once, by introducing them all in a body into the heavenly country, after the resurrection and judgment; because in this open manner to put them in possession of the inheritance, in the faith of which they lived and died, will render the dispensations of God to mankind, and his power and veracity in the performance of his promises, most illustrious in the eyes of the whole universe, ver. 39-40.

This admirable discourse, though more immediately designed for the instruction and consolation of the Hebrews, is most valuable on account of its use to the church in every age. For, in the first place, By putting us in mind that Abel was declared a righteous person by God himself, that Enoch pleased God, and that Noah became 'an heir of the righteousness which is by faith,' we are taught, that the justification of mankind by faith did not begin in Abraham, but was the method appointed for the salvation of sinners from the beginning of the world.—Secondly, By shewing that faith hath for its object, not the discoveries of revelation alone, but the manifestations also of the will of God made by reason and conscience, the apostle hath displayed the Catholic nature and influence of faith, and hath taught us that men of all ages and countries, and under all dispensations, may obtain such a degree of faith as is pleasing to God. This instruction was very necessary to those of the Hebrews who were unwilling to allow that the Gentiles might be saved by faith, without obedience to the law of Moses.—Thirdly, By celebrating the great actions and sufferings of the ancients, the apostle hath taught us, that faith is by no means an inoperative speculative belief of the doctrines, whether of natural or of revealed religion, but an active principle, which leads to the greatest fortitude in doing, and patience in suffering, every thing which God commands: in which account of faith Paul is supported by James, who hath in so many words taught that 'faith without works is dead.'—Fourthly, By calling faith 'the confidence of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen,' we are taught, that it is faith which gives to the invisable and distant things of the life to come, set forth in the promises of God, the power of operating upon our mind as if they were actually present to our senses.—Lastly, From the account here given of the faith of Abraham, and of his immediate descendants, we learn, that these ancient patriarchs knew that the promise of giving to 'Abraham and to his seed all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession,' was a promise, not of the earthly country alone, but of a far better country, even an heavenly, of which the earthly country was only a type and a pledge; and that, as they all died in the firm expectation of inheriting that better country, they died in the belief of their resurrection from the dead. Wherefore the views and expectations of the people of God, even in the most ancient times, though not so full and clear, were not in substance different from the views and expectations which believers now entertain through the more perfect revelation of the gospel.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. XI.—1 Now faith is the (πιστις) confidence¹ of things hoped for,² AND (αρετης)

Ver. 1.—1. Faith is the confidence.]—So our translators have rendered the word πιστις, Heb. iii. 14. But the Greek commentators, taking the word in its etymological meaning, explain the clause

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. XI.—1 Now the faith of the just who shall live, is the firm persuasion of the reality of the blessings hoped for in consequence of thus: Faith gives a present subsistence to the future things which are hoped for.

the evidence³ of things not seen.⁴

4 By faith¹ Abel offered to God more sacrifice² than Cain, on account of which he was testified to be righteous;³ God testifying THIS upon his gifts:⁴ (xai, 212.) and so by it, (αὐδωσας, 16.) though dead, he still speaketh.⁵

resurrection of the body, the creation of the new heavens and the new earth, the introduction of believers into the heavenly country, and their possessing its joys for ever.—Here it is proper to remark, that hope hath for its object only the things promised; whereas, besides these, faith hath for its objects all the declarations of God concerning things not seen.

3. And the evidence.]—The word ἀποδείξεις denotes a strict proof or demonstration; a proof which thoroughly convinces the understanding, and determines the will. The apostle's meaning is, that faith answers all the purposes of a demonstration, because, being founded on the veracity and power of God, these perceptions are to the believer complete evidence of the things which God declares have happened, or are to happen, however much they may be out of the ordinary course of nature.

4. Of things not seen.]—These, as distinguished from the 'things brought forth,' are the creation of the world without any pre-existing matter to form it; of the destruction of the old world by the deluge, ver. 7; the glory which Christ had with his Father before the world began, his miraculous conception in the womb of his mother, his resurrection from the dead, his exaltation in the human nature to the government of the universe; the sin and punishments of the angels, &c.—all which we believe, on the testimony of God, as firmly as if they were set before us by the evidence of sense.

Ver. 2. The elders.]—ἡμετέραν here does not denote an office, as in some other places of scripture, but merely persons who lived in ancient times. In this sense the word is used Matt. xv. 2. Mark vii. 3.

Ver. 3.—1. We understand that the worlds.]—Τὰς αἰώνας, literally, aeons, the ages. See Eph. ii. 2 note 1. But the subsequent clause, 'so that the things which are seen were not made of things which did appear,' determines its signification to the material fabric of the worlds, comprehending the sun, moon, stars, and earth, (called by Moses the heaven and the earth, Gen. i. 1.) by whose duration and revolutions, time, consisting of days, and months, and years, and ages, is measured.

2. Were produced.]—Ἐκτίσθησαν. Although κατασκευάζει properly signifies to place the parts of any body or machine in their right order, Eph. iv. 12 note 1, it also signifies to make or produce simply. Thus, Heb. x. 5. Σωμὴ κατασκευάσθαι, 'Thou hast made a body for me.' Matt. xxi. 16. 'Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings (κατασκευάσθη) thus hath produced praise.' That in the passage under consideration this word is used to express, not the orderly disposition of the parts of the universe, but their production, is plain from what follows in the verse. See note 4.

3. By the command of God.]—Ἐν λόγῳ Θεοῦ. See Luke v. 5. Matt. iv. 4. where ἐν λόγῳ, a word spoken, signifies a command. Further, ἐν λόγῳ is nowhere in scripture used to denote the Son of God. His proper title is ὁ ῥητορ, the word.—That the worlds were made by the command of God, is one of the unseen things which cannot be known but by revelation. It is therefore supposed that the apostle refers here to Gen. i. 3. 6. where God said, 'Let there be light, and there was light,' &c. and to Psal. xxxiii. 6. 9.

4. So that the things which are seen were not made of things which did appear.]—This is a literal translation of the original, which in construction stands thus: οὐκ ἐκ τῶν ὁρατῶν καὶ γινώσκονται τὰ φαινόμενα. But Hallet, in his additions to Pierce's notes on the Hebrews, thinks the passage should be translated, 'to the end that the things which are seen, may not have been (that is, may not seem to have been) of things that do appear.' The two translations differ chiefly in this, that the second one represents the worlds as produced by the word of God, for the purpose of shewing 'that the things which are seen, were not made of things which do appear'; that is, were not made of matter which existed before the worlds were produced by the word of God; whereas the translation which I have given, represents the same truth as following from the worlds being produced by the word of God; but with this advantage, that it does not require the elliptical supplement to the words κατασκευάσθη found in Hallet's translation. Besides, it is equally literal with his. For οὐκ with an infinitive, doth not always mark the end for which a thing is done, but sometimes expresses the consequence of a thing's being done.—And with respect to the word φαινόμενα, seeing it is the participle both of the present and of the imperfect of the indicative, it signifies which did appear; and should be so translated in this verse, because it clearly represents the apostle's meaning to God's promise, and the evidence of the matters of fact not seen, which revelation informs us have happened, or are yet to happen in the world.

2 And for this faith the ancients, namely Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, and the rest, were borne witness to by God, as justified and accepted persons.

3 By faith in the divine revelations, we understand that the worlds were produced by the command of God from nothing; so that the things which are seen, the things which compose this visible world, were not made of things which then did exist, but without any pre-existent matter to form them of.

4 By faith, by rightly understanding and believing what was said concerning the seed of the woman's bruising the head of the serpent, Abel offered to God more sacrifice than Cain: For with an humble penitent heart he offered a sin-offering, on account of which he was declared to be righteous; God testifying this upon his gifts: and so by that sacrifice, though dead, Abel still speaketh, recommending to us repentance, humility, and faith.

5 By faith Enoch, having lived in a continued course of piety, be as follows:—By revelation we understand that the worlds, namely, the sun, moon, and stars, with the earth and its appurtenances, were brought into being by the word of God: So that the things which are seen, (the worlds), were not made of things which did appear before they were made;—that is, the worlds which we see were not made of matter which had existed from eternity, but of matter which God created and formed into the things which we see; and having formed them, he placed them in the beautiful order which they now hold, and impressed on them the motions proper to each, which they have retained ever since.—This account of the origin of things given by revelation, is very different from the cosmogony of the heathen philosophers, who generally held that the matter of which the worlds are composed is uncreated and eternal; consequently, being independent of God and not obedient to his will, they supposed it to be the occasion of all the evil that is in the world. But revelation, which teaches us that the things which are seen were not made of matter which did appear before they were made, but of matter which God then brought into existence, by thus establishing the sovereignty of God over matter, hath enlarged our ideas of his power, and strengthened our faith in his promises concerning the felicity of good men in the life to come. For the creation of the new heavens and the new earth, and the glories of the city of the living God, do not to their formation require more power than the creation of the present universe; and therefore, if we believe that the worlds were formed by the word of God from nothing, every other exercise of faith will be easy to us.

Ver. 4.—1. By faith Abel offered.]—The apostle's affirmation, that Abel offered his sacrifice by faith, implies that he offered it by divine appointment: and, being a sacrifice of the firstlings of his flock, it was not, like Cain's, a eucharistical sacrifice, but a sacrifice for sin; the sacrifices of beasts being commonly offered as sin-offerings.

2. Offered to God (ἐλάττωσεν Θεῷ) more sacrifice.]—In this translation I have followed the critics, who tell us that ἐλάττωσεν, in the comparative degree, signifies more in number rather than more in value. Accordingly they observe, that notwithstanding Cain ought to have offered a sin-offering, he brought only 'of the fruit of the ground an offering to the Lord,' which was no proper sacrifice. But Abel, 'he also brought of the firstlings of his flock, and of the fat thereof': that is, besides the fruit of the ground, which was one of his gifts mentioned in the following verse, he also brought the fattest of the firstlings of his flock; so that he offered a sin-offering as well as a meat-offering, and thereby shewed both his sense of the divine goodness and of his own sinfulness. Whereas Cain, having no sense of sin, thought himself obliged to offer nothing but a meat-offering; and made it perhaps not of the first-fruits, or of the best of the fruits.

3. Testified to be righteous.]—In this character of Abel, Paul had our Lord's expression in his eye, Matt. xxiii. 35. 'the blood of righteous Abel.'

4. God testifying this upon his gifts.]—We are told, Gen. iv. 4. that 'the Lord had respect to Abel and to his offering'; 5. But to Cain and to his offering he had not respect. And Cain was very wroth.—Moses does not say in what manner God testified his respect to Abel and to his offering; but from Cain's being very wroth, we may believe it was by some outward visible sign. Wherefore, as in after-times God testified his acceptance of particular sacrifices, by sending down fire upon them, Gen. xv. 17. Lev. ix. 24. Judges vi. 21. we may suppose it was in that manner he testified Abel's righteousness upon his offering.—God's acceptance of Abel's sin-offering is a proof that propitiatory sacrifice was of divine appointment, otherwise his offering being will worship, must have been offensive to God, and rejected. Besides, as Hallet observes, flesh not being permitted to men till after the flood, Abel must have thought it unlawful to kill any animal, unless God had ordered it to be killed as a sacrifice.

5. He still speaketh.]—Hallet thinks the apostle alludes to Gen. iv. 10. where God said to Cain, 'The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground'; and that the meaning is, Abel's blood still crieth for vengeance against all murderers, and especially against those who persecute good men to death for righteousness sake, which was Cain's sin. But ἡ ἀνάκλησις cannot stand for ἀνάκλησις, which is a neuter word, but for ὑπόμνησις: 'By that sacrifice Abel, though dead still speaketh.'

might not see death, and was not found,² because God had translated him; for before his translation it was testified that he pleased God.³

6 But without faith¹ it is impossible to please God. For he who worshippeth God, must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them who diligently seek him.²

7 By faith Noah, when he received a revelation (see Heb. viii. 5. note 2.) concerning things not at all seen, (ver. 1.), being seized with religious fear, prepared an ark¹ for the salvation² of his family, by which³ he condemned the world,⁴ and became an heir⁵ of the righteousness which is by faith.

8 By faith Abraham, when called¹ to go out into a place which he should afterwards receive as an inheritance,² obeyed, and went out, not knowing whither he was going.

9 By faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as belonging to others, dwelling in tents¹ with Isaac and Jacob, the joint heirs of the same promise :

Ver. 5.—1. By faith Enoch.]—Moses, by telling us that 'Enoch walked with God,' shews us that his faith consisted in an habitual recollection of the being and perfections of God, and in a constant sense of the divine presence. See ver. 27.

2. And was not found.]—This implies, that Enoch was privately translated, as Elijah afterwards was, 2 Kings ii. 17. and that his relations and friends searched for him, but did not find him.—The place to which these good men were translated is not told. But their translation in the body is recorded for an example, to assure believers that in due time they also shall live in the heavenly country in the body.—Enoch's translation by faith is mentioned by the apostle, not to raise in believers an expectation of being translated into heaven, as he was, without dying, but to excite them to imitate his faith, in the assurance of being admitted into heaven in the body after the resurrection.

3. For before his translation it was testified that he pleased God.]—The apostle's account of Enoch is formed on Gen. v. 24. 'Enoch walked with God, and he was not, for God took him,' which the LXX. have thus rendered, Και περιεβόησεν Εnoch τῷ Θεῷ καὶ οὐκ εὐρέσθητο, διότι μετέθηκεν αὐτὸν ὁ Θεός; 'And Enoch pleased God, and was not found, because God had translated him.' This rendering the apostle hath adopted, because although it be not literal, it is sufficiently exact. For, 1. The Hebrews expressed that virtuous conduct in men which is pleasing to God, by the phrase of their 'walking with God'; as we learn from the account which Moses hath given of Noah's walking with God, Gen. vi. 9. 'And Noah was a just man, and perfect in his generations, and Noah walked with God.' Wherefore, when the apostle tells us it was testified of Enoch before his translation that he 'pleased God,' he in effect repeated Moses's testimony, that before his translation Enoch 'walked with God.'—2. The LXX. by saying Enoch 'was not found, because God had translated him,' have only completed the elliptical expression he was not, which Moses hath used; he was not found on earth.—3. Moses, by saying 'God took him,' plainly means that God took Enoch away from the earth in the body. This the LXX. and the apostle have very properly expressed by the phrase, 'translated him.'—To sit Enoch for his new state, his body, no doubt, was changed in the manner the bodies of the righteous will be, who at the second coming of Christ are alive on the earth.

Ver. 6.—1. But without faith, &c.]—The apostle, after his account of Enoch's pleasing God, adds, 'But without faith it is impossible to please God,' to shew, that though no particular revelation is mentioned, which Enoch is said to have believed, yet from Moses telling us that he walked with, or pleased God, it is certain that his faith in the doctrines of religion discoverable by the light of nature, and which are mentioned in this verse, must have been very strong, since it led him habitually to walk with God so as to please him.

2. Must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them who diligently seek him.]—By representing the existence of God, and his government of the world, as objects of faith, the apostle hath taught us, that the truths of natural religion are equally the objects of faith with the truths of revelation. And his doctrine is just. For the evidence by which the truths of natural religion are supported being of the same kind with the evidence which supports the truths of revelation, namely, not demonstrative but probable evidence, the was translated in the body from this earth, the habitation of sinners, to heaven, that he might not see death, and was not found, because God had translated him on account of his singular virtue. For before his translation it was testified by Moses, that he walked with God.

6 But without faith it is impossible, in any dispensation of religion, to please God. For he who worshippeth God acceptably, must believe that he exists, and that he will reward all them who sincerely worship and obey him, and who persevere in piety and obedience to the end of their life.

7 By faith Noah, when he received a revelation concerning the destruction of the world by a deluge, a thing which no man had ever seen, being seized with religious fear, prepared an ark, according to God's command, for the saving of his family; by which religious fear he condemned the inhabitants of the old world, to whom, without success, he preached the revelation which had been made to himself, (2 Pet. ii. 5.), and became an heir of the righteousness of faith; of which his temporal deliverance was a pledge. See Esa. vi. sect. 3.

8 By faith in the divine promises Abraham, when called to go out from his kindred and country, namely, Ur of the Chaldees, into a land which he should afterwards receive as an inheritance, obeyed, and relying on the power and veracity of God, went out, although he did not know the country to which he was going; nor whether it was a good or bad country.

9 By believing that Canaan was promised to him and to his seed only as the type of a better country, he acquired no possessions in Canaan except a burying-place, and built no houses there, but sojourned in the land which was promised to him as in a country belonging to others, dwelling in moveable tents with Isaac and Jacob, the joint heirs of the same promise :

persuasion produced by that kind of evidence in matters of natural religion, is as really faith as the persuasion which the same evidence produces in matters of revelation.—Further, the faith of persuasion of the truths of natural religion which men attain, being as much the effect of attention, impartial search, and prayer, as the faith which they attain of the truths of revelation, it is as much a matter of duty, and as pleasing to God, as the faith of the truths of revelation. See the View prefixed to Rom. ii. paragr. 10. and Essay vi. sect. 3.

Ver. 7.—1. Prepared an ark.]—Hallet thinks the ark, whose bottom was flat, and which had no helm, was conducted by the same extraordinary providence which sent the deluge; and perhaps by the ministry of angels.

2. For the salvation of his family.]—Σωτηρίας. Here salvation denotes a temporal deliverance.

3. By which.]—Δι᾽ ἧς. The gender of the relative permits it to stand either for Noah's faith, or for the ark which he prepared.—Eedius, following Erasmus and the Greek commentators, understands it of the ark: 'By which ark, he' not only saved his family, but 'condemned the world.' But I rather suppose it; refers to δικαιοσύνης, the noun included in the verb εὐλογοῦν.

4. He condemned the world.]—Persons are said to condemn those against whom they furnish matter of accusation and condemnation. See Tit. iii. 11. It seems the antediluvians, to whom Noah preached the revelation which had been made to him concerning the destruction of the world by a deluge, 2 Pet. ii. 5. instead of being moved with fear, turned the whole into ridicule.

5. And became an heir of the righteousness which is by faith.]—This I think shews that δικαιοσύνη, in the former clause, does not mean by which ark: For the apostle would hardly say that Noah by the ark became an heir of the righteousness which is by faith. He became an heir of that righteousness by his religious fear, which led him to build the ark.—Heir here signifies possessor of the righteousness by faith. The faith of Noah is proposed for our imitation, to assure us that they who believe and obey God shall be safe in the midst of a fallen world, while the wicked shall be condemned and destroyed.

Ver. 8.—1. Abraham, when called.]—This call is not mentioned in the history. Yet it is certain that Abraham left Chaldaea by the call of God; for God said to him, Gen. xv. 7. 'I am the Lord that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees.' Wherefore our translation of Gen. xii. 1. is just: Now the Lord had said to Abraham, &c.

2. Obeyed and went out.]—The obedience of Abraham teaches us to be willing to depart from this world at God's command, though ignorant of the world we are going to; judging it sufficient that we know it is a country which God has promised as the inheritance of his people.

Ver. 9. Dwelling in tents with Isaac and Jacob.]—The apostle does not mean that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, dwelt together in one family and one place all the time they were in Canaan; for at the time Jacob was born, Abraham and Isaac had separate habitations; but he means, that, while in Canaan, they all dwelt in tents.—By applying this observation to Isaac and Jacob, as well as to Abraham, the apostle praises their faith likewise. For since Canaan belonged to them as joint heirs with their father, by dwelling

10 For he expected the city¹ having foundations, (αἱ) of which CTR the builder and (ἀρχιτέκτων) ruler² is God.³

11 By faith even Sarah herself¹ received strength for the conception of seed,² and brought forth when past the time of age, because she judged him faithful who had promised.

12 And therefore there sprang from one, (καὶ, 219.) who was dead¹ to these matters, A RACE as the stars of heaven in multitude, and as the sand which is on the sea-shore, which is innumerable. (See Eze. v. sect. 2.)

13 All these¹ died in faith,² (οἱ πάντες, 16.) though they did not receive the things promised;³ (ἀλλὰ, 78.) For, seeing them afar off,⁴ and being persuaded of them, and embracing them,⁵ (καὶ, 219.) they confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth.⁶

14 (Tag, 97.) Now they who speak such things plainly declare, that (πατέρας ἐκζητοῦντες) they earnestly seek THEIR father's country.¹

15 (Καὶ, 207.) For truly, if they had re-there in tents as sojourners, they showed that they also knew the true meaning of the promise, and looked for a better country than Canaan.

Ver. 10.—1. He expected the city.]—The city which Abraham expected was that promised Gen. xlii. 17. 'They seed shall possess the gate (the city) of their enemies.' Now, as the promises had all a figurative, as well as a literal meaning, the enemies of Abraham's seed were not the Canaanites alone, the enemies of his natural seed, whose cities were given them by this promise, but the enemies of his spiritual seed, the evil angels, by whose temptation sin and death have been introduced and continued among mankind. If so, 'the gate (or city) of their enemies,' which Abraham's spiritual seed is to possess, strip of the metaphor, is the state and felicity from which the evil angels fell. This city is mentioned, Heb. xii. 22, under the name of 'the heavenly Jerusalem;' and by the description there given of it we learn, that believers, after the judgment, shall all be joined in one society or community with the angels, called 'a city which hath firm foundations,' because it is a community which is never to be dissolved.

2. Of which city the builder and ruler.]—The word τεκτων, translated builder, denotes one who constructs any house or machine; an architect. But the other word, ἀρχιτέκτων, signifies one who forms a people by institutions and laws. Hence the expression in Aristot. Polit. 2. ἀρχιτέκτων τῶν νόμων. Or, because they were called ἀρχιτέκτων, by the Greeks, who were set over the people, and managed their affairs, the apostle joins this term to the other, to shew that God is both the founder and the ruler of that great community of which the spiritual seed of Abraham is to make a part.

3. Is God.]—From God's being both the founder and ruler of the city which the seed of Abraham are to possess, it may justly be inferred, that the glory, security, privileges, and pleasures of their state are such, that in comparison of them the advantages and security found in any city or commonwealth on earth are nothing, and but of a moment's duration.

Ver. 11.—1. By faith even Sarah herself, &c.]—Though Sarah, standing behind the tent door, laughed when she heard the angel, whom she took to be a man, say she should bear a son, as thinking the thing impossible at her time of life; yet when he made her sensible he was an angel, by discovering what she had said within herself on that occasion, and by promising to return to her according to the time of life, she no longer doubted, but firmly believed God's promise. Hence the propriety of the expression, 'By faith even Sarah herself.'

2. Strength for the conception of seed.]—Σὺς καταβόλῃς σπέρμα. The Greeks used the word καταβόλῃς to denote the throwing of seed on the earth, or of stones into the foundation of a building. Hence the phrase, Heb. iv. 3. οὗ καταβόλῃς θεμελίον, 'from the foundation or formation of the world.' Sarah obtained strength for receiving and nourishing seed thrown into her womb. Wherefore, the phrase οὗ καταβόλῃς σπέρμα, which literally signifies 'for throwing in of seed,' is properly translated, 'received strength for the conception of seed.' Vulg. In conceptione seminis.

Ver. 12. Of one who was dead to these matters.]—Καὶ νεκρὸς ἵνα ἄνθρωπος ὅστις μὴ ἀποβῇ ὑπὸ τῷ πρὸς τὸν θεόν. See 2 Cor. ii. 16.—To the apostle's account of Abraham it is objected, that he had many children after this by Keturah. But we may suppose with Hallet, that, in giving the history of Keturah, Moses, as in other instances, and as is often done by the best historians, did not observe the order of time; but gave an account of Sarah and Isaac as the principal persons, and finished his account of them before he spoke of Keturah and her sons. On this supposition, Hallet thinks Abraham took Keturah as his concubine before he left Haran; and that her children are the souls which it is said, Gen. xli. 5, 'he had gotten in Haran;' and that the eldest of these sons was the 'one born in his house,' whom he considered as his heir, Gen. xv. 3. before he had any children by Sarah. Hallet adds, that Sarah did not look on Keturah's son as her's, because she was Abraham's slave; and 10 For he expected the city having firm foundations, of which city the builder and lawgiver is God; consequently a city more magnificent and happy than any city on earth.

11 By faith in God's promise, even Sarah herself, though at first she thought the matter impossible, received strength for the conception of seed, and brought forth a son when past the age of child-bearing; because she at length attained the strongest persuasion of the faithfulness and power of him who had promised her a son.

12 And therefore, by her, there sprang from one, namely Abraham, who on account of his great age was absolutely unfit for procreating children, a race as the stars of heaven in multitude, and as the sand upon the sea-shore, which is innumerable, agreeably to God's promises to him, recorded Gen. xv. 5. xxii. 17.

13 All these died in faith, though they did not receive the blessings promised: For, desecrating them afar off, and being persuaded of their certainty, and embracing them with ardent desire, they confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims in the land of Canaan, and on the earth itself. See Gen. xxiii. 4. xlvii. 9.

14 Now persons who spake in this manner plainly declared, that they did not consider Canaan as the country principally meant in God's promise, but that they earnestly sought to go to their father's country; the country which God promised to their fathers.

15 And they by no means wished to go back to Chaldaea: For therefore, when she despaired of having children of her own, she gave Abraham her slave Hagar, whose children, according to the manners of those times, she would regard as her own: Gen. xvi. 2. 'I pray thee go in unto my maid: it may be that I may obtain children by her.'—And with respect to what is said, Gen. xxv. 1, which in our translation runs thus, 'Then again Abraham took a wife, and her name was Keturah,' Hallet saith in the Hebrew text it is, 'And Abraham added and took a wife, and her name was Keturah;' and that the meaning is, 'And Abraham added Keturah as a concubine to his wife Sarah, either in Ur or in Haran.' According to this supposition, his grandchildren by Keturah might be born while he was alive, as they are said to have been Gen. xxv. 2—6. This method of accounting for Abraham's having children by Keturah, Hallet thinks preferable to the common supposition, that Abraham's body being miraculously renewed in order to his procreating Isaac, retained its vigour so long as to enable him to have the children by Keturah mentioned Gen. xxv. 2, 3, 4; for, if that had been the case, why did not the renewal of Sarah's vigour enable her also to have children after she bore Isaac?

Ver. 13.—1. All these;—namely, Abraham and Sarah, with their children Isaac and Jacob. That the apostle speaks of them only, and not of Abel, Enoch, and Noah, is plain from ver. 15. and from his adding here, 'not having received the promises,' that is the blessings promised. For the promise of inheriting Canaan was not made to the antediluvian believers, though the country typified by Canaan certainly belonged to them. See ver. 39. note 2.

2. Died (καὶ ἔτεθον) in faith.]—This is to be limited to the persons to whom the promises were made. And even if it were extended to the antediluvians, there would be no impropriety in the general expression 'all these died,' although Enoch was translated; because it is common in scripture to attribute to the whole, what agrees to the greatest part. Thus our Lord said to the twelve, Judas being one of them, Matt. xix. 28. 'Ye shall sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.'

3. Did not receive the things promised.]—So τὰς ἐπαγγελίας must be translated in this verse; the promises, by an usual metonymy, being put for the things promised. For the promises being made to Abraham personally, and to his immediate descendants, the apostle could not say of them that they died, not having received the promises; but he might justly say, they died, not having received the things promised: For they neither received the possession of Canaan before their death; nor the possession of the heavenly country of which Canaan was the type and pledge. See ver. 39.

4. For, seeing them afar off.]—Chrysostom thinks this is an allusion to sailors, who, after a long voyage, decry at a great distance with much joy their intended port.—The clause, 'and were persuaded of them,' is omitted in many MSS. and in all the ancient versions and commentators.

5. And embracing them.]—The word ἀνασπασαμένους denotes the affectionate salutations and embracing of friends, after a long separation.

6. They confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims (οἱ ἄλλοι) on the earth.]—These good men, knowing well that a better country than any country on earth was promised to them under the figure of Canaan, considered their abode in Canaan and on the earth as a pilgrimage, at a distance from their native country; and to shew what their expectations were, always spake of themselves as strangers and pilgrims. See especially David's confession, 1 Chron. xxi. 15.

Ver. 14. That they earnestly seek their father's country.]—David likewise shewed his earnest desire of that country, by speaking the same things with his ancestors, Psal. xxxix. 12. 'I am a stranger with thee and a sojourner, as all my fathers were.' For by this he declared his belief, that the country promised to Abraham and to his seed, was chiefly an heavenly country. This too was the belief of the pious Israelites in every age. By 'their father's country' some understand their heavenly Father's country.

membered that from which they came out,¹ they might have had an opportunity² to have returned to it.

16 (Νῦν δὲ) But indeed (ἀγνοῦσαι) they strongly desired a better country, that is, an heavenly: Therefore God is not ashamed of them to be called their God,¹ (γὰρ, 90.) because he hath prepared for them a city. (See ver. 10.)

17 By faith Abraham, when tried,¹ offered up Isaac:² he who had received the promises, offered up even his only begotten,³

18 (Προσ ἵ) Concerning whom it was said, (ἱσθί, 26.) Surely by Isaac a seed (ἐκδοθήσεται, 36.) shall be to thee:¹

19 (Λογισάμενος) Reasoning that God was able (80.) to raise him even from the dead, from whence he received¹ him, even (α παρὰ θανάτου) for a parable.²

Ver. 15.—1. For truly, if they had remembered that from which they came out.—The apostle does not mean a bare remembrance of that country, but a wishful remembrance, or a longing after it. Such a longing none of these pious men ever indulged. Abraham, in particular, considered the very thought of returning into Chaldee, as a renunciation of his interest in the promises of God; and therefore he made his steward Eliezer swear, that on no pretence whatever he would carry Isaac into Chaldee, Gen. xxiv. 5–8. This absolute renunciation of Chaldee, notwithstanding God gave Abraham¹ none inheritance in Canaan, no not so much as to set his foot on, Acts vii. 5 is a strong proof of his knowledge of the true meaning of the promises, and of his faith in them.

2. They might have had an opportunity to have returned.—The Clermont MS. with the Syriac and Vulgate versions, read here ἵσθί, 'they had an opportunity.' What is said in this verse shews that the apostle in ver. 13. does not speak of the antediluvian believers, but of Abraham and his immediate descendants.

Ver. 16. Is not ashamed of them to be called their God.—Sykes thinks the clause, οὐκ ἐκδοθήσεται ἡμεῖς, should be translated, 'does not make them ashamed in being called their God.' According to either translation, this passage is a beautiful illustration of our Lord's reasoning with the Sadducees, and an allusion to it: Matt. xxii. 31. 'But as touching the resurrection of the dead, have ye not read that which was spoken to you by God, saying I am the God of Abraham? &c. In the covenant with Abraham, the promise on which all the rest were built was this, Gen. xlvii. 7. 'I will establish my covenant, &c. to be God unto thee, and thy seed after thee. 8. And I will give to thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger; &c. Wherefore, at the bush, when God took to himself the name of the God of Abraham, &c. and added, Exod. iii. 15. 'This is my name for ever, and my memorial unto all generations,' he might have been ashamed of the name, if Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to whom as their God he had promised Canaan, but who had died without receiving the possession of it, are not to be raised from the dead to enjoy the country promised under the emblem of Canaan. The reason is, in the sense which the name God bears in the covenant, God cannot be the God of the dead; he can neither bestow the possession of Canaan, nor of the country prefigured by Canaan, on persons who are dead. But he is the God of the living; he can bestow that country on living persons, who by the reunion of soul and body are capable of enjoying it. And that he can restore to Abraham and to his seed their bodies, to enable them to enjoy Canaan, is undeniable; because all who now live in the body, live merely by his will and power.—'All live by him.' See Essay v. sect. 3. No. 8.

Ver. 17.—1. Abraham, when tried.—In this trial of Abraham's faith, there was the highest wisdom. For God, to whom all his creatures belong, and who may justly take away the life of any of them by whatever means or instruments he thinks fit, ordered Abraham with his own hand to sacrifice his only son Isaac, in whom all the promises were to be fulfilled; that, as was hinted, Ess. v. sect. 2. at the end, the greatness of Abraham's understanding, and faith and piety, becoming conspicuous, future generations might know with what propriety God made him the pattern of the justification of mankind, and the father of all believers, for the purpose of their receiving the promises in him. The sacrifice of Isaac was commanded also for the purpose of being a type of the sacrifice of Christ. See ver. 19. note 2.

2. Offered up Isaac.—Isaac indeed was not sacrificed. But Abraham, in the full resolution of obeying God's command, proceeded so far as to shew that he would actually have obeyed it. For he bound Isaac, laid him on the altar, stretched forth his hand, and took the knife to slay his son, Gen. xlii. 10. Now, though Abraham was restrained from killing Isaac, his firm purpose to offer him was considered by God as equivalent to the actual offering of him, Gen. xlii. 16 'Because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son.' In like manner, the apostle in this verse, 'He truly if they had longed after that country from which they came out, they might have had an opportunity to have returned to it.

16 But indeed (ἀγνοῦσαι, see 1 Tim. iii. 1. note 1.) they longed after a better country than Chaldee, even an heavenly country, which God had promised to them: Therefore God was not ashamed of them (Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob) to be called their God, long after they were dead, notwithstanding he gave them no possession in Canaan, because he hath prepared for them a city, even the new Jerusalem.

17 By a great exercise of faith, Abraham, when tried, offered up Isaac; laid him on the altar to sacrifice him: He who had received the promises, that his seed should be as the sand on the sea-shore innumerable, and should inherit Canaan, and that the nations should be blessed in his seed, offered up even his only begotten.

18 Concerning whom it was expressly said, Surely by Isaac a seed shall be to thee, in whom all the promises which I have made to thy seed shall be fulfilled.

19 Yet, notwithstanding the apparent contradiction in the divine revelations, Abraham laid Isaac on the altar, reasoning that, although he were burnt to ashes, God was able to raise him, and would raise him even from the dead: from whence on this occasion he received him, by being hindered from slaying him, even in order to his being a type of Christ.

who had received the promises, offered up his only begotten.—But if Abraham, at God's command, was willing himself to slay his only son, how much more willing should we be to part with our beloved children and friends, when God himself takes them from us by death?

3. His only begotten.—Isaac is called Abraham's only son, because he had no other son by Sarah.

Ver. 18. Surely by Isaac a seed shall be to thee.—This is a more just translation of the clause 'Ὅτι δι' Ἰσαὰκ ἐκδοθήσεται σοι σπέρμα, than the common version which I have adopted, Rom. ix. 7. For, to call, in the Hebrew phraseology, signifies sometimes to be, simply.

Ver. 19.—1. Raised him, even from the dead, from whence he received him.—The word ἀνέστη is more properly translated as received, than he had received. Abraham's action, on this occasion, being considered by God as a real offering up of Isaac, he might with propriety be said to 'receive him from the dead,' when he was stepped down from slaying him. It is more natural therefore to interpret the receiving of Isaac from the dead, of his receiving and bringing him away from the great danger of death which he had escaped, than of his receiving him at his birth, which was not a receiving him from the dead at all. Add to this, that the miraculous birth of Isaac was not so proper a type of a resurrection, as his deliverance from death was: being rather an image of a creation, than of a resurrection.

2. For a parable.—Ἐν παραβολῇ. The preposition ἐν, for, often denotes the purpose for which a thing is done. See Ess. iv. 164. We may therefore believe, with Warburton, that the expression for a parable, means that this transaction was designed as an emblem of the sacrifice of the only begotten Son of God. See Heb. ix. 9. where παραβολή, a parable, signifies a type or figurative representation; being used, as Wolf observes, in the latitude of the Hebrew word mashal, which denotes any similitude whatever. Wherefore, it is probable that God commanded Abraham to offer Isaac as a burnt offering, for the purpose of giving mankind a lively and striking type of the sacrifice which his only begotten Son was to make of himself after he became the seed of Abraham as well as the seed of the woman, of whom it was foretold that he should bruise the head of the serpent. The truth is, when all the circumstances of this extraordinary transaction are considered, it will appear to be a most apt emblem of that great sacrifice. Isaac was Abraham's monogenes, only begotten: This only begotten son Abraham voluntarily gave unto death, at the commandment of God: Isaac bare the wood on which he was to be burnt as a sacrifice, and consented to be offered up; for he made no resistance when his father bound him, which shews that Abraham had made known to him the divine command: Three days having passed, between God's order to sacrifice Isaac and the revoking of that order, Isaac may be said to have been dead three days: Lastly, his deliverance when on the point of being slain, was, as the apostle observes, equal to a resurrection. In all these respects this transaction was a fit emblem of the death of the Son of God as a sacrifice, and of his resurrection from the dead on the third day. And though it be not recorded, it is reasonable to suppose, that, after Isaac was offered, when God confirmed all his promises to Abraham by an oath, he shewed him that his seed, in whom all the nations of the earth were to be blessed, was to die as a sacrifice for the sin of the world; also, that he had commanded him to offer up Isaac, to prefigure that great event, and to raise in mankind an expectation of it. How otherwise can we understand our Lord's words to the Jews? John viii. 56. 'Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day; and he saw it and was glad.' For, as Warburton observes, Christ's day denotes the things done by Christ in his day; and especially his dying as a sacrifice for sin.—Besides that in ancient times it was common by symbolical actions to convey instruction, we learn from what Stephen says concerning Moses killing the Egyptian, Acts vii. 24. 'He avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptian; 25. For he supposed his brethren would have understood, how that God by his hand would deliver them, but they understood not.' See Ess. v. paragr. 10. ab initio.

Ver. 20. By faith Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau.]—Here the apostle discovers a fact, which may also be gathered from the circumstances mentioned in the history; namely, that in blessing his two sons Isaac was moved by a divine impulse.—Before these children were born, God had determined to make the younger of them the root of his visible church and people. And in prosecution of this resolution, when the younger son, feigning himself to be the elder, came and asked the blessing, Isaac in giving it was inspired by God to foretell that the person to whom he spoke should enjoy all the blessings belonging to the first-born. And as in foretelling these blessings he felt himself inspired, (see Gen. xxvii. 33.), 'he trembled very exceedingly' when he discovered his mistake, being greatly distressed for Esau, whom he knew God had deprived of his birth-right. But he would not retract what he had been moved by the Spirit to foretell, although Esau besought him with tears to do it. On the contrary, knowing that he had spoken the blessing by inspiration, he confirmed it. Gen. xxvii. 33. 'I have blessed him, yea, and he shall be blessed.'—Moreover, Isaac being absolutely certain that the blessings which he had foretold by inspiration to Esau as well as to Jacob would be bestowed on them, the apostle was warranted to affirm that Isaac blessed Jacob and Esau by faith.

The guilt which Jacob used to procure the blessing, has been greatly condemned, and indeed hardly admits of an excuse. But the blame thrown on God by the Deists for ratifying that blessing to Jacob is certainly groundless, unless it can be shewed that God ought not to bestow temporal blessings on any person who has committed a sin to procure them. Before these children were born, or had done either good or evil, God had determined to make the younger twin the root of his visible church and people: And for so doing there were good reasons, which Paul hath explained, Rom. ix. 10–16. Also, having communicated his determination to Rebecca when she inquired concerning the struggling of the children in her womb, no doubt she thought it her duty to hinder her husband from attempting to counteract the divine determination: Wherefore she counselled Jacob to assume the appearance of Esau, perhaps by representing to him the revelation which was made to her, and which it is probable she had concealed from Isaac. In all this however she acted contrary to her duty. For which reason Jacob, fearing the deceit, if discovered, might provoke his father to curse him, refused to do what his mother desired, and was not persuaded till she took the curse upon herself. Gen. xxvii. 13. 'On me be thy curse, my son,' &c. See Heb. xii. 16. note 3.

Ver. 21.—1. By faith Jacob, when dying;]—that is, when near his death: For though he was sick when he blessed the sons of Joseph, Gen. xlviii. 1. he did not die then, but lived to call all his sons together, to tell them what should happen to them in the last days. Gen. xlix.

2. Blessed each of the sons of Joseph;]—namely, by foretelling that two tribes should spring from these two sons; and that the tribe of Ephraim should be more powerful than the tribe of Manasseh.

3. And worshipped, leaning on the top of his staff.]—In the history which Moses hath given of Jacob's requiring Joseph to swear that he would bury him in Canaan, Gen. xlviii. 31. the circumstance of his worshipping on the top of his staff is mentioned. The same circumstance is said by the apostle, in this verse, to have happened after Jacob blessed the sons of Joseph, Gen. xlviii. 16. Wherefore, as Moses hath introduced the history of Jacob's blessing the sons of Joseph after his history of the oath, we must suppose that Jacob worshipped twice leaning on the top of his staff, which I think is probable, considering his great faith and piety; and that in giving an account of Jacob's blessing the sons of Joseph, Moses may have omitted that circumstance, as thinking it needless to mention it twice.

In the common translation of Gen. xlviii. 31. where Joseph's swearing that he would bury his father in Canaan is recorded, it is said, 'He swore unto him; and Israel bowed himself upon the bed's 20 By faith in the divine revelation, Isaac foretold to Jacob and Esau the blessings which were to be bestowed on them and their posterity.

21 By the like faith, Jacob, when near his death, Gen. xlviii. 29. blessed each of the sons of Joseph; and, in token of his faith in the promises concerning their possessing Canaan, worshipped God leaning on the top of his staff.

22 By faith in God's promise of giving Canaan to Abraham and to his seed, Joseph, when ending his life, made mention of the departing of the children of Israel out of Egypt, as a thing certain; and to preserve the knowledge and expectation thereof among the Israelites, he commanded them to carry his bones with them into Canaan.

23 By faith in the promises of God, Moses, when born, being circumcised, was hid three months by his parents till he was recovered, because they saw the child beautiful, and presumed he might be the person appointed to deliver them; and were not afraid of the king's commandment to give up their children to be killed, Exod. i. 22.

24 By faith in the promises of God, made known to him by his brethren, Moses, when he was grown up, resolving to join himself to his people, refused to be called any longer the son of Pharaoh's daughter;

25 Choosing rather to suffer persecution with the people of God, than, as the son of Pharaoh's daughter, to have the temporary fruition of the pleasures of sin in the court of Egypt;

26 Esteeming the scoffs cast on the Israelites for expecting the head.¹ But as Sælius and other critics have observed, the Hebrew word mutiah, signifying a bed, differs from matteh, signifying a staff, only in the punctuation, which being a modern invention, either word may be adopted agreeably to the scope of the passage. Wherefore, though Joseph swore the oath 'when the time drew nigh that Israel must die,' yet as there is no circumstance in the history leading us to think that Israel was then either sick or in his bed, but, on the contrary, his falling sick is related in the next chapter as an event posterior to the oath, I agree with Hallet in his opinion, that the apostle's translation, which is that of the LXX. likewise, namely, 'He worshipped, leaning on the top of his staff,' is more just than the common translation, 'he bowed himself upon the bed's head.' Besides, as Hallet hath shewed in opposition to Le Clerc, the word which our translators have rendered to doze, in many other passages of scripture signifies to scorn. Israel, having received his son's oath, worshipped God in token of his thankfulness for the assurance given him that he should be buried in Canaan, and of his faith in God's promise concerning the possession of Canaan: And when he stood up to worship, being old and feeble, he supported himself while worshipping, by leaning on the top of his staff.

Ver. 22. Joseph, when ending his life.]—So τὸ τέλος should be supplied and translated: for the phrase is elliptical, Parkh. Diction. voce; and what is here related did not happen when Joseph was dying, but towards the end of his life.

Ver. 23.—1. Was hid by his parents.]—The word κρυβαντες is fully translated parents, for both Moses's father and mother were engaged in the work of concealing him, although his mother only is mentioned, Exod. ii. 2.

2. Because they saw the child beautiful.]—Αἰσθησας, Moses's beauty is mentioned by Stephen, Acts vii. 20. and by Josephus, Antiq. lib. 2. c. 9. § 6–7. Nay, the fame of Moses's beauty reached even the heathens, Justin. Hist. lib. 36. c. 2.—Josephus says, God appeared to Amram in a dream, and promised him a son, who was to deliver the Israelites from the Egyptian bondage; and that Amram told this dream to his wife, and that they were led by it to hide their son. These pious persons being at length obliged to expose their son, he was taken up by Pharaoh's daughter, who gave him to his mother to nurse; and she, having nursed him, brought him to the princess, who adopted him, Exod. ii. 10; and no doubt had him educated in all the learning of the Egyptians, Acts vii. 22.

Ver. 24.—1. When he was grown up.]—Μεγαλὸν γεγονος, in allusion to Exod. ii. 11. 'In those days when Moses was grown,' &c. Stephen says, Moses left the court of Egypt after he became learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, and 'when he was full forty years old,' Acts vii. 23. For, at the time Moses stood before Pharaoh, he was fourscore years old, Exod. vii. 7. and Stephen tells us he sojourned in Midian forty years, Acts vii. 30.

2. Refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter.]—It is not said in the history, that Moses made this refusal formally. But he did it, in effect, by his actions; and particularly by killing the Egyptian who smote an Hebrew, and by leaving the court and fleeing into Midian. And though he afterwards returned to Egypt, he did not reside with Pharaoh's daughter as formerly, but went among his afflicted brethren, and never afterwards forsook them.

Ver. 25.—1. Choosing rather to suffer evil with the people of God,]—To account for this exercise of faith in Moses, we must suppose that in his childhood and youth he had often conversed with his parents, and with the Israelites, of whom he knew himself to be one by his circumcision; and that they had given him the knowledge of the true God, the God of their fathers, and of the promises which God had made to their nation as his people.

2. Than to have the temporary fruition of sin.]—In that light Moses viewed the pleasures of the court of Egypt; because they could not be enjoyed by him without renouncing the people of God, and joining in the established idolatry.

33 Who through faith subdued kingdoms,¹

Ver. 26.—1. Greater riches than the treasures of Egypt.—It is here insinuated, that if Moses had continued in the court of Egypt as the son of Pharaoh's daughter, he might have had the free use of the king's treasures, and therewith might have procured to himself every sensual enjoyment.

2. To the retribution. —So the word μειζωτέρων signifies, being used to denote either reward or punishment, Heb. ii. 2. Here it signifies reward; not however the possession of Canaan, whither Moses was going with the Israelites, nor any pleasures he could enjoy in Canaan; for every thing of that sort he might have had in much greater perfection in Egypt: But it was the joys of the heavenly country, of which the possession of Canaan promised to Abraham and to his seed was only a type.

Ver. 27.—1. By faith he left Egypt, &c. —The circumstance of his not being afraid of the wrath of the king at his leaving Egypt, shews that the apostle does not speak of Moses's departure into Midian, (for then he was in great fear, Exod. ii. 14, 15.), but of his departure with the Israelites; which he mentions before he speaks of the institution of the passover, because his design being to illustrate the power of faith by examples, it was not necessary to propose these in the exact order of time.

2. The invisible God. —By this epithet the true God, whom the Israelites worshipped, was distinguished by the apostle from the visible gods of the Egyptians.

Ver. 28. He who destroyed the first-born might not touch theirs. —That the sacrifice of the passover was an emblem of the sacrifice of Christ, we learn from John, who tells us, chap. xix. 36, that the injunction, Exod. xii. 46, 'neither shall ye break a bone thereof,' was given to prefigure, that when Christ should be put to death, none of his bones should be broken. If so, the effect of the passover mentioned in this verse, was an emblem of the salvation of the people of God through the shedding of Christ's blood. Hence Christ is called 'our passover,' and is said to 'be sacrificed for us.' 1 Cor. v. 7. See note 2. on that verse.

Ver. 29. Were drowned. —If, as is probable from the history, Exod. xiv. 23—29, the sea returned, and overwhelmed the Egyptians, while the Israelites were passing, and before they arrived at the opposite shore, it would require no small degree of faith to support them under the noise of the rushing waters, and the dreadful cries of the Egyptians while drowning.

Ver. 30. Having been encompassed seven days. —As the land of Canaan belonged to the Israelites by a grant from God the possessor of heaven and earth, it was proper that the first city which resisted them should be taken in such a manner as to demonstrate the truth of their title. And therefore God did not order them to attack Jericho with engines of war, but ordered the priests, his immediate ministers, to carry the ark, containing the tables of his covenant, round the city daily for seven days, Josh. vi. 13, and to sound trumpets of rams' horns, as summoning the inhabitants in the name of the God of Israel to surrender; the armed men going before, and the rearward following. And, on the seventh day, having surrounded Jericho seven times, they raised a great shout, upon which 'the wall fell down flat, so that the people went up into the city, every man straight before him,' ver. 20.—Thus were the inhabitants of Jericho, and all the Canaanites, made to know the supremacy and power of the God of Israel, and how vain it was to make any resistance.

Ver. 31. Rahab the harlot. —Rahab is called a harlot on account of her former way of life. But after she believed in the true God, it is reasonable to think she amended her manners, as well as repented of the lie by which she deceived the king of Jericho's messengers. For that faith in the true God, which made her hazard her life in receiving and concealing the spies, must, when she attained to more knowledge, have wrought in her a thorough reformation. Accordingly it is expressly affirmed, James i. 25, that she was justified by her works of receiving and sending the spies away in safety. See Ess. vi. sect. 3. paragr. 5.

Ver. 32.—1. Speak of Gideon. —Gideon's faith in demolishing the altar of Baal, and cutting down his grove in obedience to God's command, is recorded Judges vi. 27; also, his faith in going forth, in obedience to God, with three hundred men to fight against a prodigious host of Midianites, is recorded Judges vii. And, as Gideon continued to worship the true God all his life, and restrained the Israelites from idolatry, Judges viii. 33. Hallet supposes that the golden ephod which he made of the ear-rings of the Midianites, and put up in Ophrah, Judges viii. 27 was not intended as an object of worship, but only as a memorial of his victory. For notwithstanding it is said this 'became a snare to Gideon and to his house,' he thinks the meaning is, that becoming the occasion of the Israelites falling into idolatry, it occasioned great misfortunes to him, by alienating the affections of the Israelites from him and from his family, as the history sheweth.

2. And Barak, and Samson, and Jephthah. —Barak lived before Gideon, and Jephthah before Samson, and Samuel before David. But, for the reason mentioned ver. 27. note 1. the apostle does not observe the order of time in giving the catalogue of the Israelitish judges.—Barak's faith consisted in his believing the revelation made to Deborah, and in his obeying the command which she delivered to him from God, to go out against Jabin's numerous army, as narrated Judges iv. 6.—Samson's faith consisted in his believing and obeying the divine impulses which were made upon his mind from time to time, for the purpose of exciting him to avenge the Israelites of the Philistines, as mentioned Judges xiii. 25. xiv. 4.—In like manner, Jephthah's faith consisted in his believing God's promise to Abraham, that his children should possess the land of Canaan, as is plain from his message to the king of the Ammonites, recorded Judges xi. 24. and in his obeying the impulse of the Spirit of the Lord which moved him to fight against the Ammonites, as mentioned Judges xi. 29. Compare Numb. xxiv. 2. 1 Sam. xii. 6.

Ver. 33.—1. Who through faith subdued kingdoms. —From the apostle's ascribing the great actions of the celebrated Israelitish captains and judges to the influence of their faith, some commen-ed that Christ to arise among them, in whom all the nations of the earth should be blessed, greater riches than the treasures of Egypt; for he looked off from them to the reward which he expected in the life to come.

2. But after she believed in the true God, it is reasonable to think she amended her manners, as well as repented of the lie by which she deceived the king of Jericho's messengers. For that faith in the true God, which made her hazard her life in receiving and concealing the spies, must, when she attained to more knowledge, have wrought in her a thorough reformation. Accordingly it is expressly affirmed, James i. 25, that she was justified by her works of receiving and sending the spies away in safety. See Ess. vi. sect. 3. paragr. 5.

Ver. 32.—1. Speak of Gideon. —Gideon's faith in demolishing the altar of Baal, and cutting down his grove in obedience to God's command, is recorded Judges vi. 27; also, his faith in going forth, in obedience to God, with three hundred men to fight against a prodigious host of Midianites, is recorded Judges vii. And, as Gideon continued to worship the true God all his life, and restrained the Israelites from idolatry, Judges viii. 33. Hallet supposes that the golden ephod which he made of the ear-rings of the Midianites, and put up in Ophrah, Judges viii. 27 was not intended as an object of worship, but only as a memorial of his victory. For notwithstanding it is said this 'became a snare to Gideon and to his house,' he thinks the meaning is, that becoming the occasion of the Israelites falling into idolatry, it occasioned great misfortunes to him, by alienating the affections of the Israelites from him and from his family, as the history sheweth.

2. And Barak, and Samson, and Jephthah. —Barak lived before Gideon, and Jephthah before Samson, and Samuel before David. But, for the reason mentioned ver. 27. note 1. the apostle does not observe the order of time in giving the catalogue of the Israelitish judges.—Barak's faith consisted in his believing the revelation made to Deborah, and in his obeying the command which she delivered to him from God, to go out against Jabin's numerous army, as narrated Judges iv. 6.—Samson's faith consisted in his believing and obeying the divine impulses which were made upon his mind from time to time, for the purpose of exciting him to avenge the Israelites of the Philistines, as mentioned Judges xiii. 25. xiv. 4.—In like manner, Jephthah's faith consisted in his believing God's promise to Abraham, that his children should possess the land of Canaan, as is plain from his message to the king of the Ammonites, recorded Judges xi. 24. and in his obeying the impulse of the Spirit of the Lord which moved him to fight against the Ammonites, as mentioned Judges xi. 29. Compare Numb. xxiv. 2. 1 Sam. xii. 6.

Ver. 33.—1. Who through faith subdued kingdoms. —From the apostle's ascribing the great actions of the celebrated Israelitish captains and judges to the influence of their faith, some commen-wrought righteousness,² obtained promises,³ stopped the mouths of lions,⁴

34 Quenched the strength of fire, escaped the edges of the sword, waxed strong from sickness, became valiant in battle, overturned the camps of the aliens.

35 Women received their dead (ἐκ) by a resurrection,¹ and others were beaten,² not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection.³

36 And others had trial of mockings, and scourings, and moreover of bonds and imprisonment.¹

37 They were stoned, they were sawn asunder,¹ they were tempted,² they died by the slaughter of the sword, they went about in sheeps' skins,³ and in goats' skins, being destitute, afflicted, (καταχυμῶσι) maltreated;

38 (1st, 67.) Of these the world was not worthy: They wandered in deserts, and mountains, and in caves and holes of the earth.

39 Now all these, though borne witness to on account of faith,¹ have not received the

in the possession of Canaan, subdued the neighbouring idolatrous kingdoms, performed the righteous actions commanded them by God, and in reward, obtained promises, and stopped the mouths of lions, 34 Were unhurt by the strongest fire,—he means Shadrach and his companions, whose faith is recorded Dan. iii. 17.;—escaped the edges of the sword:—Moses escaped the sword of Pharaoh, Exod. xviii. 4. Elijah that of Jezebel, and David that of Saul;—waxed strong from sickness, as did Hezekiah, Isa. xxxviii. 21.;—became valiant in battle, and overturned the camps of the enemies;—Gideon overturned the camp of the Midianites, and Jonathan that of the Philistines.

35 Women received their dead children alive by a resurrection, as did the widow of Zarephath, 1 Kings xvii. 21., and the Shunammite, 2 Kings iv. 34.;—others were beaten to death, not accepting deliverance on the condition offered, that they might obtain a better resurrection.

36 And others, like Jeremiah, (Jer. xx. 7.), had experience of mockings, and scourings, and moreover they were fettered, and imprisoned in filthy dungeons.

37 Others were stoned to death, as Zechariah, (2 Chron. xxiv. 21.); they were sawn asunder, they were tempted, they died by the slaughter of the sword, (1 Sam. xxii. 18. 1 Kings xix. 10.): They wandered about in sheeps' skins, and in goats' skins, being destitute, afflicted, maltreated by those to whom they delivered the messages of God;

38 Of these the world was not worthy: Yet they wandered by day in deserts and mountains, and by night lodged in caves and holes of the earth; as Elijah, and the hundred prophets hid by Obadiah, and David, 1 Sam. xiv. 3.

39 Now all these, though they have justly obtained the highest renown among men, along with the better approbation of God on tators have inconsiderately inferred that they were all justified by their faith. I say inconsiderately inferred, because it is evident that the apostle does not praise them for their behaviour in general, but for the particular valiant actions which they performed through their belief of the revelations and promises made to them concerning these actions, and for their obedience to the divine commands. And doubtless it is an high commendation of faith, to observe that it influenced these valiant men to perform the heroic actions which were commanded them of God, although afterwards, in other instances, they failed in their duty through the want of an abiding principle of faith; even as the Israelites, who by faith passed through the Red Sea, lost their faith, rebelled, and were slain in the wilderness. See ver. 39. note 1.—In mentioning the subduing of kingdoms, the apostle had Joshua in his eye, who through a strong faith in the divine promises, subdued the seven kingdoms of the Canaanites: Also David, who by faith overcame Goliath, and afterwards subdued the kingdoms of the Moabites, Syrians, Ammonites, and Edomites, 2 Sam. viii. 1–6. And with respect to Samuel, he, on one occasion, through faith obtained a miraculous victory over the Philistines; God, in answer to his prayer, thundering with a great thunder on them; so that they were smitten and subdued all the days of Samuel, 1 Sam. vii. 3. 10. 13.

2. Wrought righteousness.]—According to some commentators this means, that these valiant captains and judges wrought deliverance for the Israelites from their heathen oppressors, a sense which righteousness sometimes has in the Jewish scripture. But according to others it means, that as judges they acted righteously. Hallet interprets it of their working out for themselves an evangelical righteousness acceptable to God. I rather think the meaning is, that they did the righteous things which God commanded them to do. Yet, from these particular acts of obedience, it doth not follow that they were righteous persons. See the preceding note, and ver. 39. note 1.

3. Obtained promises.]—This relates to Caleb and to Joshua, who for their righteousness, in giving a true report of the land which they had spied, and in exhorting the people to go up, were excepted out of the oath of God whereby the whole congregation were doomed to fall in the wilderness. It relates also to Phinehas, who for slaying Zimri and Cozbi obtained the promise of the everlasting priesthood: And to David, who for his faith and obedience was rewarded, first with the promise of the kingdom, and next with the far greater promise, that Messiah should spring from him.

4. Stopped the mouths of lions.]—Daniel, for worshipping God contrary to Darius's commandment, was cast into a den of lions. But God, in reward of his piety and faith, sent an angel, who shut the mouths of the lions, so that he was brought out unhurt, Dan. vi. 22. Samson likewise, as he went to Timnah, rent a lion as he would have rent a kid, Judges xiv. 6.

Ver. 35.—1. Women received, &c.]—The Syriac hath here restored to women their dead.

2. Others were beaten.]—ΕΡΜΑΙΝΕΙΣΘΕΝ. According to Perizonius the meaning is, that their body being violently stretched, was beaten with clubs, so as to occasion extreme pain. But Estius thinks the word signifies simply to be beaten, because it is used to denote striking with great force: 1 Sam. xxi. 13. LXX. καὶ ἐπὶ τοῦ σώματος ταῖς θύραις τῆς πόλεως. This punishment Eleazar suffered, 2 Mac. vi. 19. ἡ ἀνδρεία αὐτοῦ ὡς τὸ χρυσὸν ἔδοξε.

3. Not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection.]—Perhaps the persons here meant are those whose history we have 2 Mac. vii.—The 'better resurrection,' which they expected, was a resurrection to a better life than the children obtained, who in the former part of the verse are said to have been raised from the dead. For that the Jews believed in the resurrection of the body, is evident from 2 Mac. vii. 9. 11. 14. 23.

Ver. 36. Mockings, and scourings, and moreover of bonds and imprisonments.]—Isaac was mocked by Ishmael, and Eliah by the children from Bethel. See also 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16.—Jeremiah was beaten by Pashur, Jerem. xx. 2. and by the princes, chap. xxxvii. 15.—Scouring in the synagogue was a very common punishment. And with respect to imprisonment, Joseph was cast into prison: Jeremiah was let down into a dungeon full of mire, chap. xxxvii. 16. xxxviii. 6.; and the prophet Micah was imprisoned by Ahab, 1 Kings xlii. 27.

Ver. 37.—1. Sawn asunder.]—This punishment is mentioned 2 Sam. xli. 31. as then in use. And Suetonius tells us the Emperor Caligula used it, Calig. cap. 27. Moreover, Jerome on Isa. lvi. 2. speaks of it as a certain tradition, that Isaiah "was sawn asunder with a wooden saw;" a punishment which, according to the Talmud, was inflicted on him by Manasseh, who was a cruel as well as an idolatrous prince.

2. They were tempted.]—Alberti thinks, that instead of πειρασθέντες, they were tempted, the apostle wrote καταχυμῶσιν, they were strangled. Observe, Philol. p. 436. Others think the true reading is καταχυμῶσιν, they were burnt, namely, with red-hot irons; or burnt alive. Others propose other readings. But alterations of the sacred text on conjecture, without the authority of any MS. or version, deserve no regard.—Whitby contends, that the clause 'they were tempted,' is an interpolation. But Hallet, in his note on the verse, defends it at great length, and declares himself of Mill's opinion, that there is no reason whatever for altering the present reading.—Among the sufferings of good men are reckoned 'the fiery darts of the wicked one,' Eph. vi. 16. that is, peculiarly strong temptations of the devil, arising from the wrong thoughts which he suggests; and therefore they well deserved, in this place, to be ranked among the heavy sufferings of the people of God.

3. In sheeps' skins.]—ΜΑΥΡΑΙΣ. Of this sort was Elijah's mantle, which afterwards Elisha wore. For the LXX. call it expressly μαύρα, a sheep's skin, 2 Kings ii. 8. 13. Hence Elijah is called an hairy man, 2 Kings i. 8. not so much on account of his beard, as on account of his wearing a mantle of sheep's skin with the wool on it. The ancient prophets commonly went about in such garments, being mortified to all the luxuries of life; and from Zech. xlii. 4. it appears that the false prophets imitated them in their dress, to gain the more credit.

Ver. 39.—1. All these, though borne witness to on account of faith, have not received the promise.]—Because it is added in the following verse, 'that they without us should not be made perfect,' Hallet contends, that the expression, 'borne witness to on account of faith,' or as it is in the common translation, 'have obtained a good report through faith,' implies, that all the Israelitish judges and cap-

40 God having foreseen some better things concerning us, that they (οὐ χωρὶς ἡμῶν ὡς ἡμεῖς) without us¹ should not be made perfect.²

account of their faith and great actions, have not yet received the heavenly country promised to Abraham and to his seed.

40 The reason is, God having foreseen, that by the gospel he would bestow some better means of faith on us, in order to our becoming Abraham's spiritual seed, resolved, that the ancients without us should not be made perfect by receiving the promised heavenly country. For he determined that the whole spiritual seed of Abraham, raised from the dead, shall be introduced into that country in a body at one and the same time, namely, after the general judgment.

tains mentioned in this chapter, as well as the ancients, were justified by their faith, and made heirs of eternal salvation. But this by no means follows from the expression μετὰ τὴν πίστιν διὰ τὰς ἔργας. For the apostle's design in this part of his epistle being to shew, by examples from the Jewish scriptures, the influence which faith in the divine revelations and promises hath to excite men to perform those difficult and dangerous enterprises which he assigns to them in particular, 'the witness which was borne to them on account of faith,' means only the praise which was given to them in scripture on account of the faith which they shewed in performing these particular great actions.—Next, with respect to the apostle's saying, 'All these—have not received the promise,—that they without us should not be made perfect,' though it implies that many of them shall receive the promised inheritance at the time it is bestowed on the rest of the children of God, we cannot from these expressions infer, that all the persons without exception whom the apostle hath mentioned, are to receive the inheritance; for it is well known that the sacred writers often use the word all to denote the greatest part only. See Esa. iv. 31. And that it is so used in this place I think must be allowed, when it is considered that the general characters of some of the Israelitish judges and captains mentioned in this chapter was far from being good. Yet they are very properly praised along with the rest, for the great actions which they performed through their faith in the revelations and promises which God made to them in particular; because on these occasions the influence of faith was as real in them as in the others who were of a better character, though it was not so permanent. Besides, ver. 29, 30, the whole of the Israelites who passed through the Red Sea, and who encompassed Jericho, are said to have done these things by faith. Yet no one imagines that they, or even the greatest part of them, though borne witness to on account of their faith in these instances, are to be rewarded with eternal life.

2. Have not received the promise:—that is, the promised country, as is plain from ver. 13, 14, 15, 16. See ver. 13. note 2.—To the antediluvians no promise was made concerning the possession of the earthly Canaan; yet it is said of them here, as well as of the rest, that 'they died, not having received the promised country,' which implies that they had a right to that country according to its spiritual meaning. It is true Abraham was the first person to whom the promise of reward in a future life was confirmed by a formal covenant. Nevertheless, it was virtually promised at the fall, and was known and expected by good men from the beginning of the world. So the apostle tells us, ver. 6. 'He who worshippeth God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them who diligently seek him.'

Ver. 40.—1. That they without us.—The person of whom the apostle speaks here, are not all the individuals without exception whom he hath mentioned in this chapter as praised in the scriptures on account of their faith; for some are praised whose faith was only temporary. See ver. 39. note 1. But he speaks of those only who persevered in their faith and obedience: such as Abel, who was testified by God himself to be righteous; and Enoch, who is said to have walked with God; and Noah, who became an heir of the righteousness which is by faith; and Abraham, who believed the Lord, and it was counted to him for righteousness; and Moses, who persevered as seeing the invisible God; and all the rest who died in faith.

2. Should not be made perfect.—Τὴν ἑλπίδα, made perfect, here signifies made complete, by receiving the whole of the blessings promised to believers, (see Heb. v. 9. note 1), the expectation of which animated the ancients, whose great actions are celebrated in the preceding part of this chapter. These blessings are the resurrection of the body, the everlasting possession of the heavenly country, and the full enjoyment of God as their exceeding great reward. See chap. xii. 22. note 2.—The apostle's doctrine, that believers are all to be rewarded together, and at the same time, is agreeable to Christ's declaration, who told his disciples that they were not to come to the place he was going away to prepare for them, till he returned from heaven to carry them to it. John xiv. 3. 'If I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself, that where I am, there ye may be also.'—Further, that the righteous are not to be rewarded till the end of the world, is evident from Christ's words, Mat. xiii. 40, 43. In like manner, St. Peter hath told us, that the righteous are to be made glad with their reward 'at the revelation of Christ,' 1 Pet. iv. 13, when they are to receive 'a crown of glory that fadeth not away,' 1 Pet. v. 4. John also tells us, that 'when he shall appear, we shall be made like him, for we shall see him as he is,' 1 John iii. 2. See Whitby's note on 2 Tim. iv. 8.—This determination, not to reward the ancients without us, is highly proper; because the power and veracity of God will be more illustriously displayed in the view of angels and men, by raising the whole of Abraham's seed from the dead at once, and by introducing them into the heavenly country in a body, after a public acquittal at the judgment, than if each were made perfect separately at their death.

Hallet, in interpreting this 40th verse, gives it as his opinion, that the ancients before the coming of Christ, fell into a state of insensibility at death; that the better things provided for us means, that good Christians at death enter into a state of thought, sensibility, and happiness; and that the meaning of the ancients not being made perfect without us, is, that they were not, excepting Enoch and Elijah, admitted into heaven till Christ's death, (whereby that better state was purchased): from which time Christians, as fast as they leave this world, are admitted thither also. But in opposition to these conjectures nothing needs be said but that they are unsupported by scripture. It may be proper, however, to put the reader in mind, that Moses, who was not translated like Enoch and Elijah, but died, appeared at our Lord's transfiguration; because that fact is a proof that he was in a state of thought and sensibility before Christ's death; consequently, that he did not fall into a state of insensibility when he died, as Hallet supposeth.

CHAPTER XII.

View and Illustration of the Exhortations contained in this Chapter.

By a bold but beautiful rhetorical figure, the apostle, in the beginning of this chapter, represents the patriarchs, judges, kings, prophets, and righteous men, whose faith he had celebrated in the preceding chapter, after having finished their own combats with honour, as standing round and looking on the Hebrews while running in the Christian race. He therefore exhorted them to exert themselves strenuously in the presence of such spectators; but, above all, to fix their attention on Jesus, whom also he represents as looking on; because his virtues and sufferings were far more remarkable, and far more worthy of imitation, than those of the ancients, whose great actions he had celebrated, ver. 1-4.

Next, for the consolation of such of the Hebrews as were in affliction, the apostle put them in mind of the view which their own scriptures gave them of the afflictions allotted to the people of God. They are chastisements which God, from love, administers to his children, to improve their virtues. And from that consideration he exhorted them meekly and courageously to bear all the evils to which they were exposed on account of the gospel, ver. 5-13.—And to pursue peace with all men, and holiness, because without holiness no man shall see and live with the Lord in the heavenly country, ver. 14.—And to be careful to preserve each other from sin, especially the sin of apostasy, by admonishing such as were in danger of falling away; or who shewed a disposition to sensuality and profanity, like Esau, who, despising his birthright, sold it for one meal, ver. 15, 16, 17.

Having mentioned Esau's selling his birthright, to prevent the Hebrews from parting with their birthrights as the spiritual seed of Abraham, whether from the love of pleasure or from the fear of persecution, the apostle explained to them the privileges belonging to their birthright. They were entitled to inherit, not an earthly country after death, but an heavenly country; and were to become inhabitants of the city of the living God, the city which Abraham expected, Heb. xi. 40. and were there to live with God for ever—expressed ver. 14. of this chapter by their seeing God; and were to associate with angels and with the spirits of just men made perfect, and with Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, and to enjoy all the blessings procured by the shedding of his blood, ver. 18–24.

In the beginning of this epistle, the apostle had affirmed that the same God who spake to the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken to us by his Son Jesus. And this affirmation he had established in the progress of the epistle, by removing all the objections which the unbelieving Jews brought to set aside the claim of Jesus to be the Son of God. In this place, therefore, as the improvement of his doctrine concerning the sonship of Jesus, the apostle exhorted the Hebrews to beware of disobeying God, who was speaking to them by his Son, and commanding them to obey his gospel. And to enforce this exhortation, the apostle put them in mind of what befell their fathers in the wilderness, when they refused to obey God's command to go into Canaan. If, said he, the Israelites did not escape unpunished, who in Kadesh disobeyed the oracle which Moses delivered to them from God, ordering them to go up immediately and take possession of the promised inheritance, we who have that example of disobedience and punishment before our eyes, shall much less escape unpunished, if we turn away from God speaking the gospel to us from heaven by Jesus, who now sits at his right hand as the governor of the world, ver. 25.—But because to embrace the gospel was in effect to relinquish the law, and because the unbelieving Hebrews were greatly prejudiced against the gospel on that account, the apostle, to persuade them to forsake the law and embrace the gospel, quoted a prophecy of Haggai, in which God, who gave the law, declared that he would set it aside, and put an end to the kingdom of the Jewish princes who supported it, and also destroy the heathen idolatry and the kingdoms of the heathen rulers by whom it was upheld: 'His voice then shook the earth; but now he hath promised, saying, Yet once I shake not the earth only, but also the heaven,' ver. 26.—Haggai adds, chap. ii. 6, 'And the sea and the dry land. 7. And I will shake all nations; and the desire of all nations shall come.' That this is a prophecy of the abrogation of the law of Moses, and of the destruction of the heathen idolatry, we learn from God himself, who thus explains what he meant by the shaking of the heavens and the earth: Hag. ii. 21. 'Speak to Zorobabel, governor of Judah, saying, I will shake the heavens and the earth. 22. And I will overthrow the throne of kingdoms, and I will destroy the strength of the kingdoms of the heathen.' For from this it is plain, first, That 'the shaking of the heavens,' at the coming of the desire of all nations, means, that at his coming the throne of the kingdom of the Jewish princes who supported the law of Moses was to be overthrown; next, That 'the shaking of the earth' means, that the strength of the kingdoms of the heathen princes who upheld idolatry, was to be destroyed by the preaching of the gospel.—Farther, seeing in the expression, Hag. ii. 6, 'Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens and the earth,' there is a reference to a former shaking of the earth, namely, that which happened at the giving of the law, the interpretation given, Hag. ii. 21, 22, of the shaking of the heavens and the earth, by the preaching of the gospel after the coming of the desire of all nations, leads us to consider the shaking of Mount Sinai, at the giving of the law, as emblematical of the destruction of the heathen idolatry by the introduction of the law of Moses.—The apostle, for the further information of the Hebrews, told them that the promise, 'Yet once I will shake the heavens and the earth,' implied, that the things shaken and overthrown were to be removed, in order that the things not to be shaken, the Christian church and gospel form of worship, may remain firmly established to the end of time; so that there are to be no more changes made in the religion of the world, ver. 27.

Having finished his address to the unbelieving Hebrews, the apostle directed his discourse to such of the nations as professed the gospel, saying, Wherefore, we having received a dispensation of religion which is never to be altered, ought to hold fast the gift of that most excellent dispensation, whereby we can worship God acceptably with reverence and religious fear, ver. 28.—For, under the gospel, God is as much a consuming fire to them who disobey him by infidelity, or who affront him by apostasy, as he was to the rebellious Israelites under the law, ver. 29.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. XII.—1 Wherefore, even we, like the combatants in the Grecian games, having so great an assembly of witnesses placed around us, laying aside every weight of worldly hopes and fears, and cares, and friendships, which encumber us in running, and the sin of apostasy which is so easily committed, let us run with perseverance the race appointed us;

2 Looking off from the ancients to Jesus, the leader and rewarder of the faithful, who, for the joy of bringing many sons into glory which was set before him, endured the lingering agonies of the cross,

Ver. 1.—1. Having so great a cloud.—Both the Greeks and the Romans used the word cloud to express a great number of people. See 1 Thess. iv. 17. note 4. Capel thinks the metaphor is taken from flocks of birds flying in the air like clouds: Isa. lx. 8. 'Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?' See also Ezek. xxxviii. 9.

2. Of witnesses.—Because at the celebration of the games the victors in the morning combats did not receive the prizes till the evening, but looked at those who engaged in the succeeding combats, the apostle, in allusion to that custom, by an high rhetorical figure, represents the ancient patriarchs, and prophets, and judges, and kings, and captains, and righteous men, mentioned in the preceding chapter, who had been victorious in their own combats, as standing round the Hebrews, and observing how they acquitted themselves in the Christian race. By using this figure, however, the apostle did not mean to insinuate, that the saints in the other world know what we are doing in this; but to teach us to think of them often, that by the recollection of their trials and virtues we may stir ourselves up to greater diligence in our Christian course.

3. The sin easily committed.—ἡ ἁμαρτία ἡ εὐπερὶς, literally, which stands conveniently around one, to allure him or, the well circumstanced sin—the sin which is well adapted to one's circumstances and inclinations, consequently is easily committed; in opposition to ἀσχετή, that which hath no recommending circumstance, or which is destitute of ornament.

4. Let us run with perseverance the race set before us.—If it is thought that the Hebrews were not acquainted with the Olympic and other sacred games of the Greeks, we may suppose the apostle alludes to the games which Herod instituted in imitation of the Greeks, in some of the cities which he built in Judea, or repaired.

Ver. 2.—1. The captain and perfecter of the faith.—Αρχηγὸν, the captain. For this signification of ἀρχηγός, see chap. ii. 10. note 3.—Καὶ τελώντην, and perfecter. See Heb. v. 9. note 1. The apostle having exhorted the Hebrews to run the race set before them, compares Jesus to the judge of the games, whose office it was to determine who were the conquerors, and to make them perfect as combatants, by bestowing on them the prizes for which they had contended.

2 Who, for the joy which was set before him.—The phrase αὐτῷ τῷ ἀγαθῷ, is by some translated 'who, instead of the joy,' understanding thereby the joy of governing the world, which the Son possessed from the beginning by right of creation; or according to endured the cross,² despising the shame, and sat down at the right hand of the throne of God.

3 (Tag, 93.) Wherefore, attentively consider him who endured such contradiction from sinners against (αὐτοῦ) himself, that ye may not be weary, being faint in your souls.

4 Not yet unto blood have ye resisted, combating¹ against sin.

5 (Kai, 224.) Besides, have ye forgotten the exhortation which (διαιρέται) reasoneth¹ with you as with children, (Prov. iii. 11.)? My son, do not think lightly of the Lord's chastisement, neither faint when thou art rebuked (ὡς) of him:

6 For whom the Lord loveth he chastiseth,¹ and scourgeth² every son whom he receiveth. (See Rom. iii. 19.)

7 If ye endure chastisement, God beareth towards you as HIS children. For what son is there whom HIS father doth not chastise?

8 But if ye be without chastisement,¹ of which all SONS are partakers, certainly ye are bastards, and not sons.

9 (Εἰτα) Farther, we have had fathers of our flesh,¹ who chastised us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection to the Father of OUR spirits, and live?

10 For they verily, (καὶ, 295.) during a few days, chastised us according to their own pleasure, but he for OUR advantage, (ὡς τοῦ μεταλαβῆναι) in order to OUR partaking of his holiness.

11 Now no chastisement indeed, for the present, seemeth to be MATTER of joy, but of sorrow: Nevertheless, afterwards, it returns the peaceful¹ fruit of righteousness to them who are trained by it.²

12 Wherefore, bring to their right position¹

despising the shame of suffering as a malefactor, and sat down at the right hand of the throne of God. See chap. viii. 1. note 3.

3 Wherefore, attentively consider the dignity of Jesus your leader, who, before he was thus rewarded, patiently endured such calumny, opposition, and persecution from sinners against himself, that ye may not be weary, being dispirited in your minds through the continuance of the persecution.

4 Your sufferings are far short of those which Christ endured. For not yet hath the blood of any of you been shed in combating against your wicked persecutors. See Prof. sect. 2. paragr. 4.

5 Besides, have ye forgotten the exhortation in which God reasoneth with you as with his children? My son, do not think lightly of the Lord's chastisement, as they do who regard affliction as things accidental; neither, through too quick a feeling of the chastisement, nor by considering it as a token of God's anger, fall into despair when thou art rebuked of him.

6 Instead of being tokens of God's anger, afflictions are proofs of his love: For whom the Lord loveth he chastiseth, and sharply corrects for his faults every son whom he adopteth.

7 If then ye endure affliction, know that God beareth towards his children, giving you such correction as must be of great advantage to you. For what legitimate son is there whom his father never punishes for his faults?

8 But if ye live without that chastisement whereof all the sons of God are partakers, certainly ye are treated as bastards whose education is no object of their father's care, and not as the genuine sons of God.

9 Farther, we have had fathers of our bodies, who chastised us for our faults, and yet we loved and obeyed them: shall we not much rather, from affection and gratitude, be in subjection to the Father of our spirits, when he corrects us for our faults, to fit us for living with him for ever?

10 This submission is due to the Father of our spirits, because he corrects us with more prudence and affection than our earthly fathers. For they verily, during the few days of our childhood, chastised us according to their own will governed by passion, but he always for our advantage, that we might partake of his holiness; it being necessary to our living with him eternally, that we be holy.

11 Now no chastisement, indeed, whether from God or man, at the time it is inflicted, is the cause of joy, but of sorrow to the chastised: Nevertheless, afterwards, it gives as a reward the peaceful fruit of righteousness to them who are properly disciplined by it.

12 Wherefore, bring into the posture of action your arms which others, the joy of his human state, which he parted with, choosing to endure the cross. But in my opinion both glosses are improper, because the apostle speaks of a joy which Jesus was not in possession of, but which was set before him as the reward of his sufferings.—'The joy set before him,' is contrasted with 'the race set before us,' ver. 1.

3. Endured the cross.—The example of Christ's sufferings and reward is of powerful efficacy to animate his disciples to imitate him in suffering, that like him they may be rewarded.

Ver. 3. Attentively consider him.—Erasmus Schmidius observes, that the word ἀναλογίζομαι being used to denote the accurate observation of arithmetical and geometrical proportions, it signifies to consider Christ with the greatest accuracy of observation. This the Hebrews were to do, that they might understand the difference between Christ and them: For, by attending to what the Son of God endured from sinners, they would not think much of the calumnies, the scoffing speeches, and the persecutions, which they endured from their unbelieving brethren, nor be so disheartened by them as to faint or renounce the gospel.

Ver. 4. Combating against sin.—Here the allusion is changed from running to fighting with the cestus, or to wrestling.

Ver. 5. Reasoneth.—So διαιρέται properly signifies; and so it is translated Acts xvii. 19. 'He himself entering into the synagogue, (διαιρούντος τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις) reasoned with the Jews.'

Ver. 6.—1. Whom the Lord loveth he chastiseth.—This passage of scripture, by placing the dispensations of Providence in a just light, banishes that gloom which the disorders and miseries prevailing in the world are apt to occasion. We are here in a state of education, under the tuition of God, who performs to us the office of a prudent and affectionate Father. By the various afflictions of life, he teaches us the virtues necessary to fit us for discharging the duties, and for enjoying the pleasures, of heaven. May every afflicted person firmly believe thus!

2. And scourgeth every son whom he receiveth.—This is the LXX. translation of Prov. iii. 12. which Hallett thinks more just than the common version, 'Even as a father the son in whom he delighteth.' For he saith ωδωσ signifies either and as a father, or and scourgeth; in which latter sense it is translated in the Arabic, Sy-riac, and Chaldee versions; and that firetsah signifies either he delighteth in, or he receiveth. He adds, 'There is sufficient reason to determine in favour of the translation given by the LXX. and the apostle; since, according to their rendering, the Hebrew text is complete; whereas, according to the other translation, the word beasher, in whom, must be supplied as omitted.'

Ver. 8. If ye be without chastisement.—If ye pass your lives without experiencing sickness of any kind, or worldly losses, or affliction in your families, or death of children, or injuries from your neighbours, or any of the other troubles to which the children of God are exposed, certainly ye are treated by your heavenly Father as bastards, and not as sons.

Ver. 9.—1. We have had fathers of our flesh.—By distinguishing between the fathers of our flesh and the Father of our spirits, the apostle teaches us, that we derive only our flesh from our parents, but our spirit from God. Eccles. xii. 7. Isa. lvii. 16. Zech. xli. 1.

2. Be in subjection to the Father of our spirits, and live.—The apostle seems to have had Deut. xli. 18. in his eye, where the son that was disobedient to his father was ordered to be put to death. This is one of the many instances in which the apostle conveys the most forcible reason in a single word.

Ver. 11.—1. It returns the peaceful fruit of righteousness;—that is, the peaceful fruit, which is righteousness.—Bos thinks εὐφροσύνη should be translated the pleasant, or joyful fruit; because the Hebrews commonly express pleasure or happiness by peace.—Righteousness is denominated peaceful, because it is productive of inward peace to the afflicted person himself, and of outward peace to those with whom he lives: Also it is called the fruit of God's chastisements, because afflictions have a natural influence to produce virtues in the chastised, which are the occasion of joy far greater than the pain arising from the chastisement. Psal. cxix. 67, 71, 75.

2. To them that are trained thereby.—Τημενωμένοις. This word denotes those who performed the exercises, preparatory to the real combat, naked in the palaestra. It is therefore properly translated trained persons.

Ver. 12. Bring to their right position, &c.—Here the apostle alludes to pugilists, whose strength being exhausted in the fight, the arms which hang down, and the weakened knees: (Isa. xxxv. 3.)

13 And make smooth paths¹ for your feet, that that which is lame may not be put out of joint, but rather healed.

14 Pursue¹ peace with all men, and holiness,² without which no one shall see the Lord;³

15 Carefully observing,¹ lest any one come short of the grace of God, lest some bitter root² springing up trouble you,³ and by it many be polluted;

16 Lest there be any fornicator,¹ or profane person,² as Esau,³ who for one meal gave away his birthrights.⁴

17 And ye know, that (xii. 21.) although afterwards he wished to inherit the blessing, he was reprobated;¹ for he found no place of re-their arms hang down and their knees shake. His meaning is,—do not succumb under your afflictions, but renew your exertions.

Ver. 13. Make smooth or even paths:—So τεταταγμένους must be translated, because a winding path may be as smooth and easy to walk in as one that is straight.—Theophylact saith, τεταταγμένους signifies both the track made by the wheel of a chariot, and that which is made by men's feet, a foot-path.—By 'making smooth paths for their feet,' the apostle meant their removing every obstacle which might impede them in running the Christian race; such as immoderate love of sensual pleasures, slavish fear of their enemies, &c.

Ver. 14.—1. Pursue.]—διώκετε. This metaphor is taken from the chase, in which hunters exert their utmost vigour in pursuing their prey. Hence in the Syriac version it is 'Currite post pacem.' See Rom. xii. 18. Perhaps the apostle had an eye to our Lord's saying, 'Blessed are the peace-makers.'

2. And holiness.]—The word ἁγιότης, 1 Thess. iv. 1. is translated sanctification, which properly consists in being free, both from those lusts which are gratified by means of the senses, and from those bad passions which are of a more spiritual nature, such as anger, malice, revenge, envy, &c. Where these carnal lusts and bad passions are indulged, they render the person who indulges them detestable in the sight of God. Hence they are termed a 'pollution of the flesh and of the spirit,' 2 Cor. vii. 1.—Holiness, the word adopted by our translators, hath a more extensive meaning; for besides freedom from lusts and passions, it comprehends all those pious and virtuous dispositions which constitute a religious and moral character.

3. Without which no one shall see the Lord.]—Although in the New Testament Jesus is commonly called the Lord, that title in this place denotes God the Father; because our coming to him after death is mentioned ver. 23. and because, in other passages, the felicity of the righteous in heaven is said to consist in the vision of God, Matt. v. 8. 1 Cor. xiii. 12. Rev. xxii. 4.—The apostle exhorts us to be at great pains in cleansing ourselves from vicious inclinations, and in acquiring virtuous habits, from this most important of all considerations, that no one who is polluted with vice and destitute of virtue can be admitted into heaven. To illustrate this sentiment, I will transcribe the following passage from the Spectator, who thus writeth, No. 447.—"The last use which I shall make of this remarkable property in human nature, of being delighted with those actions to which it is accustomed, is to shew how absolutely necessary it is for us to gain habits of virtue in this life, if we would enjoy the pleasures of the next. The state of bliss we call heaven, will not be capable of affecting those minds which are not qualified for it: we must in this world gain a relish of truth and virtue, if we would be able to taste that knowledge and perfection which are to make us happy in the next.—The seeds of those spiritual joys and raptures which are to rise up and flourish in the soul to all eternity, must be planted in her during this her present state of probation. In short, heaven is not to be looked upon only as the reward, but as the natural effect of a religious life."

"On the other hand, those evil spirits who by long custom have contracted in the body habits of lust and sensuality, malice and revenge, an aversion to every thing that is good, just, or laudable, are naturally seasoned and prepared for pain and misery. Their torments have already taken root in them: they cannot be happy when divested of the body, unless we may suppose that Providence will in a manner create them anew, and work a miracle in the rectification of their faculties. They may, indeed, taste a kind of malignant pleasure in those actions to which they are accustomed whilst in this life: But when they are removed from all those objects which are here apt to gratify them, they will naturally become their own tormentors, and cherish in themselves those painful habits of mind which are called, in scripture phrase, the worm which never dies. This notion of heaven and hell is so very conformable to the light of nature, that it was discovered by some of the most exalted heathens. It has been improved by many eminent divines of the last age; but there is none who has raised such noble notions out as Dr. Beot, in the first book of his Christian Life."

Ver. 15.—1. Carefully observing.]—ἐπισκοπεύετε. This word, 1 Pet. v. 2. is used to denote the exercise of the bishop's office in the hang down, and your weakened knees; that is, vigorously exert your whole faculties in the conflict with affliction:

13 And by removing every temptation, make smooth paths for your feet, that if ye are infirm in any part, that which is lame may not be wholly dislocated by your falling, but rather strengthened by proper exercise.

14 Earnestly cultivate peace with all men, with the Gentiles as well as with the Jews, and even with your enemies: But at the same time maintain holiness, without which no one shall see the Lord;

15 Carefully observing your own behaviour, and that of your brethren, lest any one, through gross sins continued in, come short of the reward God has graciously promised to the faithful; lest some apostate rising trouble you, and, by his errors and bad example, many of you be corrupted;

16 Also, lest there be among you any fornicator—any one addicted to his appetites; or any profane person, who, despising spiritual blessings, renounces them for the sake of present pleasures, as Esau did, who for one meal gave away his birthrights.

17 And his folly ye know from the scripture by this, that although afterwards he wished to inherit the blessing, he was reprobated by his father, who durst not retract words which he felt himself moved by church. But as this epistle was directed not to the clergy, but to the laity among the Hebrew Christians, it must here be taken in its literal signification—carefully observing or looking to a thing. In this precept the apostle enjoins those who are more advanced in knowledge and virtue, to admonish the less perfect when they fall into sin, or shew any disposition to apostatize from the gospel.

2. Lest some bitter root.]—Literally, 'some root of bitterness.' In scripture bitterness signifies gross sin: Acts viii. 23. 'I perceive thou art in the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity.' In particular, apostasy or idolatry is called, Deut. xxi. 18. 'a root which beareth gall and wormwood.' In the margin of our Bible, gall is rendered a poisonous herb, an herb which taints the plants growing beside it. Wherefore, 'a root of bitterness,' or 'bitter root,' is a person utterly corrupted, and who by his errors and vices corrupts others. The metaphor shews that sin is of an infectious nature, and that its consequences are deadly in the highest degree.

3. Trouble you.]—ἐκτρέψω. This verb being derived from ἐκτρέφω, a reared, signifies to hurry one along. Here it denotes the influence which false reasoning and evil example have to lead men to renounce religion. Grotius and others think the true reading of this passage is ἐκτρέφω, which by mistake was written ἐκτρέψω. But as Hallet saith, "there is no reason to alter this text in conformity to the LXX. translation of Deuteronomy, since the apostle does not cite it, but only uses so much of the language of that scripture as was to his present purpose. In this way do all Christians unblameably mingle some expressions of the scripture among their own, with some variation of words."

Ver. 16.—1. Lest there be any fornicator.]—Πορνός. For the signification of this word, see what is said of πορνεία, 1 Cor. v. 1. note 1.—The propensity of mankind to fornication made it proper for the apostle to mention that vice, as a chief instance of the vicious sensuality which excludes men from heaven.

2. Or profane person.]—A profane person is one who treats sacred things with contempt, who despises spiritual blessings, and who in the whole of his behaviour shews, that he has no sense of God nor of religion; and therefore is ranked among the most flagitious sinners, 1 Tim. i. 9.

3. As Esau.]—We do not read that Esau was a fornicator; nor does the apostle say that he was addicted to that vice. By putting a comma after the word fornicator, and by connecting the words, or profane person, with what follows, Esau will be called only a profane person. This he shewed himself to be, by selling his birthrights to his brother Jacob for a mess of pottage. It is true Jacob proposed to him to sell these; not, however, as taking advantage of his necessity, but because he had heard him on former occasions speak contemptuously of his birthrights. For what else could put it into Jacob's mind to make the proposition? Therefore, when instead of going into his father's tent, where he might have got food, Esau sold his birthrights for a mess of pottage, he shewed not only sensuality, but the greatest profanity. In the family of Abraham, the birthright entailed the eldest to spiritual as well as temporal privileges, (see the next note); all which Esau despised, as we learn from Moses, who, after relating his contemptuous speech, 'Behold I am at the point to die; and what profit shall this birthright do to me?' adds, 'Thus Esau despised his birthright,' Gen. xxv. 32. 34.

4. Gave away his birthrights.]—Before the law was given, the first-born in the family of Abraham had a right to the priesthood, Exod. xix. 22; and to a double portion, Deut. xxi. 17. And in the family of Isaac, he was lord over his brethren, Gen. xxvii. 29. 37. xlix. 3. Farther, in that family the first-born, as the root of the people of God, conveyed to his posterity all the blessings promised in the covenant: such as a right to possess the land of Canaan, and to be the father of him in whom all nations were to be blessed, and to explain and confirm these promises to his children, in his dying blessing to them; of which we have a remarkable example in Jacob, Gen. xlix.

Ver. 17.—1. He was reprobated.]—not by God, but by his father, who, when he knew that he had given the blessing to Jacob refused to retract it, being sensible from his inward feelings that he had spoken prophetically, and that God willed him to give the blessing to Jacob.

penitance, though he earnestly sought the BLESSING with tears.²

18 *Now ye shall not come to a tangible mountain*² (אֶרֶץ, 219.) which burned with fire, and to blackness, and to darkness, and to tempest,³

19 *And to the noise of a trumpet, and to the sound of words,*¹ the hearers of which earnestly entreated that there might not be added to them a word,

20 (עַל, 98.) Although they could not bear that which was strictly commanded, (Exod. xix. 13.), *Even if a beast touch the mountain, it shall be stoned, or shot through with an arrow.*¹

21 And so terrible was that which appeared, THAT Moses said, *I am exceedingly afraid and quake.*¹

22 But ye shall come (see note 1. on ver. 18.) *to Mount Zion,*¹ and to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem,² and to ten thousands of angels;

2. Though he earnestly sought (עָרַב, it) the blessing with tears.]—The relative pronoun it, in this passage, stands for the blessing, the remote antecedent. For Esau did not seek repentance, but 'the blessing, with tears,' Gen. xxvii. 34.—This example, as Beza well observes, the apostle set before the Hebrews to shew them, that if, for the sake of present pleasures, any of them like Esau profanely cast away their heavenly birthrights by apostasy, they never should regain them.

Ver. 18.—1. Ye shall not come.]—Οὐ γὰρ ἀγγεῖον ἀνθρώπων, literally ye have not come. But here, and in ver. 22, the past time is put for the future; as is plain from this, that in the latter part of his discourse the apostle mentions particulars which cannot be applied to believers in the present life; such as their being come 'to myriads of angels, and to the spirits of just men made perfect.' See Rom. iv. 10.—Farther, that the apostle doth not speak of what was present, but of something future, will appear, if we consider that he here contrasteth the birthrights of the spiritual seed of Abraham with those of his natural progeny. The natural seed had a right to possess the earthly Canaan: and prepare them for that inheritance, they were brought to Sinai to receive the law which they were to observe in Canaan. But their spiritual seed by their birthright being heirs of the heavenly country, shall be prepared for it and brought into it in a different manner.

2. To a tangible mountain.]—Ἔρημος καὶ πυρρὰ, a mountain capable of being handled or touched; but which ye will be prohibited to approach. The meaning is, Believers, Abraham's spiritual seed, in their way to the heavenly country, are not, like his natural seed in their way to Canaan, to be brought to a tangible mountain, such as Sinai was, to hear the law, by which they are to be governed in the heavenly country, declared in the terrible manner in which the law of the earthly country was proclaimed; but they are to be brought directly to the heavenly mount of Zion, where God by some visible manifestation will reside, and to the city of the living God, &c.

3. And to tempest.]—Josephus, Antiq. lib. 3. c. 5. tells us, that at the giving of the law, strong winds came down, and manifested the presence of God. Perhaps this prefigured what happened when the new law, the gospel, was given: For, previous to the descent of the Holy Ghost, 'there came a sound from heaven, as of a mighty rushing wind,' Acts ii. 2.

Ver. 19. And to the sound of words.]—The words of the ten commandments were pronounced by the angel who personated God, (See Heb. ii. 2. note 2.), with a voice so loud and terrible, that the whole six hundred thousand who were able to go to war, with the women and children, and old men, heard them, Deut. v. 22. and were exceedingly frightened.

Ver. 20. Or shot through with an arrow.]—This clause is wanting in many ancient MSS., and in the Syriac, Vulgate, Coptic, Arabic, and Ethiopic versions.—If it is an addition to the text, it is taken from Exod. xix. 13.

Ver. 21. Moses said, I am exceedingly afraid and quake.]—There is no mention of this circumstance in the history. But seeing the apostle speaks of it in a letter to the Hebrews as a thing known to them, some commentators are of opinion that they had it from tradition, or that it was recorded in some Jewish writing then extant.—I think that something like this speech is insinuated in the account inspiration to utter, (see ver. 20. note); for he found no place of repentance in his father, though he earnestly sought the blessing with tears. Instead of repenting, his father confirmed the blessing to Jacob, Gen. xxvii. 33.

18 Now, that ye may understand the value of your birthrights as Abraham's seed, (Gal. iii. 18.), which I am exhorting you not to throw away, know, that ye shall not, like your fathers, come to a tangible mountain which burned with fire, to shew that God is a consuming fire to the impenitent; and to blackness, and to darkness, which was an emblem of the obscurity of the Mosaic dispensation; and to tempest,

19 And to the noise of a trumpet, like that by which the angels called the Israelites together to hear the law, and which, by waxing louder and louder, terrified the Israelites exceedingly; and to the sound of words uttered by God himself, the hearers of which, strongly impressed with the holiness and power of their lawgiver and judge, earnestly entreated to hear not a word more, Exod. xx. 18, 19;

20 Although, before they were affrighted by the voice of God, they could not bear that which was strictly commanded, Even if a beast touch the mountain while the symbol of the divine presence rests on it, it shall be stoned or shot through with an arrow. It seems they expected, by drawing near, to see God without being terrified.

21 And so terrible was that manifestation of the divine presence which appeared, that Moses cried to God, I am exceedingly afraid and quake.

22 But ye shall come to a place which I call Mount Zion, because there God will appear to you, not in the terrible of his greatness as on Sinai, but in the beauties of his goodness; and instead of being brought to any earthly city to worship, ye shall be brought to the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, and in your worship shall associate with ten thousands of angels; which Moses himself hath given of the matter. It is said, Exod. xix. 16. 'On the third day, in the morning, there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, so that all the people that was in the camp trembled. 18. And Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire; and the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace, and the whole mount quaked greatly. 19. And when the voice of the trumpet sounded long, and waxed louder and louder, Moses spake, and God answered him by a voice.' What follows in the history is an amplification of the preceding narration, according to the manner of the sacred historians, and not an account of things which happened afterwards. This the attentive reader will easily perceive, who compares the amplification with the former narration: Ver. 20. 'And the Lord came down upon Mount Sinai, (this is mentioned ver. 18.), on the top of the mount: And the Lord called Moses up to the top of the mount, and Moses went up.' It was then 'Moses spake, and God answered him by a voice,' as related ver. 19. It seems when he drew near to the thick darkness, out of which issued the thunders, and lightnings, and the great fire which burned up to the midst of heaven, his courage failing him, he spake the words mentioned Heb. xii. 21. 'I am exceedingly afraid and tremble;' and God answered him by a voice, encouraging him to lay aside his fears. Wherefore, taking courage, he became so composed as to hold that conversation with God which is recorded Exod. xix. 21.—24.

Ver. 22.—1. Ye shall come to Mount Zion.]—Mount Zion being opposed to Sinai, the tangible mountain, is no mountain on earth, but is the heavenly Mount Zion; as the Jerusalem mentioned in the subsequent clause is the heavenly Jerusalem.—When David took the stronghold of Zion, he called it 'the city of David,' 2 Sam. v. 7.; and put the ark of the Lord in the city of David, 2 Sam. vi. 12. 17. 'in his place in the midst of the tabernacle which he had pitched for it.' From this time God is said to have 'dwelt in Zion,' which on that account was called 'his holy hill of Zion,' Psal. ii. 6.; and 'to love the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob,' Psal. lxxxvii. 2. Wherefore, Mount Zion being the residence of the manifestation of the divine presence on earth, among the natural seed of Abraham, before the temple was built, it was duly made the type of that place in the heavenly country, where the manifestation of the divine presence among the spiritual seed is to be made through all eternity. See Heb. ix. 5. note.

2. The city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem.]—This is the city which Abraham expected, and 'of which the builder and ruler is God.' It is called, Gal. iv. 26. 'Jerusalem which is above,' and, Rev. iii. 12. 'New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from God,' and, Rev. xxi. 2. 'The holy city, new Jerusalem.' These names the apostles were directed by the Spirit to give to this city, to shew that Jerusalem in Canaan was a type or emblem of it. See 2 Cor. v. 1. note 2.—The intelligent reader no doubt has remarked, that here the happiness of the just, after the resurrection, is represented as in part arising from the nature of the place of their abode. The same idea is suggested by the obvious meaning of the accounts given by Christ and his apostles of the felicity of good men in the life to come: John xiv. 2. 'In my father's house (of the universe) are many mansions:—I go to prepare a place for you.'—2 Pet. iii. 13. 'According to his promise we expect new heavens and a new earth, wherein

23 To the general assembly¹ and church of the first-born² who are enrolled in heaven,³ and to God the Judge⁴ of all, and to the spirits of just men (πνεύματα, Heb. xi. 40. note) made perfect,⁵

24 And to Jesus the Mediator¹ of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling² which speaketh better things than that of Abel.³

25 Take care that ye refuse not¹ him speaking.² For if they did not escape who refused from heaven by his Son. For, if the Israelites did not escape punishment, righteousness.¹ And St. John, who in vision had the state of the church set before him in its various stages till its consummation, saw the new heaven and the new earth appear after the present fabric had passed away, Rev. xxi. 1.—That these accounts of the future felicity of the righteous are not to be interpreted metaphorically, may be gathered from the gospel doctrine of the resurrection, whereby we are assured that we shall be united to a real body, consisting of organs of sensation and of members fitted for action. See 1 Cor. xv. 44. note. For if our raised bodies are to have members and organs of sensation, we must also have a material habitation, where we can have the use of these members and organs, and derive enjoyment from objects suited to them. The reason is plain; as a body without members and senses would be no benefit, so members and senses without objects would be useless. Hence 'the redemption of the body from corruption' is called, Rom. viii. 19. 'the manifestation of the sons of God'; and, ver. 21. 'their glorious liberty'; and, ver. 30. 'their adoption.'

Farther, as the gospel speaks consistently, when, together with the resurrection of the body, it promises a new heaven and a new earth, so it speaks agreeably to the ancient revelations, which promised to the spiritual seed of Abraham the eternal possession of an heavenly country, under the figure and pledge of giving his natural seed the everlasting possession of Canaan. And though in these revelations little is said concerning the nature of the new heaven and new earth, we may believe, as was observed Esa. v. sect. 4. last paragraph, that it will be perfectly suited to the nature of our glorious bodies, and that the pleasures which we shall derive from the beauty and convenience of our future habitation, will be as much superior to the pleasures of this earth, as the members and senses of our glorious bodies shall be more perfect than our present fleshly members and senses. In a word, seeing God himself is to dwell with the righteous in the heavenly country, it will, as becometh the residence of God, be magnificent and glorious, and full of pleasures. See Spectator, vol. vii. No. 680.

Ver. 23.—1. To the general assembly.]—Πανήγυρις. This word signifies a great concourse of people, drawn together from all quarters on some public and joyful occasion; such as a religious festival, annual games, a great market or fair; from which last occasion the Greek word is derived. If the allusion to the transactions at Sinai is continued here, this first general assembly, or concourse of the subjects of God, called from his dominions everywhere, will be held for the purpose of hearing the laws of the heavenly country, which they are to inhabit, promulgated.

2. And church of the first-born.]—The first-born of man and beast, being reckoned more excellent than the subsequent births, were appropriated to God. Hence the Israelites had the name of God's first-born given them, to shew that they belonged to God, and were more excellent than the rest of the nations: Wherefore, 'the general assembly and church of the first-born,' as distinguished from 'the spirits of just men made perfect,' mentioned afterwards, means the pious Israelites of all ages, who, having imitated Abraham in his faith and obedience, are heirs of the heavenly country; whereas 'the spirits of just men made perfect,' are all in every age and nation who have feared God and wrought righteousness.

3. Who are enrolled in heaven.]—See Philip. iv. 3. note 4. This signifies that they are denizens of heaven, entitled to live there, and to enjoy its privileges.

4. And to God the Judge of all.]—As the Son, after the judgment, will deliver up the kingdom to the Father, the Father is fitly styled 'the Judge of all,' or universal Monarch, agreeably to the phraseology of the Hebrews, who called those persons Judges who exercised sovereign rule in Israel.

5. And to the spirits of just men made perfect.]—In this enumeration the particulars are not placed according to their dignity, owing, perhaps, to the apostle's being greatly affected by the contemplation of these grand objects. For in such cases people neglect to arrange their discourse methodically. Or, 'the spirits of just men made perfect,' might be mentioned after God the Judge of all, and before Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, to shew that on account of the severity of the trial which the just have sustained, they are more the objects of the love of God and of Christ than the angels, and even more excellent in respect of their virtues. Hence they are called, James i. 18. 'a kind of first-fruits of his creatures.'

Ver. 24.—1. And to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant.]—Jesus is called 'the Mediator of the new covenant,' not because he exercises the office of Mediator after he hath delivered up the mediatorial kingdom to the Father, for at that period his office of Mediator will cease; but because he exercised that office before he delivered up the kingdom, and in the exercise of that office he hath brought the people of God into heaven.

2. And to the blood of sprinkling.]—This is an allusion both to the

23 To the general assembly and church of the first-born, brought from the different parts of the universe to worship God. These are enrolled in heaven as citizens. And, instead of standing afar off, as your fathers did at Sinai, ye shall come near to God the supreme ruler of the whole universe, and to the spirits of just men made perfect by their union with their glorified bodies, and their introduction into heaven, 24 And to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, and to his blood, which is the true blood of sprinkling typified by the Levitical sprinklings, and which, by crying for mercy to penitents, speaketh better things than the blood of Abel, which cried for vengeance on his murderer.

25 Take care that ye disobey not God who is now speaking to you from heaven by his Son. For, if the Israelites did not escape punishment sprinkling of the Israelites with blood, when the covenant was made at Sinai, and to the sprinkling of the blood of the sin-offerings before the veil, and on the mercy-seat. For the former sprinkling typified the efficacy of Christ's blood in procuring the new covenant, and the latter, its efficacy in procuring the pardon of sin for all them who believe and obey God.—'The blood of sprinkling,' by an unusual figure, is put here for the effect of the blood of sprinkling. The saints, when admitted into heaven, shall come to the full enjoyment of the blessings procured by the sprinkling of Christ's blood.

In this latter part of the description of the joys of heaven, we are taught that they will arise chiefly from our seeing and conversing with the virtuous of our own kind; and not with them alone, but with the different orders of angels, and with Jesus, and even with God himself, who will manifest his presence there in a much more glorious manner than he does here by his works; and that the scheme of our salvation, by the shedding of Christ's blood, will afford matter of delightful contemplation to the redeemed, and be recollected by them with transports of gratitude through all eternity. Farther, seeing the pot with the manna, and Aaron's rod which budded, and the tables of the covenant, were, by God's command, placed in the inward tabernacle which represented heaven, to intimate, as was observed, Heb. ix. 4. note 3. that in heaven the people of God will recollect the particular interpositions of Providence by which, while on earth, they were prepared for the employments and enjoyments of heaven, and that they will be greatly delighted with the recollection of these interpositions; may we not suppose, that our happiness in heaven will arise also from our searching into the works of creation, by which God hath so illustriously displayed his perfections? For if our feeble pursuit, and imperfect acquisition of knowledge in the present life, afford us such exquisite pleasure, how great must the entertainment of the saints in heaven be, when the works of God are fully laid open to their view, and their faculties are strengthened to examine them! The pleasures which the blessed will derive from this source must be unspeakable; not only because they will be enhanced by the charm of novelty, but because every new acquisition will stimulate them to proceed in the search, and because, although it be continued through eternity, the immense subject will never be exhausted by them. The desire of knowledge is so deeply engraved in the human mind, and the pleasure flowing from its acquisition is so exquisite, that to use the words of the Spectator, No. 626. 'I cannot think he detracts from the state of the blessed, who conceives them to be perpetually employed in fresh searches into nature, and to eternity advancing into the fathomless depths of the divine perfections. In this thought there is nothing but what doth honour to these glorified spirits, provided still it be remembered, that their desire of more proceeds not from their disrelishing what they possess; and the pleasure of a new enjoyment is not with them measured by its novelty, (which is a thing merely foreign and accidental), but by its real intrinsic value. After an acquaintance of many thousand years with the works of God, the beauty and magnificence of the creation fills them with the same pleasing wonder and profound awe, which Adam felt himself seized with as he first opened his eyes upon this glorious scene.'

The grand description of the heavenly country, the inheritance of the spiritual seed of Abraham, found in ver. 22. and of its joys in ver. 23. 24. the apostle gave, to make the Hebrews sensible how foolish it would be in them, for the sake either of the pleasures or of the pains of the transient life, profanely to cast away their birthright, whereby they were entitled to inherit the heavenly country.

3. Speaketh better things (κατα το Αβελ) than that of Abel.—The masculine article τὸν cannot agree with αἷμα understood, which is a neuter word. Wherefore we must adopt the reading of the MSS. mentioned by Mill, which have τὸν in place of τὸν, and which seems to have been followed by the Syriac translator: or we must supply either αἷμα τοῦ ἀδικητός, the speech of the blood of Abel, or ἐκτίσθη τοῦ ἀδικητός, the sprinkling of the blood of Abel, namely, on the ground, in allusion to Gen. iv. 10. where God saith, 'the voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground.'

Ver. 25.—1. Take care that ye refuse not.]—Here the apostle turned his discourse to the unbelieving Hebrews; and by calling to their remembrance the sin and punishment of their forefathers, who refused to obey God when he commanded them to go into Canaan, and who for that sin were all destroyed in the wilderness, he shewed them the danger of disobeying God, who commanded them by his Son to receive the gospel.

2. Him speaking.]—Τὸν λαλοῦντα. In this expression there is a reference to Heb. i. 1. where we are told, that God, (ὁ λαλοῦν) 'who spake to the fathers by the prophets, (λαλοῦν) hath in these last days spoken to us by his Son. Wherefore, the Him speaking, whom the Hebrews were not to refuse, was God the Father, who at that time was actually speaking to them the gospel from heaven by 26 God's voice at the giving of the law shook the earth, in token that idolatry was to be shaken in Canaan by the law of Moses. But now concerning his speaking by his Son he hath promised, saying, Yet once I shall not shake the earth only—the heathen idolatry and the powers which support it—but also the heaven; the Mosaic worship and Jewish state.

27 Now this speech, Yet once, signifieth the removing of the things shaken; the abolition of the former religions, and the destruction of the powers which uphold them, as of things which were his Son. For, having commissioned his son to make the gospel revelation, and having given him the apostles as his assistants, John xvii. 6. and, according to his promise, having sent down the Holy Ghost from heaven upon them, whatever they speak by inspiration, was really spoken of God by his Son.

3. For if they did not escape who refused him delivering an oracle on earth.]—That χρηματιζον signifies to deliver an oracle, see proved, Heb. vii. 6. note 3.—Although των λαλωντων in the preceding clause denotes God's speaking the gospel from heaven by his Son, των ουρανωσιν χρηματιζοντα does not signify God speaking the law from Sinai: For on that occasion the Israelites did not refuse either God or Moses; neither was there any punishment inflicted on them, to escape from. I therefore think the oracle which the Israelites refused to obey, was that which God delivered to them by Moses in Kadesh, after they left Horeb, and had gone forward three or four days' journey, Heb. iii. 8. note 2: For on that occasion, being commanded in the name of God to go up directly and take possession of Canaan, their refusal provoked God so exceedingly, as to make him swear that none of the grown-up persons who had come out of Egypt should enter Canaan, but that all of them should fall in the wilderness. And since all of them did actually fall, except Caleb and Joshua, who were not engaged in the rebellion, the apostle had good reason, from their not escaping, to caution the Hebrews against turning away from God, who was then speaking to them from heaven by his Son. He had given them a caution of the same kind, Heb. ii. 1—4, by putting them in mind of the punishments which were inflicted on their fathers, from time to time, for their various transgressions of 'the words spoken by angels'; that is, their transgressions of the law of Moses.

4. Much more we shall not escape who turn away from him speaking from heaven.]—The words 'shall not escape,' are necessarily supplied here from the clause immediately preceding. And with respect to the word speaking, it is taken from the first clause of the verse; and being followed in this place with the words ουρανωσιν, from heaven, it is reasonable to think that the same words ought to be supplied in the first clause, thus, 'Take care that ye refuse not him speaking from heaven.'

Ver. 26.—1. His voice then shook the earth.]—His voice does not mean Moses's voice; for when he spake the oracle, or divine command to the Israelites to go into Canaan, his voice was not accompanied with any earthquake. Neither does it mean the Son's voice; for he did not speak the law. See Heb. i. 2. note 2. But the meaning is, that God's voice shook the earth at the giving of the law. Accordingly we are told, Exod. xix. 18. that 'the whole mount quaked greatly,' before God spake the ten commandments. Now as the promise, 'Yet once I shake not the earth only, but also the heaven,' is a declaration of God's resolution to remove both the idolatrous worship of the heathens, and the ceremonial worship of the Jews, by the introduction of the gospel dispensation, (see ver. 27. note 1.), may we not suppose, that the former shaking of the earth, that is, of Mount Sinai, alluded to in the clause, 'yet once I shake not the earth only,' and mentioned in the next verse, was emblematical of the removing of the idolatrous worship of the Canaanites by the introduction of the law of Moses into Canaan?

2. But now he hath promised.]—As the word νυν, then, in the first clause, refers to the shaking of the earth at the giving of the law, the word νυν, now, in this clause, which stands opposed to it, must refer to the introduction of the new dispensation, and to the alteration which was to be made in the religious and political state of the world, by the preaching of the gospel.

3. Saying, Yet once I shake not the earth only, &c.]—The unbelieving Jews were violently prejudiced against the gospel, because it abolished the law of Moses. Wherefore, to reconcile them to that event, the apostle quoted this prophecy of Haggai, in which not only the destruction of the heathen idolatry, but the removal of the Mosaic institutions, together with the alteration which was to be made in the political state of the nations of the earth, are foretold under the idea of God's shaking the heavens and the earth, &c. Haggai ii. 6. 'Thus saith the Lord of hosts, Yet once, it is a little while, and I will shake the heavens and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land. And I will shake all nations: For the desire of all nations shall come; and I will fill this house with glory.'

In quoting this prophecy, the apostle hath mentioned only the first words of it; and even these he hath not given completely, nor in the order in which they stand in the Hebrew text: for he hath omitted the clause, 'It is a little while,' and hath mentioned the shaking of the earth before the shaking of the heavens. But with respect to the apostle's mentioning only the first words of this prophecy, it is sufficient to reply, that Paul, in quoting passages from the Jewish scriptures, mentions only the first words of these passages, because the persons to whom he wrote were well acquainted with them, and would naturally recollect the whole. Besides, in the instance under consideration, his argument being founded on the whole of the prophecy, he knew that that circumstance would lead the Hebrews to recollect the whole.—Next, with respect to the clause, 'It is a little while,' which the apostle has omitted, seeing the LXX. have likewise omitted it, Pierce thinks the omission was occasioned, either by the carelessness of transcribers, or by the officiousness of some ignorant Christians, who wished to make the LXX. version agree with the apostle's quotation. But be that as it may, since the apostle's omission of the clause, and his mentioning the shaking of the earth before the shaking of the heaven, make no change in the sense of the prophecy, these alterations are of little consequence, especially as they may have been occasioned by the apostle's quoting the prophecy from memory.

4. But also the heaven.]—In the prophetic writings, the Jewish state and worship are called the heaven, either because they were appointed by heaven, or because the Jewish church assembled round the tabernacle to worship, was an emblem of the church of the first-born assembled round the symbol of the divine presence in heaven to worship.—Here it is proper to observe, that in Haggai's prophecy, where the alteration which was to be made in the religious and political state of the world, is foretold, by calling it 'a shaking of the heaven, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land,' and 'a shaking of all nations,' God alluded to Mount Sinai's 'quaking greatly' before he spake the ten commandments, Exod. xix. 18; consequently by this allusion he hath taught us, that his shaking of the earth, before he spake the law, was emblematical of his shaking the heathen idolatry by the introduction of the law of Moses into Canaan.—Next, it is to be observed that Haggai, after foretelling the alteration which was to be made in the religious and political state of the world, under the idea of 'shaking all nations,' adds, 'For (so the Hebrew particle אז in this passage must be translated) the desire of all nations shall come.' This God mentioned to shew, that the great alteration in the state of the world which he foretold, was to be effected by the coming of the person whom he calls 'the desire of all nations.' And to this the fact agrees. For the destruction of the heathen idolatry, and the abolition of the Mosaic worship, and the change which took place in the political state of the nations of the earth, have all been brought to pass by the coming of Christ, and the setting up of his kingdom through the preaching of the gospel.

That the destruction of the heathen idolatry, the abolition of the Levitical worship, and an alteration in the political state of the world, were foretold by Haggai under the idea of 'shaking the heavens and the earth,' &c. the apostle hath taught us in his comment on the speech, 'Yet once,' &c. See ver. 27. note 1.

Ver. 27.—1. Now this speech, Yet once, (see note 3. on this verse), signifieth the removing of the things shaken.]—The ellipsis in the beginning of this verse is supplied by our translators as follows: This word yet once. But it is so supplied improperly, because it leads the reader to fancy that the word yet once signifieth the removing of the things shaken; whereas that idea is signified, not by the word yet once, but by the whole clause of which the word yet once is the beginning; namely, 'yet once I shake not the earth only, but also the heavens.' Wherefore, to suggest this idea, the translation should run in the following manner: 'Now this speech, yet once, signifieth the removing of the things shaken.'—Σαλευσιντες, shaken, is a metaphor taken from ships, which are tossed backwards and forwards by the winds and waves, till they are sunk or beaten to pieces.—That the Jewish worship, and the heathen idolatry, and the powers which supported these forms of worship, are the things foretold here to be shaken, and that they are to be removed, is evident from God himself, who thus explains the shaking of the heavens and the earth: Hag. ii. 21. 'Speak to Zerubbabel, governor of Judah, saying, I will shake the heavens and the earth; 22. And I will overthrow the throne of kingdoms, and I will destroy the strength of the kingdoms of the heathen, and I will overthrow the chariots, &c. For, 'the throne of kingdoms,' as distinguished from 'the kingdoms of the heathen, is the throne of the kingdom of the Jewish princes, the overthrowing of which is foretold by the 'shaking of the heavens.' See ver. 26. note 4. And 'the kingdoms of the heathen' are the kingdoms of the worshippers of idols, the destruction of which is foretold by 'the shaking of the earth.' Wherefore, all these kingdoms being to be destroyed, the forms of worship which were upheld by them were of course to be removed.

2. As of things that were made, 1.—Οτι, ποσειδισιν. Because the word ποσειδισιν sometimes signifies to appoint, (see Heb. iii. 2. note 1.), Pierce thinks the apostle's argument is, that the Jewish church and worship having been appointed by God, might be set aside when God saw fit. But since the heathen worship is likewise said to be shaken, I think the expression, 'things that were made,' is an ellipsis for 'things that were made with hands,' which, according to the Hebrew idiom, denotes things of an inferior and even imperfect nature; consequently might be applied, not only to the heathen rites, but to the Mosaic form of worship, which was inferior to the Christian.

3. That the things not to be shaken may remain. [—This the apostle rightly infers from the expression, Yet once. For as it implies, that God would make but one alteration more in the religious worship of the world, it certainly follows, that the form to be substituted in the room of the things to be shaken and removed, shall be permanent. The gospel therefore will remain to the end of the world, as the only form of religion acceptable to God.]

Ver. 28. Wherefore, we having received a kingdom not to be shaken. [—ἀπὸ θεοῦ ἀπαράλυστον βασιλείαν. This is an allusion to Dan. vii. 18. 'The saints of the Most High (ἁγιοὶ τοῦ ἰσχυροῦ) shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever.' In this allusion the apostle followed Christ, who often called the gospel dispensation the kingdom of heaven.]

2. Let us hold fast a gift. [—So χαρὶς is translated 2 Cor. viii. 4. and made with hands—things of an inferior and imperfect nature; that the things not to be shaken, the gospel-church and worship, may remain to the end of the world.]

28 Wherefore we, the disciples of God's Son, having in the gospel dispensation received the kingdom foretold by Daniel to be given to the saints, and which is never to be shaken, let us hold fast that gift, that excellent dispensation of religion by which we can worship God acceptably, if we do it with reverence and religious fear.

29 For, even under the gospel, our God is as much a consuming fire to infidels and apostates, as under the law.

should be translated here, as that sense of the word agrees well with the apostle's purpose in this exhortation.

3. With reverence. [—Μετὰ φόβου, literally with modesty. The word is used by heathen authors, for that reverence with which men approach their princes or superiors. Now, modesty being a fear of doing something unbecoming, it is very properly used to denote the fear with which one, who is sensible of his own unworthiness, approaches the Deity in acts of worship.]

Ver. 28. Even our God is a consuming fire. [—The apostle had now in his eye Deut. iv. 24. where, by telling the Israelites, 'The Lord thy God is a consuming fire,' Moses put them in mind of the destruction of Korah and his companions. Wherefore, by adopting Moses's words, the apostle brings the same instance of vengeance to our remembrance, that we may be deterred from apostasy, disobedience, and all irreverence in the worship of God, who, though he appears full of mercy in the gospel, is as much determined to punish the rebellious as ever.]

CHAPTER XIII.

View and Illustration.

This chapter begins with an exhortation to the Hebrews to exercise love to the brethren, hospitality to strangers, and compassion to the imprisoned and afflicted: chastity likewise is recommended, together with disinterestedness, and a careful imitation of their teachers, whose trial was ended, and who had shewed great fortitude in suffering for their faith, ver. 1-8.

Next, the Hebrews were desired to beware of being tossed about with those discordant doctrines which were introduced by foreign, that is, unauthorized teachers; especially those pernicious doctrines, concerning the efficacy of the Levitical sacrifices to procure the pardon of sin, which the Judaizing teachers inculcated with great earnestness. Their giving heed to these errors the apostle was anxious to prevent, because, if they trusted to the Levitical atonements for pardon, they would lose the benefit of the sacrifice of Christ. This, the apostle told them, their own law taught them figuratively, by prohibiting the priests and people to eat of those sacrifices whose blood was carried into the holy places to make atonement.—And being unwilling to quit the subject, he added, that because the carcasses of the sin-offerings were ordered to be burnt without the camp as things unclean, ver. 11.—so Jesus, who sanctified the people with his own blood, suffered as a malefactor or unclean person without the gates of Jerusalem, ver. 12.—These particulars the apostle mentioned, to shew, that all the Levitical sin-offerings were types of Christ, whose example in suffering ignominy and punishment for men he desired the Hebrews to imitate from gratitude, by willingly suffering reproach and persecution for his sake, ver. 13.—And this they might do the more easily, as they knew they had no continuing city here, but were seeking one in the life to come, ver. 14.—In the mean time, he exhorted them to worship God, not in the Jewish but in the Christian manner, by offering through Christ the sacrifice of praise to God continually, ver. 15.—and to be zealous in doing good works, because worship, accompanied with such works, are sacrifices far more pleasing to God than the sacrifices of beasts, ver. 16.

Again, because the Hebrews, through the prejudices of their education, were in danger of not hearkening to their teachers when they inculcated the true doctrines of the gospel, he ordered them to be obedient to their spiritual guides, and to esteem them highly as persons who watched for their souls, ver. 17.—And requested them to pray for him, because he assured them that he had maintained a good conscience in all the things he had written to them, ver. 18.—Then gave them his apostolical benediction in a most elegant form, ver. 20, 21.—and besought them to take in good part the instruction contained in this letter, which he acknowledged was a short one, considering the variety and importance of the subjects he had handled in it, ver. 22.

Having thus finished his exhortations, the apostle informed the Hebrews that he had sent away Timothy on some important business, but promised, if he returned in time, to bring him with him when he visited them, ver. 23.—In the mean while, he desired them to present his salutation to all the rulers of their church; meaning, I suppose, the apostles and elders at Jerusalem: also, in his name, to salute all the brethren and saints; and sent them the salutation of the brethren in Italy, ver. 24.—Then concluded with giving them his apostolical benediction in a more short form, ver. 25.

3 By your prayers and good offices assist them who are in bonds for their religion, as equally liable to be bound for that good cause; and them who suffer any kind of evil, as being yourselves also in the body, subject to adversity.

4 In opposition to the notions of the Essenes, let marriage be esteemed an honourable state among all ranks, and let adultery be avoided. For fornicators and adulterers, though not punished by men, God will severely punish, as invaders of their neighbour's dearest rights.

5 However poor ye may be, shew no immoderate love of money in your dealings; being contented with what things ye have. In every difficulty rely on God. For, when he ordered Joshua to conduct the Israelites, he himself said, (Josh. i. 5.), 'As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee, I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee.'

6 So that when afflicted, but especially when persecuted, taking courage, we may say with the Psalmist, (Psal. cxviii. 6. LXX.), 'The Lord is my helper, and I will not be afraid of any evil that man can do to me in opposition to him.'

7 Remember your teachers who have preached to you the word of God; of whose conversation attentively considering the ending, imitate their faith in the doctrines, and precepts, and promises of the gospel, that when ye end your conversation, ye may be supported as they were.

8 Jesus Christ, yesterday and to-day, is the same powerful, gra-form of men, supposed them to be men on a journey; and, though unacquainted with them, invited and entertained them with the greatest hospitality, without knowing them to be angels. This is mentioned, not to raise in us the expectation of entertaining angels, but to make us sensible that the unknown persons, to whom we shew kindness, may be persons of the greatest worth, and may to us, as the angels were to Abraham and Lot, be the occasion of great blessings.

Ver. 3. Being yourselves also in the body.—The precepts contained in this and in the following verses, but especially the precept in this verse, on account of the simplicity, brevity, and beauty of the language, and the strength of the reasons added to support them, may be compared with the most elegant of the precepts of Epictetus, or of any of the most famed heathen philosophers; and on the comparison they will be found by persons of taste to excel them all.

Ver. 4.—1. Let marriage be honourable.—I have supplied the substantive verb BE here, to make this verse run, as the preceding and following verses, in the imperative mood.

2. For fornicators.—This is the Vulgate translation, Fornicatores enim.

Ver. 5.—1. Let your behaviour.—The word BEHAVIOUR is used likewise by Plato, and other Greek writers, to denote one's manner of living.

2. Being contented with the things ye have.—The apostle did not mean by this to preclude the Hebrews, or any person, from using lawful means for bettering their circumstances; but that, having used such means, they were to be contented, although God did not make them successful.—This advice was peculiarly suited to the Hebrew Christians in their then persecuted state, see ver. 6. It is also proper for persons in the most prosperous situations; because, by forbidding the immoderate love of money, and enjoining contentment with the things we have, it teaches us to derive our happiness from the possession and exercise of virtuous dispositions, rather than from the enjoyment of riches.—The argument, ver. 6. by which the apostle enforces his precept, leads us to think that he means contentment with our lot, whatever it may be. In this large sense the following passage from the Spectator, No. 574. is an excellent illustration of the apostle's precept: Says he, "There never was any system besides that of Christianity, which could effectually produce in the mind of man the virtue I have been hitherto speaking of. In order to make us content with our present condition, many of the ancient philosophers tell us that our discontent only hurts ourselves, without being able to make any alteration in our circumstances; others, that whatever evil befalls us is derived to us by a fatal necessity, to which the gods themselves are subject; while others very gravely tell the man who is miserable, that it is necessary he should be so to keep up the harmony of the universe, and that the scheme of Providence would be troubled and perverted were he otherwise. These, and the like considerations, rather silence than satisfy a man. They may shew him that his discontent is unreasonable, but are by no means sufficient to relieve it. They rather give despair than consolation. In a word, a man might reply to one of these comforters, as Augustus did to his friend who advised him not to grieve for the death of a person whom he loved, because his grief could not fetch him again,—It is for that very reason, said the emperor, that I grieve.—Religion bears a more tender regard to human nature. It prescribes to a very miserable man the means of bettering his condition; nay, it shews him, that the bearing of his afflictions as he ought to do, will naturally end in the removal of them. It makes him easy here, because it can make him happy hereafter.—Upon the whole, a contented mind is the greatest blessing a man can enjoy in the present world; and if in the present life his happiness arises from the subduing of his desires, it will arise in the next from the gratification of them." The same author, in the same essay, as a proper means of acquiring the virtue of contentment, advises a man,—1. To set the good things which he possesses in opposition to those which he doth not possess. For thus he will be sensible, that the things which he enjoys are many more in number, and of much greater value, than those which he wants; and for the want of which he is unhappy. 2. Under affliction, to reflect how much more unhappy he might be than he really is. The former consideration belongs to those who are in easy circumstances: this regards those who are under the pressure of some misfortune. To such it will be an alleviation of their sufferings to compare them with those of others. He adds, that Bishop Fell, who wrote the life of Dr. Hammond, saith, that good man, who laboured under a complication of distempers, used, when he had the gout upon him, to thank God that it was not the stone; and when he had the stone, that he had not both these distempers upon him at the same time.

3. Himself hath said.—AVRE; ἑαυτοῦ εἰρηγόρως. This AVRE; εἰρηγόρως is of much greater authority than the AVRE; εἰς of the Pythagoreans. And by quoting it on this occasion the apostle teaches us that every faithful servant of God, in those difficulties to which he is exposed, may apply to himself God's promise to Joshua while he endeavours to do his duty.

4. Utterly forsake thee.—The multitude of the negative particles, and their position in the original, render this passage exceedingly emphatical and beautiful.—This promise David repeated to Solomon, 1 Chron. xxviii. 20. See also Isa. xli. 10. 17.

Ver. 6.—1. Taking courage we may say.—God's promises to Joshua and to David, and their expressions of trust in God, being applied by the apostle to the Hebrews, it teaches us, that God's promises to individuals, and their exercises of faith and trust built thereon, are recorded in scripture for the encouragement of the people of God in every age.

2. I will not fear what man can do to me.—As a remedy against the immoderate fear of evil from men, besides the promise here suggested by the apostle, which every good man may apply to himself, namely, that the Lord is his helper, the Spectator, No. 616. advises the timorous to consider, "First, that what he fears may not come to pass. No human scheme can be so accurately projected but some little circumstance intervening may spoil it. He who directs the heart of man at his pleasure, and understands the thoughts long before, may by ten thousand accidents, or an immediate change in the inclinations of men, disconcert the most subtle project, and turn it to the benefit of his own servants.—In the next place, we should consider, though the evil we imagine should come to pass, it may be much more supportable than it appeared to be. As there is no prosperous state of life without its calamities, so there is no adversity without its benefit. The evils of this life appear like rocks and precipices, rugged and barren at a distance, but at our nearer approach we find little fruitful spots and refreshing springs, mixed with the harshness and deformities of nature.—In the last place, we may comfort ourselves with this consideration, that as the thing feared may not reach us, so we may not reach what we fear. Our lives may not extend to that dreadful point which we have in view. He who knows all our failings, and will not suffer us to be tempted beyond our strength, is often pleased, in his tender severity, to separate the soul from its body and miseries together."

Ver. 7.—1. Remember your rulers.—Who they were, see Preface, sect. 2. art. 1. paragraph 3.—Though the word ἐπιστάτας, properly signifies a ruler or commander, we should recollect, that the authority of Christian bishops and pastors, of whom the apostle is speaking, is not of the same kind with that of civil rulers, 1 Pet. v. 3. being founded, not on force, but in the fidelity with which they discharge the duties of their function, and in the esteem and affection of their flock.

2. Of whose conversation attentively considering the ending.—See ver. 17. note 1.—This remembrance of the dead saints, with admiration of their virtues, and with a desire to imitate them, is the only worship which is due to them from the living.

10 We have an altar, of which they have no right to eat¹ who worship in the tabernacle :²

11 For, of these animals whose blood is brought as a sin-offering into the holy places by the high-priest, the bodies are burnt without the camp.¹

12 Therefore, Jesus also, that he might sanctify (see Heb. x. 10.) the people (Jm. 119.) with his own blood, suffered without the gate.¹

13 Well then, let us go forth (περὶ, 294.) with him out of the camp, bearing his reproach.

14 For we have not here an abiding city,¹ but we earnestly seek one to come. (Chap. xi. 10.)

cious, and faithful Saviour, and will continue to be so for ever.

9 Be not tossed about with discordant and foreign doctrines, taught by unauthorized teachers, concerning the efficacy of the Levitical sacrifices: For it is good that your courage in sufferings and death be established on God's free pardon of sin through the sacrifice of Christ, and not on the Levitical sacrifices made of animals designed for meats, by which they have not been profited in respect of pardon who continually offer them.

10 That ye must not seek the pardon of sin through the sacrifices of animals appointed for meat, ye may know by this, that we have a sacrifice for sin of which they have no right to eat, who, to obtain pardon, worship in the tabernacle with the sacrifices of eatable animals appointed for sin-offerings.

11 This was shewed figuratively in the law: For of these animals whose blood is brought as a sin-offering into the holy places by the high-priest, the bodies are burnt without the camp as things unclean, of which neither the priests nor the people were allowed to eat.

12 Therefore Jesus also, who was typified by these sin-offerings, that he might be known to sanctify the people of God with his own blood presented before the throne of God in heaven as a sin-offering, suffered without the gate of Jerusalem, as the bodies of the sin-offerings were burnt without the camp.

13 Well then, let us go forth, after his example, from the city of our habitation to the place of our punishment, bearing the reproach laid on him; the reproach of being malefactors.

14 The leaving our habitation, kindred, and friends, need not distress us; for we have not here an abiding city, but we earnestly seek one to come; namely, the city of the living God, of which I spake to you, chap. xii. 22.

Ver. 8. Jesus Christ, yesterday and to-day, the same.]—Because Jesus Christ sometimes denotes the doctrine of Christ, (Acts v. 42. 1 Cor. i. 24. 2 Cor. iv. 5.) the Socinians think this is a declaration that the doctrine of the gospel, when the apostle wrote, was the same as at the beginning, and will continue to be so for ever, without any alteration; and that, if men either add to, or take from it, they are greatly culpable. According to this interpretation, the verse connects with the following ver. 9. 'Be not tossed about,' &c. But though their interpretation contains an excellent sentiment, others, more justly in my opinion, understand this of the nature, rather than of the doctrine of Christ, especially as ἡ αὐτὴ, the phrase here used, is that by which the Immutability of the Son is expressed, Heb. i. 12. 'But thou art (ἡ αὐτὴ) the same. Semper eul similia, invariabilis, et immutabilis.'—According to this interpretation, the verse connects with verse 7.

Ver. 9.—1. With various and foreign doctrines.]—Διδοχαίς ποικίλαις. Various doctrines are doctrines inconsistent with each other; discordant doctrines. But ἑτεροῦς διδασκαίς, foreign doctrines, are doctrines introduced into the church by unauthorized teachers.—The doctrines concerning the efficacy of the Levitical sacrifices to procure the pardon of sin, and their necessity to salvation, were discordant with the gospel doctrine of pardon through the death of Christ; and were taught by the unbelieving Jews and Judaizing Christians, who had no authority to inculcate such doctrines.

2. That the heart be established by grace, not by meats.]—Here the apostle had in his eye the Levitical burnt-offerings and peace-offerings which were made of animals fit for meat, and on which the offerers feasted in the court of the tabernacle, Lev. vii. 11—15. Deut. xii. 6. 11, 12. in token of their being pardoned and at peace with God. That this was signified by the worshippers being allowed to eat of their own peace-offerings, we learn from ver. 10. where, by 'eating of the sacrifice,' the apostle, who was well acquainted with the sentiments and language of the Jews, evidently means the partaking of the blessings procured by the sacrifice. See 1 Cor. x. 16. note 2. Wherefore, as the offering of the burnt and peace-offerings is termed 'a worshipping with meats,' Heb. ix. 9, 10, the 'establishing the heart by meats,' certainly means the hoping for pardon through these sacrifices; consequently its opposite, 'the establishing of the heart by grace,' must mean, as in the commentary, the hoping for pardon through the sacrifice of Christ, called grace, because the pardon obtained through that sacrifice is the free gift of God.

3. Through which they have not been profited who walk in them.]—This circumstance shews that the apostle is not speaking of ordinary meats, but of meats offered in sacrifice, concerning which the apostle affirms, that those who were in the habit of offering these meats did not obtain an eternal pardon thereby. And he had good reason to say this: For these sacrifices being offered to God as king in Israel, and not as moral governor of the world, the pardon which was sealed to the offerers, by their being permitted to feast on these sacrifices in the court of the tabernacle, as persons in peace with God their king, was not a real but a political pardon, consisting in the remission of those civil penalties which God, as the head of their commonwealth, might have inflicted on them for transgressing the laws of the state. That the Israelites did not obtain a remission of the moral guilt of any of their sins by their burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, the apostle, in the 11th verse, proves from the inefficacy of all the sacrifices for sin which were offered by the high-priest, on the day of expiation in the tabernacle, to God as the moral governor of the world.

Ver. 10.—1. We have an altar, of which they have no right to eat.] Here, by an usual metonymy, the altar is put for the sacrifice, as is plain from the apostle's adding, 'of which they have no right to eat.' The sacrifice belonging to those who believe, is the sacrifice of himself, which Christ offered to God in heaven for the sin of the world: and the eating of that sacrifice doth not mean the corporal eating thereof, but the partaking of the pardon which Christ hath procured for sinners by that sacrifice. See ver. 9. note 2.

2. Who worship in the tabernacle.]—The worship in the outward tabernacle was performed by the ordinary priests carrying into it the blood of the animals appointed for sin-offerings, and sprinkling it before the veil. The worship in the inward tabernacle was performed by the high-priest's carrying into it the blood of the animals appointed to be offered on the tenth of the seventh month, and sprinkling it seven times on the floor before the mercy-seat.—Now, that neither the high-priests who thus worshipped in the inward tabernacle, nor the persons for whom they performed that worship, had any right to eat of the Christian altar, the apostle proves in the following 11th verse.

Ver. 11.—The bodies are burnt without the camp.]—This law, concerning the bodies of the animals whose blood the high-priest carried into the holy places, we have Lev. xvi. 27. The same law is given concerning all the proper sin-offerings, Lev. vi. 30. From which it appears, that neither the priests who offered the sin-offerings, nor the people for whom they offered them, were to eat of them. Wherefore, if the eating of the burnt-offerings and peace-offerings was permitted, to shew that the offerers were at peace with God as their political ruler, (see ver. 9. note 2,) it may fairly be presumed, that the prohibition to eat any part of the bodies of the animals whose blood was brought into the holy places as an atonement, was intended to make the Israelites sensible that their sins against God, as moral governor of the world, were not pardoned through these atonements; not even by the sacrifices which were offered by the high-priest on the tenth of the seventh month, which, like the rest, were to be wholly burnt. Unless this was the intention of the law, the apostle could not, from that prohibition, have argued with truth, that they who worshipped in the tabernacles with the sin-offerings had no right to eat of the Christian altar. Whereas if, by forbidding the priests and people to eat the sin-offerings, the law declared that their offences against God as moral governor of the world were not pardoned thereby, it was in effect a declaration, as the apostle affirms, that they had no right to eat of the Christian altar, that is, to share in the pardon which Christ hath procured for sinners by his death, who trusted in the Levitical sacrifices for pardon and acceptance with God.

Ver. 12. Suffered without the gate.]—The Israelites having cities to live in at the time our Lord suffered, 'without the gate' was the same as 'without the camp' in the wilderness. Wherefore, criminals being regarded as unclean, were always put to death without the gates of their cities. In that manner our Lord and his martyr Stephen suffered.

Ver. 14. We have not here an abiding city.]—In this it is thought

15 (Ow, 262.) *And through him let us offer up the sacrifice of praise continually to God, namely, the fruit of our lips, confessing to his name.*²

16 But to do good, and to communicate, forget not; for with such sacrifices God is well pleased.

17 Obey your rulers, (see ver. 7. note 1.), and submit yourselves, for they watch for your souls as those who must give account. OBEY THEM, that they may do this with joy,³ and not with mourning; for that WOULD BE unprofitable for you.

18 Pray for us; for we are confident that we have good conscience, willing in all things to behave well.

19 And I the more earnestly beseech you to do this, that I may be restored to you the sooner.

20 Now may the God of peace, who brought back from the dead our Lord Jesus the great Shepherd of the sheep,⁴ (w) through the blood of the everlasting covenant,⁵

21 Make you fit for every good work, to do his will, producing in you what is acceptable in his sight through Jesus Christ, to whom as the glory for ever and ever.² Amen.

22 Now I beseech you, brethren, suffer this word of exhortation, for indeed I have written to you (ἡς χάριν) briefly.

23 Know that our brother Timothy is sent away, with whom, if he come soon, I will see you.²

15 And though persecuted by our unbelieving brethren, through him, as our High-priest, let us offer up the sacrifice of praise continually to God for his goodness in our redemption, namely, the fruit of our lips, by confessing openly our hope of pardon through Christ, to the glory of God's perfections.

16 But, at the same time, to do good works, and to communicate of your substance to the poor, do not forget; for with such sacrifices God is especially delighted. See Philip. iv. 18. note 3.

17 Follow the directions of your spiritual guides, and submit yourselves to their admonitions, for they watch over your behaviour for the good of your souls, as those who must give account to God. Obey them, therefore, that they may do this with joy, as having promoted your salvation, and not with mourning on account of your forwardness; for that would be unprofitable for you, ending in your condemnation.

18 Pray for me: For, though ye may dislike my doctrine set forth in this letter, I am certain, in teaching it, I have maintained a good conscience, having delivered it to you faithfully; willing in all things to behave suitably to my character as an inspired teacher.

19 And I the more earnestly beseech you to pray for me, that through the help of God I may be restored to you the sooner.

20 Now may God the author of all happiness, who to save mankind brought back from the dead our Lord Jesus the great Shepherd of the sheep, may he, through the blessings procured by the blood whereby the new covenant, which is never to be changed, was ratified, 21 Prepare you for every good work, to do what he has commanded, producing in you every disposition acceptable in his sight, through the doctrine and assistance of Jesus Christ, to whom be ascribed the glory of our salvation, for ever and ever. Amen.

22 Now, fearing ye may be prejudiced against me, I beseech you, brethren, take in good part the instructions I have given you concerning the law and the Levitical institutions, and judge candidly of them; the rather, because I have written to you but briefly concerning these subjects, considering their importance.

23 Know that my much respected brother Timothy is sent away by me into Macedonia, with whom, if he come back soon, I will pay you a visit: For I have ordered him to return to this place.

By some that the apostle had the destruction of Jerusalem in his eye, which happened A. D. 70, about nine years after this epistle was written.

Ver. 15.—1. The fruit of our lips.—Pococke, cited by Whitby, says ἁγίος is here put for ἁγίασμα, a word by which the LXX. denote a holocaust: and these being usually made of young bullocks, 'the holocaust of our lips' is equivalent to 'the calves of our lips,' Hos. xiv. 2. But Estius more justly thinks, that the praise of God uttered with our lips, may be called 'the fruit of our lips,' just as the good works of the virtuous woman are called, Prov. xxxi. 31, 'the fruit of her hands.'

2. Confessing to his name.—The word ἡμολογούμενοι is used by the LXX. to denote the praising of God publicly; because to praise God is to confess or declare his perfections and benefits.

Ver. 17.—1. Obey your rulers, and submit yourselves.—See Preface, sect. 2. paragr. 3.—As the apostle James, who presided in the church at Jerusalem, had been lately put to death, the writer of this epistle, once and again, exhorted the Hebrews to obey the college of presbyters who then ministered in holy things at Jerusalem, and directed the affairs of the church there; because if at any time there was occasion for the brethren to be closely united to their pastors, it was when this letter was written; the rage of the Jews being then great against the disciples of Christ. See Mill's Proleg. No. 83. Besides, as some of the common people in the church at Jerusalem entertained different sentiments from their teachers with respect to the obligation of the law of Moses, and the efficacy of the Levitical institutions, it was the more proper to enjoin them to pay respect to their teachers.

2. That they may do this with joy.—Because the perverseness of the people will not hinder the reward of faithful ministers at the day of judgment, some think this clause is not connected with their giving an account of their ministry, but with their watching for the souls of their flock. Nevertheless, as the apostle in other passages of his epistles speaks of his converts as his crown and his joy at the day of judgment, 1 Thess. ii. 19, the sense given in the commentary may be admitted.

Ver. 18. Willing in all things.—The words ἡμετέρας may signify among all men, among the Jews as well as among the Gentiles.

Ver. 20.—1. May the God of peace.—This is a title of the Deity, nowhere found but in Paul's writings. See Lord of peace, 2 Thess. iii. 16. note.

2. The great Shepherd.—The Lord Jesus has this title given him here, because he was foretold under the character of a shepherd, Ezek. xxxiv. 23, and because he took to himself the title of the good shepherd, John x. 11., and because all who are employed in feeding the flock are but inferior shepherds under him. See 1 Pet. ii. 25. note.

3. Of the sheep.—Christ's sheep are all those, whether in the visible church or out of it, who from faith in God, and in Christ when he is made known to them, live sober, righteous, and godly lives. For all such are guided, protected, and fed by Christ. So Christ himself hath told us, John x. 16. 'Other sheep I have who are not of this fold.'

4. Blood of the everlasting covenant.—In allusion to Matt. xxvi. 28. 'This is my blood of the new covenant,' my blood by which the new covenant was procured and ratified.—It is uncertain whether the words, 'through the blood of the everlasting covenant,' should be connected with what goes before, or what follows. If it is connected with what goes before, the meaning is either, that God brought back our Lord Jesus from the dead on account of his having shed his blood to procure the everlasting covenant; or, that the Lord Jesus became the great Shepherd and Saviour of the sheep, by shedding his blood to procure and ratify the everlasting covenant. This latter sense seems to be supported by Acts xx. 28, where Christ is said to have 'purchased the church with his own blood.' But if the clause is connected with what follows, the meaning is, May God make you perfect in every good work, through the assistance of his Spirit promised in the everlasting covenant.—Now seeing these senses are all good, any of them may be adopted, as it is uncertain which of them was intended by the apostle.

Ver. 21.—1. Make you fit.—So κατασκευάζει signifies. See Heb. xi. 3. note 2. Estius explains the word thus: 'Perficere non quomodocunque, sed apta dispositione partium.' See Heb. x. 6.

2. Christ, to whom be glory for ever and ever.—Here eternal glory is ascribed to Christ, as it is likewise, 2 Pet. iii. 18. Rev. v. 12. 13.

Ver. 22.—1. Timothy is sent away.—The word ἀπολλύμενος may either be translated sent away, or sent away on some errand. Matt. xiv. 15. Ἀπολλύουσιν τὰς ἐκκλησίας, 'Send the multitudes away, that they may go into the villages,' &c. Euthalius among the ancients, and Mill, who is followed by Lardner and the moderns, understand the word in the latter signification; first, because it appears from Philip. ii. 19–24, that Paul, about this time, purposed to send Timothy into Macedonia, with an order to return and bring him an account of the affairs of the brethren in that country; secondly, because in none of Paul's epistles, written during his confinement in Rome, does he give the least intimation of Timothy's having been imprisoned, although he was with Paul the greatest part of the time: Philip. i. 1. Col. i. 1. Philem. ver. 1.

2. I will see you.—From this it is evident, that the apostle, when he wrote this epistle, was set at liberty.

24 Salute all your rulers, (see ver. 7. 17.), and all the saints. They of Italy salute you.'

25 Grace be with you all. Amen.

24 In my name, wish health to all your spiritual guides, and to all the Christians in Judea. The Christians of Italy, in token of their communion with you, wish you health.

25 May the favour of God, and the assistance of his Spirit, be with you all. And in testimony of my sincerity in this wish, and in all the doctrines delivered in this letter, I say Amen.

Ver. 24. They of Italy salute you.—The salutations from the Christians of Italy shew, that the writer of this letter was either in Italy, or had some of the brethren of Italy with him, when he wrote it: which agrees with the supposition, that Paul was the author of

it. For he had been two years a prisoner at Rome, but had now obtained his liberty, ver. 53. by means, as is supposed, of the persons he had converted in the emperor's family, Philip. iv. 22.

EPILOGUE

ST. PAUL'S EPISTLES.

HAVING now finished the translation and explanation of all the apostle Paul's epistles, I presume my readers will not be displeased with me for transcribing a passage from the conclusion of Archdeacon Paley's Horæ Paulinæ, where, after giving a short but comprehensive view of the evidences by which the authenticity of St. Paul's epistle is established beyond all possibility of doubt, he thus proceeds:—"If it be true, that we are in possession of the very letters which St. Paul wrote, let us consider what confirmation they afford to the Christian history. In my opinion, they substantiate the whole transaction. The great object of modern research is, to come at the epistolary correspondence of the times. Amidst the obscurities, the silence, or the contradictions of history, if a letter can be found, we regard it as the discovery of a land-mark; as that by which we can correct, adjust, or supply the imperfections and uncertainties of other accounts. One cause of the superior credit which is attributed to letters is this, that the facts which they disclose generally come out incidentally, and therefore without design to mislead the public by false or exaggerated accounts. This reason may be applied to St. Paul's epistles with as much justice as to any letters whatever. Nothing could be farther from the intention of the writer, than to record any part of his history. That his history was in fact made public by these letters, and has by the same means been transmitted to future ages, as a secondary and unthought-of effect. The sincerity therefore of the apostle's declarations cannot reasonably be disputed; at least, we are sure that it was not vitiated by any desire of setting himself off to the public at large. But these letters form a part of the muniments of Christianity, as much to be valued for their contents as for their originality. A more inestimable treasure, the care of antiquity could not have sent down to us. Besides the proof they afford of the general reality of St. Paul's history, of the knowledge which the author of the Acts of the Apostles had obtained of that history, and the consequent probability that he was what he professes himself to have been, a companion of the apostle; besides the support they lend to these important inferences, they meet specifically some of the principal objections upon which the adversaries of Christianity have thought proper to rely. In particular, they shew,—

"I. That Christianity was not a story set on foot amidst the confusions which attended and immediately preceded the destruction of Jerusalem; when many extravagant reports were circulated, when men's minds were broken by terror and distress, when amidst the tumults that surrounded them inquiry was impracticable. These letters shew incontestably, that the religion had fixed and established itself before this state of things took place.

"II. Whereas it hath been insinuated, that our Gospels may have been made up of reports and stories which were current at the time, we may observe, that with respect to the Epistles that is impossible. A man cannot write the history of his own life from reports; nor, what is the same thing, be led by reports to refer to passages and transactions in which he states himself to have been immediately present and active. I do not allow that this insinuation is applied to the historical part of the New Testament with any colour of justice or probability; but I say, that to the Epistles it is not applicable at all.

"III. These letters prove, that the converts to Christianity were not drawn from the barbarous, the mean, or the ignorant set of men, which the representations of infidelity would sometimes make them. We learn from letters, the character not only of the writers, but, in some measure, of the persons to whom they are written. To suppose that these letters were addressed to a rude tribe, incapable of thought or reflection, is just as reasonable as to suppose Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding to have been written for the instruction of savages. Whatever may be thought of these letters in other respects, either of diction or argument, they are certainly removed as far as possible from the habits and comprehension of a barbarous people.

"IV. St. Paul's history, I mean so much of it as may be collected from his letters, is so implicated with that of the other apostles, and with the substance indeed of the Christian history itself, that I apprehend it will be found impossible to admit St. Paul's story (I do not speak of the miraculous part of it) to be true, and yet to reject the rest as fabulous. For instance, can any one believe that there was such a man as Paul, a preacher of Christianity in the age which we assign to him, and not believe that there were also at the same time such men as Peter, and James, and other apostles, who had been companions of Christ during his life, and who after his death published and avowed the same things concerning him which Paul taught? Judea, and especially Jerusalem, was the scene of Christ's ministry: The witnesses of his miracles lived there. St. Paul by his own account, as well as that of his historian, appears to have frequently visited this city; to have carried on a communication with the church there; to have associated with the rulers and elders of that church, who were some of them apostles; to have acted, as occasions offered, in correspondence, and sometimes in conjunction with them. Can it after this be doubted, but that the religion, and the general facts relating to it, which St. Paul appears by his letters to have delivered to the several churches which he established at a distance, were at the same time taught and published at Jerusalem itself, the place where the business was transacted, and taught and published, by those who had attended the founder of the institution in his miraculous, or pretended miraculous ministry?

"It is observable, for so it appears both in the Epistles and from the Acts of the Apostles, that Jerusalem, and the society of believers in that city, long continued the centre from which the missionaries of the religion issued, with which all other churches maintained a correspondence and connexion, to which they referred their doubts, and to whose relief, in times of public distress, they remitted their charitable assistance. This observation I think material; because it proves that this was not the case of giving out accounts in one country of what is transacted in another, without affording the hearers an opportunity of knowing whether the things related were credited by any, or even published in the place where they are reported to have passed.

"V. St. Paul's letters furnish evidence (and what better evidence than a man's own letters can be desired!) of the soundness and sobriety of his judgment. His caution in distinguishing between the occasional suggestions of inspiration, and the ordinary exercise of his natural understanding, is without example in the history of human enthusiasm. His morality is everywhere calm, pure, and rational, adapted to the condition, the activity, and the business of social life, and of its various relations; free from the over-scrupulousness and austerities of superstition, and from (what was more perhaps to be apprehended) the abstractions of quietism, and the soarings or extravagancies of fanaticism. His judgment concerning a hesitating conscience, his opinion of the moral indifference of many actions, yet of the prudence and even duty of compliance, where non-compliance would produce evil effects upon the minds of the persons who observed it, is as correct and just as the most liberal and enlightened moralist could form at this day. The accuracy of modern ethics has found nothing to amend in these determinations.

"What Lord Lyttelton has remarked of the preference ascribed by St. Paul to inward rectitude of principle above every other religious accomplishment, is very material to our present purpose. 'In his first epistle to the Corinthians, chap. xiii. 1-3. St. Paul has these words:—'Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing. And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing.' Is this the language of enthusiasm? Did ever an enthusiast prefer that universal benevolence which comprehendeth all moral virtues, and which, as appeareth by the following verses, is meant by charity here? Did ever an enthusiast, I say, prefer that benevolence (which we may add is attainable by every man) to faith and to miracles, to those religious opinions which he had embraced, and to those supernatural graces and gifts which he imagined he had acquired, nay, even to the merit of martyrdom? Is it not the genius of enthusiasm to set moral virtues infinitely below the merit of faith, and, of all moral virtues, to value that least which is most particularly enforced by St. Paul, a spirit of candour, moderation, and peace? Certainly neither the temper nor the opinions of a man subject to fanatic delusions are to be found in this passage.'—Considerations on the Conversion, &c.

"I see no reason, therefore, to question the integrity of his understanding. To call him a visionary, because he appealed to visions, or an enthusiast, because he pretended to inspiration, is to take the question for granted. It is to take for granted that no such visions or inspirations existed; at least it is to assume, contrary to his own assertions, that he had no other proofs than these to offer of his mission, or of the truth of his relations.

"One thing I allow, that his letters everywhere discover great zeal and earnestness in the cause in which he was engaged; that is to say, he was convinced of the truth of what he taught; he was deeply impressed, but not more so than the occasion merited, with a sense of its importance. This produces a corresponding animation and solicitude in the exercise of his ministry. But would not these considerations, supposing them to be well-founded, have holden the same place, and produced the same effect, in a mind the strongest and the most sedate?

"VI. These letters are decisive as to the sufferings of the author; also as to the distressed state of the Christian church, and the dangers which attended the preaching of the gospel. See Col. i. 24.; 1 Cor. xv. 19, 30, 31, 32.; Rom. viii. 17, 18, 35, 36.; 1 Cor. vii. 25, 26.; Philip. i. 29, 30.; Gal. vi. 14, 17.; 1 Thess. i. 6.; 2 Thess. i. 4.

"We may seem to have accumulated texts unnecessarily; but besides that the point which they are brought to prove is of great importance, there is this also to be remarked in every one of the passages cited, that the allusion is drawn from the writer by the argument on the occasion; that the notice which is taken of his sufferings, and of the suffering condition of Christianity, is perfectly incidental, and is dictated by no design of stating the facts themselves. Indeed they are not stated at all; they may rather be said to be assumed. This is a distinction upon which we have relied a good deal in the former part of this treatise; and where the writer's information cannot be doubted, it always, in my opinion, adds greatly to the value and credit of the testimony, &c.

"In the following quotations, the reference to the author's sufferings is accompanied with a specification of time and place, and with an appeal for the truth of what he declares to the knowledge of the persons whom he addresses, 1 Thess. ii. 2. 2 Tim. iii. 10, 11.

"I apprehend, that to this point, as far as the testimony of St. Paul is credited, the evidence from his letters is complete and full. It appears under every form in which it could appear, by occasional allusions and by direct assertions, by general declarations and by specific examples.

"VII. St. Paul in these letters asserts, in positive and unequivocal terms, his performance of miracles, strictly and properly so called: Gal. iii. 5. 1 Cor. ii. 4, 5. 1 Thess. i. 5. Heb. ii. 4. Rom. xv. 15, 18, 19. 2 Cor. xii. 12. 'Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you, in all patience, by signs and wonders and mighty deeds.' These words, signs, wonders, and mighty deeds, (σημεία, και τέρατα, και θύματα), are the specific appropriate terms throughout the New Testament, employed when public sensible miracles are intended to be expressed. This will appear by consulting amongst other places the following texts: Mark xvi. 20. Luke xxiii. 8. John ii. 11. 23. iii. 2. iv. 48. 54. xi. 49. Acts ii. 22. iv. 30. v. 12. vi. 8. vii. 16. xiv. 3. xv. 12. And it cannot be shewn, that they are ever employed to express any thing else. Farther, these words not only denote miracles as opposed to natural effects, but they denote visible, and what may be called external miracles, as distinguished, First, from inspiration. If St. Paul had meant to refer only to secret illuminations of his understanding, or secret influences upon his will or affections, he could not with truth have represented them as signs and wonders wrought by him, or signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds wrought amongst them. Secondly, from visions. These would not by any means satisfy the force of the terms, signs, wonders, and mighty deeds; still less could they be said to be wrought by him, or wrought amongst them; nor are these terms and expressions anywhere applied to visions. When our author alludes to the supernatural communications which he had received, either by vision or otherwise, he uses expressions suited to the nature of the subject, but very different from the words which we quoted. He calls them revelations, but never signs, wonders, or mighty deeds. 'I will come,' says he, 'to visions and revelations of the Lord;' and then proceeds to describe a particular instance; and afterwards adds, 'lest I should be exalted above measure, through the abundance of the revelations, there was given me a thorn in the flesh.'

"Upon the whole, the matter admits of no softening qualification or ambiguity whatever. If St. Paul did not work actual, sensible, public miracles, he has knowingly in these letters borne his testimony to a falsehood. I need not add, that in two also of his quotations he has advanced his assertion in the face of those persons amongst whom he declares the miracles to have been wrought.

"Let it be remembered, that the Acts of the Apostles describe various particular miracles wrought by St. Paul, which in their nature answer to the terms and expressions which we have seen to be used by St. Paul himself.

"Here then we have a man of liberal attainments, and in other points of sound judgment, who had addicted his life to the service of the gospel. We see him, in the prosecution of his purpose, travelling from country to country, enduring every species of hardship, encountering every extremity of danger, assaulted by the populace, punished by the magistrates, scourged, beat, stoned, left for dead; expecting wherever he came a renewal of the same treatment and the same dangers, yet, when driven from one city, preaching in the next; spending his whole time in the employment, sacrificing to it his pleasures, his ease, his safety; persisting in this course to old age, unaltered by the experience of perverseness, ingratitude, prejudice, desertion; unsubdued by anxiety, want, labour, persecution; unwearied by long confinement; undismayed by the prospect of death. Such was St. Paul. We have his letters in our hands; we have also a history purporting to be written by one of his fellow-travellers, and appearing, by a comparison with these letters, certainly to have been written by some person well acquainted with the transactions of his life. From the letters, as well as from the history, we gather, not only the account which we have stated of him, but that he was one out of many who acted and suffered in the same manner; and that of those who did so, several had been the companions of Christ's ministry, the ocular witnesses, or pretending to be such, of his miracles and of his resurrection. We moreover find this same person referring in his letters to his supernatural conversion, the particulars and accompanying circumstances of which are related in the history, and which accompanying circumstances, if all or any of them be true, render it impossible to have been a delusion. We also find him positively, and in appropriate terms, asserting that he himself worked miracles, strictly and properly so called, in support of the mission which he executed; the history meanwhile recording various passages of his ministry which come up to the extent of this assertion. The question is, whether falsehood was ever attested by evidence like this! Falsehoods, we know, have found their way into reports, into tradition, into books; but is an example to be met with of a man voluntarily undertaking a life of want and pain, of incessant fatigue, of continual peril; submitting to the loss of his home and country, to stripes and stoning, to tedious imprisonment, and the constant expectation of a violent death, for the sake of carrying about a story of what was false, and of what, if false, he must have known to be so?"—Herz Pauline, chap. xvi. p. 405-426.

PREFACE.

THE following seven epistles have commonly been called Catholic Epistles; but for what reason, commentators are not agreed. Hammond's account of the matter seems as probable as any; namely, that the first epistle of Peter, and the first of John, having from the beginning been received as authentic, obtained the name of Catholic, or universally acknowledged, and therefore canonical epistles, to distinguish them from the epistle of James, the second of Peter, the second and third of John, and the epistle of Jude; all which were for a while doubted of, and by many not considered as a rule of faith. But their authenticity being at length acknowledged by the generality of the churches, they also obtained the name of Catholic or universally received Epistles, and were esteemed of equal authority with the rest. Whitby, however, seems to adopt the account which Oecumenius hath given of this matter; namely, that these epistles were denominated Catholic, because all of them, except the two short epistles of John, were written, not to people dwelling in one place, but to the Jews dispersed through all the countries within the Roman empire.

Here it is proper to observe, that as we judged it necessary to establish the authenticity of Paul's epistles to the Hebrews, because of all his epistles it alone was called in question, so we judge it necessary to establish the authenticity of the five epistles above mentioned, because they were doubted of by many in the first age. In the preface, therefore, to each of these epistles, I will explain the grounds on which the church hath now received them into the canon of scripture; and the rather, because it will shew how generally all Paul's epistles, except that to the Hebrews, were acknowledged and received as his from the very beginning. See sect. 2. paragraph 2. of this Preface.

The testimonies of the ancients, by which the authenticity of the books of the New Testament, and more especially of the Catholic epistles, is established, have been carefully collected, and most fairly proposed by the excellent Lardner, in the supplement to his Credibility, &c. From that valuable work I have transcribed the testimonies of the greatest importance for establishing the genuineness of the Catholic epistles, and have marked the pages where they are to be found. But, in some cases, having abridged Lardner's account, I have not marked the places from which I have taken the particulars. But the reader who desires more full information, will easily obtain it by consulting the three vols. of his Supplement, which treat of the Canon of the New Testament, where also he will find the judgment of authors, both ancient and modern, concerning the above-mentioned doubted epistles, either accurately recited, or the places of their works distinctly referred to, in which they have given their opinion concerning them.

SECT. I.—The History of James, the Author of the Epistle which bears his name.

IN the catalogues of the apostles, given Matt. x. 2. Mark iii. 16. Luke vi. 14. Acts i. 13. we find two persons of the name of James. The first was the son of Zebedee, Matt. x. 2.; the second, in all the catalogues, is called the son of Alpheus. One of these apostles is called,

Gal. i. 19. 'the Lord's brother.'—Wherefore, as there were only twelve apostles, and as James the son of Zebedee, so far as we know, was in no respect related to our Lord, the apostle called James the Lord's brother must have been James the son of Alpheus, called also James the less, or younger, whose relation to Christ will appear by comparing Mark xv. 40. with John xix. 25. In the former passage, Mark, speaking of the women who were present at the crucifixion, says, 'There were also women looking on afar off, among whom were Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the less, and of Joses and Salome.' In the latter passage, John, speaking of the same women, says, 'There stood by the cross of Jesus, his mother, and his mother's sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas, and Mary Magdalene.' Wherefore, our Lord's 'mother's sister, Mary the wife of Cleophas,' mentioned by John, is, in all probability, the person whom Mark calls 'Mary the mother of James the less, and of Joses;' consequently, her sons James and Joses were our Lord's cousins-german by his mother. And as the Hebrews called all near relations brethren, (compare Gen. xiii. 8. with Gen. xi. 27. and Gen. xxix. 12. with ver. 15.), it is more than probable, that James the son of Alpheus, who was our Lord's cousin-german, is 'James the Lord's brother' mentioned Gal. i. 19.—Three circumstances confirm this opinion: 1st, James and Joses, the sons of Mary our Lord's mother's sister, are expressly called the brethren of Jesus, Matt. xiii. 55. Mark vi. 3.—2d, James the son of our Lord's mother's sister, being distinguished from another James by the appellation of the less, Mark xv. 40. there is good reason to think that he is the James whom Mark in this catalogue distinguishes from James the son of Zebedee, by the appellation of the son of Alpheus. It is true, Mary the mother of James and Joses is called the wife of Cleophas, John xix. 25. But Cleophas and Alpheus are the same names differently pronounced, the one according to the Hebrew, the other according to the Greek orthography.—3d, Of the persons called 'the brethren of Jesus,' Matt. xiii. 59. three are mentioned in the catalogues as apostles; namely, James, and Simon, and Judas. They, I suppose, are the brethren of the Lord, who are said, as apostles, to have had a right to lead about a sister, or a wife, &c. 1 Cor. ix. 5.—Jerome likewise thought James the Lord's brother was so called, because he was the son of Mary our Lord's mother's sister. "Jacobus, qui appellatur frater Domini, cognomento justus, ut nonnulli existimant Josephi ex alia uxore, ut autem mihi videtur, Mariæ sororis matris Domini (cujus Joannes in libro suo meminit) filius, post passionem Domini ab apostolis Hierosolymorum episcopus ordinatus, unam tantum scripsit epistolam, quæ de septem Catholicis est." Art. Jacobus.—Lardner, Canon. vol. iii. p. 63. says, Jerome seems to have been the first who said our Lord's brethren were the sons of his mother's sister; and that his opinion was at length embraced by Augustine, and has prevailed very much of late, being the opinion of the Romanists in general, and of Lightfoot, Witsius, Lampe, and many of the Protestants.

On the other hand, Origen, Epiphanius, and other ancient writers, both Greeks and Latins, were of opinion, that James the Lord's brother was not the son of the Virgin's sister, but of Joseph our Lord's reputed father by a former wife, who died before he espoused the Virgin. Of the same opinion were Vossius, Basnage, and Cave among the Protestants, and Valesius among the Romanists. Epiphanius and Theophylact supposed that Joseph's first wife was the widow of Alpheus, who, being Joseph's brother, Joseph married her to raise up seed to him; and therefore James, the issue of that marriage, was fitly called the son of Alpheus, and brother of our Lord. But these suppositions might have been spared, if the ancients and moderns had recollected that near relations were called brethren by the Hebrews, and that Alpheus and Cleophas are the same names differently written.

James the less, the son of Alpheus, being not only the Lord's near relation, but an apostle whom, as is generally supposed, he honoured in a particular manner, by appearing to him alone after his resurrection, 1 Cor. xv. 7. these circumstances, together with his own personal merit, rendered him of such note among the apostles, that they appointed him to reside in Jerusalem, and to superintend the church there. This appointment, Lardner says, was made soon after the martyrdom of Stephen; and in support of his opinion he observes, "That Peter always speaks first as president among the apostles, until after the choice of the seven deacons. Every thing said of St. James after that, implies his presiding in the church of Jerusalem." Canon. vol. iii. p. 28. For example, when the apostles and elders at Jerusalem came together to consider whether it was needful to circumcise the Gentiles, after there had been much disputing, Peter spake, Acts xv. 7. then Barnabas and Paul, ver. 12. And when they had ended, James summed up the arguments, and proposed the terms on which the Gentiles were to be received into the church, ver. 19, 20, 21.; to which the whole assembly agreed, and wrote letters to the Gentiles conformably to the opinion of James, ver. 22-29. From this it is inferred, that James presided in the council of Jerusalem, because he was president of the church in that city. Chrysostom, in his homily on Acts xv. says, "James was bishop of Jerusalem, and therefore spake last."

In the time of this council Paul communicated the gospel which he preached among the Gentiles to three of the apostles, whom he calls pillars; and tells us, that when they perceived the inspiration and miraculous powers which he possessed, they gave him the right hands of fellowship, mentioning James first: Gal. ii. 9. 'And knowing the grace that was bestowed on me, James, Cephas, and John, who were pillars, gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship.' This implies, that James, who in the first chapter he had called 'the Lord's brother,' was not only an apostle, but the presiding apostle in the church of Jerusalem. In the same chapter, Paul, giving an account of what happened after the council, says, ver. 11. 'When Peter was come to Antioch, 12. Before that certain came from James, he did eat with the Gentiles; but when they were come, he withdrew, and separated himself, fearing them who were of the circumcision.' This shews that James resided at Jerusalem, and presided in the church there, and was greatly respected by the Jewish believers. The same circumstance appears from Acts xxi. 17. where, giving an account of Paul's journey to Jerusalem with the collections for the saints in Judea, Luke says, ver. 18. 'Paul went in with us to James, and all the elders were present.' Farther, the respect in which James was held by the apostles, appears from two facts recorded by Luke. The first is, When Paul came to Jerusalem three years after his conversion, Barnabas took him and brought him to Peter and James as the chief apostles. Compare Acts ix. 27. with Gal. i. 19. The second fact is, After Peter was miraculously delivered out of prison, about the time of the passover in the year 44, 'he came to the house of Mary,—where many were gathered together praying,' Acts xii. 12.—'And when he had declared to them how the Lord had brought him out of prison, he said, Go shew these things to James, and to the brethren,' ver. 17. —These particulars are mentioned by Lardner, and before him by Whitby and Cave, to shew that James the Lord's brother was really an apostle in the strict acceptation of the word; consequently, that Eusebius was mistaken, when he placed him among the seventy disciples. E. H. lib. i. c. 12.

In the history of the Acts, there are some circumstances which, as learned men have remarked, lead us to conclude, that the apostles, by common agreement, allotted to each other the offices and duties which they were to perform. Thus, Acts viii. 14. 'When the apostles who were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word, they sent to them Peter and John.'—Acts xi. 22. 'Then tidings of these things,' (namely, that a number of the Hellenist Jews in Antioch had received the word), 'came to the ears of the church which was in Jerusalem, and they sent forth Barnabas, that he should go as far as Antioch.'—Gal. ii. 9. 'When James, Cephas, and John, perceived the grace that was given to me, they gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship, that we should go to the Gentiles, and they to the circumcision.' Wherefore, if James the Lord's brother was really president of the church in Jerusalem, as was formerly mentioned, and as the ancients universally affirm, he was in all probability placed in that station by the appointment, or with the approbation of the other apostles, as an ancient tradition, preserved by Eusebius and Jerome, informs us. But Epiphanius, Chrysostom, Oecumenius, and Photius think he was raised to that office by our Lord himself.—That one of the apostles should reside constantly in Jerusalem, to whom the faithful might apply for advice in any difficult case, was very proper; because circumstances might make it necessary for the greatest part of the apostles to leave Jerusalem, and to go to other countries.—Wherefore, as James the Lord's brother was a person of singular prudence and great authority, as well as an apostle, he was well qualified for that important station, and may have been appointed to it by common consent. And as every apostle, by virtue of his superior character and illumination, had a right to direct the affairs of the church where he happened to reside, the apostle James, by constantly residing in Jerusalem, became the perpetual president and director of the church there; on which account the ancients called him the bishop of Jerusalem.

Lardner's character of James deserves a place here. "Though we do not allow ourselves to enlarge on every thing said of him in the history of the council of Jerusalem, and his reception of Paul when he came up to Jerusalem and was imprisoned; yet I suppose, that every one may have discerned marks of an excellent character, and of his admirably uniting zeal and discretion, a love of truth and condescension to weak brethren. His epistle confirms that character. I think likewise, that the preservation of his life in such a station as his, to the time when he is mentioned last by Luke, may induce us to believe, that he was careful to be inoffensive in his behaviour to the unbelieving part of the Jewish nation, and that he was had in reverence by many of them." Can. vol. iii. p. 20.

James the Lord's brother was surnamed the less, John xix. 25. either because he was younger than James the son of Zebedee, or because he was a person of small stature, which is the literal meaning of τὸ μικρὸν, the little. James was likewise surnamed the Just, not indeed in the New Testament, but by the ancients, who gave him that appellation on account of his singular virtue. Some indeed have supposed James the Just to be a different person from James the son of Alpheus, and have ascribed this epistle to him; but I think without foundation. For, as there are only two persons of the name of James mentioned in scripture as apostles, and as the most ancient Christian writers have given James the Lord's brother the surname of the Just, there is no reason to believe that there was any third person of the name of James, who was surnamed the Just, and who was the writer of this epistle. See Euseb. E. H. lib. ii.—Lard. Com. vol. iii. p. 26.

SECT. II.—Of the Authenticity and Authority of the Epistle of James.

BEZA in his preface to this epistle tells us, that in the Syriac version, (I suppose he means the second Syriac), the general title prefixed to the Catholic epistles is, "The three epistles of the three apostles before whose eyes the Lord transfigured himself." Wherefore, according to that translator, the author of this epistle was James the son of Zebedee; in which opinion he hath been followed by the Arabic translator, and by some modern commentators. But, on that supposition, the epistle of James must have been written the first of all the epistles; namely, before the year 43 or 44; for in one of these years James the son of Zebedee was put to death by Herod, Acts xii. 2. The errors, however, and vices reprov'd in this epistle, shew it to be of a much later date, being the very errors and vices which gave occasion to the epistles of Peter, and John, and Jude, which all agree were written towards the conclusion of the lives of these apostles. Besides, there are passages in the epistle itself, which imply, that at the time it was written the destruction of Jerusalem was at hand. For these reasons, Jerome's opinion formerly mentioned, page 581. ought to be adopted, who tells us, that this epistle was written by James, who was called the Lord's brother, because he was the son of Mary the sister of our Lord's mother.

That this epistle was anciently esteemed a part of the sacred Canon, we learn from Eusebius, whose words I will recite. E. H. lib. iii. c. 25. "Here it will be proper to enumerate, in a summary way, the books of the New Testament which have been already mentioned. And, in the first place, are to be ranked the four sacred Gospels; then the book of the Acts of the Apostles; after that are to be reckoned the Epistles of Paul; in the next place, that called the first Epistle of John, and the first of Peter; after these is to be placed, if it be thought fit, the Revelation of John, the opinions of the ancients concerning which we shall in due season explain. Now these are among the acknowledged books. Among the contradicted, but yet well known to many," or approved by many, "are that called the Epistle of James, and that of Jude, and the second of Peter, and the second and third of John, whether they were actually composed by the Evangelist, or by another of the same name." From this passage it appears, that in the beginning of the fourth century, the seven Epistles called Catholic were well known, and received by many, though some of them were not received by all. Farther, the same author (E. H. lib. ii. c. 23.) writes as follows: "Thus far concerning James, the writer of the first Epistle called Catholic. But it ought to be observed, that (κατασκευαστος) it is thought spurious." By which Eusebius does not mean that it was in this time thought a forged writing, but that it had not been universally received by the church, as is evident from the reason which he subjoins: "For as much as there are not many of the ancient writers who have quoted it, as neither that called Jude's, another of the epistles named Catholic. However, we know that these also are commonly used," that is, publicly read, "in most churches with the rest." From this passage it appears, that notwithstanding the epistle of James was doubted of by some, and not often quoted by the ancients, it was in Eusebius's days generally received, and publicly read in the churches of Christ.

That the epistle of James was early esteemed an inspired writing, is evident from the following fact: That, while the second epistle of Peter, the second and third of John, the epistle of Jude, and the Revelation, are omitted in the first Syriac translation of the New Testament, which was made in the beginning of the second century for the use of the converted Jews, the epistle of James hath found a place therein, equally with the books which were never called in question. This is an argument of great weight. For certainly the Jewish believers, to whom that epistle was addressed and delivered, were much better judges of its authenticity than the converted Gentiles, to whom it was not sent, and who, perhaps, had no opportunity of being acquainted with it till long after it was written. Wherefore, its being received by the Jewish believers is an undeniable proof that they knew it to be written by James the apostle. Whereas, the ignorance of the Gentile believers concerning this epistle, is not even a presumption against its authenticity.

That the converted Gentiles had little knowledge of the epistle of James in the first ages, may have been owing to various causes; such as, That it was addressed to the Jews, and that the matters contained in it were personal to the Jews. For, on these accounts, the Jewish believers may have thought it not necessary to communicate it to the Gentiles. And when it was made known to them, they may have scrupled to receive it as an inspired writing, for the following reasons:—1. The writer does not in the inscription take the title of an apostle, but calls himself simply, 'James, a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ.' 2. Many of the ancients, by calling the writer of this epistle James the Just, have rendered his apostleship doubtful. 3. As they have done likewise, by speaking of him commonly as Bishop of Jerusalem, and not as an apostle of Christ.—It is little wonder, therefore, that this epistle was not generally received by the converted Gentiles; consequently that it was not often quoted by them in their writings. But afterwards, when it was considered that this epistle was from the beginning received by the Jewish believers, and that it was translated into the Syriac language for their use; and that Paul, though an apostle, sometimes contented himself with the appellation of 'a servant of Christ,' Philip. i. 1. Philem. ver. 1. and sometimes took no appellation but his own name, 1 Thess. i. 1. 2 Thess. i. 1.; and that the apostle John did not in any of his epistles call himself an apostle—the title which the author of the epistle of James had to be an apostle was no longer doubted, but he was generally acknowledged to be 'James the son of Alphaeus,' and 'the Lord's brother;' and his epistle, after an accurate examination, (see Preface to 2 Peter, sect. 1. paragr. 2.), was received into the canon as an inspired writing. So Estius tells us, who affirms, that, after the fourth century, no church nor ecclesiastical writer is found, who ever doubted of the authority of this epistle. But, on the contrary, all the catalogues of the books of scripture, published, whether by general or provincial councils, or by Roman bishops or other orthodox writers since the fourth century, constantly number it among the Canonical scriptures. See Whitby's Preface.

With respect to what is remarked by Eusebius, that there are not many ancient writers who have quoted the epistle of James, learned men have observed, that Clement of Rome hath quoted it four several times. And so does Ignatius in his genuine epistle to the Ephesians, sect. 10. 12. 17. 30. And Origen in his 13th Homily on Genesis, sect. 5. That it was not more generally quoted by the ancients, besides the things already mentioned may have been owing to the following reasons:—

1. Being written to the whole Jewish nation, to correct the errors and vices which prevailed among them, the Gentiles may have thought themselves little concerned with it, and may have been at no pains to procure copies of it; by which means it was not at first so generally known among them as some other books of scripture.—
2. The seeming opposition of the doctrine in this epistle, to the doctrine of Paul concerning justification by faith without works of law, may have occasioned it to be less regarded by the most ancient writers; just as in later times it was on the same account rejected by Luther, who to show his contempt of it, called it (epistola straminea, a straw or chaffy epistle).

To conclude, the authority of the epistle of James as an inspired writing, is abundantly established, in Mill's opinion, by the apostles Paul and Peter, who have in their writings many sentiments and expressions similar to those contained in this epistle. For example:—

1 Pet. i. 1. Who hath begotten us again to a living hope, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ.

Rom. v. 3. Knowing that affliction worketh out patience, and patience experience.

Rom. ii. 13. Not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified.

Rom. vii. 23. I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind.

1 Pet. ii. 11. Lusts which war against the soul.

1 Pet. v. 8. Your adversary the devil: 9. Whom resist, steadfast in the faith.

1 Pet. v. 6. Be humbled under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you.

Rom. iv. 4. Who art thou that condemnest another man's household servant?

1 Pet. iv. 8. Love covereth a multitude of sins.

James i. 18. Having willed it, he hath begotten us by the word.

James i. 3. Knowing, that the proving of your faith worketh out patience.

James i. 22. And be ye doers of the law, and not hearers only, deceiving yourselves by false reasoning.

James iv. 1. Come they not hence, even from your lusts, which war in your members?

James iv. 7. Resist the devil, and he will flee from you.

James iv. 10. Be humbled in the presence of God, and he will lift you up.

James iv. 12. Thou, who art thou that condemnest another?

James v. 20. Will cover a multitude of sins.

SECT. III.—Of the Persons to whom the Epistle of James was addressed:—Of the Time and Place where it was written and delivered:—And of the Death of James.

I. BEZA thought the epistle of James was written to the believing Jews dispersed all over the world. This likewise was the opinion of Cave and Fabricius. Grotius says, it was written to all the people of Israel living out of Judea; in which he is followed by Wall. But Lardner, with more probability, thinks it was written to the whole Jewish nation in Judea, and out of it, whether believers or not. This opinion he builds on the inscription of the epistle, which runs thus:—'James, a servant of God, and of Jesus Christ, to the twelve tribes;' that is, to the whole Jewish nation, in whatever part of the world they were living. For no description of that people can be more comprehensive than the twelve tribes; and though it be added, who are in the dispersion, the expression, he thinks, includes the Jews living in Judea, who, since the Romans subdued them, might be considered as dispersed even in Judea itself. Or, if this sense of the expression is not admitted, it can imply no more but that the apostle's letter was chiefly intended for the Jews in foreign countries; consequently, it does not exclude the Jews in Judea, who were the writer's peculiar charge; and to whom, as shall be shewed immediately, some things in the epistle more especially belong. Next, that this epistle was designed for the unconverted as well as the converted Jews, is plain from this, that the apostle did not in the beginning of it wish the twelve tribes 'grace and peace from Jesus Christ,' but gave them only a general salutation, or wish of health; neither did he conclude his letter with any Christian benediction, as he would have done if the whole of his letter had been intended for believers. Farther, that this epistle was designed in part for the unbelieving Jews, appears from some passages which belong more particularly to them. For example, chap. iv. 1—10, where the writer speaks of wars and fightings among them, in which, being actuated by their lusts, they killed one another. These things could not be said of the believing Jews, but must be understood of the mutinies and insurrections which the unbelievers, especially the zealots, raised both in Judea and in the provinces, and which brought on the war with the Romans; also chap. v. 1—5, where James describes the miseries which were coming on the persons to whom he writes, and which fell heaviest on the unbelieving Jews in Judea; and mentions their 'condemning the just One, who did not resist them,' and insinuates, that these miseries were coming on them for that crime. Lastly, the whole of the third chapter, in Whitby's opinion, may have been intended for the unbelieving as well as the believing Jews, the name of brethren being applicable to both, when used by a writer of their own nation.

II. With respect to the date of this epistle, they who think it was written by James the son of Alphaeus, fix it to the year 62; because the wars and insurrections, which ended in the destruction of the Jewish commonwealth, are reproved in it, and the coming of Christ to destroy Jerusalem, and break the power of the unbelieving part of the nation, is said, chap. v. 8, to be near. Later than that year the epistle of James cannot be dated, if the opinion of Theodoret be admitted, who tells us, that what is said in the epistle to the Hebrews, which was written in the end of the year 62, or the beginning of the year 63, refers, among others, to the martyrdom of James the Just, chap. xiii. 7. 'Remember your rulers, who have spoken to you the word of God; and, attentively considering the ending of their conversation, imitate their faith.'

Joseph, the Jewish historian, is supposed to have spoken of the death of James the Just in the following passage: "Ananus the younger, who had just before been nominated high-priest, was naughty in his behaviour, and extremely daring. He was of the sect of the Sadducees, who are above all other Jews severe in their judicial sentences. As therefore Ananus was such a man, he, thinking he had a fit opportunity, because Festus was dead and Albinus was yet upon the road, calls a council, and bringing before them 'the brother of Jesus who is called Christ, whose name was James,' and some others, he brought an accusation against them as transgressors of the law, and delivered them to be stoned to death; by which means he offended some of the mildest Jews in the city, and such as were most exact observers of the law." Ant. lib. 20. cap. 8. Genev. Edit. If the words, 'the brother of Jesus who is called Christ,' are genuine, this passage will fix the death of James to the year 63, after Festus was dead, and before Albinus came into the province. But many learned men, and among the rest Le Clerc, Ans Critic. Part III. sect. 1. cap. 14. and Lardner, Can. vol. iii. p. 51. think these words are an interpolation. The ancient Christian writers give a different account of the death of James: They think he was killed, not in consequence of a judicial trial, but in a popular tumult, the occasion of which Eusebius thus explains, E. H. l. 2. c. 23. "When Paul had appealed to Cæsar, and had been sent to Rome by Festus, the Jews, who had aimed at his death, being disappointed in that design, turned their rage against James the Lord's brother, who had been appointed by the apostle bishop of Jerusalem," &c. Lardner conjectures that the death of James was partly "occasioned by the offence taken at his epistle; in which are not only sharp reprehensions of the unbelieving Jews, for the crimes committed by them, but also affecting representations of the dreadful calamities coming upon them." Can. iii. p. 93. By laying these facts and circumstances together, we cannot be much mistaken in supposing, that James wrote his epistle after the mutinies and insurrections which brought on the war with the Romans were begun, and before Jerusalem was besieged; consequently in the beginning of the year 62, or in 61, a short time before James's death. This is Lardner's opinion, p. 92. But Mill and Fabricius think it was written in the year 60, a year or two before his death.

As the apostle James commonly resided in Jerusalem, for the purpose of superintending the affairs of the church there, it is reasonable to think he wrote his epistle in Jerusalem, and delivered copies of it both to the believing and unbelieving inhabitants of that city, who, no doubt, circulated it among their brethren in distant countries, by means of such of them as came up to Jerusalem annually to the feast of Pentecost.

MANY of the converted Jews having formerly been of the sect of the Pharisees, who held the doctrines of fate and of the decrees of God, brought into the church not these doctrines alone, but the errors which the corrupt part of the nation had built on them; such as, that God is the author of sin, and that whoever professes the true religion is sure of salvation, whatever his temper or practice might be. In these mistaken notions the converted Jews seem to have been confirmed by certain passages of Paul's epistles, which they wrested to their own destruction. For example, Rom. i. 28. where it is said, that God 'delivered the Gentiles to a reprobate mind.'—Rom. vii. 17. 'It is no more I who work it out, but sin dwelling in me.' See the note on that verse.—Rom. ix. 19. 'Whom he will he hardeneth.'—ver. 21. 'Hath not the potter power over the clay?' &c.—chap. xi. 8. 'And the rest are blinded, as it is written,' &c. It seems the Judaizers in the Christian church, not willing to acknowledge that, according to the idiom of the Hebrew language, 'God is said to do what he permits,' inferred from the passages just now mentioned, that the sinful actions of men being all decreed by God, there is no resisting his will; and that the temptations by which men are seduced to sin, being all appointed of God, he is actually the author of men's sins. Farther, Paul's doctrine of justification by faith without works of law, being considered by the Judaizers as a confirmation of their favourite tenet, that nothing is necessary to salvation but the knowledge and profession of the true religion, many of them affirmed, that men are sanctified and made acceptable to God by knowledge alone. These false teachers corrupted the gospel in this manner, that by rendering it acceptable to the wicked, they might increase the number of their disciples, and draw money from them to spend on their lusts. See Pref. to Jude, sect. 4.

From these pernicious doctrines flowed that extreme corruption of manners found among some sects of Christians in the first ages; and particularly among the Simonians, Nicolaitans, and other heretics of Jewish extraction, of which there are evident traces in the apostolical epistles. (See Pref. to 1 John, sect. 3.) From the same polluted source issued those manifold crimes, for which the unbelieving Jews were infamous and intolerable everywhere, about the time of the breaking out of the war which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the nation. See the Illustrations prefixed to 2 Pet. chap. i. and ii.

In this state of the Jewish nation and of the Christian church in the latter period of the first age, it became absolutely necessary that the apostles of the circumcision who were then alive, should exert their authority in confuting errors, which were not only ruinous to the souls of men, but most dishonourable to the character of God as the governor of the universe. Wherefore, to expose the dangerous nature of these errors, and to guard the faithful against them, the apostles Peter, (see Pref. to 2 Pet. sect. 5.), and James, and John, (see Pref. to 1 John, sect. 3.), and Jude, (see Pref. to Jude, sect. 4.), wrote the seven epistles called Catholic. So Augustine informs us in his treatise of Faith and Good Works, chap. 14. "A wicked opinion having sprung up, even in the apostles' days, by misunderstanding Paul's arguments, Peter, John, James, and Jude aimed in their epistles principally at this end, to vindicate the doctrine of Paul from the false consequences charged upon it, and to shew that faith without works is nothing worth; but indeed Paul does not speak of faith at large, but only of that living, fruitful, and evangelical faith which he himself saith worketh by love. As for that faith void of good works, which these men thought sufficient to salvation, he declareth positively against it."—And having mentioned that Peter says some passages of his brother Paul's epistles had been wrested by unlearned men, Augustine observes, that Peter calls it wresting, because Paul was in truth of the same opinion with the other apostles, and held eternal life impossible to be obtained by any faith which had not the attestation of a holy life." Benson's translation in his note on 2 Pet. i. 9.

But although all the Catholic epistles were written to confute the corrupt doctrines and practices of the unbelieving Jews, and of the Judaizing Christians, in none of them are these doctrines more strongly opposed than in this epistle of James. For the sentiments which it contains are excellent, the doctrines which it inculcates are perfectly just and conformable to the spirit of the gospel, the precepts which it enjoins have all a tendency to advance the perfection and happiness of human nature. Moreover, the arguments by which the practice of religion and morality are enforced, are most cogent and affecting, and the language in which they are expressed is beautiful. From all which it follows, that this writing is the production of a person of an enlarged understanding, and of great goodness of heart, which, as Lardner observes, is the very character ascribed to James our Lord's brother; by all the Christian writers who have made mention of him.

CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Exhortations contained in this Chapter.

THE object of this epistle being to persuade the whole body of the Jewish nation to forsake the many errors and vices into which they had fallen, the apostle first directed his discourse to such of them as were Christians, who, it would seem, were becoming impatient under the persecution they were suffering for their religion; and the rather, because their unbelieving brethren had endeavoured to persuade them, that the evils under which they laboured were tokens of the divine displeasure. For they applied to individuals those passages of the law in which God declared he would bless and prosper the Israelitish nation, or curse and afflict it, according as it adhered to or forsook the law of Moses. Wherefore, to enable the Jewish Christians to judge rightly of the affliction they were enduring, and to reconcile them to their then suffering lot, the apostle, in the beginning of his epistle, exhorted them to rejoice exceedingly in affliction as a real advantage, ver. 2.—Because it was intended by God to produce in them patience, ver. 3.—And if it produced patience, it would contribute to the perfecting of many other virtues in them, ver. 4.—In the second place, the apostle exhorted them to pray for wisdom to enable them to make a proper use of their afflictions, and assured them, that God was most willing to grant them that, and every other good gift, ver. 5.—provided they asked these gifts sincerely, ver. 6-8.—Thirdly, that the poor among the brethren might be encouraged to bear the hardships of their lot patiently, and that the rich might not be too much cast down when they were stripped of their riches and possessions by their persecutors, he represented to the poor their great dignity as the sons of God, and the excellent possessions they were entitled to as the heirs of God: On the other hand, the rich he put in mind of the emptiness, instability, and brevity of all human grandeur, by comparing it to a flower whose leaves wither and fall immediately on their being exposed to the scorching heat of the sun, ver. 9-11.—Fourthly, to encourage both the poor and the rich to suffer cheerfully the loss of the transitory goods of this life for Christ's sake, he brought to their remembrance Christ's promise to bestow on them, in recompense, a crown of life, ver. 12.

The apostle next directed his discourse to the unbelieving part of the nation, and expressly condemned that impious notion by which many of them, and even some of the Judaizing teachers among the Christians, pretended to vindicate their worst actions, namely, that God tempts men to sin, and is the author of the sinful actions to which he tempts them. For he assured them, that God neither seduces any man to sin, neither is himself seduced by any one, ver. 13.—But that every man is seduced by his own lusts, ver. 14.—which being indulged in the mind, bring forth sin; and sin, by frequent repetition being nourished to maturity, bringeth forth death at length to the sinner, ver. 15.—Wherefore he besought them, not to deceive themselves by the impious notion that God is the author of sin, ver. 16.—He is the author of every good and perfect gift, and of nothing but good, and that invariably, ver. 17.—Farther, that such of them as professed the gospel might be brought to a right faith and practice, he desired them, as learners, to hearken with attention and submission to the apostles of Christ, who had brought them the word; and to be slow in delivering their opinion on matters of religion, lest they might say something that was dishonourable to God; and by no means to be angry with those who differed from them, ver. 19, 20.—And to lay aside all those evil passions which they had hitherto indulged, and which hindered them from receiving the word with meekness, ver. 21.—Then exhorted them to be doers, rather than hearers only of the word, ver. 22.—because the person who contents himself with hearing the word, is like a man who transiently beholds his natural face in a glass, then goes away, and immediately forgets his own appearance, so that he is at no pains to remove from his face any thing that is disagreeable in it, &c. ver. 23-25.

The apostle, having thus exhorted the Jews to be doers of the law, proceeded to mention certain points of the law, which persons who pretend to be holier than their neighbours are apt to neglect, but which merit the attention of all who are truly religious: And, first, he recommended the briding of the tongue—that virtue being a great mark of perfection in those who possess it, and the want of it a certain proof that such a person's religion is false, ver. 26.—An exhortation of this kind was peculiarly suitable to the Judaizing teachers, who sinned exceedingly with their tongue, both by inculcating erroneous doctrines, together with a most corrupt morality, and by reviling all who opposed their errors. The second point of duty which the apostle recommended was, kind offices to orphans and widows in their affliction, because such good works are in the sight of God a principal part of true religion, ver. 27.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. I.—1 James, a servant of God¹ and of the Lord Jesus Christ, to the twelve tribes² who ARE in the dispersion—health.³

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. I.—1 James, a servant of God, (see Rom. i. 1. note 1.), and of the Lord Jesus Christ, to the twelve tribes who are dispersed among the Gentiles—health.

Ver. 1.—1. A servant of God.]—James called himself 'a servant of God,' as well as 'of Jesus Christ,' for the sake of the unconverted Jews, who, because he was a servant of Christ, thought he was not a servant of God.

2. To the twelve tribes.]—That the twelve tribes were actually in existence when James wrote his epistle, will appear from the following facts:—1. Notwithstanding Cyrus allowed all the Jews in his dominions to return to their own land, many of them did not return. This happened agreeably to God's purpose, in permitting them to be carried captive into Assyria and Babylonia. For he intended to make himself known among the heathens, by means of the knowledge of his being and perfections, which the Jews in their dispersion would communicate to them. This also was the reason that God determined that the ten tribes should never return to their own land, Hos. i. 6. viii. 3. ix. 17.—2. That, comparatively speaking, few of the twelve tribes returned in consequence of Cyrus's decree, but continued to live among the Gentiles, appears from this, that in the days of Ahasuerus, one of the successors of Cyrus, who reigned from India to Ethiopia, over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces, Esther iii. 8. 'the Jews were dispersed among the people in all the provinces of his kingdom, and their laws were diverse from the laws of all other people, and they did not keep the king's laws': So that, by adhering to their own usages, they kept themselves distinct from all the nations among whom they lived.—3. On the day of Pentecost, which happened next after our Lord's ascension, Acts ii. 5. 9. 'There were dwelling at Jerusalem, Jews, devout men out of every nation under heaven,—Parthians, Medes, and Elamites,' &c.: So numerous were the Jews, and so widely dispersed through all the countries of the world.—4. When Paul travelled through Asia and Europe, he found the Jews so numerous, that in all the noted cities of the Gentiles they had synagogues in which they assembled for the worship of God, and were joined by multitudes of proselytes from among the heathens, to whom likewise he preached the gospel.

—5. The same apostle, in his speech to king Agrippa, affirmed that the twelve tribes were then existing, and that they served God day and night, in expectation of the promise made to the fathers, Acts xxvi. 6.—6. Josephus, Ant. l. 14. c. 12 tells us that one region could not contain the Jews, but they dwelled in most of the flourishing cities of Asia and Europe, in the islands and continent, not much less in number than the heathen inhabitants. From all which it is

2 My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers trials.¹

3 Knowing that (το σκαριον, 1 Pet. i. 7.) the proof of your faith worketh out patience:

4 Let patience, (ἡ, 106.) therefore, have a perfect work, that ye may be perfect and complete,² deficient in nothing.

5 If any of you be deficient in wisdom,¹ let him ask it of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given to him.

6 But let him ask in faith, (ἡμεῖς δὲ οὐκ ἔχοντες) being not at all irresolute;¹ for he who is irresolute, is like a wave of the sea, driven of the wind, and tossed.

7 (Tag, 97.) Now, let not that man think he shall receive any thing from the Lord.¹

8 A man of two minds¹ is unstable² in all his ways.

9 (Δι, 104.) Moreover, let the brother who is low, glory in his exaltation;

10 And the rich in his humiliation.¹ For, as a flower of an herb, (1 Pet. i. 24. note), he shall pass away.²

11 For the sun riseth with a burning heat, and withereth the herb; and the flower thereof falleth down, and the beauty of the appearance¹ thereof perisheth: so also the rich man shall wither in his ways.²

2 My brethren, instead of placing your happiness in great worldly prosperity, count it a most joyful event when ye fall into divers trials. See ver. 13. note.

3 Knowing that the proving of your faith by persecution and affliction, worketh out in you patience and resignation to God's will, from which many other virtues will flow:

4 Let patience, therefore, operate fully, that ye may be perfect and complete in the virtues which ye already possess, and deficient in no virtue which ye ought to attain.

5 If any of you be so deficient in wisdom as not to make a due use of afflictions, let him ask it of God—who giveth good things to all men liberally, and reproaches none for asking these things with importunity—and it shall be given to him.

6 But let him ask in the faith that God is able and willing to grant what he asks, not at all irresolute with respect to what he asks; for he who is irresolute concerning the good gifts for which he prays, is like a wave of the sea, driven of the wind and tossed: he will not pursue any virtue steadily.

7 Now, let not that man think, that, by the mere uttering of words not accompanied with sincere desires and endeavours, he shall receive any spiritual blessings from the Lord.

8 A man of two minds is unstable in all his purposes and actions; and never can attain any excellency of character.

9 Moreover, let the Christian who is low in this life, glory in his great dignity as a son of God and an heir of heaven, equally with the rich;

10 And let the rich who suffers for being a Christian, glory in being reduced to poverty for his attachment to so excellent a cause. For as a flower of an herb he must soon die.

11 For the sun (αυρος, i. aorist) riseth with a burning heat, and withereth the herb; and the flower thereof falleth down, and its beautiful form perisheth: so also the rich man, by the common vicissitudes of life, or by diseases and death seizing him in the midst of his glory, shall wither in his ways; the grandeur of his state shall vanish.

evident, that the Jews of the dispersion were more numerous than even the Jews in Judea; and that James very properly inscribed his letter to the twelve tribes which were in the dispersion; seeing the twelve tribes really existed then, and do still exist, although not distinguished by separate habitations, as they were anciently in their own land.

2. Health.]—Luther and Cajetan, who believed James to be no apostle, and rejected his epistle, called this a naked manner of salutation unworthy of an apostle, because it was not a wish of grace and peace, but only of health (ὑγιαίνετε). The apostle John, however, in his second epistle, used this salutation. It is the salutation likewise which the angel gave to Mary, Luke i. 28. Nay, this naked and heathenish manner of salutation, as they are pleased to term it, was used by the Council of Jerusalem in their letter to the converted Gentiles, Acts xv. 23. And as that letter was dictated by James the author of this epistle, it is beautiful to observe the same form of salutation used in both.

Ver. 2. When ye all into divers trials.]—The word πειρασμοί, which in our Bible is translated temptations, does not signify here what is commonly meant by temptations; for these we are directed to pray against. But it denotes trials by affliction and persecution. To these, God, by whose providence they come, exposes men, not to lead them into sin, but to afford them an opportunity of exercising and improving their virtues. Affliction, however, and persecution, contrary to God's intention, often prove temptations to sin through the influence of men's lusts.—Because afflictions have a natural influence to improve men's virtue, our Lord declared those 'blessed who are persecuted for righteousness' sake, Matt. v. 10. and exhorted such, ver. 12. 'to rejoice and be exceeding glad.' These sentiments the apostle James, I doubt not, had in his eye, when he exhorted the Jewish Christians to 'count it all joy when they fell into divers trials.'

Ver. 4. And complete.]—ὁλοκληροί. This word is applied to such living creatures as have all the members which belong to their kind. See 1 Thess. v. 23. note 1.—Here it signifies that the virtues proper to the new creature, which the brethren already possessed, were to be complete both in principle and in practice.

Ver. 5. Deficient in wisdom.]—ἡσυχία. In the common acceptance of the word, denotes a sound practical judgment concerning things to be done or avoided. But in scripture it signifies that assemblage of virtues which constitute true religion. See chap. iii. 17.—By wisdom, in this place, Benson understands those spiritual gifts which Christ promised to his disciples to enable them to defend the gospel, Luke xxi. 15. But I rather think practical wisdom to improve one's afflictions is meant, as expressed in the commentary.

Ver. 6. Not at all irresolute.]—One of the senses of δισταλλόμενος is to be in doubt, to be divided in one's own mind; consequently to be irresolute. Parkhurst's Dictionary.

Ver. 7. Receive any thing from the Lord.]—The man who is not fixed in his resolution to pursue virtue and avoid vice, but halts between the two, can never ask God's assistance sincerely, and therefore cannot expect to receive from God what he asks. See Epistola on 1 John v. 14. for an account of the qualifications necessary to acceptable prayer.

Ver. 8.—1. A man of two minds.]—The word διψυχος, signified one who has two souls, of which the one is of his opinion, the other of that; consequently is ever changing his resolutions and actions, according to the passion which happens to have the ascendant for the time. We have the same word, chap. iv. 8. applied to persons atrociously wicked.

2. Is unstable in all his ways.]—Having no fixed inclination either to virtue or vice, he halts between the two; and, pursuing no steady plan of conduct, he will neither be delivered from his vices, though he sometimes resists them, nor acquire any measure of virtue, though he sometimes pursues it.—Some are of opinion, that in this passage the apostle speaks of those Jews who were not resolved whether they would adhere to the law or to the gospel.

Ver. 10.—1. The rich in his humiliation.]—So the word is translated, Acts viii. 33. The humiliation in this verse, being opposed to ψαύω in the preceding, signifies the humiliation of the rich man, by his being stripped of his riches and possessions, of his liberty, and even by his being liable to lose his life on account of the gospel. Here, therefore, the apostle adviseth the rich to glory when they lose the uncertain riches of this life, for the sake of maintaining such excellent possessions as truth and a good conscience, with the favour and approbation of God.—Grotius and Le Clerc, by supplying αἰσχυνέσθαι, translate the clause thus: Let the rich be ashamed of his meanness; that is, of the emptiness and uncertainty of the enjoyments in which he delights. But the translation I have given agrees better with the scope of the passage.

2. He shall pass away.]—The apostle's argument is, that the rich who lose their possessions for righteousness' sake, lose things comparatively of small value, and which, according to the course of nature, they must soon part with, though they do not suffer persecution.

Ver. 11.—1. And the beauty (ἀπαύρατος, of the face) of the appearance thereof.]—The Greek word is applied metaphorically to things inanimate, to denote their external form or appearance. Thus the face of the earth, the face of the heavens, &c.

2. Wither in his ways.]—As ὁδὸς, from ὁδοποιέω, signifies a way or journey, (Luke xiii. 22), some are of opinion, that the word may here be translated 'shall wither in his journeys'; meaning those journeys which the rich Jews, who were commonly merchants, made for the sake of carrying on their traffic. But as, in scripture, one's way is put for his actions or course of life, (ver. 8.), I think ways here signifies the rich man's projects or pursuits; a sense which agrees well with the context. Wherefore, the correction proposed by Erasmus, in suis negotiis, being inept, and without the authority of MSS. is justly rejected.—One MS. mentioned by Mill reads here ὑπερηφανία, in his riches or abundance. But being a single authority, it is of little value.

2 Blessed is the man who sustaineth trial, (see ver. 13. note), for, becoming an approved person, he shall receive the crown (see 1 Cor. ix. 25. note 2.) of life, which the Lord hath promised to them who love him.

13 Let no one who is tempted say, Certainly I am tempted (πειρασθῆναι) by God.¹ For God is incapable of being tempted by evil things, (Ja. 101.), and he tempteth no one.

14 But every one is tempted of his own lust, being drawn away and enticed¹ BY IT.

15 Then lust having conceived,¹ bringeth forth sin; and sin being perfected,² bringeth forth death.³

16 Be not deceived, my beloved brethren :

17 Every good gift, and every perfect free gift,¹ is from above, descending from the Father of lights,² with whom there is no variableness, nor shadow of turning.³

18 Having willed IT,¹ he hath begotten us by the word of truth,² in order that we should be a kind of first-fruits³ of his creatures.

19 Wherefore, my beloved brethren, let every man be swift to hear, slow to speak,¹ slow to wrath.²

12 The glory of this life being so transitory, blessed is the man, whether he be rich or poor, who worthily sustains the trial which is appointed him, for, becoming an approved person, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord Christ hath promised to them who love him more than relations, or riches, or life itself.

13 Let no one who is drawn into sin by the things which befall him, say with the false teachers, Truly I am seduced by God. For God is incapable of being seduced by evil things, and he does not seduce any one, either by an outward or inward influence. His infinite holiness and goodness make every thing of that sort impossible.

14 But every sinner is seduced by his own lust, being voluntarily drawn away from virtue, and enticed to sin by it, as by the allurements of an harlot.

15 Then lust, by enticing the sinner to its embraces, having conceived, bringeth forth sinful actions; and sinful actions, by frequent repetition being perfected into a confirmed habit, bring forth eternal death as their offspring.

16 Be not deceived, my beloved brethren, into the belief that God is the author of sin.

17 So far is God from seducing men to sin, that every good gift, whether it be our reasonable faculties, or virtuous dispositions, or outward happy circumstances, and every perfect gift, pardon of sin, the favour of God, and eternal life, is from above, descending from God the author of all virtue and happiness, with whom there is no variableness nor shadow of change.

18 The Father of lights, agreeably to his own good pleasure, hath begotten us Jews for sons by the preaching of the gospel, that being converted and sanctified, we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures; the most acceptable part of his creatures.

19 Since God hath willed to regenerate us by the gospel, my beloved brethren, let every man be swift to hear the gospel, and slow to speak concerning it till he understands it; slow also to wrath in religious matters.

Ver. 13. Say I am tempted of God.—Πειρασθῆναι, to tempt, sometimes signifies to try, in order to discover the disposition of a person, or to improve his virtue, ver. 12. In this sense God is said to have tempted or tried Abraham, and the Israelites. Not that he was ignorant of the dispositions of either of them. In the same sense the Israelites are said to have tempted or proved God. They put his power and goodness to the trial, by entertaining doubts concerning them. Here, to tempt, signifies to solicit one to sin, and actually to seduce him into sin, which is the effect of temptation or solicitation. See ver. 14.—In this sense the devil tempts men. And because he is continually employed in that malicious work, he is called, by way of eminence, ὁ πειραστής, the tempter. It is in this sense we are to understand the saying in the end of the verse, that God is incapable of being tempted, that is, seduced to sin by evil things, and that he seduces no one to sin. God having nothing either to hope or fear, no evil being, whether man or angel, can either entice or seduce him. Farther, his infinitely perfect nature admitting of evil thought or inclination, he is absolutely (ἀνέναντος) incapable of being tempted.

Ver. 14. Being drawn away and enticed.—Ἐξαιχμαίνεσθαι καὶ δαλεζομένους, literally being drawn out when caught with a bait. It is generally supposed that the allusion here is to the drawing of fish out of a river with a baited hook; a metaphor used by Plato, as quoted by Cicero, De Senect. c. 13. "Divinus enim Plato, escam, malorum appellat voluptatem, quod ea videlicet homines captantur ut hamo pisces." Nevertheless, since the original words are likewise used to express the enticements of harlots, the apostle seems rather to have had that idea in his mind; especially as in the subsequent verse he speaks of 'lust's' conceiving and bringing forth sin.

Ver. 15.—1. Lust having conceived.—The soul, which the Greek philosophers considered as the seat of the appetites and passions, is called by Philo το δούλο, the female part of our nature, and the spirit, το ἀνδρῖν, the male part. In allusion to that notion, James represents men's lust as an harlot, who entices their understanding and will into its impure embraces, and from that conjunction conceives sin. And sin being brought forth, it immediately acts and is nourished by frequent repetition, till at length it gains such strength, that in its turn it begets death, which destroys the sinner. This is the true genealogy of sin and death. Lust is the mother of sin, and sin the mother of death, and the sinner the parent of both.—Ver. 16. the apostle gives the genealogy of righteousness. All the righteous deeds which men perform proceed from their renewed nature. Their nature is renewed by the power of truth; and God is the prime mover in the whole. 'Having willed it, he hath begotten us by the word of truth.'

2. And sin being perfected.—Ἀποτελειθῆναι, literally, being brought to maturity. Thus, τελειοῦσθαι εὐσεβείας is a full grown man. The compounded word in this passage is elegantly applied to sin after it is brought forth, to denote its arriving at such a state of maturity as, in its turn, to become a father and beget death.

3. Bringeth forth death.—Ἀποθνήσκειν. This word, like γεννᾶν, properly signifies to bring forth as a female does; but both of them signify also to beget as the male does. The present passage therefore might have been translated, 'Sin being perfected begetteth death.' See ver. 18.

Ver. 17.—1. Every good gift, and every perfect free gift.—Critics observe, that in the original this is an hexameter verse, which they suppose the apostle quoted from some Greek poet. But that is not certain.

2. The father of lights.—The word lights being in the plural, may signify as in the commentary. See 1 John i. 5. note 3. Or it may denote spiritual and corporeal lights.—To mention God's being the Father or Author of the light of the heavenly bodies, as well as of the light of reason, was very proper, because the creation of these corporeal lights is a great instance of his goodness.

3. Variableness, nor shadow of turning.—The Father of lights is not like the sun, the fountain of corporeal light. He neither rises nor sets, doth not approach nearer to and recede farther from us, but is unchangeable both in his kind intentions and actions, as well as in his nature. Will he then give us holy desires at one time, and evil inclinations at another? No. He always gives what is good, and nothing but good. It is blasphemous, therefore, as well as absurd, to suppose that God either tempts or constrains men to sin, on purpose that he may have a pretence for making them miserable.—Some are of opinion, that in the word ἀεὶ ἀλλοτρίως, translated variableness, there is an allusion to the paradoxes of the heavenly bodies. But as these were not known to the common people, the apostle, in a letter addressed to them, would hardly introduce a reference to such things.

Ver. 18.—1. Having willed it, he hath begotten, &c.—The regeneration of men is not a necessary act in God, but proceeds from his own free will. All the actions of God are perfectly free, John i. 13. Eph. i. 5.

2. Begotten us by the word of truth.—The change which God produces in men's dispositions and actions, by the truths of the gospel impressed on their minds, is so great, that it may be called a begetting or creating them anew. We have the same sentiment, 1 Pet. i. 3.

3. A kind of first-fruits.—See 1 Cor. xv. 20. note 1. The first-fruits being the best of their kind, by calling the regenerated the 'first-fruits of God's creatures,' the apostle has shewn how acceptable such are to God, and how excellent in themselves through the renovation of their nature.—By creatures some understand believers in Christ, called in other passages new creatures.

Ver. 19.—1. Slow to speak.—Persons half learned, having an high opinion of their own knowledge in religious matters, are very fond of instructing others, and zealous to bring them over to their opinions. The zeal of the Jews in this respect is taken notice of and ridiculed by Horace, Satir. lib. i. Satir. iv. lin. 142. That the converted Jews were exceedingly fond of being teachers, we learn from James iii. 1. Rom. ii. 19. 1 Tim. i. 7.—The petulance of his disciples Pythagoras repressed, by obliging them to be five years silent before they attempted to speak on any point of science. Does the apostle here allude to that custom?

2. Slow to wrath.—Intemperate religious zeal is often accompanied with a train of bad passions, and particularly with great wrath

20 For the wrath of man doth not work out the righteousness of God.¹

21 Wherefore, putting away all filthiness,¹ and the overflowing of maliciousness,² embrace ye with meekness the implanted³ word, which is able to save your souls.

22 (Δε) And be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, (παρελογίζεσθαι) deceiving yourselves by false reasoning.

23 For if any one be a hearer of the word, and not a doer, he is like a man who views his natural face¹ in a looking-glass:

24 For he looketh at himself, and goeth away, and immediately forgets what kind of person he was.

25 But he who looketh narrowly¹ into the perfect law,² which is of liberty,³ and continueth; he not becoming a forgetful hearer, but a doer of ITS work, (ὡς) the same shall be blessed in his acting.

26 If any one among you¹ thinketh to be religious, who bridleth not his tongue,² but deceiveth his own heart, of this person the religion is false.

27 Pure religion¹ and undefiled, with God even the Father, is this, (οὐρανίου) To take care of orphans² and widows in their affliction, and to keep one's self unspotted (αὐτοῖς) by the world. (See 1 Tim. v. 4.)

20 Besides, persecution raised by the wrath of man, does not work out in others the faith which God counts to men for righteousness.

21 Wherefore, putting away all the filthiness of fleshly lusts, and the abounding of maliciousness which leads men to persecute those who differ from them, embrace ye with a teachable disposition the doctrines of the gospel, as now implanted in the world by us apostles; which doctrine is able to save your souls.

22 Ye Jews are at no pains in performing the duties of piety and morality, because ye think knowledge will save you. But, be ye doers of the word, not hearers only, deceiving yourselves by false reasoning.

23 For if any one be a hearer of the gospel, and does not practise its precepts, he is like a man who, from custom or by accident, views his natural face in a looking-glass, without any intention to wipe off the spots that may be on it:

24 For he looketh at himself, without taking notice of the spots on his visage, and, going away, immediately forgets what kind of appearance he had, without removing from his face what is foul.

25 But he who, with an intention to correct his errors, looketh narrowly into the perfect law of liberty, and does not go away as the other doth, but continueth to look into it, that he may know himself; he not becoming a forgetful hearer, but a careful doer of the work which it enjoins, the same shall be blessed of God in his endeavours to become good.

26 If any one among you Jews thinketh to be religious, who restraineth not his tongue from railing against those who differ from him in religious opinions, but deceiveth himself with the notion, that railing, as a mark of zeal, is acceptable to God, of this person the religion is false.

27 Hypocrites place religion in performing the external duties of devotion, but pure religion, and that which is not defiled with worldly mixtures, in the esteem of God, even the Father, does not consist in forms, but is this,—To take care of orphans and widows in their affliction, and to keep one's self unspotted by the vices of the world.

against those who differ from us in opinion. The Jews, to whom this letter was written, were remarkably faulty in these respects.

Ver. 20. The wrath of man doth not work out the righteousness of God.—Persecution, the effect of the wrath of man, if violent, may make men hypocrites, by forcing them to profess what they do not believe; but it hath no influence to produce that genuine belief which God counts to men for righteousness. Nothing but rational arguments, with the assistance of the Spirit of God, can do this.—Wrath, or a blind furious zeal in matters of religion, is an horrible evil, as it is subversive of that freedom of thought in which the dignity of a reasonable creature consists.

Ver. 21.—1. Putting away all filthiness.—See Rom. vi. 19. note 2. The word καθαίρειν signifies filthiness adhering to the body. Applied to the mind, it denotes those lusts and appetites which defile the soul, particularly those which are gratified by gluttony, drunkenness, and fornication; vices to which many Jews pretending to be teachers were exceedingly addicted.

2. And (περιεργάζεσθαι) the overflowing of maliciousness.—Some are of opinion that there is in this precept an allusion to circumcision, because the foreskin cut off in that rite is denoted by an Hebrew word of the same signification with περιεργάζεσθαι, superfluity; and because it was supposed to render them unclean in the sight of God, as being an emblem of carnal lust. See Rom. ii. 29. note. Maliciousness is such a rooted hatred, as leads men to do all the evil they can to each other. This, when it proceeds from differences in religion, makes men quite blind to truth.

3. Embrace ye with meekness the implanted word.—Vatablus and Heinicus think σπέρμα here should be translated natural, pure.—Although the word of God, the incorruptible seed by which men are regenerated, be implanted in the world, it will not regenerate them unless they embrace it with meekness, that is, with an humble teachable disposition; for which purpose they must lay aside all filthiness, &c.—In the writings of the heathen philosophers we find many injunctions to their disciples to cleanse their soul from its filth, as a necessary prerequisite to their profiting by the instructions which they were to receive.—Meekness here stands opposed to wrath, ver. 20.

Ver. 22. His natural face.—ὡς ὁμοῦντος τὴν φύσιν, literally, the face of his nativity. The meaning is, 'his face as it is by nature;' for this is a description of a person who is so careless of his looks that he suffers his face to remain in its natural state. He does not cleanse it, far less paint it, as the Easterns used to do to render themselves beautiful.

Ver. 25.—1. Who looketh narrowly.—The word παραρθεύειν signifies to stoop down with an intention to look to and examine an object with accuracy. It is therefore fitly translated 'looketh narrowly.'

2. Into the perfect law.—See Rom. ii. 12. note 1. The law of God, as it subsists in the gospel, is called perfect on account of its superiority to the law of Moses, and is here compared to a mirror, because it shews every man the temper and disposition of his mind, and what is its complexion or colour; just as a mirror shews him the features and colour of his countenance.—The gospel is called the perfect law, to distinguish it from the law of Moses, which made no man perfect, either in respect of holiness or of pardon, Heb. vii. 10.; whereas the gospel makes men perfect in both.

3. Which is of liberty.—The gospel is called the law of liberty,—1. Because it delivers men from the slavery of their lusts, and restores the dominion of reason and conscience in their minds, which is true liberty; 2. Because it hath freed the Jews from the law of Moses, which was a yoke of bondage they were not able to bear; 3. Because it delivers all true believers from the punishment of sin; 4. Because it assures us, that in the eye of God all men are on a level, and equally entitled to the privileges of the gospel; 5. Because it forbids the acceptance of persons in judgment, chap. ii. 12.

Ver. 26.—1. If any one among you.—Some MSS. want the words among you; but as they are emphatical, they are fitly retained.—The Jews were much addicted to cursing and railing, especially when provoked by opposition in matters of religion.

2. Who bridleth not his tongue, &c.—This is a sharp rebuke to those in modern times, who, from a pretended zeal for religion, propagate calumnies against every one who is not of their way of thinking concerning the disputed articles of the Christian faith. Such a conduct renders their pretensions to religion false. So κατακλίνω signifies, Acts xiv. 15. 'That ye turn from (τὸν ὁδὸν ἀποστρέψαι) these false gods.'

Ver. 27.—1. Pure religion.—The word θρησκεία signifies worship; but by an usual figure, a part of religion is put for the whole. Tillotson (Sermon) thinks the apostle likens religion to a gem, whose perfection consists in its being clear, that is, without flaw or cloud. And Doddridge observes that no gem is so ornamental as the temper here described.

2. To take care of orphans.—According to the apostle, religion does not consist so much in the warmth of affection with which we worship God, as in good works. These, when they proceed from a regard to the welfare of society, are termed virtuous actions; but when done from a regard to the will of God, and to promote his glory, they become pious actions, and make a chief part of true religion.—There is a sentiment in Isocrat, ad Niccol. not much different from this: 'Ὅπου δὲ τοῦτο εἶναι ὁρᾷ καλλίστην καὶ διακρίνουσαν καὶ γὰρ οὐδὲν ἄλλο ἐκείνην ἀνίσταται παρὰ τὴν ἐξέτασιν, ἡ δὲ ἐξέτασις ἐστὶν ἡ ἀκριβοῦς ἐπιστήμη καὶ ἡ ἀληθὴς πίστις.' 'Esteem this the most excellent sacrifice and the greatest worship, if you present yourself as good and just as possible.'

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Precepts and Doctrines contained in this Chapter.

THE manners and customs of the Hebrews being different from those of all other nations, the jurisprudence of the heathens could not be applied for determining the controversies which arose among the Jews in the provinces. The Romans therefore allowed them, not only in Judea, but in all the countries of the empire, to determine their controversies about matters of property by their own law and practice. So Josephus informs us, and gives us copies of several decrees of the emperors to that effect. See 1 Cor. vi. 2. note 4. Hence the apostle, in mentioning the right practice which the Jewish converts who thought themselves religious were to maintain, insisted particularly, in the first part of this chapter, on their observing justice and impartiality in judging such causes as by the Roman law, or by the consent of parties, they were allowed to determine. And this he did, the rather, because the unbelieving Jews were now become very partial and unjust in their decision as judges. Nor were the believing part of the nation altogether blameless in that respect. But partiality in judgment being directly contrary to the gospel, the apostle severely reproved both the one and the other for shewing any disposition to favour rich litigants, though it were only by giving them a better or more honourable seat in their synagogue, than that allotted to their poorer opponents, ver. 1, 2, 3, 4.—This partiality to the rich, and contempt of the poor, he told them, was extremely improper to the disciples of Christ, especially as they knew, that in all the countries the poor had shewed a greater disposition to receive the gospel than the rich, ver. 5.—and that the rich unbelieving Jews were great persecutors of the Christians, and dragged them to the heathen tribunals to get them punished, ver. 6.—Wherefore, to prevent partiality in judgment for the future, the apostle recommended to them that unfeigned benevolence towards all men, which Christ hath enjoined as his commandment, and which on that account may be called the royal law, ver. 8–13. This passage of the epistle, so far as it related to the Christians, was intended for the instruction of the bishops and rulers, and other gifted persons in the church, whose office it was to determine those controversies about worldly matters which arose among the brethren. See 1 Cor. xii. 28. note 2. and the Life of Paul, Proofs and Illustr. No. 2.

Many of the Jews, influenced by the prejudices of their education, attempted to excuse their unjust judgments and other evil actions, by the care with which they performed some other of the precepts of the law, which they considered as of more importance than the rest. Hence the question of the lawyer, Matt. xxii. 36. 'Master, which is the great commandment in the law?' Wherefore, to set them right in this matter, the apostle assured them, that though they kept all the other precepts of the law, if they habitually offended in any one of them, they became guilty of all, ver. 10.—because the precepts of the law being all enjoined by one and the same authority, he who habitually transgresseth one precept, disregards the authority of the lawgiver, and shews himself ready to transgress any other precept in the like circumstances, ver. 11–13.

Another great error into which the Jewish Christians had fallen in the first age, and which had made them negligent of good works, was this: They fancied that the speculative belief of the doctrines of the gospel, to which they gave the name of faith, was sufficient to save them, however deficient they might be in good works; an error which has prevailed in modern times likewise. Wherefore, to shew that one's assenting with his understanding to truth, will not save him, unless it leads him to perform good works, the apostle compared the faith of such a believer to the benevolence of a man, who in words expresses abundance of kindness to the naked and the hungry poor, yet gives them none of the things necessary to the body, ver. 14–18. For the same purpose he remarked, that even the devils believe speculatively that God exists; but will not be saved by their faith, though it be real, as appears by their trembling when they recollect God's justice and power. The reason is, they are so utterly depraved that their faith hath no influence on their temper and conduct, ver. 19.—Farther, more fully to prove that good works are necessary to justification, the apostle appealed to Moses himself, who hath declared that Abraham and Rahab were justified on account of the good works which their faith prompted them to perform, ver. 20–25. In this appeal there was the greater propriety, that Paul, whose doctrine the Judaizers pretended to espouse, in his epistle to the Romans and Galatians, had built his doctrine of justification by faith, upon the account which Moses had given of the justification of that great believer.

His discourse on justification James concluded with a saying, which must impress every intelligent reader with the strongest conviction of the necessity of good works in order to salvation, 'As the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also,' ver. 26.

CHAP. II.—1 My brethren, do ye not hold¹ the faith of the glory² of our Lord Jesus Christ with acceptance³ of persons!

Ver. 1.—1. Do ye not hold, &c. 1)—That this clause is rightly translated interrogatively is plain, because translated either as a precept or as an affirmative proposition, it does not agree with what is contained in the following verse.

2. The faith of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ.—In construing πίστις with δόξα, I have followed the Syriac translation, which hath here, 'Fidem gloriæ domini nostri.' The glory of our Lord Jesus Christ consists in being the Son of God, and the governor and judge of the worlds visible and invisible. The faith of this glorious character cannot be held consistently with partiality in judgment, which Christ hath prohibited, and will severely punish: or, 'faith of the glory,' &c. may be an Hebraism for 'the glorious faith' of the gospel enjoined by our Lord Jesus Christ; or the glo-

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. II.—1 My brethren, do ye not, in judging causes, hold the belief of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ, as the Son of God and judge of the world, with acceptance of persons, contrary to that faith, and contrary to the law itself! Lev. xix. 16. Deut. xvi. 19.

2 That ye do this ye cannot deny: for if there enter into your synagogue a man, who is a party in the cause to be judged, having rious faith of which he is the object. The faith of the gospel may justly be called glorious, on account of its intrinsic excellence, and of the spiritual gifts and miraculous powers with which it was accompanied in the first age. See 3 Cor. iii. 7–8. notes.

3. With acceptance of persons.—Ἐν προσωπολήψει. This word signifies regard shewn to persons, not on account of their real worthiness, but on account of their station, their riches, and other external circumstances. This partiality in judges being extremely culpable, it is here severely condemned by the apostle.

Ver. 2. If there enter into your synagogues.—The word συναγωγή sometimes denotes an assembly of persons, sometimes the house in which such an assembly is held. Here, 'your synagogues' does not mean a Jewish synagogue, but the house or room where the with splendid clothing, and there enter likewise a poor man with dirty clothing ;

3 And ye look upon him who hath the clothing which is splendid, and say to him, Sit thou here (κατα) honourably ;¹ and say to the poor MAN, Stand thou there, or Sit here at my footstool :

4 (καὶ, 318.) Verily, do ye not make a difference¹ within yourselves,² and are become judges POSSESSED of evil thoughts !³

5 Harken, my beloved brethren, Hath not God chosen the poor of this world TO BE (see Eph. i. 4. Greek) rich in faith,¹ and heirs of the kingdom² which he hath promised to them who love him ?

6 But ye have despised the poor. Do not the rich exceedingly oppress you ? and themselves drag you to the judgment-seats !

7 Do not they blaspheme that excellent name which is named upon you ?

8 If now indeed ye fulfil the royal law¹ according to that scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, (see Rom. xiii. 9. note), ye do well.²

9 But if ye accept persons, ye work sin, being convicted by the law as transgressors.

10 For whosoever shall keep the whole law, (he) but shall fall with respect to one PRECEPT, hath become guilty of all.²

11 For he who commanded, Do not commit adultery, hath commanded also, Do not kill.¹ Now, if thou commit not adultery, but killest, thou hast become a transgressor of the law.

Christians assembled for worship. And as the Jews held courts of judicature in their synagogues, (see Vitringa de Veter. Synag. lib. 3. part 1. c. 11. p. 174. Luke xxi. 12), and there also punished offenders by scourging, (Matt. x. 17. Acts xxi. 11.), it is probable that the first Christians, after their example, held courts for determining civil causes in the places where they assembled for public worship, called here, 'your synagogue.' For, that the apostle speaks not of their assembly, but of the place where their assembly was held, is evident from his mentioning the litigants sitting in a more honourable or in a less honourable place of the synagogue.

Ver. 3. Sit thou here honourably.—Of the chief or most honourable seats in the synagogues our Lord speaks Matt. xxiii. 6. where he rebuked the scribes and Pharisees for loving to sit in these seats.

Ver. 4.—1. Verily, do ye not make a difference.—This is the literal translation of the phrase ἐν ἑαυτοῖς, as is plain from Acts xv. 9. where it is so rendered. Accordingly, the Syriac hath, 'Annon discernim fecistis apud vos ?'

2. Within yourselves.—Ἐν ἑαυτοῖς is rendered within yourselves, Matt. iii. 9.

3. And are become judges possessed of evil thoughts.—So I have rendered καὶ ἑαυτοὺς κριταὶ γεννηθέντες, because it is the genitive of possession. See Eccl. iv. 24. 2. Benson, supposing the apostle to be speaking of the synagogue as a place of worship, thinks he reproved the teachers for showing more concern to have the rich Jews converted than the poor. But if that had been the apostle's design, what he says, ver. 6, 7. in reproof of their partiality, would have been an argument in favour of it. For the power and malice of the rich unbelieving Jews was a good reason for the Christian teachers endeavouring, by innocent complaisance, to bring about their conversion, rather than that of the poor.

Ver. 5.—1. Chosen the poor of this world to be rich in faith.—Our Lord and his apostles preached the gospel to the poor, who at first received it more readily than the rich, being the greatest consolation under the miseries of life.—That the gospel should have been first preached to the poor, and first received by them, was wisely ordered : Because it shewed, that the spreading of the gospel through the world, was owing not to human policy but to the power of God. Among the Gentiles, the prejudices of the rich against the gospel were not so great as among the Jews. Hence more persons of rank and education among the Gentiles were converted than among the Jews. See 1 Cor. i. 26. note.

2. Heirs of the kingdom.—Under the law great blessings were promised to them who loved God, Exod. xxi. 6. 1 Sam. ii. 30. Prov.

golden rings on his fingers, and with splendid clothing, and there enter likewise a poor man, who is the other party in the cause, with ragged dirty clothing ;

3 And ye, who are to judge their cause, take notice of him who hath the splendid clothing, and with great respect say to him, Sit thou here in an honourable place, and with manifest contempt say to the poor man, Stand thou there, or Sit here at my footstool :

4 Verily, do ye not by this behaviour make a difference in your own minds between them, and are become judges who indulge the evil purpose of favouring the one more than the other !

5 To shew you the evil of favouring the rich more than the poor when ye act as judges, hearken, my beloved brethren, Hath not God chosen the poor of this world to be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which God hath promised to them who love him ? Why then do ye despise persons who are esteemed and promoted by God equally with the rich !

6 But, contrary to the example of impartiality set you by God, ye have despised the poor when ye judged their causes. Why are ye partial to the rich ? Do not the rich exceedingly oppress you, and drag you to the heathen tribunals, to be punished for your faith ?

7 Do not they utter the most injurious speeches against the excellent name of Christ, which is named upon you in the appellation of Christians, by affirming him to be a deceiver !

8 If now indeed, as upright judges, ye fully obey the excellent law of Christ the great king, according to that scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, (Rom. xiii. 9. note), ye do well : ye will be guilty of no partiality in judgment.

9 But if, in judging, ye accept persons, ye work sin, and are convicted by the royal law as transgressors : for that law enjoins you to love your neighbours as yourselves, consequently to do them justice.

10 Ye cannot make atonement for your transgressions, by performing other precepts with care : For whosoever shall keep the whole law, but shall fall wilfully and habitually with respect to one precept, hath become guilty of breaking them all.

11 For he who commanded, Do not commit adultery, hath commanded also, Do not kill. Now, if thou commit not adultery, but killest by iniquitous judgments, thou hast become a transgressor of the whole law of love, because thou despisest the authority of him who enjoined all the precepts of that law.

vit. 17. : But under the gospel the happiness of heaven is promised to such ; and by making the poor heirs of the kingdom equally with the rich, God hath shewed that he is no respecter of persons, and hath taught us, in all religious matters, and in matters of justice, to shew a like impartiality.

Ver. 8.—1. Ye fulfil the royal law.—Νόμον βασιλικόν. This phrase admits of three interpretations. 1. The Greeks called a thing royal, which was excellent in its kind. A royal law, therefore, is an excellent law. 2. The same Greeks, having few or no kings among them, called the laws of the kings of Persia, βασιλικὰ, royal laws. In this sense, the royal law is the law made by Christ our King. 3. The law enjoining us to love our neighbour may be called the royal law, because it inspires us with a greatness of mind fit for kings, whose greatest glory consists in benevolence and clemency.—The law or precept here spoken of was enjoined by Moses ; but Christ carried it to such perfection, and laid such a stress upon it, that he called it a 'new commandment,' John xiii. 34. and 'his commandment,' John xv. 12. See 1 John ii. 8. note 1. These circumstances lead us by the royal law to understand the law of Christ, our King, which seems to have been the opinion of the Syriac translator, who hath here 'Legem Dei, the law of God.'

2. Ye do well.—This expression is used, Acts xv. 29. in the decree concerning the Gentiles. And as that decree is generally supposed to have been dictated by James the apostle, it is a presumption that this epistle was written by him.

Ver. 10.—1. But shall fall.—The word πταίσω properly signifies shall stumble. But the cause is here put for the effect. See chap. iii. 2. note 1.

2. Become guilty of all.—The Jewish doctors affirmed, that by observing any one precept of the law with care, men secured to themselves the favour of God, notwithstanding they neglected all the rest. Wherefore, they recommended it to their disciples to make choice of a particular precept, in the keeping of which they were to exercise themselves. Whitty says they commonly chose either the law of the Sabbath, or the law of sacrifice, or the law of tithes ; because they esteemed these the great commandments in the law.—This corrupt Jewish doctrine James expressly condemned, by declaring, that although a man were to keep the law in all other points, yet if he habitually breaks one precept, he is really guilty of all. See next note.

Ver. 11. Hath commanded also, Do not kill.—This being the reason of the apostle's affirmation in the preceding verse, his meaning is, that all the commandments being equally enjoined by God, the man who despises the authority of God, so far as to break any

12 So speak, and so do, as those who shall be judged¹ by the law of liberty: (See chap. i. 25. note 3.)

13 For judgment without mercy¹ WILL BE to him who shewed no mercy; (see, 205.) but mercy will exult over judgment TO HIM WHO SHEWED MERCY. (Psalm xviii. 25.)

14 What IS the advantage, my brethren, if any one say he hath faith, but hath not works? can this faith save him?¹

15 (see, 105.) For if a brother or a sister¹ be naked,¹ (see, 206.) or destitute of daily food, 16 And any one of you say to them, Depart in peace; be ye warmed, and be ye filled; yet give them none of the things needful for the body, what IS the advantage?

17 So also faith, if it hath not works, is dead,¹ BEING by itself.

18 (see, 76.) Also, one may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works; shew me thy faith without thy works,¹ and I will shew thee my faith by my works.

19 Thou believest that there is one God; thou dost well: (see ver. 8. note 2.) Even the devils believe THIS, and tremble.

20 (see, 104.) Besides, wouldst thou know, O false man, that faith without works is dead?¹

21 Was not Abraham our father justified by works, when he had lifted up Isaac his son upon the altar?¹

22 Thou seest that HIS faith co-operated

12 In judgment, to speak and so act as those ought to do who know that they shall be judged by the gospel, which forbids all partiality in judgment:

13 For the gospel teaches, that at the last day judgment, according to the strictness of law, without mercy, will be to him who in his dealings shewed no mercy: But at that day mercy will triumph over judgment to him who shewed mercy.

14 To shew you the absurdity of relying on the profession without the practice of the gospel, I ask, What advantage is it to him, my brethren, if any one say, he hath faith, but hath not works? Can this faith save him?

15 The profession of such a faith is as unprofitable to the believer, as the kindness which some profess to the poor is to them whom they do not relieve. For if a brother or sister be naked, or destitute of daily food,

16 And any one of you who is rich say to them, Depart in peace whithersoever ye are going; be ye clothed and fed by some humane person; yet give them none of the things needful for clothing and feeding their body, nor money to purchase them, what is the advantage? Will such speeches feed and clothe the poor?

17 So also faith, if it is not accompanied with good works, is dead, being by itself. It is as ineffectual for justification, as good wishes without good works are for feeding the hungry and clothing the naked.

18 Also one may say, Thou affirmest thou hast faith, and I affirm I have good works: Shew me, if thou canst, thy faith without doing good works: thou canst not do it; since faith can only be known by the good works which it produceth: and I will easily shew thee that I have faith, by my good works.

19 Thou believest that there is one God: So far thou dost well: Even the devils believe this, and tremble. But as that faith will not save them, so neither will thy faith save thee, though it be both real, and sound as to its object.

20 Besides, wouldst thou know the truth respecting justification, O hypocrite, that faith without works is dead? is utterly incapable of justifying any one!

21 Was not Abraham our father accounted by God a righteous person for his works, when he had lifted up Isaac his son upon the altar; and God swore, that because he had done it, he would bless him exceedingly, and that in his seed Christ all the nations of the earth should be blessed?

22 In this instance thou seest that his faith only co-operated with one of them habitually, would in the like circumstances of temptation and opportunity, certainly break any other of them; consequently in the eye of God he is guilty of breaking the whole law; that is, he hath no real principle of virtue.—The corrupt Jewish doctrine mentioned in the preceding note, and which is condemned in this passage by the apostle James, it is to be feared many who profess the gospel still entertain.

Ver. 12. So speak, and so do, as those who shall be judged, &c.]—By giving this precept after the declaration ver. 11. the apostle teaches us, that the gospel requires obedience to all the laws of God without exception.

Ver. 13. For judgment without mercy.]—Judgment, which is the primary signification of the word κρίσις, suits this passage better than damnatio, condemnation, which is Beza's translation; not to mention that 'judgment without mercy' is certainly condemnation to sinners.—If they who have shewed no mercy shall be condemned, much more shall they be who have dealt unjustly with others. Perhaps the apostle, in writing this, had our Lord's account of the judgment in his eye, in which he introduces himself as condemning the wicked for neglecting works of charity and mercy. See ver. 15, 16.

Ver. 14. Can this faith save him?]—This question demonstrates, that James is not treating of the justification of the believer in the eyes of men, as some fancy, but of that justification which will issue in his eternal salvation. See ver. 18. note.

Ver. 15. Be naked, that is, ill clothed or wanting some of his clothes;—so the word naked signifies in most languages. See Jewish Antiquities prefixed to my Harmony, page 134.

Ver. 17. If it hath not works, is dead.]—In this passage James teaches, that good wishes, which work no real benefit to our neighbour, and an assent to truth, which produces no obedience to God, are things akin, and of like value.

Ver. 18. Shew me thy faith without thy works.]—Most of the printed editions of the Greek New Testament read here, 'Shew me thy faith by thy works'; which Mill thinks is the true reading, and explains the apostle's reasoning in this manner: "Shew me thy faith by thy works:—It is the only way thou canst shew it; but as thou hast no works to produce, thou never canst shew thy faith: I will prove that I have faith by my works." The reading which our translators have adopted is that of the Alexandrian, and of some other MSS. which read here καὶ ἐκείνῃ, without. The Syriac also, and the Vulgate versions, have 'sine operibus, without works.' Besides, this reading is confirmed by ver. 20. where the phrase καὶ ἐκείνῃ is used.—Because the apostle, in this verse, speaks of one's proving the reality of his faith to others by his works, many have fancied that what is said, ver. 23. 'Was not Abraham our father justified by works?' means no more than that Abraham was proved in the sight of men to have true faith, by the work of offering up Isaac. But if this was the apostle's meaning, what he saith ver. 23. 'And so that scripture was confirmed which saith, Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness,' must mean that Abraham's believing God was proved to men to be righteousness, by the offering up of Isaac. This sense, however, does not accord with the history, in as much as Abraham had not offered up Isaac at the time his faith is said to have been counted to him for righteousness, nor for a long time after. See ver. 23. note 2.—Further, what the apostle saith, ver. 24. 'Ye see, then, that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only,' shews the impropriety of interpreting Abraham's justification by works, of his being justified in the eyes of men. For seeing the apostle's saying implies that a man is justified not only by works but by faith also, if one's being justified by works means his being proved in the eyes of men by his works to have faith, his being justified by faith must in like manner mean, his being proved, in the eyes of men, by his faith to have faith. But a proof of this kind being impossible, unless men could look into each other's hearts, every reader must be sensible of the absurdity of the above interpretation of ver. 23. and that it deserves to be exploded. See ver. 14. note.

Ver. 20. That faith without works is dead.]—The apostle by the term dead, does not mean a faith not real. For as the faith of the devils, mentioned ver. 19. is a real conviction, and is shown to be real by their trembling when they think of God's holiness and power, so a man may have a real conviction of the truth of the gospel, who is not habitually influenced thereby. But, by a dead faith, James means a faith which, because it has no influence on a man's actions, is as incapable to justify him, as a dead carcass is to perform the offices of a living body.

Ver. 21. When he had lifted up Isaac his son upon the altar.]—Though the word ἀνέστηκεν sometimes signifies the offering of a sacrifice, it is here used in its primary sense, of carrying or lifting up: For Isaac was not actually offered. Yet because, by lifting him up and laying him on the altar, Abraham shewed that he was fully determined to slay him, God considered that action, and spake of it, as a real offering of Isaac.

with his works,¹ and (α) by works HIS faith was perfected.²

23 (Kai, 312.) And so that scripture was confirmed¹ which saith, Abraham believed God,² and it was counted to him for righteousness: and he was called the friend of God.³

24 Ye see, therefore, that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only.

25 And in like manner also, was not Rahab the harlot justified¹ by works, having secretly received the messengers, and having sent them away by another road?

26 For as the body without the spirit is dead, so also faith without works is dead.

Ver. 22.—1. Faith co-operated with his works.—As in many passages of scripture, so in this, the word only is wanting, and must be supplied in the following manner, to render the sense complete: 'His faith only co-operated with his works.' For the apostle is reasoning, not to prove that faith is necessary to justification; that was allowed on all hands; but to shew that faith does not justify any man by itself, ver. 17, 24. The meaning therefore is, that Abraham's faith did not by itself justify him, but only co-operated with his works in procuring him the promise of justification, as appears plainly from ver. 24. Yet, because this is one of the passages of scripture whose meaning is much contested, I have not ventured to insert the word only in the translation. See Ess. vi. sect. 2. where this subject is handled at great length.

2. And by works his faith was perfected.—The command to offer Isaac for a burnt-offering, Gen. xxi. 2. appearing directly contrary to the promise, Gen. xxi. 12. 'In Isaac shall thy seed be called,' Abraham's faith was thereby put to the severest trial. Yet it was not staggered by the seeming contrariety of the divine revelations. Abraham reasoned with himself, as St. Paul informs us, Heb. xi. 19. 'that God was able to raise Isaac even from the dead;' and, 'firmly believing that he would actually do so,' he set himself to obey the divine command without the least gain saying. James, therefore, had good reason to say, that Abraham's faith co-operated with his works in procuring him the promises confirmed with an oath; because it was his faith in God which enabled him to perform the difficult works requisite to the offering of Isaac as a burnt-offering. He had equally good reason to say, 'by works his faith was perfected,' or rendered complete; because if, when tried, he had refused to obey, his would not have been a complete faith.

In this passage James hath declared, that faith and works are inseparably connected as cause and effect; that faith as the cause necessarily produces good works as its effect, and that good works must flow from faith as their principle; that neither of them separately are the means of our justification, but that when joined they become effectual for that end. Wherefore, when in scripture we are said to be 'justified by faith,' it is a faith accompanied with good works. On the other hand, when we are said to be 'justified by works,' it is works proceeding from faith.

Ver. 23.—1. And so that scripture was confirmed.—The word επιβεβαιωθη has this sense, Matt. v. 17. 'I came not to dissolve the law and the prophets, (αλλα να τηρω) but to confirm them' as revelations from God.

2. Abraham believed God, &c.—This passage of scripture contains two assertions: 1. That Abraham believed God; 2. That his believing God was counted to him for righteousness. By the offering of Isaac that scripture was confirmed, or proved to be true in both its parts. For, 1. By offering Isaac, in the firm expectation that God would raise him from the dead, and fulfil in him the promise of the numerous seed, Abraham shewed that he believed God in the firmest manner: 2. By offering Isaac, Abraham had the promise, that God would count his faith to him for righteousness at the judgment, renewed and confirmed in a solemn manner with an oath.—Now it deserves notice, that the confirmation of the scripture by the offering of Isaac, mentioned in this passage, did not happen till many years after it was said that Abraham's faith was counted for righteousness: for this shews, that to men's justification, not one act, but a continued course of faith and obedience, is necessary. See Rom. iv. 3. note 1. and James ii. 18. last part of the note.

3. And he was called the friend of God.—This honourable title is well illustrated by Malmonides, Jeshub, c. 10. "He who worships God from love meditates on his law and precepts, and walketh in the path of his will, not from any worldly consideration, nor from his works in procuring him the blessing of justification; and that by his works relating to the offering of Isaac, his faith was rendered complete.

23 And so, by the offering of Isaac, that scripture was shewed to be true in both its parts, which saith, Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness: and, as a person in high favour with God, he was called by God himself, Isa. xli. 8. the friend of God.

24 Wherefore, from Moses ascribing the justification of Abraham to the work of offering up Isaac, ye see that by works proceeding from faith a man is justified, and not by faith without works.

25 And in like manner also was not Rahab the harlot justified by works proceeding from faith in the true God, (Josh. ii. 3–11), having secretly received and concealed the spies, and having sent them away by a different road from that which she knew their pursuers would take.

26 In no way but by faith accompanied with works can any one be justified. For as the body without the soul, though a real body, is a dead carcass, incapable either of action or enjoyment; so also faith without works, though a real assent of the understanding, is dead—hath no power to procure justification.

fear of evil, nor the hope of procuring good to himself, but doth the truth because it is the truth, and that at length he may obtain the greatest felicity. This is the highest degree of excellence, and which every good man does not arrive at. But it is the degree which our father Abraham attained to, whom the blessed God called his friend, because he served him purely out of love."

Ver. 25. In like manner also, was not Rahab the harlot justified by works, &c.—The apostle Paul hath made honourable mention of Rahab, Heb. xi. 31. 'By faith Rahab the harlot was not destroyed with the unbelievers, having received the spies in peace.' Rahab's faith, as was observed, Rom. vi. sect. 3. paragr. 5. consisted in her attending to and reasoning justly on what she had heard concerning the dividing of the waters of the Red Sea for a passage to the Israelites, and concerning the destruction of Sihon and Og. For from these things she concluded, that the God of the Israelites was the true God, and sole governor of the universe. And firmly believing this, she renounced her former false gods, and concealed the Israelitish spies at the hazard of her life. In this she shewed a goodness of disposition of the same kind with that which Abraham shewed when he left his country and kindred at God's command. And as Abraham, for that great act of faith, and obedience, was rewarded with the promise of Canaan, so Rahab, as the reward of her faith and works, was not destroyed with the unbelieving inhabitants of Jericho. This is St. Paul's account of Rahab; to which we may add what is mentioned Josh. vi. 25. that she 'obtained a dwelling in Israel' being received among the Israelites as a proselyte to their religion.—But James hath carried the matter farther; for he tells us that Rahab was justified by the work of concealing the spies, in the same manner and in the same sense that Abraham was justified by the work of lifting up Isaac on the altar; that is, she was accounted by God a righteous person, and became an heir of salvation. It is true Rahab, in concealing the spies, told a lie to the person who pursued them. Nevertheless, her faith in the God of Israel was not lessened by that single sin, which properly was a sin of ignorance, committed agreeably to the false morality of the heathens among whom she had been educated, and is nowhere in scripture commended. Besides, of that sin, as well as of her former loose life, she no doubt repented, when she attained more just notions of her duty. For, after she lived among the Israelites, she seems to have been remarkable for her piety and virtue, inasmuch that Salmon, a Jewish great man, married her, and by her had Boaz, the great grandfather of David, from whom our Lord descended.—Some commentators, in vindication of Rahab's character, tell us that the Hebrew word answering to εμενη, an harlot, sometimes signifies an innkeeper or host. But there is no occasion, in Rahab's case, to depart from the common meaning of the word; because the worthiness of a person's character, whatever it may be in the estimation of men, doth not in the sight of God depend on what one hath been formerly, but on what he is at present, and continues to be to the end of his life. Rahab, for concealing the spies and deceiving their pursuers by a lie, hath been represented by the enemies of revelation as a traitor to her country, and an immoral person, who was unworthy of the praise bestowed on her by the apostles Paul and James. But it should be considered, that after she believed the God of Israel to be the true God, and was certain that he would destroy Jericho, the concealing of the spies, instead of being a blamable action, was a duty she owed to the worshippers of the true God, and was the only means by which she could preserve her own life, and the life of her parents and kindred. Wherefore, the commendation bestowed by the apostles on Rahab is well founded; and she is said with truth to have been justified by the work of concealing the spies.

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

From the writings of Paul, but especially from his epistle to the Romans, we learn that the Jews valued themselves highly on the knowledge of the true God, and of his will, which they derived from the divine revelations of which they were the keepers, and set themselves up everywhere as teachers of the Gentiles. Animated by the same spirit, many of the Jews who had embraced the gospel, were exceedingly desirous of the office of teachers in the Christian church. But the apostle James, well knowing that some of them still believed the observance of the law of Moses necessary to salvation; that others had not shaken off the prejudices of their education; and that not a few still followed the bad practices to which they had been accustomed in their unconverted state, earnestly dissuaded them from becoming teachers, by representing to them the punishment to which they exposed themselves, if they either perverted the doctrines, or concealed the precepts, of the gospel, ver. 1.—Next he insinuated, that their ancient prejudices might lead them, as teachers, to offend in many things; but, at the same time, to make them attentive to their own conduct, he told them, that if they did not offend in word, by teaching false doctrine and by uttering bitter speeches against those who differed from them in religious matters, it would be a proof of their having attained a great degree of virtue, ver. 2.—Then, to make them sensible how dangerous it was to sin with the tongue, he shewed them, by the power which bits in the mouth of horses, and helms in ships, have to turn these great bodies whithersoever their governor pleases, that the tongue, though a little member, is capable of producing prodigious effects, either good or bad, according as it is used, ver. 3, 4, 5.—And gave as an example, the mischief which the intemperate use of speech often produceth in society, ver. 6.—adding, that though human ingenuity had been able to subdue all kinds of wild beasts, birds and sea-monsters, the tongue is so unruly a thing that no one hath been able to subdue the tongue of others, ver. 7, 8. And to shew the unruliness of the tongue, the apostle mentioned, that with it we bless God, but with it also we curse men made in the image of God, ver. 9.—Moreover, the absurdity of employing the tongue for such contradictory purposes, he displayed by remarking, that no such contradictions were to be found in any part of the natural system, ver. 10–12.

To his description of the mischiefs occasioned in society by an unbridled tongue, James subjoined an earnest exhortation to such of the Jews as pretended to be wise and intelligent, to make good their pretensions by shewing their works all done with the meekness of wisdom. In this exhortation, he seems to have had those of them especially in his eye who set themselves up as teachers; and the rather, because they all valued themselves on their wisdom and knowledge, Rom. ii. 10–20. So that, by calling them wise and intelligent, he prudently used an argument which he hoped would draw their attention, ver. 13.—On the other hand, he told them, that if they taught either the law or the gospel with bitter anger and strife, after the example of some of their bigoted brethren, they lied against the truth; because such a conduct was a contradiction to the religion which they pretended to teach, ver. 14.—and was no part of the wisdom which cometh from above, to which they laid claim; but was earthly, animal, and demoniacal, ver. 15.—Besides, bitter anger and strife never fail to produce tumult and every evil work, ver. 16.—Then he recommended to them the wisdom which is from above, by displaying its many amiable qualities, ver. 17.—together with its efficacy in producing in those whom they instructed the good fruit of true faith, by means of a peaceable behaviour towards them.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. III.—1 Do not become many of you teachers, my brethren, knowing that we¹ shall receive the greater (αἰμα) punishment.

2 For in many things we all stumble.¹ If any one stumble not in word,² he is a perfect man,³ able to rule even the whole body.⁴

3 Behold, into the mouths of horses we put bits, to make them obedient to us, and we turn about their whole body.

Ver. 1.—1. Do not become many of you teachers.]—The great desire which the Jews, to whom this letter was written, had to become teachers in the church after their conversion, and to inculcate the obligation of the law of Moses, is remarked 1 Tim. i. 7. Θελοῦντες ἑαυτοὺς διδάσκαλοι, 'desiring to be teachers of the law.' These teachers of the law in the Christian church, were the great corrupters of the gospel.

2. We shall receive.]—He joins himself with the persons to whom he wrote, to mitigate the harshness of his reproof.

Ver. 2.—1. We all stumble.]—Πέσσομεν. This is a metaphor taken from persons who, in walking on slippery or rough ground, slide or stumble, without falling; as is plain from Rom. xl. 11. Μεταπορεύονται περὶ, 'Have they stumbled so as to fall?'—Wherefore, as in scripture walking denotes the course of a man's conduct, stumbling, in this passage, signifies those lesser failings in duty to which common Christians are liable. For it was in that character, and not in the character of an inspired apostle, that James, to mitigate the harshness of his reproof, ranked himself among the persons to whom he wrote.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. III.—1 Do not become many of you teachers, my brethren. That office requires a knowledge which few possess, unless they are inspired. And if we err, we shall receive the greater punishment on account of our being teachers.

2 For in many things, through natural infirmity and strong temptation, we are all liable to fall. But as our faults are often in speech, if any one so governs his tongue that he sinneth not in word, he is a man of great virtue, able to rule even the whole body of his passions.

3 Think not the tongue a weak member because it is small; Behold, into the mouths of horses we put bits, to make them obedient to us; and though these bits are small, with them we turn about their whole body.

2. If any one stumble not in word, he is, &c.]—The apostle's meaning, according to Grotius, is, 'If any one does not teach false doctrine, he is able to rule the church,' called in other passages the body. But, as the apostle is speaking of the vices of the tongue in general, which he had reprov'd chap. i. 26. I am of opinion, that by 'stumbling in word,' he means those sinful railing speeches which the Judaizing teachers uttered against their opponents, as well as the uttering of erroneous doctrine and precepts.

3. He is a perfect man.]—Not perfect in an absolute sense; for in that sense no one can be perfect. But he is a man of great virtue; a man perfect in comparison of others. For it is reasonable to believe, that one who is strictly conscientious in his words, will be proportionably careful of his actions.

4. Able to rule even the whole body.]—The word καλῶς ἐμαρτυρεῖ properly signifies to hold in and turn about a fiery high-mettled horse by means of a strong bridle. Here it is applied metaphorically, to denote the restraining of our passions by means of a firm resolution. That the body in this passage signifies the passions and appetites of the body, and not the church, I think is evident from ver. 6.

4 Behold also the ships, which, though they be so great, and are driven by hard winds, are turned about by a very small helm whithersoever the force of the director willeth.¹

5 So also the tongue is a little member, (xai, 211.) yet it worketh mightily.¹ Behold how much wood? a little fire kindleth!

6 (And the tongue is a fire, a world¹ of iniquity,) even so the tongue is placed among our members, that which spotteth the whole body,² and setteth on fire the natural frame,³ and is set on fire from hell.⁴

7 (Tag) Now every nature of wild beasts,¹ and of birds, and of serpents, and of sea-monsters, is subdued, and hath been subdued by the human nature:

8 But the tongue of men no one can subdue.¹ It is an unruly evil thing, full of deadly poison.

9 (Ev) With it we bless God, even the Father, and with it we curse men,¹ who were made after the likeness of God.

10 Out of the same mouth¹ goeth forth a blessing and a curse. My brethren, these things ought not so to be.

11 Dooth a fountain send forth from the same hole sweet water and bitter?

12 Can a fig-tree, my brethren, produce olives? or a vine figs? so no fountain can yield salt and sweet water.¹

Ver. 4. The force of the director willeth.]—This is the literal translation of ὁ δὲν ἰσχυροῦς, βουλῆται: For ἰσχυρὸς is he who directs the helm; and βουλῆται signifies the force which he exerts in turning it from side to side; and βουλῆται, which expresses the will of the director, is poetically ascribed to the force which he exerts in steering.

Ver. 5.—1. It worketh mightily.]—The word μυαλονυχίᾳ is compounded of two words which signify a great neck; consequently it contains an allusion to a horse, who in walking proudly raises his neck: and as he does the same when he exerts his force, the word is very properly translated, 'worketh mightily.' The meaning is, that the tongue, though a small member, hath great power in governing the body; that is, our affections and actions.—Occumenius explains μυαλονυχίᾳ, thus—Μυαλὸν ἰσχυρὸν, καὶ καὶ καὶ καὶ, It works great good and evil.

2. How much wood?—The Greek word ὕλη denotes a mass or heap of any kind of matter, but especially of wood. The Latins used materia in the same sense.—Curtius, l. 6. c. 6. "Multa materia cedentis miles: The soldiers had cut down much wood."

Ver. 6.—1. And the tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity.]—This is a metaphor of the same kind with a sea of troubles, a deluge of wickedness. The Syriac translation of this clause is, 'Et mundus peccati veluti riuus.'—And the wicked world is as the wood; which, in Whitby's opinion, maketh both the sense and the similitude clear. But it changes the similitude, by making the wicked world the fuel; whereas the apostle represents the body as the fuel. And therefore commentators think this clause was originally a marginal note, which afterwards was inserted in the text by some ignorant transcriber.—'A world of iniquity;' that is, a great collection of iniquity. This the apostle says the tongue is, because there is no iniquity which an unbridled tongue is not capable of producing; either by itself, when it curses, rails, teaches false doctrine, and speaks evil of God and man; or by means of others, whom it entices, commands, terrifies, and persuades, to commit murders, adulteries, and every evil work.

2. That which spotteth the whole body.]—In this and in what follows, the similitude of the fire and wood is carried on. For as the fire put among the wood, first spotteth or blackeneth it with its smoke, and then setteth it on fire, so the tongue spotteth and blackeneth the whole body, then setteth on fire the natural frame.

3. And setteth on fire the natural (wheel or) frame.]—So τὸν τροχὸν τῆς ψυχῆς signifies. For τροχὸς τῆς ψυχῆς, chap. i. 22, is the natural face.—The wonderful mechanism of the human body, and its power of affecting, and of being affected by the soul, is in this passage aptly represented by the wheels of a machine which act on each other.—The pernicious influence of the tongue, in first spotting and then destroying both the bodies and the souls of men, arises from the language which it frames, whereby it inflames men's passions to such a degree, that being no longer under the direction of their reason, they push them on to such actions as are destructive both of their body and soul.—Bos, Elmer, Alberti,

4 Behold also the ships, which, though they be so great in bulk, and are driven by stormy winds, are turned about by a very small helm, and made to sail whithersoever the force of the pilot who steers the helm willeth them to sail.

5 So also the tongue is but a little member, yet it worketh mightily upon those to whom it speaks. Also, to shew by another comparison the operation of the tongue, Behold how great a mass of wood a little fire kindleth!

6 (I say this, because the tongue ungoverned is a fire, and contains a great collection of iniquity.) Even so the tongue is placed among our members, that which defileth with its speech the whole body; as fire by its smoke spotteth the wood among which it is put, and as fire kindleth the wood, the tongue setteth on fire the frame of our nature, being itself set on fire from hell.

7 Now it is remarkable, that every nature of wild beasts, and of birds, and of serpents, and of sea-monsters, is capable of being subdued, and hath actually been subdued by the human ingenuity:

8 But the tongue of other men no one is able to subdue. It is an unruly evil thing, full of deadly poison: It oftentimes occasions death to those on whom it is let loose. Psal. cxl. 3.

9 Besides, it is applied to the most contradictory purposes; With it we bless God, even the Father of the universe, and with it we curse men, who in their intellectual part were made after the likeness of God, whom we bless.

10 Out of the same mouth goeth forth a blessing and a curse. My brethren, these things ought not so to be: for if we love and bless God, we will love and bless men also, seeing they were made after his image.

11 No such inconsistency is found, in the natural world. Dooth any fountain send forth from the same opening fresh water and salt?

12 Can a fig-tree, my brethren, produce olives? or a vine figs? In like manner, no fountain can produce salt and fresh water. It is equally unnatural for the same mouth to send forth praises to God and cursings to men.

and others, by 'the natural wheel,' understand the successive generations of men; one generation going, and another coming, without intermission: So that the apostle's meaning is, the tongue hath a t on fire our forefathers, it inflameth us, and will have the same influence on those who come after us.—Benson, supposing that γένος; here answereth to the Hebrew toloth, understands by 'the wheel of generation' the course of a man's life.—The apostle's sentiment is true in all these senses.

4. And is set on fire from hell.]—Hell, the place prepared for the devil, is by a metonymy put for the devil himself; as by a like metonymy heaven is put for God. But the apostle represents the tongue as set on fire from hell, rather than from the devil, because he is speaking of fire and burning, whose origin he elegantly deduces from hell flames.—The use we ought to make of the doctrine taught in this highly figurative passage, is obvious.—Being surrounded with such a mass of combustible matter, we should take great care not to send from our tongues the least spark by which it may be kindled, lest we ourselves, with those whom we set on fire, be consumed in the flames which we raise.

Ver. 7. Every nature of wild beasts, &c.]—In translating this verse I have followed Beza. The phrase παντὸς φύσεως, 'every nature of wild beasts,' &c. means, the strength and fierceness of wild beasts, the swiftness of birds, the poison of serpents, the exceeding great force of sea-monsters. These have all been overcome by the art and ingenuity of man, so that they have been made subservient to his use and pleasure.

Ver. 8. But the tongue of men no one can subdue.]—This translation arises from the right construction of the original, in the following manner: Τὰν δὲ γλῶσσαν ἀνθρώπου, οὐδὲν δύναται δαμάσκειν. Besides, it gives a more just sense than the common translation, which represents the apostle as saying, that no one can subdue his own tongue. The tongue of other men no one can subdue; but certainly a man can subdue his own tongue. Occumenius read this clause interrogatively, 'And can no man subdue the tongue? It is an unruly evil.'

Ver. 9. With it we curse men.]—Perhaps the apostle in this glanced at the unconverted Jews, who, as Justin Martyr informs us, in his dialogue with Trypho the Jew, often cursed the Christians bitterly in their synagogues.

Ver. 10. Same mouth.]—If James here had the ministers of religion in his eye, whose office it was to praise God in name of the people, his reproof would be the more severe.

Ver. 12. So no fountain can produce salt and sweet water.]—Because this is supposed to be a repetition of what is contained in ver. 11. Lucas Brugensis, Estius, Grotius, and others, prefer the reading of the Alexandrian and other MSS. namely, οὐδὲν οὐδὲ ἀλμυρὸν γλυκὺ ποιεῖται ὕδωρ: 'So neither can salt water produce sweet.'—The Syriac hath here, 'Similiter neque aqua salis possunt fieri dulces.—Salt water cannot be made sweet.' The Vulgate, 'Sic neque salum dulcem potest facere aquam.' So neither can salt water make fresh water.' But the comparisons are different; bitter water being 13 *Is any one wise and intelligent among you? Let him shew, by a good conversation, his works with meekness of wisdom.*¹

14 But if ye have bitter anger¹ and strife in your hearts, do not boast and lie against the truth.

15 This is not the wisdom which cometh from above, (chap. i. 17.), but is earthly,¹ animal, AND demoniacal.

16 For where anger and strife,¹ there tumult,² and every evil work.

17 But the wisdom from above is first indeed (αἴνη) pure,¹ then peaceable, gentle, (see Philip. iv. 5. note 1.), easy to be persuaded, full of compassion and good fruits, without partiality,² and without hypocrisy.

18 (Δα. 104.) Besides, the fruit of righteousness¹ (σ) with peace, is sown by them who practise² peace.

different in kind from that which is salt. Estius observes, that the apostle's design was to confirm his doctrine by four similitudes; the first taken from fountains, the second and third from fruit trees, and the fourth from the sea, which, being in its nature salt, does not produce fresh water. He therefore approves of the reading of the Alexandrian MS. but Mill prefers the common reading.

Ver. 13. Meekness of wisdom.]—This beautiful expression intimates, that true wisdom is always accompanied with meekness, or the government of the passions. 'The meekness of wisdom,' and 'the beauty of holiness,' are expressions of the same kind, formed to represent the excellency of these qualities.

Ver. 14. If ye have bitter anger.]—Ζῆλον πικρὸν. See 2 Cor. xi. 2. note 1.—There is a virtuous anger, namely when it is exercised for a just reason, and does not exceed in degree and duration. Hence the precept, Eph. iv. 26. 'Be angry and sin not,' &c.

Ver. 15. But is earthly.]—The apostle having described that bitter bigoted spirit of which the Jewish teachers boasted, condemns it in this verse, by declaring that it is no part of the wisdom which cometh from God; but is earthly, mere worldly policy; animal, its end is to procure the gratification of the animal passions; and demoniacal, it is the wisdom practised by evil spirits, and which they infuse into their votaries.

Ver. 16.—1. For where anger and strife.]—St. Paul speaks of ἐρις καὶ μάχη νομίζεσθαι, 'strifes and fightings about the law,' Tit. iii. 9. The Jews everywhere enforced the obligation of the law of Moses with a fury that bordered on madness, and which led them to commit the greatest crimes, as is evident from the things mentioned in the following chapter.

2. There tumult.]—Ἀναταραχὴς. Paul uses this word in the plural for seditions, 2 Cor. vi. 5. a sense which suits this place well. For about this time the Jews, from their intemperate zeal for the 13 Though ye cannot subdue other men's tongues, ye may bridle your own. I therefore say, Is any teacher among you wise and intelligent? Let him shew, by a good conversation, his words and actions as a teacher performed with the meekness of wisdom.

14 But if ye have bitter anger and strife in your hearts against your opponents, and express these bad dispositions by speech, do not boast of these things as wisdom, and give the lie to true religion, which forbids them.

15 This outrageous method of spreading religion is not the wisdom which cometh from God, but is earthly policy suggested by your animal passions, and belongeth to demons, who inspire you with it.

16 For where there is bitter anger on account of opinions, and strife in maintaining them, there tumult and every evil work subsist.

17 But the wisdom from God, which ought to guide the teachers of religion, is first indeed unmixed with error and passion; then peaceable, leading men to maintain peace: it renders men gentle towards others; and easy to be persuaded to forgiveness: it is full of compassion towards the afflicted, and of the good fruits of charitable actions; without partiality in judgment, and without hypocrisy.

law of Moses, raised seditions in Judea and elsewhere, which were the occasion of many crimes and of much bloodshed.

Ver. 17.—1. But the wisdom from above is first indeed pure, &c.]—See chap. i. 5. note, for the meaning of wisdom.—In this beautiful passage, James describes the excellent nature of that temper which is recommended by the Christian religion, and the happy effects which it produces. It is the highest wisdom; it cometh from God; and makes those who receive it first pure, then peaceable, &c. All the apostles except Paul were illiterate men; but, according to their Master's promise, they had by the inspiration of the Spirit a wisdom and eloquence given them, far exceeding what they could have acquired by the deepest erudition. Of the fulfilment of Christ's promise the epistle of James is a striking proof. Search all heathen antiquity, and see whether it can produce any sentiments more noble, or more simply and beautifully expressed, than those contained in this chapter, and indeed throughout the whole of this epistle.

2. Without partiality:]—Ἀνεμερίας, literally, without making a difference. This character of true religion was very properly mentioned to persons whom the apostle had rebuked for their partiality in judging causes.

Ver. 18.—1. The fruit of righteousness.]—If I mistake not, righteousness here signifies not only that uprightness of conduct which is produced by a true faith, but faith itself, which, when accompanied with good works, is counted to the believer for righteousness, and produces the greatest happiness to him; or, righteousness may signify truth, or true doctrine. In the whole of this chapter, the apostle gave the Jews directions how most effectually as teachers they might promote the faith and practice of their religion among the heathens.

2. Who practise, or work:]—So ποιεῖν signifies 1 John ii. 22. iii. 8. Properly, the word denotes the doing of things which require time and perseverance to accomplish them.

CHAPTER IV.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

THE crimes condemned in this and the following chapter were so atrocious, and of so public a nature, that we can hardly suppose them to have been committed by any who bore the name of Christians. Wherefore, as this letter was directed to the whole Jewish nation, it is reasonable to suppose, that the apostle, in writing these chapters, had the unbelieving Jews, not only in the provinces, but in Judea, chiefly in his eye; who, it is well known, were now become desperately wicked.

Some time before the breaking out of the war with the Romans, which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem and of the Jewish commonwealth, the Jews, as Josephus informs us, (Bell. l. ii. c. 17. 19. 21. Geneva edit. 1633), on pretence of defending their religion, and of procuring for themselves that freedom from foreign dominion, and that liberty which they thought themselves entitled to as the people of God, made various insurrections in Judea against the Romans, which occasioned much bloodshed and misery to their nation. The factions likewise into which the more zealous Jews were now split, had violent contentions among themselves, in which they killed one another, and plundered one another's goods. In the provinces likewise the Jews were become very turbulent; particularly in Alexandria, Egypt, Syria, and many other places, where they made war against the heathens, and killed numbers of them, and were themselves massacred by them in their turn. To these attempts against the heathens the more zealous Jews were led by this false opinion, that the precepts of their law, which required them to extirpate the Canaanites, obliged them to kill idolaters, and destroy idolatry everywhere. Accordingly it is certain, that in the period we are speaking of, the zealots in the provinces, aided by their brethren, neglected no opportunity of attacking the heathens, when they thought they could do it with success.

This being the state of the Jews in Judea, and in the provinces, about the time the apostle James wrote his epistle to the twelve tribes, it can hardly be doubted, that the wars, and fightings, and murders, of which he speaks in the beginning of chap. iv. were those above described. For, as the apostle composed his letter in the year 62, after the confusions were begun; and as the crimes committed in these confusions, although acted under the colour of zeal for God and for truth, were a scandal to any religion, it certainly became him, who was one of the chief apostles of the circumcision, to condemn such insurrections, and to rebuke, with the greatest sharpness, the Jews who were the prime movers in them. Accordingly this is what James hath done. For, after recommending the practice of peace to the teachers of religion, he began this chapter with asking the Jews, whence the wars and fightings that were among them came? And by adding, 'Come they not from your lusts which war in your members?' he insinuated, that although they pretended in these things to be guided by zeal for the glory of God, and for the salvation of the heathen, the true spring of the whole was their own lusts. Their love of power and wealth made them anxious to have many proselytes, by whose influence they hoped to have some share in the government of the cities where they lived, or at least to enjoy some lucrative public offices. They even endeavoured to terrify the heathens, by their wars and massacres, into a compliance with their desires, ver. 1.—Next he told them, they never could succeed in converting the heathens, and destroying idolatry, because they did not use the methods proper for these ends. They neither prayed to God for assistance and success, nor exercised meekness towards those whom they wished to convert, ver. 2.—Besides, they acted from wicked motives. They wished to make proselytes, merely that they might draw money from them to spend on their lusts, ver. 3.—Nay, they followed the heathens in their corrupt manners, that, gaining their friendship, they might with the more ease persuade them to embrace Judaism, ver. 4.—In all these things they were condemned by their own scriptures, and also by the practice of the apostles of Christ, who propagated true religion mildly, and without rage, ver. 5, 6.—He therefore exhorted them to subject themselves to God, and to resist the devil, by whom they were excited to follow the turbulent courses he had condemned; and assured them that if they resisted the devil, he would flee from them, ver. 7.—Then counselled them to worship God, not by rites and ceremonies, but with their spirit; assuring them, if they did so, that God would accept and bless them. In this the apostle tacitly reproved the unbelieving Jews for the zeal they shewed in persuading the heathens to embrace the rites of Moses, while they were at no pains in persuading them to lead holy lives. Farther, the zealots he ordered to cleanse their hands from blood and rapine, and to purify their hearts from evil passions, before they presumed to worship God, ver. 8.—Withal, to rouse the whole of them, if possible, to repentance, he foretold the dreadful miseries which were coming upon them; and called on them to mourn bitterly for their sins, ver. 9, 10.—By this severe rebuke and threatening, in which the apostle used great authority and plainness, he intended not only to bring the unconverted Jews to a right sense of things, but also to prevent the believing part of the nation from joining them in the riots and insurrections which they raised on pretence of religion. Then, addressing both sorts, he forbade them to speak evil of one another on account of their differences in religion, because it was an usurpation of God's prerogative, as Lord of the conscience, and only Judge of men, ver. 11, 12.

Lastly, because many of the unconverted Jews who followed commerce, in laying their schemes, neither took into their view the brevity and uncertainty of human life, nor the supremacy of God in directing all events, but spake and acted as if all things had depended on their own pleasure, the apostle rebuked them for their irreligious temper and vain speeches, and directed them in what manner to express themselves concerning their schemes respecting futurity, ver. 13–17.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. IV.—1 Whence the wars and fightings which ye carry on among yourselves, and against the heathens? Come they not hence, even from your lusts, your pride, covetousness, sensuality, and ambition, which war in your members against your reason and conscience!

2 Ye strongly desire to make proselytes, and have not what ye desire. Ye kill the heathens, being zealous to destroy idolatry, and cannot obtain your purpose. Ye fight and war to force the heathens to embrace Judaism, but have not any success, because ye ask not God's direction.

3 And even when ye ask success, ye do not receive it, because ye ask success in making proselytes wickedly; having no view therein

Ver. 1.—1. Whence wars, &c.—Here, and in the following chapter, James uses the rhetorical figure called apostrophe, addressing the Jews as if they were present, whereby he hath given his discourse great strength and vivacity. What these wars were, see in the Illustration.

2. Even from your lusts.—ἡσυχία. Literally, your pleasures; pleasure, the effect, being put for cause, the cause.

3. Lusts which war in your members.—This, as Bengelius remarks, is the true origin of most of the wars which kings carry on against kings, and nations against nations. Their ambition to extend their territories, their love of grandeur and riches, their resentments of supposed injuries, all the effect of lust, engage them in wars.

Ver. 2.—1. Ye strongly desire.—For this sense of ἐπιθυμία see Rom. vii. 7. note. According to Whitby, the strong desire which the Jews indulged was that of throwing off the yoke of the heathens, and of recovering their liberty. But as the apostle says, they did not obtain what they strongly desired, because they did not ask it of God, I rather think what they strongly desired was, to make proselytes to the Jewish religion, as a prelude to the Messiah's kingdom, where they expected to pass their lives in the enjoyment of every kind of sensual pleasure.

2. Ye kill, and are zealous.—The Jews, in the reign of the Emperor Claudius, being greatly enraged against their brethren who had become Christians, raised such tumults in Rome, that Claudius found it necessary for the peace of the city to banish them all. See Pref. to Romans, sect. 3. Yet I do not think the apostle had these confusions in his eye here. The murders of which he speaks seem to have been those committed by the zealots, whose rage often carried them to murder the heathens, and even those of their own nation who opposed them. Accordingly, to shew who the persons were to whom he spake, the apostle adds, καὶ ζηλοῦντες, 'and are zealous.'

3. Ye fight and war.—According to Bengelius, ye kill and are zealous, is the action of individuals against individuals; but this, ye fight and war, is the action of many against many.

4. But ye have not, because ye ask not.—Since the persons to whom the apostle is speaking failed of their purpose because they did not pray to God, it shews that some of their purposes at least were laudable, and might have been accomplished with the blessing of God. Now this will not apply to the Judaizing teachers in the church, who strongly desired to subject the converted Gentiles to the law of Moses. As little will it apply to those who coveted riches. The apostle's declaration agrees only to such of the unconverted Jews as endeavoured to bring the heathens to the knowledge and worship of the true God. So far their attempt was commendable, because, by converting the Gentiles to Judaism, they prepared them for receiving the gospel; and if for this they had asked the assistance and blessing of God sincerely, they might have been successful in their purpose.

4 Ye adulterers and adulteresses,¹ know ye not that the friendship of the world is enmity AGAINST God? Whosoever, therefore, will be a friend of the world (καταστὰς, 57.) is the enemy of God.

5 Do ye think that the scripture (συνεως) speaketh falsely? AND doth the Spirit² who dwelleth in us (ἐν ἡμῖν) strongly incline to rage?³

6 No. But he giveth greater grace. (Δα, 122. 2.) For he saith,¹ God resisteth the proud, but giveth (χαρῶν) grace to the humble.

7 Therefore be ye subject to God. Resist the devil,¹ and he will flee from you. (See 1 Pet. v. 9. Eph. vi. 11.)

8 Draw nigh to God,¹ and he will draw nigh to you. Cleanse your hands,² ye sinners, and purify your hearts, ye men of two souls. (See chap. i. 8. note 1.)

9 Be exceedingly afflicted, and mourn, and weep: And let your laughter be turned into mourning, and your joy into sadness.¹

Ver. 3. Ye do not receive, because ye ask wickedly, that ye may spend upon your lusts.—Some commentators understand this of the Jews praying for the goods of this life, which they did not receive, because their design in asking them was to spend them in the gratification of their lusts. But though such a prayer had been allowable, the apostle scarcely would have spoken of it here, as it had no connexion with his subject. His meaning in my opinion is, that they prayed for success in converting the heathen, not from any regard to the glory of God and the salvation of the heathen, but from a desire to draw money from them, when converted, to spend on their own lusts.

Ver. 4. Ye adulterers and adulteresses.—Because God himself represented his relation to the Jews, as his people, under the idea of a marriage, and because the prophets, in conformity to that idea, represented the idolatry of the Jews as adultery, it is supposed by some, that James called those Jews who acted inconsistently with their religion adulterers and adulteresses in a spiritual sense: but others more properly understand these appellations literally, because idolatry was a sin from which the Jews had long been entirely free; but to adultery, and the other sins of the flesh, they were exceedingly addicted. See Rom. ii. 1. note 1. and James v. 8. note 2. The Syriac and Vulgate versions want the word adulteresses; and Estius thinks it was added to the text by some injudicious translator, because James nowhere else in this epistle addresses the females. Mill likewise thinks the word should be omitted; Proleg. No. 498.

Ver. 5.—1. Do ye think the scripture speaketh (συνεως) falsely?—The apostle means, speaketh falsely when it declareth, that the friendship of the wicked, which is purchased by following them in their evil courses, is enmity against God; and when it denounces the wrath of God against such friendships. Here James had in his eye those passages of the Jewish scriptures, where the things mentioned are declared sinful and denounced as deadly, either directly or by implication, particularly Psal. v. 5. 6. vii. 11. ix. 17. Isa. xlii. 11. If the reader thinks the questions in this verse were addressed to the converted Jews, the apostle may have had in his eye Paul's declaration to the Romans, chap. vii. 7. 'The minding of the flesh is enmity against God.' And by calling these words scripture, he hath, like Peter, 2 Ep. iii. 16. testified that Paul wrote his epistles by inspiration. That the Greek word συνεως signifies falsely, see 1 Thess. ii. 1. note.

2. And doth the Spirit?—I have followed Glasius and Whitby in supplying the word and at the beginning of this clause, to shew that the apostle puts two separate questions to the Jews. For, if the whole is considered as one question, it will imply, as Whitby observes, that the scripture saith what is contained in the latter clause; which I do not find it hath anywhere done. Beza, however, supposing that the scripture is represented as saying these words, thinks the apostle alludes to Gen. viii. 21. 'The imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth.' But that text does not appear to have any relation to the clause in question. This passage of the epistle being very difficult, I am not certain that I have attained its true meaning.

3. The Spirit who dwelleth in us.—The apostle proposed to the Jews the mild method of spreading the gospel, which he and his brethren, by the direction of the Spirit of God, followed, as an example to be imitated by the Jews in spreading their religion among the heathens.

4. Strongly incline to rage?—I have translated the Greek word ἐκσινεω, in this clause, by the English word rage, because the word but to draw money from them, that ye may spend it upon your lusts.

4 Ye adulterers and adulteresses, know ye not that the friendship of the wicked, gained by partaking with them in their vices, is enmity against God. Whosoever, therefore, will be a friend of the wicked by following them in their vices, is the enemy of God, though he does it on the specious pretence of converting them to Judaism.

5 Do ye follow these ways because ye think that the scripture speaketh falsely in its denunciations of punishment against the enemies of God? And doth the Spirit of God who dwelleth in us apostles strongly dispose us to exercise rage against those who oppose the truth?

6 No. But the Spirit giveth the knowledge of a more gracious method of dealing with unbelievers. For he saith in the scripture, God resisteth the proud by making their schemes abortive, but giveth grace to the humble; he giveth them gracious assistance.

7 Therefore, be ye subject to God, while ye endeavour to make him known to the heathen: And resist the devil, who by filling you with pride and rage, spurs you on to spread your religion by wars, and he will flee from you.

8 Worship God, deeply impressed with a sense of his holiness and justice; and he will bless and assist you. Cleanse your hands, ye sinners, from blood and rapine, before you worship him; and purify your hearts, ye men of two souls, from those evil passions which make you act so inconsistently.

9 Be exceedingly afflicted for your crimes, and mourn, and weep on account of them; and let your foolish mirth, arising from sensual gratifications, be turned into mourning, and your carnal joy into sadness. (See Joel, chap. ii. 12, 13.)

which answers to it in the Hebrew hath that signification, Job v. 2. Esak. xxv. 11.; and because there are other Greek words used by the penmen of the New Testament, in the sense of the corresponding Hebrew words. Elmer likewise is of opinion, that ἐκσινεω here signifies anger; for he hath translated the passage thus, 'Do ye think the scripture saith in vain, The Spirit that dwelleth in us is ready to be angry?' But as the scripture does not anywhere say this, it is more proper to separate the verse into two questions, as I have done. If rage is thought an unusual sense of the word ἐκσινεω, it may be translated malice; a sense which it has Matt. xxvii. 18. Mark xv. 10. See Parkhurst's Dictionary.

Ver. 6. For he saith, &c.—The Spirit saith this, Prov. iii. 34. 'Surely he scorneth the scornful, but he giveth grace to the lowly.' The apostle's quotation of this passage, though somewhat different in the words, is the same in the sense with the original. For scornful, in scripture, are proud insolent wicked men; and to resist such persons, by rendering their schemes abortive, and by bumping them, is emphatically called a scornful of them.—The Zealots, for whom this passage of the epistle was intended, are fitly called scornful, because they held the heathens in the utmost contempt; and fancying themselves, by the precepts given to their fathers concerning the Canaanites, bound to exterminate all idolaters, they did not scruple to kill the heathens when it was in their power to do it.—In quoting Prov. iii. 34. James hath adopted the LXX. translation, as sufficiently accurate.

Ver. 7. Resist the devil, &c.—Benson's note on this is good, 'We may chase away the devil, not by holy water, the sign of the cross, or any superstitious charm, but by steady virtue and resolute goodness.'

Ver. 8.—1. Draw nigh to God.—Persons who came to the tabernacle to worship, were said 'to draw nigh to God,' because the symbol of his presence resided there. But this was only a drawing nigh to God with the body. They more truly draw nigh to God, who draw nigh to him with their spirits, by a serious and solemn recollection of his presence, perfections, and benefits; and by exercising those pious affections which are due to him. And whosoever worshippeth God in that spiritual manner, is justly said to draw nigh to God, and will be accepted of him, in whatever place he worshippeth him.

2. Cleanse your hands, ye sinners.—The priests prepared themselves for performing the services of the tabernacle by washing and cleansing their bodies. In like manner the people, before they prayed, always washed their hands. In both cases the rite was emblematical, denoting that purity of heart and life which is necessary to render men's worship acceptable to the Deity. Farther, hands in this passage being put for all the members of the body used in the commission of sin, the apostle's injunction, according to its emblematical meaning, imports, that under the gospel we must worship God, not by cleansing our bodies from outward filthiness, but by holiness of heart and life. Accordingly, because our Lord had declared that out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, &c. James adds, 'and purify your hearts.' This, with other exhortations of the like kind found in scripture, imply, that in matters of religion and virtue men must co-operate with the grace of God by their own earnest endeavours.

Ver. 9. And your joy into madness.—ΚΑΤΕΣΤΕΙΛΑΝ. This word is used by Homer, Iliad ii. 493. p. 566. to denote the dejection of mind observable in persons overwhelmed with shame or sorrow, and manifested by hanging down the head. This was the disposition of the publican who went up to the temple to pray, Luke xviii. 13.

10 Be humbled in the presence of the Lord, and he will lift you up.

11 Speak not against one another, brethren. He who speaketh against his brother, and condemneth his brother, speaketh against the law,¹ and condemneth the law.² But if thou condemnest the law, thou art not a doer of the law, but a judge.

12 There is one lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy.¹ Thou, who art thou that condemnest another?²

13 Come now,¹ ye who say, To-day, or to-morrow, we will go to such a city,² and will abide there one year, and make merchandise, and get gain;

14 Who do not know what shall be to-morrow. For what is your life? a smoke (ye) verily it is, which appeareth for a little while, and then disappeareth.¹

15 Instead (ye, 73.) of which ye ought to say,¹ If the Lord will, and we shall live, (see, 218.) certainly we will do this or that.

16 But now ye boast of your proud speeches; all boasting of this sort is bad.¹

17 (Our, 262.) Wherefore, to him who knoweth to do good, and doth it not, it is to him sin.¹

10 Be humbled in the presence of the Lord, on account of your sins, and he will lift you up, by bestowing on you pardon and salvation.

11 Speak not against one another, brethren, on account of your opinions in religion. He who speaketh against his brother, and condemneth his brother in matters pertaining to conscience, speaketh against the law both of Moses and of Christ, which forbids that kind of speaking; and condemneth the law itself. But if thou condemnest the law, thou art not a doer of the law, as thou oughtest to be, but a proud arraigner of it.

12 There is but one lawgiver, who hath power to save the obedient, and to destroy the disobedient. Thou, who art thou that condemnest thy brother, and thereby assumest the prerogative of Christ?

13 Attend now, ye irreligious men, who, forgetting your dependence on God, say, as if all events were in your hand, To-day, or to-morrow, we will go to such a city, and will abide there one year, and make merchandise, and get gain.

14 In this confident manner ye speak concerning futurity, who do not know what shall happen to-morrow. To-morrow ye may die. For what is your life? A smoke, verily it is, which appeareth for a little time, and then disappeareth while men are beholding it.

15 Instead of which ye ought to say, If the Lord will, and we shall live, certainly we will do this or that, seeing all future events depend on God alone, and not on your pleasure.

16 But now ye boast of your proud speeches concerning futurity, as if ye were absolutely independent on God. All boasting of this sort is impious, implying great ignorance both of yourselves and of God.

17 Being taught by your own scriptures that all things are ordered by God, ye have no excuse for your proud speeches. Wherefore, to him who knoweth to think and speak rightly concerning futurity, and doth it not, to him it is sin.

Ver. 11.—1. Speaketh against the law;—that is, in Bengelius's opinion, against the law of Moses. But why may not the law in this passage be the gospel, called twice in this epistle the law of liberty? Bengelius says this is the last time the law of Moses is mentioned in the New Testament.

2. Condemnest the law.—The word κατακαίνω signifies to condemn, John iii. 17, 18. vii. 51. xii. 47.

Ver. 12.—1. There is one lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy.—This description of the lawgiver shews, that the apostle is not speaking of Moses and his law, but of Christ and his gospel. Being therefore the sole lawgiver in the Christian church, the zealots among the converted Jews had no power to make laws for themselves. For the same reason, neither the bishop of Rome, nor any collection of men met in councils, have power to make any laws binding on the conscience; far less have they power to deliver over to perdition those who refuse to obey their laws. The power of saving and destroying, though they have impiously assumed that power, belongs to Christ alone.—His own laws he hath declared in the scriptures, and for any man, or body of men, to add to or take from what is there delivered, is a degree of presumption which Christ the great lawgiver will by no means suffer to go unpunished.—Many MSS. and versions, after the word lawgiver, add και κριτης, and judge.

2. Who art thou who condemnest another?—This question strongly displays the arrogance and folly of men's condemning one another for any matter pertaining to conscience, since they cannot punish them whom they condemn.

Ver. 13.—1. Come now.—Αγε νυν. This is an interjection calculated to excite attention.

2. Ye who say, To-day or to-morrow, we will go, &c.—Many MSS. have the verbs in this verse in the subjunctive mood. But other MSS. with some printed editions, have them in the indicative. The sense, however, is the same; for the subjunctive hath often the signification of the indicative.

Ver. 14. A smoke verily it is, which appeareth for a little while, and then disappeareth.—In the writings of the heathen moralists and poets, there are many beautiful descriptions of the brevity and uncertainty of human life. Homer, Iliad vi. compares the successions of the races of men to the leaves of trees, which fall in autumn, and new ones come forth in the following spring. We find the same thought more elegantly expressed, Ecclesiastic. xiv. 18. 'As of the green leaves on a thick tree, some fall and some grow, so is the generation of flesh and blood: One cometh to an end, and another is born.' The eloquent Isaiah compares the life of man to a flower of the field, chap. xl. 6. 'All flesh is grass, and all the goodness thereof is as the flower of the field. The grass withereth, and the flower fadeth, because the Spirit of the Lord bloweth upon it. Surely the people is grass.' So likewise our apostle, chap. i. 10, 11. But in no author, sacred or profane, is there a finer image of the brevity and uncertainty of human life than this given by James, who hath likened it to 'a smoke which appeareth for a little time, then disappeareth' while men are looking at it.

Ver. 15. Instead of which ye ought to say, If, &c.—To attain the true meaning of the original words, αντι του λεγειν υμεις, I think a comma ought to be placed after του, and the impersonal verb ει ought to be supplied before λεγειν, so as to govern υμεις, thus; Αντι του, (for ου) ει υμεις λεγειτε. By this translation, the sentence begun ver. 13. but which is interrupted by ver. 14. is completed ver. 15. in the following manner: ver. 13. 'Ye who say, To-day or to-morrow we will go,' &c. (ver. 14. 'Ye who say, To-day or to-morrow we will go,' &c. (ver. 15. 'Ye who do not know, &c.')

Ver. 16. Instead of which (namely what is mentioned ver. 13.) ye ought to say, If the Lord will, &c. The apostle does not mean that these words should always be used by us, when we speak of our purposes respecting futurity; but that on such occasions, the sentiment which these words express, should always be present to our mind. The same advice Socrates gave to Alcibiades, with great reason; because, whether one uses the words mentioned by the apostle, or only recollects the sentiment which they denote, nothing can be more effectual than either, for impressing the mind with a sense of God's supremacy in the government of the world; agreeably to the saying of the wise man, Prov. xvi. 9. 'A man's heart deviseth his way, but the Lord directeth (governeth) his steps.'

Ver. 17. All boasting of this sort is bad.—It was bad, because by these proud speeches the Jews represented themselves as not dependent on God for the prolongation of their life, and for success in their affairs. This impiety, as the apostle told them in the subsequent verse, was highly aggravated in them, who were so well instructed concerning the providence of God out of their own law.

Ver. 17. It is to him sin.—Because this is true with respect to all who act contrary to knowledge and conscience, Beza and Estius consider it as a general conclusion, enforcing the whole of the reproofs given to the Jews for acting contrary to the divine revelations of which they were the keepers.

CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

THE unbelieving Jews being exceedingly addicted to sensual pleasures, and very covetous, were of course grievous oppressors of the poor. Wherefore, to terrify these wicked men, and if possible to bring them to repentance,

St. James, in the most lively colours, set before them the miseries which the Romans, the instruments of the divine vengeance, were to bring upon the Jewish people, both in Judea and everywhere else, now deserted of God for their crimes; and particularly the great crime of murdering the Just One, Jesus of Nazareth their long expected Messiah. So that, being soon to lose their possessions and goods, it was not only criminal, but foolish, by injustice and oppression, to amass wealth, of which they were so soon to be stripped, ver. 1-6. In this part of his letter the apostle hath introduced figures and expressions, which, for boldness, vivacity, and energy, might have been used by the greatest tragic poet. And if they had been found in any of the writings of Greece or Rome, would have been praised as exceedingly sublime.

Having foretold, that the power of the unbelieving Jews, the great persecutors of the Christians, was soon to be utterly broken, St. James improved the knowledge of that event for the consolation of the faithful, whom he next addressed. The coming of the Lord to destroy the Jewish state and church, was at hand, so that the evils which they were suffering from the Jews were speedily to end. He therefore exhorted the brethren to bear patiently, till the Lord should come to deliver them. In so doing, they were to imitate both the husbandman, who waiteth patiently for the early and the latter rain to render the seed he hath sown fruitful, ver. 7-9. and their own prophets, who suffered evil patiently while they delivered the messages of God to their fathers, ver. 10.—He also put them in mind of the patience of Job, who was a Gentile, and whose patience under accumulated sufferings was in the end rewarded with great temporal prosperity, and a lasting fame, ver. 11.

Some of the Jewish Christians, it seems, when called before the tribunals of their persecutors, had saved themselves from punishment, by denying their faith upon oath, in the vain imagination that some oaths were obligatory, and others not, Matt. v. 33-37. This practice the apostle strictly prohibited, ver. 12.—and recommended prayer to God as the proper means of their deliverance out of trouble; also, the singing of psalms of thanksgiving and praise, when they were cheerful on account of their prosperity, ver. 13.—And when labouring under bodily distempers, he directed them to send for the elders, who were endowed with the gift of healing diseases miraculously, that they might pray for their recovery, ver. 14, 15.—And if they had injured one another, he desired them in their sickness to confess their faults mutually, and to pray for each other's recovery, ver. 16.—The efficacy of the prayers of prophets and righteous men, he illustrated by the efficacy of Elijah's prayers, ver. 17, 18, 19.—Lastly, that the faithful might be excited to do their utmost, by prayer and every other proper means, to reclaim their brethren who had fallen into sin, he assured them, that whosoever turns a sinner from the error of his way, saves him from death eternal; and for that good office shall shine as the brightness of the firmament for ever and ever, ver. 20.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. V.—1 Come now, ye rich men, weep, howl, on account of your miseries which are coming upon you.

2 Your riches are putrefied,¹ and your garments are moth-eaten.²

3 Your gold and silver are eaten with rust; and the rust of them will be a witness against you, and will eat your bodies as fire. Ye have treasured up³ MISERY (w) in the last days.

4 (W) Hark! The hire of the labourers who have reaped your fields, which is fraudulently kept back by you, crieth; and the cries of the reapers have entered into the ears of the Lord of Hosts. (Rom. ix. 29. note 2.)

Ver. 1. Weep on account of your miseries which are coming upon you.—The Syriac translation of the last clause of this verse is, 'Qui venient super vos.' In the Vulgate it is, 'Miseria vestris que advenient vobis.' The miseries of which the apostle speaks, were those in which the Jews were to be involved in their war with the Romans, and which, by the signs pointed out in our Lord's prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem, James, who wrote this letter in Judea, knew were at hand; miseries from famine, pestilence, and the sword. These fell heaviest no doubt on the Jews in Judea. But they extended also to the Jews in the provinces. Besides, when Jerusalem was besieged by the Romans, the Jews in the provinces within the empire, and also out of its bounds, sent help to their brethren in Judea. So Dion Cassius tells us, lib. 66.—The reader who desires a particular account of the calamities which then befell the Jews, may read Josephus's history of the war, where he will find scenes of misery not to be paralleled in the annals of any nation.

Ver. 2.—1. Your riches are putrefied.—Erems. This circumstance shows that the apostle is speaking of stores of corn, wine, and oil, which, like the rich fool mentioned Luke xii. 18, they had amassed probably by rapine and fraud. In this manner the Syriac translator understood the passage; for he translates it, 'corruptis aut et fetuerunt.'

2. Your garments are moth-eaten.—In the eastern countries, the fashion of clothes did not change as with us. Hence persons of fortune were in use to have many garments made of different costly stuffs, which they laid up as part of their riches. See Gen. xiv. 22. Judges xiv. 12, 13. 2 Kings v. 6. This appears also from Q. Curtius, who tells us, lib. v. c. 6. that when Alexander took Persepolis, he found the riches of all Asia gathered together there, which consisted not only of gold and silver, but of garments: vestis ingens modus.

Ver. 3.—1 And the rust of them will be a witness against you.—The circumstances of their corn, &c. being putrefied, and of their gold and silver being eaten with rust are mentioned to shew that

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. V.—1 Come now, ye rich men who disbelieve the gospel, instead of rejoicing in the prospect of much pleasure from your wealth, weep and cry bitterly on account of the miseries which are coming upon you.

2 Your riches, your corn, wine, and oil, which ye have amassed by injustice and rapine, are putrefied, and your garments in your wardrobes are moth-eaten.

3 Your gold and silver, long hoarded, are eaten with rust; and the rust of them will be a witness against you, that ye have not employed your riches properly, and by irritating your conscience, will eat your bodies as fire. By amassing riches unjustly, and by not employing them in acts of beneficence, ye have treasured up misery to yourselves, in the last days of your commonwealth.

4 Hark! The hire of the labourers who have reaped your fields, which is fraudulently kept back by you, in violation of God's law, (Lev. xix. 13.), crieth for vengeance against you: And the cries of the reapers thus defrauded, have entered into the ears of the Ruler of the universe, who is much more powerful than the greatest of you, and will punish you severely.

they had not been properly used, but covetously hoarded. And by a strong poetical figure, the rust of their gold and silver is represented both as a witness against them, and an executioner to destroy them: It will bear witness to their covetousness, and punish them by raising the most acute pain in their conscience.

2. Treasured up misery in the last days.—In the original this clause is elliptical. In Estius's edition of the Vulgate it is, 'Theaurizastis vobis iram.' The Syriac translator, construing we with this clause, hath 'ignem congestistis vobis in dies ultimos.' And the commentators who by the last days understand the day of judgment, have adopted that translation. But, as the apostle is speaking of the last days of the Jewish commonwealth, and of the miseries which were then to fall on the nation, and particularly on the rich men, I think with Whitty that the word to be supplied is misery; especially as their wealth would be an inducement to the Romans to murder them. We have the phrase treasure up wrath, Rom. ii. 5.—This denunciation, though applied here to the unbelieving Jews in the apostle's days, is general in its intention, and ought to be seriously attended to by all in every age who amass riches unjustly, and who either hoard them covetously, or spend them luxuriously. It is in reality a treasuring up to themselves misery against the day of judgment.

Ver. 4. The hire of the labourers, &c. crieth, and the cries of the reapers.—Here a twofold cry is mentioned, the cry of the hire, and the cry of the reapers themselves, to mark more strongly the greatness of the injustice committed. In this apostrophe there is an allusion to Deut. xiv. 15. 'At his day shalt thou give him his hire—lest he cry against thee to the Lord.' By representing the cries of the reapers defrauded of their hire, as entering into the ears of the Lord of hosts, the apostle intimates, that the great Ruler of the universe attends to the wrongs done to his creatures, and is affected by them, as tender-hearted persons are affected by the cries of the miserable; and that he will in due time avenge them by punishing their oppressors. Let all oppressors consider this.

5 Ye have lived *luxuriously*¹ on the earth, and have been wanton:² ye have fatted your hearts,³ as (w, 164.) for a day of slaughter.

6 Ye have condemned, ye have killed the Just One,⁴ WHO did not resist you.²

7 Wherefore, be patient,¹ brethren, unto the coming of the Lord. Behold the husbandman, WHO expecteth the valuable fruit of the earth, IS patient concerning it, till it receive the early and the latter rain.²

8 Be ye also patient: Strengthen your hearts; for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.¹

9 Groan not against one another, brethren, lest ye be condemned: Behold the Judge standeth before the door.¹ Gen. iv. 7.

10 Take, my brethren, the prophets who have spoken in the name of the Lord for an example of suffering evil, and of patience.

11 Behold we call them *blessed*¹ who are patient. Ye have heard of the patience of Job,² and ye have seen the end of the Lord,³ that the Lord is very compassionate and merciful.

12 But above all things, my brethren, swear not,¹ neither by the heaven, nor by the earth

5 Ye have lived luxuriously on the earth, and have given yourselves up to lasciviousness; and by that sensual manner of living ye have fatted yourselves for a day of vengeance, as victims are fatted for a day of sacrifice.

6 The crime for which especially ye are to be punished is this; Ye have condemned as an impostor, ye have killed the Just One Jesus of Nazareth, who, though he could have delivered himself, did not resist you.

7 Wherefore, having this great example of patience in your Master, be ye patient, brethren, who are persecuted by your countrymen as he was, until the coming of the Lord to destroy your persecutors. In the common affairs of life, men exercise patience cheerfully. Behold the husbandman, who expecteth the valuable fruit of the earth, is patient concerning it till it receive the early and the latter rain.

8 Be ye also patient: Strengthen your hearts, by considering that your sufferings will not be long; for the coming of the Lord to destroy your persecutors draweth nigh.

9 Having foretold the speedy destruction of your persecutors, for the purpose of comforting you, and not to excite you to resentment, I say, Groan not against one another, brethren, as in pain till ye are avenged, lest ye be condemned. Behold, Christ the Judge standeth before the door, hearing all ye say.

10 Take, my brethren, the prophets who have spoken in the name of the Lord to your forefathers, for an example of suffering evil from the very persons to whom they brought the messages of God, and of patience in suffering.

11 Behold, after Christ's example, we call them blessed who are patient. Ye have heard of the patience of Job under his heavy sufferings, and ye have seen the happy end which the Lord put to them; and that the Lord is very compassionate and merciful to his people, even when he afflicts them most.

12 But above all things, my brethren, swear not falsely concerning your faith, to free yourselves from punishment, neither by hea-

Ver. 5.—1. Ye have lived luxuriously.]—So ἐκπαύεσθαι literally signifies. Vulgate, 'Epulati estis, ye have feasted;' because the felicity of the rich consists chiefly in the pleasures of the table. The luxury of the rich Jews is finely described by the prophet Amos, ch. vi. 4. 'That lie upon beds of ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches, and eat the lambs out of the flock, and the calves out of the midst of the stall; 5. That chant to the sound of the viol, and invent to themselves instruments of music like David; 6. That drink wine in bowls, and anoint themselves with the chief ointments; but they are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph.'

2. And have been wanton.]—ἐκπαύεσθαι, Syriac, subannantia, ye have mocked. The Greek word signifies, to feed deliciously, and drink choice liquors; and because that manner of living leads to lasciviousness, it often signifies to be addicted to carnal lusts, as in this passage, where it is distinguished from ἐκπαύεσθαι, ye have lived luxuriously. See 1 Tim. v. 6.—The Jews were so noted for lasciviousness, that Tacitus calls them "projectastina ad libidinem gens,—a nation exceedingly addicted to lust." Hist. lib. v. initio.

3. Ye have fatted your hearts, as for a day of slaughter.]—Syriac, corpore vestra, your bodies.—"A day of slaughter" is an high festival, a day of offering many sacrifices. This is an allusion to Isaiah's description of the destruction of the Idumeans, chap. xxxiv. 6. 'For the Lord hath a sacrifice in Bozra, and a great slaughter in the land of Idumea.' In the same manner, the destruction of God's enemies is called 'the supper of the great God,' Rev. xix. 18. See also Ezek. xxxix. 17.—The apostle's meaning is, that the rich Jews, by their luxury and lasciviousness, had rendered themselves fit to be destroyed in the day of God's wrath. Others think the meaning is, ye have pampered yourselves every day, as the luxurious do on high festival days. Either way understood, this passage is a rebuke to those who by fraud and oppression amass riches, and spend them in gratifying their own lusts, without attending to the wants of the poor. The clause, 'as for a day of slaughter,' is wanting in the Ethiopic version, and is thought by Mill an interpretation rather than a part of the text, Proleg. 1217. But the reading of the Ethiopic version, being unsupported, is of no authority.

Ver. 6.—1. Ye have killed the Just One.]—In Le Clerc's opinion, which Benson follows, 'the just one' is the Christians whom the unbelieving Jews persecuted and put to death. But as Stephen charged the council, Acts vii. 62, with murdering 'the Just One,' and 'the Just One' is an appellation given to our Lord, Acts iii. 14. xxii. 14. to denote that he was just or righteous in calling himself the Messiah, and that the sin of the Jews in putting him to death was great, I rather think it is of him the apostle speaks; more especially as our Lord himself, in the parable of the vineyard, expressly declared that the lord of the vineyard, for the crime of killing his son, would miserably destroy these wicked husbandmen; that is, the whole Jewish nation, to whom the crime committed by their rulers is imputed, both by Christ and by his apostles.—The conjunction and is elegantly omitted in this clause, to express the haste of the Jewish rulers to put Christ to death after he was condemned.

2. Who did not resist you.]—I have followed Michaelis in supplying the pronoun who. In the original it is 'resisteth you not.'—But as the other verbs in the sentence are in the preterite tense, 'Ye have condemned, ye have killed,' this must be understood in the past time likewise. Benson, who by 'the just one' understands all the righteous persons who were murdered by the Jews from first to last, thinks this clause should be translated interrogatively, 'Doth he (the Lord) not resist you?'

Ver. 7.—1. Be patient.]—Μακάριον ὑμῶν. This word signifies to put off anger for a time. Here it means to put off impatience.

2. The early and the latter rain.]—Literally, 'the morning and the evening rain.' The whole time the seed is in the ground being considered as one day, the early rain is called the morning rain, and the latter rain, the evening rain. In Judea the rains come in a regular course. The early rain falls commonly about the beginning of November after the seed is sown, and the latter rain in the middle or towards the end of April while the ears are filling. Those rains were promised to the Israelites, Deut. xi. 14.

Ver. 8. The coming of the Lord draweth nigh.]—By the coming of the Lord, James meant his coming to destroy the Jewish commonwealth. See Pref. to 2 Thess. sect. 4. Agreeably to the prophetic style, the preterite ἤγγισεν, hath approached, is used here to shew that the coming of the Lord was absolutely certain; and at the time of writing this epistle, very near.

Ver. 9. Groan not against one another.]—Groaning is caused by oppression; and when it is merely the natural expression of affliction, it moves God to pity the afflicted person, Judges ii. 18.; but, as Whitby observes, when it is the effect of impatience, or when it expresses a desire of revenge, it becomes criminal. It is this kind of groaning which the apostle forbids.

Ver. 11.—1. Behold we call them blessed who are patient.]—This being subjoined to ver. 10. where the prophets were proposed as an example of patience in suffering, it is an allusion to Christ's words, Matt. v. 11. 'Blessed are ye when men shall revile you and persecute you;' as is plain from his adding, ver. 12. 'Rejoice—for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you.' To shew the allusion, I have translated μακάριον ὑμῶν literally, 'we call them blessed.' Benson observes, that the Papists, to authorize their practice of making saints, have in their versions translated this clause, 'we beatify those who have suffered with constancy.' See 3 John, ver. 5. note 2.

2. Ye have heard of the patience of Job.]—After mentioning the prophets, namely, Elijah, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the rest, as examples of patience under sufferings, the apostle brings in the example of Job, a Gentle, who was remarkably patient under the heaviest afflictions, and was highly rewarded. His design in this was to shew the suffering believing Jews that their lot was not different from that of the most eminent servants of God; and that if a Gentle was so patient under great sufferings, it became them to be equally patient, as being better instructed than he was.—This passage of scripture, as well as Ezek. xiv. 14. where Job is mentioned with Noah and Daniel as one eminently righteous, shews that Job was a real person, and that his history is not a dramatic fable, as many have supposed. A fabulous person certainly would not have been mentioned by the apostle as an example of any virtue.

3. Ye have seen the end of the Lord.]—This is the genitive of the agent. Ye have seen in the history of that good man, what a happy termination the Lord put to his sufferings.

Ver. 12.—1. Swear not, neither by the heaven, &c.]—It is supposed nor by any other oath: But let your yea be yea, and your nay, nay, that ye may not fall under condemnation.²

13 Does any one among you suffer evil? let him pray. Is any one cheerful? let him sing psalms.¹

14 Is any one sick among you? let him send for the elders¹ of the church, and let them pray over him,² having anointed him with oil³ in the name of the Lord.

15 And the prayer of faith¹ will save (resurrect) the sick person, and so the Lord will raise him up. (Kai, etsi) And although he hath committed sins, they shall be forgiven him.

16 Confess your faults¹ one to another, and pray for one another, that ye may be healed.² (See 1 John v. 16. note 3.) The inwrought prayer (James, 69.) of the righteous man availeth much.³

17 Elias was a man of like infirmity¹ with us. And he prayed fervently² (60.) that it ven, nor by the earth, nor by any other oath, in the imagination that such oaths are not obligatory: But let your yea, or affirmation on oath; be yea, that is, agreeable to truth, and your nay, nay, in like manner, that ye may not fall under condemnation as perjured hypocrites.

13 Does any one among you suffer evil for being a Christian? instead of denying his faith with oaths, let him pray for strength to bear his sufferings. Is any one cheerful? let him sing psalms of praise to God for all his mercies.

14 Is any one sick among you? let him send for the elders of the church, who possess the gift of healing diseases, and let them pray over him, after anointing him with oil by the special direction of Christ, in token that a miracle is to be performed for his recovery.

15 And the prayer of faith will save the sick person from his disease, and the Lord will raise him up from his sick-bed. See Mark i. 31. So that although he hath committed sins, for which that disease was sent on him, they shall be forgiven him by the removal of the disease. (See 1 John v. 16. note 3.)

16 In your sickness, therefore, confess your faults to one another, if ye have done one another any injury. And the injured to whom the confession is made, ought to forgive the sick, and pray for him that he may be healed. The inspired prayer of the elder, (ver. 14.), accompanied with the prayer of the injured party, hath great influence with God.

17 The infirmities to which the elders are subject, will not hinder the efficacy of their prayers. Elijah was a man of like infirby some, that James in this passage forbade the brethren to make indiscreet vows for the purpose of delivering themselves out of their affliction; because a practice of that sort shewed great ignorance of the character of God, and great impatience. This no doubt is a good sense of the passage. Yet I rather think he forbade them, when brought before the tribunals of their persecutors, to deny their faith with oaths; which some of them, it seems, thought they might do with a safe conscience, if the oath was one of those which were reckoned not binding. For that the Jews thought some oaths obligatory and others not, appears from our Lord's condemnation of that false morality, recorded Matt. v. 34.

2. That ye may not fall (under condemnation.)—This, which is the reading of the common edition, and of some ancient MSS., particularly the Alexandrian, and of the Syriac, Vulgate, and other versions, was adopted by our translators. But Beza, Bengelius, and others, on the authority of the greatest number of MSS. prefer into hypocrisy. This latter reading Mill hath inserted in his edition; yet in his Prolegomena he prefers the other, No. 1208.—The apostle in this passage sets the condemnation of God threatened in the decalogue against false swearers, in opposition to the condemnation of men, which the brethren might escape who aware falsely concerning their faith.

Ver. 13.—Let him sing psalms.—In this, and what goes before, the apostle advises us to employ ourselves in such private religious exercises as are suitable to our present circumstances and frame of mind. When rendered cheerful, by contemplating the manifestations which God hath made of his perfections in the works of creation, providence, and redemption, or by any blessing bestowed on ourselves, we are to express our joy, not by drinking and singing profane lewd songs, but by hymns of praise, and by thanksgivings to God for all his mercies. See Eph. v. 18, 19. On the other hand, when afflicted, we are to pray; that being the best means of producing in ourselves patience and resignation. But as the precept concerning our singing psalms when cheerful does not imply that we are not to pray then; so the precept concerning prayer in affliction does not imply that we are not to express our joy in suffering according to the will of God, by singing psalms as Paul and Silas did in the jail at Philippi.

Ver. 14.—1. Send for the elders of the church;—namely, where the sick person lives. See 1 Tim. v. 17. note 1. for an account of the elders.—In the first age the spiritual gifts were dispensed in such plenty, that no church was without these gifts; and particularly, in every church there were some who possessed the gift of miraculously healing the sick.

2. Let them pray over him;—that is, with their hands laid on him. This is what is called the prayer of faith, ver. 15. See note 1. there; also the notes on the parallel passage, 1 John v. 14, 16.

3. Having anointed him with oil.—Although the rite here prescribed is not mentioned in the account which the Evangelists have given of Christ's commission to his disciples to heal the sick, Matt. x. 8. Luke ix. 2. it is probable he appointed it then. For in the account given of the execution of that commission it is said, Mark vi. 13. 'They anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them.' The anointing the sick with oil was not prescribed, either by our Lord or by his apostles, as a natural remedy, but as a sensible token to the sick person himself, and to those who were present, that a miracle of healing was going to be performed. Where no miracle is to be performed, to use anointing, as a religious rite, is a vain superstition. See 1 John v. 16. note 4.

Ver. 15. And the prayer of faith.—In scripture, faith sometimes signifies the spiritual gifts in general, Rom. xii. 3. sometimes the gift of working miracles, 1 Cor. xii. 9. xiii. 2. and sometimes the gift of healing diseases miraculously, Acts iii. 16. In which sense it is to be understood here. The gift of working miracles was called faith, because they were always performed in consequence of an impression made by the Spirit on the mind of the person who was to perform them, moving him to undertake the miracle, and working in him a full persuasion that it would be performed. Wherefore, 'the prayer of faith' is a prayer which the elder, moved by the Spirit of God, was to make for the recovery of the sick, in the full persuasion that the Lord would raise him up. See 1 John v. 16. note 1.

Ver. 16.—1. Confess your faults one to another.—In sickness we are to confess our faults one to another, not because we have power to grant pardon of sin to each other, but, diseases being often inflicted as the punishment of particular sins, (1 Cor. xi. 30.), when the sick are made sensible, in the course of their disease, that they have injured their brethren, they ought to shew their repentance, by confessing these sins to them, and by asking their pardon. This passage of scripture, therefore, affords no foundation for the Popish practice of auricular confession to the priest. Besides, mutual confession being here enjoined, the priest is as much bound by this precept to confess to the people, as the people to the priest; not to mention, that confession in general is not enjoined here, but confession to the injured party only, agreeably to our Lord's direction, Matt. v. 25.; and when acknowledgment is made to him, he ought to forgive, and pray for the party who injured him, that he may be healed. See the following note.

2. And pray for one another, that ye may be healed.—Here four things are observable:—1. That this confession was to be made, not by a person in health that he might obtain eternal salvation, but by a sick person that he might be healed; 2. That this direction being addressed to women as well as to men, they are required to pray for one another, and even for the men, whether lay or clergy, who have injured them; 3. That there is no mention here of absolution, either by the priest, or by any other person; 4. Absolution, in the sound sense of the word, being nothing but a declaration of the promises of pardon which are made in the gospel to penitent sinners, every one who understands the gospel doctrine may, as Benson observes, declare these promises to penitent sinners, as well as any bishop or priest whatever; and the one hath no more authority to do it than the other: nay, every sincere penitent may expect salvation without the absolution of any person whatever; whereas the impenitent have no reason to expect that blessing, although absolved by all the priests in the world.

3. The inwrought prayer of the righteous man availeth much;—namely, to obtain health for the sick. Because this is called inwrought, the inwrought prayer, I think it must be understood of the prayer of the elder for the miraculous recovery of the sick, to which he was moved by the Spirit, and not of the prayer of any righteous man whatever. For we do not find in scripture that the prayers of such were followed with miraculous cures, unless they possessed the gift of healing, and were moved by an impulse of the Spirit to pray for the cure.—In this verse it is intimated, that if the disease was inflicted on the sick person for some injury which he had committed, he was to shew his repentance by confessing his fault to him whom he had injured, before the elder prayed for his recovery; and that, to render the elder's prayer the more effectual, the injured party was to join the elder in praying that the sick person might be healed.

Ver. 17.—1. Elias was a man of like infirmity with us.—In this sense the word infirmity is used, Acts xiv. 18.; literally it signifies, suffering like things with another. Elijah through natural infirmity suffered as we do, from disease, from temptation, from persecution, &c.

2. And he prayed fervently.—In the history it is not said directly, might not rain; and it *did not rain upon the land for three years and six months.*¹

18 And again he prayed, and the heaven gave rain,¹ and the land brought forth its fruit.

19 Brethren, if any *one among you is seduced from the truth, and any one turn him back,*¹

20 Let him know, that he *who turneth a sinner back from the error of his way, will save a soul from death,*¹ and *will cover a multitude of sins.*²

either that the drought was brought on, or the rain sent, in consequence of Elijah's praying; but it is insinuated, that both happened through his prayer; for, 1 Kings xvii. 1. we are told that 'Elijah sware there should not be dew nor rain these years, but according to his word;' that is, as James hath explained it, according to his inspired prayer for drought or for rain.

3. And it did not rain upon the land for three years and six months.)—This is the period which our Lord likewise says the drought continued, Luke iv. 25. It is said indeed, 1 Kings xviii. 1. 'That in the third year the word of the Lord came to Elijah,' namely, concerning the rain. But this third year was computed from the time of his going to live at Zarephath, which happened many days after the drought began; as is plain from this, that he remained at the brook Cherith till it was dried up, and then went to Zarephath in the country of Sidon, 1 Kings xvii. 7. 9. Wherefore, the three years and six months must be computed from his denouncing the drought, at which time that judgment commenced.

Ver. 18. And again he prayed, and the heaven gave rain.)—Of this second prayer there is an insinuation in the history, 1 Kings xvii. 42. where we are told, that 'he cast himself down on the earth, and put his face between his knees;' for that was the posture of an humble and earnest supplicant. Besides, Moses's praying is expressed by his 'falling on his face,' Numb. xvi. 4.

Ver. 19. And any one turn him back.)—This teaches us, that it is the duty of those who persevere in the path of truth, to endeavour with us. And he, to shew Ahab that the God whom he worshipped was the true God, prayed fervently that it might not rain: And it did not rain on the land of Israel for three years and six months.

18 And the famine occasioned by the drought having humbled Ahab, again Elijah prayed for rain, and the heaven gave rain, and the land brought forth its fruit plentifully.

19 Ye ought to be solicitous for each other's eternal welfare, as well as for their temporal happiness. I therefore tell you, brethren, if any one among you is seduced from the doctrine and practice of the gospel, and any person turn him back to the right path, 20 Let such an one know, that he who turneth a sinner back from false doctrine and bad practice, will save a soul from the spiritual death, and will procure him the pardon of all his sins; and for that good office will himself shine as the stars for ever and ever, Dan. xii. 3.

by friendly admonition and by good example, to turn back those who have wandered into error through the viciousness of their own disposition. See 2 Thess. xi. 12.

Ver. 20.—1. Will save a soul from death.)—What greater motive can there be to excite the virtuous earnestly to exert themselves in accomplishing the reformation of their erring brethren?

2. And will cover a multitude of sins.)—The covering of sin is a phrase which often occurs in the Old Testament, and always signifies the pardoning of sin. Nor has it any other meaning here. For surely it cannot be the apostle's intention to tell us, that the turning of a sinner from the error of his way will conceal, from the eye of God's justice, a multitude of sins committed by the person who does this charitable office, if he continueth in them. Such a person needs himself to be turned from the error of his way, in order that his own soul may be saved from death. St. Peter hath a similar expression, 1 Pet. iv. 8. 'Love covers a multitude of sins,' not, however, in the person who is possessed of love, but in the person who is the object of his love. It disposes him to forgive his sins, see Prov. x. 12.—Atterbury, however, (Serm. vol. i. p. 46.), and Scott, (Christ. Life, vol. i. p. 368.), contend, that 'the covering a multitude of sins' includes also, that the pious action of which the apostle speaks, engages God to look with greater indulgence on the character of the person who performs it, and to be less severe in marking what he hath done amiss.

I. PETER.

PREFACE.

SECT. I.—The History of Simon, whom our Lord surnamed Peter.

SIMON was a native of Bethsaida, a town situated on the western shore of the lake of Genesareth. He was by trade a fisherman, and had a brother named Andrew; but whether he was elder or younger than Simon, is not known. Their father was named Jonah or John; and probably was of the same occupation with his sons. Andrew was a disciple of John Baptist, John i. 35. 41. and heard him point out Jesus as 'the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world.' This good news Andrew communicated to his brother Simon, and brought him to Jesus; who, foreseeing the fortitude he would exercise in preaching the gospel, honoured him with the name of Cephas or Peter, which is by interpretation a stone or rock, John i. 42.

Andrew and Peter, now become the disciples of Jesus, often attended him. Yet they still followed their trade of fishing occasionally, till he called them to a more constant attendance, promising to make them 'fishers of men,' Matt. iv. 19. Afterwards, when he chose twelve of his disciples to be with him always, and to be his Apostles, Peter and Andrew were of the number. About that time Peter had left Bethsaida, and had gone to Capernaum with his wife, who is thought to have been of that town. From Andrew's accompanying his brother thither, and living with him in the same house, it may be conjectured that their father was dead. With them Jesus also abode, after he took up his ordinary residence in Capernaum; for he seems to have been pleased with the disposition and manners of all the members of the family.—This house is sometimes called Peter's house, Matt. viii. 14. and sometimes the house of Simon and Andrew, Mark i. 29.—Thus, as Lardner observes, it appears that before Peter became an apostle he had a wife, was the head of a family, had a boat and nets, and a furnished house, and maintained himself by an honest occupation. To these things Peter alluded when he told his Master, 'Behold we have left all and followed thee! What shall we have therefore?' Matt. xix. 27.—The apostle Paul seems to insinuate, that Peter's wife attended him in his travels after our Lord's ascension, 1 Cor. ix. 5.

Peter, now made an apostle, shewed on every occasion the strongest faith in Jesus as the Messiah, and the most extraordinary zeal in his service; of which the following are examples.—The night after the miracle of the loaves, when Jesus came to his disciples walking on the sea, they were affrighted, supposing that they saw a spirit. But Peter, taking courage, said, 'Lord, if it be thou, bid me come to thee on the water.' And he said to him, 'Come,' Matt. xiv. 28.—The next day, when many of our Lord's disciples, offended at his discourse in the synagogue of Capernaum, left him, Jesus said to the twelve, 'Will ye also go away? Then Simon Peter answered him, Lord, to whom shall we go? for thou hast the words of eternal life; and we know, and are sure, that thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.' In returning this answer, Peter was more forward than the rest, because his faith was strengthened by the late miracle of his walking on the water.—The same answer Peter gave, when Jesus in private asked his disciples, first, what opinion the people entertained of him? next, what was their own opinion? Matt. xvi. 16. 'Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God.' Having received this answer, Jesus declared Peter blessed on account of his faith; and in allusion to the signification of his name, added, 'Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church;—and I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth,' &c. Many think these things were spoken to Peter alone, for the purpose of conferring on him privileges and powers not granted to the rest of the apostles. But others, with more reason, suppose, that though Jesus directed his discourse to Peter, it was intended for them all; and that the honours and powers granted to Peter by name, were conferred on them all equally. For no one will say, that Christ's church was built upon Peter singly. It was built on the foundation of all the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone. As little can any one say, that the power of binding and loosing was confined to Peter; seeing it was declared afterwards to belong to all the apostles, Matt. xviii. 18. John xx. 23. See Preface to I Timothy, Sect. 5. Art. 1, 2. To these things add this, that as Peter made both his confessions in answer to questions which Jesus put to the whole apostles, these confessions were certainly made in the name of the whole. And therefore what Jesus said to him in reply was designed for the whole without distinction; excepting this, which was peculiar to him, that he was to be the first who, after the descent of the Holy Ghost, should preach the gospel to the Jews, and then to the Gentiles; an honour which was conferred on Peter in the expression, 'I will give thee the keys,' &c.

Peter was one of the three apostles whom Jesus admitted to witness the resurrection of Jairus's daughter, and before whom he was transfigured, and with whom he retired to pray in the garden the night before he suffered. He was the person who, in the fervour of his zeal for his Master, cut off the ear of the high-priest's slave, when the armed band came to apprehend him. Yet this same Peter, a few hours after that, denied his Master three different times in the high-priest's palace, and with oaths. After the third denial, being stung with deep remorse, he went out and wept bitterly. This offence therefore Jesus pardoned. And to testify his acceptance of his lapsed but penitent apostle, he ordered the women to carry the news of his resurrection to Peter by name; and appeared to him before he shewed himself to any other of his apostles: and, at another appearance, he confirmed him in the apostolical office, by giving him a special commission to feed his sheep.—From that time forth Peter never faltered in his faith; but uniformly shewed the greatest zeal and courage in his Master's cause.

Soon after our Lord's ascension, in a numerous assembly of the apostles and brethren, Peter gave it as his opinion, that one should be chosen to be an apostle in the room of Judas. To this they all agreed, and, by lot, chose Matthias, whom, on that occasion, they numbered with the eleven apostles. See Prelim. Essay I. Art. 1.—On the day of Pentecost following, when the Holy Ghost fell on the apostles and disciples, 'Peter, standing up with the eleven, lift up his voice; that is, Peter, rising up, spake with a loud voice, in the name of the apostles, as he had done on various occasions in his Master's lifetime, and gave the multitude an account of that great miracle, Acts ii. 14.—When Peter and John were brought before the council, to be examined concerning the miracle wrought on the impotent man, Peter spake. It was Peter who questioned Ananias and Sapphira about the price of their lands; and, for their lying in that matter, punished them miraculously with death. It is remarkable also, that although by the hands of the apostles many signs and wonders were wrought, it was by Peter's shadow alone, that the sick, who were laid in the streets of Jerusalem, were healed as he passed by. Lastly, it was Peter who made answer to the council, for the apostles not obeying their command to preach no more in the name of Jesus.

Peter's fame was now become so great, that the brethren at Joppa, hearing of his being in Lydda, and of his having cured Eneas miraculously of a palsy, sent, desiring him to come and restore a disciple to life named Tabitha, which he did.—During his abode in Joppa, the Roman centurion Cornelius, directed by an angel, sent for him to come and preach to him. On that occasion, the Holy Ghost fell on Cornelius and his company, while Peter spake.—Peter, by his zeal and success in preaching the gospel, having attracted the notice of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, Herod Agrippa, who, to please the Jews, had killed James the brother of John, still farther to gratify them, cast Peter into prison. But an angel brought him out; after which he concealed himself in the city, or in some neighbouring town, till Herod's death, which happened about the end of the year. Some learned men think Peter at that time went to Antioch or to Rome. But if he had gone to any celebrated city, Luke, as L'Enfant observes, would probably have mentioned it. Besides, we find him in the council of Jerusalem, which met not long after this to determine the famous question concerning the circumcision of the Gentiles.—The council being ended, Peter went to Antioch, where he gave great offence by refusing to eat with the converted Gentiles. But Paul withstood him to the face, rebuking him before the whole church for his pusillanimity and hypocrisy, Gal. ii. 11—21.

From the foregoing history it appears, that Peter very early distinguished himself as an apostle; that his Master greatly esteemed him for his courage, his zeal, and his other good qualities; that he lived in peculiar habits of intimacy with Peter, and conferred on him various marks of favour in common with James and John, who likewise distinguished themselves by their talents and good dispositions. But that Peter received from Christ any authority over his brethren, or possessed any superior dignity as an apostle, there is no reason for believing. All the apostles were equal in office and authority; as is plain from our Lord's declaration, 'One is your master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren.' The only distinction among the apostles, was that which arose from personal talents and qualifications, a distinction which never fails to take place in every society. Because, if one distinguishes himself by his superior ability in the management of affairs, he will be respected in proportion to the idea which his fellows entertain of him. In this manner, and in no other, Peter, whose virtues and talents were singularly conspicuous, acquired a pre-eminence among the apostles; but it was only of the sort founded on personal esteem. And therefore, in their meetings to deliberate on any important affair, the brethren may have wished to hear him speak first; and he commonly did so: but that was all. In like manner, in their intercourses with their adversaries, Peter often spake in the name of such of the apostles and brethren as were present; which they willingly allowed, perhaps desired, as thinking him best qualified for the office. The Evangelists also, who wrote their gospels a considerable time after Peter had raised himself in the esteem of the apostles and brethren, added their suffrage to his character, by mentioning him first in the catalogues which they gave of the apostles. And as two of them were themselves apostles, by acknowledging, in that manner, their respect for him, they have shewn themselves entirely free from envy. Lastly, it appears from Peter's epistles that he did not think himself superior in authority to the other apostles. For if he had entertained any imagination of that sort, insinuations of his superiority, if not direct assertions thereof, might have been expected in his epistles, and especially in their inscriptions. Yet there is nothing of that sort in either of his letters. The highest title he takes to himself, in writing to the elders of Pontus, is that of their fellow-elder, 1 Pet. v. 1.

To the foregoing account of Peter's rank among the apostles, I will add from Lardner on the Can. p. 102. that Cassian, supposing Peter to be older than Andrew, makes his age the ground of his precedence among the apostles: And that Jerome himself says, "The keys were given to all the apostles alike, and the church was built on all of them equally: But, for preventing dissension, precedence was given to one. And John might have been the person; but he was too young; and Peter was preferred on account of his age." See the Pref. to James, sect. 1. paragr. 3.

In the history of the Acts, no mention is made of Peter after the council of Jerusalem. But from Gal. ii. 11. it appears, that after the council he was with Paul at Antioch. He is likewise mentioned by Paul, 1 Cor. i. 12. iii. 23. from which Pearson infers, that Peter had been in Corinth before the first epistle to the Corinthians was written. But this does not follow. In these passages Paul speaks of certain Jews in Corinth, who had been converted by Jesus and Peter. But he does not say they were converted in Corinth: Probably their conversion happened in Judea. If Peter had preached in Corinth before Paul wrote to the Corinthians, he would not have said, 'I have planted, Apollos hath watered;' overlooking the labours of Peter.—When Paul wrote his epistle to the Romans, it may be presumed that Peter was not in Rome. For in that epistle Paul saluted many of the brethren there by name, without mentioning Peter. Farther, during his two years' confinement at Rome, Paul wrote four letters to different churches, in none of which is Peter mentioned. Neither is any thing said or hinted in these epistles, from which it can be gathered that Peter had ever been in Rome. Probably he did not visit that city till about the time of Paul's martyrdom.

It is generally supposed, that after Peter was at Antioch with Paul he returned to Jerusalem. What happened to him after that is not told in the scriptures. But Eusebius informs us, that Origen, in the third tome of his Exposition on Genesis, wrote to this purpose, "Peter is supposed to have preached to the Jews of the dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Bithynia, Cappadocia, and Asia: And at length, coming to Rome, was crucified with his head downwards; himself having desired that it might be in that manner." Some learned men think, that Peter in the latter part of his life went into Chaldea, and there wrote his first epistle; because the salutation of the church at Babylon is sent in it. But their opinion is not supported by the testimony of ancient writers.—Lardner, Can. vol. iii. p. 169. saith, "It seems to me, that when he (Peter) left Judea, he went again to Antioch the chief city of Syria. Thence he might go into other parts of the continent, particularly Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, which are expressly mentioned at the beginning of his first epistle. In those countries he might stay a good while. It is very likely that he did so; and that he was well acquainted with the Christians there, to whom he afterwards wrote two epistles. When he left those parts, I think he went to Rome; but not till after Paul had been in that city, and was gone from it."

Many ancient writers have said that Peter was crucified at Rome, while Nero persecuted the Christians. And their opinion has been espoused by learned men, both Papists and Protestants. Some, however, particularly Scaliger, Salmasius, Fred. Spanheim, and others, deny that Peter ever was at Rome. If the reader wishes to see the evidence from antiquity, on which Peter's having been at Rome rests, he will find it fully set forth by Lardner, (Can. vol. iii. c. 18.), who concludes his inquiry as follows: "This is the general, uncontradicted, disinterested testimony of ancient writers in the several parts of the world, Greeks, Latins, Syrians. As our Lord's prediction concerning the death of Peter is recorded in one of the four Gospels, it is very likely that Christians would observe the accomplishment of it: which must have been in some place. And about this place there is no difference among Christian writers of ancient times. Never any other place was named beside Rome: nor did any other city ever glory in the martyrdom of Peter.—It is not for our honour, nor for our interest, either as Christians or Protestants, to deny the truth of events ascertained by early and well attested tradition. If any make an ill use of such facts, we are not accountable for it. We are not, from a dread of such abuses, to overthrow the credit of all history; the consequence of which would be fatal."

SECT. II.—Of the Authenticity of the Epistles of Peter.

THOUGH some doubts were anciently entertained concerning the second epistle of Peter, the authenticity of the first was never called in question; being universally acknowledged as Peter's from the very beginning. In proof of this, Lardner has shewn, Can. iii. p. 216. that Peter's first epistle was referred to by Clemens Romanus, by Polycarp, and by the martyrs of Lyons: that it was received by Theophilus Bishop of Antioch, and quoted by Papias, Irenæus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Tertullian; which last calls it, "The epistle to the inhabitants of Pontus." Wherefore, there can be no doubt that the first epistle of Peter was all along received as an inspired writing by the whole Christian church.

Eusebius seems to refer to the testimonies just now mentioned, in the following passage: E. H. lib. ii. c. 3. "One epistle of Peter, called his first, is acknowledged. This the presbyters of ancient times have quoted in their writings, as undoubtedly genuine. But that called his second, we have been informed, by tradition, has not been received as a part of the New Testament. Nevertheless, appearing to many to be useful, it hath been carefully studied with the other scriptures." It is evident, therefore, that in the time of Eusebius great regard was shewed even to the second epistle of Peter by many Christians who esteemed it genuine: for, as Le Clerc, quoted by Benson, very well observes, "If it had not been Peter's, it would not have seemed useful to any man of tolerable prudence; neither ought it to have been carefully studied with the other scriptures, seeing the writer in many places pretends to be St. Peter himself. On the very account that it was a forgery, it would be noxious; as it is a thing of the worst example, for any man to forge another's name, or pretend to be the person he is not; and what ought not to be pardoned." The reader will find another passage in the Preface to James, sect. 2. paragr. 2. in which Eusebius has spoken of the epistles of Peter.

From a passage in Origen's Commentary on Matthew, quoted by Eusebius, E. H. lib. vi. c. 25. it appears that Origen acknowledged Peter's second epistle. "Peter, on whom the church is built, hath left an epistle universally acknowledged. Let it be granted that he also wrote a second; for it is doubted of."—Jerome, in his book of illustrious men, Art. Peter, says, "Peter wrote two epistles called Catholic, the second of which is denied to be his, because of its differing in style from the former."—This difference shall be examined in the Preface to the second Epistle, sect. 1. towards the end.

Estius observes, that whoever desires to know the agreement of Peter's doctrine with Paul's, ought to examine the sentiments and precepts contained in this epistle, which he will find so exactly the same with Paul's, that it will be impossible for him to doubt, that the doctrine of both proceeded from one and the same Spirit of God.

SACT. III.—Of the Persons to whom Peter's First Epistle was written.

EUSEBIUS, Jerome, Didymus of Alexandria, and many of the ancients, were of opinion that Peter's first epistle was written to the Jewish Christians scattered through the countries mentioned in the inscription. And their opinion is adopted by Beza, Grotius, Mill, Cave, Tillamont, and others. But some of the ancients thought this epistle was written to Gentiles also. See Lardner, Canon, iii. p. 225. Bede, in his prologue to the Catholic epistles, says, St. Peter's epistles were sent to such as had been proselyted from heathenism to Judaism, and after that were converted to the Christian religion.—The author of Misc. Sacra and Benson contend, that Peter's first epistle was written to proselytes of the gate; but Wetstein that it was written to the Gentiles. Hallet and Sykes argue that both epistles were written to the Gentiles. Lardner thought Peter's epistles were sent to all Christians in general, Jews and Gentiles, living in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, &c. So likewise Estius and Whitby.

In this diversity of opinions, the only rule of determination must be the inscription, together with the things contained in the epistle itself. From 2 Pet. iii. 1. it appears, that that epistle was sent to the same people as the first. Wherefore, since its inscription is, 'To them who have obtained like precious faith with us,' the first epistle must have been sent to believers in general. Accordingly the valediction, 1 Pet. v. 14. is general; 'Peace be with you all who are in Christ Jesus.' So also is the inscription; 'To the Sojourners of the dispersion of Pontus, &c. elected according to the foreknowledge of God;' 1 Pet. i. 1.: For the appellation of sojourners does not necessarily imply, that this letter was written to none but Jewish believers. In scripture, all religious men are called sojourners and strangers, because they do not consider this earth as their home, but look for a better country. (See Gen. xlvii. 9. Psal. xxxix. 12. LXX. Heb. xi. 13.) Wherefore, in writing to the Gentile believers, Peter might call them sojourners as well as the Jews, and exhort them, chap. i. 17. 'to pass the time of their sojourning here in fear;' and chap. ii. 11. 'beseech them, as travellers, to abstain from fleshly lusts.'—Farther, the Gentile believers in Pontus, &c. might be called 'sojourners of the dispersion of Pontus,' although none of them were driven from their native countries. For the dispersion may signify, that they lived at a distance from each other in the widely extended regions mentioned in the inscription; and that they were few in number, compared with the idolaters and unbelievers among whom they lived. In this sense, the Jewish Christians of Jerusalem are said to have been 'dispersed through Judea and Samaria,' by the persecution raised after the death of Stephen, Acts viii. 1.—Lastly, the appellation elected, which is added to that of 'strangers of the dispersion,' does not imply that none but Jewish believers are meant: All who profess the gospel, whether they be Jews or Gentiles, are in scripture said to be elected; that is, made the visible church and people of God. It may therefore be allowed, that the expressions 'sojourners of the dispersion, elected,' &c. comprehend the Gentile Christians of Pontus, as well as the Jewish; especially seeing they are said to be 'elected according to the foreknowledge of God.' For that is a plain allusion to God's promise, of blessing all nations in Abraham's seed.

Secondly, There are things written in this Epistle which are peculiar to the Gentiles, and cannot be understood of the Jews. For example, chap. i. 14. 'As obedient children, do not fashion yourselves according to the former lusts, in your ignorance.' This, as Lardner observes, might very properly be said to persons converted from heathenism, but not to the Jews, who from their infancy knew the true God by means of the Mosaic revelation. Besides, nowhere in the New Testament are the Jews represented as living in ignorance or darkness.—Chap. i. 18. 'Ye were redeemed from your foolish behaviour, delivered to you by your fathers.' This might be said of the Gentiles rather than of the Jews, if by 'foolish behaviour' the apostle meant the worship of idols, who in scripture are termed τα μωρα, Acts xiv. 15. For the idolatrous worship practised by the Gentiles was delivered to them of their fathers. But if, by foolish behaviour, the apostle meant a superstitious wicked behaviour, it might be said of the Jews as well as of the Gentiles, that that behaviour was delivered to them by their fathers.—Chap. i. 20. speaking of Christ, the apostle says, Who was 'manifested in these last times for you, 21. who through him believe in God who raised him up from the dead.' This could neither be said to Jews nor to proselytes, as Benson supposes. For their belief in God was founded on the revelations made by the prophets, and not on the revelations made to them by Christ. But it well agrees to the Gentiles, who, till they were enlightened by the gospel of Christ, had not the least knowledge of the true God. Besides, no one will say, that Christ was manifested for the Jews and proselytes only.—Chap. ii. 10. 'Who formerly were not a people, but now are a people of God.' This applies to the Gentiles only. See Rom. ix. 24, 25.—Chap. iv. 3. 'For the time which hath passed of life, is a sufficient time for us to have wrought out the will of the Gentiles, having walked in lasciviousness, lusts, excesses in wine, revelings, banquetings, and abominable idolatries.' Though Peter in this passage joined himself with the persons of whom he speaks, it does not follow, either that he was guilty of idolatry, or that the persons with whom he joined himself were Jews. Idolatry was a crime which the Jews, ever since their return from Babylon, had avoided, and which Peter never was guilty of. Neither had he ever wrought the will of the Gentiles, by walking in lasciviousness, &c. This passage, therefore, is addressed to the Gentile Christians alone, with whom the apostle joins himself, to avoid giving them offence, and to render his discourse the more persuasive.

The passages which appear inconsistent with the supposition that this epistle was written to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews, are the two following:—Chap. ii. 9. 'But ye are an elected race, a kingly priesthood, an holy nation, a purchased people.' These honourable appellations, it is true, were in former times appropriated to the Jews, the ancient people of God. But they belong now to all believers, to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews. And this is what the apostle here declares; as is plain from his adding, 'That ye should declare the perfections of him who hath called you from darkness into his marvellous light, who formerly were not a people, but now are a people of God,' &c.—Chap. ii. 12. 'Have your behaviour among the Gentiles comely,' &c. But the Gentiles here are the unbelieving Gentiles; a sense which the word has, 1 Cor. x. 32. 'Giving offence neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the church of God.'

Upon the whole, I agree with those who think the first epistle of Peter was written to the whole body of Christians who resided in the countries of Pontus, Galatia, &c. and that whether they were of Jewish or Gentile extraction.

SECT. IV.—Of the Apostle Peter's Design in writing this Epistle; and of the Matters contained in it.

It is well known, that anciently, in proportion as the Christians multiplied in any country, their sufferings became more general and severe. In the latter part, therefore, of the first age, when the rage of the Jews and Gentiles was exceedingly stimulated by the prevalence of the gospel, the apostles of Christ, who were then alive, considered themselves as especially called upon to comfort and encourage their suffering brethren. With this view the apostle Peter wrote his first epistle to the Christians in Pontus, &c. wherein he represented to them the obligations the disciples of Christ were under to suffer for their religion; and suggested a variety of motives to persuade them to suffer cheerfully.

The enemies of the Christians, to enrage not only the magistrates against them, but all who had any regard to the interests of society, represented them everywhere as atheists and enemies of mankind, because they would not comply with the common idolatry, nor obey the heathen magistrates in things contrary to their religion. They calumniated them also as movers of sedition, and as addicted to every species of wickedness. To wipe off these foul aspersions, Peter, in this epistle, earnestly beseeched the brethren of Pontus, &c. to behave both towards the magistrates and towards their heathen neighbours in a blameless manner, and to be remarkable for every virtue; that by their general good behaviour they might make their enemies ashamed of the calumnies which they uttered against them.—Withal, that they might know how to conduct themselves on every occasion, he gave them a particular account of the most important duties of civil and social life. Wherefore, though this epistle had an especial reference to the circumstances of the Christians in the first age, it is still of great use for enforcing the obligations of morality, and in promoting holiness among the professors of the gospel.—Moreover, it contains some deep mysteries, not so plainly discovered in the other inspired writings; such as, 1. That it was the spirit of Christ which spake anciently in the Jewish prophets, chap. i. 11. and particularly in Noah, chap. iii. 19.—2. That the ungodly men of the old world, to whom Noah preached, are neither annihilated nor punished; but are at present spirits in prison, reserved to judgment and punishment.—3. That the water of the flood, which bare up Noah and his family in the ark, and preserved them from perishing, was a type of the water of baptism, and of its efficacy in saving those, who, besides being washed with that water, give the answer of a good conscience, agreeable to the true meaning of baptism.—4. That the devil goeth about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may swallow up; consequently, that evil spirits are now employed in tempting men; and that their purpose in tempting them is to destroy them, chap. v. 8.

As the design of this epistle is excellent, its execution, in the judgment of the best critics, does not fall short of its design. Ostervald says of the first epistle of Peter, "It is one of the finest books of the New Testament;" and of the second, "That it is a most excellent epistle, and is written with great strength and majesty."—Erasmus's opinion of Peter's first epistle is, "It is worthy of the Prince of the apostles, and full of apostolical dignity and authority." He adds, "It is (verbis parca, senten- tis, differta) sparing in words, but full of sense."—Lardner observes, that Peter's two epistles, with his discourses in the Acts, and the multitudes who were converted by these discourses, are monuments of a divine inspiration, and of the fulfilment of Christ's promise to Peter and Andrew, 'Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men.'

Peter's epistles, therefore, being of great and general use, and so excellently composed, should, like the other inspired writings, be read and studied by Christians in every age, with the utmost care; not only for comforting them under affliction, but for directing them to a right behaviour in all the different relations of life.

SECT. V.—Of the Place and Time of writing Peter's First Epistle.

FROM Peter's sending the salutation of the church at Babylon to the Christians in Pontus, it is generally believed that he wrote his first epistle in Babylon. But as there was a Babylon in Egypt, and a Babylon in Assyria, and a city to which the name of Babylon is given figuratively, Rev. xvii. xviii. namely Rome, the learned are not agreed which of them is the Babylon meant in the salutation.

Pearson, Mill, and Le Clerc think the apostle speaks of Babylon in Egypt. But if Peter had founded a church in the Egyptian Babylon, it would have been of some note. Yet, if we may believe Lardner, there is no mention made of any church or bishop at the Egyptian Babylon in any of the writers of the first four centuries; consequently, it is not the Babylon in the salutation.—Erasmus, Drusius, Beza, Lightfoot, Baasnage, Beausobre, Cave, Wetstein, and Benson think the apostle meant Babylon in Assyria. And, in support of this opinion, Benson observes, that the Assyrian Babylon being the metropolis of the eastern dispersion of the Jews, Peter, as an apostle of the circumcision, would very naturally, when he left Judea, go among the Jews at Babylon; and that it is not probable he would date his letter from a place by its figurative name. But Lardner says the Assyrian Babylon was almost deserted in the apostle's days; and adds, Can. vol. iii. p. 246. "If the Assyrian Babylon was not now subject to the Romans, but to the Parthians, which I suppose to be allowed by all, it cannot be the place intended by Peter: For the people to whom he writes were subject to the Romans; and, at the time of writing this epistle, he must have been within the territories of the same empire, 1 Eph. ii. 13, 14. 'Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; whether it be to the king, (or rather emperor), as supreme, or unto governors sent (from Rome) by him for the punishment of evil doers, and for the praise of them that do well.' Again, ver. 17. 'Honour the king;' or rather the emperor. If St. Peter had not now been within the Roman territories, he would have been led to express himself in a different manner when he enforced obedience to the Roman emperor.—St. Peter requires subjection to governors sent by the emperor; undoubtedly meaning from Rome. I suppose that way of speaking might be properly used in any part of the empire. But it might have a special propriety if the writer was then at Rome." To these particulars I add, that Peter's letter was only directed to the inhabitants of the Lesser Asia.

Whitby, Grotius, and all the learned of the Romish communion, are of opinion, that by Babylon Peter meant figuratively Rome, called Babylon by John likewise, Rev. xvii. xviii. And their opinion is confirmed by the general testimony of antiquity; which, as Lardner observes, is of no small weight.—Eusebius, E. H. lib. ii. c. 15. informs us, that Clemens, in the sixth book of his Institut-tions, and Papias, bishop of Jerusalem, said, that Mark's gospel was written at the request of Peter's hearers in Rome; and "that Peter makes mention of Mark in his first epistle, which was written at Rome itself. And that he (Peter) signifies this, calling that city, figuratively, Babylon, in these words, 'The church which is at Babylon, elected jointly with you, saluteth you. And so doth Mark my son.'" This passage Jerome transcribed in his book of illustrious men, (Art. Mark), from Eusebius, and adds positively, "That Peter mentions this Mark in his first epistle, figuratively denoting Rome by the name of Babylon: 'The church which is at Babylon,' &c. It is generally thought that Peter and John gave to Rome the name of Babylon figuratively, to signify that it would resemble Babylon in its idolatry, and in its opposition to anti-persecution of the church of God; and that, like Babylon, it will be utterly destroyed. These things, however, the inspired writers did not think fit to say plainly concerning Rome, for a reason which every reader may easily understand.

Concerning the time of writing this epistle, see Preface to 2 Peter, sect. 2.

CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Precepts and Doctrines contained in this Chapter.

To comfort the brethren of Pontus, &c. under their sufferings, St. Peter put them in mind of the glories of that inheritance of which they were the heirs, by thanking God for giving them the certain hope of a new life after death, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ, ver. 3.—in order that they may be capable of enjoying that incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading inheritance, which was preserved in heaven for them who, by the power of God, are guarded through faith to salvation, ver. 4, 5.—This, he said, might be matter of great joy to them, though they suffered persecution. Then, to reconcile them to their sufferings, he suggested various powerful persuasives: such as, that their sufferings would soon be over; that they were necessary to try and improve their faith; that the improvement of their faith would be of greater value to themselves and to the world, than the finest gold, and would procure them great honour at the revelation of Jesus Christ. All these arguments the apostle comprised in two short verses, 6, 7.—Then addressing their strongest feelings, he told them, that though they had never seen their Master, they loved him; and that though they did not see him now, yet believing him to be the Son of God, they rejoiced in him with joy unspeakable, ver. 8.—knowing, that from him they would assuredly receive the reward of their faith, even the eternal salvation of their souls, ver. 9.—And to shew the greatness and certainty of this salvation, he observed, that it had been foretold and accurately searched into by the prophets, who testified before the sufferings which the Christ was to undergo for our salvation, and the glories following his sufferings; and that the angels desired to look attentively into these things, ver. 10, 11, 12.—By mentioning the sufferings of Christ, and the glories following, the apostle insinuated, that if his disciples suffered patiently and courageously, after his example, they might expect to be rewarded as he was.

The apostle having thus comforted the persecuted brethren to whom he wrote, by recalling to their remembrance the great objects of their faith and hope, he exhorted them to hope strongly for the blessings that were to be brought to them at the revelation of Jesus Christ, ver. 13.—and, as became the children of God, the heirs of these great blessings, to avoid the lusts which they formerly indulged while unconverted, ver. 14.—and to imitate God in his holiness, ver. 15, 16.—and, from the consideration of the future judgment, to live in the fear of God, ver. 17.—knowing that they were redeemed from their wicked manner of living, not with silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ, as a sin-offering appointed by God himself before the foundation of the world, that their hope of pardon might be firmly founded in the unchangeable purpose of God, ver. 18-21.—Next, the apostle told the Christians of Pontus, that, seeing they had purified their hearts from fleshly lusts by receiving the gospel, and had attained sincere brotherly love, he hoped they would love one another always from a pure heart, as brethren, ver. 22.—a relation in which they stood to each other, by being born again as sons to God, through the incorruptible seed of the word: so that the poorest and meanest believer is not only the brother of every other believer, but he is a more noble and estimable person than the greatest prince on earth, who is not like him a son of God, ver. 23.—And in proof of this Peter observes, that the noblest earthly descent, and the highest titles of honour, are short-lived, like the flowers of the field, ver. 24.—but, that the more honourable nobility which is founded on the belief of the word of Christ, whereby men are made partakers of the nature of God, continues through all eternity, ver. 25.

CHAP. I.—1 Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ, to the sojourners of the dispersion of Pontus,¹ Galatia,² Cappadocia,³ Asia,⁴ and Bithynia,⁵ elected.⁶

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. I.—1 Peter, an apostle of Jesus Christ, to the Jewish and Gentile believers, (Preface, sect. iii.) who are sojourners dispersed through Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, the proconsular Asia, and Bithynia, elected.

Ver. 1.—1. Pontus.]—The kingdom properly called Pontus was possessed by six princes of the name of Mithridates, the last of whom, surnamed Eupator, waged war against the Romans many years, but being at last overcome, they seized his paternal kingdom and all his other dominions.—Pontus lay on the south side of the eastern part of the Euxine Sea, extending from the river Halys on the west to the country of Colchis on the east. In the time of the Roman Emperors, Pontus was distinguished into three parts.—The western division was called the Galatian Pontus, because southward it was bounded by a part of Galatia. The chief city of this division was Amisus.—The eastern division was called the Cappadocian Pontus, because on the south it was bounded by Cappadocia. Its chief city was Trapezus, which being peopled by a colony from Sinope, it was properly a Grecian city.—The middle division was called the Ptolemaion Pontus, and was separated from the Galatian Pontus by the river Thermoodon, beside which the Amazons are said to have dwelled.

2. Galatia,]—or Gallogræcia, was bounded on the west by Phry-gia; on the north by Paphlagonia and part of Pontus; on the east by the river Halys and a part of Cappadocia; and on the south by Lycaonia. It was called Galatia, from the Gauls, to whom Nicomedes king of Bithynia gave it as a reward for their having assisted him in his wars against his brother. See Pref. to Galatians, paragr. 1.—The chief cities of Galatia were Ancyra, now called Angora, Tavium, Germani, and Pessinus. In these cities it is supposed the churches of Galatia were planted, to whom the apostle Paul wrote his epistle which in our canon is inscribed to the churches of Galatia. It was a country of great extent, and in later times was governed by kings, as appears from Tully's oration in defence of Dejotarus, a king of Galatia, which is still extant in his works.

3. Cappadocia,]—The whole of the region lying on the south-east side of the Euxine Sea, and reaching downwards to Mount Taurus, was called Cappadocia. This country, when possessed by the Persians, was divided into two Satrapies, which afterwards were made two kingdoms by the Macedonian princes, Alexander's successors

2 According to the foreknowledge¹ of God the Father, (σ, 167.) through sanctification of the Spirit,² (σ, 147.) in order to obedience, and sprinkling of the blood³ of Jesus Christ: May grace and peace be multiplied to you.

3 Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his great mercy hath begotten us again¹ to a living hope, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead,²

4 To an inheritance incorruptible,¹ and undefiled, and unfading, preserved in the heavens² (σ) for us,

5 Who by the power of God are guarded,¹ through faith, to the salvation² prepared to be

2 According to the foreknowledge of God the Father, to be his people, through sanctification of the Spirit, in order to their giving obedience to the gospel and to their being sprinkled with the blood of Jesus Christ, as a token of their being admitted into the gospel covenant: May grace and peace be multiplied to you. See Rom. i. 7. notes 3, 4.

3 Praise be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who according to his great mercy hath begotten us, Jews and Gentiles, a second time to the hope of a new life after death, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead,

4 And to an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and unfading, preserved in the heavens for us, (so that it is better than any earthly inheritance),

5 Who by the power of God are safely guarded against Satan and his instruments our spiritual enemies, (1 Pet. v. 8.), through faith,

The one of these was called Pontus simply, and sometimes the Cappadocian Pontus already described. The other was called Cappadocia ad Taurum, the Great Cappadocia, and Cappadocia Proper. Cellarius says the inhabitants of Great Cappadocia were called Leucosyrians, and Syrians.—Under Archelaus and the princes who immediately preceded him, Cappadocia was divided into ten districts, five of which were near Mount Taurus, and five more remote. To these the Romans added, as an eleventh district, that part of Cilicia which was on the west of Taurus. Of this district the chief city was Mazaca, afterwards called Caesarea; and near it was the village Dacora, where Eumomius the Arian was born. The rest of Cilicia lying beyond the Taurus, was bounded by that mountain on the west and north, but on the south by the Mediterranean Sea, and on the east by Mount Amanus, which separated it from Armenia. The passes of this ridge of mountains are so strait, that Alexander with much difficulty marched his army through them, to fight the Persians.

4. Asia.—The last king of this country was Attalus, who, by his testament, bequeathed his kingdom to the Romans. He, like his predecessors, held his court in Pergamus, a city of Mysia. But when the Romans took possession of his dominions, they made Ephesus the seat of their government, which they administered first by a Prætor, and then by a Proconsul. According to Sigonius, the Roman province called Asia comprehended Mysia, Phrygia, Eolis, Ionia, Caria, Doris, Lydia, Lycæonia, and Pisidia, all which are on this side Mount Taurus. But Bithynia, Paphlagonia, Galatia, and Lycia, although on this side of Taurus, were not comprehended in the Roman province; for Lycia was given to the Rhodians, and the rest were governed by their own Tetrarchs, after whose extinction their countries were formed into a province distinct from that of Asia.—The countries on the other side of Taurus, namely, Pamphylia, Isauria, and Cilicia, were possessed by the kings of Syria, Alexander's successors.

5. Bithynia.—This country was anciently called Bebyrcia, from the Bebyrcæ, who inhabited it before they were expelled by the Thracians, Bithynians, and Thynians. On the west it was bounded by the Thracian Bosphorus, and a part of the Propontis; on the south, by the river Rhyndacus and Mount Olympus; on the north, by the Euxine Sea; on the east, its boundaries are fixed differently by different geographers. Pliny extends Bithynia to the river Parthenius; Ptolemy says it comprehended that part of Paphlagonia which lay on the Euxine Sea, but the southern part he ascribes to Galatia. The metropolis of Bithynia was Nicomedia, a city famous, not only under the kings of Bithynia, but under the emperors, particularly Diocletian, who had a palace there, the burning of which occasioned the tenth general persecution of the Christians.—Chalcedon, an ancient city in this country, situated on the Bosphorus, which divided Europe from Asia, was famous for the council which met in it, and condemned the Eutychian heresy.

From the foregoing account of the countries mentioned in the inscription of Peter's first epistle, it appears that it was written to the Christians who were dispersed through all the countries of the Lesser Asia. In these countries the apostle Paul had often preached, and had gathered many churches, to whom he afterwards wrote letters which still remain, and of which Peter hath made honourable mention, 2 Eph. iii. 15, 16.

6. Elected.—In the original, the word elected is prefixed to 'strangers of the dispersion;' yet, as it stands in concord with 'according to the foreknowledge of God,' it must in the translation be joined therewith, as in the English version.—The sojourners of the dispersion are said to have been 'elected according to the foreknowledge of God,' not because they were elected to eternal life. A letter directed in that manner, no one, as Lardner observes, could receive; because no one could be certain of his election to eternal life, till it was made sure by his final perseverance. But the persons to whom the apostle wrote were all, with propriety, said to be 'elected according to the foreknowledge of God, because agreeably to the original purposes of God discovered in the prophetic writings, Jews and Gentiles indiscriminately were made the visible church and people of God, and entitled to all the privileges of the people of God, by their believing the gospel. In this sense the word elected is used in other passages of scripture. See 1 Thess. i. 4. note 2.

Ver. 2.—1. According to the foreknowledge of God.—God's foreknowledge of all believers to be his people, was revealed in the covenant with Abraham. This the apostle mentions, to shew the Jews that the believing Gentiles were no intruders into the church of God: he determined from the beginning to make them his people.—See Rom. xi. 2. where God is said to have foreknown the whole Jewish nation; and 1 Pet. i. 20. where the sacrifice of Christ is said to be foreknown before the foundation of the world.

2. Through sanctification of the Spirit.—This being spoken of all the strangers of the dispersion without exception, it cannot mean their sanctification from sin, but their separation from their unbelieving brethren by their professing the gospel. Now this is called the 'sanctification of the Spirit,' because it had been brought to pass by the operation of the Spirit, who, having enabled the apostles to prove the divine original of the gospel by miracles, had persuaded the sojourners of the dispersion, not only to obey the gospel, but to be sprinkled emblematically with the blood of Jesus in token of their faith: so that, by their belief and profession of the gospel, they were totally separated, both from the unbelieving Jews and from the unbelieving Gentiles; a sense which the word sanctification often hath in scripture. See Ess. ix. 53.

3. And sprinkling of the blood of Jesus.—As the Israelites, after having declared their consent to the Sinaitic covenant, Exod. xxiv. 7. were formerly initiated into that covenant by being sprinkled with the blood of the sacrifices whereby it was ratified, so all who receive the gospel, being emblematically sprinkled with the blood of Jesus in the Lord's supper, are initiated into the gospel covenant, which was ratified by the shedding of the blood of Jesus as a sacrifice. Hence apostates themselves are said to have been 'sanctified by the blood of the covenant,' Heb. x. 29. Hence also it is said of Messiah, Isa. lii. 15. 'He shall sprinkle many nations:' he shall initiate many nations into the gospel covenant; in allusion to the sprinkling of the Israelites at Sinai.

Ver. 3.—1. Hath begotten us again to a living hope.—This is a Hebraism for a hope of life. Accordingly the Syriac version hath here, 'in spem vite—to an hope of life.' Believers of all nations are begotten to the hope of a new life after death, through the covenant of grace made with our first parents after the fall. To the same hope they are begotten a second time, through the resurrection of Christ from the dead. See the following note.

2. Through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.—Jesus having been put to death by the Jews for calling himself the Son of God, his resurrection was a declaration from God that he is his Son; and to shew this, God termed his raising him 'his begetting him,' Acts xiii. 33. Wherefore, Jesus having promised to return and raise the dead, his resurrection is both a proof and a pledge of our resurrection: on which account God is fully said to have begotten us again to the hope of life, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.

Ver. 4.—1. To an Inheritance incorruptible, &c.—Through the same resurrection, God hath begotten us to the hope of obtaining an inheritance incorruptible. This is that country which was promised to Abraham and to his spiritual seed under the emblem of Canaan, and which is called, 2 Pet. iii. 13. 'A new heavens and a new earth.'—This happy country is said to be incorruptible, because it shall neither be destroyed by the waters of a flood, nor by fire, as this earth hath been, and in the end will be.—Also it is said to be undefiled, because it shall not, like the earthly Canaan, be defiled with the sins of its inhabitants, Lev. xviii. 28. For into the heavenly country nothing shall enter that defileth, Rev. xxi. 27. Lastly, it is said to be unfading, because it will never wax old; and because its beauties will remain fresh through all eternity, and its pleasures will never become insipid by enjoyment.

2. Preserved in the heavens.—This inheritance is said to be 'in the heavens,' because of its excellence; and to be 'preserved there,' to denote its certainty and permanency. Or the expression may be understood literally, as an allusion to our Lord's words, 'I go to prepare a place for you.'—Accordingly in the following verse it is represented as already prepared to be revealed in the last time.

Ver. 5.—1. Who by the power of God are guarded (or defended) through faith.—The word σχεδιασμενος; signifies guarded in a garison. The term is very emphatical here. It represents believers as attacked by evil spirits and wicked men their enemies, but defended against their attacks by the power of God, through the influence of their faith, 1 John v. 4. just as those who remain in an impregnable fortress are secured from the attacks of their enemies by its ramparts and walls.

2. Salvation prepared to be revealed in the last time.—This salvation, in the opinion of some, is the deliverance from the destruction brought on the Jewish nation by the Romans, which the disciples of Christ obtained, by observing the signs mentioned in their Master's prophecy concerning that event. For when they saw these signs take place, they fled from Jerusalem to places of safety, agreeably to their Master's order, Matt. xxiv. 16. But what is said, ver. 9—12. concerning this salvation,—that it is a salvation, not of the body but of the soul, to be bestowed as the reward of faith; that the prophets who foretold this salvation, searched diligently among what revealed in the last time.

6 (Ev. 5, 167. 67.) On account of this, be exceeding glad, THOUGH for a little while still (since it is needful²) ye are made sorry by divers trials;

7 That the trying of your faith, much more precious than of gold¹ which perisheth (A, 100.) though proved by fire, may be found to praise, and honour, and glory, at the revelation² of Jesus Christ:

8 Whom not having seen¹ ye love;² on whom, not now looking,³ but believing,⁴ ye greatly rejoice IN HIM with joy unspeakable and full of glory;⁵

9 Receiving the reward¹ of your faith, EVEN the salvation² of your souls.

10 Concerning which salvation the prophets inquired accurately, and searched diligently, who have prophesied (μεν) concerning the grace TO BE BESTOWED on you.¹

11 Searching diligently¹ (α, 148.) of what PEOPLE, (α, 195.) and what kind of time, the Spirit of Christ who was in them² did signify, when he testified before the sufferings (α, 149.) of Christ, and the glories following³ these.

12 To them it was revealed, that not CONCERNING¹ themselves, but us, they ministered these things; which things have now been reported to you by them who have preached the will we obtain the salvation prepared to be revealed in the last time; the time of Christ's second coming.

6 On account of this great salvation firmly hoped for by you, be ye exceeding glad, though for a little while still (since it is necessary) ye are made sorry by divers afflictions sent on you as trials of your faith and hope;

7 That the trying of your faith, which is of much greater value to the world than the trying of gold which perisheth, though proved in the most perfect manner by fire, may be found to issue in praise to God, and in honour and glory to yourselves, at the revelation of Jesus Christ:

8 Whom, though ye never saw him, ye love; on whom, not now looking with your bodily eyes, but believing the accounts given of him by the eye-witnesses, ye greatly rejoice in him as your Saviour with joy unspeakable, and which will be full of glory to you at the judgment,

9 Because, like conquerors in the games, ye shall then receive (τινος) the reward of your faith, even the salvation of your souls.

10 Concerning the nature and manner of which salvation, the prophets themselves inquired accurately, and searched diligently, who have prophesied concerning the means by which, and the time when, the great blessings to be bestowed on you were to be procured.

11 In particular, they employed themselves in searching diligently, (α τινος, supply ας) of what people, and of what period of time, the Spirit of Christ who inspired them did signify, when by them he foretold the sufferings of Christ, and the glories which were to follow to him and to mankind after these sufferings.

12 In consequence of their searching, to them it was discovered, that not concerning themselves and their contemporaries, but concerning us, they foretold these things; which things have now been reported to you, as come to pass among us, by the apostles and other people and at what time the means of procuring it were to be accomplished; that it was revealed to the prophets that these means were to be accomplished, not among them, but among us; and that these things were preached by the apostles as actually come to pass;—I say the above-mentioned particulars, concerning the salvation to be revealed in the last time, do not agree to the deliverance of the Christians from the destruction of Jerusalem, but are applicable only to the salvation of believers in general from eternal death, by a resurrection to an immortal life in heaven at the time of Christ's coming, when this salvation is to be revealed; and that time is called the last time, because it will be the concluding scene of God's dispensations relating to our world.

Ver. 6.—1. Be exceeding glad.—So υπερλαλᾶτε is rendered by our translators, Matt. v. 12. Properly the word signifies to leap for joy.

2. Since it is needful.—From this we learn, that the people of God are never afflicted, except when it is necessary for their improvement in virtue, that they may become meet for the heavenly inheritance. What a consolation is this to the afflicted!

Ver. 7.—1. The proof of your faith, much more precious than of gold.—In the first age the Christians were subject to persecution and death, their faith being put to the severest trial, mankind might have, in their tried and persevering faith, what is infinitely more profitable to them than all the gold and silver in the world; namely, such an irrefragable demonstration of the truth of the facts on which the Christian religion is built, as will bring praise and honour and glory to God, and to the martyrs themselves, at the last day. For what can be more honourable to God, than that the persons whom he appointed to bear witness to the resurrection of Christ, and to the other miracles by which the gospel was established, sealed their testimony with their blood? Or, what greater evidence of the truth of these miracles can the world require, than that the persons who were eye-witnesses of them lost their estates, endured extreme tortures, and parted with their lives, for bearing testimony to them? Or, what greater felicity can these magnanimous heroes wish to receive, than that which shall be bestowed on them at the revelation of Jesus Christ, when their testimony shall be put beyond all doubt, their persecutors shall be punished, and themselves rewarded with the everlasting possession of heaven?

2. At the revelation of Jesus Christ.—When the first coming of Christ into our world is spoken of, the verb φανερω is commonly used, 1 Tim. iii. 16. 1 Pet. i. 20. 1 John i. 2. iii. 8. Yet, for a reason to be mentioned 1 John ii. 28. note 2. it is applied with peculiar propriety likewise, to denote Christ's coming to raise the dead and judge the world, which here, and ver. 13. and 1 Cor. i. 7. is termed ἀποκαλύψις, the revelation and the revelation of his glory, 1 Pet. iv. 13; because on that occasion, appearing in his own glory as the Son of God, and in the glory of his Father as Judge, attended by an host of angels, he will reveal or shew himself the Son of God and Judge of the world, and thereby overwhelm with inexpressible confusion all infidels and wicked men, who denied him to be the Son of God, and rejected his gospel; and will punish them with everlasting destruction, 2 Thess. i. 8.

Ver. 8.—1. Whom not having seen.—The word ὁρᾶν literally signifies known; but it sometimes signifies seen, Matt. ii. 2. εἰδέναι, 'we have seen his star in the east.' See also ver. 9, 10.—In this sense Thucydides likewise uses the word, as Wetstein has shewed.

2. Ye love;—namely, on account of his amiable character, and for the great benefits he hath bestowed on you.

3. On whom not now looking.—Here ἰσμεν; hath the sense of ὁρᾶμεν; by virtue of the preposition αἰ, which goes before in this clause.

4. But believing.—This is an allusion to our Lord's words to Thomas, John xx. 29. 'Because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed: Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed.'

5. And full of glory.—In support of this translation, Estius observes, that the participle δεικνύμενοι is put for the adjective. But Bengelius thinks the participle is used, in its proper signification, to denote that the joy of believers will be glorified, or rendered able, by Christ at the judgment.

Ver. 9.—1. Receiving the reward of your faith.—The word τιμῆς, rendered reward, properly signifies the end. But it is fitly translated reward, because, as Beza observes, the reward is the end for which any work is performed. See Rom. vi. 21. note.

2. The salvation of your souls.—See ver. 5. note 2.—The salvation to be accomplished by Messiah, was thought by the Jews to be a salvation from the Roman, and every foreign yoke. But that was only a salvation of their bodies. Whereas the salvation which believers expect from Christ is the salvation of their souls from sin, and of their bodies from the grave. See chap. iv. 6. note 2.

Ver. 10. Concerning the grace to be bestowed on you.—The original clause τῆς αἰς ἡμᾶς χάριτος, is an ellipsis of the same kind with ver. 11. τῆς αἰς Χριστοῦ παλάτης. But to render the sentence complete, the word ἀποδοχῆς must be supplied in both. By grace, Bengel understands the gospel revelation.

Ver. 11.—1. Searching diligently of what people, &c.—From this it appears, that in many instances the prophets did not understand the meaning of their own prophecies, but studied them, as others did, with great care, in order to find it out. See Dan. vii. 28. xii. 9. This care they used more especially in examining the prophecies which they uttered concerning the Christ, being extremely solicitous to know what people were to put him to death, and what time for that event the Spirit of Christ who was in them did signify, when he testified the sufferings, &c.; and by the assistance of the Spirit, they obtained the knowledge mentioned, ver. 12.

2. The Spirit of Christ who was in them.—Here Peter assures us, that the inspiration of the Jewish prophets was derived from Christ. It was his Spirit (see Gal. iv. 6. note) who spoke in them. The same Spirit he promised to his apostles, John xvi. 7. 13. Wherefore, the prophets and apostles, being inspired by one and the same Spirit, their doctrine must be, as in fact it is, the same.

3. The glories following.—The glories which followed the sufferings of Christ were,—1. The glory of his resurrection: 2. Of his ascension into heaven, and exaltation to the government of the universe: 3. Of his sending down the Holy Ghost on his apostles and disciples, to enable them to propagate the gospel effectually: 4. Of his returning to the earth, to raise the dead, and judge the world; and, 5. Of his introducing the spiritual seed of Abraham, in a body, into the heavenly country. These were the glories of which Christ himself spake, Luke xxiv. 26.

Ver. 12.—1. Concerning themselves.—Parkhurst, in his Grammar prefixed to his Dictionary, p. 73. observes, that in Greek the dative case is often governed by a preposition which is understood; and among the rest mentions αἰ, concerning. I have therefore supplied it in the translation of this passage, being authorized to do so by the context.

gospel to you with the Holy Ghost² sent down from heaven: into which things⁴ angels earnestly desire to look attentively.⁴

13 Wherefore, having the loins of your mind girded,¹ AND watching, do ye perfectly hope for the gift (πρεμιον, 12. 2.) to be brought to you (ε) at the revelation of Jesus Christ. (See ver. 7 note 2.)

14 As obedient children, do not fashion yourselves according to the former lusts, in your ignorance;¹

15 But as he who hath called you¹ is holy, be ye also holy in all your behaviour.

16 (Δαρι, 123.) For it is written, be ye holy, (ττ, 254.) because I am holy.

17 And seeing ye call on the Father, who, without respect of persons,¹ judgeth according to every man's work, pass the time of your sojourning² here in fear;

18 Knowing, that not with corruptible things, as silver and gold, ye were redeemed¹ from your foolish behaviour delivered to you by your fathers;²

19 But with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb¹ without blemish and without spot;

20 Foreknown indeed before the foundation of the world,¹ but manifested in these last times for you,

21 Who through him believe (ε) in God,¹

2. Who have preached the gospel to you with the Holy Ghost.]—It was Paul chiefly who preached the gospel to the persons to whom this epistle was written. Of him, therefore, and of his assistants, Peter speaks in this passage; and affirms, that he, with the rest of the apostles, in preaching and writing the doctrines of the gospel, were assisted by the Holy Ghost; and that in general the first preachers confirmed their testimony concerning their Master, by working miracles, and by exercising the spiritual gifts.

3. Into which things.]—namely, the sufferings of Christ, the glories following his sufferings, the nature of the salvation which he hath wrought for us by his death, the constitution of the Christian church, together with the prophecies and types in which all these things were foretold.

4. Angels desire to look attentively.]—Παρασπον, literally to stoop. But stooping being the action of one who desires to look narrowly into a thing, it is properly translated look attentively. The omission of the article before αγγελοι, renders the meaning more grand. Not any particular species of angels, but all the different orders of them, desire to look into the things foretold by the prophets, and preached by the apostles. See Eph. iii. 10.—This earnest desire of the angels to contemplate the sufferings of the Christ, was emblematically signified by the cherubim placed in the inward tabernacle with their faces turned down towards the mercy-seat, Exod. xxv. 20. To that emblem there is a plain allusion in the word παρασπον, to stoop. The apostle's meaning is, If our salvation, and the means by which it is accomplished, are of such importance as to merit the attention of angels, how much more do they merit our attention, who are so much interested in them?

Ver. 13. Loins of your mind girded.]—This is an allusion to the manners of the east, where, the men's garments being long and flowing, they prepared themselves for travelling, and other active employments, by tucking them up, and fastening them round their loins with a girdle, to prevent their being encumbered by them: Wherefore, the loins of the mind girded, is a bold but a most expressive metaphor to signify the faculties of the mind prepared for exerting themselves properly: Our mind must not be overcharged at any time with suffering and drunkenness; our affections must be placed on proper objects, and in a just degree; and our passions must all be under the government of our reason. St. Paul gives the same advice, Eph. vi. 14.; and so doth our Lord himself, Luke xii. 35.

Ver. 14. In your ignorance.]—This, I think, implies that some of the persons to whom Peter wrote had formerly been Gentiles. The commentators, however, who contend that this epistle was addressed to the Jews only, think that their state before their conversion might be called ignorance, in comparison of the greater knowledge they enjoyed under the gospel.

Ver. 15. Who hath called you is holy:]—Called you to his eternal glory as his children. So Peter himself explains this calling, 1 Pet. v. 10. See also chap. ii. 21. iii. 9.—As the heathens believe eye-witnesses who have preached the gospel to you with the power of the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, Acts ii. 3, 4. Into which things, angels earnestly desire to look attentively.

13 Your salvation being an object of attention even to angels, preserving the faculties of your mind in a fit condition to discern its greatness, and watching so as to avoid every thing that may hinder your salvation, do ye strongly, and to the end of your lives, hope for the gift of eternal life to be bestowed on you at the revelation of Jesus Christ

14 As becometh obedient children of God, and heirs of heaven, (ver. 4.), do not fashion your actions according to the lusts which formerly ruled you during your ignorance of God;

15 (Αλλα κατα τον) But as God, who hath called you his children, and thereby hath made you heirs of heaven, is holy, be ye also holy like him, in every thing ye say and do.

16 For it is written by Moses, Lev. xix. 2. as God's command to the Israelites his children, Be ye holy, because I am holy: I am free from sin and every kind of impurity, and I hate the workers of iniquity.

17 And seeing ye worship the Father of the universe, who, without considering whether men are Jews or Gentiles, rich or poor, kings or beggars, judgeth according to the nature of every man's doings, pass the time of your sojourning on earth in fear of that impartial judgment;

18 Especially as ye know, that not with corruptible things, as silver and gold, ye were delivered from your wicked, superstitious, sensual manner of living, which was taught you by your fathers, and from the miserable consequences of that kind of life;

19 But with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot. By dying, Christ hath obtained power to deliver sinners, both from the power and from the punishment of their sins.

20 The sacrifice of Christ was appointed of God, indeed, before the foundation of the world; but was offered in these last times of the Mosaic dispensation for you.

21 Who through his gospel believe in God, who raised him up their gods to be the patrons and practisers of all kinds of vice, the religious worship which they paid to their gods must have had a pernicious influence in corrupting their morals. Not so the worship which Christians paid to the true God, who, being perfectly free from evil, and the author as well as the possessor of moral excellence, is worthy of the imitation of his intelligent creatures. Besides, holiness is necessary to qualify us for living with God in his eternal kingdom, 2 Cor. vi. 1.

Ver. 17.—1. Without respect of persons.]—Here Peter repeats what he said to Cornelius, Acts x. 34. 'Respect of persons' is explained Rom. ii. 11. note. This can have no place with God, who hath nothing either to hope or fear from any of his creatures.

2. Pass the time of your sojourning.]—The word παρεοικω; properly signifies the stay which travellers make in a place, while finishing some business. The term, therefore, is applied with great propriety to the abode of the children of God in the present world, as it signifies that this earth is not their home, and that they are to remain in it only a short time. See Heb. xi. 13. note 5.

Ver. 18.—1. Not with corruptible things, as silver and gold, ye were redeemed.]—Properly speaking, to redeem means to procure life to a captive, or liberty to a slave, by paying a sum of money for them. In scripture, to redeem frequently signifies to deliver from any misfortune simply, without marking the means made use of for that purpose. See 1 Tim. ii. 6. note 1. In this sense the word is used in the passage before us.

2. Delivered to you by your fathers.]—The Jews derived from their fathers that implicit regard for the traditions of the elders, by which they made the law of God of none effect. In like manner, the Gentiles derived the idolatry and other vicious practices from the teaching and example of their fathers. For in general, as Whitby observes, the strongest argument for false religions, as well as for errors in the true, is, that men have received them from their fathers.

Ver. 19. As of a lamb without blemish.]—See Lev. xiii. 21, 22, where the things reckoned blemishes in the animals to be sacrificed are enumerated.—Αμωμος means without any excrescence, as αμωμος means without any defect. The sacrifice of himself, which Christ offered to God without spot, being here likened to the sacrifice of the paschal lamb, and to the lambs daily offered as sin-offerings for the whole nation, we are thereby taught, that the shedding of Christ's blood is a real atonement for the sins of the world. Hence John Baptist called him 'the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world.' And to shew the extent of the efficacy of his atonement, he is said to be 'a lamb slain from the foundation of the world.' Rev. xiii. 8.

Ver. 20. Foreknown indeed before, &c.]—See the illustration prefixed to Rom. v. paragraph 3. from the end.

Ver. 21. Who through him believe in God.]—The Gentiles might justly be said to have believed in God through the ministry of Christ and of his apostles, because, before the gospel was preached to who raised him up from the dead, and gave him glory, that your faith and hope might be in God.

22 WHEREFORE, having purified your souls (v. 65.) by obeying the truth through the Spirit, to unfeigned brotherly love, ye will love one another (u.) from a pure heart continually:¹

23 Having been regenerated,¹ not of corruptible seed, but incorruptible, (isa. 113.) through the word of the living God,² (isa. 219.) which remaineth for ever.³

24 (isa. 123.) For all flesh is as grass,¹ and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower of it falleth down:

25 But (quæ) the word of the Lord remaineth for ever. (isa. 103.) Now this is that word which is preached to you.

from the dead, and gave him the glory of sitting at his own right hand, as Saviour and King, that your faith in him, and hope of eternal life, might be founded in the power and veracity of God.

22 Wherefore, having purified your souls by embracing the gospel through the influence of the Spirit, (this sentiment Peter delivered in the council, Acts xv. 8, 9.), so as to have attained an unfeigned love of your Christian brethren, ye will without doubt love one another, not from a carnal passion, but from a pure heart continually:

23 Having all been regenerated as sons to God, not of corruptible seed, but incorruptible, namely, through the word of the living God, which, with its offspring, doth not, like the corruptible seed with its offspring, remain only in the present world, but for ever.

24 For, as Isaiah hath said, ch. xl. 6. 8. every thing pertaining to our flesh is weak and perishing like grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass. The grass withereth, and the flower of it falleth down; so the noblest races of mankind, with all their glory, quickly decay:

25 But the word of the Lord, the incorruptible seed, with the noble nature which it conveys to its offspring, remaineth for ever. Now this word is that gospel which is preached to you by us apostles.

them, they were utterly ignorant of the true God. But this could not be said of the Jews.

Ver. 22. From a pure heart continually.—So the original word ἐκ is translated in our Bibles: Acts xii. 5. 'Prayer was made (ἐκ) without ceasing of the church unto God for him.'—Peter's description of Christian love is excellent. It springs up in a heart purified by truth through the assistance of the Spirit, it is sincere in its operation, it is unmix'd with carnal passions, and it is permanent.

Ver. 23.—1. Having been regenerated.—In this expression the apostle insinuated to the Jews, that they were not the children of God and heirs of immortality by their being begotten of Abraham, nor by their obeying the law of Moses, but by their being begotten of the incorruptible seed of the preached word of the living God. See ver. 25. The same thing our Lord declared to Nicodemus, when he told him, John iii. 5. 'Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.' See 1 John ii. 29. note 1.

2. But incorruptible, through the word of the living God:—So the clause ἐκ ἀβύσσου ζωῆς θεοῦ should be translated. The incorruptible seed, through which believers are born again, is not bodily seed, but 'the word of the living God,' the doctrines of the gospel. These are called the word of God, because they were given to Christ by God; and are said to be incorruptible, because they are never to be altered.

3. Which remaineth for ever.—I acknowledge that ἀβύσσου ζωῆς θεοῦ καὶ ἀνθρώπων ἐκ τῆς ἀβύσσου may be translated 'the word of God who liveth and remaineth for ever.' But as in ver. 25. after telling us that 'the word of the Lord remaineth for ever,' the apostle adds, 'Now this is that word which is preached to you,' he plainly shews that his meaning in this verse is, not that God, but that his word remaineth for ever.—The incorruptible seed, the word of God, differeth entirely from the corruptible seed which produceth the human body. For whereas that seed, with the high birth and other distinctions which it conveys to those who are born from it, remaineth only during the present life, the incorruptible seed together with the new and noble nature which it conveys to them who are born from it, will remain through all eternity.

Ver. 24. All flesh is as grass.—The word χρῆμα denotes not only grass, but all kinds of herbs; and among the rest those which have stalks and flowers. Nay, it seems to be used for shrubs, Matt. vi. 30.—This is a quotation from isa. xl. 6—8, where the preaching of the gospel is foretold, and recommended from the consideration that every thing which is merely human, and among the rest the noblest races of mankind, with all their glory and grandeur, their honour, riches, beauty, strength, and eloquence; as also the arts which men have invented, and the works they have executed, all decay as the flowers of the field. But the incorruptible seed, the gospel, called by the prophet 'the word of the Lord,' shall be preached while the world standeth; and the divine nature, which it is the instrument of conveying to believers, will remain in them to all eternity.—James likewise hath illustrated the brevity and uncertainty of human life with its glory, by the same figures, chap. i. 11. See also chap. iv. 14. note.

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Directions in this Chapter.

It being of great importance in the first age, that the disciples of Christ, by a holy and virtuous behaviour, should confute the calumnies of their adversaries, who charged them with all manner of crimes, the apostle Peter earnestly exhorted the brethren of Pontus, from the consideration of their character and dignity as the children of God, described in the preceding chapter, to lay aside all malice, guile, hypocrisies, envyings, and calumnies, things utterly inconsistent with brotherly love, ver. 1.—And, as new-born babes, by the unadulterated milk of the word of God, to nourish the divine nature in themselves to maturity, ver. 2, 3.—that they might be fit to be built into the temple of God, as living stones, upon the foundation Christ, ver. 4.—agreeably to what Isaiah foretold, ver. 6.—And to encourage them he observed, that to all who believe, the great honour belongs of being built into the temple of God, as consistent parts thereof; whereas all who refuse to believe in Christ are not only dishonourable but miserable, ver. 7.—because they are to be broken in pieces by Christ, the stone against which they stumble, ver. 8.—Next, he told both Jews and Gentiles, that by their believing on Christ, being built up into a temple for the worship of God, all the honourable titles formerly appropriated to the Jews, as the visible church and people of God, now belong to them, ver. 9.—so that the Gentiles in particular were much more happy, as members of the church of Christ, than ever they had been in their heathen state, ver. 10.—And seeing they were now become constituent parts of the temple of God, he earnestly exhorted them to abstain from fleshly lusts, ver. 11.—and to have their behaviour comely in the eyes of the Gentiles, who, by their holy lives, would be sensible of the falsehood of the calumnies uttered against the Christians, ver. 12.—In particular, they were in every thing innocent to obey the heathen magistrates of all denominations, because their office required them to punish the bad and reward the good, ver. 13, 14.—Thus, to shew themselves good subjects, he told them, was the most effectual method of silencing those foolish men who slandered them as seditious persons, ver. 15.—This advice, I suppose, was intended more especially for the Jewish Christians, to prevent them from joining their unbelieving brethren in the rebellion against the Romans, which was ready to break out about the time the apostle wrote his letter.—See the Illustr. prefixed to James, chap. iv.—Farther, because many who had embraced the gospel fancied that they were thereby freed from obeying the heathen laws, the apostle told them plainly, that the freedom bestowed on them by the gospel was a spiritual, not a political freedom; and ordered them not to use that freedom as a cloak for wickedness, but to behave as the bondmen of God, who enjoined them to obey their earthly masters, ver. 16.—Next, because the Jewish zealots affirmed, that no obedience was due from the people of God to the emperor, or any other prince who was not of their religion, and who did not govern them according to the law of Moses, the apostle commanded them to pay to all men the honour which was due to them on account of their rank, or office, or personal merit; to love the brotherhood; to fear God; and to honour the emperor.

Having thus enjoined such of the Christians as were freemen to obey the heathen magistrates in all things consistent with their obedience to Christ, St. Peter proceeded to direct such of them as were slaves to obey their masters in the same manner, with all reverence, whether they were believers or unbelievers, and whether they were gentle in their manners or froward, ver. 18.—assuring them, that it was an acceptable thing to God if a slave, from a principle of religion, suffered bad usage patiently, ver. 19, 20.—And that they were called to patience under unjust sufferings, from the example of Christ, who, though he was a person of such dignity and power, submitted to suffer wrongfully for our sakes, leaving us, when he returned to heaven, an example that we should follow his steps, ver. 21.—Farther, that the example of Christ in suffering injurious treatment patiently might make the deeper impression upon them, he gave them an account of his innocence, sincerity, willingness to forgive injuries, and self-government, ver. 22, 23.—and of the end for which he suffered, namely, that we, being freed from the dominion of sin, might have faith counted to us for righteousness, who have been healed by Christ's stripes, ver. 24.—Lastly, by observing that the sojourners of the dispersion had been as sheep going astray, but were now returned to the shepherd and overseer of their souls, he insinuated the obligation which lay on them to obey and imitate Christ, their shepherd and overseer, in all things, ver. 25.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. II.—1 Seeing ye are born again through the incorruptible seed of the word, laying aside every degree of ill-will, and every kind of guile, not excepting flattery and insincere compliments, and hypocrisies in religion, and envyings of the prosperity of others, and every kind of evil speaking,

2 As new-born children of God earnestly desire the unadulterated milk of the gospel doctrine, that ye may grow thereby to the proper stature and strength of the children of God.

3 This desire will be strong in you, because indeed ye have tasted, in the unadulterated milk of the word, that the Lord Jesus, in what he hath already done, and in what he is still to do for you, is good to you.

4 To whom coming by faith as to a living foundation-stone, rejected indeed of the Jewish builders, the chief priests and scribes, but chosen by God to be the chief corner foundation-stone of his temple, and therefore a precious stone,

5 Ye also, as living stones, are built up on him, so as to make a

Ver. 2.—1. As new-born babes.]—Wolfius observes, that the Jewish doctors were wont to call new proselytes little children, and new-born babes. The apostle Peter gave the Christians of Pontus the latter appellation, perhaps, because many of them were but newly converted.

2. The unadulterated milk of the word.]—Because the offering of our bodies living sacrifices to God is called, Rom. xii. 1. λογικὴ λατρεία, our 'reasonable worship,' some critics, following the Vulgate version, translate λογικὸν ἀδόλαν γάλα in this passage, 'the unadulterated rational milk.' But as λογός is often used in scripture to denote the word of God preached, the translation in our English Bible is perfectly just.—By adding the epithet ἀδόλαν, unadulterated, the apostle hath taught us that the milk of the word will not nourish the divine nature in those who use it, if it is adulterated with human mixtures.

3. That ye may grow thereby.]—In the former chapter the apostle told the Christians of Pontus, that they were born again of the incorruptible seed of the word. Here he told them, that the word is also the milk by which the new-born grow to maturity. The word, therefore, is both the principle by which the divine life is produced, and the food by which it is nourished.

Ver. 3. Tasted that the Lord is good.]—Vulgata, dulcis, sœpet. This is an allusion to Psalm xxiv. 8. 'O taste and see that the Lord is good.' The goodness of the Lord, which the new-born taste in the milk of his word, is his goodness in promising to forgive their sins, and to raise them from the dead, and to bestow upon them the incorruptible inheritance, and to give them in the present life every thing necessary to prepare them for enjoying that inheritance.

Ver. 4.—1. To whom coming as to a living stone.]—Here St. Peter had in his eye Isa. xxviii. 16. where the formation of the Christian church, for the spiritual worship of God, is foretold under the image of a temple which God was to build on Messiah as the foundation-stone thereof: 'Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation.'

The apostle here terms the Lord Christ a living stone, to show that the temple of which he is the foundation is built of living men, and represents their entering into the Christian church by their coming to this living stone, to be built thereon as living stones. Withal, to show that this is his meaning, he adds, ver. 5. 'Ye also, as living stones, are built up a spiritual temple.'—The laying this precious corner-stone in Zion for a foundation, signifies that the Christian church, the new temple of God, was to begin in Jerusalem. See ver. 6. note 2.—The apostle Paul likewise, in allusion to Isaiah's prophecy represents the Christian church, Eph. ii. 20. as a great temple 'built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone thereof.'

2. Rejected indeed of men.]—By calling the Lord Christ a living stone who was rejected of men, Peter intimates that he is the person spoken of Psal. cxviii. 22. 'The stone which the builders refused, is become the head stone of the corner.' 23. This is the doing of the Lord, and it is marvellous in our eyes.' In applying this prophecy to Christ, the apostle was authorized by Christ himself, who said to the chief priests and elders, Matt. xxi. 42. Did ye never read in the scriptures, 'the stone which the builders rejected,' &c. For by proposing this question, after he had delivered, in the hearing of the chief priests and elders, the parable of the vineyard let out to husbandmen, who put the Lord of the vineyard's son to death, and who for that crime were destroyed by the armies of the Lord of the vineyard; also by adding, that the kingdom of God should be taken from them and given to another nation, Christ intimated, that the chief priests and elders were the builders spoken of Psal. cxviii. 22. (see the following ver. 7. note 3.): that the stone which they rejected was Messiah, God's Son: that their rejection of that stone consisted in their refusing to acknowledge Christ as the foundation of the new temple of God foretold to be laid in Zion: and that the taking of the kingdom of God from them because they crucified Christ, meant that the Jews were no longer to be the visible church and people of God, but that another nation was to obtain that honour.

3. But chosen of God.]—Although the Jewish builders rejected Christ, the stone which God laid in Zion for the foundation of his new temple, yet he was chosen of God to be both the chief corner-stone in the foundation of God's temple, whereby the two sides of the building were united, and the top corner-stone by which the building was completed.

4. And precious.]—Isaiah termed the tried stone which God laid in Zion for a sure foundation precious, to signify its excellence and efficacy in supporting the great temple of God, the Christian church, built thereon.

Ver. 5.—1. Ye also, as living stones.]—Because the Hebrews used the epithet living to denote excellence, (Ess. iv. 50.), living stones in this and the preceding verse, are by some thought to mean excellent stones. Nevertheless, as the Christian church is built upon Christ and his apostles, and consists of living men, I think the word living may be understood literally, so as to distinguish the Christian church, the spiritual temple of God, both from the temples of idols and from the temple of Jerusalem, which were built of nothing but dead materials.

spiritual temple,² an holy priesthood,¹ to offer spiritual sacrifices, most acceptable to God, through Jesus Christ.

6 (Δὲ καὶ) For even it is contained in the scripture¹ (Isa. xxviii. 16.), Behold, I lay in Zion a chief corner-stone,² elected, precious; and he who believeth on him³ shall not be ashamed. (See Rom. ix. 33. commentary.)

7 To you, therefore, who believe, is (ἡ, 71.) this honour;¹ but to the disobedient,² the stone which the builders rejected,³ the same is become the head of the corner;

8 Also a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence.¹ The disobedient stumble against the word, to which (καὶ, 218.) verily they were appointed.²

9 But ye are an elected race, (see chap. i. 1. note 3.) a kingly priesthood, an holy nation, (see Ess. iv. 48.) a purchased people, that ye should declare the perfections¹ of him who hath spiritual temple. Ye are also an holy priesthood, appointed by him to offer in that temple spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise; sacrifices most acceptable to God, through the mediation of Jesus Christ.

6 In calling Christ the foundation of the temple of God, I speak truth. For even it is contained in the scripture, Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation of the new temple of God, a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation; he that believeth on him shall not make haste.

7 To you, therefore, who believe, is this honour of being built on him, and of not being ashamed; but to the disobedient is the dishonour written, Psal. cxviii. 22. The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner of God's temple:

8 Also it is become a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence, to both houses of Israel. The disobedient stumble against the word, and fall, and shall be broken; to which punishment verily they were appointed.

9 But ye who believe have not stumbled against the stone of stumbling, so that the high titles given to God's ancient people belong to you, whether ye be Jews or Gentiles: Ye are an elected race, Deut. vii. 6.—a kingly priesthood, an holy nation, Exod. xix.

2. A spiritual temple.]—The word οἶκος, house, often signifies a temple. See 1 Tim. iii. 15. and note 2. on Eph. ii. 21. where it is shewed in what sense the Christian church is the temple of God.

3. An holy priesthood.]—ἱερεῖον, properly, is a college or company of priests. Christians are called a priesthood, in the same sense that the Israelites were called 'a kingdom of priests,' Exod. xix. 6. They are called likewise 'a kingly priesthood,' 1 Pet. ii. 9. perhaps on account of that pre-eminence over others to which they shall be raised in the life to come. Hence they are said, Rev. i. 6. to be made kings as well as priests. The apostle's design in giving these titles to Christians is to shew, that in the Christian church or temple there is no need of the mediation of priests to present our prayers to God. Every sincere worshipper has access to the Father through Christ, as if he were really a priest himself. The sacrifices which the Christian priests offer to God, are described Heb. xiii. 15.

Ver. 6.—1. It is contained in the scripture.]—Beza thinks the active verb ποιεῖται is put for the passive ποιεῖται, because in the Syriac version the translation is, 'Dicitur in scriptura.' Others think that the reading of the Vulgate version, 'Propter quod continet scriptura,' should be adopted, because some ancient MSS. have ποιεῖται γὰρ; a reading which Estius suspects was formed on the Vulgate. See Mill.

2. Behold I lay in Zion a chief corner-stone:]—a principal corner-stone in the foundation, for uniting the two sides of the building. This, as explained Eph. ii. 21. signifies the union of Jews and Gentiles in one faith, baptism, and hope, so as to form one church or temple for the worship of God, through the mediation of Jesus Christ.—This chief corner-stone is said, ver. 8. to be the stone of stumbling and the rock of offence, foretold Isaiah vii. 14. against which 'many were to stumble, and fall, and be broken,' Isaiah xviii. 16. Wherefore, this chief corner-stone was a crucified Christ or Messiah; and it is said to be 'laid in Zion,' that is, in Jerusalem, because there Messiah was crucified, and by his death abolished the Jewish church, and laid the foundation of the new temple of God, the Christian church, agreeably to Isaiah ii. 3. 'Out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem.' All which was so offensive to the Jews, that most of them rejected the gospel, on which account their nation was broken and their temple destroyed.

3. He who believeth on him.]—Some translate ὁ πιστεύων ἐν αὐτῷ, 'he who confideth in it.' But the common translation is supported by ver. 7.

Ver. 7.—1. To you, therefore, who believe, is this honour:]—the honour of being built on Christ, the foundation or chief corner-stone of the new temple of God.

2. But to the disobedient, (ἀδυν ὁν) the stone which, &c.]—Because it is difficult to know how ἀδυν comes to be put here in the accusative case, our translators are supposed to have followed the reading of some MSS., which instead of ἀδυν have ἀδύς: but such a reading is unnecessary, in regard that, according to the common reading, the apostle hath quoted the passage exactly as it stands in the LXX. translation of Psal. cxviii. 22. where, to complete the construction, the preposition κατὰ must be supplied thus, κατὰ τὴν ἀδύν ὁν, &c. with respect to the stone which the builders rejected, &c. Now in quoting that passage, if the words are exactly quoted, it is by no means necessary that they should accord in their construction with the words of the context where they are inserted. This every reader who is skilled in the Greek language must allow. Wherefore the apostle's meaning is fully expressed in the commentary; for it was a great dishonour to the person who refused to be built on the rejected foundation corner-stone, that that stone is become the head of the corner of God's new temple, the Christian church.

3. The builders rejected.]—The Jewish chief priests, elders and scribes, are called builders, because in the oracles of God, of which they were the keepers, having the coming of Christ, the demolition of the Jewish church, and the erection of the Christian in its place, all foretold, they ought to have been active in building the new temple of God on Christ the foundation-stone. Nevertheless they zealously upheld the ancient fabric, and utterly rejected Christ and his claim to be the foundation of God's new temple; and, to annihilate his claim, they impiously put him to death as an impostor;

But without effect: For, notwithstanding their opposition, he is become the head of the corner.

Ver. 8.—1. Also a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence.]—The apostle means, that to the disobedient there is this dishonour likewise, which is mentioned Isa. vii. 14. namely, that Christ is a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence, on which the disobedient shall fall and be broken.

2. The disobedient stumble against the word, to which verily they were appointed.]—In our Bible the translation is, 'and a rock of offence, even to them which stumble at the word, being disobedient, whereunto also they were appointed;' which implies that the disobedient were appointed to be disobedient. But the original, which runs thus, 'Οἱ ἀπειθεῖς τῷ λόγῳ ἀπειθεῖντες, εἰς ἃ καὶ ἐτίθενται,' does not convey that idea. For the words in construction stand connected in this manner, 'Οἱ ἀπειθεῖς τῷ λόγῳ ἀπειθεῖντες, εἰς ἃ καὶ ἐτίθενται.' The disobedient stumble against the word, to which verily they were appointed.' They were appointed to stumble against the word, but not to be disobedient. Now, to understand what the apostle means by the disobedient's stumbling against the word, let it be observed, first, That the stone of stumbling, and the rock of offence, Isa. vii. 14. is the same with the chief corner-stone laid in Zion, Isa. xlviii. 16. called, in chap. vii. 14. 'a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence,' because it was rejected by the Jewish builders, and lay in the way of the disobedient.—Secondly, Since the chief corner-stone which the builders rejected signifies Christ, the stone of stumbling and rock of offence must signify Christ likewise. And therefore, when the apostle says, 'the disobedient stumble against the word,' he does not mean that they stumbled against the preached word, but against Christ himself, one of whose titles is ὁ λόγος, the word.—Thirdly, to understand what Peter means by the disobedient's being appointed to stumble against the word, let it be observed, that he alludes to Isa. vii. 15. where it is said, 'And many among them shall stumble, and fall, and shall be broken;' consequently their being appointed to stumble must be taken in connexion with the words, 'and fall, and shall be broken,' which follow in the same sentence, but which the apostle hath not expressed, because being well known to his Jewish readers, he supposed they would naturally occur to them. On this supposition the apostle's meaning will be, either that the disobedient were appointed to stumble and fall, or that they were appointed to be broken, as the consequence and punishment of their stumbling and falling. That this latter sense is the apostle's meaning, I think plain from what our Lord said to the chief priests and elders in explication of Isaiah's prophecy, chap. vii. 15. 'He shall be—for a stone of stumbling—to both the houses of Israel. 15. And many among them shall stumble, and fall, and be broken.' For having told them that God's Son is the stone which the builders rejected, and that the builders were to be destroyed for that crime, (see 1 Pet. ii. 4. note 2.) he added, that this punishment was foretold in the passage of Isaiah quoted above: Matt. xxi. 44. 'Whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder.' Christ being both the chief foundation corner-stone and the top corner-stone, whosoever through heedlessness falls on the foundation corner-stone, rejected and laid in his way by the builders, shall, as the appointed consequence and punishment of his falling, be broken or destroyed: but whosoever maliciously endeavours to pull down the top corner-stone from its place, it will fall on him and 'grind him to powder.' This meaning of the clause, 'stumble against the word, to which verily they were appointed,' would plainly appear, if Isaiah's words, quoted by the apostle, were set down at full length in the translation, as follows: 'The disobedient stumble against the word, and fall, and shall be broken, to which verily they were appointed.' They were appointed to be broken in consequence of their stumbling and falling, and as the punishment thereof, but were not appointed to stumble. Or, since the Hebrews used active verbs to express merely the permission of a thing, Ess. iv. 4. we may understand the apostle's meaning to be, That the disobedient were permitted to stumble, and fall, and be broken, as the punishment of their disobedience.—The first interpretation, however, being more grammatical, should be preferred.

the wisdom, goodness, justice, and truth of God, who hath called you; in allusion to Isa. xliii. 21. LXX.

2. Called you from darkness into his marvellous light.—Darkness was the peculiar characteristic of the state of the Gentiles: Acts xvi. 18. "To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light." This, with verse 10, shews plainly that the sojourners of the dispersion, to whom Peter wrote this epistle, were many of them Gentile believers. The light of the gospel is called marvellous light, because of the many wonderful things it discovers.—Benson says, "The cloud of glory was a marvellous light to the Israelites in their passage through the wilderness. Christianity is a more excellent light, to guide us through the wilderness of this world to the heavenly country."

Ver. 10.—1. Who formerly were not a people, but now, &c.—This is a quotation from Hosea ii. 23. where the conversion of the Gentiles is foretold, as the apostle Paul informs us. See Rom. ix. 25. note 1, 2.

2. Who had not obtained mercy.—Any great favour bestowed on men by God is called mercy: In particular, mercy, Rom. xi. 31. signifies the great favour of being introduced into the visible church.

Ver. 11. As sojourners and travellers, abstain.—The settled inhabitants of a country are anxious to acquire riches, to purchase lands, and to build houses. But they who stay but a few weeks in a country, or who only travel through it, are not commonly solicitous to secure to themselves accommodations which they are so soon to leave. In the same manner, believers being only sojourners on earth, and travellers to a better country, ought not to place their happiness in the enjoyment of those objects by which the lusts of the flesh are gratified, and which are peculiar to this earthly state, but in securing themselves possessions in the heavenly country, the proper habitation of the righteous.

Ver. 12.—1. Speak against you as evil-doers.—See Preface, sect. 3. The calumnies which the heathens spread concerning the Christians, is termed a speaking against them, because what they said was greatly to their dishonour.

2. Of your good works,—namely, your obedience to the just laws of the state, your submission to magistrates, and your patience and meekness when unjustly punished.

3. May glorify God in the day of visitation,—that is, in the time of persecution. For a time of great affliction and suffering is called "a day of visitation," Isa. x. 3. And when God afflicts, he is said to visit, Jer. vi. 15.—It is well known, that the patience, fortitude, and meekness with which the first Christians bore persecution for their religion, and the forgiving disposition which they expressed towards their persecutors, made such an impression on the heathens who were witnesses to their sufferings, that many of them glorified God by embracing the gospel.

Ver. 13.—1. Every human creation of magistrates.—So I supply and translate πᾶσι ἀνθρώπων κτίσις, because both Greeks and Ro-

10 Who formerly were not a people of God, being worshippers of idols, but now are a people of God, having subjected yourselves to his government; who had not obtained the benefit of an external revelation, but now have obtained that mercy jointly with the Jews.

11 Beloved, I beseech you, as sojourners and travellers who have no inheritance on this earth, but are travelling to the heavenly country, abstain from indulging fleshly lusts, which, though pleasant to the senses, are deadly enemies to the soul.

12 Have your behaviour among the unbelieving Gentiles comely, especially towards magistrates, that whereas they speak against you as seditious persons and atheists, because ye do not worship their false gods, when they behold many of your good actions they may glorify God in the day of persecution, by acknowledging the truth concerning your behaviour.

13 Be ye subject, therefore, to every magistrate of human creation, from a regard to the will of Christ; whether it be to the emperor as the supreme magistrate,

14 Or to the governors of provinces, as persons sent by the emperor, for the punishing indeed of evil-doers, but for protecting and rewarding them who give due obedience to the good laws of the state.

15 For by inspiration I assure you so is the will of God, that, obeying the magistrates, ye put to silence those ignorant wicked men who affirm that your religion makes you bad subjects.

16 Your religion frees you only from sinful laws. With respect to these, live as freemen, and do not make your freedom from them a covering of disobedience to rulers: But live as bondmen of God, observing all his laws.

17 Honour all your superiors: Love your Christian brethren: Fear God: Honour the emperor as the minister of God for good to the people, by protecting the virtuous and restraining the vicious.

18 Household slaves, be subject to your own lords with all reverence, although they be unbelievers; and give obedience not only to the humane and gentle, but also to the ill-natured and severe.

mans called the appointment of magistrates a creation of them. In this passage the abstract word creation is put for the concrete, the person created; just as governments and powers are put for the persons exercising government and power. The phrase "human creation of magistrates," was formed by St. Peter with a view to condemn the principles of the zealots, who maintained that obedience was due to no magistrates but to those who were appointed by God, as the Jewish kings had been.

2. Whether to the king,—that is, to the emperor. For though at Rome the name of king was odious, the people in the provinces gave that name to the emperor, John xix. 15. Acts xvii. 7.—At the time this epistle was written, Nero was emperor.

Ver. 14. Or to governors, as those sent by him.—See Pref. sect. 5. paragr. 2. From the precepts given to the brethren of Pontus in this and the preceding verse we learn, that it is the duty of Christians residing in foreign, and even in infidel countries, to obey the laws of these countries in all things not sinful, without considering whether the religion of the magistrate and of the state be true or false.

Ver. 15. Put to silence.—ἄφρων properly signifies to muzzle a beast to hinder it from eating, or from biting, 1 Tim. v. 18.

Ver. 16.—1. Live as freemen.—The Jews boasted in their having been at all times freemen; that is, in having been always governed by their own laws, John viii. 33. In this sense, the precept live as freemen, means, live according to the rules of your religion, free from complying with the established idolatry.

2. A covering of wickedness.—Though κακία often signifies malignancy, it also signifies wickedness in general. In this passage it means disobedience to magistrates, as is plain from the subsequent verses.

Ver. 17.—1. Honour all your superiors.—As the adjective παύτας hath no substantive expressed, the word to be supplied is not ἀνθρώπων, men, but ἐκκλησιῶν, all having dignity or power.

2. Honour the king.—The honour which subjects owe to magistrates and other superiors, consists not only in paying them outward respect according to the custom of the country, but in giving due obedience to their commands, in so far as it can be done consistently with our duty to God, whom we are bound, in the first place, to honour and fear.—This verse is a beautiful instance of the nervous laconic style, in which a great deal is expressed in the fewest words possible.

Ver. 18.—1. Household servants, be subject to your own lords.—See Col. iii. 22. note. The slaves who were employed in the house, were more exposed to suffer from the vices and bad temper of their masters than those in the field. Wherefore, to reconcile them to their lot, the apostle called them domestics rather than slaves, in imitation of the Romans, who, as Macrobius informs us, "to take away all envy from the masters, and all reproach from the slaves, called the former Pater-familias, and the latter familiares." Saturnal. lib. i. c. 11.

19 For this is an acceptable thing, (see ver. 20. note 3.), if any one, from conscience of God's COMMAND, sustains sorrows, suffering unjustly.¹

20 But what praise! IS DUE, if, when ye commit faults and are buffeted, ye bear IT patiently! Yet, if when ye do well,² and suffer, ye bear IT patiently, this is an acceptable thing³ with God.

21 (Tag, 91.) Besides, to this ye were called: (τα, 256.) for even Christ suffered for us,¹ leaving us a pattern² that ye should follow IN his footsteps;

22 Who did no sin, neither was guile¹ found (see Philip. ii. 8. note 1.) in his mouth;

23 Who, when he was reviled, did not revile in return; when he suffered, he did not threaten,¹ but committed (Syriac, causam suam) HIS CAUSE to him who judgeth righteously.

24 He (αυτος, 65.) himself bare¹ our sins in his own body on the tree, that we, (απορριμνοι) being freed from sins,² should live (τα δικαιουν) to righteousness: (Το μαλακτι) By whose own stripes ye are healed.³

25 For ye were as sheep going astray, but are now returned to the shepherd and overseer¹ of your souls.

19 For this is an acceptable thing to God, if any slave, from a regard to the will of God, patiently bears the sorrows attending the service of a passionate, insolent, rigorous master, suffering punishment from him unjustly.

20 But what extraordinary praise, from God or man, is due to you, if, when ye commit faults and are beaten, ye bear it patiently? The punishment, being just, ought to be borne. Yet, if when ye do your duty conscientiously, and suffer for it, ye bear it patiently from a regard to the commandment of God, this is an acceptable thing with God.

21 Besides, to suffer for well-doing ye were called by the gospel: For even Christ our Master, whom we are bound to obey, suffered for us, leaving us, when he returned to heaven, an example of suffering for well-doing, that ye should follow in his footsteps.

22 These sufferings Christ did not deserve; being one who did no sin whatever, neither was any falsehood found in his mouth;

23 Who, when he was reviled by the Jews, did not revile in return; when he suffered crucifixion, he did not threaten his persecutors, though he could easily have destroyed them; but by repeating the words of Psalm xxii. he meekly committed his cause to God who judgeth righteously, and forgave his murderers.

24 From gratitude, ye ought for the gospel to suffer patiently in imitation of your Master, who himself bare our sins in his own body on the cross, that we, being freed from the power and the punishment of sins, should live to righteousness. By whose own stripes ye are healed of the wounds and bruises in your souls occasioned by sin.

25 For ye were formerly as sheep going astray from their pasture, and in danger of being lost, or destroyed by wild beasts. But now ye are returned from your wandering, to the shepherd and overseer of your souls, who will direct and defend you.

2. But also to the froward.]—In this verse the apostle establishes one of the noblest and most important principles of morality, namely, that our obligation to relative duties does not depend either on the character of the persons to whom they should be performed, or on their performing the duties they owe to us, but on the unalterable relations of things, established by God.

Ver. 19. Suffering unjustly.]—The apostle had here in view those punishments which, according to the customs of that age, tyrannical masters were allowed to inflict on their slaves, however contrary to justice and mercy these punishments might be.

Ver. 20.—1. But what praise.]—The word αλλοι; properly signifies renown; here it is put for that praise which follows great and noble deeds, and which is the spring of renown.

2. Do well.]—Among other instances of well-doing, the apostle no doubt meant the Christian slaves refusing to join their masters in worshipping idols.

3. This is an acceptable thing.]—I have here followed Beza, who supposes that αρετις is put for χαρις by a common Hebraism. Others translate the word here and in ver. 19. by beauty, so as to imply that God, the Supreme Judge of beauty in characters, is delighted with the spectacle of a slave suffering punishment for acting conscientiously.

Ver. 21.—1. For even Christ suffered for us.]—Some MBS. and printed editions have here 'suffered for you,' leaving you an example, that ye, &c. which Estlin thinks the true reading, because the apostle is addressing himself to slaves, (see the last clause of the verse), on whom the argument would make the greater impression, when he told them that Christ suffered even for them. This reading Bengelius has adopted; but Mill and Benson prefer the common reading.

2. Leaving us a pattern.]—Beza says παρεμμενος signifies such a pattern as painters and writing-masters place before their scholars to be imitated.

Ver. 22. Who did no sin, neither was guile, &c.]—This is an allusion to Isaiah's account of Messiah, chap. liii. 9. 'Because he had done no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth.' Our Lord's absolute freedom from sin is asserted by the other inspired writers also, (2 Cor. v. 21. Heb. vii. 26. 1 John iii. 5.) It was asserted likewise by himself once and again, John viii. 46. xiv. 30. and it is fully verified by the history of his life.—The apostle mentions guile, because slaves are apt to tell lies to screen themselves from punishment.

Ver. 23. Who, when he was reviled, did not revile in return, when he suffered, he threatened not.]—Christ was exceedingly reviled, and evil treated by the Jews. They said he was possessed with a devil: They called him a Samaritan, a glutton, a wine-bibber, a blasphemer, a demoniac, one in league with Beelzebub, a perverter of the nation, and a deceiver of the people. In the high-priest's palace, his judges spit in his face: The servants, covering his face, smote him with the palms of their hands, and in derision of his pretensions to inspiration, bade him prophesy who it was that smote him. In the common hall, the soldiers crowned him with thorns, put a reed into his hand, and smote him therewith, and, bowing the knee, said, 'Hail, King of the Jews.' While hanging on the cross, the chief priests, with the scribes and elders, mocking him, said, 'He saved others, himself he cannot save.'

But, though he could both have saved himself, and destroyed them, he did not threaten to punish them: on the contrary, he prayed from the cross for forgiveness to his murderers. He said once indeed to the Jews, 'Ye are of your father the devil, and the works of your father ye will do.' This, however, was no reviling speech, but a true description of their character, and a prediction of their murdering him. These reproaches he forebore in his last sufferings, lest they might be thought to have proceeded from resentment.

Ver. 24.—1. He himself bare our sins in his own body on the tree.]—This is an allusion to Isaiah liii. 12. LXX. Ανομιαν ημεμων, 'He bare the sins of many.'—The phrase bearing iniquity, is often used in the Old Testament. It signifies, sometimes the making atonement for sin, Lev. x. 17. sometimes the suffering punishment for sin, Lev. xxii. 9. Ezek. xviii. 20. and sometimes the carrying away sin from the sight of God; as the scape-goat is said to do, Lev. xvi. 22. The apostle uses here the first person, our sins; to shew that Christ bare the sins of believers in every age and country, and to make us sensible how extensive the operation of his death is in procuring pardon for sinners.

2. That we, being freed from sins.]—Ταυς αμαρτιας απορριμμεναις, extra fieri, sejunctum, aut separatim esse. This translation Beza and Schenklus approve, who by the expression 'freed from sins,' understand our being freed from the dominion of sins. But I think the apostle means, freed from the punishment as well as from the power of sins, because the former is the immediate effect of Christ's death as a sacrifice for sin, and the greatest encouragement to live righteously.

3. By whose own stripes ye are healed.]—This is an allusion to Isa. liii. 5. 'With his stripes we are healed.' The word μαλακτι signifies that swelling on the flesh which is occasioned by a severe stroke. By changing his discourse from the first to the second person, the apostle addressed those slaves who might be beaten unmercifully by cruel masters; because, of all the considerations by which they could be animated to patience, the most powerful was, to put them in mind of the painful stripes with which Christ was beaten, when he was scourged by Pilate's order, Matt. xxvii. 26.; and to tell them, that with these stripes the wounds in their souls occasioned by sin are healed; wounds far more painful and deadly than those inflicted on them by their froward masters.

Ver. 25. Returned to the shepherd and overseer of your souls.]—Though in this passage the apostle addressed his discourse to slaves, yet by giving titles to Christ which marked his relation to men of all ranks and conditions, he hath intimated, that his exhortation to suffer unmerited evils patiently, is intended for all who profess the gospel. Our Lord delighted in the title of shepherd, John x. 11. 14. 'I am the good shepherd.' Hence Peter calls him 'the chief shepherd,' 1 Pet. v. 4.; and Paul, 'that great shepherd of the sheep,' Heb. xiii. 20. See note on that verse.—The title of shepherd our Lord took, if I mistake not, to shew that he is the person prophesied of by Ezekiel, under the title of the One Shepherd, whom God was to set over his flock, Ezek. xxxiv. 23.—Farther, Peter by calling Christ ποιμανον, 'the overseer of our souls,' seems to allude to ver. 11. of that prophecy, where God in the character of a good shepherd says, ἐκζητησα τα περιπαται μου, και επισκεψομαι αυτους, LXX.; 'I will seek out my sheep, and will over see them.'

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Precepts and Directions delivered in this Chapter.

THAT the brethren might know how to behave in the various relations of life, the apostle in this chapter first of all commanded the Christian women in Pontus, who were married, to obey their own husbands, although they were heathens; that by their cheerful submissive behaviour they might allure their husbands to embrace the gospel, ver. 1.—when they found it had such an happy influence on the temper and behaviour of their wives, ver. 2.—With respect to their dress, the apostle ordered all the women who professed the gospel to adorn their minds with the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, rather than their bodies with ornaments of gold and silver, and costly apparel, ver. 3, 4.—proposing to them the example of the godly women in ancient times, who adorned their minds with the female virtues, being subject to their own husbands, ver. 5.—Such as Sarah, who obeyed Abraham, and shewed how greatly she respected him by calling him her lord, ver. 6.

Then turning his discourse to husbands, the apostle ordered them to live with their wives, in the performance of all the duties of the married state, suitably to the more enlarged views which the gospel gave them of these duties; and, in the treatment of their wives, to have a regard to the weakness of their bodily frame, ver. 7.—Next, addressing the disciples in general, he ordered them, in their intercourse with one another, to be sympathizing, tender-hearted, and courteous, ver. 8.—never returning evil for evil, nor railing for railing, but, on the contrary, blessing; that they might obtain the blessing of inheriting the heavenly country, according to Christ's promise, ver. 9.—and David's declaration concerning those who desire to enjoy life and see good days, ver. 10, 11.—He told them farther, that the divine protection is promised to the righteous; but that the anger of God is threatened against the wicked, ver. 12.—Besides, to forgive our enemies is the way to disarm them, and restrain them from hurting us, ver. 13.—Then returning to the subject of suffering, he told them, that if they suffered for righteousness' sake, they were happy, as Christ declared Matt. v. 10—12.—And exhorted them not to be terrified by the threatenings of their persecutors, ver. 14.—but to be always prepared to give with calmness an answer to every one who asked a reason concerning their hope of an eternally happy life in the body after death. This hope the Christians were to profess, more especially when their enemies were putting them to death; because the heathens, who heard them on these occasions declare their hope, perceiving that it was what supported them under their sufferings, and made them fearless in death, could not avoid being curious to know what the foundation of that hope was whose influence was so powerful, ver. 15.—also, because the declaration of their hope at such a time, might induce some of the heathens to embrace the gospel, who, with admiration, beheld their courage in suffering death.

Because the disciples of Christ, on account of their aversion to idolatry, and of their deserting the temples of the heathen deities, were represented as atheists, seditious persons, and the most profligate of mankind, the apostle exhorted the brethren of Pontus, while they resisted idolatry, and refused obedience to the sinful commands of the heathen magistrates, to maintain a good conscience in every part of their behaviour; that their persecutors, who spake loudly against them as evil-doers, might be put to shame, ver. 16.—Besides, if they were to suffer, it was better for them to suffer as well-doers than as evil-doers, ver. 17.—And lest their enemies might conclude from their sufferings that they were wicked persons, or at least persons with whom God was displeased, the apostle observed, that Christ, though a most righteous person, and greatly beloved of God, had been put to death as an evil-doer; but was demonstrated to be innocent of the crimes laid to his charge, by his resurrection from the dead. This example shewed the brethren that sufferings are no mark of God's displeasure; and that, if they suffered with Christ, their innocence should be made manifest at least in the end, when, being raised from the dead as Christ was, they should be brought to God to enjoy eternal life with him in heaven, ver. 18.—Farther, to prove what he had affirmed, ver. 12. that God protects the righteous, and will severely punish the wicked, the apostle, as an example of both, observed, that Christ, 2 Pet. iii. 6, by God's command, brought a flood on the old world and destroyed the ungodly, to whom, without success, he had preached by his Spirit, speaking in his prophet Noah; but saved Noah and his family by that very water with which he destroyed the ungodly, ver. 19, 20.—That the purpose for which St. Peter appealed to these ancient facts was what I have mentioned, is evident, not only from what is said ver. 20. but from 2 Pet. ii. 5. where, after mentioning God's saving Noah while he brought the flood on the world of the ungodly, he adds, ver. 9. 'The Lord knoweth to deliver the godly out of temptation, and to reserve the wicked to the day of judgment to be punished.'—Farther, that the brethren might be in no doubt concerning the apostle's design in mentioning the salvation of Noah and his family, he assured them, that the salvation of these eight persons by the water of the deluge, is a type of the salvation of believers from death by the water of baptism, through the resurrection of Christ: Which baptism, he told them, consists not in the washing away of the filth of the flesh, but in the answer of a good conscience, ver. 21.—Then, to make the righteous, on whom the eyes of the Lord continually look, certain of deliverance out of temptation in the present world, and of eternal salvation in the world to come, and at the same time to fill the wicked, against whom the face of God is set, with a just dread of the future judgment, the apostle declared, that Christ our Master, since his resurrection, hath gone into heaven, and is now at the right hand of God as Governor and Judge universal; every creature in the universe, whether good or bad, being put in subjection to him, ver. 22.

CHAP. III.—1 As I have exhorted servants to be in subjection to their masters, I in like manner say, Wives, be in subjection to your own husbands, that even if any of them obey not the gospel, they, with-

Ver. 1.—1. In like manner wives, &c.]—To account for the apostle's not having inculcated the duties of masters towards their slaves, Estius supposes that most of the Jews living in Pontus, Galatia, &c. were slaves, and few of them masters. But his precepts concerning the dress of the women shews, that the brethren in Pontus, &c. were many of them rich, and in the higher ranks of life; consequently they may be supposed to have had slaves. Wherefore, there ωφρ, 60.) without speech² may be won by the behaviour of the wives,

2 When they behold your chaste behaviour JOINED with reverence.¹

3 (Or, 67.) Of these, let the adorning be not what is outward ONLY,¹ of plaiting of hair, and of putting round golden CHAINS, (Syriac version) or of putting on clothes.

4 But LET the hidden man of the heart¹ BE ADORNED with the incorruptible ORNAMENT of a meek and quiet spirit,² which is in the sight of God of great value.

5 For thus anciently, the holy women also, who trusted in God, adorned themselves, being in subjection to their own husbands;

6 Even as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him Lord;¹ whose daughters ye have become² by doing well, and not being frightened with any terror.³

7 In like manner, husbands cohabit with YOUR WIVES according to knowledge, giving honour¹ to the wife as the weaker vessel,² and as joint heirs of the grace³ of life, in order that your prayers be not hindered. (Εμμενεδαι, cut off.)

8 (Τὸ εἰς αὐτοῦ, supp. αὐτῶν) Finally, BE all of one mind,¹ sympathizing lovers of the bre-out speech from their wives, may be allured to believe the gospel by the good behaviour of the wives,

2 When, with admiration and increasing love, they daily behold your chaste affectionate behaviour, joined with a respectful submission to them.

3 Of these, let the adorning to secure their husband's affection, be not what is outward only, of nice plaiting of hair, and of putting round golden chains, or of putting on costly apparel: These ornaments are foreign to the person, and of a perishing nature.

4 But let the mind be adorned with the unperishing ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is the greatest beauty of the female sex; and in the sight of God, who is the best judge of beauty, it is an ornament of great value; as it is likewise in the sight of men.

5 For thus anciently, the holy women also, who were eminent for piety, adorned themselves, not with apparel only, but chiefly with meekness and quietness, being in subjection to their own husbands; a method of adorning which hath always been the prevailing fashion in the family of God;

6 Even as Sarah adorned herself by obeying Abraham, calling him Lord, in token of her subjection. Whose daughters ye Christian women have become, by behaving well towards your husbands, and not being frightened to actions contrary to your religion through fear of displeasing them.

7 From a like regard to the will of God, Christian husbands cohabit with your wives, performing your duties to them, according to the superior knowledge which your religion gives of these duties; giving to the wife, as the weaker person, the necessities and conveniences of life suitable to your station, and as heirs equally with you of the blessings of the present and future life, that your prayers be not hindered, nor improperly performed, by reason of family quarrels.

8 Finally, in managing your affairs as a religious society, be all, whether married or not, of one mind; sympathizing with those in must have been some other reason for the omission, which at this distance of time we are not able to find out.

2. They without speech, &c.]—Here Peter wisely intimated to the women, that the silent but powerful persuasion of a becoming behaviour, would be more effectual in winning their unbelieving husbands to embrace the gospel, than many arguments, proposed perhaps with heat, for the purpose of convincing them. For when the husbands found what a happy influence the gospel had in making their wives sweet-tempered and dutiful in every respect, they could not but entertain a good opinion of a religion which produced such excellent effects.

Ver. 2. Joined with reverence.]—Ἐν φόβῳ. This is similar to Paul's precept, Eph. v. 33. 'And the wife see that she (φεισται) reverence her husband.'

Ver. 3. Let it not be the outward adorning only.]—The word only is supplied here, agreeably to the known phraseology of scripture, and to the nature of the precept. For we cannot suppose that the apostle forbids Christian women to adorn themselves with apparel suitable to their station, any more than our Lord forbade his disciples to labour for the meat that perisheth, John vi. 27. His meaning in that precept certainly was, that the disciples were not to labour for the meat which perisheth only, but also for the meat enduring to everlasting life. I therefore think the meaning of the precept under consideration is, that women are not to adorn their bodies only, but chiefly their mind; because a mind adorned with the different virtues proper to the female character, will, by attracting esteem, secure a lasting love; whereas the adorning of the body catches the fancy of the vain and foolish only, and creates no real affection, at least in the breast of the wise, see 1 Tim. ii. 9, 10. notes; where the same directions are given concerning the dress of women, with this addition, that instead of adorning themselves with jewels and costly attire, they ought to adorn themselves with good works: by which the apostle intimated, that works of charity performed to the distressed with the money necessary for purchasing ornaments of gold, and costly attire, will render women much more beautiful in the eye both of God and man, than if they were decked with all the vain ornaments in which the lighter part of the sex delight.

Ver. 4.—1. The hidden man of the heart.]—In scripture the heart is represented as the seat, not only of passion and affection, but of intelligence, reason, and will: Luke xiv. 25. 'O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken.' The heart, therefore, is what St. Paul calls ὁ νοῦς ἀρρετικός, 'the inward man,' Rom. vii. 22. In like manner St. Peter calls the female mind 'the hidden (or invisible) man of the heart,' as opposed to the outward man or body.

2. Incorruptible ornament of a meek and quiet spirit.]—Meekness consists in the bearing of provocation patiently; but quietness, in abstaining from giving provocation, especially by bitter language. This meek and quiet spirit is called an incorruptible ornament, because it does not, like ornaments of gold and silver, grow out of fashion by age, nor ugly by wearing, but preserves its beauty always; and in this respect also, it is much more valuable than the other. In illustration of the sentiment contained in this verse, Blackwell writes as follows: "How must all the short-lived beauties the shapes, features, and most elegant and rich ornaments of the mortal body, which attract the eyes and admiration of vain mortals, fade away and lose their charm and lustre, when compared with the heavenly graces of a pious and regular temper, the incorruptible ornaments and beauties of the soul, which are ever amiable, and of high value in the eye of God the sovereign Judge of what is good and beautiful!" Sacred Class. vol. i. p. 164.

Ver. 6.—1. Calling him Lord.]—Gen. xviii. 12. The argument in this verse is founded on the manners of the ancients, who, by giving titles of respect to their superiors, acknowledged their own inferiority. Wherefore, by mentioning the reverence with which Sarah spoke of Abraham, the apostle intimates, that she entertained the highest respect for him, and a just sense of her own subjection to him.—By the Jewish women, Sarah was considered as an illustrious pattern of a dutiful wife.

2. Whose daughters ye have become.]—Sarah being constituted by God the mother of all believers, Gal. iii. 26. even as Abraham was made their father, the believing women of Pontus, by imitating Sarah's virtue, became her children, though not descended from her. This the Gentile women would consider as a great honour, more especially as they had been taught by the Jews to look on themselves as unclean on account of their being Gentiles by birth.

3. And not being frightened with any terror.]—Μὴ φοβησθε αὐτῶν. This is an Hebraism of the same kind and signification with that found ver. 14. οὐ φοβησθε αὐτοὺς ἀλλὰ φοβησθε τὸν κύριον, 'be not afraid of their fear.'—It is worthy of notice, that while the apostle enjoined wives to be in subjection to their husbands, he cautioned them against committing sin, especially that of idolatry, either from a desire to please their husbands, or from the fear of offending them.

Ver. 7.—1. Giving (τιματε) honour to the wife.]—In scripture, honour is used to signify maintenance, because to supply any one with the necessities and conveniences of life, was considered in ancient times as doing him honour. Accordingly the Greeks, in reward of eminent services done to the community, decreed maintenance at the public expense to those who had performed these services.

2. As the weaker vessel.]—The Greek word ελαττω, being used to denote the human body, 1 Thess. iv. 4. It may here be translated body or person.—By assigning as the reason why honour should be given to the wife, that she is weaker than the husband in body, the apostle hath insinuated, not only that he ought to afford her a competent share of the necessities and conveniences of life, but as much relief from bodily labour as his circumstances will allow: all which is most reasonable, considering the many bodily troubles women are subject to in the breeding, bearing, and nursing of children.—Adam shewed his indigence to Eve, by allowing her to give names to their children.

3. Joint heirs of the grace of life.]—The word here translated grace, is rendered a gift, 1 Cor. xvi. 3. margin. According to this sense Peter's meaning is, that, by God's original grant, the woman being a joint heir with man of the gift of life, is equally entitled with man to all the innocent enjoyments of life, Gen. i. 25, 29. This interpretation is confirmed by the clause, 'in order that your prayers be not hindered.' For if honour is thus given to the wife, family quarrels will cease, and family prayers will not be neglected.

Ver. 8.—1. Be all of one mind.]—Ὀμολογεῖτε. The sense of this thren, tender-hearted,² courteous. (See Acts xxviii. 7.)

9 Not returning evil for evil, or railing for railing, but, on the contrary, do ye bless: knowing that to this ye were called,¹ that ye might inherit THE blessing.

10 For he who is desirous to enjoy life, and to see good days,¹ let him restrain his tongue from evil, and his lips from speaking deceit. (Psalm. xxxiv. 12.)

11 Let him turn away from evil, and do good. Let him seek peace, and pursue it. (Rom. xiii. 18.)

12 For the eyes of the Lord ARE (εἰς) upon the righteous, and his ears ARE OPEN to their supplication; but the face of the Lord¹ is (ἐν) against the workers of iniquity.

13 (Kai, 224.) Besides, who is he that will do evil to you, if ye be imitators of the good One?²

14 Nevertheless, although ye even suffer for righteousness' sake,¹ blessed ARE ye. (As, 106.) Therefore, do not fear their fear,² neither be troubled;

15 But sanctify (53.) the Lord God in your hearts, and BE always prepared for GIVING an answer, with meekness and reverence, to every one who asketh of you a reason (αἰτιαν) for the hope² which is in you. (See the illustration of this verse given in the View.)

16 (Ἐξῆς) Hold fast a good conscience,¹ that whereas they speak against you as evil-doers, they may be put to shame who arraign² your good behaviour in Christ:

17 For it is better, AS well-doers, to suffer, affliction, loving one another as brethren in Christ, tender-hearted, and affable in the whole of your deportment.

9 Not returning evil for evil, nor railing for railing, but, on the contrary, in return for railing, do ye wish blessings; knowing that to be of this beneficent forgiving temper ye were called by God, that ye might inherit the blessing of pardon and life.

10 David enjoined the same disposition, as necessary to the inheriting the earthly country: For he who desires to enjoy life with comfort, and to see happy days, let him restrain his tongue from railing, and his lips from speaking deceit.

11 Let him turn away from evil actions of every kind, and do good. Let him seek to live in peace with mankind; and, though it seem to flee from him, let him pursue it.

12 This is the way to secure the favour of God: For, as the Psalmist observes, the Lord looks upon the righteous to protect them, and his ears are open to their supplication when in distress; but the anger of the Lord is ready to fall on the workers of iniquity.

13 Besides, in ordinary cases, ye will have the favour of men; for few will do evil to you, if ye be imitators of God, by forgiving injuries, and doing good to the unthankful.

14 Nevertheless, although, through the extreme malice of particularly wicked men, ye even suffer for righteousness' sake, happy are ye, for great is your reward. Therefore, do not fear the threatenings of your persecutors, neither be troubled at the rage of the heathen rulers:

15 But honour the Lord God in your hearts, by entertaining just conceptions of his perfections, by submitting to his appointments, and by relying on him; and be always prepared for giving an answer with calmness and reverence to every one, who, in a court of judicature, or in private with a good intention, or at death, asketh of you a reason for the hope ye entertain of an eternal life of happiness in the body after death.

16 Hold fast a good conscience, both by never denying your religion, and by behaving properly towards the magistrates, that whereas they speak against you as seditious persons, they may be put to shame who arraign your attachment to your religion, when they find the whole of your behaviour good as Christians;

17 For it is better, in every respect, for us as well-doers to suffer, word given in the commentary seems to be its true meaning, because uniformity in religious opinions being scarce possible, and not at all necessary, cannot be the subject of a divine precept. See Rom. xii. 16. xx. 5. 1 Cor. i. 10. Philip. ii. 2.

2. Tender-hearted. — Εὐεργετῶν, literally of good bowels. See Ess. vi. 21. The meaning is, Be moved with compassion on beholding the weaknesses and distresses of others, and do what ye can to assist them.

Ver. 9. To this ye were called;—namely, to bless them who curse you, and to pray for them who despitefully use you and persecute you, that, by possessing the dispositions of God, ye may become his children, and inherit the blessing of eternal life.

Ver. 10. He who is desirous to enjoy life, and to see good days. — Ὁ ἐπὶ εὖ ζῆν καὶ ὄψαι. This is generally considered as a quotation from Psalm. xxxiv. 12. But in the LXX it is, Τὸ εὖ ζῆν καὶ ὄψαι ὁ ὁ θεὸς ζῶν, ἀγαπῶν ἡμᾶς ὡς υἱοὺς. 'Who is the man that desireth life, loving to see good days?'—The Syriac translator hath rendered the passage in Peter as follows: 'He therefore who desireth life, and loveth to see good days.' But Peter's words will not bear that translation. To give a proper meaning to his words I have translated εὖ ζῆν, to enjoy, though I know no passage in any Greek writer in which it is so used. See the General Preface. — In this and the following verses, the apostle offers three arguments of great importance to induce men to the practice of virtue:—1. It secures the happiness both of the present and of the future life; 2. It procures the favour and protection of God, ver. 12; 3. It commonly disarms the malice of men, ver. 13.

Ver. 12. But the face of the Lord. — In scripture 'the face of God' signifies the anger of God, Psal. xxi. 9. Sometimes it signifies 'the favour of God,' Numb. vi. 25.

Ver. 13. Imitators (μιμηταί) of the good One. — This epithet is applied to God to the exclusion of all others, Matt. xix. 17; as, on the other hand, the devil is, by way of eminence, called the evil one. The apostle's intention in this question is to shew, that few of mankind are so wicked as to do evil to one who is remarkably benevolent, meek, and forgiving. — Others interpret the question thus: The righteous being under the especial protection of God, who is he that can do you evil, if ye are righteous, and God is pleased to protect you?

Ver. 14.—1. Suffer for righteousness' sake. — By righteousness some understand adherence to the gospel. But I rather think the apostle means well-doing in general, ver. 17; and particularly the imitation of God, mentioned in the preceding verse.

2. Therefore, do not fear their fear. — This exhortation Isaiah gave to the Israelites, when threatened with an invasion by the Assyrians, Isa. viii. 12. 'Neither fear ye their fear, nor be afraid. 13. Sanctify the Lord of hosts himself, and let him be your fear,' &c. — The expression 'fear not their fear,' is an Hebraism, the meaning of which is, be not affected with the fear which they endeavour to raise in you by their threatenings.

Ver. 15.—1. But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts;—namely, by fearing him more than men, by believing all his promises, by trusting in his power and goodness, by acknowledging his justice in the punishments which he inflicts, and by patiently bearing all the trials he is pleased to appoint. By these dispositions believers sanctify God in their hearts; they give him the glory of all his perfections. — The Syriac and Vulgate versions read here 'Dominum Christum, the Lord Christ.'

2. Asketh of you a reason for the hope which is in you. — The Spectator, No. 471, observes, that man would be a very miserable being were he not endowed with hope; that hope quickens all the still parts of life, and keeps the mind awake in her most indolent hours, and that no kind of life is so happy as that which is full of hope; especially when the hope is well-grounded, and when the object of it is in its nature fitted to make the person happy who entertains it. He next observes, that a religious life is that which most abounds in a well-grounded hope, and such an one as is fixed on objects which are capable of making us entirely happy. This hope, in a religious man, is much more sure and certain than the hope of any temporal blessing, as it is strengthened not only by reason but by faith. He then concludes his discourse as follows: 'Religious hope has likewise this advantage above any other kind of hope, that it is able to revive the dying man, and to fill his mind not only with secret comfort and refreshment, but sometimes with rapture and transport. He triumphs in his agonies, while the soul springs forward with delight to the great object which she has always had in view, and leaves the body with an expectation of being reunited to her in a glorious and joyful resurrection.' How eminently was this power of hope exemplified in the consolation and support, which the hope of a resurrection to eternal life afforded to the first Christians, when tormented and put to death by their cruel persecutors!

Ver. 16.—1. Hold fast a good conscience. — They hold fast a good conscience, who are always careful to do what a good conscience approves.

2. Who arraign your good behaviour in Christ. — Elsner says the word ἐκδικεῖς; here used hath often a forensic sense, and denotes the bringing a criminal charge against one. It occurs Matt. v. 44. 'Pray for them (ἐκδικεῖς τοὺς ἔχοντες) who arraign you,' namely, in criminal courts, 'and persecute you.'

if the will of God appoints us to suffer, than as evil-doers to suffer.

18 Our sufferings are no proof that our cause is bad, and that God is displeased with us: For even Christ hath suffered once for the sins of others; he who was perfectly righteous suffered for the unrighteous, that, by making atonement for our sins, he might bring us to God as acceptable worshippers; being put to death indeed in the flesh, but made alive by the Spirit, as approved of God in dying for the sins of the world.

19 By which Spirit also, speaking in Noah, (3 Pet. ii. 5.), he preached to the persons now in prison, 20 Who formerly were disobedient, when the patience of God, once for all, waited for their reformation in the days of Noah, during an hundred and twenty years, while an ark was preparing, in which few, that is, eight persons only, were effectually saved by the water of the flood itself, which bore up the ark in which they were enclosed.

Ver. 17. If the will of God appoints.]—The apostle adds this to show that the wicked can do no evil to believers but by the permission of God.

Ver. 18.—1. For even Christ hath once suffered for sins.]—In the sufferings of Christ we have a clear proof that sufferings are no evidence of the wickedness of the sufferer, nor of the badness of the cause for which he suffers. Moreover, in the resurrection of Christ, we have a convincing proof that the sufferings of good men are not inconsistent with the perfections of God. For he will reward them with a blessed resurrection from the dead, accomplished after the example of Christ's resurrection. Wherefore, the power of God, visible in Christ's resurrection, affords to all who lose their life for the gospel, a sure ground of consolation and hope that God will raise them at the last day.

2. But made alive by the Spirit.]—As Christ was conceived in the womb of his mother by the Holy Spirit, Luke i. 35. so he was raised from the dead by the same Spirit; on which account he is said, 1 Tim. iii. 16. to have been 'justified by the Spirit;' and Heb. ix. 14. to have offered himself without fault to God 'through the Eternal Spirit.'—It is true the resurrection of Christ is ascribed to the Father, 1 Cor. vi. 14. 2 Cor. iv. 14. Eph. i. 20. But that is not inconsistent with Peter's affirmation in this verse: for the Father may, with the strictest propriety, be said to have done what the Spirit did by his appointment; especially as it was done to show that God acknowledged Jesus to be his Son. What our Lord said concerning his own resurrection, John ii. 19. 'Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up,' is to be understood in the same manner. For having told the Jews, John x. 18. 'I have power to lay down my life, and I have power to take it again;' he added, 'this commandment I received of my Father.'—Christ's resurrection being an example as well as a proof of our resurrection, he was raised by the agency of the Spirit, perhaps to shew, that we shall be raised by the same power exerted agreeably to the will of God and of Christ: on which account the resurrection of the dead is ascribed sometimes to the Father, Acts xxvi. 8. 1 Cor. vi. 14. Heb. xi. 19. but more frequently to the Son, John v. 28. vi. 39, 40. 1 Cor. xv. 21, &c. 1 Thess. iv. 16, &c.

Ver. 19.—1. By which also he preached to the spirits in prison.]—Christ is said, by the same Spirit who made him alive, to have preached to the antediluvians, because his Spirit inspired Noah to preach to them, as is plain from Gen. vi. 3. 'My Spirit shall not always strive with man.' Hence Noah is called 'a preacher of righteousness.' 2 Pet. ii. 5. note.—By attributing the preaching of the ancient prophets to Christ, the apostle hath taught us, that from the beginning the economy of man's redemption hath been under the direction of Christ. Accordingly the same apostle hath expressly affirmed, 1 Pet. i. 11. that the Spirit who was in the ancient prophets was the Spirit of Christ.

2. He preached.]—Προεῖπεν; ἀνέειπεν, Syriac version, Et predicavit. Elmer, on this passage, hath produced examples from the scriptures, and from Demosthenes, to shew that the phrase, 'he went and preached,' is a pleonasm for 'he preached.' See Ess. iv. 87. Among the examples from scripture, the clearest and most direct is Eph. ii. 15. 'Having abolished, &c. 17. (καὶ ἐλθὼν ἐν ἑαυτοῖς) and came and preached peace to you who were afar off, and to them who were nigh.' For it is certain that our Lord, after his resurrection, did not go personally to the Gentiles to preach peace to them: he preached to them by his apostles only. But if Christ is said by Paul to go and do, what he did by his apostles, he may with equal propriety be said by Peter, to go and do, what he did by his prophet Noah. See Jude ver. 14.

3. To the spirits in prison.]—Some commentators, supposing that the word πνεύματα, spirits, is of the same signification with ψυχαι, souls, ver. 20. interpret this passage of Christ's personal preaching. For those to whom Christ was to preach being called 'captives in prison,' Isa. xlii. 7. xlix. 9. they to whom Noah preached might, by the same figure, be called 'spirits in prison.' Yet, since 'the spirits in prison' to whom Christ preached are expressly said to have been disobedient in the days of Noah, this interpretation cannot be admitted. I have therefore, in the explanation of the passage, supplied the word now, to shew that the apostle speaks of the antediluvians in their present state. They were men on earth in the flesh when Christ preached to them by his Spirit speaking in Noah; but they are now 'spirits in prison,' detained, like the fallen angels, (Jude v. 6.), 'unto the judgment of the great day.' In the Syriac version the clause is thus translated, 'Animabus illis que incluse fuerunt in sepulchro.'—By 'the spirits in prison,' L. Harrington understands Noah's family shut up in the ark. But it does not appear that they were disobedient.

Ver. 20.—1. Who formerly were disobedient.]—This clause being connected in the original with the clause 'spirits in prison,' it is evident that the spirits in prison to whom Christ preached, are the persons who were disobedient in the days of Noah, but who now are spirits in prison; unless we suppose they are said to have been in prison in the days of Noah, by the same figure of speech that the persons to whom Christ preached in the days of his flesh are called 'captives in prison,' Luke iv. 18.

2. Eight souls were effectually saved by water, or, safely conveyed through the water.]—Thus, Acts xxiv. 24. ἐν ὁλοκαυτῶντι τοῦ Ἰωάννου δ. αὐτοῦ πρὸς Φίλικον τὸν ὑποκόμην is translated, 'that they may—bring Paul safe unto Felix the governor.' Christ's preaching to the antediluvians by Noah, the destruction of these antediluvians for their disobedience to that preaching, the preservation of Noah and his family in the ark by means of the water of the deluge, are all fitly mentioned, to shew that it hath been God's way from the beginning of the world, when the wickedness of men becomes general, to oppose it, by raising up prophets to reprove them, and to warn them of their danger; and after waiting for their repentance to no purpose, to destroy them; while he delivers the righteous from the evils to which they are exposed, by manifest interpositions of his power. These things teach us, that we should not think the worse of the gospel, because it hath been rejected by many, nor of ourselves, because we are persecuted by the wicked. On the other hand, by the punishment of the antediluvians, and of the Jews who crucified our Lord, wicked men and persecutors are taught to dread the judgments of God.

Ver. 21.—1. To which water.]—The relative ὃ being in the neuter gender, its antecedent cannot be ὁ ἀρκας, the ark, which is feminine, but ὁ ὕδαρ, water, which is neuter. I have therefore supplied that word in the translation.

2. The antitype baptism.]—The word τύπος, type, denotes a thing that is so formed as to convey an exact image of itself, by impression on another substance capable of receiving the impression. In scripture it signifies a pattern according to which a thing is made. Thus the visionary tabernacle shewn to Moses in the mount is called τύπος, type or pattern, because he was to make the material tabernacle exactly like it, Heb. viii. 5. In scripture, likewise, τύπος, a type, signifies an example of moral conduct, to be followed or avoided, 1 Cor. x. 6—11. The word ἀντίτυπος, antitype, denotes the thing formed in imitation of the type or pattern. Thus, Heb. ix. 24. the Mosaic tabernacles are called ἀντίτυπα, antitypes, or likenesses of the true tabernacle or habitation of the Deity, because they were formed according to the τύπος, pattern, shewed to Moses, which was considered as the true tabernacle.—Farther, because some remarkable persons and events recorded in scripture, were so ordered by God as to be fit emblems or representations of future persons and events, (see Gal. iv. 24. note 1.) these persons and events are called types, and the things which they represented or prefigured are called antitypes. Thus, Rom. v. 14. Adam is called τύπος, the type of Christ, who on that account is called the second Adam. Thus also the water of baptism is here called the antitype to the water of the flood, because the flood was a type or emblem of baptism, in the three following particulars:—1. As by building the ark, and by entering into it, Noah shewed a strong faith in the promise of God, concerning his preservation by the very water which was to destroy the antediluvians for their sins, so, by giving ourselves to be buried in the water of baptism, we shew a like faith in God's promise, that though we die and are buried, he will save us from death, the punishment of sin, by raising us from the dead at the last day: 2. As the preserving of Noah alive, during the nine months he was in the flood, is an emblem of the preservation of the souls of believers while in the state of the dead, so the preserving believers alive while buried in the water of baptism, is a prefiguration of the same event: 3. As the water of the deluge destroyed the wicked antediluvians, but preserved Noah, by bearing up the ark in which he was shut up till the waters were assuaged, and he went out of it to live again on the earth, so baptism may be said to destroy the wicked, and to save the righteous, as it prefigures both these events: the death of the sinner

(not the putting away of the filth of the flesh,³ but the answer of a good conscience toward God), now saveth us also—through the resurrection of Jesus Christ,⁴

22 Who, having gone into heaven,¹ is (σ) at the right hand of God; angels, and authorities, and powers, being subjected² to him.

It prefigures by the burying of the baptized person in the water; and the salvation of the righteous, by raising the baptized person out of the water to live a new life.—These things considered, may not our Lord's words to Nicodemus, 'Except a man be born again of water,' be an allusion to the history of the deluge, and a confirmation of its typical meaning? For Noah's coming forth from the water to live again on the earth, after having been full nine months in the water, might fitly be called his being 'born of water:' consequently, as baptism is the antitype, or thing signified by the deluge, a person's coming out of the water of baptism may have been called by our Lord, his being 'born again of water.'

3. Not the putting away the filth of the flesh, (see 2 Pet. i. 9. note 3.), but the answer of a good conscience.—Here a twofold baptism is spoken of; the one consisting in 'the putting away the filth of the flesh' by washing; the other, 'in the answer of a good conscience.'—This latter, the apostle tells us, is the baptism which is the antitype to the deluge. From this the Anabaptists infer that baptism ought not to be administered to infants, because they are incapable of giving the answer of a good conscience. But if this inference were just, it would follow that circumcision could not have been administered to infants, seeing it is said, Rom. ii. 23, 29, 'circumcision' is not that which is outward in the flesh, but of the heart in the spirit.' Infants, however, being capable of the outward circumcision, and of the outward baptism, these rites are fitly administered to them as the seals of God's covenants, and as the rites of initiation into these covenants. See Rom. iv. 11. note 1.—Commentators are divided about the meaning of the original word ḡnōmēnē. Our translators have rendered it by the word answer, and Beza by the word stipulation, on supposition that the apostle had in his eye the answers which persons to be baptized gave to the questions put to them before their baptism, of which Cyprian hath given an account. But it does not appear that these questions and answers were used in the apostle's days. Allowing, however, that by an enallage the word question is here put for the word answer, that 'answer of a good conscience' being made to God, is an inward answer, and means the baptized person's sincere persuasion of the things which, by submitting to baptism, he professes to believe; namely, that Jesus, in whose name baptism is administered, arose from the dead, and that at the last day he will raise all from the dead to eternal life who sincerely obey him. This signification of baptism the apostle Paul hath taught, Rom. vi. 4, 5; and mean the washing away of the filth of the flesh only, but the thing signified thereby, the answer of a good conscience toward God), now saveth us also—gives us the assurance that we shall be saved out of the grave—through the resurrection of Jesus Christ, emblematically represented in baptism, 22 Who, having gone into heaven, is sitting at the right hand of God, as governor of the universe; angels, both good and bad of every order, and human rulers of every denomination, and whatever else hath power, being absolutely subjected to him, that he may be able to save his people.

therefore he calls it 'our begun confidence,' Heb. iii. 14.; and exhorts the Hebrews 'to hold it steadfast to the end.'

4. Now saveth us also through the resurrection of Jesus Christ.]—The baptism which consists in the answer of a good conscience towards God, and which is the antitype or thing which was signified by the deluge, now saves us as effectually as the water of the deluge preserved Noah by bearing up the ark.—Here it is proper to observe, that Noah gave the answer of a good conscience towards God, by entering into the ark, in the firm belief that God, according to his promise, would preserve him and his family, by that very water which he knew was to destroy all the rest of mankind.—Baptism, understanding thereby the answer of a good conscience, 'now saveth us also through the resurrection of Jesus Christ;' because, if Christ had not risen, being an impostor, he could not have saved any one; but, by his resurrection from the dead, being demonstrated to be the Son of God, he is able to save all who believe on him; and in his resurrection he hath given an example, as well as a proof, of the resurrection of believers to eternal life.

Ver. 22.—1. Who, having gone into heaven, is at the right hand of God.]—The Vulgate version hath here, 'Who is at the right hand of God, having swallowed up death that we might be made the heirs of eternal life, having gone,' &c. But this is an interpretation rather than a various reading.—Burnet, De Statu Mort. p. 155. thus describes our Lord's departure from the earth: "Non tantum mortuis surrexit Christus, sed in cælum etiam ascendit. Parva victoria, triumphum egit: atque nube vectus lucida, veluti triumphali curru, aspectantibus discipulis, comitantibus angelis, et ad pristinas sedes in patriam, et ad Deum patrem rediit. Nec est vera modestie, quam frustra effectarunt Cæsares, et Heroes, alique inter gentes, dignitate, fortitudine, aut sapientia eximii."

2. Angels, and authorities, and powers, being subjected to him;]—that is, angels both good and bad being subjected to him; and, among the rest, the one who had the power of death, that is the devil. The supreme dominion of Christ over every created nature, is mentioned by the apostle as a proof that he is able to save the whole human race from death, the punishment which the devil brought on them by seducing their first parents; able also to bestow on believers eternal life, after having conducted them safe through the difficulties and dangers of their present trial. For this is the salvation of believers through the resurrection of Jesus Christ, which the apostle affirms, ver. 21. was typified by the salvation of Noah and his family.

CHAPTER IV.

THE apostle having told the brethren of Pontus, that it was better to suffer as well-doers than as evil-doers; also having insinuated, that the dignity and power with which Christ is invested to enable him to save his people was the reward of his sufferings—he begins this chapter with an exhortation to them, to arm themselves with the same resolution to suffer death for the gospel, which Christ manifested when he suffered death for calling himself the Son of God; and gave this reason for their doing so, that the person who is firmly resolved to suffer death rather than renounce his religion, hath freed himself from the dominion of sin, ver. 1.—so that he does not live the rest of his life according to the inclinations of his persecutors, but according to the will of God, ver. 2.—Besides, the time past of their life, he told them, was sufficient to have complied with the will of the Gentiles, by walking in lasciviousness, &c. ver. 3.—And although their heathen acquaintance might be surprised that they did not still accompany them in these vicious courses, and might revile them on that account, they were not to be moved thereby, ver. 4.—These wicked men shall be called to an account for their crimes, and be punished, ver. 5.—They were likewise to consider, that the gospel had been preached to the dead Gentiles for the very purpose of assuring them, that, although for their faith they might be condemned to death in their fleshly body by men, they shall at the last day be raised and rewarded in their spiritual body, ver. 6.—Farther, he assured them, that the end of all things, the end of the Mosaic dispensation and of the Jewish state, was at hand; so that the power of the unbelieving Jews, their greatest persecutors, would soon be broken. And from that consideration, he exhorted them to continual sobriety and watchfulness, ver. 7.—and to comfort one another under their sufferings by mutual love, which would lead them to overlook each other's faults, ver. 8.—and to be hospitable, ver. 9.—and to exercise their spiritual gifts for each other's benefit, ver. 10, 11.—Next, he told them they were not to think it strange, that God had permitted so hot a persecution to fall on them: It was for the trial of their faith, and the improvement of their virtues, ver. 12.—that their reward might be the greater at the revelation of Jesus Christ, ver. 13.—Besides, if they were reviled for the name of Christ, they were happy for this other reason, that the Spirit of Christ resting on them, and strengthening them to suffer, would be a spirit of glory to them in the eyes of their persecutors, ver. 14.

About the time the apostle wrote this letter, the unbelieving Jews, especially the zealots, were raising great disturbances, both in Judea and in the provinces; and, in these confusions, they murdered their brethren who were of a different faction, and plundered their goods. These fanatics, fancying that no obedience was due from the people of God to idolatrous princes, paid no regard to the heathen laws and magistrates, but were guilty of the grossest outrages in the countries where they lived, by which they often brought on themselves punishment. Wherefore, to prevent the Jewish Christians from joining their unbelieving brethren in these outrages, the apostle exhorted them not to bring punishment on themselves as murderers or thieves, &c. because to suffer for such things was extremely disgraceful, ver. 15.—But if any of them suffered as a Christian, he was not to be ashamed, but rather to glory in it, ver. 16.—In the mean time, lest the Jewish believers might have entertained harsh thoughts of God on account of their sufferings, the apostle told them, the time was come in which the Jews, the ancient household of God, were to be punished as a nation, for all the crimes committed by them from the beginning; that the Jewish Christians were to be involved in the general punishment; and that it was proper to begin at them, as a part of that devoted nation, notwithstanding they were now become the house of God; because the justice of God would be the more illustriously displayed thereby. However, to terrify their persecutors, he observed, that if the punishment of the nation was to begin at the Jews who were become the house of God by believing in Jesus, the punishment of those Jews who obeyed not the gospel of God would be most terrible, ver. 17.—And that if the righteous, the Jewish believers, would be saved with difficulty from perishing in the impending destruction, the ungodly and sinners of the nation could not hope to escape, ver. 18.—Lastly, he told the brethren, that as in the general calamity some of them who were in Judea, when God's judgments fell on the nation, might suffer death by the will of God, they ought on that occasion to commit their lives in well-doing to him, as to a faithful Creator, ver. 19.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. IV.—1 Christ then having suffered death for us in the flesh, do ye also arm yourselves with the same resolution of suffering death for him when called; because he who hath resolved to suffer death in the flesh for Christ, having overcome the strongest temptation, hath thereby freed himself from the solicitations of sin:

2 So that he no longer liveth his remaining time in the flesh agreeably to the corrupt inclinations of his persecutors, but agreeably to the will of God, who hath commanded him to shun idolatry, and all the vices practised by idolaters.

3 For reason teaches us, that the time which hath passed of our life is too much to have fully performed the corrupt inclinations of the Gentiles, having long walked in all kinds of lasciviousness, base passions, excessive drinkings of wine, revellings, (καμωκ, see Rom. xiii. 13, note 1.), luxurious feastings, (πρωκ) and abominable idolatries, and all the shameful vices connected therewith.

4 On account of your former life they wonder that ye shun their company, and do not run with them into the same slough of dissoluteness, reviling you on that account as unsocial, and making you everywhere objects of scorn.

5 But be not troubled at their speeches: They shall give an account of them to him, who, by the commission and power which he received from God, is prepared to judge the living and the dead.

6 Besides, to encourage you to suffer death for Christ, know that for this purpose the gospel hath been preached even to the dead in sins, Eph. ii. 1. to the Gentiles, to assure them, that although they may be condemned to death indeed by men in their fleshly body, as Christ

Ver. 1.—1. Having suffered for us in the flesh;—namely, death, with all those previous and concomitant evils, which rendered his death in the flesh bitter.

2. Arm yourselves with the same mind.]—Christ having suffered in the flesh, that is, in his imbedded state, to arm ourselves against our persecutors with the same mind, is to arm ourselves with the same resolution to suffer all the evils to which we are exposed in the body; and particularly to suffer death, when called by God to do so for our religion.

3. For he who hath suffered in the flesh.]—The apostle having exhorted the brethren of Pontus to arm themselves with the resolution of suffering death in the flesh, he considered that resolution as an actual suffering of death; just as God considered Abraham's resolution to offer Isaac as the actual offering of him, Gen. xxi. 18. That this is the apostle's meaning is evident from ver. 2. where the person who hath suffered death in the flesh, is represented as still living in the flesh.

4. Hath rested from sin.]—So the phrase παύσας ἀμαρτίας literally signifies, the preposition παύ being understood. He hath been made to rest from temptation to sin, consequently from sin itself. For if a man hath overcome the fear of torture and death, no weaker temptation will prevail with him to make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. This happy efficacy of arming themselves with the resolution of suffering for Christ, the apostle explained to the brethren of Pontus to excite them to attain that resolution.

Ver. 3.—1. The word καιρος, translated sufficient, being in the masculine gender, the word with which it agrees is χρονος, time, which, though not expressed, must in the translation be supplied from the preceding clause, as I have done. The phrase a sufficient time, is a soft expression which conveys the strongest meaning; namely, that in no period of their life ought they to have wrought the will of the Gentiles; and that whatever time they spent in so doing, was too much. See an example of this figure, Ezek. xiv. 6.

2. Having walked in lasciviousness.]—Παροργισμενος. This is an example of the accusative absolute. See Eas. iv. 23.—Lasciviousness, as distinguished from lust, denotes outward actions of a base kind—fornication, adultery, incest, sodomy; whereas lust consists in impure desires inwardly cherished.

3. Banquetings.]—Πρωκ, banquetings, according to Estius, were those meetings in which the heathens strove with each other who should continue longest to drink; consequently the original word might be translated drinking matches. But as excesses in wine are mentioned in the preceding clause, our translators supposed that πρωκ was put for εὐφροσυναις, a word which anciently signified feastings; which, when they consume too much time, or occasion intemperance, are certainly blamable.

Ver. 4.—1. They wonder.]—The Greeks used the word ἐπιθαλασσομαι, to express that admiration and wonder with which a stranger is struck, who beholds any thing uncommon or new.

2. Run with them.]—Here the apostle alludes to the practice of the votaries of Bacchus, who ran about the streets and fields like mad people, committing every sort of excess.

3. The same slough of dissoluteness.]—The word αὐχλος, signifies a collection of water, a miry pool. The other word, αὐχλος, signifies a dissolute course of life. Luke xv. 13.—The metaphorical expression, 'slough of dissoluteness,' strongly marks the danger and misery of living in the vices mentioned ver. 3.; vices which the heathens practised in the temples of their gods as worship.

Ver. 5. To judge the living and the dead.]—From the following verse it appears, that by 'the dead' the apostle meant the Gentiles, said, in other passages, to be dead through ignorance and sin; consequently, by 'the living,' we are to understand those who, by their profession of the gospel, are reputed to be alive: Rev. iii. 1. 'Thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead.' See also 1 Tim. v. 6. The living and the dead, therefore, are the Jews and Gentiles.

Ver. 6.—1. That although they might be condemned indeed by men in the flesh.]—According to the common translation of this might live ETERNALLY by God in the spirit.²

7 (Δε, 103.) Now the end of all things¹ hath approached. Be ye therefore sober,² and watch unto prayers.³ (See ch. v. 8. note.)

8 And, above all things, have fervent love (ἡ ἀγάπη) to one another; for love will cover a multitude of sins. (See James v. 20. note 2.)

9 BE hospitable (see 1 Tim. iii. 2. note 6.) to one another without murmurings.

10 Let every one, according as he hath received (χάρισμα) a spiritual gift, minister it (ἡ λειτουργία) to one another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God.

11 If any one speak, LET HIM SPEAK as the oracles of God REQUIRE.¹ If any one minister, LET HIM DO IT as from the strength which God supplieth, that in all things God may be glorified through Jesus Christ, to whom be the glory² and the power for ever and ever. Amen.

12 Beloved, wonder not at the burning¹ among you, WHICH is to you for a trial, as if some strange thing happened to you.

13 (Αλλὰ καθὼς, 203.) But seeing ye partake of the sufferings of Christ, rejoice, that also at the revelation of his glory (chap. i. 7. note 2.) ye may rejoice, leaping for joy.

14 If ye be reproached¹ (ἐν) for the name of Christ, YE ARE happy, because the Spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you.² (Κατὰ, 229.) By them indeed he is evil spoken of, but (κατὰ) by you he is praised.

15 (Γὰρ, 93.) Wherefore,¹ let none of you passage, the apostle is represented as saying that the gospel was preached to the dead Gentiles, in order that they might be condemned by men in the flesh. But as this cannot be the apostle's meaning, I suppose there is here an ellipsis of the word although, as is plain from the adversative particle ἐν, which follows. See See iv. 109. I have therefore ventured to supply it in the translation. We have the same ellipsis Rom. vi. 17.

2. Yet they might live eternally by God in the spirit.]—As St. Paul, speaking of the body of the righteous, says, 1 Cor. xv. 44. 'It is sown an animal body, it is raised a spiritual body.' we may by the flesh here understand the animal body in which men now live, and by the spirit, the spiritual body which the righteous are to receive at the resurrection. This interpretation makes one of the darkest passages of the New Testament intelligible. However, although spirit were taken literally in this clause, yet as flesh in the former clause does not signify the body separate from the spirit, but human nature as it consists at present of flesh and spirit, so the spirit in which we are to live after death, does not signify the spirit separate from the body in which the saints are to be raised, but their spirit united to an immortal incorruptible body. In the same manner, 'the salvation of souls,' chap. i. 9. is not to be understood of a salvation of the soul exclusive of the body, but a salvation of both. Knatchbull supplies and translates this verse in the following manner: 'that (ἐν) they who live according to men in the flesh may be condemned, but (κατὰ) they who live according to God in the spirit may live.' But the translation I have adopted is more easy, and gives a sense of the passage more analogous to the scripture phraseology.

Ver. 7.—1. The end of all things hath approached.]—That by 'the end of all things' which had approached when Peter wrote this epistle, he did not mean the end of this mundane system, but the end of the temple, of the Levitical priesthood, and of the whole Jewish economy, see proved, Pref. to 2 Thess. sect. 4. paragr. 1, 2, 3.—This epistle being written A. D. 67, about a year after the war with the Romans began, which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem and of the Jewish state, Peter, who had heard his Master's prophecy concerning these events, and concerning the signs of their approach, had good reason to say, that they had approached. It will be said, perhaps, that the brethren in Pontus had little interest in the destruction of the Jewish state. Yet as the Jews were the bitter persecutors of the Christians, in all the countries where they had any power, it must have been a great consolation to the brethren everywhere, to be assured that the power of their chief persecutors was soon to be utterly broken. Also, to know that the law of Moses was soon to be abolished, must have prevented the Gentiles from receiving the Jewish rites.

2. Be ye therefore sober.]—The word σοφροσύνη signifies to rule both the passions of the mind and the appetites of the body with was, yet they shall live eternally by the power of God in their spiritual body as Christ now liveth.

7 Now the end of the temple, of the law, and of the Jewish state, hath approached. Be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayers, in the hope of being soon delivered from your bitterest persecutors.

8 And, above all things, have fervent love to one another; for love will make you pardon a multitude of faults in each other, whereby, in your present persecuted state, ye will be the more disposed to assist each other.

9 In this time of persecution especially, be hospitable one to another, without murmurings on account of the trouble and expense it occasions to you.

10 Let every one, according as he hath received any spiritual gift, exercise it for the benefit of each other, as becomes good stewards of the manifold gifts of God, which are bestowed, not for the receiver's advantage only, but for the benefit of others also.

11 If any one speak by inspiration, let him speak with fidelity and earnestness, as the oracles of God require. If any one minister to the necessities of the saints, let him do it suitably to the strength of body and mind which God supplieth to him; that, in the exercise of all his gifts, God may be glorified through Jesus Christ, the wise dispenser of these gifts; to whom be ascribed the glory of them, and the power of dispensing them, for ever and ever. Amen.

12 Beloved, wonder not at the fire of persecution now raging among you, which is appointed to you for a trial of your faith, as if something happened to you which never happened to the people of God before.

13 But seeing, for calling him the Son of God, ye partake of the sufferings which Christ endured for the same cause, rejoice in your sufferings, that also at the day of the revelation of his glory as the Son of God, ye may rejoice, being transported with joy on account of the greatness of your reward.

14 Besides, if ye be reproached for bearing the name of Christ, ye are happy even in the present life, because the Spirit of honour and of God resteth upon you. By your persecutors, indeed, Christ is evil spoken of as an impostor, but by you who suffer for believing him to be the Son of God, and who are supported by him in your sufferings, he is greatly praised.

15 Wherefore, let none of you suffer by your own fault as a mur-wisdom. When applied to the mind, as in this passage, it signifies to be meek under provocation: when applied to the body, it signifies to be temperate in the use of meat and drink, and other sensual gratifications.

3. And watch unto prayers.]—This is the advice our Lord gave to his disciples when he foretold the destruction of Jerusalem, Luke xxi. 36.—The word ῥησιν signifies both to be sober and to watch. In this passage it signifies to watch, because it follows a word which signifies to be sober; and both are necessary preparations for prayer, which, to those who might have occasion to go to Jerusalem, the apostle recommended as the best means of avoiding the calamities that were coming on that devoted city.

Ver. 11.—1. If any one speak, let him speak as the oracles of God require.]—Let him speak nothing but what hath been revealed to him; and let him speak with gravity and earnestness.—For the meaning of ῥησιν, oracles, see Rom. iii. 2. note 2. Heb. v. 12. note.

2. To whom be the glory.]—It is uncertain whether the relative (ὃς) refers to God or to Christ. Understood of Christ, this doxology is perfectly proper, being given to him Rev. i. 6.

Ver. 12. Wonder not (see verse 4. note 1.) at the burning.]—The word πυρρῶς, burning, denotes the grievous persecution which the Christians in Pontus, &c. were suffering for their faith. The metaphor is bold but noble. It represents them as having fire cast on them for the trial of their faith, as gold is tried by fire, chap. i. 7. to which the apostle alludes. This figure in a lively manner expresses the painful and dangerous nature of their trial.

Ver. 14.—1. If ye be reproached.]—To an ingenuous mind, reproach is often worse than the spoiling of goods, or even than bodily pain. Wherefore, to comfort the brethren when reviled, the apostle put them in mind of Christ's words, Matt. v. 11. 'Blessed are ye when men shall revile you,' &c.

2. The Spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you.]—This is an allusion to Isaiah xl. 2. 'The Spirit of glory,' which rested on the persecuted disciples of Christ in the first age, was a spirit of fortitude, enabling them to suffer the greatest evils without shrinking; a virtue which the heathens greatly admired. For which reason, when they put the first Christians to death for refusing to worship idols, they were so struck with the constancy, patience, meekness, and benevolence, wherewith they suffered, that it led many of them to think well, both of a religion which inspired its votaries with such admirable virtues, and of those votaries themselves. And, as this constancy in suffering, from which the Christians derived so much glory, proceeded from the aid of the Spirit of God, the apostle justly termed it, both the Spirit of glory and the Spirit of God.

Ver. 15.—1. Wherefore, let none of you suffer as a murderer, &c.]—This caution the apostle gave to the Jewish Christians, because, at suffer as a murderer, or a thief, or a malefactor,² or as a meddling person.³

16 However, if ANY ONE SUFFER as a Christian,¹ let him not be ashamed, but let him even glorify God on that account.

17 (Ort, 260.) Indeed the time is come, that punishment¹ must begin at the house of God,² (chap. ii. §. note 2.); and if IT BEGIN first (αφ') at us, what WILL the end BE of them who obey not the gospel of God!

18 And if the righteous with difficulty¹ can be saved, where will the ungodly and the sinner (γενναί, 2d future of the Indic. Med. voc.) shew themselves?

19 (Ort, 331.) Wherefore, let even those who suffer by the will of God,¹ (ver. 15.), commit (τας ψυχὰς αὐτῶν) their own lives² to HIM in well-doing, as to a faithful Creator.

the time he wrote his epistle, the unbelieving Jews in Judea were extremely addicted to murder, and robbery, and every kind of wickedness; for they robbed and killed not only the heathens, but their own brethren who would not join them in their opposition to the Romans, as appears from the account which Josephus hath given of them.

2. Or a malefactor,]—that is, an adulterer, a sodomite, a perjured person.

3. Or as a meddling person.]-Αλλοτρίων πικρῶς, alienorum inspector. Estius.—As the apostle is speaking of their suffering for being meddling persons, meddling must be something criminal. According to Le Clerc, it was the inspecting of the behaviour of persons in public offices, from a factious disposition to find fault with their conduct, and thereby to raise commotions in the state; which was the practice of the Jews in Alexandria, Cosarea, and other places, as Lardner hath shewn, Credibil. B. i. c. 8. page 443. L'Enfant takes this word in the more general sense of meddling with other people's affairs, from avarice, anger, revenge, malice, or other bad passions. Estius thinks it denotes one who covetously looks on the goods of others, with an intention to take them away by force. In the Vulgate it is translated, alienorum appetitor.

Ver. 16. Suffer as a Christian.]-This, with Acts xi. 26. xvi. 28. are the only passages of scripture in which the disciples are called Christians, after their Master.

Ver. 17.—1. Indeed the time is come, that punishment must begin.]-The punishment which the apostle speaks of, is that which Christ had described Matt. xxiii. 35. 'That on you may come all the righteous blood shed,' &c.

derer, or a thief, or a malefactor, or as a meddling person; sufferings of this kind, however courageously borne, bring neither glory nor reward to the sufferers.

16 However, if any one suffer because he is a Christian, let him not be ashamed of his sufferings, though ever so ignominious; but let him rather even praise God, for having judged him worthy to suffer in so good a cause, and enable him to suffer.

17 Indeed the time is come, that the punishment to be inflicted on the Jews as a nation, for their crimes from first to last, must begin at you Jewish Christians, now become the house of God. And if it begin first at us, who are so dear to God on account of our faith in his Son, what will the end be of those Jews who obey not the gospel of God?

18 And when God thus punishes the nation, if the righteous Jews who believe in Christ with difficulty can be saved, where will the ungodly and the sinful part of the nation shew themselves saved from the divine vengeance?

19 In thus punishing the Jews God is just: Wherefore, let even the Gentile Christians who suffer with them in Judea by the will of God, use no unlawful means for preserving themselves, but commit their own lives to him in well-doing, as to a faithful Creator, who can and will most certainly restore their lives to them at the resurrection.

2. At the house of God.]-So the believing Jews are called, because they were now become the family and people of God, in the room of the unbelieving Jews. See the illustration of this verse in the View.

Ver. 18. With difficulty (so the word μολις signifies) can be saved.]-That the apostle is not speaking here of the difficulty of the salvation of the righteous at the day of judgment, will be evident to any one who considers 2 Pet. i. 11. 'Thus there shall be richly ministered to you an entrance into the everlasting kingdom.' What he speaks of is, the difficulty of the preservation of the Christians at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem. Yet they were preserved; for so Christ promised, Matt. xxiv. 13. But the ungodly and wicked Jews were saved neither in Judea nor anywhere else.

Ver. 19.—1. Let even those who suffer by the will of God, &c.]-The apostle added this direction, for the sake of such Gentile Christians as might be in Judea during the war. For the Christians in the first age being considered by the heathens as a sect of the Jews, the Romans could not distinguish them from the Jews, in the punishments which they inflicted on that rebellious nation.

2. Commit their own lives.]-Παρατίθεσθαι, commit them as a deposit (see 2 Tim. i. 12. note 3.) to be restored to them at the resurrection.—Lives; so the word ψυχὰς is translated, Matt. x. 39.—But if it is understood in this passage of our souls, there is an allusion, in this direction, to Christ's words on the cross, Luke xxiii. 46. 'Father, into thy hands (παρέδωκεν τὸ πνεῦμα μου) I commit my spirit.'

CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Precepts given in this Chapter.

BECAUSE the knowledge and good behaviour of the people depend in a great measure upon the kind of instructions which they receive from their teachers, the apostle in this chapter addressed the elders, that is, the bishops, pastors, rulers, and deacons, among the brethren of Pontus, &c. ver. 1.—exhorting the bishops, in particular, to feed the flock of God committed to their care faithfully; and to exercise their episcopal office, not as by constraint, but willingly; not from the love of gain, but from love to their Master and to the flock, ver. 2.—and not to lord it over God's heritages, but to be patterns of humility and disinterestedness to their people, ver. 3.—This exhortation to bishops to feed Christ's flock, was given with much propriety by Peter, who had himself been appointed by Christ to feed his lambs and his sheep.—Next, because the faithful performance of the bishop's office was in that age attended with great difficulty and danger, the apostle, to encourage the bishops, assured them, that when the chief Shepherd shall appear, they shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away, ver. 4.—The distinguished reward which Christ is to bestow on those who have suffered for his sake, being a favourite topic with our apostle, he introduces it often in this epistle.

Having thus exhorted the pastors, the apostle turned his discourse to the people, charging them to be subject to their elders, and to one another; that is, to be of a teachable disposition, and to receive instruction from every one capable of giving it, and to do all the duties which they owed to each other, according to their different stations and relations, ver. 5.—But especially to be subject to God, by humbly submitting themselves to the judgments which were coming upon them, that God might exalt them in due time, ver. 6.—casting all their anxious care on God, because he cared for them, ver. 7.—and to watch against the devil, who went about as a roaring lion seeking to destroy them, by instigating the wicked to persecute them, and driving them into apostasy, ver. 8.—but they were to resist that terrible enemy, by steadfastness in the faith; and not to think themselves hardly dealt with when persecuted, knowing that their brethren everywhere were exposed to the same temptations of the devil, ver. 9.—In the mean time, to give them all the assistance in his power, the apostle prayed earnestly to God to stablish and strengthen them, ver. 10.—and ended his prayer with a doxology to God, expressive of his supreme dominion over the universe, and all the things it contains.

The apostle informed the brethren of Pontus, that he had sent this letter to them by Silvanus, whom he praised for his fidelity to Christ, ver. 12.—Then giving them the salutation of the church in Babylon, where it seems he was when he wrote this letter, he added the salutation of Mark, whom he called his son, either because he had converted him, or on account of the great attachment which Mark bore to him, ver. 13.—And having desired them to salute one another, he concluded with giving them his apostolical benediction, ver. 14.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. V.—1 The elders¹ who are among you I exhort, who ἀν (συμμετέχοντες) a fellow-elder,² and a witness³ of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory⁴ which is to be revealed.

2 Feed the flock of God which is (ω, 162.) with you, (ἐπισκοπῶντες) exercising the bishop's office, not by constraint, but willingly; neither for the sake of base gain, but (πρὸς θυμῳ) from good disposition;⁵

3 Neither as lord⁶ing it¹ over the heritages of God;² But being (τύποι) patterns to the flock.

4 And when the chief Shepherd (see chap. ii. 25. note) shall appear, ye shall receive the crown of glory which ἀδελφὸν not away.

5 For the like reason,¹ ye younger persons,² subject yourselves to the elders. Yea, all be subject to one another, and be clothed with humility;³ for God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble.

6 Be humbled, therefore, under the strong hand of God, (chap. iv. 12.), that he may exalt you in due time.

7 Cast all your anxious care on him,¹ (ὅτι, 254.) because he careth for you.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. V.—1 The elders who are among you in your different churches, I exhort in what follows; who am a fellow-elder, and witness of the sufferings of Christ in the garden and on the cross, and a partaker of his glory of governing the world by the gospel, which glory is to be manifested at the last day.

2 Feed the flock of God which is committed to your care, faithfully exercising the bishop's office, not constrained thereto by men, but willingly, from a sense of the excellence and usefulness of the office; neither exercise it for the sake of gaining a maintenance, but from a good disposition to promote the glory of God and to save souls;

3 Neither as lord⁶ing it¹ over the flocks which are the heritages of God: But being patterns to the flock in disinterestedness, temperance, humility, and charity to the poor.

4 And to encourage you, know that when the chief Shepherd shall appear to judge the world, ye who have discharged your duty to your flocks faithfully, shall receive from him the crown of glory which ἀδελφὸν not away.

5 For the like reason, ye the people subject yourselves to the elders, receiving their instructions and reproofs with humility. Yea, all of you be subject to one another, in the various relations wherein ye stand to each other, and be clothed with humility; for God resisteth the proud, and casteth them down, but giveth the aid of his Spirit to the humble.

6 Seeing God resisteth the proud, be humbled under the strong hand of God; take his corrections patiently, that according to his promise, he may exalt you to the possession of heaven in due time.

7 In your distresses, cast all your anxious care on God, (Psalm. lv. 23.), because, in the most affectionate manner, he careth for you effectually.

Ver. 1.—1. The elders.]—Elder, as a name of office, belonged indifferently to bishops, presidents, teachers, and deacons, Acts xiv. 23. See 1 Tim. v. 17. note 1.

2. Who am a fellow-elder.]—Here Peter shewed his great modesty; for though he was one of the chief apostles, he took the title of elder only. And to render his exhortation acceptable to the elders of Pontus, he called himself their fellow-elder. The commentators justly observe, that if Peter had been the prince or chief of the apostles, as the Papists affirm, he would in this place, and in the inscription of his two epistles, certainly have assumed to himself that high prerogative. The circumstances of Peter's being a fellow-elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, &c. are mentioned to give weight to his exhortation.

3. And a witness of the sufferings of Christ.]—One of the purposes for which Christ chose twelve of his disciples to be with him always, was, that having heard his discourses, and seen his miracles and sufferings, they might be able to testify these things to the world, as what they themselves heard and saw. Wherefore, μάρτυς, a witness, in this passage signifies not only one who was present at a transaction, but who testifies it to others.

4. A partaker of the glory which is to be revealed.]—The glory to be revealed is Christ's glory of governing the world by his gospel. This glory, of which Peter and the rest who preached the gospel by inspiration, were partakers, is to be illustriously manifested at the last day, when Christ will judge the world by the gospel which was preached by his apostles. See 2 Pet. i. 3. where also δοξά signifies the apostolic office.

Ver. 2.—1. Exercising the bishop's office, not by constraint, but willingly.]—In the first age, when the profession of the gospel exposed men to persecution, and when the persecution fell more especially on the bishops, it may easily be imagined, that some who were appointed to that office, would undertake it unwillingly; perhaps, because they were not disposed to do the duties thereof diligently, or because they were not willing to suffer. In such cases, the apostle very properly advised persons to decline the office.

2. But from good disposition.]—So I have translated πρὸς θυμῳ, because it is opposed to the desire of base gain, mentioned in the preceding clause; also to distinguish it from ἐκ θυμῳ, willingly, mentioned likewise in the preceding clause. In the Syriac version, this word is translated to corde.—Benson's observation on this verse is, "How severely are they here condemned who feed themselves and not the flock; who take the patrimony of the church, and commit the care of souls to others, to whom they allow a very small share of that plenty which they have for doing ill."

Ver. 3.—1. Neither as lord⁶ing it¹.]—Κατακυριεύωντες. This is a strong word, denoting that tyranny which the men of this world often exercise, when they have obtained offices of power.

2. Over the heritages of God.]—The word κληρονομία properly signifies a lot. But, because the land of Canaan was divided among the Israelites by lot, the word came to signify an heritage. Wherefore, believers being God's people, or portion, the different churches or congregations for worship are called here God's heritages.—In process of time the name κληρικός, clergy, was appropriated to the ministers of the gospel, because, being considered as the successors of the Levitical priests, they were regarded as God's lot or portion. From this prohibition it would seem, that in the apostle's days, the bishops were beginning to assume that dominion over their flocks, which in after-times they carried to the greatest height of tyranny. Or St. Peter, by inspiration foreseeing what was to happen, condemned in this prohibition the tyranny which in after-times the clergy exercised. Bengelius thinks the power exercised by the Christian bishops, anciently called Seniores, elders, gave rise to the French title Monsieur, and to the Italian Signore, &c.

Ver. 4. Which ἀδελφὸν not away.]—This is an allusion to the crowns of green leaves of trees and herbs, bestowed by the ancients as the rewards of military prowess, or of victory in the games. See 1 Cor. ix. 25. note 2. These, together with the honours of which they were the symbols, soon faded away. But the crown of glory, the reward to be given to faithful shepherds, will never fade, being 'a crown of righteousness,' 2 Tim. iv. 8. and 'a crown of life,' James i. 12.

Ver. 5.—1. For the like reason.]—So the word ὁμοίως signifies here. For the preceding being an exhortation to the elders to feed the flock, and not to lord it over God's heritages, the apostle could not begin his exhortation to the people with saying to them, 'In like manner subject yourselves to the elders.' But he might say to them, with propriety, 'For the like reason, that ye are to receive a crown of glory, subject yourselves to the elders.'

2. Ye younger persons, subject yourselves.]—As, in the preceding part of this chapter, the apostle by an elder means a person holding a sacred office, such as a pastor or teacher, it is reasonable to think that he uses the word in the same sense here; consequently, that νεώτεροι, which signifies an inferior of any kind, Luke xlii. 26. and which is opposed to it here, denotes the laity or people of the churches of Pontus, whom the apostle further exhorts to be subject to one another.

3. And be clothed with humility.]—Ἐνυποτασσάμενοι. Julius Pollux, lib. iv. c. 18. tells us that the ὑπομύημα was a white cloak used by slaves. Whitby says it was a frock put over the rest of the clothes; and that the apostle's meaning is, "that humility should be visible over all the other Christian virtues, in our whole behaviour."

Ver. 7. Cast all your anxious care on him.]—Lest the brethren of Pontus might have been too much distressed with the fears of their suffer as a murderer, or a thief, or a malefactor,² or as a meddling person.³

16 However, if ANY ONE SUFFER as a Christian,¹ let him not be ashamed, but let him even glorify God on that account.

17 (Ort, 260.) Indeed the time is come, that punishment¹ must begin at the house of God,² (chap. ii. §. note 2.); and if IT BEGIN first (aq') at us, what WILL the end BE of them who obey not the gospel of God?

18 And if the righteous with difficulty¹ can be saved, where will the ungodly and the sinner (συνετα, 2d future of the Indic. Med. voc.) shew themselves?

19 (Ort, 331.) Wherefore, let even those who suffer by the will of God,¹ (ver. 15.), commit (τας ψυχας αυτων) their own lives² to HIM in well-doing, as to a faithful Creator.

the time he wrote his epistle, the unbelieving Jews in Judea were extremely addicted to murder, and robbery, and every kind of wickedness; for they robbed and killed not only the heathens, but their own brethren who would not join them in their opposition to the Romans, as appears from the account which Josephus hath given of them.

2. Or a malefactor,]—that is, an adulterer, a sodomite, a perjured person.

3. Or as a meddling person.]—ΑΛΛΗΤΕΡΩΣΙΩΝΕΣ, alienorum inspector. Estius.—As the apostle is speaking of their suffering for being meddling persons, meddling must be something criminal. According to Le Clerc, it was the inspecting of the behaviour of persons in public offices, from a factious disposition to find fault with their conduct, and thereby to raise commotions in the state; which was the practice of the Jews in Alexandria, Cesarea, and other places, as Lardner hath shewn, Credib. B. l. c. 8. page 443. L'Enfant takes this word in the more general sense of meddling with other people's affairs, from avarice, anger, revenge, malice, or other bad passions. Estius thinks it denotes one who covetously looks on the goods of others, with an intention to take them away by force. In the Vulgate it is translated, alienorum appetitor.

Ver. 16. Suffer as a Christian.]—This, with Acts xi. 26. xvi. 28. are the only passages of scripture in which the disciples are called Christians, after their Master.

Ver. 17.—1. Indeed the time is come, that punishment must begin.]—The punishment which the apostle speaks of, is that which Christ had described Matt. xxiii. 35. 'That on you may come all the righteous blood shed,' &c.

derer, or a thief, or a malefactor, or as a meddling person; sufferings of this kind, however courageously borne, bring neither glory nor reward to the sufferers.

16 However, if any one suffer because he is a Christian, let him not be ashamed of his sufferings, though ever so ignominious; but let him rather even praise God, for having judged him worthy to suffer in so good a cause, and enable him to suffer.

17 Indeed the time is come, that the punishment to be inflicted on the Jews as a nation, for their crimes from first to last, must begin at you Jewish Christians, now become the house of God. And if it begin first at us, who are so dear to God on account of our faith in his Son, what will the end be of those Jews who obey not the gospel of God?

18 And when God thus punishes the nation, if the righteous Jews who believe in Christ with difficulty can be saved, where will the ungodly and the sinful part of the nation shew themselves saved from the divine vengeance?

19 In thus punishing the Jews God is just: Wherefore, let even the Gentile Christians who suffer with them in Judea by the will of God, use no unlawful means for preserving themselves, but commit their own lives to him in well-doing, as to a faithful Creator, who can and will most certainly restore their lives to them at the resurrection.

2. At the house of God.]—So the believing Jews are called, because they were now become the family and people of God, in the room of the unbelieving Jews. See the illustration of this verse in the View.

Ver. 18. With difficulty (so the word μάλα; signifies) can be saved.]—That the apostle is not speaking here of the difficulty of the salvation of the righteous at the day of judgment, will be evident to any one who considers 2 Pet. i. 11. 'Thus there shall be richly ministered to you an entrance into the everlasting kingdom.' What he speaks of is, the difficulty of the preservation of the Christians at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem. Yet they were preserved; for so Christ promised, Matt. xxiv. 13. But the ungodly and wicked Jews were saved neither in Judea nor anywhere else.

Ver. 19.—1. Let even those who suffer by the will of God, &c.]—The apostle added this direction, for the sake of such Gentile Christians as might be in Judea during the war. For the Christians in the first age being considered by the heathens as a sect of the Jews, the Romans could not distinguish them from the Jews, in the punishments which they inflicted on that rebellious nation.

2. Commit their own lives.]—Παρατίθεσθαι, commit them as a deposit (see 2 Tim. i. 12. note 3.) to be restored to them at the resurrection.—Lives; so the word ψυχας is translated, Matt. x. 39.—But if it is understood in this passage of our souls, there is an allusion, in this direction, to Christ's words on the cross, Luke xxiii. 46. 'Father, into thy hands (παρέδωκεν τα πνευμα μου) I commit my spirit.'

CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Precepts given in this Chapter.

BECAUSE the knowledge and good behaviour of the people depend in a great measure upon the kind of instructions which they receive from their teachers, the apostle in this chapter addressed the elders, that is, the bishops, pastors, rulers, and deacons, among the brethren of Pontus, &c. ver. 1.—exhorting the bishops, in particular, to feed the flock of God committed to their care faithfully; and to exercise their episcopal office, not as by constraint, but willingly; not from the love of gain, but from love to their Master and to the flock, ver. 2.—and not to lord it over God's heritages, but to be patterns of humility and disinterestedness to their people, ver. 3.—This exhortation to bishops to feed Christ's flock, was given with much propriety by Peter, who had himself been appointed by Christ to feed his lambs and his sheep.—Next, because the faithful performance of the bishop's office was in that age attended with great difficulty and danger, the apostle, to encourage the bishops, assured them, that when the chief Shepherd shall appear, they shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away, ver. 4.—The distinguished reward which Christ is to bestow on those who have suffered for his sake, being a favourite topic with our apostle, he introduces it often in this epistle.

Having thus exhorted the pastors, the apostle turned his discourse to the people, charging them to be subject to their elders, and to one another; that is, to be of a teachable disposition, and to receive instruction from every one capable of giving it, and to do all the duties which they owed to each other, according to their different stations and relations, ver. 5.—But especially to be subject to God, by humbly submitting themselves to the judgments which were coming upon them, that God might exalt them in due time, ver. 6.—casting all their anxious care on God, because he cared for them, ver. 7.—and to watch against the devil, who went about as a roaring lion seeking to destroy them, by instigating the wicked to persecute them, and driving them into apostasy, ver. 8.—but they were to resist that terrible enemy, by steadfastness in the faith; and not to think themselves hardly dealt with when persecuted, knowing that their brethren everywhere were exposed to the same temptations of the devil, ver. 9.—In the mean time, to give them all the assistance in his power, the apostle prayed earnestly to God to stablish and strengthen them, ver. 10.—and ended his prayer with a doxology to God, expressive of his supreme dominion over the universe, and all the things it contains.

The apostle informed the brethren of Pontus, that he had sent this letter to them by Silvanus, whom he praised for his fidelity to Christ, ver. 12.—Then giving them the salutation of the church in Babylon, where it seems he was when he wrote this letter, he added the salutation of Mark, whom he called his son, either because he had converted him, or on account of the great attachment which Mark bore to him, ver. 13.—And having desired them to salute one another, he concluded with giving them his apostolical benediction, ver. 14.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. V.—1 The elders who are among you in your different churches, I exhort in what follows; who am a fellow-elder, and witness of the sufferings of Christ in the garden and on the cross, and a partaker of his glory of governing the world by the gospel, which glory is to be manifested at the last day.

2 Feed the flock of God which is committed to your care, faithfully exercising the bishop's office, not constrained thereto by men, but willingly, from a sense of the excellence and usefulness of the office; neither exercise it for the sake of gaining a maintenance, but from a good disposition to promote the glory of God and to save souls;

3 Neither as lord⁷ it over the flocks which are the heritages of God: But being patterns to the flock in disinterestedness, temperance, humility, and charity to the poor.

4 And to encourage you, know that when the chief Shepherd shall appear to judge the world, ye who have discharged your duty to your flocks faithfully, shall receive from him the crown of glory which fadeth not away.

5 For the like reason, ye the people subject yourselves to the elders, receiving their instructions and reproofs with humility. Yea, all of you be subject to one another, in the various relations wherein ye stand to each other, and be clothed with humility; for God resisteth the proud, and casteth them down, but giveth the aid of his Spirit to the humble.

6 Seeing God resisteth the proud, be humbled under the strong hand of God; take his corrections patiently, that according to his promise, he may exalt you to the possession of heaven in due time.

7 In your distresses, cast all your anxious care on God, (Psalm. lv. 22.), because, in the most affectionate manner, he careth for you effectually.

2. Over the heritages of God.]—The word κληρες, properly signifies a lot. But, because the land of Canaan was divided among the Israelites by lot, the word came to signify an heritage. Wherefore, believers being God's people, or portion, the different churches or congregations for worship are called here God's heritages. In process of time the name κληρες, clergy, was appropriated to the ministers of the gospel, because, being considered as the successors of the Levitical priests, they were regarded as God's lot or portion. From this prohibition it would seem, that in the apostle's days, the bishops were beginning to assume that dominion over their flocks, which in after-times they carried to the greatest height of tyranny. Or St. Peter, by inspiration foreseeing what was to happen, condemned in this prohibition the tyranny which in after-times the clergy exercised. Bengelius thinks the power exercised by the Christian bishops, anciently called Seniores, elders, gave rise to the French title Monsieur, and to the Italian Signore, &c.

Ver. 4. Which fadeth not away.]—This is an allusion to the crowns of green leaves of trees and herbs, bestowed by the ancients as the rewards of military prowess, or of victory in the games. See 1 Cor. ix. 25. note 2. These, together with the honours of which they were the symbols, soon faded away. But the crown of glory, the reward to be given to faithful shepherds, will never fade, being 'a crown of righteousness,' 2 Tim. iv. 8. and 'a crown of life,' James i. 12.

Ver. 5.—1. For the like reason.]—So the word ιναυτως signifies here. For the preceding being an exhortation to the elders to feed the flock, and not to lord it over God's heritages, the apostle could not begin his exhortation to the people with saying to them, 'In like manner subject yourselves to the elders.' But he might say to them, with propriety, 'For the like reason, that ye are to receive a crown of glory, subject yourselves to the elders.'

2. Ye younger persons, subject yourselves.]—As, in the preceding part of this chapter, the apostle by an elder means a person holding a sacred office, such as a pastor or teacher, it is reasonable to think that he uses the word in the same sense here: consequently, that υποτασσιν, which signifies an inferior of any kind, Luke xli. 26. and which is opposed to it here, denotes the laity or people of the churches of Pontus, whom the apostle further exhorts to be subject to one another.

3. And be clothed with humility.]—Ενδυσθηναι. Julius Pollux, lib. iv. c. 18. tells us that the χιτων was a white cloak used by slaves. Whitty says it was a frock put over the rest of the clothes; and that the apostle's meaning is, "that humility should be visible over all the other Christian virtues, in our whole behaviour."

Ver. 7. Cast all your anxious care on him.]—Lest the brethren of Pontus might have been too much distressed with the fears of their being reduced to want by the persecution they were suffering, and of their being tempted thereby to renounce the gospel, the apostle exhorted them to be only moderately solicitous to avoid these dangers, and to cast their anxious care on God.

Ver. 8. Be sober, be vigilant.]—This advice the apostle had given before, chap. iv. 7. (See note 2. there). But he enforces it here by a new reason, 'That the devil is going about seeking whom he may swallow up.' So the word αυτος, literally signifies; being used concerning solids as well as liquids. It strongly expresses the insatiable rage of the enemy of mankind to hinder their salvation, and the danger we are in from his devices. For he sometimes attacks the people of God in person, though not visible; and sometimes by his ministers, the other evil spirits who are in league with him; and sometimes by wicked men his subjects, whom he instigates to tempt them by the terror of persecution. This account of the devil's malice is given with great propriety by Peter, to whom our Lord said, 'Simon, Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat; but I have prayed for thee.' Peter likewise had good reason, as Doddridge observes, to recommend watchfulness, since he had fallen so shamefully himself, notwithstanding this warning from his Master.—Benson by the devil understands the unbelieving Jews, who persecuted the Christians with great fury.

Ver. 9. Him resist, steadfast in the faith.]—To shew the efficacy of faith in enabling us to resist temptation, Paul calls it a shield, Eph. vi. 16. 'wherewith the fiery darts of the wicked one,' &c.

Ver. 10. After ye have suffered a little.]—St. Peter calls the sufferings of the first Christians αλις, a little, either in respect of time or of degree, or perhaps in respect of both; because, compared with the joys of heaven, the sufferings of this life are both light and momentary.

Ver. 11. To him be the glory, &c.]—By this doxology Peter expressed his firm persuasion, that the devil hath no title to any honour from men, nor any dominion in the universe, nor power to tempt men, but by permission from God.

Ver. 12.—1. By Silvanus, a faithful brother.]—If Silvanus by whom this letter was sent, is, as Oecumenius supposes, the person of that name who joined Paul in writing the epistles to the Thessalonians, he is the Silas who is called, Acts xv. 22. 'a chief man among the brethren,' and ver. 32. 'a prophet;' and being Paul's constant companion in travel, after the defection of John Mark, he no doubt assisted in planting churches in Galatia and the other countries of the Lesser Asia mentioned in the inscription: so, being well known to the brethren in these parts, he was a fit person to carry this letter. He is called here by Peter 'a faithful brother.' And without doubt he must have been an excellent person, and very zealous in the cause of the gospel, who attended Paul in so many painful journeys undertaken for the service of Christ, and who on this occasion was willing to go into Pontus, Galatia, &c. with Peter's epistle to the churches in these widely extended countries. Probably, after Paul's

8 Yet do not neglect lawful means for delivering yourselves out of trouble. Wherefore, be temperate, be vigilant at all times, because your adversary the devil is going about continually as a fierce lion, seeking whom he may swallow up.

9 Him resist (see James iv. 7.) by being steadfast in the faith, knowing that the very same kinds of sufferings, proceeding from the devil and his instruments, which ye now sustain, are allotted to your Christian brethren who are dispersed through the world.

10 And may God the author of all goodness, who hath called us to the enjoyment of his eternal happiness by Christ Jesus, after ye have suffered a little, himself make you complete in the virtues, support you in the exercise of them, strengthen you to resist temptations, and settle you in the profession of the gospel.

11 To him be the glory of all perfection, and the dominion of the universe ascribed by us, for ever and ever. Amen.

12 By Silvanus, a faithful brother as I conclude from the general tenor of his behaviour, I have written to you in few words, to encourage you to persevere in the belief and profession of the gospel, exhorting you, and strongly testifying to you, that this is the true gospel of God in which ye stand: it contains a true account of the salvation of sinners.

13 The members of the church which is in Babylon, who are elected jointly with you to be the people of God, and Mark, whom I love as my own son, salute you.

14 Salute one another with a kiss in testimony of your mutual love. Happiness be to all among you who are steadfast in the belief and profession of the gospel. Amen.

death, Silas attached himself to Peter as his assistant, and reckoned himself much honoured by this commission to carry the apostle's letter into the Lesser Asia, which he executed faithfully.

2. A faithful brother as I conclude.]—Peter having become intimately acquainted with Silvanus only since Paul's death, 'he concluded him to be a faithful brother,' from his having so long jointly laboured with Paul in the work of the gospel.

3. And strongly testifying.]—According to Bengelius, the preposition οτι in the word αλις, is used to signify that Peter added his testimony to that of Paul and Silas, concerning the truth of the gospel which they preached to the Galatians, &c. But I think the meaning is simply, that Peter testified concerning the gospel which had been preached to the Galatians, that it is the true gospel; consequently, that the rites of the law were not necessary to salvation.

Ver. 13.—1. The church which is in Babylon.]—See Pref. sect. 5. The word church is not in the original. But it is supplied in the Syriac, Vulgate, and other ancient versions, and by Oecumenius. Grotius approves of the addition; and Beza observes very well, that Peter omitted the word church, as is often done with regard to words of common use. But Mill and Wall think the translation should be, 'She who is in Babylon;' and that the apostle meant his own wife; or some honourable woman in that city. Lardner says, it is not probable that Peter would send a salutation to the Christians of so many countries, from a woman not named.

2. Elected jointly with you.]—The apostle, in the beginning of his letter, had called the strangers of the dispersion 'elected according to the foreknowledge of God.' Here he tells them, that the church at Babylon 'was elected jointly with them,' to be the people of God.

3. And Mark my son.]—Heuman, following the opinion of some of the ancients mentioned by Oecumenius, supposes this Mark to be Peter's own son by his wife. But others are of opinion, that he calls him his son because he had converted him; so that he was his son according to the spirit, and not according to the flesh. This opinion is probable, because Peter was well acquainted with the family of which Mark was a member, as may be gathered from his going immediately to 'the house of Mary, the mother of John whose surname was Mark,' after he was miraculously brought out of prison by the angel, Acts xii. 12. This John Mark was Barnabas's sister's son, Col. iv. 20. and the person who accompanied Paul and Barnabas as their minister, in their first journey among the idolatrous Gentiles, Acts xiii. 5. But he deserted them in Pamphylia, ver. 13. Afterwards, however, he accompanied Paul in some of his journeys, Col. iv. 10; and during his second imprisonment at Rome, the apostle ordered Timothy to bring Mark to Rome, because he was useful to him in the ministry, 2 Tim. iv. 11. See the note on that verse. It is generally believed, that John Mark was the author of the gospel called According to Mark.

II. PETER.

PREFACE.

SECT. I.—Of the Authenticity of the Second Epistle of Peter.

IN the Preface to the epistle of James, (sect. 2. initio), and in that to 1 Peter, (sect. 2. initio), the doubts which the ancients entertained concerning the authenticity of five of the seven Catholic epistles, are faithfully declared. But at the same time it is proved, that the doubted epistles were very early known, and well received by many. On this subject it is proper to put the reader in mind, that these epistles were rendered doubtful by a circumstance mentioned in the Gen. Pref. p. 1. namely, that the doubted epistles are omitted in the first Syriac translation of the New Testament, which is supposed to have been made in the second century. But the only conclusion that can be drawn from the omission is, that the author had not seen these epistles, or rather that they were not generally known when he made his version. Now this might easily happen, if, as it is probable, he was a Syrian Jew. For Syria being at a great distance from Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, the proconsular Asia and Bithynia, to whose inhabitants the epistles under consideration were originally sent, it would be a considerable time before copies of them were dispersed among the people for whom the Syriac version of the New Testament was made, so that the author might think it useless to translate them.

With respect to the doubts which some entertained of these epistles, after they came to be known, they serve to prove that the ancient Christians were very cautious of receiving any books as canonical, whose authority they were not perfectly assured of. For as Wall, Crit. Notes, vol. iii. p. 358. very well observes, "They not only rejected all the writings forged by heretics under the names of the apostles; but if any good book, affirmed by some man or by some church to have been written and sent by some apostle, was offered to them, they would not, till fully satisfied of the fact, receive it into their canon." Wherefore, though the five epistles above-mentioned were not immediately acknowledged as inspired writings, in the countries at a distance from the churches or persons to whom they were originally sent, it is no proof that they were looked on as forgeries. It only shews that the persons who doubted of them had not received complete and incontestable evidence of their authenticity; just as their being afterwards universally received is a demonstration, that, upon the strictest inquiry, they found them the genuine productions of the apostles of Christ whose names they bear.—For the churches to whom these letters were sent, hearing that doubts were entertained concerning them, would no doubt of their own accord, as well as when asked concerning them, declare them to be genuine. And their attestation made public, joined with the marks of authenticity found in the epistles themselves, in time established their authority beyond all possibility of doubt. The truth is, such good opportunity the ancient Christians had to know the truth in this matter, and so well founded their judgment concerning the books of the New Testament was, that, as Lardner observes, no writing which was by them pronounced genuine, hath since their time been found spurious; neither have we at this day the least reason to think any book genuine which they rejected.

Thus much was necessary to be said concerning the five doubted-of epistles in general. With respect to the second epistle of Peter in particular, it remains to point out the marks of authenticity contained in the epistle itself, which with the attestations of the churches to which it was sent, have fully established its authority.

1. And first it is observable, that the writer styles himself Symeon Peter; from which we conclude that this epistle is the work of the apostle Peter.—If it be objected, that the apostle's name was Simon not Symeon, the answer is, that although in Greek this apostle's name was commonly written Simon, the Hebrew form of it was Symeon; for in the history of Jacob's sons it is so written. Besides, this very apostle is called Symeon, Symeon, Acts xv. 14.—Next, it is objected, that in the first epistle, which is undoubtedly the apostle Peter's, he styles himself, not Simon Peter, but Peter simply. But I observe, that Luke hath called this apostle Simon Peter, chap. v. 8.; and that John hath given him that name no less than seventeen times in his gospel; perhaps to shew that he was the author of the epistle which begins, 'Symeon Peter, a servant, and an apostle,' &c.—Farther, though in the inscription of the first letter, Peter's surname only is mentioned, because by it he was sufficiently known, he might in the inscription of the second, for the greater dignity, insert his name complete; because he intended authoritatively to rebuke the false teachers who had already risen, or were to rise. Upon the whole, Symeon Peter being the same with Simon Peter, no objection can be raised against the authenticity of this epistle on account of the name.

2. The writer of this epistle expressly calls himself in the inscription an apostle. He does the same chap. iii. 2.; and in other places he ascribes to himself things which agree to none but to Peter the apostle. For example, chap. i. 14. 'Knowing that the putting off of my tabernacle is soon to happen, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me;' alluding to John xxi. 19. where we are told that Jesus signified to Peter by what death, when old, 'he should glorify God.'—Chap. i. 16. this writer affirms, that he was one of the three apostles who were with Jesus at his transfiguration, when by a voice from God he was declared to be 'his Son the beloved.'—Chap. iii. 15. this writer calls Paul 'his beloved brother,' in allusion no doubt to his having given Paul the right hand of fellowship: withal he commends his epistles as scriptures, that is, divinely inspired writings. The writer therefore, having thus repeatedly taken to himself the name an character of an inspired apostle, if he was an impostor, he must have been the most profligate of men. See 1 Peter, Pref. sect. 2. paragr. 2.

3. By calling this his Second Epistle, chap. iii. 1. the writer intimates that he had written to them formerly. He insinuates the same thing chap. i. 12—15. and, by so doing, shews himself to be the same Peter who wrote the first epistle. The method which Grotius has taken to elude the force of this presumption, shall be considered afterwards.

4. The matters contained in this epistle are highly worthy of an inspired apostle; for besides a variety of important discoveries, (see sect. v.), all tending to display the perfections of God and the glory of Christ, we find in it exhortations to virtue, and condemnations of vice, delivered with an earnestness and feeling which shew the author to have been incapable of imposing a forged writing upon the world; and that his sole design in this epistle was to promote the interests of truth and virtue in the world.

II. But in opposition to these internal marks of authenticity, and to the testimony of all the ancient Christian writers since the days of Eusebius, who with one voice have ascribed this second epistle, as well as the first, to the apostle Peter, Salmasius, and other learned moderns have argued, that because its style is different from the style of the first epistle, it must have been written by some impostor who personated the apostle Peter. This objection shall be fully considered immediately. At present suffice it to say in the general, that if this were a writing forged in the name of an apostle by any impostor, we should certainly find some erroneous tenet, or false fact, asserted in it, for the sake of which the forgery was attempted. Yet nothing of that kind appears in the second epistle of Peter; nothing inconsistent with the doctrine taught in the other writings, which by all are acknowledged to be divinely inspired; in a word, nothing unsuitable, but every thing consonant, to the character of an inspired apostle.

This argument appeared so strong to Grotius, that although, on account of the difference of the sentiments and style observable in the two epistles, he would not allow the second epistle to be Peter's he did not venture to call it the work of an impostor, but supposed it to have been written after the destruction of Jerusalem by Symeon, who succeeded James, our Lord's brother, in the bishopric of Jerusalem. And because the inscription, with the other particulars, in the epistle relating to the writer's character, are utterly inconsistent with Grotius's opinion, he uses a method of removing these difficulties, unworthy so learned a critic, and so good a man. Without the least authority from any ancient MSS. or versions, he confidently affirms that the inscription is interpolated, and that originally it was Symeon, a servant of Jesus Christ.—With the same unauthorized boldness he proposes to expunge the words our beloved brother, which precede the word Paul, chap. iii. 15.—And with respect to the words which this writer says he heard coming from the excellent glory, when he was with Jesus on the holy mount, chap. i. 16. Grotius affirms, "that if some more ancient MSS. could be found, it might thence appear, that these words were added in this place, as other words in other places, by those who were willing to have this pass for an epistle of Peter." But I reply, That if the texts of ancient books are to be altered, at the pleasure of every rash critic, for the sake of supporting some groundless conceit, there will be no such thing as the genuine text of any ancient book whatever. Wherefore, if liberties of this kind are not to be taken with profane authors, far less are they to be allowed in settling the text of the books of scripture, whose authority depends on our naving, not the conjectural emendations of fanciful critics, but the very words of the inspired authors themselves. With respect to the insinuation, that the author of this epistle wrote the first also, contained in the expression, 'This second epistle, beloved, I now write to you,' chap. iii. 1. Grotius says, that the two preceding chapters are the first epistle, and that the second epistle begins with the words, 'This second epistle,' &c. But as in no ancient MS. or version of this epistle is it so divided, and as no author ancient or modern hath spoken of its having been at any time so divided, Grotius's opinion merits no regard.

III. With respect to the objection against the authenticity of the second epistle of Peter, taken from its style being different from the style of the first, it is to be observed, that in the opinion of many learned men this diversity is found only in the second chapter of the second epistle; the style of the first and third chapters being pretty much akin to the style of the first epistle. Wherefore, if the first and second epistles of Peter are thought to have been written by different authors, because the style of the second epistle differs in one chapter from that of the first, we must think that the second epistle itself was written by two different authors, because the style of its first and third chapters differs from that of the second. Yet no such conclusion ought to be drawn in either case; as it is well known that an author's style is regulated by the subjects of which he treats. If these are grand and interesting, they naturally suggest animated and sublime expressions; such as those in the first and third chapters of the second epistle, in which Peter describes the transfiguration of his Master, with the august circumstances which attend it; also the creation of the world, its past demolition by water, and its future destruction by fire.—On the other hand, if the subjects treated of raise an author's indignation and abhorrence, he will use an acrimony of style, expressive of these feelings. Of this kind is the style of the second chapter of the second epistle. For the apostle, whose love to his Master was great, and who had the feeding of Christ's sheep committed to him, regarding the false teachers as the most flagitious of men, wrote that chapter against them with a bitterness which he would not have used in correcting teachers who had erred through simplicity. Moreover, in describing the character, and in foretelling the miserable end of these impostors he adopted the bold figures and lofty expressions peculiar to the eastern writers, as even coming short of what might with truth be said concerning them.—Wherefore, since the diversity of style in the two epistles of Peter can be so well accounted for, even on supposition that they were written by the same author, there is no reason to fancy with Grotius, that the second epistle was written by Symeon bishop of Jerusalem; or with Jerome, that Peter made use of different interpreters for the purpose of turning his Syriac epistle into Greek; or with bishop Sherlock to suppose, that Peter in his second epistle, and Jude in his epistle, copied some ancient Jewish writer, who described the false teachers of their own times, and denounced the judgments of God against them.

SECT. II.—Of the Time when the Second Epistle of Peter was written.

WHEN Peter wrote his second epistle, he was old, and near his end: Chap. i. 14. 'Knowing that the putting off of my tabernacle is soon to happen, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me.' Besides, chap. iii. 16. he speaks as if he had then seen all Paul's epistles: 'As also our beloved brother Paul, according to the wisdom given to him, hath written to you, 16. as indeed in all his epistles,' &c. If Peter had seen all Paul's epistles when he wrote this letter, it is probable that Paul was then dead. Nay, it is thought that Paul was dead when Peter wrote his first letter; at least if he wrote it from Rome, as most of the ancient Christian writers testify, (see I Peter, Pref. sect. 5.) The reason is, when Paul wrote his second to Timothy from Rome, a short while before his martyrdom, though he mentioned many who were then with him, he spake nothing in that letter of Peter; an omission which, if Peter had been in Rome at that time, could not well have happened. Wherefore, if Peter wrote his first epistle from Rome, he must have done it after Paul's death; consequently not sooner than the end of the year 66, or the beginning of the year 67, about three years before the destruction of Jerusalem. For Paul was put to death in the twelfth year of Nero, answering to A. D. 66.

With respect to the second epistle, which, as we have seen, was composed a little before Peter's death, it seems to have been written from Rome likewise not long after the first. For, as Lardner, Can. iii. p. 253. observes, "It is not unlikely, that, soon after the apostle had sent away Silvanus with the first epistle, some came from those countries to Rome, where there was a frequent and general resort from all parts, bringing him an account of the state of religion among them, which induced Peter to write a second epistle, for the establishment of the Christians among whom he had laboured; and he might well hope, that his last words and dying testimony to the doctrines which he had received from Christ, and had taught for many years with unshaken steadfastness, would be of great weight with them." Indeed he seems to make that circumstance his apology for writing a second letter to them so soon after the first. See chap. i. 15. iii. 1.—If the second epistle of Peter was written not long after the first, we may date it in the year 67 or 68, while the persecution against the Christians raged at Rome, and when Peter had an immediate prospect of suffering martyrdom, as the Lord Jesus Christ had shewn him.

It was mentioned, No. 2. that Grotius supposed this epistle was written after the destruction of Jerusalem. But if his opinion be true, it will destroy the authenticity of the epistle as an inspired writing, seeing the only ground on which he rests his opinion is chap. iii. 12. where he says the writer speaks of the end of the world as then at hand: 'Expecting, and earnestly desiring the coming of the day of God, in which the heavens being set on fire shall be dissolved,' &c. For as, according to him, it was a common opinion in the first age that the end of the world was to succeed the destruction of Jerusalem, he supposed the writer of this epistle could not exhort the Christians to 'expect and earnestly desire the coming of the day of the Lord,' &c. unless Jerusalem had been then destroyed. But an exhortation of this sort is no proof that the writer, whoever he was, thought the end of the world was then at hand. He knew the contrary, as is plain from chap. iii. 3. where he expressly foretells, that 'scoffers will come in the last days; saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep,' &c. In the last days, the scoffers, on account of Christ's long delaying to come, would ridicule his promises, and his disciples' expectation of that grand event. It being thus evident that the writer of this epistle did not think the end of the world was then at hand, (see 2 Thess. Pref. sect. 3.), his exhortation to expect, and earnestly desire the coming of the day of the Lord, does not imply that the day of the Lord's coming to destroy the world was then at hand, but that being kept hid from all mankind, and absolutely uncertain, believers ought always to be prepared for it. And as at that day the living are to be changed, and the dead to be loosed from the bands of death, and the whole crowned as victors, it ever was, and till it happen, ever will be, the object both of their earnest desire and of their firm hope. Grotius's argument, therefore, to prove that this epistle was written after the destruction of Jerusalem, taken from chap. iii. 12. being a misrepresentation of that text founded on a false fact, is not of the least value.

SECT. III.—Of the Persons to whom the Second Epistle of Peter was written.

In the Preface to 1 Peter, sect. 3. we have shewn, that that epistle was written to the whole of the brethren, whether of Gentile or Jewish extraction, who were dispersed in the widely extended countries of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. Wherefore they were the brethren to whom St. Peter directed this his second epistle, 2 Pet. iii. 1. And as the matters which it contains were admirably calculated for confirming them in the faith of the gospel, and for comforting them under the persecution to which they were exposed for their religion, it must have been of great use to all the brethren in these countries to have them in writing from an inspired apostle; and the epistle which contained them could not fail to be exceedingly valued by them, especially as it is written in a higher strain than common, both of discovery and of language, (see sect. 5.); written also in the prospect of his soon dying a martyr for the truths which he had all along taught during the course of a long life.

SECT. IV.—Of the Occasion on which the Second Epistle of Peter was written.

For this see the quotation from Lardner, sect. 2. penult paragraph. See also the Preface to James, sect. 4. and the Illustrations prefixed to chapters i. and ii. of this epistle.

SECT. V.—Of the Matters contained in the Second Epistle of Peter.

THE Spirit who revealed to Peter, that false teachers and corrupt doctrine would greatly disturb the peace and purity of the church in after-times, directed him to publish these discoveries in a second epistle to the brethren of Pontus, &c.; and to accompany them with the plainest and most express declarations of the chief doctrines and precepts of the gospel; and to assert the high character, the power, and the coming of Jesus the author of the gospel; that at whatever time these false teachers appeared, and this epistle was read, the faithful might discern the impiety of their tenets, by comparing them with the true doctrines of the gospel set forth in this epistle, and steadfastly resist them.

In speaking of the matters contained in the second epistle of Peter, I must not omit observing, that in it, as in the first epistle, there are discoveries of some important facts, and circumstances, not mentioned at all, or not mentioned so plainly, by the other inspired writers. Such as, 1. That our Lord was transfigured for the purpose of exhibiting, not only a proof of his greatness and power as the Son of God and Judge of the world, but an example of the glory in which he will come to judgment: an example also, of his power to transform our corruptible mortal bodies, at the resurrection, into the likeness of his own glorious body, as it appeared in his transfiguration.—2. That the destruction of the cities of the plain by fire, was intended to be an example of that destruction by fire from the presence of the Lord, which will be inflicted on the wicked after the judgment. Compare Jude ver. 7.—3. That in the last age of the world scoffers will arise, who, from the stability of the present mundane system, will argue that the world hath existed as we see it from eternity, and that it will continue for ever.—4. That after the judgment, this earth with its atmosphere shall be set on fire, and, burning furiously, the elements shall be melted, and the earth with all the works of God and man thereon shall be utterly destroyed.—That after the present heaven and earth are burnt, a new heaven and a new earth shall appear, into which, according to God's promise, the righteous shall be carried, there to live in unspeakable happiness; an event which Peter himself, in his discourse to the Jews, Acts iii. 21. hath termed 'the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.'

From the foregoing account of the discoveries made in the second epistle of Peter, the attentive reader must suffer as a murderer, or a thief, or a malefactor,² or as a meddling person.³

16 However, if ANY ONE SUFFER as a Christian,¹ let him not be ashamed, but let him even glorify God on that account.

17 (ΟΤΙ, 260.) Indeed the time is come, that punishment¹ must begin at the house of God,² (chap. ii. 5, note 2.); and if IT BEGIN first (αφ') at us, what WILL the end BE of them who obey not the gospel of God?

18 And if the righteous with difficulty¹ can be saved, where WILL the ungodly and the sinner (ἀσεβεις, 2d future of the Indic. Med. voc.) shew themselves?

19 (ΝΥΝ, 331.) Wherefore, let even those who suffer by the will of God,¹ (ver. 15.), commit (τας ψυχας αυτων) their own lives² to HIM in well-doing, as to a faithful Creator.

derer, or a thief, or a malefactor, or as a meddling person; sufferings of this kind, however courageously borne, bring neither glory nor reward to the sufferers.

16 However, if any one suffer because he is a Christian, let him not be ashamed of his sufferings, though ever so ignominious; but let him rather even praise God, for having judged him worthy to suffer in so good a cause, and enable him to suffer.

17 Indeed the time is come, that the punishment to be inflicted on the Jews as a nation, for their crimes from first to last, must begin at you Jewish Christians, now become the house of God. And if it begin first at us, who are so dear to God on account of our faith in his Son, what will the end be of those Jews who obey not the gospel of God?

18 And when God thus punishes the nation, if the righteous Jews who believe in Christ with difficulty can be saved, where will the ungodly and the sinful part of the nation shew themselves saved from the divine vengeance?

19 In thus punishing the Jews God is just: Wherefore, let even the Gentile Christians who suffer with them in Judea by the will of God, use no unlawful means for preserving themselves, but commit their own lives to him in well-doing, as to a faithful Creator, who can and will most certainly restore their lives to them at the resurrection.

the time he wrote his epistle, the unbelieving Jews in Judea were extremely addicted to murder, and robbery, and every kind of wickedness; for they robbed and killed not only the heathens, but their own brethren who would not join them in their opposition to the Romans, as appears from the account which Josephus hath given of them.

2. Or a malefactor,]—that is, an adulterer, a sodomite, a perjured person.

3. Or as a meddling person.]—ΑΛΛΗΤΕΡΩΣ, alienorum inspector. Estius.—As the apostle is speaking of their suffering for being meddling persons, meddling must be something criminal. According to Le Clerc, it was the inspecting of the behaviour of persons in public offices, from a factious disposition to find fault with their conduct, and thereby to raise commotions in the state; which was the practice of the Jews in Alexandria, Coemarea, and other places, as Lardner hath shewn, Credibil. B. 1. c. 8. page 443. L'Enfant takes this word in the more general sense of meddling with other people's affairs, from avarice, anger, revenge, malice, or other bad passions. Estius thinks it denotes one who covetously looks on the goods of others, with an intention to take them away by force. In the Vulgate it is translated, alienorum appetitor.

Ver. 16. Suffer as a Christian.]—This, with Acts xi. 26. xxvi. 28. are the only passages of scripture in which the disciples are called Christians, after their Master.

Ver. 17.—1. Indeed the time is come, that punishment must begin.]—The punishment which the apostle speaks of, is that which Christ had described Matt. xxiii. 35. 'That on you may come all the righteous blood shed,' &c.

2. At the house of God.]—So the believing Jews are called, because they were now become the family and people of God, in the room of the unbelieving Jews. See the illustration of this verse in the View.

Ver. 18. With difficulty (so the word μάλιν signifies) can be saved.]—That the apostle is not speaking here of the difficulty of the salvation of the righteous at the day of judgment, will be evident to any one who considers 2 Pet. i. 11. 'Thus there shall be richly ministered to you an entrance into the everlasting kingdom.' What he speaks of is, the difficulty of the preservation of the Christians at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem. Yet they were preserved; for so Christ promised, Matt. xxiv. 13. But the ungodly and wicked Jews were saved neither in Judea nor anywhere else.

Ver. 19.—1. Let even those who suffer by the will of God, &c.]—The apostle added this direction, for the sake of such Gentile Christians as might be in Judea during the war. For the Christians in the first age being considered by the heathens as a sect of the Jews, the Romans could not distinguish them from the Jews, in the punishments which they inflicted on that rebellious nation.

2. Commit their own lives.]—Παρατίθεσθαι, commit them as a deposit (see 2 Tim. i. 12, note 3.) to be restored to them at the resurrection.—Lives; so the word ψυχας is translated, Matt. x. 39.—But if it is understood in this passage of our souls, there is an allusion, in this direction, to Christ's words on the cross, Luke xxiii. 46. 'Father, into thy hands (παράδωκα) I commit my spirit.'

CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Precepts given in this Chapter.

BECAUSE the knowledge and good behaviour of the people depend in a great measure upon the kind of instructions which they receive from their teachers, the apostle in this chapter addressed the elders, that is, the bishops, pastors, rulers, and deacons, among the brethren of Pontus, &c. ver. 1.—exhorting the bishops, in particular, to feed the flock of God committed to their care faithfully; and to exercise their episcopal office, not as by constraint, but willingly; not from the love of gain, but from love to their Master and to the flock, ver. 2.—and not to lord it over God's heritages, but to be patterns of humility and disinterestedness to their people, ver. 3.—This exhortation to bishops to feed Christ's flock, was given with much propriety by Peter, who had himself been appointed by Christ to feed his lambs and his sheep.—Next, because the faithful performance of the bishop's office was in that age attended with great difficulty and danger, the apostle, to encourage the bishops, assured them, that when the chief Shepherd shall appear, they shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away, ver. 4.—The distinguished reward which Christ is to bestow on those who have suffered for his sake, being a favourite topic with our apostle, he introduces it often in this epistle.

Having thus exhorted the pastors, the apostle turned his discourse to the people, charging them to be subject to their elders, and to one another; that is, to be of a teachable disposition, and to receive instruction from every one capable of giving it, and to do all the duties which they owed to each other, according to their different stations and relations, ver. 5.—But especially to be subject to God, by humbly submitting themselves to the judgments which were coming upon them, that God might exalt them in due time, ver. 6.—casting all their anxious care on God, because he cared for them, ver. 7.—and to watch against the devil, who went about as a roaring lion seeking to destroy them, by instigating the wicked to persecute them, and driving them into apostasy, ver. 8.—but they were to resist that terrible enemy, by steadfastness in the faith; and not to think themselves hardly dealt with when persecuted, knowing that their brethren everywhere were exposed to the same temptations of the devil, ver. 9.—In the mean time, to give them all the assistance in his power, the apostle prayed earnestly to God to establish and strengthen them, ver. 10.—and ended his prayer with a doxology to God, expressive of his supreme dominion over the universe, and all the things it contains.

The apostle informed the brethren of Pontus, that he had sent this letter to them by Silvanus, whom he praised for his fidelity to Christ, ver. 12.—Then giving them the salutation of the church in Babylon, where it seems he was when he wrote this letter, he added the salutation of Mark, whom he called his son, either because he had converted him, or on account of the great attachment which Mark bore to him, ver. 13.—And having desired them to salute one another, he concluded with giving them his apostolical benediction, ver. 14.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. V.—1 The elders¹ who are among you I exhort, who ἀν (ἐπισκοποι) a fellow-elder,² and a witness³ of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory⁴ which is to be revealed.

2 Feed the flock of God which is (ω, 162.) with you, (ἐπισκοποι) exercising the bishop's office, not by constraint, but willingly; neither for the sake of base gain, but (καὶ ἐκ καρδίας) from good disposition;²

3 Neither as lording it¹ over the heritages of God:² But being (καὶ κατὰ τύπον) patterns to the flock.

4 And when the chief Shepherd (see chap. ii. 25. note) shall appear, ye shall receive the crown of glory which fadeth¹ not away.

5 For the like reason,¹ ye younger persons,² subject yourselves to the elders. Yea, all be subject to one another, and be clothed with humility:³ for God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble.

6 Be humbled, therefore, under the strong hand of God, (chap. iv. 12.), that he may exalt you in due time.

7 Cast all your anxious care on him,¹ (ἐν, 254.) because he careth for you.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. V.—1 The elders who are among you in your different churches, I exhort in what follows; who am a fellow-elder, and witness of the sufferings of Christ in the garden and on the cross, and a partaker of his glory of governing the world by the gospel, which glory is to be manifested at the last day.

2 Feed the flock of God which is committed to your care, faithfully exercising the bishop's office, not constrained thereto by men, but willingly, from a sense of the excellence and usefulness of the office; neither exercise it for the sake of gaining a maintenance, but from a good disposition to promote the glory of God and to save souls;

3 Neither as lording it over the flocks which are the heritages of God: But being patterns to the flock in disinterestedness, temperance, humility, and charity to the poor.

4 And to encourage you, know that when the chief Shepherd shall appear to judge the world, ye who have discharged your duty to your flocks faithfully, shall receive from him the crown of glory which fadeth not away.

5 For the like reason, ye the people subject yourselves to the elders, receiving their instructions and reproofs with humility. Yea, all of you be subject to one another, in the various relations wherein ye stand to each other, and be clothed with humility; for God resisteth the proud, and casteth them down, but giveth the aid of his Spirit to the humble.

6 Seeing God resisteth the proud, be humbled under the strong hand of God; take his corrections patiently, that according to his promise, he may exalt you to the possession of heaven in due time.

7 In your distresses, cast all your anxious care on God, (Psalm. lv. 22.), because, in the most affectionate manner, he careth for you effectually.

Ver. 1.—1. The elders.]—Elder, as a name of office, belonged indifferently to bishops, presidents, teachers, and deacons, Acts xiv. 23. See 1 Tim. v. 17. note 1.

2. Who am a fellow-elder.]—Here Peter shewed his great modesty; for though he was one of the chief apostles, he took the title of elder only. And to render his exhortation acceptable to the elders of Pontus, he called himself their fellow-elder. The commentators justly observe, that if Peter had been the prince or chief of the apostles, as the Papists affirm, he would in this place, and in the inscription of his two epistles, certainly have assumed to himself that high prerogative. The circumstances of Peter's being a fellow-elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, &c. are mentioned to give weight to his exhortation.

3. And a witness of the sufferings of Christ.]—One of the purposes for which Christ chose twelve of his disciples to be with him always, was, that having heard his discourses, and seen his miracles and sufferings, they might be able to testify these things to the world, as what they themselves heard and saw. Wherefore, μαρτυρῶν, a witness, in this passage signifies not only one who was present at a transaction, but who testifies it to others.

4. A partaker of the glory which is to be revealed.]—The glory to be revealed is Christ's glory of governing the world by his gospel. This glory, of which Peter and the rest who preached the gospel by inspiration were partakers, is to be illustriously manifested at the last day, when Christ will judge the world by the gospel which was preached by his apostles. See 2 Pet. i. 3. where also glory signifies the apostolic office.

Ver. 2.—1. Exercising the bishop's office, not by constraint, but willingly.]—In the first age, when the profession of the gospel exposed men to persecution, and when the persecution fell more especially on the bishops, it may easily be imagined, that some who were appointed to that office, would undertake it unwillingly; perhaps, because they were not disposed to do the duties thereof diligently, or because they were not willing to suffer. In such cases, the apostle very properly advised persons to decline the office.

2. But from good disposition:]—So I have translated καὶ ἐκ καρδίας, because it is opposed to the desire of base gain, mentioned in the preceding clause; also to distinguish it from ἐκ προθέσεως, willingly, mentioned likewise in the preceding clause. In the Syriac version, this word is translated into corde.—Benson's observation on this verse is, "How severely are they here condemned who feed themselves and not the flock; who take the patrimony of the church, and commit the care of souls to others, to whom they allow a very small share of that plenty which they have for doing life."

Ver. 3.—1. Neither as lording it.]—κατακυριεύωντες. This is a strong word, denoting that tyranny which the men of this world often exercise, when they have obtained offices of power.

2. Over the heritages of God.]—The word κληρῶν properly signifies a lot. But, because the land of Canaan was divided among the Israelites by lot, the word came to signify an heritage. Wherefore, believers being God's people, or portion, the different churches or congregations for worship are called here God's heritages.—In process of time the name κληρῶν, clergy, was appropriated to the ministers of the gospel, because, being considered as the successors of the Levitical priests, they were regarded as God's lot or portion. From this prohibition it would seem, that in the apostle's days, the bishops were beginning to assume that dominion over their flocks, which in after-times they carried to the greatest height of tyranny. Or St. Peter, by inspiration foreseeing what was to happen, condemned in this prohibition the tyranny which in after-times the clergy exercised. Bengelius thinks the power exercised by the Christian bishops, anciently called Seniores, elders, gave rise to the French title Monsieur, and to the Italian Signore, &c.

Ver. 4. Which fadeth not away.]—This is an allusion to the crowns of green leaves of trees and herbs, bestowed by the ancients as the rewards of military prowess, or of victory in the games. See 1 Cor. ix. 25. note 2. These, together with the honours of which they were the symbols, soon faded away. But the crown of glory, the reward to be given to faithful shepherds, will never fade, being 'a crown of righteousness,' 2 Tim. iv. 8. and 'a crown of life,' James i. 12.

Ver. 5.—1. For the like reason.]—So the word ὁμοίως signifies here. For the preceding being an exhortation to the elders to feed the flock, and not to lord it over God's heritages, the apostle could not begin his exhortation to the people with saying to them, 'In like manner subject yourselves to the elders.' But he might say to them, with propriety, 'For the like reason, that ye are to receive a crown of glory, subject yourselves to the elders.'

2. Ye younger persons, subject yourselves.]—As, in the preceding part of this chapter, the apostle by an elder means a person holding a sacred office, such as a pastor or teacher, it is reasonable to think that he uses the word in the same sense here: consequently, that νεώτεροι, which signifies an inferior of any kind, Luke xxii. 26. and which is opposed to it here, denotes the laity or people of the churches of Pontus, whom the apostle further exhorts to be subject to one another.

3. And be clothed with humility.]—ὑποτασσάμενοι. Julius Polux, lib. iv. c. 18. tells us that the ὑποκατάμα was a white cloak used by slaves. Whitby says it was a frock put over the rest of the clothes; and that the apostle's meaning is, "that humility should be visible over all the other Christian virtues, in our whole behaviour."

Ver. 7. Cast all your anxious care on him.]—Lest the brethren of Pontus might have been too much distressed with the fears of their being reduced to want by the persecution they were suffering, and of their being tempted thereby to renounce the gospel, the apostle exhorted them to be only moderately solicitous to avoid these dangers, and to cast their anxious care on God.

Ver. 8. Be sober, be vigilant.]—This advice the apostle had given before, chap. iv. 7. (See note 2 there.) But he enforces it here by a new reason, 'That the devil is going about seeking whom he may swallow up.' So the word αὐτός, literally signifies; being used concerning solids as well as liquids. It strongly expresses the insatiable rage of the enemy of mankind to hinder their salvation, and the danger we are in from his devices. For he sometimes attacks the people of God in person, though not visible; and sometimes by his ministers, the other evil spirits who are in league with him; and sometimes by wicked men his subjects, whom he instigates to tempt them by the terror of persecution. This account of the devil's malice is given with great propriety by Peter, to whom our Lord said, 'Simon, Satan hath desired to have you, that he may sift you as wheat; but I have prayed for thee.' Peter likewise had good reason, as Doddridge observes, to recommend watchfulness, since he had fallen so shamefully himself, notwithstanding this warning from his Master.—Benson by the devil understands the unbelieving Jews, who persecuted the Christians with great fury.

Ver. 9. Him resist, steadfast in the faith.]—To shew the efficacy of faith in enabling us to resist temptation, Paul calls it a shield, Eph. vi. 16. 'wherewith the fiery darts of the wicked one,' &c.

Ver. 10. After ye have suffered a little.]—St. Peter calls the sufferings of the first Christians λίγος, a little, either in respect of time or of degree, or perhaps in respect of both; because, compared with the joys of heaven, the sufferings of this life are both light and momentary.

Ver. 11. To him be the glory, &c.]—By this doxology Peter expressed his firm persuasion, that the devil hath no title to any honour from men, nor any dominion in the universe, nor power to tempt men, but by permission from God.

Ver. 12.—1. By Silvanus, a faithful brother.]—If Silvanus by whom this letter was sent, is, as Oecumenius supposes, the person of that name who joined Paul in writing the epistles to the Thessalonians, he is the Silas who is called, Acts xv. 22. 'a chief man among the brethren,' and ver. 32. 'a prophet;' and being Paul's constant companion in travel, after the defection of John Mark, he no doubt assisted in planting churches in Galatia and the other countries of the Lesser Asia mentioned in the inscription: so, being well known to the brethren in these parts, he was a fit person to carry this letter. He is called here by Peter 'a faithful brother.' And without doubt he must have been an excellent person, and very zealous in the cause of the gospel, who attended Paul in so many painful journeys undertaken for the service of Christ, and who on this occasion was willing to go into Pontus, Galatia, &c. with Peter's epistle to the churches in these widely extended countries. Probably, after Paul's death, Silas attached himself to Peter as his assistant, and reckoned himself much honoured by this commission to carry the apostle's letter into the Lesser Asia, which he executed faithfully.

2. A faithful brother as I conclude.]—Peter having become intimately acquainted with Silvanus only since Paul's death, 'he concluded him to be a faithful brother,' from his having so long jointly laboured with Paul in the work of the gospel.

3. And strongly testifying.]—According to Bengel's, the proposition ἵτι in the word ἵτι, is used to signify that Peter added his testimony to that of Paul and Silas, concerning the truth of the gospel which they preached to the Galatians, &c. But I think the meaning is simply, that Peter testified concerning the gospel which had been preached to the Galatians, that it is the true gospel; consequently, that the rites of the law were not necessary to salvation.

Ver. 13.—1. The church which is in Babylon.]—See Pref. sect. 5. The word church is not in the original. But it is supplied in the Syriac, Vulgate, and other ancient versions, and by Oecumenius. Grotius approves of the addition; and Beza observes very well, that Peter omitted the word church, as is often done with regard to words of common use. But Mill and Wall think the translation should be, 'She who is in Babylon;' and that the apostle meant his own wife; or some honourable woman in that city. Lardner says, it is not probable that Peter would send a salutation to the Christians of so many countries, from a woman not named.

2. Elected jointly with you.]—The apostle, in the beginning of his letter, had called the strangers of the dispersion 'elected according to the foreknowledge of God.' Here he tells them, that the church at Babylon 'was elected jointly with them,' to be the people of God.

3. And Mark my son.]—Heuman, following the opinion of some of the ancients mentioned by Oecumenius, supposes this Mark to be Peter's own son by his wife. But others are of opinion, that he calls him his son because he had converted him; so that he was his son according to the spirit, and not according to the flesh. This opinion is probable, because Peter was well acquainted with the family of which Mark was a member, as may be gathered from his going immediately to 'the house of Mary, the mother of John whose surname was Mark,' after he was miraculously brought out of prison by the angel, Acts xii. 12. This John Mark was Barnabas's sister's son, Col. iv. 20. and the person who accompanied Paul and Barnabas as their minister, in their first journey among the idolatrous Gentiles, Acts xiii. 5. But he deserted them in Pamphylia, ver. 13. Afterwards, however, he accompanied Paul in some of his journeys, Col. iv. 10; and during his second imprisonment at Rome, the apostle ordered Timothy to bring Mark to Rome, because he was useful to him in the ministry, 2 Tim. iv. 11. See the note on that verse. It is generally believed, that John Mark was the author of the gospel called According to Mark.

II. PETER.

PREFACE.

SECT. I.—Of the Authenticity of the Second Epistle of Peter.

In the Preface to the epistle of James, (sect. 2. initio), and in that to 1 Peter, (sect. 2. initio), the doubts which the ancients entertained concerning the authenticity of five of the seven Catholic epistles, are faithfully declared. But at the same time it is proved, that the doubted epistles were very early known, and well received by many. On this subject it is proper to put the reader in mind, that these epistles were rendered doubtful by a circumstance mentioned in the Gen. Pref. p. 1. namely, that the doubted epistles are omitted in the first Syriac translation of the New Testament, which is supposed to have been made in the second century. But the only conclusion that can be drawn from the omission is, that the author had not seen these epistles, or rather that they were not generally known when he made his version. Now this might easily happen, if, as it is probable, he was a Syrian Jew. For Syria being at a great distance from Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, the proconsular Asia and Bithynia, to whose inhabitants the epistles under consideration were originally sent, it would be a considerable time before copies of them were dispersed among the people for whom the Syriac version of the New Testament was made, so that the author might think it useless to translate them.

With respect to the doubts which some entertained of these epistles, after they came to be known, they serve to prove that the ancient Christians were very cautious of receiving any books as canonical, whose authority they were not perfectly assured of. For as Wall, Crit. Notes, vol. iii. p. 358. very well observes, "They not only rejected all the writings forged by heretics under the names of the apostles; but if any good book, affirmed by some man or by some church to have been written and sent by some apostle, was offered to them, they would not, till fully satisfied of the fact, receive it into their canon." Wherefore, though the five epistles above-mentioned were not immediately acknowledged as inspired writings, in the countries at a distance from the churches or persons to whom they were originally sent, it is no proof that they were looked on as forgeries. It only shews that the persons who doubted of them had not received complete and incontestable evidence of their authenticity; just as their being afterwards universally received is a demonstration, that, upon the strictest inquiry, they found them the genuine productions of the apostles of Christ whose names they bear.—For the churches to whom these letters were sent, hearing that doubts were entertained concerning them, would no doubt of their own accord, as well as when asked concerning them, declare them to be genuine. And their attestation made public, joined with the marks of authenticity found in the epistles themselves, in time established their authority beyond all possibility of doubt. The truth is, such good opportunity the ancient Christians had to know the truth in this matter, and so well founded their judgment concerning the books of the New Testament was, that, as Lardner observes, no writing which was by them pronounced genuine, hath since their time been found spurious; neither have we at this day the least reason to think any book genuine which they rejected.

Thus much was necessary to be said concerning the five doubted-of epistles in general. With respect to the second epistle of Peter in particular, it remains to point out the marks of authenticity contained in the epistle itself, which with the attestations of the churches to which it was sent, have fully established its authority.

1. And first it is observable, that the writer styles himself Symeon Peter; from which we conclude that this epistle is the work of the apostle Peter.—If it be objected, that the apostle's name was Simon not Symeon, the answer is, that although in Greek this apostle's name was commonly written Simon, the Hebrew form of it was Symeon; for in the history of Jacob's sons it is so written. Besides, this very apostle is called Symeon, Symeon, Acts xv. 14.—Next, it is objected, that in the first epistle, which is undoubtedly the apostle Peter's, he styles himself, not Simon Peter, but Peter simply. But I observe, that Luke hath called this apostle Simon Peter, chap. v. 8.; and that John hath given him that name no less than seventeen times in his gospel; perhaps to shew that he was the author of the epistle which begins, 'Symeon Peter, a servant, and an apostle,' &c.—Farther, though in the inscription of the first letter, Peter's surname only is mentioned, because by it he was sufficiently known, he might in the inscription of the second, for the greater dignity, insert his name complete; because he intended authoritatively to rebuke the false teachers who had already risen, or were to rise. Upon the whole, Symeon Peter being the same with Simon Peter, no objection can be raised against the authenticity of this epistle on account of the name.

2. The writer of this epistle expressly calls himself in the inscription an apostle. He does the same chap. iii. 2.; and in other places he ascribes to himself things which agree to none but to Peter the apostle. For example, chap. i. 14. 'Knowing that the putting off of my tabernacle is soon to happen, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me;' alluding to John xxi. 19. where we are told that Jesus signified to Peter by what death, when old, 'he should glorify God.'—Chap. i. 16. this writer affirms, that he was one of the three apostles who were with Jesus at his transfiguration, when by a voice from God he was declared to be 'his Son the beloved.'—Chap. iii. 15. this writer calls Paul 'his beloved brother,' in allusion no doubt to his having given Paul the right hand of fellowship: withal he commends his epistles as scriptures, that is, divinely inspired writings. The writer therefore, having thus repeatedly taken to himself the name an character of an inspired apostle, if he was an impostor, he must have been the most profligate of men. See 1 Peter, Pref. sect. 2. parag. 2.

3. By calling this his Second Epistle, chap. iii. 1. the writer intimates that he had written to them formerly. He insinuates the same thing chap. i. 12—15. and, by so doing, shews himself to be the same Peter who wrote the first epistle. The method which Grotius has taken to elude the force of this presumption, shall be considered afterwards.

4. The matters contained in this epistle are highly worthy of an inspired apostle; for besides a variety of important discoveries, (see sect. v.), all tending to display the perfections of God and the glory of Christ, we find in it exhortations to virtue, and condemnations of vice, delivered with an earnestness and feeling which shew the author to have been incapable of imposing a forged writing upon the world; and that his sole design in this epistle was to promote the interests of truth and virtue in the world.

II. But in opposition to these internal marks of authenticity, and to the testimony of all the ancient Christian writers since the days of Eusebius, who with one voice have ascribed this second epistle, as well as the first, to the apostle Peter, Salmasius, and other learned moderns have argued, that because its style is different from the style of the first epistle, it must have been written by some impostor who personated the apostle Peter. This objection shall be fully considered immediately. At present suffice it to say in the general, that if this were a writing forged in the name of an apostle by any impostor, we should certainly find some erroneous tenet, or false fact, asserted in it, for the sake of which the forgery was attempted. Yet nothing of that kind appears in the second epistle of Peter; nothing inconsistent with the doctrine taught in the other writings, which by all are acknowledged to be divinely inspired; in a word, nothing unsuitable, but every thing consonant, to the character of an inspired apostle.

This argument appeared so strong to Grotius, that although, on account of the difference of the sentiments and style observable in the two epistles, he would not allow the second epistle to be Peter's he did not venture to call it the work of an impostor, but supposed it to have been written after the destruction of Jerusalem by Symeon, who succeeded James, our Lord's brother, in the bishopric of Jerusalem. And because the inscription, with the other particulars, in the epistle relating to the writer's character, are utterly inconsistent with Grotius's opinion, he uses a method of removing these difficulties, unworthy so learned a critic, and so good a man. Without the least authority from any ancient MSS. or versions, he confidently affirms that the inscription is interpolated, and that originally it was Symeon, a servant of Jesus Christ.—With the same unauthorized boldness he proposes to expunge the words our beloved brother, which precede the word Paul, chap. iii. 15.—And with respect to the words which this writer says he heard coming from the excellent glory, when he was with Jesus on the holy mount, chap. i. 16. Grotius affirms, "that if some more ancient MSS. could be found, it might thence appear, that these words were added in this place, as other words in other places, by those who were willing to have this pass for an epistle of Peter." But I reply, That if the texts of ancient books are to be altered, at the pleasure of every rash critic, for the sake of supporting some groundless conceit, there will be no such thing as the genuine text of any ancient book whatever. Wherefore, if liberties of this kind are not to be taken with profane authors, far less are they to be allowed in settling the text of the books of scripture, whose authority depends on our naving, not the conjectural emendations of fanciful critics, but the very words of the inspired authors themselves. With respect to the insinuation, that the author of this epistle wrote the first also, contained in the expression, 'This second epistle, beloved, I now write to you,' chap. iii. 1. Grotius says, that the two preceding chapters are the first epistle, and that the second epistle begins with the words, 'This second epistle,' &c. But as in no ancient MS. or version of this epistle is it so divided, and as no author ancient or modern hath spoken of its having been at any time so divided, Grotius's opinion merits no regard.

III. With respect to the objection against the authenticity of the second epistle of Peter, taken from its style being different from the style of the first, it is to be observed, that in the opinion of many learned men this diversity is found only in the second chapter of the second epistle; the style of the first and third chapters being pretty much akin to the style of the first epistle. Wherefore, if the first and second epistles of Peter are thought to have been written by different authors, because the style of the second epistle differs in one chapter from that of the first, we must think that the second epistle itself was written by two different authors, because the style of its first and third chapters differs from that of the second. Yet no such conclusion ought to be drawn in either case; as it is well known that an author's style is regulated by the subjects of which he treats. If these are grand and interesting, they naturally suggest animated and sublime expressions; such as those in the first and third chapters of the second epistle, in which Peter describes the transfiguration of his Master, with the august circumstances which attend it; also the creation of the world, its past demolition by water, and its future destruction by fire.—On the other hand, if the subjects treated of raise an author's indignation and abhorrence, he will use an acrimony of style, expressive of these feelings. Of this kind is the style of the second chapter of the second epistle. For the apostle, whose love to his Master was great, and who had the feeding of Christ's sheep committed to him, regarding the false teachers as the most flagitious of men, wrote that chapter against them with a bitterness which he would not have used in correcting teachers who had erred through simplicity. Moreover, in describing the character, and in foretelling the miserable end of these impostors he adopted the bold figures and lofty expressions peculiar to the eastern writers, as even coming short of what might with truth be said concerning them.—Wherefore, since the diversity of style in the two epistles of Peter can be so well accounted for, even on supposition that they were written by the same author, there is no reason to fancy with Grotius, that the second epistle was written by Symeon bishop of Jerusalem; or with Jerome, that Peter made use of different interpreters for the purpose of turning his Syriac epistle into Greek; or with bishop Sherlock to suppose, that Peter in his second epistle, and Jude in his epistle, copied some ancient Jewish writer, who described the false teachers of their own times, and denounced the judgments of God against them.

SECT. II.—Of the Time when the Second Epistle of Peter was written.

WHEN Peter wrote his second epistle, he was old, and near his end: Chap. i. 14. 'Knowing that the putting off of my tabernacle is soon to happen, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me.' Besides, chap. iii. 16. he speaks as if he had then seen all Paul's epistles: 'As also our beloved brother Paul, according to the wisdom given to him, hath written to you, 16. as indeed in all his epistles,' &c. If Peter had seen all Paul's epistles when he wrote this letter, it is probable that Paul was then dead. Nay, it is thought that Paul was dead when Peter wrote his first letter; at least if he wrote it from Rome, as most of the ancient Christian writers testify, (see I Peter, Pref. sect. 5.) The reason is, when Paul wrote his second to Timothy from Rome, a short while before his martyrdom, though he mentioned many who were then with him, he spake nothing in that letter of Peter; an omission which, if Peter had been in Rome at that time, could not well have happened. Wherefore, if Peter wrote his first epistle from Rome, he must have done it after Paul's death; consequently not sooner than the end of the year 66, or the beginning of the year 67, about three years before the destruction of Jerusalem. For Paul was put to death in the twelfth year of Nero, answering to A. D. 66.

With respect to the second epistle, which, as we have seen, was composed a little before Peter's death, it seems to have been written from Rome likewise not long after the first. For, as Lardner, Can. iii. p. 253. observes, "It is not unlikely, that, soon after the apostle had sent away Silvanus with the first epistle, some came from those countries to Rome, where there was a frequent and general resort from all parts, bringing him an account of the state of religion among them, which induced Peter to write a second epistle, for the establishment of the Christians among whom he had laboured; and he might well hope, that his last words and dying testimony to the doctrines which he had received from Christ, and had taught for many years with unshaken steadfastness, would be of great weight with them." Indeed he seems to make that circumstance his apology for writing a second letter to them so soon after the first. See chap. i. 15. iii. 1.—If the second epistle of Peter was written not long after the first, we may date it in the year 67 or 68, while the persecution against the Christians raged at Rome, and when Peter had an immediate prospect of suffering martyrdom, as the Lord Jesus Christ had shewn him.

It was mentioned, No. 2. that Grotius supposed this epistle was written after the destruction of Jerusalem. But if his opinion be true, it will destroy the authenticity of the epistle as an inspired writing, seeing the only ground on which he rests his opinion is chap. iii. 12. where he says the writer speaks of the end of the world as then at hand: 'Expecting, and earnestly desiring the coming of the day of God, in which the heavens being set on fire shall be dissolved,' &c. For as, according to him, it was a common opinion in the first age that the end of the world was to succeed the destruction of Jerusalem, he supposed the writer of this epistle could not exhort the Christians to 'expect and earnestly desire the coming of the day of the Lord,' &c. unless Jerusalem had been then destroyed. But an exhortation of this sort is no proof that the writer, whoever he was, thought the end of the world was then at hand. He knew the contrary, as is plain from chap. iii. 3. where he expressly foretells, that 'scoffers will come in the last days; saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep,' &c. In the last days, the scoffers, on account of Christ's long delaying to come, would ridicule his promises, and his disciples' expectation of that grand event. It being thus evident that the writer of this epistle did not think the end of the world was then at hand, (see 2 Thess. Pref. sect. 3.), his exhortation to expect, and earnestly desire the coming of the day of the Lord, does not imply that the day of the Lord's coming to destroy the world was then at hand, but that being kept hid from all mankind, and absolutely uncertain, believers ought always to be prepared for it. And as at that day the living are to be changed, and the dead to be loosed from the bands of death, and the whole crowned as victors, it ever was, and till it happen, ever will be, the object both of their earnest desire and of their firm hope. Grotius's argument, therefore, to prove that this epistle was written after the destruction of Jerusalem, taken from chap. iii. 12. being a misrepresentation of that text founded on a false fact, is not of the least value.

SECT. III.—Of the Persons to whom the Second Epistle of Peter was written.

In the Preface to 1 Peter, sect. 3. we have shewn, that that epistle was written to the whole of the brethren, whether of Gentile or Jewish extraction, who were dispersed in the widely extended countries of Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. Wherefore they were the brethren to whom St. Peter directed this his second epistle, 2 Pet. iii. 1. And as the matters which it contains were admirably calculated for confirming them in the faith of the gospel, and for comforting them under the persecution to which they were exposed for their religion, it must have been of great use to all the brethren in these countries to have them in writing from an inspired apostle; and the epistle which contained them could not fail to be exceedingly valued by them, especially as it is written in a higher strain than common, both of discovery and of language, (see sect. 5.); written also in the prospect of his soon dying a martyr for the truths which he had all along taught during the course of a long life.

SECT. IV.—Of the Occasion on which the Second Epistle of Peter was written.

For this see the quotation from Lardner, sect. 2. penult paragraph. See also the Preface to James, sect. 4. and the Illustrations prefixed to chapters i. and ii. of this epistle.

SECT. V.—Of the Matters contained in the Second Epistle of Peter.

THE Spirit who revealed to Peter, that false teachers and corrupt doctrine would greatly disturb the peace and purity of the church in after-times, directed him to publish these discoveries in a second epistle to the brethren of Pontus, &c.; and to accompany them with the plainest and most express declarations of the chief doctrines and precepts of the gospel; and to assert the high character, the power, and the coming of Jesus the author of the gospel; that at whatever time these false teachers appeared, and this epistle was read, the faithful might discern the impiety of their tenets, by comparing them with the true doctrines of the gospel set forth in this epistle, and steadfastly resist them.

In speaking of the matters contained in the second epistle of Peter, I must not omit observing, that in it, as in the first epistle, there are discoveries of some important facts, and circumstances, not mentioned at all, or not mentioned so plainly, by the other inspired writers. Such as, 1. That our Lord was transfigured for the purpose of exhibiting, not only a proof of his greatness and power as the Son of God and Judge of the world, but an example of the glory in which he will come to judgment: an example also, of his power to transform our corruptible mortal bodies, at the resurrection, into the likeness of his own glorious body, as it appeared in his transfiguration.—2. That the destruction of the cities of the plain by fire, was intended to be an example of that destruction by fire from the presence of the Lord, which will be inflicted on the wicked after the judgment. Compare Jude ver. 7.—3. That in the last age of the world scoffers will arise, who, from the stability of the present mundane system, will argue that the world hath existed as we see it from eternity, and that it will continue for ever.—4. That after the judgment, this earth with its atmosphere shall be set on fire, and, burning furiously, the elements shall be melted, and the earth with all the works of God and man thereon shall be utterly destroyed.—That after the present heaven and earth are burnt, a new heaven and a new earth shall appear, into which, according to God's promise, the righteous shall be carried, there to live in unspeakable happiness; an event which Peter himself, in his discourse to the Jews, Acts iii. 21. hath termed 'the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began.'

From the foregoing account of the discoveries made in the second epistle of Peter, the attentive reader must be sensible, that they are more grand and interesting than even those contained in the first epistle; and that to the foreknowledge and declaration of them, a degree of inspiration was necessary, superior to that required in the writing of the first epistle. Consequently, that the matters exhibited in the second epistle are every way worthy of an apostle of Christ really inspired, such as this writer expressly affirms himself to have been, and of which there can be no doubt.

CHAPTER I.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

IN the latter part of the apostolical age many false teachers arose, among whom the Nicolaitans and the Simonians were the most remarkable. These, as Jude tells us, ver. 4. 'perverted the grace of God to lasciviousness.' They perverted the doctrine of the gospel concerning men's being justified of free grace by faith, without the works of law, so as to make it a pretence for gratifying the lusts of their flesh without restraint. And to gain credit to their impious explications of the doctrines of the gospel, these impostors denied the authority of the apostles of Christ, and arrogated to themselves an illumination and authority superior to theirs. Nay, they denied the authority of Christ himself, chap. ii. 1. And having thus set themselves up as the only inspired teachers, (Jude, ver. 16, 19.), they assured their disciples, that being justified by faith without works, believers are under no obligation, either to abstain from sin, or to do what is morally good; that Christ hath purchased for them a liberty to gratify all their passions and appetites; and that Christ will not judge and punish them for so doing, nor for any sin whatever.

These doctrines, being extremely agreeable to the corruptions of the human heart, were embraced by many in the latter part of the first age. Wherefore, to stop the mouths of those false teachers, who were now gone abroad among the churches, and to prevent the faithful from being seduced by them, and to establish them in the belief of the things which the Lord himself had taught, and which his apostles had delivered in his name, Peter wrote this second epistle, in which he brought these things to their remembrance.

And, first of all, in opposition to the calumnies of the false teachers, he assured the brethren to whom this epistle was directed, that Christ had gifted to his apostles every thing necessary to qualify them for leading mankind to a godly life, and for making them partakers of the divine nature. He had bestowed on them inspiration to know the true doctrines of the gospel, and authority to declare them to the world. From this it followed, that the teachers who pretended to possess a greater illumination than the apostles, or greater authority, were impostors, ver. 3, 4.—And because these seducers taught their disciples, that morality was of no use in procuring salvation, Peter, by his apostolical authority, commanded all who professed the gospel, to add to their faith courage, and to courage knowledge, &c. ver. 5-7.—Declaring, that these excellent dispositions would make them fruitful in good works, ver. 8.—That if they were deficient in these things, they were blind, notwithstanding their preten-sions to illumination, ver. 9.—Moreover, the practice of good works the apostle recommended to them from this important consideration, that thereby, and not otherwise, they would make their calling and election firm, ver. 10.—and have an entrance into the everlasting kingdom of the Saviour, richly or honourably ministered to them, ver. 11.—These things, he told them, he would not cease to call to their remembrance while he was in life, although they knew and believed them already, ver. 12, 13.—Withal, being sensible that he was soon to die, he proposed, by committing his instructions to writing in this epistle, to put it in their power, after his decease, to have them always in remembrance as his dying words, ver. 14, 15.

In the mean time, to give the faithful the fullest assurance of the truth of all the things which the apostles with one consent had delivered to the churches, and which in part he was now going to write; more particularly, to give them a perfect assurance of Christ's being the Son of God, and of his coming to judge the world, which the infidels of that age loudly denied, St. Peter told them, that in making known the power and coming of Christ, he and his brethren apostles had not published a fable cunningly devised by Christ, and credulously received by them. They had the clearest evidence of their Master's power and coming set before them visibly, in the honour and glory which he received from the Father when he was transfigured in their presence, and a voice came to him from the excellent glory saying, 'This is my Son the beloved, with whom I am well pleased.' This voice, said he, we Peter, and James, and John, heard distinctly, being with him on that occasion upon the holy mountain, ver. 16-18.—He added, by these proofs of our Master's greatness, of which we were beholders, we and all mankind have the ancient prophecies concerning the resurrection of the dead, and the judgment of the world, as well as our Master's prophecies concerning these events, made more firm. Wherefore, it is your duty to give heed to the prophetic word thus confirmed, as to a lamp shining in a dark place, until the day of judgment itself dawn, and Christ the morning-star of that day arise in your hearts, by his personal appearance from heaven, ver. 19.—Knowing this first, as a circumstance necessary to confirm you in the belief of the ancient prophecies, that no prophecy of scripture is of the prophet's own invention, ver. 20.—but that all the prophets spake their prophecies by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. I.—1 Symeon Peter, a servant and apostle of Jesus Christ, to all, both Jews and Gentiles, who have obtained like precious faith in the gospel with us believing Jews, through the righteousness of our God, who, by the prophets, promised that blessing to all nations; and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath called us thereto.

dered this, 'of God and our Saviour Jesus Christ,' I know not. Perhaps they pointed the Greek text thus, Θεῷ, ἡμῶν καὶ Σωτῆρι Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ. But the propriety of the language does not admit of that punctuation. Some understand this passage as signifying, that Jesus Christ is both our God and our Saviour. But others are of 2 Grace and peace be multiplied to you, through the knowledge¹ of God, and of Jesus our Lord.

3 (Nc, 319.) Certainly his divine power hath gifted to us all things¹ which ARE NECESSARY to life and godliness, through the acknowledgment of him who hath called us (sic) to glory² and courage.³

4 (Δι' ἧς) By whom¹ the greatest, even precious promises,² are gifted to us, that by these ye might become partakers of the divine nature, fleeing away from the corruption³ which is in the world through lust.

5 (Καὶ αὐτοὶ τὸ δέ, 107.) And FOR this very reason indeed, giving all diligence, join¹ (σ) to your faith² courage;³ and to courage, knowledge;⁴

6 And to knowledge, temperance;¹ and to temperance, patience;² and to patience, godliness;³

7 And to godliness, the love of the brethren;¹ and to the love of the brethren, love¹ TO ALL MEN.

2 May good dispositions, and happiness temporal and eternal, be multiplied to you, through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord, given you in the gospel.

3 Certainly God's divine power hath gifted to us, the apostles of his Son, all things necessary to bring mankind to a godly life, on account of our acknowledgment of his Son, who, because we acknowledged him, and accompanied him from the beginning, hath called us to the glorious office of apostles, and to courage in the exercise of that office.

4 By whom the greatest, even precious promises, are revealed to us apostles, with a commission to publish them, that by believing them ye might become partakers of the divine nature, the holiness and immortality of God, fleeing away from all the vices which are practised by the wicked, through the prevalence of fleshly lusts. See 1 Pet. iv. 3.

5 And for this very reason indeed, that we make known to you the promises of the gospel, giving the greatest diligence, do ye join to your precious faith, (ver. 1.), courage to maintain it under persecution; and to courage, increasing knowledge of the gospel doctrine;

6 And to knowledge, the government of your passions; and to the government of your passions, patience under afflictions; and to patience, piety;

7 And to piety the love of your Christian brethren; and to the love of the brethren, love to all men, not excepting enemies and persecutors.

opinion, that the relative οὗ, in the first clause, though omitted in the second, is, according to the idiom of scripture, to be understood as repeated. Yet, as this is disputed, I have not ventured to supply it in the translation of the second clause.—Mill says, one of Stephen's MSS., instead of Θεοῦ ἡμῶν καὶ Σωτῆρος Ἰησοῦ, hath Κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ; and that the Syriac, by which he means the second Syriac version, hath 'of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ;' and the Arabic, 'God and our Saviour Jesus;' in which it is followed by our translators.—I have only to add, that, in the following verse, God is distinguished from Jesus our Lord; and that clause hath not the article prefixed to it.

Ver. 2. The knowledge, &c.—Σοφίᾳ signifies, ver. 8. What an high value Peter put on the knowledge of God and of Christ, may be known, not only from his account of its efficacy in producing good dispositions and inward peace in men's minds, but from his exhortation, ver. 5. to add to their faith knowledge, (see note 4. on that verse), and from the advice with which he concludes this epistle, chap. iii. 18. 'Grow—in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour.' This knowledge our Lord likewise highly commended, John xvii. 3. 'This is life eternal, to know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.'

Ver. 3.—1. All things which are necessary to life and godliness;—that is, to a godly life. The things gifted by God's divine power to the apostles, to enable them to bring mankind to a holy life, were, 1. A complete knowledge of the doctrines of the gospel.—2. A mouth to preach and defend these doctrines, which their adversaries should not be able to resist.—3. Wisdom to direct them to behave as teachers sent from God, Luke xli. 15.—4. Miraculous powers, to confirm their doctrine and mission.

2. Hath called us to glory.—The apostle, 1 Epist. v. 1. denotes the apostolic office by the word glory.

3. And courage.—So I have translated the word ἀνθρ, because courage was one of the spiritual gifts bestowed on the apostles, to fit them for their work. Accordingly, we find two of them praying for courage, Acts iv. 29. See ver. 6. note 3. Others translate δύναμις καὶ ἀνθρ, by his glorious power.

Ver. 4.—1. By whom.—If the third verse is read as a parenthesis, the antecedent to the plural relative ἧς will be, God and Jesus. See, however, chap. iii. 6. note 1. at the end, where it is shewed, that according to the Hebrew idiom a plural relative may have a singular antecedent; consequently, Jesus our Lord may be intended by St. Peter. Two or three MSS. have τῆς in here.

2. Precious promises.—The apostle means all the promises of the gospel, which he calls great, because the things promised are the greatest that can be conceived by the human mind; such as the pardon of sin, the favour of God, the return of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, the judgment of the world, &c. He likewise calls them precious, because of their efficacy to make us partakers of the divine nature; a possession more precious than all the riches in the universe.

3. From the corruption.—This name the apostle gives to vicious actions in general, because they tend to destroy both the souls and the bodies of men.

Ver. 5.—1. Join, &c.—ἑνωσάμενοι. Knatchbull, supposing that the apostle alludes here to the ancient chorus, in which they danced holding one another by the hand, would have this translated, 'join hand in hand with your faith, courage; and with courage, knowledge,' &c. Others, because ἑνωσάμενοι and ἑνωσάμενοι signify to furnish the expense necessary to a chorus, are of opinion that the clause should be translated, 'minister or supply by your faith courage,' &c. in which sense ἑνωσάμενοι is used in ver. 11. of this chapter.

2. To your faith.—ἑνθρ, being here distinguished from knowledge, means a general disposition to know and do the will of God, which one may possess who has not attained an extensive knowledge of the will of God: or it may mean a general belief of the divine original of the gospel, such as those were impressed with who embraced it on their first hearing the apostles preach. See note 4. on this verse.

3. Courage.—ἀνθρ, from ἀνθρ, Mars. This Greek word is commonly used by the poets to denote military courage. It has the same sense likewise in some prose writers. Afterward it came to signify virtue, or a right moral conduct in general. Thus, Philip iv. 8. 'If there be any (ἀνθρ) virtue, any praise.' But as ἀνθρ is mentioned by Peter among a number of particular virtues, it cannot signify a right moral conduct in general, but, agreeably to the original sense of the word, it means here courage to profess one's faith. In the first age, the disciples of Christ were often accused before the heathen magistrates of being Christians. On such occasions it was incumbent on them to acknowledge it, notwithstanding they exposed themselves thereby to persecution; because by boldly professing their faith, they not only encouraged each other to persevere in their Christian profession, but they maintained the gospel in the world. Accordingly, Christ solemnly charged all his disciples to confess him before men, and threatened to inflict the severest punishment on those who denied him, Matt. x. 32, 33. But to this difficult and dangerous duty, no small degree of fortitude being necessary, the apostle Peter ordered the brethren of Pontus to 'add to their faith courage.'—In the present state of the world, indeed, the profession of the gospel does not commonly expose us to persecution. Nevertheless, it is still necessary to 'join to our faith courage, in professing and defending our faith, that when infidels ridicule the doctrines of the gospel, or when the wicked openly transgress its precepts, we may not by our silence appear to be ashamed of our faith and practice as Christians, nor suffer the young and unstable to be drawn away by the error of the wicked.

4. And to courage, knowledge.—In the first age, the sermons and miracles of the apostles often produced a strong conviction of the divine original of the gospel, in persons who never had heard of the gospel before. Such, on their believing, must have had a very imperfect understanding of the doctrines and precepts of the gospel. It was therefore necessary that such should 'join to their faith the knowledge of these things; especially as the influence of the gospel on men's temper and conduct results, in a great measure, from their knowledge of its doctrines, precepts, and promises. It is still necessary, therefore, that Christians be at pains to increase their knowledge of spiritual things, that they may have grace and peace multiplied to them, ver. 2. and become partakers of the divine nature, ver. 4.—By γνῶσις, in this verse, Benson thinks prudence, to prevent courage from degenerating into rashness, is meant.

Ver. 6.—1. And to knowledge (γνῶσις) temperance.—This virtue consists in a confirmed habit of governing all the affections, passions, and appetites of our nature, in a proper manner, by placing our affections on proper objects, by restraining our angry passions, and by gratifying our appetites in moderation. Where this virtue subsists, temptation can have little influence.

2. And to temperance, patience.—This virtue consists in bearing all kinds of afflictions meekly and quietly, in the hope, whether of reward or of deliverance, Rom. viii. 25. Heb. xii. 1. James v. 11. It differs from courage in this, that it is exerted under the actual suffering of evil; whereas courage is exerted in encountering evil, with a view to avert it.

3. And to patience, godliness.—By desiring us to join godliness to patience, the apostle teaches us, that piety, or a firm belief of the wisdom and goodness of the divine dispensations, is the only foundation by which patience can be effectually supported.

Ver. 7. And to the love of the brethren, love to all men.—This chain of virtues the apostle begins with faith, because it is the root from which they must all spring; and ends with love, because it is the point to which they all lead. Dr. Wessel of Groningen one of 8 For these things being in you, and abounding, make you TO BE neither slothful nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

9 (Eg, 98.) But he who hath not these things is blind,¹ shutting his eyes,² AND taking up a forgetfulness of the purification of his old sins.³

10 Wherefore the rather, brethren, earnestly endeavour to make your calling and election sure: For, doing these things, ye shall never at any time fall.

11 (Eg, 97.) And thus there shall be richly ministered to you, (i words) an entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

12 Wherefore, I will not neglect to put you always in remembrance concerning these things, although ye know, and are established in the present truth. (See 1 John ii. 21.)

13 Yea, I think it fit, as long as I am in this tabernacle,¹ to stir you up, by putting you in remembrance;

14 Knowing that the putting away of my tabernacle is soon TO HAPPEN, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me.¹

15 (As, 106.) Therefore I will carefully endeavour, that ye may be able, after my decease, to have these things always in remembrance.¹

16 For (see the view and Illustration here) we have not followed cunningly devised fables,¹ when we made known to you (1 Ep. i. 5. 13.)

8 For these virtues being in you, and abounding, will make you to be neither slothful in endeavouring to do, nor unfruitful in actually doing, those good works which the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ leads men to perform.

9 But he who hath neither the good dispositions nor the good actions I have recommended, is wilfully blind, shutting his eyes against the light, and is at pains to forget the vow which he made at his baptism, to purify himself from his former sins.

10 Wherefore, the rather that men are apt to forget their vows, do ye, brethren, earnestly endeavour to make your calling as the sons of God, and election as his church, sure, by doing good works: For, continuing to do these things, ye shall never at any time fall from your calling and election.

11 And thus not falling, there shall be, in the most honourable manner, an entrance afforded to you into the everlasting kingdom erected by our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and a place allotted to you there, suitable to the degree of virtue ye have attained.

12 Wherefore, as it is in this manner only that ye can enter, I will not neglect to put you always in mind of these things, although ye know and are established in the persuasion of the truth which at present I am inculcating; namely, that by doing good works ye shall enter honourably into Christ's kingdom.

13 Yea, I think it suitable to my office as an apostle, as long as I am in this body, to stir you up to practise all the Christian virtues, by putting you in remembrance that they are necessary to your entrance into Christ's kingdom.

14 I am the more earnest in this, knowing that my death is soon to happen, even in the manner our Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me before he ascended into heaven.

15 Therefore I will carefully endeavour, by writing these things in this epistle, that ye may be able, through frequently reading them after my decease, to have these things always in remembrance as my dying words.

16 For we have not published cunningly devised fables, like those fabricated by the heathen priests concerning the appearance of their gods on earth, when we made known to you the power and coming of the reformers, observed on this passage, That the Spirit of God hath, by Peter, established this the only Bull of Indulgence whereby an entrance into the kingdom of God is obtained.

Ver. 8. Slothful nor unfruitful.]—The apostle, in the preceding verses, having recommended the acquisition of virtuous dispositions, he in this tells us, that these dispositions must lead us to good works.

Ver. 9.—1. Is blind.]—Good works, being the natural fruits of the knowledge of Christ, the person who pretends to have the knowledge of Christ, and yet does no good works, is blind with respect to the nature of the Christian religion. The Jews, though very faulty in their actions, gloried in the knowledge of true religion, which they derived from the Mosaic revelation; and took to themselves the pompous appellation of Guides of the blind Gentiles, Rom. ii. 19. This therefore may have been intended as a rebuke to them.

2. Shutting his eyes.]—Μουσουλων. According to Bochart, this word comes from μους τις οφθαλμος, to shut the eyes. The apostle uses this word, to shew that the blindness of which he speaks was wilful.

3. The purification of his old sins.]—This expression, which is an allusion to baptism, together with Ananias's words to Paul, Acts xxii. 16. 'Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins,' is thought by many to imply, that in baptism the guilt of former sins is washed away. But Paul himself hath taught the sound meaning of Ananias's words: Heb. x. 22. 'Having your hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and your body washed with clean water.' Besides, Peter in his 1 Epist. iii. 21. tells us expressly, that 'baptism is not the washing away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience towards God; in which respect it resembles circumcision, which is not that which is outward, but of the heart,' by cutting off all irregular passions and appetites. The washing in baptism, therefore, is not a real, but an emblematical washing of the sinner from the guilt of his sins; which emblem, as it contains a promise of pardon, will be realized to the sinner, if he gives the answer of a good conscience, and not otherwise. For, as the burying of the baptized person in the water is an emblem of his death, the raising him out of the water is an emblem of his resurrection to eternal life if he forsakes his sins.

Ver. 10. Make your calling and election sure.]—The original word βεβαιω signifies firm. The Vulgate version is, 'that by good works ye make your calling and election firm.' And Beza tells us, that he found the same reading in two Greek MSS. As men's election to eternal life cannot be made more firm than it was at first, and as calling is here put before election, it is reasonable to think the apostle is speaking of the brethren's calling and election to be the church and people of God, which they were to make firm by adding to their faith courage, &c. especially as it is said, 'if ye do these things, ye shall never at any time fall;' namely, from your election. Accordingly, the word fall is used to signify the rejection of the Jews as a nation, and their falling from their privileges as the people of God, Rom. xi. 11.

Ver. 11. Everlasting kingdom.]—Since we are told, 1 Cor. xv. 24. that after the judgment Christ will deliver up the kingdom to the Father, we must not think the kingdom into which the righteous shall enter after the judgment is called 'the everlasting kingdom of Christ,' because it will for ever be governed by him. 'The kingdom of Christ' being the genitive of the agent, and not of possession, means the kingdom which Christ erected by what he did in the flesh, and which by the government which he now exercises he will at length fully establish. This kingdom is fitly called everlasting, because after it is delivered up to the Father, it will continue throughout all eternity. Some MSS., instead of αἰωνιος, read here αυαριος or αυγαριος. The MSS. from which the Ethiopic version was made, instead of αἰωνιος, read εὐριος. But the common reading is best supported.

Ver. 13. As long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up.]—Here the apostle seems to apologize to the brethren for writing a second letter to them so soon after the first. He calls his body ταβερνακλις, a tabernacle, to intimate that the soul is a distinct substance from the body, that its continuance in the body is of short duration, and that its departure is easy.

Ver. 14. Even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me:]—meaning the revelation which Christ made to him, John xxi. 13, 19. But because he says this was soon to happen, Estius, following Hesiippus, thinks he speaks of some new revelation, signifying that he was to die soon. However, as our Lord, in the before-mentioned revelation, told him he was to die when he was old, he might, from his own great age, without any new revelation, know that his death was to happen soon.

Ver. 15. May be able, after my decease, to have these things always in remembrance.]—The apostle's care in this was highly commendable; because the most important truths, if they are not remembered, have no influence on the mind. The graduation in this passage, as Benson remarks, is beautiful. He proposed to put the brethren in mind of some revealed truths with which they were acquainted: He proposed to do this, not once or twice, but always, as long as he lived; nay, he proposed to put them in remembrance of these things after his death. Wherefore the ministers of the gospel, following Peter's example, ought to insist most on the things which are of most importance to their people, though they are already well instructed in them; the influence of truth depending, not so much upon the knowledge, as upon the frequent recollection of it.

Ver. 16.—1. We have not followed cunningly devised fables.]—The word εὐρησεν, in its bad sense, denotes, as Benson remarks, that which hath a false appearance of wisdom and goodness. From the apostle's using the term εὐρησεν, fabulosa, in the end of the verse, it is probable, that the cunningly devised fables of which he speaks, were those concerning the appearance of the heathen gods the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were (ὁρῶνται) beholders² of his greatness.³

17 (Ἀκούσας, 94.) When indeed he received from God the Father honour and glory, a voice of this kind being brought to him¹ from the magnificent glory,² This is my Son, the beloved, (α, 143.) with whom I am well pleased.³

19 (Και, 212.) And so we have the prophetic word (chap. iii. 2.) more firm,¹ to which ye do well to take heed, as to a lamp shining in a dark place:² until the day dawn,³ and (ὁ ὀρθρινός) the morning-star⁴ arise in your hearts;

18 And this voice, declaring Jesus to be God's Son, we, Peter, James, and John, heard brought from God, being with him on the holy mountain.

19 And thus we apostles, and all men, have the word of the Jewish prophets, and of Christ himself, concerning his coming to raise the dead and judge the world, made more firm; to which ye will do well to take heed, as to a lamp shining in a dark place, until the day of judgment dawn, and Christ, surrounded with the glory of the Father, appear like the morning-star, which, by assuring you of his coming, may be said to arise in your hearts.

on earth in human forms, which the heathen priests had contrived to aggrandize their particular temples, and which the legislators and statesmen had adopted for the purpose of supporting the popular religions. To gain the greater credit to these fables, the priests and statesmen instituted what they called the mysteries of the gods, in which the fabulous appearances of the gods were represented in mystic shows. But one particular show none but the fully initiated were permitted to behold. Hence they were called μυστήριαι, beholders. See the following note. In this passage the apostle, I suppose, meant to tell us, that the account which he and his brethren gave of Christ's transfiguration, was not a cunningly devised fable, like those exhibited in the heathen mysteries, but a real transaction of which they were μυστήριαι, beholders.

2. For we were (μυστήριαι) beholders.]—The initiated into the greater mysteries were called μυστήριαι, beholders, because they were admitted to behold a shining image which represented the supreme God, and heard an hymn in which his attributes were described and celebrated. In opposition to these vain mysteries, St. Peter places the much more grand and important mystery of the transfiguration, in which, as our Lord told the μυστήριαι, beholders, there was exhibited both a visible example and a proof of the glory, wherein as the Son of God he will appear at the last day to judge the world, Matt. xvi. 27. In our Bibles μυστήριαι is translated eye-witnesses; but the proper term for eye-witnesses is αὐτόματοι, Luke i. 2.

3. Of his greatness.]—The change which our Lord produced in his own body, when he transfigured himself, so that his face shone as the sun, and his garments became white as the light, by his body shining through them, together with the voice which came to him from the magnificent glory, is called by Peter his μυράκιον, greatness, both because the transfiguration was an example and proof of his power to change our corruptible body into one which is incorruptible, and because the voice was a declaration from God, assuring the (μυστήριαι) beholders that he is his Son. These beholders were three in number, that the credit of so great a miracle might not rest on the testimony of one person only, but be supported by the concurring testimony of a sufficient number of credible witnesses. The appearing of Moses and Elijah at the transfiguration, was not only an honour done to Jesus in his humble state, but a proof from fact, that the dead have not lost their existence, and that God's beloved Son hath the keys of Hades and of death, Rev. i. 18. In the transfiguration, therefore, having not only an image of the power and glory with which Christ will return to raise the dead and judge the world, but a proof that he will actually return and accomplish these great events, the promise of his coming is worthy of the highest credit.

Ver. 17.—1. A voice of this kind being brought to him.]—The voice was not addressed to Jesus, but to the three apostles. Nevertheless, as it spake of Jesus in his hearing, it might be said to have been brought to him.

2. From the magnificent glory.]—Μεγαλοπρεπείας; literally, the greatly becoming glory. This was different from the glory in which Moses and Elijah appeared, Luke ix. 31, being 'the glory of God,' which Stephen beheld, Acts vi. 55, and 'the glory of the Lord' in which Christ will come to judgment, Mark viii. 38.—At the transfiguration, it had the appearance of a bright or shining cloud, Matt. xvii. 6, which by the Jewish doctors was called the shechinah; but in the Old Testament it is termed 'the face of God'; and by St. Paul, 'the presence of the Lord and the glory of his power,' 2 Thess. i. 9. This glory, or fiery shining cloud, appeared to the patriarchs when the Deity was pleased to make them sensible of his presence. In particular, this glory appeared to Moses at the bush, and on Mount Sinai at the giving of the law. Hence he is said to have conversed with God 'face to face,' Exod. xxxiii. 11. It accompanied the Jews in their journeyings from Egypt and through the wilderness, in form like a pillar of fire. On these occasions its brightness was softened by the cloud which attended it. See 1 Cor. x. 1. note 2. When it appeared to Saul on the road to Damascus, it shone with a brightness above that of the sun. But in its greatest splendour it cannot be looked on with mortal eyes. Hence it is called, 1 Tim. vi. 16, ὁς οὐδεὶς ὤψετο, 'the light which no man can approach.'

3. With whom I am well pleased.]—The Vulgate version adds, 'hear ye him'; and all the evangelists mention these words as spoken on this occasion. They are a plain allusion to Moses's prophecy, Deut. xviii. 15; and being directed to the disciples, God thereby intimated that Jesus is the prophet foretold by Moses, to whom the Israelites were to hearken. Benson supposes, that as at the transfiguration Moses and Elijah represented the law and the prophets, the uttering of the words, 'hear ye him,' after they disappeared in the cloud, was intended as a declaration by action, that the dispensation of the law and the prophets was removed, and that from thenceforth mankind were to hearken to God's Son speaking to them in his gospel.

Ver. 18.—We heard brought from heaven.]—that is, from God: For in this, as in other passages, heaven signifies God: Luke xv. 21. 'I have sinned against heaven.' Besides, from the voice itself it is evident that it was uttered by God: 'This is my Son, the beloved.' And being directed to the three disciples, they could not but attend to it, and know that it was their Master of whom these words were spoken.

2. In the holy mountain.]—Peter calls this mountain holy, on account of the appearance of God thereon at the transfiguration. In this he was authorized by God himself, who, when he appeared to Moses at the bush, ordered him to put off his shoes, because 'the place where he stood was holy ground,' Exod. iii. 5. Concerning the mountain on which our Lord was transfigured, see Harmony, 2d edit. p. 301.

Ver. 19.—1. We have the prophetic word (βιβλικόν) more firm.]—This, which is Oecumenius's translation, is the true literal translation of the passage, as Benson hath shewn by examples from Socrates and Josephus. Besides, the Greek word βιβλικόν signifies to confirm or make firm, 1 Cor. i. 6. 2 Cor. i. 21. Col. ii. 7. Heb. ii. 3. and vi. 18, an oath (ὅς βιβλικόν) for confirmation. The comparative, βιβλικότερον, may therefore be translated more confirmed. What the prophetic word was which was made more firm by the transfiguration, is explained chap. iii. 2. Sir Isaac Newton thought it was St. John's prophecies in the Revelation. But it is not certain that the Revelation was published when Peter wrote: wherefore, the common translation of this passage, which represents the word of prophecy as more sure than the miracle of the transfiguration, is utterly wrong.

2. As to (ὡς) a lamp shining in a dark place.]—Ὡς, ὡς, ὡς, ὡς; such as a dungeon, which is commonly dark. The present state of mankind, in respect of their knowledge of spiritual things, is fitly compared to the darkness of night. During this night of darkness, the prophecies concerning the resurrection, judgment, final issues of things, &c. contained in the writings of the prophets and apostles, perform the office of a lamp, by cheering and directing us in our journey through life.

3. Until the day dawn.]—The future state, which is to dawn or begin with Christ's appearing to judgment, is fitly called the day, because of the clear knowledge we shall then attain of spiritual matters, and because it will be one never-ending day, without any night.

4. The morning-star arise in your hearts.]—Our Lord calls himself 'the bright and morning-star,' Rev. xxi. 16, because, when he comes from heaven to judge the world, being surrounded with the glory of the Father, that bright light at a great distance will have the appearance of a star; which he termed the morning-star, because it will usher in the day of judgment. This star the apostle represents as arising in men's hearts, because its appearing will produce in their hearts the fullest conviction of the truth of all Christ's promises.

Ver. 20. Is of private invention.]—ἰδίᾳ, ἐκ τῆς ἰδίας. That the Greek word which I have translated invention, hath that signification in any other Greek book, I will not take upon me to affirm; but this I will venture to say, that the subsequent verse plainly leads to that meaning. If so, why should not the scope of the context determine the meaning of the word? 'a translating profane author,

21 For never, at any time, was prophecy brought by the will of man, but the holy men of God spake, being moved¹ by the Holy Ghost. (See 2 Tim. iii. 16.)

21 For never, either anciently or lately, was prophecy uttered by the will of the prophet, but the holy prophets of God spake their prophecies, being inspired by the Holy Ghost: So that the prophecies recorded in the scriptures are not the words of men, but of God.

critics and dictionary writers give uncommon meanings to words, on no other authority but that the scope of the passages where they are found leads to that meaning. So Vitringa and Lowth tell us, Prelim. Diss. Isaiah, p. 39. In particular, what other reason had the Greek commentators for interpreting ἐκείνοι, 1 Cor. vii. 24. οὗτοι ἵτι, διὰ τὴν ἐξουσίαν ἑλλήνων, they differ from another? In like manner, what other reason had our English translators for rendering Luke iii. 13. ἐξουσίᾳ, exact no more than that which is appointed you; and for rendering ἐξουσία, 1 Cor. xi. 10. a veil; and πνευματικά, 1 Cor. xiv. 12. spiritual gifts; and for translating ἐκείνους, 2 Cor. xi. 8. I have not been chargeable? However, not to rest the translation of ἐκείνους solely on the ground of necessity, I observe, that it comes from the word ἐκείνους, which signifies to untie a knot, to unloose a bundle, so as to disclose what it contains. Now, as a prophecy is a thing hidden from the prophet himself, till it is discovered to him by the Spirit, the discovery of it to him may very properly be expressed by the word ἐκείνους, untying: consequently the clause, 'no prophecy of scripture is of private untying,' means, that the prophet did not make it known to himself; it is not of his own invention or finding out. If the reader desires to know the various interpretations which have been given of this passage, he may consult Benson in loc. who rightly observes, "that this text says nothing about any man's interpreting or explaining the scriptures, but declares how the prophets who wrote the scriptures came by the knowledge of the things they wrote."

Ver. 21. Spake, being moved by the Holy Ghost. — ἐκείνους, literally, being carried; not, however, like the heathen priestesses, by the agency of evil spirits, who deprived them of the exercise of all their faculties, (see 1 Cor. xiv. 32. note 2.), but by the inspiration of the Spirit of God, during which they had the entire use of their rational powers.

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Subjects discoursed of in this Chapter.

THE entrance of false teachers into the church, their impious doctrines, their success in perverting many, and the influence of their doctrines in corrupting the morals of their disciples, were all very early made known by the Spirit to the apostle Paul: as we learn from his speech to the elders of Ephesus, and from his epistles to the Thesalonians, to Timothy, and to Titus. The same discoveries were made to the apostles Peter, and John, and Jude, who, as well as Paul, published them in their writings, that the faithful might oppose these false teachers, and confute their errors, as soon as they appeared.

With this benevolent design, therefore, Peter, in his second chapter, recorded the revelation which was made to him concerning the false teachers who were to arise in the church, and concerning their destructive ways. But lest the prospect of these great evils might have grieved the faithful too much, as if God had forsaken his church, he observed, by way of preface, that in the Jewish church there were false prophets, even as among the disciples of Christ there were to be false teachers, who, in a covert manner, would introduce most destructive heresies, denying even the Lord who bought them, ver. 1.—and by their vicious manners would occasion the gospel to be evil spoken of, ver. 2.—These false teachers Jude describes as in part actually come when he wrote his epistle, and mentions their perverting the grace of God into lasciviousness. Both apostles, I suppose, spake of the Nicolaitans, whose deeds our Lord hated, Rev. ii. 6. 15. and of the pestilent sects which sprang from them; namely the Gnostics, Carpocratians, and Menandrians. See 1 John, Prof. sect. 3. Farther, St. Peter foretold that these teachers, actuated by an insatiable love of gain, would make merchandise of the people with feigned words; but should at length suffer condign punishment, ver. 3.—Of these feigned words, the most destructive it seems were, their confidently affirming that God is so good that he will not punish men for their sins. For in confutation of that pestilent error, Peter appealed to the punishment of the angels who sinned, and of the old world, and of Sodom and Gomorrah, as clear proofs from facts, that, sooner or later, God will not spare impenitent sinners, ver. 4, 5, 6.—By what other feigned words the false teachers were to make merchandise of the people, Peter has not so plainly insinuated; but from his appealing to the punishment of the antediluvians and Sodomites, in proof that heretical teachers and their disciples shall not escape, and from what he says ver. 10. and downwards, concerning the practices of these men, it may be presumed that they were falsehoods, contrived to make the indulgence of their lusts consistent with their hope of salvation.

If this was the nature of their doctrine, it accounts for the great success of these teachers in making disciples; for, with the bulk of mankind, instructors are most acceptable when they flatter the multitude in their vices.

But lest it might be alleged, that the flood which destroyed the old world, and the fire which fell on the cities of the plain, were natural events, in which the wicked were no more concerned than the righteous, St. Peter, in describing the destruction of the antediluvians and Sodomites, took care to mention the deliverance of Noah and Lot, as evident proofs that these punishments fell on the wicked by the immediate interposition of God, ver. 7, 8.—And from the whole he draws this conclusion: The Lord is able and willing to deliver the godly, and to reserve the wicked to the day of judgment to be punished, ver. 9.—So that the righteous have no reason to fear their being involved with the wicked in the everlasting destruction which in the end is to fall on them.—Farther, that the faithful might know who the false teachers and wicked men are that shall be punished at the judgment, the apostle told them, they are those especially who go after the flesh in the lusts of pollution, and who despise government, that is, the wholesome laws of the countries where they live, and speak evil of magistrates, ver. 10.—characters by which false teachers in all ages have been distinguished; for their errors have constantly ended in the gratification of their lusts; and they themselves have always hated laws and magistrates, because they restrained and punished their enormities. But the apostle justly observed, that persons of this stamp, by their own corruptions, destroy themselves, both in the present and future life, ver. 12.—Then described the rioting of the false teachers at the love feasts of the church, together with their lasciviousness, ver. 13, 14.—And by remarking that they followed in the way of Balaam, he insinuated, that in opposition to their own knowledge and conscience, they, for the sake of drawing money from their disciples, taught them to indulge themselves in all kinds of sensuality, ver. 15, 16.—Next, because these teachers never delivered any instructions really useful, the apostle compared them to wells without water, and to clouds driven by the wind which yield no rain, ver. 17.—while in the mean time, to draw disciples after them, they boasted of the excellency of their doctrine, by which they permitted those to live in lasciviousness, who, by receiving the gospel, had separated themselves from the wicked heathens, ver. 18.—But of the miserable state into which they brought their disciples, by promising them liberty from the restraint of all laws human and divine, these teachers were glaring examples; being themselves slaves to their own lusts, which is a much worse condition than to be under the restraint of good laws, ver. 19.—He therefore told the disciples of these teachers, that if, after fleeing away from the pollutions of heathenism by professing the gospel, they were again entangled in the same pollutions through the base arts of their teachers, they would become even more vicious than formerly, ver. 20.—So that it had been better for them never to have known the way of righteousness, than having known it to forsake it, ver. 21.—For, in that case, they would be like dogs who turn again to their own vomit, and to the washen sow, which returns to its wallowing in the mire, ver. 22.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. II.—1 But, now that I am speaking of the divinely inspired Jewish prophets, I must remind you, that there were also false prophets among the Jews, even as among you Christians there will be false teachers, who will privily introduce destructive heresies; in particular they will deny even the Lord who bought them from sin and death, (see 2 Cor. v. 15. note 1.) bringing on themselves irresistible destruction.

2 And many nominal Christians will embrace their destructive heresies, because they encourage them in their sins; on account of whose bad lives, the gospel, which teaches the true way of salvation, will be evil spoken of by infidels, who do not distinguish real from nominal Christianity.

3 And having nothing in view but money, these teachers will make merchandise of your persons and estates, will get possession of them by the falsehoods and fables which they will tell you. To them, and to their disciples, the punishment threatened of old lingereth not, and their destruction slumbereth not.

4 The punishment of these deceivers, and of those who are deluded by them, is certain: For, if God did not spare the angels who

Ver. 1.—1. Privily introduce.]—So the word ἑκκρυπτῶς properly signifies, as is plain from the use of the verbal noun ἐκκρυπτός, privily brought in, Gal. ii. 4.—Jude uses a word of the same composition in the same sense; ver. 4. 'Certain men (ἐκκρυπτοὶ) have crept in privily.' By using the word under consideration, Peter intimated, that the heresies of which he speaks were to be introduced under the colour of true doctrine, in the dark as it were, and by little and little; so that the people would not discern their real nature.

2. Destructive heresies.]—Literally, heresies of destruction. This is what grammarians call the genitive of the agent; heresies which cause destruction. The word translated heresy hath a middle signification in scripture, as well as in profane authors; for, as it signifies simply a choice, it is used to express any system of opinions in philosophy or religion, whether true or false, which a person hath chosen to adopt. Thus Paul said to king Agrippa, Acts xxvi. 5. 'after the most straitest (ἡρώτων, heresy) sect of our religion,' &c.; but by Peter, in this passage, it is used to signify opinions known to be false, taken up to gratify pride, ambition, covetousness, lust, or other evil passions. Hence Paul tells Titus, chap. iii. 11. that an 'heretic is self-condemned'; which he could not be if heresy were merely an error of judgment. Being, therefore, an error of the will, it is reckoned among 'the works of the flesh,' Gal. v. 20. and the heretic himself is to be marked and avoided, Rom. xvi. 17. Doctrines known to be false, taken up and spread for the sake of gain, are justly declared to be destructive, because they will bring destruction both on them who teach and on them who receive them. But if one is sincerely persuaded of the truth of the opinion he has embraced, and if neither his worldly interest nor the gratification of his vicious inclinations are thereby promoted, his heresy or wrong opinion is his misfortune rather than his fault; and God, who knows the heart, will make the allowances which are necessary in such a case.

3. Denying even (καὶ ἀπαρνούσαντες) the Lord who bought them.]—Because the Lord is said to have bought the persons who denied him, buying cannot mean the buying these persons from eternal punishment, but must be taken in the sense in which God is said to have bought the Israelites to be his subjects and people, namely, by working miracles for their deliverance out of Egypt, and their introduction into Canaan, Exod. xix. 16. Deut. xxxii. 6. In this sense, either God or Christ might be called 'the Lord who bought the false teachers.' The common opinion however is, that Christ is the Lord spoken of.—Benison indeed affirms that the Father is meant, because Jude, in his 4th verse, distinguishes the only Lord God from our Lord Jesus Christ; and because in scripture the title ἡρώων is nowhere else given to Christ, but to the Father: Luke ii. 29. Acts iv. 24. 2 Tim. ii. 21. Nevertheless, that title seems to be given to the Lamb who opened the seals, Rev. vi. 10. But the determination of this point is of little importance, because, whether the Father or the Son be here styled ἡρώων, it is generally agreed, that by the Lord's buying the heretical teachers, nothing more is meant but his making them his professing people by the preaching of the gospel; and that their denying the Lord who bought them, consisted in their refusing to obey the precepts of the gospel; perhaps, also, in their worshipping idols in order to escape persecution. If Christ in particular is the Lord here spoken of, the false teachers who denied him may be those described 1 John iv. 1. some of whom denied his humanity, ver. 2. and others his divinity, ver. 15. See Jude, ver. 4. note 5.

Ver. 2.—1. Many will follow (ἰακ ἀκολουθίαν) their destructions.]—More than twenty MSS. read here ἀκαθάρτων, their lasciviousness, which Estius and others think the true reading, because it is more natural to say 'follow their lasciviousness,' than 'follow their destructions.' But the common reading should be retained, because any transcriber who did not know that by destructions the apostle meant the destructive heresies mentioned ver. 1. might easily write ἀκαθάρτων for ἀκαθάρτων; but no transcriber would substitute ἀκαθάρτων, a word whose meaning he did not know, in place of ἀκαθάρτων, a word well understood by him.

2. The way of truth.]—So the gospel is called, because perseverance in the faith and practice of the gospel will, like a way or path, lead men to heaven. In the same sense, way of righteousness, way of judgment, &c. are used in scripture.

3. Will be evil spoken of.]—The monstrously vicious lives of the false teachers and their disciples, was, without doubt, one of the causes which, in the early ages, occasioned the Christians in general to be spoken of as the most flagitious of mankind.

Ver. 3.—1. Through covetousness they will make merchandise of you.]—In this single sentence there is a clear prediction of the iniquitous practices of these great merchants of souls, the Romish clergy, who have rated all crimes, even the most atrocious, at a fixed price; so that, if their doctrine be true, whoever pays the price may commit the crime, without hazarding his salvation.

2. By fictitious tales.]—So ἡρώων λόγους literally signifies: For any narration, whether historical or fabulous, was called ἡρώων. See Esa. iv. 60. Accordingly our translators have rendered ἡρώων λόγους, Acts i. 1. 'the former treatise. What the fictitious tales were, by which the false teachers would make merchandise of the people, is not said: But from the apostle's mentioning the degradation of the angels who sinned, and the destruction of the antediluvians and Sodomites, to prove that God will not spare obstinate sinners, it is probable they were of such a kind as to make the people believe that God is so good that he will not punish men severely for indulging their natural appetites, and committing a few sins which do him no harm. Perhaps, also, he had in view the fables concerning the visions of angels, and the miracles performed at the sepulchres of departed saints, &c. which the false teachers in the early ages, and the monks in later times, fabricated, to gain credit to those impious doctrines by which they made the practice of sin consistent with the hope of salvation, and drew money from the people.

3. The punishment threatened of old lingereth not.]—God having at the beginning condemned the first sinners, Adam and Eve, to death, that ancient condemnation belongs to all sinners, and will fall heavier on those who not only are wicked themselves, but by false doctrine and fables excite others to be wicked. The apostle therefore justly declared, that the condemnation threatened of old belongs to false teachers; and, by a beautiful personification, represents it as having long ago begun its journey towards them; and, since it neither lingereth nor slumbereth, it will certainly overtake them. Thus, while the apostle asserts the justice of God, he declares his patience: He is slow to punish, that sinners may have time to repent; but if they continue impenitent, he will without fail punish them at last.

Ver. 4.—1. For if.]—Ἐπεὶ γὰρ may here be translated affirmatively, 'since God did not spare.' Either way translated, this, and verses 5, 6, 7. contain a proof of the apostle's affirmation in the latter part of ver. 3.

2. God did not spare the angels who sinned.]—The angels seem to have been placed originally in a state of trial. Those who stood are called in scripture the holy angels. The sin of the angels is spoken of likewise John viii. 44. and Jude ver. 6. as a thing well known. Perhaps it was handed down by tradition from Adam and Eve; for the memory of it seems to have been preserved among the heathens in the fable of the Titans warring against the Gods. What the sin of the angels was, is not well known. Jude, ver. 5. says 'they kept not their own principality, but left their proper habitation.' Hence their

5 And did not spare the old world, but saved Noah, a preacher of righteousness,¹ the eighth WHO WAS SAVED;² when he brought the flood upon the world of the ungodly;³

6 And having reduced to ashes the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah,¹ punished THEM with an overthrow, placing THEM an example² to those who afterward would live ungodly;

7 And rescued righteous Lot, exceedingly grieved by the lawlessness of the behaviour of the lawless; WILL HE SPARE THEM? (See ver. 4. note 1.)

8 For that righteous man, dwelling among them, by seeing and hearing tormented HIS righteous soul from day to day with THEIR unlawful works.

9 The Lord knoweth to rescue the godly out of temptation, (Ja. 101.) and to keep in ward the unrighteous to the day of judgment, to be punished.¹ (Vulg. cruciandos).

10 And especially these who go after the sin by many is thought to have been pride, and a discontent with their station. See 1 Tim. iii. 6. note 3. But whatever it was, considering their high intellectual powers, they might easily have avoided it; and therefore God did not spare them, as he spared Adam and Eve, who, on account of the greatness of the temptation spread forth by the evil angels, and their own inexperience, were fit objects of mercy.

3. With chains (see Jude ver. 6. note 3.) of darkness, confining them in Tartarus.]—This is a literal translation of ἐν τοῖς ἰσχυροῖς τῆς ἀπαιτίας. The word Tartarus is not found in the LXX. nor anywhere in the New Testament but here. Its meaning therefore must be sought for among the Greeks. Homer represents Tartarus as a deep place under the earth, Iliad v. line 13. In like manner Hesiod speaks of Tartarus as a place far under ground, where the Titans are bound with chains in thick darkness, Theogon. line 119. 718. But on other occasions the Greek writers speak of Tartarus as in the air, and at the extremity of the earth, beyond the region of Mauritania. Hence the epithet τῆς ἀπαιτίας αἰθέρος, airy Tartarus. The Jews, as appears from Job ii. 2. thought the fallen angels, or at least some of them, were permitted to wander up and down the earth, and to tempt men. This was the opinion of the evangelists likewise, who speak of the devil's tempting our Lord; and of Peter, who represents the devil as 'a roaring lion walking about,' &c. 1 Epist. v. 8.; and the opinion of Paul, who insinuates that evil spirits have their habitation in the air, Eph. ii. 2. vi. 11, 12. Wherefore, seeing the Greeks named the place where they supposed the Titans, the enemies of the gods, were confined, Tartarus, it was natural for Peter, when writing in the Greek language concerning the confining of the evil angels in the air, or wherever else they are shut up, to call the place of their confinement Tartarus, although his idea of Tartarus was different from that of the Greeks.—Peter's expression, 'chains of darkness,' and Jude's, 'reserved in everlasting chains under darkness,' are not inconsistent with the fact asserted by the other inspired writers, that the evil spirits are confined in our atmosphere; for, in comparison of the regions out of which they were cast, our air is a place of darkness. Or darkness and chains of darkness may be understood metaphorically, as denoting the horror and misery of the state in which evil spirits now are. See ver. 17. Because it is said, Rev. xx. 3. that 'Satan was cast (ἐκ τῆς γῆς) into the abyss,' and Luke vii. 31. that the devils besought Jesus 'that he would not command them to go out (ἐκ τῆς γῆς) into the abyss,' Estius infers that Tartarus and Hell are the same; and that the greatest part of the angels who sinned are confined there, though some of them are allowed to roam about on the earth, tempting men. For more concerning Tartarus as a place of punishment, see Pope's note on line 16. of his translation of the 8th book of the Iliad.

4. Delivered them over to be kept to judgment.]—Jude, ver. 6. 'The judgment of the great day.' From this it follows, that the angels who sinned are not at present suffering the punishment due to them for their crimes, but, like malefactors, they are kept in durance in the air, till the time come when they are to be punished with the wicked of mankind whom they have seduced. This was the opinion of all the Christian writers for five centuries, as Whitby hath shewn; and it is agreeable to our Lord's doctrine, who calls the fire into which wicked men are to be cast, 'fire prepared for the devil and his angels.'

Ver. 5.—1. But saved Noah (ἄνθρωπος) a preacher of righteousness.]—By calling Noah ἄνθρωπος, a crier or herald of righteousness, Peter insinuates, that all the time Noah was preparing the ark, he proceeded, notwithstanding their high rank, but, with chains of darkness confining them in Tartarus, delivered them over to be kept for judgment and punishment;

6 And did not suffer the wicked inhabitants of the old world to go unpunished, but saved Noah, a preacher of righteousness, the eighth person who was saved, when he brought the flood upon the earth on which the ungodly dwell, and destroyed them all, though they were so many in number, 1 Pet. iii. 20.

6 And having reduced to ashes the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, punished their inhabitants with a great overthrow, placing them a typical example of that dreadful punishment by fire which he will inflict on the wicked at the last day, to deter those who in after-times would live ungodly;

7 And, to shew his regard to good men, rescued righteous Lot, who had been exceedingly grieved by the lawlessness of the behaviour of the lawless Sodomites;—will he, do ye think, suffer those ungodly teachers to go unpunished, who by their false doctrine destroy multitudes?

8 Lot was justly delivered when the Sodomites were destroyed; for that righteous man, dwelling among them, was so far from imitating them, that, by seeing their base actions, and hearing their lewd speeches, he tormented his righteous soul from day to day with their unrighteous works.

9 From the preservation of Noah and Lot, with their families, ye may be sensible that the Lord is willing and able to rescue the godly out of temptation; and from the example of the angels who sinned, that he will keep in ward the unrighteous to the day of judgment, to be punished.

10 And especially God will punish those who go after the flesh claimed to the antediluvians the destruction of the world by a flood, that from the dread of that impending judgment of God they might be brought to repentance; like as Jonah proclaimed to the Ninevites the destruction of their city for the same purpose.

2. The eighth who was saved.]—Pearson on the Creed, p. 113. translates this 'the eighth preacher of righteousness'; supposing that Enoch, (Gen. v. 24.), from whom Noah was descended, was the first preacher of righteousness, and that all the intermediate persons were likewise preachers of righteousness. But there is not any evidence that the intermediate persons were preachers of righteousness, and therefore the translation I have given seems more natural. For in the ark were Noah, and his sons Shem, Ham, and Japhet, and Noah's wife, and the three wives of his sons, Gen. vii. 16. in all eight persons. Bryant, Mythol. vol. ii. hath shewn, that the knowledge of the flood, and of the eight persons who were saved, hath been preserved among the different nations of mankind by tradition; that in the ancient heathen writings there is mention made of the sacred eight; that the hill where the ark rested is called the hill of the eight; and that a village near that hill bears the same name, Themenis. See Hammond.

3. The world of the ungodly.]—The antediluvians were called ungodly, because they had lost all knowledge of God, were universally addicted to idolatry, and lived in the gratification of the lusts of the flesh, Gen. vi. 2. 4. These likewise were the sins of the false teachers of whom Peter speaks.

Ver. 6.—1. The cities of Sodom and Gomorrah.]—The sin of Sodom was unnatural lusts, Gen. xix. 5. and 'pride with fulness of bread, (luxury), and abundance of idleness,' especially among the women, and hard-heartedness towards the poor, Ezek. xvi. 49. Jude, ver. 7.

2. Placing them an example.]—Because the word used here is παράδειγμα, not ἀνάδειγμα, Erasmus supposes the apostle meant, not an example to be imitated, but an example to be avoided; and that Jude, to express the same idea, uses the word ἐκτίμημα. Estius says, these differences in the use of the words are not always observed; and therefore he is of opinion, that by an example Peter means a type or representation of the future punishment of the wicked by everlasting fire. Jude, ver. 7.

Ver. 8. Dwelling among them.]—Lot dwelled sixteen years in Sodom after he parted with Abraham; which was a long space of severe trial. Doubtless Lot, who was so exceedingly grieved with the lawlessness of the Sodomites from day to day, often earnestly desired to depart from so wicked a city. But he was directed, it seems, by God to remain, that he might be an example of his goodness and power in delivering the godly both from temptation and punishment.

Ver. 9. And to keep in ward the unrighteous, &c.]—So τηναις signifies, Acts xvi. 23. The multitude of the inhabitants of the old world, and of the cities of the plain, was in the eye of God no reason for not destroying them. He destroyed them all at once. On the other hand, a few godly persons among them were not overlooked by God because they were few, but were preserved by an immediate interposition of his power. This last observation Peter makes, to shew, that notwithstanding God permits false teachers to arise and deceive many, he will preserve the sincere from being deluded by them, and at length will destroy them out of the church. By God's keeping the unrighteous in ward to be punished at the day of judgment, we are taught, that the punishment inflicted on the wicked in this life will not hinder them from being punished in the next

11 Whereas angels, who are greater in strength and power, do not bring a reviling¹ accusation against them² before the Lord.³

12 But these, as natural irrational animals,¹ made for capture and destruction, speaking evil (ψ, 166.) of MATTERS which they do not understand, shall be utterly destroyed by their own corruptions, 13 Receiving the DUE reward of unrighteousness. They reckon riot which IS in the day, pleasure. THEY ARE spots and causes of reproach¹ living in riot² by their own deceits, when they feast³ with you.

14 They have eyes full of an adulteress, and which cease not from sin: They allure¹ unstable souls: They have an heart exercised IN covetous practices. (See Eph. iv. 18. note 2.) Children of the curse. (Matt. xxv. 41.)

15 Having forsaken the straight way, they have wandered, following IN the way¹ of Balaam the son of Beor,² who loved the hire of unrighteousness;³ (see Numb. xxii. xxiii.)

The principal part of their punishment will be that which they shall suffer after the judgment.

Ver. 10.—1. Those who go (οὐκ ἔστιν) after the flesh.—Jude, ver. 7. 'after strange flesh.' This is a periphrasis for sodomitical practices.

2. They despise government.—Since δοξαι, dignities, persons in high offices, magistrates and rulers, are mentioned in the following clause, it is natural to suppose that ἀντιπαύειν signifies the office of magistrates, or rather the exercise of their office—they hate the government which God and men carry on by righteous laws. In this passage the apostle had an eye to the false teachers of the Jewish nation, whose principles led them to despise the heathen magistrates, and even to revile and resist them. See Rom. xiii. II. illustration.

Ver. 11.—1. A reviling accusation.—Βλασφημῶν κεινόν. The Greek word βλασφημῶν signifies to utter speech, whether true or false, which hurts the reputation of another. Here it signifies true speech of that kind, expressed in bitter language.

2. Against them.—One MS., supported by the Vulgate, reads here ἀντιπαύειν, against one another, which no doubt gives a good meaning. But the common reading αὐτῶν, them, is better supported, and may be retained, because it is not uncommon thing in scripture to introduce a relative, the antecedent of which is not expressed; see Ess. iv. 64. Or αὐτῶν may be read with the spiritus asper; thus, αὐτῶν; in which case the translation will be one another. To this temperate manner of speaking concerning the angels who sinned, the holy angels are led by their own virtue, and by their reverence for God. It is probable the apostle had in his eye Michael's contest with the devil, mentioned Zech. iii. 1. To which also Jude refers, ver. 9. For angels, the plural, signify one angel here. See iv. 22.

3. Before the Lord.—If, as is generally supposed, this is an allusion to Zech. iii. 1, 2. 'before the Lord' means 'before the Angel of the Lord.'

Ver. 12. But these, as (ὡς) natural irrational animals.—The epithet natural is given here to wild beasts, to signify that they act always according to their natural dispositions; and that the false teachers, whom the apostle compares to them, were like them furious, rapacious, lustful, and revengeful; and, on account of their mischievous nature, were to be taken and destroyed. For in these things the false teachers resembled wild beasts, and not in reviling laws and magistrates; unless we suppose the apostle means, that in so doing they were actuated, like wild beasts, by the impulse of their passions. See Jude, ver. 10. note.

Ver. 13.—1. And causes of reproach.—In this translation I have followed Estius, because the καὶ, which signifies a reproach, is here put for a cause of reproach.

2. Living in riot.—The word ἐκστασις properly signifies (delicat) to live in sensual pleasure, especially that of eating and drinking carried to excess.

3. By their own deceits, when they feast with you.—Συνιέντες μετὰ, from σύν, an elegant plentiful feast, from ἐν ἐκ αὐτῶν τοῦς συνιέντες.—The primitive Christians were used to feast together before they celebrated the Lord's Supper, because it was instituted by Christ after he had eaten the passover with his disciples, see 1 Cor. xi. 21. note 1. These previous suppers were called, Jude, ver. 13.

through unnatural lust, and who despise the government both of God, and man, hating to be restrained thereby: and being audacious, self-willed, they do not fear to revile magistrates when they punish them for their crimes.

11 Whereas the holy angels, who are greater in strength and power than the angels who sinned, when they complain of them, do not bring an accusation against them in reviling speech before the Lord, but set an example of temperate language, which mankind ought to imitate.

12 But these false teachers, like natural wild beasts made for capture and destruction on account of the mischief they do, reviling laws and magistrates, whose excellent nature they do not understand, shall be miserably destroyed, both in the present and future life, by their own corrupt doctrines and practices;

13 Thus receiving the due reward of unrighteousness. They reckon riot which is in the day the highest pleasure, because it is a carrying vice to the greatest pitch, 1 Thess. v. 7. They are spots in the body of Christ, deformities in the church, and causes of reproach, living in riot by means of their own corrupt doctrines, when they join you in your love feasts.

14 On these occasions, they look lasciviously on the married women whom they have debauched, without ceasing from looking on them. With the bait of sensual pleasure, they allure souls who have no fixed principles of virtue, making them believe the Lord's Supper was instituted to promote carnal love. Besides being lewd, they are excessively covetous: They are heirs of the curse which Christ will pronounce on the wicked.

15 Having forsaken the straight path of virtue, these teachers have wandered, following in the crooked path of Balaam the son of Beor, who loved the hire of unrighteousness promised him by Balak to such a degree, that he resolved to curse the Israelites whether God gave him permission to do so or not.

αἰώνων, love feasts, because the rich, by feasting their poor brethren expressed their love to them; see Jude, ver. 12. note 2. On these occasions the false teachers and their disciples were guilty of much lewdness. For, as is mentioned in the next verse, they inflamed themselves by looking lasciviously on the married women, whom they had debauched by telling them that Christ's precept of loving one another was chiefly to be understood of the mutual love of the sexes. Thus did these wicked teachers and their disciples live in riot by their own deceits.

Ver. 14. They allure unstable souls.—For the import of ἀλλυμένων, here translated allure, see James i. 14. note. The persons, especially the women, who were thus allured, were souls not established in the faith and practice of the gospel.

Ver. 15.—1. Following in the way of Balaam.—Balaam loved wealth and honour so immoderately, that to obtain them he acted contrary to his conscience. 'To follow in his way,' therefore, is to be guided by the same base passions, and to commit the same base actions.

2. The son of Beor.—He is called by Moses the son of Beor; and his city was Pethor, Numb. xxii. 5. Wherefore, either Balaam's father had two names, or, as Almsworth and Lightfoot conjecture, the apostle adopts the Chaldaic orthography, in which letters are often changed, as in this name Ajin is changed to Samach.

3. Who loved the hire of unrighteousness.—When Balaam was first sent for to curse the Israelites, Balak's messengers carried only the rewards of divination in their hand, ver. 7.; and, therefore, when God forbade him to go, he easily acquiesced and refused to go, ver. 13. But when Balak sent a second request, by more honourable messengers, and with them a promise to promote him to very great honour, and to do whatever he should say to him, Balaam, inflamed with a love of the promised hire, endeavoured a second time to obtain permission to go. And though God allowed him to go, on the express condition that he should do nothing in the affair without his order, Balaam went with the resolution of cursing the Israelites whether God permitted him or not. This appears from the following circumstances:—1. 'God's anger was kindled against Balaam, because he went,' ver. 22.; and that notwithstanding he had permitted him to go.—2. An angel was sent to stop him on the road, because his way was perverse, ver. 32.—3. After the angel rebuked him, Balaam confessed he had sinned; not surely in going, since God had permitted him to go, but in going with the resolution to curse the Israelites.—4. Having acknowledged his sin, Balaam was permitted to go without farther opposition; doubtless because he had at that time laid aside his wicked project, and was determined to do nothing but by God's order. Nevertheless, his love of the hire still continuing, he again resumed his wicked project, and endeavoured, by repeated sacrifices and enchantments, to obtain permission to curse the people, that he might obtain the hire, chap. xxiv. 1. And when these were ineffectual, though he so far obeyed God that he blessed the Israelites, it was no dictate of his heart, but a suggestion of the Spirit of God, which he could not resist. For that his love of the hire, and his inclination to curse the Israelites continued, he shewed by his after behaviour, when, to bring the curse of God on the Israelites, he counselled Balak to entice them to fornication and idolatry, by means of the Midianitish women.

16 But received a rebuke for his own transgression, (αἰσχος ἀνθρώπου) the dumb beast, speaking in man's language, forbade the madness of the prophet.²

17 These TEACHERS are wells without water; clouds driven by a tempest,¹ (νεφελὶς ζέφυρος) for whom the blackness of darkness³ is reserved for ever:

18 (Tag, 98.) Because, speaking great swelling WORDS of falsehood,¹ they allure by the lusts of the flesh, EVEN by lasciviousness, those who have actually fled away² from them who are living in error.³

19 They promise them liberty,¹ themselves being slaves of corruption. (See chap. i. 4. note 3.) For by what a man is conquered, by that also he is enslaved.²

20 (Tag, 97.) Now if, having fled away from the pollutions of the world¹ through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, being again entangled in these they are overcome, the last POLLUTIONS become worse to them than the first.

21 (Tag, 93.) Therefore it had been better¹ for them not to have known the way of righteousness, than, having known it, to turn away from the holy commandment delivered to them.²

Numb. xxi. 16. Rev. ii. 14. Now, in giving that advice Balaam acted most unrighteously, as he did it in contradiction to the will of God made known to him, and in opposition to his own knowledge that God's promise concerning the Israelites was irrevocable, Numb. xxi. 19. &c. He therefore gave the advice, not in the persuasion that it would be effectual, but merely to gain the promised hire, which therefore is called 'the hire of unrighteousness.' In these things the false teachers, who, to draw money from their disciples, encouraged them by their doctrine to commit all manner of lewdness, might well be said to 'follow in the way of Balaam;' and their doctrine might justly be called 'the doctrine of Balaam.'

Ver. 16.—1. The dumb beast, speaking (ὡς ἀνθρώπου φωνῇ) in man's language, (for this translation, see 1 Cor. xiv. 10. note), forbade.—The apostle does not mean that the ass forbade Balaam, in so many words, to go with the princes of Moab; but that her unwillingness to proceed in the journey, her falling down under him rather than go on, her complaint in man's language of his smiting her three times for not going on, and her saying, 'I will ever wait to do so to thee' were things so extraordinary, especially her speaking, that Balaam, from that miracle at least, ought to have understood that the whole was a rebuke from God of his foolish project. But the thoughts of the riches and honours promised him by Balak so occupied his mind, that nothing of that sort occurred to him till the angel shewed himself, and rebuked him for his perverseness. That Balaam's ass should have spoken on this occasion cannot be thought incredible. 'God opened her mouth,' that is, made such a change in its parts as fitted them for emitting articulate speech; and, either by his own operation, or by the operation of an angel, directed the ass to utter what she said. There is therefore no necessity to suppose, either that the ass was endowed for a few moments with reason, or that the particulars relating to her were presented to Balaam's imagination in a dream, as Maimonides believed; or that, according to the system of the metempsychosis, she was animated by a human soul. The whole transaction, on the supposition that it was miraculous, is rational and consistent.

2. The madness of the prophet.—The apostle terms Balaam's resolution to curse the Israelites without the divine permission madness, because it could have no effect but to bring the curse of God upon himself. Though Balaam is termed a soothsayer, Josh. xii. 2. and is said to have used enchantments, Numb. xxi. 1. Peter justly calls him a prophet, on account of God's speaking to him, and giving him a very remarkable prophecy, recorded Numb. xxiv. 15. However, being a very bad man, he may often have feigned communications with the Deity, to draw money from the multitude. Perhaps the only communications he ever had with God were on this occasion; and they may have been granted to him, that by uttering them in the hearing of Balak, and of the princes of Moab and Midian, the coming of one out of Jacob who was to have dominion, might be known to the nations of the east. See Numb. xxi. 19.

Ver. 17.—1. Wells without water; clouds driven by a tempest.—There being few wells and little rain in the eastern countries, it was a grievous disappointment to a thirsty traveller to come to a well that had no water. The husbandman was equally disappointed to see clouds arise which gave him the prospect of rain, but, ending in a tempest, instead of refreshing, destroyed the fruits of the earth. By these comparisons, the ostentation, hypocrisy, levity, and pessi-

16 But he received a rebuke for his own transgression, the dumb beast on which he rode, speaking to him in man's language, put a stop to the madness of the prophet, by occasioning him to attend to the angel who stood in his way.

17 These teachers, though they promise much instruction to their disciples, are wholly void of knowledge; so may be called wells without water, and clouds driven about by a tempest, which give no rain. For these hypocritical teachers and their disciples, the gloomiest darkness is reserved for ever:

18 Because, though they are utterly void of knowledge, speaking great swelling false words concerning their own illumination, and their knowledge of the gospel, they allure by the lusts of the flesh, even by permitting all kinds of lasciviousness, those to become their disciples, who, as Christians, have actually separated themselves from the heathens, who are living in error and sin. See ver. 20.

19 By teaching that men's appetites are given them to be gratified, and that the gospel allows them every pleasure, they promise them liberty. But what sort of liberty that is, may be known from themselves being slaves of corruption. For, by what a man is overcome, by that he certainly is enslaved.

20 Now the deluded ought to consider, that if, having fled away from the pollutions of the heathens, through the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, being a second time entangled in these lascivious practices, they are overcome (ver. 19.) by them, the latter pollutions are more fatal to them than the first, because they are more aggravated, more difficult to be expelled, and will be more severely punished. See Matt. xii. 45.

21 Therefore it had been better for them never to have known the gospel, the way of righteousness, than after having known it and embraced it, to turn away from the holy commandment delivered to them by the apostles of the Lord and Saviour, chap. iii. 2.

cloudiness of the false teachers, are set forth in the strongest colours. See Jude 12. note 5, 6.

2. The blackness of darkness.—In scripture, darkness signifies a state of disconsolate misery. Here it denotes the punishment of the wicked after the judgment, which our Lord also hath represented by persons being 'cast into outer darkness,' Matt. viii. 12. 'The blackness of darkness,' therefore, is a great degree of future misery.

Ver. 18.—1. Great swelling words of falsehood.—The false teachers, pretending to an illumination superior to that of the apostles, vaunted thereof on all occasions in pompous language, to gain credit to every thing they taught. The doctrine mentioned by Jude, ver. 16. for the sake of which the false teachers boasted of their illumination, was different from the doctrine of which Peter speaks here; see Jude, ver. 16. note 4.

2. Who have actually fled.—For αὐτοὶ; the Alexandrian MS. hath here οὐκ ὄντες, a little, and the Vulgate postulatum. Some MSS. have οὐκ ὄντες.

3. Fled away from them who are living in error.—The word αὐτοὶ is rightly construed with τοὺς ἀσεβήσαντας, them who are living, because κ governs the accusative. See ver. 20.

Ver. 19.—1. They promise them liberty.—By teaching their disciples to 'despise government,' ver. 10. they promised them liberty to gratify their lusts without restraint, ver. 18. which they pretended was the true Christian liberty. But as the apostle observes in this verse, instead of being liberty, that method of living is the most grievous bondage.

2. For by what a man is conquered, by that also he is enslaved.—This, Le Clerc tells us, is an allusion to the ancient custom of making those slaves who were conquered and taken in battle. Such persons were called servi, because they were preserved from death to be made slaves. Just. Inst. lib. i. tit. 3. It was one of the stoical paradoxes, that the wise man is the only free man, and that all wicked men are slaves. This maxim the apostle adopts and supports in its sound sense, by unanswerable argument; namely, that the man who is conquered by his lusts hath no freedom left him, but must, as a slave, obey all their dictates. Hence our Lord said to the Jews who boasted of their freedom, John vii. 24. 'Whosoever committeth sin is the slave of sin.' Of the slavery in which every wicked man lives, St. Paul hath given a lively picture, Rom. vi. 16—20.

Ver. 20. The pollutions of the world.—What these are, Peter hath described 1 Epist. iv. 3. The word ἀσεβήματα, in the language of the ancient physicians, signified the infection of the plague. It is here used to denote sin in general; but more especially the sin of lasciviousness, on account of its infectious nature and destructive consequences.

Ver. 21.—1. Better for them not to have known the way of righteousness;—because their sin would have been less, and their punishment lighter. If a man forsakes the way of righteousness which he hath once walked in, he sins knowingly and wilfully. This our Lord declares to be worthy of many stripes.—See Heb. vi. 6. x. 26. where the dangerous nature of the sin of apostasy is described. See also James iv. 17.

2. The holy commandment delivered to them.—Bishop Sherlock understands this of some directions drawn up by the apostles, and delivered to the Christians, concerning their conduct with respect to the false teachers of that age. But I rather understand it of the commandments delivered by the apostles in their epistles, concerning the moral conduct of Christians in general.—See what is meant in scripture by delivering, tradition, &c. Col. ii. 6. note.

23 But the SAYING of the true proverb hath happened to them: The dog is turned again to his own vomit; and the washed sow to wallowing in the mire.

23 But the saying of the true proverb hath happened to them: The dog is turned again to his own vomit, (Prov. xxvi. 11.) and the washed sow to wallowing in the mire; which proverbs teach, that it is as difficult to change the dispositions of wicked men, as to alter the nature of brute animals.

Ver. 22. The dog is turned again to his own vomit.]—As applied by the apostle this proverb signifies, that although the persons spoken of had at their baptism promised to renounce their wicked practices, and perhaps had begun to do so, yet, as the corruptions of their nature still remained, they returned to their evil practices with more greediness than ever. Blackwall says this proverb, "with great propriety and strength, marks out the sottishness and odious manners of wretches enslaved to sensual appetites and carnal lusts; and the extreme difficulty of reforming vicious and irrevocate habits." Sacr. Classics, vol. li. p. 82.

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Discoveries in this Chapter.

THE apostle informed the brethren, that his design in writing both his epistles, was to bring to their remembrance the doctrines and precepts delivered by the prophets and apostles; because it was the most effectual method of preserving them from being seduced by false teachers, ver. 1.—Wherefore, as one of the greatest of these men's errors was, their denying the coming of Christ to judge the world and destroy this mundane system, he desired the brethren to recollect what the holy prophets anciently had spoken, together with the commandments of the apostles of Christ to their disciples, to prepare for and to expect these events, ver. 2.—But, lest they might think Christ was to come to judgment immediately, he told them they were to know this, that in the last age of the world scoffers will arise in the church itself, who, though they may pretend to believe the revelations of God, (see ver. 5.), will be infidels at heart, ver. 3.—and who, because Christ's coming was so long delayed, will ridicule the promise of his coming as a mere fable, and from the permanency of the mundane system, without any alteration since the beginning, will argue that there is no probability of its being ever destroyed, ver. 4.—But to shew the fallacy of these reasonings, the apostle observed, that such atheistical Christians are wilfully ignorant of Moses's doctrine concerning the making of the heavens and the earth of water, and concerning the earth's subsisting by water through the power of the word of God, ver. 5.—and concerning the destruction of the old world by the same word of God, through his overflowing it with water, ver. 6.—Wherefore, the world having been once destroyed, as well as made, by the word of God, there is a possibility that it may be destroyed by him a second time. This conclusion following clearly from the Mosaic history, the apostle did not think it necessary to mention it. But to shew the certainty of the destruction of the mundane system, he assured the brethren, and all mankind, that the world is no more to be destroyed by water but by fire; being defended from deluges, and kept safely to be destroyed by fire at the day of judgment, ver. 7.—This argument being founded on experience, was unanswerable.

The apostle, it seems, foresaw, that on account of the day of judgment's being so long delayed, the scoffers would charge Christ with a want of faithfulness, or want of power to perform his promise. He therefore assured the brethren, that God's purposes are not affected by any duration whatever. One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. His purposes are accomplished with as much certainty, however long delayed, as if they had been executed the very day they were declared, ver. 8.—Further, he assured them, that Christ does not delay his coming, either because he has forgotten his promise, or because he wants power to do what he hath promised, but merely with a view to afford sinners space for repentance, ver. 9.; that his coming will be sudden and unexpected, and occasion inexpressible terror to infidels; that after the judgment, the heavens and the earth, and all the works of God and man upon the earth, shall be utterly burnt, ver. 10.; and that, knowing these things, believers ought always to live in a godly manner, ver. 11.—looking for, and earnestly desiring the coming of the day of the Lord, in which the heavens being set on fire, &c. ver. 12.—But though the world is thus to be burnt, the apostle declared, that he with all the godly, according to God's promise, expected a new heaven and a new earth, in which the righteous are to dwell for ever, ver. 13.—Wherefore he exhorted the faithful, in the expectation of an abode in that happy country, to endeavour earnestly to be found blameless by Christ at his coming, ver. 14.

In the remaining part of the chapter St. Peter informed the brethren, that some of the teachers built their false doctrine on certain passages of his brother Paul's epistles, which they wrested, as they also did the other scriptures, to their own destruction, ver. 15, 16.—He desired them therefore to be on their guard, that they might not be carried away by the error of these lawless persons, ver. 17.—and exhorted them to grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, to whom he addressed a doxology; and so concluded his letter, ver. 18.

CHAP. III.—1 Beloved, this second epistle I now write to you, in which¹ EPISTLES I stir up your sincere² mind (v. 163.) to remembrance:

2 To recollect (τὸν θυμὸν) the words before spoken by the holy prophets, (chap. i. 12, 19.), and the commandment of us the apostles

Ver. 1.—1. In which.]—Ἐν ᾧ. Because the antecedent, second epistle, implies that Peter had written a first, he puts the relative in the plural, to shew that he speaks of both his epistles.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. III.—1 Beloved, this second epistle I now write to you, in which two epistles my design is to stir up your sincere mind to the practice of every virtue, by bringing to your remembrance some things which ye know;

2 Even to recollect the predictions before spoken by the holy prophets, (Jude, ver. 14, 15.), David (Psalm. l. 1—6, lxxv. 8.), and Daniel (xii. 2.), concerning the power and coming of Christ

2. Your sincere mind.]—Ἐν ᾧ. The apostle calls their mind sincere, to signify that he believed they had a real love of truth and goodness.

of the Lord and Saviour. (See ver. 11, 12.)

3 Knowing this first, that *scoffers will come*¹ in the last of the days,² walking after their own lusts,³

4 And saying, Where is the promise¹ of his coming? For from the *TIME*² the fathers have fallen asleep, all things continue³ as at the beginning of the creation.⁴

5 (Iac, 98.) But this wilfully escapes them, that the heavens were anciently, and the earth (ἐξ) of water,¹ and (ἡ, 113.) through water THE EARTH consists² by (τῇ λογῇ) the word of God.

6 (ὁ δὲ ὅτι τότε κόσμος) By whom the then world, being overflowed with water, perished.¹

Ver. 3.—1. Scoffers will come.]—When the apostle wrote this passage, there were Epicureans and others among the Gentiles, and Sadducees among the Jews, who ridiculed the promises of the gospel concerning the resurrection of the dead, the general judgment, the destruction of the earth, and a future state of rewards and punishments. Wherefore, seeing the scoffers of whom Peter speaks had not yet appeared, but were to come in the last period of the duration of the world, it is probable that they were to arise in the church itself. Accordingly they are reproved, ver. 5. for being wilfully ignorant of the Mosaic history of the creation and of the deluge. And Jude, ver. 18, 19, says the scoffers separated themselves from other Christians, and had not the Spirit, though they pretended to be inspired.—The evil of scoffing at the doctrines and promises of the gospel may be learned from Psal. l. 1. where scoffing at religion is represented as the highest stage of impiety. The prediction of the coming of scoffers shews that they come by the permission of God, who, no doubt, will bring good out of that great evil.

2. In the last of the days.]—Ἐν ἔσχατοις τοῖς μέσιν. This is different from ἔσχατοις χρόνοις, 1 Tim. iv. 1. 'future times,' and from ἔσχατοις ἡμέραις, 2 Tim. iii. 1. 'later times.' See the note on that verse. It is different likewise from ἐν ἔσχατῳ τῷ χρόνῳ, 1 Pet. i. 20. 'in the last of the times.' Perhaps it means the last part of the days of the world's duration.

3. Walking after their own lusts.]—Here the apostle has laid open the true source of infidelity, and of men's scoffing at religion. As Benson says, "They may pretend to religion, but they are governed by sense and appetite: and they take refuge in infidelity, and scoff at religion, to make themselves easy in their vices."

Ver. 4.—1. Where is the promise of his coming?]—that is, the accomplishment of the promise of his coming. The promise of Christ's coming we have, Matt. xx. 27. 'The Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels; and then he will reward every man according to his works.' See also John xiv. 3. This promise was renewed by the angel at our Lord's ascension, Acts i. 11. 'This same Jesus, who is taken from you into heaven, will so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.'—By representing Christ's promised coming as a delusion, the scoffers set themselves and others free from all fear of future judgment, and bereft the righteous of the hope of reward.

2. For (ἐπεὶ; supply ἵνα) from the time.]—Grotius translates this, "For except that the fathers have fallen asleep," contrary to the propriety of the Greek idiom.

3. All things continue as at the beginning.]—By all things, the scoffers meant the existence and motion of the heavenly bodies, the succession of the seasons, the revolutions of day and night the same degree of light and heat in the world, the fruitfulness of the earth, the successive generation and corruption of animals and vegetables; in short, every part of this stupendous fabric, which, because it suffers no change, the scoffers will say must be eternal. And with respect to the resurrection; as the first races of men, who have fallen asleep, continue to sleep, without the least symptom of their awaking, the scoffers will affirm, that the resurrection of the dead is a thing altogether improbable. The same they will say of the creation of the new heavens and new earth. The atheists of the present age have no better arguments for proving the eternity of the world, in opposition to the arguments from tradition, from history, from the recent invention of arts, from the imperfect population of the earth; which all shew that it was made, and that not very long ago.

4. Of the creation.]—The scoffers being nominal Christians, will speak of the creation, not because they believe it, but as using the common phraseology; or, perhaps, by way of ridicule. For if they allowed the world to have had a beginning, they could not deny the possibility of its having an end.

Ver. 5.—1. That the heavens were anciently, and the earth of water.]—As in this passage the heavens signify the aerial atmosphere which surrounds this earth, the plural is put for the singular, by a change of the number very common in the scripture. See Esa. lv. 22.—Further, since Moses tells us, that 'in the beginning God created the heavens and the earth'; and that after the earth was created 'it was without form and void,' and then calls it the deep, and the waters, he certainly speaks of the creation of the chaos. But the apostle Peter speaks of the formation of the different parts of the mundane system out of the chaos or water, of which Moses also gives an account. For the latter tells us, that the Spirit of God moved on the face of the waters; and then that God brought from them, first light, next the firmament or atmosphere, which he calls to judgment: also the commandment of us the apostles of the Lord and Saviour, to prepare for that event, which we delivered to you as his commandments.

3 But that your faith in the prophetic word may not be shaken, ye are to know this first of all, that scoffers will arise in the last part of the days of the world, walking after their own lusts,

4 And saying, where is his promised coming to raise the dead, and to destroy the earth? For from the time of the death of the first race of men, all the parts of the mundane system continue as they were at their first creation. Christ's coming, therefore, is a delusion.

5 But this wilfully escapes the scoffers, (who, from the stability of all the parts of the universe, argue against the creation and destruction of the world), that, according to Moses, the aerial heavens were at the beginning; and the earth made of water, and through water the earth subsists, and all by the word of God. See John i. 3.

6 By whom the then created world, being overflowed with water, perished before it was two thousand years old.

Heaven, and then the dry land, which he calls earth, &c. So that all the different parts of our system, according to Moses, were of water; which is what Peter likewise affirms. The ancient philosopher Thales gives the same account of the origin of things, I suppose, from ancient tradition: Ἐκ τοῦ υδατος πρῶτος ἐκπλασθησάμενος κόσμος, which Cicero thus translates, "Ex aqua dixit omnia constare,—He said that all things consist of water."

2. And through water the earth (γεωγενεσις) consists.]—Because this Greek word is the nominative singular feminine, it cannot agree with ἡ γῆ, the heavens, which is masculine. 'The earth, γῆ, therefore, is understood; and I have supplied it accordingly. The apostle's meaning is, that as the earth was made of water, it consists or subsists by water; for water is necessary to unite its parts, to render it fruitful, and to afford drink to animals. Water also is necessary to the subsistence of the heavens or atmosphere, to render it fit for respiration, and for distilling rain to fructify the earth. Erasmus translates the clause thus: 'That the heavens were anciently, and the earth of water, and through water, consisting by the word of God.' But both the number and the gender of the word γεωγενεσις, consisting, forbid this translation. See the next note.

Ver. 6.—1. By whom the then world, being overflowed with water, perished.]—Because the relative ὃς, By whom, is in the plural number, and the immediate antecedent, the word of God, is in the singular, Beza, who is followed by Whitby, Benson, and others, thinks ὃς refers to the heavens and the earth, the remote antecedent, and interprets the passage thus: 'By which heavens and earth, the inhabitants of the old world, being overflowed with water, perished.' For as the waters of the deluge came from the heavens or atmosphere, and from the earth, he thinks the antediluvians might be said to have been overflowed with water by the heavens and the earth. But first, that the then world which perished, means principally the material fabric, and not its inhabitants only, I think is plain from ver. 7. where the ἡ νῦν οὐρανοὶ καὶ ἡ γῆ, the present heavens or atmosphere, and the earth, are opposed to what is called, ver. 6. ἡ τότε κοσμος, the then world, and is said to have been overflowed with water. For if, as all agree, the ἡ νῦν οὐρανοὶ καὶ ἡ γῆ, which are said, ver. 7. to be kept for fire, mean the present mundane system, the ἡ τότε κοσμος, which was overflowed with water, and which is opposed to the present heavens and earth, must undoubtedly mean the antediluvian earth itself, rather than its inhabitants, whose perishing was only the consequence of the overflowing of the earth with water. Secondly, with respect to the account given ver. 6. of the cause of the deluge, I acknowledge that ὃς in the beginning of the verse may imply that it was brought on, either by the instrumentality of the heavens and the earth, as Beza supposes, or, which is the more general opinion, by the efficiency and direction of the word of God. This latter sense I take to be the apostle's meaning; for as his design in the passage was to prove that Christ is able to destroy this mundane system, it was directly to his purpose to speak of him as the intelligent efficient cause of the overflowing of the old world with water, after having made it at first out of water. The reason is, if the word of God destroyed the old world with water, he certainly is able to destroy it a second time. And having promised to preserve it from being destroyed again by water, that he may destroy it by fire at the judgment and destruction of ungodly men, ver. 7. his having actually preserved it during so many ages from any deluge, is a proof which, the longer the world continues, becomes the stronger, to convince us that it shall be destroyed by fire, as Christ hath declared. On the other hand, for the apostle to have mentioned, as Beza supposes, that mankind perished by the heavens and the earth overflowing them with water, is no proof that the world shall be destroyed a second time; and far less is it a proof that the heavens and the earth shall be destroyed by fire at the judgment. Yet that event the apostle infers, ver. 7. from the old world's having been destroyed by water. See the notes on that verse.—For all these reasons I conclude, that the relative ὃς, ver. 6. does not refer to the heavens and the earth, the remote antecedent mentioned ver. 5. but to the word of God, the near antecedent in the end of the verse. It is no objection that the relative is in the plural number; for as the Hebrews, in order to aggrandize the person and things of which they treat, speak of them in the plural number, although in their nature they are singular, (Esa. lv. 22.), ὃς, ver. 6. may, agreeably to the Hebrew idiom, be put for ὃς; consequently the word of God, though it be singular, may very well be its antecedent. Or the relative in this passage may be put in the plural form, to shew that the expression word of God includes two persons, namely, God and

7 But (ἡ νῦν γενεά) the present heavens and the earth, by the same word,¹ are treasured up, being kept for fire² (ως) against the day of judgment³ and destruction of ungodly men. (See Whitby's note on this verse.)

8 But this one thing, let it not escape you, beloved, that one day with the Lord is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.¹

9 The Lord who hath promised, doth not delay in the manner some account delaying,¹ but he exercises long-suffering towards us, not desiring² that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance.

10 However, as a thief in the night,¹ the day his Word, just as in chap. iii. 1. the phrase, this second epistle, is shewed to imply the first epistle also, by the relative αὕτως being in the plural.

2. Overflowed with water, perished;—that is, lost its primitive constitution and form, by which means, and by the alteration made in its atmosphere, it became a habitation less healthy and fruitful, and less pleasant than formerly; as may be gathered from the shortening of the life of man after the flood, and the present appearance of the earth, which is that of a ruin.

Ver. 7.—1. By the same word.]—The common reading here is ἡ νῦν γενεά, by the same word. But our translators have followed the reading of the Alexandrian and some other MSS., and of the Vulgate version, and which is adopted by Beza, namely, ἡ νῦν αἰών, by the same word. See Mill.

2. Being kept for fire.]—Here the apostle hath in his eyes God's oath to Noah, 'not to destroy the earth any more by a flood,' Gen. ix. 11; also his declaration, Gen. vii. 22, 'that while the earth remained, seed-time and harvest, &c. should not cease.' Wherefore, the earth is not always to remain; but it is not to be destroyed by a deluge. It is kept from floods, to be destroyed by fire.

3. Against the day of judgment and destruction of ungodly men.]—In regard that Hammond and other celebrated commentators understand this prophecy as a prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, it will be proper here to inform the reader, that in support of their interpretation they appeal to the ancient Jewish prophecies, where, as they contend, the revolutions in the political state of empires and nations are foretold in the same forms of expression with those introduced in Peter's prediction. The following are the prophecies to which they appeal.—Isa. xxiv. 4, 'where the destruction of Idumea is foretold under the figures of 'dissolving the host of heaven,' and of 'rolling the heaven together as a scroll,' and of 'the falling down of all their host as the leaf falleth off from the vine.'—Ezek. xxxi. 7, 'where the destruction of Egypt is described by the figures of 'covering the heaven, and making the stars thereof dark;' and of 'covering the sun with a cloud,' and of 'hinder the moon from giving her light.'—Joel ii. 10, 'the invasion of Judea by foreign armies is thus foretold: 'The earth shall quake before them; the heavens shall tremble; the sun and the moon shall be dark, and the stars shall withdraw their shining.' And ver. 30, 31, 'the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans is thus predicted: 'I will shew wonders in the heavens and in the earth; blood and fire and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord come.'—Amos viii. 9, 'God threatening the Jews is introduced saying, 'In that day I will cause the sun to go down at noon, and I will darken the earth in the clear day.'—Haggai ii. 6, 'the overthrow of Judaism and heathenism is thus foretold, 'Yet once and I will shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea and the dry land.'—Lastly, Our Lord, in his prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem, has the following expressions: Matt. xxiv. 29, 'After the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of heaven shall be shaken.'

Now it is remarkable, that in these prophecies none of the prophets have spoken, as Peter has done, of the entire destruction of this mundane system, nor of the destruction of any part thereof. They mention only the 'rolling of the heavens together as a scroll;' the 'obscuring of the light of the sun and of the moon;' the 'shaking of the heavens and the earth,' and 'the falling down of the stars;' whereas Peter speaks of the utter destruction of all the parts of this mundane system by fire. This difference affords room for believing, that the events foretold by the prophets are different in their nature from those foretold by the apostle; and that they are to be figuratively understood, while those predicted by the apostle are to be understood literally. To this conclusion likewise the phraseology of the prophets compared with that of the apostle, evidently leads. For the prophetic phraseology, literally interpreted, exhibits impossibilities; such as 'the rolling of the heaven together as a scroll,' the 'turning of the moon into blood,' and 'the falling down of the stars from heaven as the leaf of a tree.' Not so the apostolic phraseology; for 'the burning of the heavens' or atmosphere, and its passing away with a great noise; and 'the burning of the earth and the works thereon,' together with the 'burning and melting of the elements,' that is, the constituent parts of which this terrestrial globe is composed, are all things possible, and therefore may be literally understood; while the things mentioned by the prophets can only be taken

7 But though the destruction of the old world by water shews that the present world may be destroyed, I do not say it will be destroyed by water: The present heavens and earth, by the same word who destroyed the old world, are treasured up and preserved from a deluge, for the purpose of being burnt with fire at the day of judgment and destruction of ungodly men.

8 Do not hearken to those who, from Christ's delaying, argue that he will never come. But this one thing remember, beloved, that the Lord's purposes are not affected by any duration, whether short or long; because nothing can happen to hinder their execution.

9 The Lord, who hath promised to come, doth not delay his coming to destroy the world, for the reason supposed by some; namely, that he is not able to do what he hath promised; but he delays his coming, that he may exercise long-suffering towards us, not desiring that any should perish, but that all should have an opportunity of repenting.

10 However long it may be delayed, as a thief in the night cometh figuratively.—This, however, is not all: There are things in the apostle's prophecy which shew that he intended it to be taken literally; as, 1. He begins with an account of the perishing of the old world, to demonstrate, against the scoffers, the possibility of the perishing of the present heavens and earth. But that example would not have suited his purpose, unless by the burning of the present heavens and earth he had meant the destruction of the material fabric. Wherefore, the opposition stated in this prophecy between the perishing of the old world by water, and the perishing of the present world by fire, shews that the latter is to be as real a destruction of the material fabric as the former was. 2. The circumstance of the present heavens and earth being treasured up and kept, ever since the first deluge, from all after deluges, in order to their being destroyed by fire at the day of judgment, shews, I think, that the apostle is speaking of a real and not of a metaphorical destruction of the heavens and earth: 3. This appears likewise from the apostle's foretelling, that after the present heavens and earth are burnt, a new heavens and a new earth is to appear, in which the righteous are to dwell for ever: 4. The time fixed by the apostle for the burning of the heavens and the earth, namely, the day of judgment and punishment of ungodly men, shews that the apostle is speaking not of the destruction of a single city or nation during the subsistence of the world, but of the earth itself, with all the wicked who have dwelt thereon. These circumstances persuade me, that this prophecy, as well as the one recorded 2 Thess. i. 9, is not to be interpreted metaphorically of the destruction of Jerusalem, but should be understood literally of the destruction of our mundane system, and of the general judgment.

Ver. 8. One day with the Lord is as a thousand years, &c.]—This is an allusion to Psal. xc. 4. But neither the apostle nor the Psalmist meant that God does not perceive any difference between the unequal durations of a day and of a thousand years; but that these differences do not affect either his designs, or actions, or felicity, as they do those of finite creatures: So that what he brings to pass on the day he declares his purpose, is not more certain than what he will bring to pass a thousand years after his declaration. In like manner, what is to be brought to pass a long time after his declaration, is not less certain than if it had been done when declared. See Abernethy's Sermons, vol. i. p. 218, 219.

Ver. 9.—1. The Lord who hath promised, doth not delay, &c.]—Benson, by supplying αὐτῷ here, translates the clause thus:—'The Lord doth not delay concerning the promise.' But ἡ νῦν αἰών may be the genitive not of possession but of the agent; on which supposition the translation will be, 'The Lord who hath promised,' namely, to come.—L'Enfant observes, that the word ὑπομονή denotes a declaration of any kind, whether it be a promise of something good, or a denunciation of evil.

2. Not desiring that any should perish.]—The word βούλομαι in this passage cannot be understood of the ultimate determination of the divine will; for that is always followed with the thing willed. The proper translation of the word is, not desiring; for God may truly be said 'not to desire that any should perish,' as he hath included Adam and all his posterity in the covenant of grace, and hath given the means of repentance and salvation to all. On this Occumenius writes, 'Consummationis tempus differri, ut compleretur numerus salvandorum;—that the time of the end is deferred, that the number of them who are to be saved may be filled up.' By the persons to be saved, Estius and Beza understand the elect to eternal life; but others understand this of mankind in general.

Ver. 10.—1. As a thief in the night.]—Because thieves commonly break into houses in the night-time, and occasion great fear to those who are within, any sudden unexpected event, especially such as occasioned terror, was compared by the Hebrews to the coming of a thief in the night. The suddenness, therefore, and unexpectedness of the coming of the day of the Lord, and the terror which it will occasion to the wicked, are the circumstances in which it will resemble the coming of a thief, (see 1 Thess. v. 4. note), and not that it will happen in the night-time. Yet the ancients, from this and other passages, inferring that Christ's coming to judgment would happen in the night-time, instructed their virgins. But, as Beza says, leaving the uncertainties, let us rather watch day and night, with minds raised up to him, that we may not be lulled asleep by the intoxications of the world.

2. The day of the Lord.]—See 2 Thess. Prof. sec. 4. where it is shewn, that although Christ's coming to destroy Jerusalem is some times called 'the coming, and the day of the Lord,' these appellations earth,² wherein dwelleth righteousness.

14 Wherefore, beloved, expecting these things, diligently endeavour to be found of him spotless¹ and irreproachable, in peace.

15 And the long-suffering (ver. 9.) of our Lord, reckon TO BE FOR salvation; as also our beloved brother Paul, according to the wisdom¹ given to him, hath written to you;²

16 As indeed in all his epistles,¹ speaking in them concerning these things;² in which³ there are some things hard to be understood, which the unteachable⁴ and unstable⁵ wrest,⁶ everlasting possession of Canaan, Isaiah hath explained, by predicting the creation of the new heavens and the new earth, and the happy state of its inhabitants, chap. lxx. 17—23.; where, under the figure of there being no infant of days there, and of the extreme longevity of all its inhabitants, he hath described the immortality of the righteous; and by representing the animals in this new earth as entirely script of all their noxious qualities, and as living in peace with one another, he hath taught us, that in the new creation there will be nothing to hurt or to offend. This creation of the new heavens and the new earth, our apostle, in his sermon to the Jews, hath called 'the restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began, Acts iii. 21. See Ess. v. sect. 4. towards the end.

2. New heavens and a new earth.—Having in the former note explained what the new heavens and the new earth are, it may be proper to mention, that the commentators who interpret St. Peter's prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem by the new heavens and new earth, understand the peaceful state in which the Christians were to live after the destruction of Jerusalem. But to overturn that interpretation it needs only to be observed, that there was no such alteration in the state of the disciples after the destruction of Jerusalem, as merited to be called 'a new heavens and a new earth;' for they were as much persecuted as ever, for near three hundred years, till Constantine embraced the gospel. Others, by the new heavens and the new earth, understand that state of things called the Millennium, which is supposed to take place before the general judgment. But to confute this opinion I observe, 1. That our Lord himself hath expressly told us, that his disciples are not to be received into the place he hath gone to prepare for them till he come again.—2. That the Millennium of St. John is a state peculiar to the martyrs who have suffered death for Christ; whereas 'the new heavens and the new earth,' as Whitby observes, are the common expectation of all Christians, who are therefore admonished, ver. 14. to 'endeavour earnestly to be found of Christ spotless and irreproachable, in peace.'—3. That the apostle, speaking of the destruction of the heavens and the earth by a conflagration, represents it, ver. 7. as contemporary with 'the day of judgment and destruction of ungodly men,' who are to perish in that very fire which is to consume the heavens and the earth.—4. That the scripture in other places represents the destruction of the wicked as to happen at the end of the world: Matt. xli. 49. 'So shall it be at the end of the world: the angels shall come forth, and sever the wicked from among the just, 50. And shall cast them into the furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth.'—2 Thess. i. 7. 'And to you the afflicted rest with us, when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven with the angels of his power, 8. Inflicting punishment with flaming fire on them who know not God and obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. 9. They shall suffer punishment, even everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power, 10. In that day when he shall come to be glorified by his saints,' &c.; whereas the Millennium of St. John must be at an end before the day of judgment. For having spoken of the first resurrection, and of the conclusion of the thousand years in which they are to reign who are raised, and of the resurrection of Gog and Magog against them, he saw, Rev. xxi. 11. 'One sitting on a great white throne. 12. And the dead, small and great, standing before God,—and judged according to their works. ver. 15. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life, was cast into the lake of fire.' After which, Rev. xxi. 1. St. John 'saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away.'—These things show, that 'the new heavens and the new earth,' which Peter and John tell us expressly are to succeed the present heavens and earth after the general judgment, do by no means signify the state of things called the Millennium, which is to take place and come to an end before the general judgment.

Ver. 14. Expecting these things, diligently endeavour to be found, &c.]—What a blessing is the gospel to the world! By explicitly revealing our duty as the command of God, it lays us under that strong obligation which arises from the consideration of the authority of God, by assuring us that our souls do not perish at death, but are preserved in the state of the dead by the power of Christ, it gives weight to all the motives offered in recommendation of a religious life; and by giving us the assured hope of Christ's return from heaven to raise the dead, and to carry the righteous into the heavenly country, it gives those who firmly hope for these glorious events, an elevation of soul above all the pomp and boasted vanities of this life; it inspires them with fortitude to withstand the temptations which arise, whether from the prospect, the possession, or the new heavens and of a new earth, wherein righteous men shall dwell for ever.

14 Wherefore, beloved, firmly expecting the coming of Christ to destroy the present mundane system, and to create a new heaven and earth, earnestly endeavour to be found of Christ spotless and irreproachable, consequently in peace with him.

15 And, instead of considering his delaying to come as a proof that he will never come, consider the long-suffering of our Lord as designed to promote the salvation of sinners, by giving them time to repent, as also our beloved brother Paul, according to the inspiration given to him, hath written to you;

16 As indeed in all his epistles, speaking in them concerning these things: in which writings there are some things hard to be understood, which the unteachable and unstable wrest, as they do also the other scriptures, making them the foundation of erroneous doctrines, loss of worldly things, and strengthens them to bear afflictions, not only with patience, but with joy. May thou who readest always live under the influence of these obligations and hopes!

Ver. 15.—1. According to the wisdom given to him.]—As the gospel itself is called the wisdom of God, and the inspiration by which the apostles were enabled to declare all the parts of the gospel scheme in an infallible manner is called the word of wisdom, I have no doubt that, by the wisdom given to Paul, Peter means his inspiration. See ver. 16. note 7.

2. Hath written to you.]—This epistle being written to those to whom the first epistle was sent, the persons to whom Paul wrote concerning the long-suffering of God, were the Jewish and Gentile Christians in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia. Accordingly, we know he wrote to the Ephesians, (ii. 3, 4, 5.), to the Colossians, (i. 21.), and to Timothy, (1 Ep. ii. 4.), things which imply, that God's bearing with sinners is intended for their salvation. The persons to whom Peter's epistles were sent, were for the most part Paul's converts.

Ver. 16.—1. As indeed in all his epistles.]—From this it appears, that Peter had read Paul's epistles; and as he speaks not of some, but of all his epistles, it is probable that Paul was dead when Peter wrote this; and seeing Paul, in his epistle to the Romans, chap. ii. 4., and to the Hebrews, chap. x. 36—38., wrote that the long-suffering of God was intended for salvation, by mentioning that circumstance Peter intimated, that he knew Paul to be the author of the epistles to the Romans and to the Hebrews.

2. He speaketh of these things.]—Paul in all his epistles hath spoken of the things written by Peter in this letter. For example, he hath spoken of Christ's coming to judgment, 1 Thess. iii. 13. iv. 14—18.; 2 Thess. i. 7—10.; Tit. ii. 13.—And of the resurrection of the dead, 1 Cor. xv. 22.; Philip. iii. 20, 21.—And of the burning of the earth, 2 Thess. i. 8.—And of the heavenly country, 2 Cor. v. 1—10.—And of the introduction of the righteous into that country, 1 Thess. iv. 17.; Heb. iv. 9. xii. 14, 18, 24.—And of the judgment of all mankind by Christ, Rom. xiv. 10.

3. In which there are some matters hard to be understood.]—The greatest number of MSS. read here in his. But because the neuter relative his cannot refer to epistles, which is feminine, his may be translated 'among which things,' (namely, the things which Paul hath written concerning Christ's coming to judgment; the burning of the earth, the heavenly country, and the introduction of the righteous into that country,) 'there are some matters hard to be understood.' It is true the Alexandrian, and six other MSS. read here in his, 'in which epistles.' This Beza says is the true reading, because he thinks it would have been improper in Peter to say that Paul had written obscurely concerning subjects, of which Peter himself hath written more things hard to be understood, than any Paul hath written in any place of his epistles. Nevertheless the common reading may be retained; because the antecedent to the neuter relative his may be a word not expressed but understood, (see Ess. iv. 64.), namely, scriptures, which signifies letters or epistles, Acts xxviii. 21. On this supposition Peter's meaning will be, in which epistle there are some things hard to be understood. The inferences of the Papists from this passage are, 'That the scriptures are not sufficient for deciding controversies concerning the articles of faith; and that the decision of these matters is to be sought from the Catholic church,' by which they mean the church of Rome. But the falsehood of these inferences must be acknowledged by every candid person who recollects, that the Papists hitherto have never determined among themselves what person or persons in their church are the infallible judge of controversies, to whose decisions all Christians ought to submit—whether it is the Pope alone, or the Pope in conjunction with his own clergy, or a general council of Christian bishops, or any particular council, or any other body of men in their church distinguished by a particular denomination. The truth is, in leaving this undetermined they have acted wisely; because all to whom they have attributed infallibility, whether they were individuals or bodies of men, have erred in their decisions, as the Papists themselves have been obliged to acknowledge.

4. Which the unteachable.]—Ἀνεπίσταντοι, Indoctes. So Esaius translates the word.—The unteachable are persons whose passions blind their understanding, and make them averse to truth.

5. And unstable.]—The ἀεὶ ἰσχυροὶ, unstable, are those whom St. James calls δύσυχον, men of two minds, chap. i. 8.; men who, having no real love of goodness, sometimes follow it, sometimes desert it, as good or bad inclinations happen to predominate in them; whereas the stable are those who have a firm attachment to truth and virtue, called, ver. 17. τελειότατοι, establishment.

6. Wrest.]—The original word, ἐκτελλουσιν, signifies to put a per-as THEY DO also the other scriptures,⁷ to their own destruction.

17 Ye therefore, beloved, *foreknowing*¹ THESE THINGS, be on your guard,² lest being carried away with others (πλανη, Eph. iv. 14.) by the deceit of the lawless, ye fall from your own steadfastness.

18 But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. To him be glory both now and (εἰς) unto the day of eternity.¹ Amen.²

son to the torture, to make him confess some crime laid to his charge, or reveal some secret which he knows. Applied to writings, it signifies, by far-fetched criticisms and unsupported senses of words, to make a passage speak a meaning different from what the author intended: Hence in our language we have the expression, to torture words. Of this vice they are most commonly guilty, who, from pride of understanding, will receive nothing but what they can explain; whereas the humble and teachable receive the declarations of revelation according to their plain, grammatical, unconstrained meaning, which it is their only care to attain by reading the scriptures frequently, and with attention.

7. As they also do the other scriptures.]—Here Peter expressly acknowledges the divine inspiration by which Paul wrote all his epistles; for, unless Paul was inspired, his writings could not have been called scriptures by any inspired apostle. The affection with which Peter, on this occasion, spoke of Paul, and the honourable testimony which he bore to his writings, deserves great praise. He had been formerly rebuked by Paul before the brethren at Antioch, for refusing to keep company with the Gentile converts. But whatever resentment he might have entertained of that affront at the beginning, he had long ago laid it aside; and on cool reflection, it is whereby the morals of men are corrupted, and so bring destruction upon themselves. See Chap. i. View, also Chap. ii. View.

17 Ye therefore, my beloved, foreknowing the coming of the Lord to judgment, and that scoffers will ridicule the promise of his coming, be on your guard, lest, being seduced with others by the deceit of lawless teachers, ye fall from your own steadfastness in the faith and practice of the gospel.

18 But, instead of becoming unstable, grow ye in grace daily, and in the knowledge of the doctrine of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. To him be glory ascribed by us his disciples, both now and until the day of eternity. Amen.

probable, that, instead of thinking ill of Paul, he now admired him for his bold and steady maintaining of the truth.

Ver. 17.—1. Foreknowing these things, be on your guard.]—Here St. Peter teaches, that one great purpose for which the prophets were inspired to foretell the corruptions which were to arise in the church, and the evils which were to befall the sincere disciples of Christ, was to put them on their guard against these corruptions, and to arm them with fortitude to bear persecution.

2. Be on your guard.]—The word φυλάττετε is a military term, denoting the action of soldiers who keep guard in fortified towns or castles.

Ver. 18.—1. Until the day of eternity.]—So the original, ἕως αἰῶνος αἰῶνος, literally signifies Bengelius on this expression remarks, that it teaches us that eternity is a day without any night; a real and perpetual day.

2. Amen.]—See Eph. vi. 24. note 2. Benson remarks, that when this word is placed at the beginning of a sentence, it is an earnest asseveration. In the conclusion of a sentence it imports an earnest wish that it may be so.—The doxology with which this epistle concludes is evidently directed to Christ, as are some of the other doxologies in scripture.

I. JOHN.

PREFACE.

SECT. I.—The History of John the Apostle.

JOHN, the writer of this epistle and of the gospel which bears his name, was the son of Zebedee, a fisher, who had a boat and nets and hired servants, Mark i. 20. and followed his occupation on the Sea of Galilee.—From Matt. xxvii. 55. compared with Mark xv. 40. it appears that the name of Zebedee's wife was Salome; for, in the former of these passages, she is called 'the mother of Zebedee's children,' who in the latter is named Salome.—Zebedee had another son whose name was James, and who seems to have been elder than John. Both of them were fishers like their father, and assisted him in his business till they were called to follow Jesus.—They seem all to have lived in one family in the town of Bethsaida, which being situated near the Sea of Galilee, was a convenient station for fishers.

Because the mother of Zebedee's children is mentioned among the women who followed Jesus from Galilee to the last passover, ministering to him, as related Matt. xxvii. 55. Lardner conjectures, that Zebedee was then dead, and that the two brothers lived in separate houses. For when our Lord, upon the cross, recommended his mother to John, it is said, John xix. 27. 'From that hour that disciple took her into his own home.' Perhaps John and his mother Salome lived together.—Theophylact was of opinion that John's mother was related to our Lord: and Lardner, whom I have generally followed in giving John's history, supposes that that relation encouraged her to ask the two chief places in Christ's kingdom for her sons; and that it was the occasion of our Lord's committing the care of his mother to John. But there is no evidence in scripture of Zebedee's children being related to our Lord by their mother.

John had not the advantage of a learned education; for we are told, Acts iv. 13. that 'the council perceived Peter and John were unlearned men.' Nevertheless, like the generality of the Jewish common people of that age, they may have been well acquainted with the scriptures, having often heard them read in the synagogues. And as, with the rest of their countrymen, they expected the coming of the Messiah about that time, they lent a willing ear to the Baptist, when he published that Messiah was actually come, though the people did not know him, John i. 26. Afterward, when the Baptist pointed out Jesus to his disciples, ver. 29. 'as the lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world,' he said to them, ver. 33. 'I knew him not to be Messiah, but he who sent me to baptize with water, the same said to me, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining on him, the same is he who baptizeth with the Holy Ghost.' 34. And I saw and have record, that this is the Son of God.' If the sons of Zebedee were of the number of those to whom John testified that Jesus was the Son of God, we may believe they attached themselves early to him, and were among those who are called his disciples, and to whom he manifested his glory at the marriage in Cana, by turning water into wine, John ii. 11.

After the miracle in Cana, the sons of Zebedee seem to have followed their ordinary occupation, till Jesus called them to attend on him constantly, as mentioned Matt. iv. For the evangelist having related the calling of Peter and Andrew, adds, ver. 21. 'And going on from thence, he saw other two brethren, James the son of Zebedee, and John his brother, in a ship with Zebedee their father, mending their nets; and he called them, 22. And they immediately left the ship and their father, and followed him; namely, when 'he went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the good news of the kingdom, and healing all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease among the people.'

Some time after this, Jesus chose twelve of his disciples to be with him always, that they might be eye and ear-witnesses of all he did and said, and be qualified to testify the same to the world; and, in particular, qualified to bear witness to his resurrection from the dead. These chosen persons Jesus named apostles; and the sons of Zebedee being of that number, he surnamed them Boanerges, or sons of thunder, to mark the courage with which they would afterwards preach him to the world, as Christ the Son of God. How well James fulfilled his Master's prediction, may be known from his being put to death by Herod Agrippa, not long after our Lord's ascension, on account of his boldly testifying the resurrection of Jesus from the dead; so that he became the first martyr among the apostles. Cave, in his life of James, says, the sons of Zebedee had the surname of Boanerges given them, on account of the impetuosity of their tempers. And it must be acknowledged, that they shewed too much anger in their proposal to have the Samaritans destroyed by fire from heaven, because they refused to receive Jesus, as he was going up to Jerusalem to worship: Luke ix. 54. 'Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven, and consume them, even as Elijah did?'

But although James and John shewed improper zeal on the occasion mentioned, they were highly esteemed by their Master for their other good qualities; as appears from this, that of all the apostles, they only, with Peter, were admitted by him to be the witnesses of the resurrection of Jairus' daughter, and of our Lord's transfiguration, and of his agony in the garden. John more especially was so much beloved of Jesus, that he was called the disciple whom he loved. His benevolent-disposition John manifested in this his first epistle, by the frequency and earnestness with which he recommended mutual love to the disciples of Christ. With benevolence, John joined great fortitude and constancy in his attachment to his Master. For he only of the twelve attended him during his crucifixion, and saw the blood and water issue from his side, when the soldier pierced it with a spear; and, I doubt not, was present when his body was laid in the sepulchre, and saw the sepulchre closed with a stone. He, with Peter, ran to the sepulchre, when Mary Magdalene brought word that the Lord's body was taken away. He was present also when Jesus shewed himself to his apostles, on the evening of the day of his resurrection; and on the eighth day thereafter. He, with his brother James, was present when Jesus shewed himself to his disciples at the Sea of Tiberias; and to the five hundred on the mountain in Galilee, mentioned Matt. xxviii. 16. Moreover, he was present with the rest of the apostles, when our Lord ascended into heaven from the mount of Olives. So that, with the greatest propriety and truth, he could begin his first epistle with saying, 'That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen, &c. we declare unto you;' referring to his gospel, in which he hath narrated the crucifixion, miracles, sufferings, death, and resurrection of the living Word; his appearances to his disciples after his resurrection; and, last of all, his ascension into heaven. To conclude, John was one of the one hundred and twenty upon whom the Holy Ghost descended, on the day of Pentecost which immediately followed our Lord's ascension.

After the effusion of the Holy Spirit, John displayed the greatest boldness in maintaining his Master's cause, when with Peter he was brought before the council, and was strictly charged not to teach in the name of Jesus. For, on that occasion, he made the noble answer recorded Acts iv. 19. 'Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you rather than unto God, judge ye. For we cannot but speak the things which we have heard and seen.'

We are told, Acts viii. 14. that 'when the apostles who were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent to them Peter and John, that they might receive the Holy Ghost.' It seems none could confer that gift but apostles.

From Gal. ii. 9. it appears that John was present at the council of Jerusalem, which met A. D. 49 or 50 to determine the great question agitated in the church of Antioch, namely, whether it was necessary to the salvation of the believing Gentiles, that they should be circumcised.—And if, as is probable, John had his ordinary residence in Jerusalem till that time, he had his share in working the many signs and wonders, which are said to have been done by the hands of the apostles, Acts ii. 43. iv. 33. v. 12.

We are told, Rev. i. 9. that John was banished to the Isle of Patmos, for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus. In that island he was favoured with the visions, which he hath recorded in his book of the Revelation.

The foregoing particulars concerning John, are all mentioned in the New Testament. The fathers in their writings add, that John lived to a great age; that he spent the latter part of his life mostly at Ephesus, the metropolis of the province of Asia: that the Roman emperor Domitian banished him to Patmos about the year 95; consequently after the destruction of Jerusalem. But Grotius and Sir Isaac Newton place John's banishment to Patmos, the former in the reign of Claudius, the latter in the reign of Nero; consequently before the destruction of Jerusalem. And in support of their opinion they allege some testimonies of later writers, together with other particulars. But Lardner, Can. vol. i. p. 359—377. hath shewed, that these things are insufficient for establishing the early date of John's banishment. He therefore adheres to the common opinion, that John was banished to Patmos by Domitian's edict for persecuting the Christians, published in the latter part of his reign, A. D. 95. Domitian died September 18, A. D. 96, and was succeeded by Nerva, in the first year of whose reign, if not sooner, John being released, returned to Ephesus, where, according to the ancients, he died in the third year of the emperor Trajan, answering to A. D. 100. Or, as Jerome expresses it, he died in the 68th year after our Lord's passion; which was the third of Trajan. Wherefore, if Lamoignon's opinion is well founded, that John was born in the same year with his Master, he must have been an hundred years old when he died.

The time of John's leaving Judea is unknown. But as in Luke's history of Paul's travels John is not mentioned, and no salutation is sent to him in any of the epistles which Paul wrote from Rome to the churches of Asia, not even in his epistles to the Ephesians, nor in the epistles which in the latter part of his life he wrote to Timothy in Ephesus, it is reasonable to think that John was not at Ephesus while Paul was alive. I therefore am of their opinion who suppose, that John remained in Judea, from the time of the council of Jerusalem, till he saw Jerusalem encompassed with armies, and observed the other signs of its approaching destruction foretold by his Master: that he then fled into Asia, and coming at length to Ephesus, he fixed his ordinary residence in that city, and abode there till his death, as all the ancient Christian writers testify. Because none of these writers say our Lord's mother went with John into Asia, Cave, Basnage, and Lardner, conjecture that she died before John left Judea.

The other particulars, said by the ancients to have happened to John after he settled at Ephesus, it is needless to mention; as some of them are not sufficiently attested, and others of them are embellished with circumstances evidently fabulous. Yet, if the reader is desirous to know what ancient authors have reported concerning our apostle after he went into Asia, he will find the passages of their writings, in which these things are mentioned, quoted by Lardner, Canon, vol. i. beginning at page 349.

SECT. II.—Of the Authenticity of the First Epistle of John.

THE authenticity of any ancient writing is established, first, By the testimony of contemporary, and of succeeding authors, whose works have come down to us; and who speak of that writing, as known to be the work of the person whose name it bears. Secondly, By the suitability of the things contained in such a writing, to the character and circumstances of its supposed author; and by the similarity of its style to the style of the other acknowledged writings of that author. The former of these proofs is called the external evidence of the authenticity of a writing; the latter, its internal evidence. Where these two kinds of evidences are found accompanying any writing, they render its genuineness indubitable.

The external evidence of the authenticity of John's first epistle shall be laid before the reader in the preface to the second epistle, sect. 1. by shewing that the earliest and best Christian writers have all, with one consent, and without any hesitation, ascribed the first epistle to him. And their testimony is confirmed by this circumstance, that the Syriac translator who omitted the second epistle of Peter, the second and third epistles of John, and the epistle of Jude, because some doubts were entertained concerning them in the first age, or perhaps because they had not come to his knowledge, hath translated John's first epistle as an apostolical writing of which there never was any doubt.

In this preface, therefore, we shall state the internal evidence of the authenticity of the first epistle ascribed to John, by shewing, first, that in respect of its matter, and secondly, that in respect of its style, it is perfectly suitable to the character and circumstances of its supposed author. In respect of the matter or subject of the epistle under consideration, the writer of it hath discovered himself to be John the apostle, by introducing a number of sentiments and expressions found in the gospel, which all Christians from the beginning have acknowledged to be the work of John the apostle.

EPISTLE.

CHAP. I.—1. That which was from the beginning, (ἡ ἀρχὴ) which we have contemplated—concerning the living Word.

II.—5. Whosoever keepeth his word, truly in that man the love of God is perfected.

II.—6. He who saith he abideth in him, ought himself also so to walk, even as he walked. See chap. iii. 24. iv. 13. 16.

II.—8. I write to you a new commandment.

III.—11. This is the message which ye have heard from the beginning, that we should love one another.

II.—8. The darkness passeth away, and the light which is true, now shineth.

10. Abideth in the light, and there is no stumbling-block to him.

II.—13. Young children, I write to you, because ye have known the Father.

14. Because ye have known him from the beginning.

II.—29. Every one who worketh righteousness is begotten of God. See also iii. 9. v. 1.

III.—1. Behold how great love the Father hath bestowed on us, that we should be called the sons of God!

III.—2. We shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is.

III.—8. He who worketh sin is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning.

III.—13. Do not wonder, my brethren, that the world hateth you.

IV.—9. By this the love of God was manifested, that God sent his Son, the only begotten, into the world, that we might live through him.

IV.—12. No man hath seen God at any time.

V.—13. These things I have written to you who believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may know that ye have eternal life; and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God.

V.—14. If we ask any thing according to his will, he heareth us.

V.—20. The Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know him that is true; and we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God and eternal life.

GOSPEL.

CHAP. I.—1. In the beginning was the Word. 14. And (ὁ λόγος) we beheld his glory.

4. In him was life.

14. The word was made flesh.

XIV.—23. If a man love me, he will keep my words, and my Father will love him.

XV.—4. Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bring forth fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me.

XIII.—34. A new commandment I give to you,—that ye love one another as I have loved you.

I.—5. The light shineth in darkness.

9. That was the true light.

XI.—10. If a man walk in the night, he stumbleth, because there is no light to him.

XVII.—3. This is the eternal life, that they might know thee the only true God.

And Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.

III.—3. Except a man be begotten again.

5. Except a man be begotten of water and of the Spirit.

I.—12. To them he gave power to become the sons of God, even to them who believe on his name.

XVII.—24. Be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory.

VIII.—44. Ye are of your father the devil—He was a murderer from the beginning.

XV.—20. If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you.

III.—16. God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish, but have everlasting life.

I.—18. No man hath seen God at any time.

XX.—31. These things are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through his name.

XIV.—14. If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will do it.

XVII.—2. Thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he might give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him. 3. And this is the eternal life, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.

From the above comparison of the first epistle of John with his gospel, there appears such an exact agreement of sentiment in the two writings, that no reader who is capable of discerning what is peculiar in an author's turn of thinking, can entertain the least doubt of their being the productions of one and the same writer. Farther, since John hath not mentioned his own name in his gospel, the want of his name in the epistle is no proof that it was not written by him; but rather a presumption that it is his, especially as he hath sufficiently discovered himself to be an apostle, by affirming, in the beginning of the epistle, that he was an eye and ear-witness of the things which he hath written concerning the living Word.

2. The style of this epistle, being the same with the style of the gospel of John, it is by that internal mark likewise shewed to be his writing. In his gospel, John doth not content himself with simply affirming or denying a thing, but to strengthen his affirmation, he denies its contrary. In like manner, to strengthen his denial of a thing, he affirms its contrary. See John i. 20. iii. 36. v. 24. vi. 22. The same manner of expressing things strongly, is found in the epistle. For example, ch. ii. 4. 'He who saith I have known him, and doth not keep his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him.'—Ver. 27. 'The same unction teacheth you concerning all things, and is truth, and is no lie.'—Chap. iv. 2. 'Every spirit which confesseth Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh, is from God. 3. And every spirit which doth not confess Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh, is not from God.'

In his gospel likewise, John, to express things emphatically, frequently uses the demonstrative pronoun this. Chap. i. 19. Autē, 'This is the testimony.'—iii. 19. Autē, 'This is the condemnation, that light,' &c.—vi. 29. Tete, 'This is the work of God.'—ver. 40. Tete, 'This is the will of him.'—ver. 50. Oute, 'This is the bread which came down from heaven.'—xvii. 3. Autē, 'This is the eternal life.' In the epistle, the same emphatical manner of expression is found, chap. i. 5. ii. 25. 'This is the promise.'—iii. 23. Autē, 'This is his commandment.'—v. 3. Autē, 'This is the love of God.'—ver. 4. 'This is the victory.'—ver. 6. Oute, 'This is he who came by water.'—ver. 14. 'This is the boldness which we have with him.'

Such is the internal evidence on which all Christians from the beginning have received the first epistle of John, as really written by him, and of divine authority, although his name is not mentioned in the inscription, nor in any part of the epistle.

SECT. III.—Of the State of the Christian Church at the time John wrote his First Epistle; and of his design in writing it.

THE apostle John, having lived to see great corruptions, both in doctrine and practice, introduced into the church, by many who professed themselves the disciples of Christ, employed the last years of his life in opposing these corruptions. For he wrote his three epistles, to establish the truths concerning the person and offices of Christ, and to condemn the errors then prevailing contrary to these truths. Also to repress the lewd practices, for the sake of which these errors were embraced.—Beidas, he considered that his testimony to the truths concerning the person and offices of Christ, together with his direct condemnation of the opposite errors published to the world in his inspired writings, would be of singular use in preserving the faithful from being seduced by the false teachers and other corruptors of Christianity, who in future ages might arise and trouble the church. See the Preface to James, sect. 4.

The heretical teachers who infested the church in the first age, finding Messiah called in the Jewish scripture,

God, and the Son of God, thought it impossible that he could be made flesh. In this sentiment, these teachers followed the Jewish chief priests, elders, and scribes, who being assembled in full council, unanimously condemned Jesus as a blasphemer, because, being a man, he called himself Christ the Son of the blessed God. See 1 John v. 5. note. Upon this decision, one class of the ancient false teachers founded their error concerning the person of Christ. For, while they acknowledged his divinity, they denied his humanity; that is, the reality of his appearing in the flesh, (see 1 John iv. 2, 3. v. 1.); and contended, that his body was only a body in appearance, that he neither suffered nor died, and that he did none of the things related of him in the gospel. He seemed indeed to do these things, which, in their opinion, was a sufficient foundation for the evangelists to relate them as done by him. But their reality, as matters of fact, they absolutely denied. More particularly, having affirmed that he died only in appearance, they denied his having made a propitiation for the sins of the world by his death, chap. ii. 2. They likewise denied, that he arose from the dead and ascended into heaven. In short, according to them, the things ascribed to Jesus in the gospels were altogether imaginary. This was the opinion of Basilides, and of all the heretics in the first age to whom the fathers have given the name of Docetæ, or Phantasiastæ; but who by the apostle John are more emphatically called Antichrists, chap. iv. 3. because they were opposers of Christ as come in the flesh. By pretending that Christ suffered death only in appearance, the Docetæ endeavoured to avoid the ignominy of the crucifixion of their Master, and to free themselves from that obligation to suffer for their religion, which was laid on them both by Christ's precept and example.

On the other hand, the Cerinthians and Ebionites adopted a doctrine concerning the Christ, which, though contrary to that just now described, was equally erroneous. They acknowledged the reality of the things written in the gospels concerning Jesus: But like many in modern times, who admit nothing as true which they are not able to comprehend, they denied that Jesus was the Christ or Son of God, chap. ii. 22. because they could not reconcile the things which happened to him with their idea of the Son of God. This class of heretics were said by the fathers, Autem res Iohannis, to dissolve Jesus. See chap. iv. 3. note 1. end. For they affirmed that Christ entered into Jesus at his baptism in the form of a dove, but flew away from him before his passion.—B. Horsley, in Lett. 14. to Dr. Priestley, saith, "The Cerinthians held, that Christ being restored to Jesus after his resurrection, it rendered the man Jesus an object of divine honours." They believed, it seems, that Jesus was originally and essentially a man; and that whatever divinity he possessed was adventitious, consequently was separable from him.

The former sort of false teachers having denied the humanity, and the latter the divinity of our Lord, the apostle John, to confirm all the disciples in the belief of the truth concerning the person and offices of Christ, wrote this his first epistle, in which he expressly asserted that 'Jesus Christ is the Son of God,' chap. i. 3. 7. iv. 15. and that he came in the flesh. See chap. iv. 2. note.

Here let it be observed, that the opinions of the Docetæ, on the one hand, and of the Cerinthians on the other, concerning the person and offices of Christ, make it probable that the apostles taught, and that the first Christians believed Christ to be both God and man. For if the Docetæ had not been taught the divinity of Christ, they had no temptation to deny his humanity. And if the Cerinthians had not been taught the humanity of Christ, they would have been under no necessity of denying his divinity. But fancying it impossible that both parts of the apostle's doctrine concerning the Christ could be true, the one class of heretics, to maintain his divinity, thought themselves obliged to deny his humanity; and the other, to maintain his humanity, supposed it necessary to deny his divinity.—To this argument, by which it is rendered probable that the apostles taught, and the first Christians believed, Jesus Christ to be both God and man, the Socinians perhaps will reply, that the members of the church of Jerusalem being called Ebionites by the ancients, is a proof, not only that the church of Jerusalem held the opinion of Ebion concerning the mere humanity of Christ, but that the apostles who planted and instructed that church held the same opinion; because it is natural to suppose, that the faith of the teachers and of the disciples on this article was the same, consequently that the apostles themselves were Unitarians. Nevertheless, from the account which Origen hath given of the brethren of the church of Jerusalem, who he tells us were called Ebionites by the ancients, it appears that this name, as applied to the Hebrew Christians, by no means leads to these conclusions. For in his second book against Celsus, sect. 1. in answer to the Jew, who alleged that the Jewish Christians, being deceived by Christ, had forsaken the laws and institutions of their fathers, and gone over to a different name and manner of living, Origen affirmed, "That they had not forsaken the law of their fathers, but lived according to it, being named from the poorness of the law; (he means, named Ebionites); for a poor person is called by the Jews Ebion. Hence, those of the Jews who received Jesus are called Ebionites." The Jewish believers, therefore, according to Origen, were called Ebionites, not because they held the opinion of Ebion concerning the mere humanity of Christ, but because they adhered to the law of Moses, and expected only the poor temporal rewards which were promised in that law; whereas, the proper Ebionites were those who had a low opinion of the person of Christ. So Eusebius informs us, E. H. lib. iii. c. 27. "The ancients called them Ebionites, who entertained a poor and low notion of Christ; for they thought him only (ἀπὸ τοῦ καὶ κατὰ) a simple and common man." Farther, admitting that the argument taken from the appellation of Ebionites, which was given by the ancients to the members of the church of Jerusalem, were well founded, it would not prove that all, or even the greatest part of them, held the doctrine of the mere humanity of Christ. For in comprehending the whole body of the Hebrew Christians under the appellation of Ebionites, Origen himself acknowledgeth in the third section of the same second book, that he wrote incorrectly, since he there distinguishes the Hebrew Christians into three sects, one of which, he tells us, discarded the law entirely; consequently they were not Ebionites, but orthodox Christians. The same distinction Jerome hath made in his commentary on Isaiah ix. 1, 2, 3. where he speaks of Hebrews believing in Christ, and, as a class of people distinct from them, mentions Nazarenes, who observed the law, but despised the traditions of the Pharisees, thought highly of Paul, and held the doctrine of our Lord's divinity. See also his Comment. on Isaiah viii. 14—21. More than this, although it were granted, for argument's sake, that the brethren of the church of Jerusalem generally believed the doctrine of Christ's mere humanity, it will not prove that the apostles by whom they were instructed were of the same opinion, unless we think the Hebrew Christians could not be enticed by false teachers to forsake their first faith. This, it is presumed, no one will affirm who recollects that the Laodiceans are an example of a whole church declining from its first faith, even in the days of the apostles, Rev. iii. 14—18. Lastly, in this question it is of importance to know, that the doctrine of the proper Ebionites concerning the mere humanity of Christ was deemed heretical by the church in the days of Irenæus, who wrote his books against heresies in the year 176 or 177. For in the list which he hath given of heresies, lib. i. he places the Ebionites between the Cerinthians and the Nicolaitans, both of them acknowledged heretics. And in his third book he refutes, by testimonies from the scriptures, the opinion of those who affirmed that Christ was a mere man engendered of Joseph, which was precisely the opinion of the proper Ebionites. Now, if the Ebionite doctrine concerning the person of Christ was esteemed by the church heretical so early as in the time of Irenæus, it could neither be the doctrine of the apostles nor of the first Christians. Upon the whole, the argument of the Socinians to prove that both the apostles and the first Christians were Unitarians, taken from the members of the church of Jerusalem being called Ebionites by the ancients, is by no means conclusive.

Besides the heretics above-mentioned, there was a third sort who troubled the church in the apostle's days, named Nicolaitans, Rev. ii. 15. These the ancient Christian writers called Gnostics; because, misunderstanding our Lord's words, John xvii. 3. 'This is the life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent,' they affirmed, that nothing was necessary to eternal life, but the knowledge of the true God and of his Son Jesus Christ. With them, therefore, knowledge was the highest, and indeed the only Christian virtue; and therefore, whoever possessed the knowledge of God and of Christ was sure of salvation, whatever his character and actions might be.—Farther, because the apostle Paul, in his epistles, had taught the doctrine of justification by faith without works of law, these heretics affirmed that Christ had set men free from the obligation of the law of God as a rule of life; consequently, that in the gospel dispensation believers being under no law whatever, they sinned not by any thing they did, however contrary it might be to the laws, whether of God or of men. According to them, the only thing incumbent on believers, in order to their obtaining eternal life, was 'to abide in Christ;' by which they meant, abiding in the knowledge and profession of the gospel. This impious doctrine the Nicolaitans anxiously propagated, for the purpose of alluring wicked men to become their disciples, that they might draw money from them, which they spent in gratifying their lusts. Accordingly our Lord, in his epistle to the church of Pergamos, Rev. ii. 14. represents the Nicolaitans as 'holding the doctrine of Balaam, who (as Peter expresses it, 2 Pet. ii. 15. loving the hire of unrighteousness) taught Balak to cast a stumbling-block before the children of Israel, to eat things sacrificed to idols, and to commit whoredom.'—Farther, because these ungodly teachers, whilst they inculcated the most immoral doctrines, pretended to be inspired, our Lord gave them the name of Jezebel, Ahab's wife, who, being addicted to sorcery and divination, was a great favourite of the prophets of Baal. Perhaps also the Nicolaitans, to gain the reputation of inspired teachers, imitated the prophets of Baal in their ecstasies.—Our Lord's condemnation of the doctrines and practices of these impostors, we have in the following passage, Rev. ii. 20. 'Thou sufferest that woman Jezebel, who calleth herself a prophetess, to teach, and to deceive my servants to commit whoredom, and to eat things sacrificed to idols.'—Concerning this class of false teachers, it is proper to remark, that their error did not consist in denying the essential difference between moral good and evil, but in affirming that Christ having purchased for his people an absolute freedom from the laws both of God and men, they were not bound by any rules of morality, but were at liberty to do what they pleased; so that, being incapable of sinning, they were not subject to punishment. This doctrine leading its abettors to all manner of licen-tiousness, our Lord had good reason to say of the Nicolaitans, Rev. ii. 6. that, 'he hated their deeds,' and also 'their doctrine,' ver. 15.

The licentious doctrines and abominable practices of the Nicolaitans, being adapted to the corrupt inclinations of the wicked, were eagerly embraced by many in the latter part of the apostle John's days. He therefore judged it necessary, in this epistle, to condemn these doctrines and practices in the plainest and strongest terms. See chap. i. 8-10, ii. 1-3, iii. 4.—For a more particular account of the Gnostics, taken from Mosheim, see Preface to the Colossians, sect. 2, paragraph 3, from the end.

SECT. IV.—Of the Time when, and the Place where, John wrote his First Epistle.

GROTIUS, HAMMOND, WHITBY, and BENSON think John wrote his first epistle before the destruction of Jerusalem. BENSON fixes it to A. D. 68, answering to the 14th year of the emperor Nero, not long before the destruction of Jerusalem. This opinion he founds on chap. ii. 18, where the apostle says, 'Young children, it is the last hour;' by which BENSON understands the last hour of the duration of the Jewish church and state. But LAMPE, who supposed this epistle was written after the destruction of Jerusalem, thought the apostle might say 'it is the last hour,' not only before, but after Jerusalem was destroyed.—WALL, in his notes on these words, after mentioning that GROTIUS and HAMMOND interpreted them of the time immediately preceding the destruction of Jerusalem, which happened A. D. 70, adds, "Nor are St. John's words like those of any one who was foretelling that event, but rather of one who was speaking of the present state of the Christian religion."—The commentators who suppose this epistle was written before Jerusalem was destroyed, appeal likewise, in support of their opinion, to chap. ii. 13. 'Fathers, I write to you, because ye have known him from the beginning.' For this, they think, could be said only to persons who had seen and conversed with Christ; of which description there might be many alive at the time Jerusalem was destroyed.

Other commentators assign a much later date to this epistle.—MILL and LE CLERC place it A. D. 91 or 92.—BARNAGE A. D. 98.—BEAUSOBRE and L'ENFANT in the end of the first century, when John was very old; on which account they think he called himself, in his second and third epistles, The Elder.—DU PIN was of the same opinion.—WHISTON thought this and the other two epistles were written A. D. 81 or 82.—LAMPE places the first epistle after the Jewish war was ended, and before the apostle's exile into Patmos.—LARDNER also places it, after the Jewish war, A. D. 80, or later.

My opinion is, that John wrote his first epistle before the destruction of Jerusalem:—1. Because the expression, 'it is the last hour,' may more naturally be understood of the last hour of the duration of the Jewish state, than of any later period; especially since the apostle adds, 'and as ye have heard that the antichrist cometh, so now there are many antichrists; whence we know that it is the last hour;' plainly alluding to our Lord's prediction concerning the false teachers who were to arise before the destruction of Jerusalem.—2. The expression, 'Ye have known him from the beginning,' applies better to the disciples, immediately before Jerusalem was destroyed, than to the few who may have been alive at the late date assigned to this epistle: for, thirty-five years after our Lord's ascension, when Jerusalem was destroyed, there may have been many living who had seen and conversed with him during his ministry on earth; whereas, in the year 98, or even in 92, there could not be many alive who were of that description.

In proof, however, of the late date of John's first epistle, it is alleged, that the heretics, who are said by the ancient fathers to have propagated the errors and practised the vices condemned in it, did not arise till after the destruction of Jerusalem. But though it were true that Basilides, Cerinthus, and the rest, who are mentioned by the fathers as holding the errors and following the vicious practices condemned in this epistle, did not arise till after Jerusalem was destroyed, the errors and vices for which they were infamous, certainly existed in the church before that catastrophe. For JAMES speaks of them as prevalent in his time. See the preface to his epistle, sect. 4. And John represents the false teachers, whom he terms antichrists, as the very persons who were foretold by Christ to arise before Jerusalem was overthrown, 1 John ii. 18. I am therefore of opinion, that Basilides, and the rest, were mentioned by the fathers, not because they were the authors of the heresies ascribed to them, but because they propagated them with great industry and success.

As we do not know the precise time when, so neither do we know, with any certainty, the place where, John wrote his first epistle. GROTIUS thought it was written in Patmos, during the apostle's exile there, which he places before the destruction of Jerusalem. But if it was written before that event, which I think is the truth, it is more reasonable to suppose, that it was penned in Judea about the time the apostle observed the encompassing of Jerusalem with armies, and the other signs of its approaching destruction foretold by his Master, which led him to conclude that the last hour of the Jewish state was come, and to write this letter, to prevent the Christians in Judea from being seduced by the false Christs and false teachers, who, according to our Lord's prediction, had arisen. If I am right in this conjecture, the persons addressed in the second chapter, under the denomination of little children, young men, and fathers, were the Christians of different standings in the church, who were living in Judea and the neighbouring countries at that time, for whose salvation the apostle had the most anxious concern; especially as he speaks of the persons he calls fathers as having seen Christ. However, they were not the only persons for whom this epistle was intended. It was written for the benefit of Christians in general, to preserve them in the truth, and to prevent them from following the vicious practices of the false teachers, who had then arisen, or who might afterward arise. But of these things more in the following section, where the opinions, both of the ancients and moderns, concerning the persons to whom John's first epistle was written, shall be explained.

In this question it is of some importance to observe, that if John wrote his first epistle in Judea, about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, and delivered it to the Christians living in that country, as I suppose he did, it will account for its being universally received as his, in the first age, notwithstanding it appeared without any inscription, and did not bear his name in any part of it. For, as he lived among the people for whom it was more immediately intended, and delivered it to some of them personally, they must all have known it to be his. Besides, after he settled at Ephesus, he had frequent opportunities, during his long abode there, to acknowledge that epistle as his in the presence of persons who inquired concerning its authenticity, and who no doubt reported his acknowledgment to others. Thus, the testimony of the brethren in Judea, to whom this epistle was originally delivered, joined with the apostle's own acknowledgment, published in Asia by the Christians there, could not fail to establish its authenticity, in such a manner as to occasion its being universally received as his, before the apostle's decease.—But the second and third epistles of John being written in the latter part of his life, he did not survive long enough to establish their authenticity universally by his own acknowledgment. Besides, being written to private individuals, we may suppose they remained some time concealed in their possession, and did not come abroad, so as to occasion much inquiry concerning them, whilst the apostle was alive. This, I suppose, was the reason that the second and third epistles of John were doubted of by many in the early ages; whilst the first was received universally as his, immediately on its publication.

SECT. V.—Of the Persons for whose Use the First Epistle of John was written.

LARDNER, Can. vol. iii. p. 273. saith of this epistle; "As the writer does not at the beginning prefix his name, nor anywhere else mention it in the epistle; so neither does he describe or characterize the persons to whom he writes, by the name of their city or country, or any such thing."

Augustine, Cassiodorus, and Bede inform us, that the first epistle of John was anciently called The Epistle to the Parthians, as if it had been written to the Jewish believers in the country of Parthia; which Estius saith lay between the Tigris and the Indies. For in that country, as Josephus informs us, Antiq. lib. xxiii. c. 12. there were many Jews, of whom it is probable some were converted to Christianity; for Luke, speaking of the Jews who came to Jerusalem to worship at the feast of Pentecost which immediately followed our Lord's ascension, and who heard the apostles preach after the Holy Ghost had fallen on them, mentions, first of all, Parthians.

Estius, following the tradition preserved by Augustine, was of opinion, that as Peter wrote his epistle to the strangers of the dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia, so John wrote his first epistle to the strangers of the dispersion in Parthia and the neighbouring countries; and to persons of all ages in these countries, as he himself testifies, chap. ii. 13, 14, 18. because he had a concern for the salvation of all.

Whiston, in his commentary on John's epistles, saith, "None of these three epistles of St. John were written to the Parthians, as some later Latin writers have supposed, but rather to the Christians or churches of Asia near Ephesus." This opinion he supports, "by the perfect silence of all true antiquity as to St. John's ever preaching in Parthia; and from the account which we have in Eusebius from Origen, that Parthia was St. Thomas's province, and Asia St. John's; as also from the account in the Recognitions, ix. 29. that Thomas really preached the gospel in Parthia, without a syllable of St. John thereto relating. All which," says he, "makes it plain, that this pretended direction of any of St. John's epistles to the Parthians, stands on no good authority at all. And it is not improbable that the occasion of this error was barely a false reading in some ancient manuscript, where προς Παρθους, to the Parthians, was read for προς Παιδες, to the virgins; which latter inscription might easily be applied to the first epistle; for as it is chiefly addressed to young Christians, yet uncorrupted both as to fleshly and to spiritual fornications, such as in St. John's revelations are called παιδες, virgins; so was the second epistle anciently affirmed by some to be written to the virgins; as we learn from Clement of Alexandria in Cassiodorus," that is, as Lardner observes, from Clement's Adumbrations on the Catholic Epistles, translated by order of Cassiodorus. But, as L'Enfant has remarked, there is nothing in the second epistle which suits virgins more than other Christians.

Oecumenius, in his comment upon the last verse of this epistle, says it was written to the whole church in general. And in the proem to his commentary upon the second epistle, he calls the first a catholic epistle, and says, "That epistle is not written to a certain person, nor to the churches of one or more places, as the blessed Peter's to the Jews in their dispersion; nor as James before him to the twelve tribes of the Jewish people; but he writes to all the faithful in general, whether assembled together or not: for which reason there is no incription to that epistle, as there is to the other two."—"To me, therefore," said Lardner, "it seems, that this epistle was designed for the churches of Asia under St. John's inspection, and for all other Christians into whose hands it should come."—Lampe says, "We easily admit that Jewish believers are specially regarded in this epistle. Nevertheless we think, that St. John directed it to all believers of his time in general; forasmuch as there appears not in it any expression of limitation."—Nevertheless, chap. ii. 2. 'He is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but even for those of the whole world,' seems to intimate, that this epistle was intended chiefly, though not exclusively, for the Jewish believers in Judea and the neighbouring countries. To this opinion Oecumenius likewise inclines; for in his note on chap. ii. 2. he thus writes, "This John said, either because he wrote to Jews, and intended to shew that the benefit of repentance was not restrained to them, but extended to Gentiles also; or else that the promise was not made to the men of that time only, but likewise to all in future times."

CHAPTER I.

It is remarkable, that the apostle begins this epistle with a confutation of those corrupt teachers, whom he afterwards calls Antichrists, but who were named by the ancient fathers Docets, because, as was observed, Pref. sect. 3. they affirmed, that Christ had not come in the flesh, and that the things which were related concerning him by the evangelists, were not really done and suffered by him, but were transacted in appearance only: For he assures us, that the evangelists and apostles testified to the world nothing concerning the life of the Word in the flesh, but what they had heard with their ears, and seen with their eyes, and handled with their hands; founding their attestation on the evidence of their own senses, ver. 1.—So that the apostles, who accompanied the Word during his abode on earth, bare witness to his life in the flesh, as it was plainly manifested to their senses, ver. 2.—and that they declared these incontestable facts to the world, that all who received them might have fellowship with the apostles, through their believing the truth. This, he told them, would be a great honour to them, because the apostle's fellowship was with the Father of the universe, and with his Son Jesus Christ, ver. 3.—John mentioned the honourableness of being in the fellowship of the Father and of his Son Jesus, because the heathens boasted to the believing Jews and Gentiles of the honour which they derived from their fellowship in the Eleusinian and other mysteries. But these were far inferior to the Christian fellowship in this respect, that the heathen gods, the supposed heads of the heathen fellowships, were mere non-entities, 1 Cor. viii. 4.; or, if any of them were real beings, they had no power in the affairs of the world;

whereas the Father, and his Son Jesus Christ, the heads of the Christian fellowship, governed the whole affairs of the universe without control. These things, concerning the heads of the Christian fellowship, the apostle told them he wrote, that their joy in being members of such an honourable and powerfully protected fellowship might be complete, ver. 4.—Further, that the believing Jews and Gentiles might know the advantages also which they enjoyed in the Christian fellowship, he told them, This is the message which we apostles have received from Christ, and which we declare to you, the initiated into our fellowship. That God is light, and in him is no darkness at all: He is goodness and truth, without any mixture of evil or error. Wherefore, the discoveries made in the gospel, to the initiated into the Christian fellowship, concerning the nature and perfections of God were very different from, and far superior to, the boasted discoveries made to the initiated in the heathen mysteries, who were made to believe that their gods practised every sort of vice, and that their votaries worshipped them acceptably by imitating them in their vices, ver. 5.—To shew that the character and manners of the initiated into the fellowship of God, were of a very different nature from those of the initiated into the heathen fellowships, the apostle declared, that if any one pretended to be a member of the fellowship of God, who lived in wickedness, he lied, and was no member of the fellowship of God, who is infinitely holy, and admits none but the holy into his fellowship, ver. 6.—In the mean time, to encourage the disciples of Christ to imitate the head of their fellowship, in his moral perfections, the apostle assured them, That if they walked in holiness as God is holy, they would certainly have fellowship with God, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son would procure them pardon for all such sins as they might fall into, not presumptuously, but through human infirmity. Such is the nature of the Christian fellowship, and such its unspeakable advantages, ver. 7.

To his account of the motives offered in the gospel, to the members of the fellowship of God to live in holiness after the example of God, the apostle subjoined an express condemnation of the corrupt doctrine of the Nicolaitans, described Pref. sect. 3. toward the close. For he declared, That whosoever saith he hath no sin to be cleansed from, deceiveth himself, and the true Christian doctrine is not in him, ver. 8.—He therefore advised every one to confess his sins to God, who, agreeably to his promise published in the gospel, and to his own righteousness, will cleanse penitent sinners from the pollution and punishment of all their sins, ver. 9.—Farther, he declared, If any one affirmeth that he hath no sin to be cleansed from, he strives to make God a liar, who, as the apostle observes in the beginning of the next chapter, hath sent his Son to be a propitiation for the sins of the world, ver. 10.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. I.—1 That which was from the beginning,¹ which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have contemplated,² and our hands have handled,³ concerning the living Word.⁴

2 (K^α, 207.) (For the life¹ was manifested,² and we have seen it, and bear witness, and declare to you that life which is eternal, which was with the Father,³ and was manifested to us.)

Ver. 1.—1. That which was from the beginning.]—As the apostle is here describing, not the Word simply, but the living Word, the Son of God made flesh, he doth not say, in the beginning, as he doth John i. 1. but αὐθεν, from the beginning; a phrase used in other passages to denote the beginning of the gospel. See John xv. 27. Acts xxvi. 4. 1 John ii. 7. 24. iii. 11. 2 John 5. 6. 'That which was from the beginning,' which the apostles heard and saw, and contemplated and handled, was the life of the Word in the flesh, together with his doing and suffering all the things related of him in the gospel; namely, his baptism, the descent of the Holy Ghost on him at his baptism, his temptation by the devil in the wilderness, his preaching, his miracles, his transfiguration, his agony in the garden, his trial and condemnation by the Jewish council, his death on the cross, his resurrection from the dead. Also the eyewitnesses conversing with him, and handling his body after his resurrection, his eating and drinking with them at different times, and his ascending into heaven in a shining cloud, while they looked on.

2. Which we have seen with our eyes, which we have contemplated.]—The expression ἵδμεν, which we have seen, is different from ἑώρακεν. For the latter, as distinguished from the former, denotes the apostle's beholding attentively, and considering at leisure, the life of the Word in the flesh; his words, his actions, his sufferings, and all the other particulars by which he manifested the reality of his life in the flesh. To mark this difference in the expressions, I have translated ἵδμεν, which we have contemplated.

3. And our hands have handled.]—In this John alludes to what Christ said to his disciples, when he appeared to them after his resurrection, Luke xxiv. 29. 'Handle me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have.'—On many other occasions the disciples had an opportunity of handling their Master, and knowing that he had a real body. For example, when he washed their feet; when he took Peter by the hand to prevent him from sinking as he walked on the water; when the disciples gave him the loaves and fishes, and when he, after multiplying them, put them into their hands to be distributed to the multitude. John, in particular, had an opportunity of feeling Christ's body, when he leaned on his bosom during the last passover supper, John xiii. 23.

4. Concerning the living Word.]—ἡ ζωὴ ὡς ὅτι ὁ λόγος; literally, concerning the word of life. But the expression is an Hebraism, which, as the context sheweth, ought to be translated, concerning

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. I.—1 That which was from the beginning of the gospel, which we apostles have heard with our ears, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have contemplated at leisure, and with the greatest attention, and our hands have handled pertaining to the really living Word.

2 For the life of the Word, or Son of God in the flesh, was manifested to the senses of all who conversed with him. And we apostles, who accompanied him during his abode on earth, have seen it, and bear witness, and declare to you that life which is eternal, which the Word possessed with the Father, and which was manifested to us at his baptism, transfiguration, and resurrection.

the living Word. See Ess. iv. 18.—The sentiment in this clause John hath expressed more fully in his gospel, chap. i. 4. where, speaking of the Word, he saith, 'In him was life, and the life (namely, of the Word) was the light of man;' and, ver. 14. 'The word was made flesh, and dwelt among us; and we beheld his glory, as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.' The heresy which the apostle condemned in this and the following verse, is mentioned 2d Epistle, ver. 7. 'Many deceivers are entered into the world, who do not confess Jesus Christ did come in the flesh.' See Pref. to 1 John, sect. 3. paragr. 2; also 1 John iv. 3. note 1. In opposition to that pernicious doctrine, which overturned the gospel entirely, John solemnly affirmed, that what he and his brethren apostles published to the world concerning the real manifestation of the Word or Son of God in the flesh, and concerning his actions and sufferings in the flesh, all actually happened: That having heard him speak, and seen him die, and handled him, both before his death and after his resurrection, they could not be mistaken in believing that he really appeared in the flesh.

Ver. 2.—1. The life.]—By this expression Benson understands Christ himself, the author of eternal life, chap. v. 11. But as the apostle adds 'that they had seen the life,' I rather think he means the life of the Word in the flesh.

2. Was manifested.]—ἔφανερώθη. This word is applied, not only to our Lord's appearing in the flesh, but to his second appearing at the end of the world, chap. ii. 28. See note 2. on that verse, and 1 Pet. i. 7. note 2.

3. And declare to you that life which is eternal, which was with the Father, and was manifested to us.]—By 'the life which is eternal, which was manifested to the apostles,' some understand that immortal life of blessedness which was brought to light and promised in the gospel to believers. But as that life is said to have been with the Father, it must mean either the eternal life or existence of the Father himself, or of some other person. Now, since the eternal existence of the Father could not be manifested to the apostles by revelation, which presupposes the existence of God, 'the life which is eternal' must be that which the Word, or Son, possessed with the Father before the world was; and which was manifested to the apostles at our Lord's baptism and transfiguration, when, by a voice from heaven, God declared him his beloved Son: It was manifested likewise by God's raising Jesus from the dead.—That this ver. 2. is a parenthesis, is evident from the repetition of the words of the first verse in the beginning of the third.

3 That which we have seen and heard¹ we declare² to you,³ that ye also may have fellowship⁴ with us: and our fellowship (h) truly is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ.⁵

4 And these things we¹ write to you, that your joy may be complete.

5 (Ka, 224.) Moreover, this is the message¹ which we have heard from him, and declare to you,² that God is light,³ and in him is no darkness at all.

6 If we say,¹ ('Ort, 260.) Certainly we have

Ver. 3.—1. That which we have seen and heard.]—John having affirmed this in the first verse, he repeats it here, to shew that he and his brethren apostles were the persons to whom Christ said, Matt. xlii. 16. 'Blessed are your eyes, for they see; and your ears, for they hear.'—Further, because the apostles, by hearing and seeing, had the fullest assurance of the things which they testified concerning their Master, John told the elders of the Jews, Acts iv. 20. 'We cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard'; namely, the doctrine, miracles, resurrection, and ascension of their Master, and his return to judge the world.

2. We declare to you.]—As I am of the opinion of those who think John wrote his gospel a considerable time before the destruction of Jerusalem, I suppose he here alluded to his own gospel, in which he had related the particulars whereby the Word was proved to have been made flesh.

3. That ye also may have (κοινωνία) fellowship with us.]—In scripture κοινωνία signifies both the communication of something to others, and the participation of something with others; a joint participation. In the former sense it is used 2 Cor. ix. 13, where it is translated distribution. In the latter sense it is used 1 Cor. x. 16. 'Is it not (κοινωνία) the joint participation of the blood of Christ?' The Greeks likewise, as Chandler informs us in his note on Eph. v. 11, used the word κοινωνία to denote a participation in their religious rites and mysteries, and in the benefits supposed to be procured by them.—κοινωνία also signifies a fellowship, or company of men joined together by some common bond, for the purpose of obtaining certain advantages by means of their union. Among the heathens there were a variety of such fellowships, called by the Latins Sodalitas. And because many of them were instituted for celebrating the mysteries, or secret worship of their gods, the particular god in honour of whom the fellowship was instituted was considered as the head of it, and the author of the benefits which the associated expected to derive from their fellowship in his worship.—In this sense the word fellowship is with great propriety applied to the disciples of Christ, united by their common faith, into one society or church for worshipping the only true God, through the mediation of his Son Jesus Christ, and for receiving from him, through the same mediation, the great blessings of protection and direction in the present life, and of pardon and eternal happiness in the life to come.—Agreeably to this account of the Christian fellowship, the apostle, in this 3d verse, contrasts the heads thereof with the heads of the heathen fellowships: 'Truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ.' The heads of the Christian fellowship are, the great Father of the universe, and his Son Jesus Christ, who governs the world under him; whereas the heads of the heathen fellowships were mere nonentities; or if any of them were real beings, they had no power in human affairs, consequently their votaries could derive neither protection nor any blessing whatever from them.—Farther, in ver. 5, the apostle contrasts the knowledge of the nature and perfections of the true God, communicated in the gospel to the members of the Christian fellowship, with the knowledge of the pretended heathen divinities, communicated in their mysteries to the initiated: 'This is the message we have received from him, and declare to you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all.' He possesses every possible perfection, and is absolutely free from evil; whereas the heathen gods, according to the representation given of them in their mysteries, were polluted with every kind of vice.—Next, in ver. 6, he contrasts the character and manners of the members of the fellowship of the true God, with the character and manners of the initiated into the fellowship of the heathen gods. No person could be in the fellowship of the Father who habitually practised any wickedness; whereas, to be in the fellowship of the heathen gods, it was necessary to imitate them in their characters and vices.—In ver. 7, the apostle contrasts the benefits which the members of the fellowship of God, who imitate him in his moral qualities, receive from him, with the benefits which the votaries of the heathen gods receive from them. The former are the objects of God's love and care, and are cleansed both from the power and from the punishment of their sins through the blood of Christ; whereas the latter receive neither of these blessings from their gods, nor indeed any benefit whatever.

Before this note is concluded, it may be proper to observe, that κοινωνία, Fellowship, is used by the apostle Paul likewise to denote that intercourse which the members of a fellowship or society have with each other, 2 Cor. vi. 14. 'Now what (κοινωνία, fellowship) intercourse hath light with darkness?'

4. And our fellowship truly is with the Father, and with his Son

3 I say, that which we apostles have actually seen and heard, pertaining to the appearing of the Word in the flesh, we declare to you as absolutely certain, that, by believing our testimony, ye also may enter into our fellowship: and our fellowship truly is with the Father of the universe, and with his Son Jesus Christ; consequently it is a more honourable and a more powerfully protected society than any of the heathen fellowships.

4 These things, concerning our fellowship with the Father and the Son, we write to you who have entered into our fellowship, that your joy, on account of the great honour and safety which ye have obtained therein, may be complete.

5 Moreover, to shew you the advantage of being members of our fellowship, this is the message which we apostles have heard from the living Word, and which we declare to you, that God, the Father of the universe, and head of our fellowship, is possessed of all moral perfection, and in him is no evil nor error at all.

6 Wherefore, if we say, Certainly we have fellowship with God,

Jesus Christ.]—Fellowship with the Father and the Son, means our being members of that religious community of which the Father and Son are the heads; and our sharing in all the benefits which the members of that community derive from the Father and the Son, on account of their relation to them as votaries or worshippers.—Paul likewise hath mentioned this fellowship under the denomination of the fellowship of Christ: 1 Cor. i. 9. 'Faithful is God, by whom ye have been called into the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord.'

Ver. 4. These things we write.]—Eusebius saith, the apostle useth the plural we, because the things which he wrote were perfectly consonant to the doctrine of his brethren apostles.

Ver. 5.—1. This is the message.]—Here the common reading is ἐπαγγελία, the promise. But our translators have justly followed the reading of above thirty MSS., and several ancient versions, which have here ἐγγύλιον, the message; or they have supposed that ἐπαγγελία may be translated a message; for it is plain that the apostle is not speaking of a promise, but of a message.

2. Which we have received from him, and declare to you.]—The initiated into the heathen fellowships gloried in their mysteries, or hidden doctrines, as the only effectual means of purifying the soul from ignorance and error. But the real tendency of these mysteries was to corrupt the minds of the initiated with false notions of the objects of their worship, and of the duties of morality; for which reason they were always communicated under the seal of the greatest secrecy. See Pref. to Ephesians, sect. 7, paragr. 4. The Christian mysteries, or doctrines, being of a very different nature, and having a real tendency to enlighten the soul, the apostles published them to all mankind; particularly that great doctrine concerning the nature of God, which was delivered to them by Christ as a message from God himself, namely, 'that God is light; he is righteousness, goodness, and truth; and in him is no darkness at all,' no ignorance, nor error, nor evil of any kind. See the following note 3. Moreover, he is the source of all the knowledge, truth, and goodness, existing in the universe. This important doctrine having been delivered by the living Word, as a message from God himself to the apostles, their declaration of it was thereby rendered more solemn and certain.—Thus it appears, that while the minds of the heathens were utterly corrupted by the representations given of their gods in the mysteries, the initiated in the fellowship of Christ had in their mysteries, that is, in the preaching of the word and in the sacraments, the highest ideas given them of the holiness and other perfections of God; and were taught to aspire after the greatest sanctity of manners by imitating him.

This message concerning God, so solemnly declared by the apostle, may have been designed likewise as a condemnation of the impure doctrines and practices of the Nicolaitans, and other heretics, who in the first age endeavoured to seduce the faithful to commit idolatry, lewdness, and other impurities.

3. That God is light, and in him is no darkness at all.]—Light being the purest of all material substances, and that which, by means of the eye, conveys to the mind pleasures more grateful, and more various, than those communicated by the other senses, it is fitly used, metaphorically, to denote knowledge and virtue. Wherefore, when we are told that God is light, it signifies not only that he is infinite in knowledge, and possessed of all moral perfection, without the least mixture of evil, but that the contemplation of his nature and perfections is as pleasant to the minds of his rational creatures as light is to the eye: On the other hand, darkness admitting all manner of mixture, and concealing every thing from our view, and being extremely unpleasant as well as hurtful, is used with propriety to denote ignorance, error, and moral evil or vice, which of all things are the most destructive of our rational nature. Hence the devils, the most immoral beings in the universe, and the greatest promoters of ignorance and wickedness, are styled, Eph. vi. 12. 'the rulers of the darkness of this world;' and their kingdom is called, Luke xlii. 53, and Col. i. 13. 'the power of darkness;' and the idolatrous heathen their subjects, who were converted to Christianity, are said, Eph. v. 8, to have 'been formerly darkness, but now light in the Lord.' So likewise the Jews converted to Christ are called, Col. i. 12. 'saints in the light.'—Bengelius thinks the apostle, by calling God light, means to tell us, that God is to the eye of the mind what light is to the eye of the body.—Eusebius, in his note on this verse, says, the Manicheans held that God is a light visible to the bodily eye, and that Christ is the visible sun which we behold.

Ver. 6. If we say.]—This is an expression repeatedly used by John.

fellowship with him, (ver. 211.) although we walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth.

7 But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light,¹ we have fellowship with one another,² and the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin.³

8 If we say (see ver. 6. note) that we have no sin,¹ we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.

9 If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just, (ver. 212.) so that he can forgive¹ sins to us, and cleanse us from all unrighteousness. (See ver. 7. note 3.)

10 If we say that we have not sinned, we make (Exe. iv. 1.) him a liar, and his word is not in us.

(ver. 3. note 3.), although we practise wickedness, we lie, and do not the truth: we do not act agreeably to the true doctrine of the gospel, nor to the true nature of the fellowship which we pretend to have with God.

7 But if we practise holiness, after the example of God, the head of our fellowship, who is infinitely pure, he and we have fellowship with one another; he by bestowing, and we by receiving happiness: And the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, shed as an atonement, will deliver us from the punishment of all our sins.

8 If we say, with the Nicolaitans, that we have no sin to be cleansed from, being allowed under the gospel to do what we list, we deceive ourselves, and the true doctrine of God is not in us.

9 The doctrine of the Nicolaitans, that believers have no sin to be pardoned, doth not afford men more comfort than the true doctrine of the gospel, which is, If we confess our sins to God with a firm resolution to forsake them, he is faithful to his promise, and just to his Son whom he sent to save sinners; so that he can forgive sins to us, and cleanse us from all unrighteousness by his Spirit.

10 If, with the Nicolaitans, we say that we have not sinned by any thing we have done, because all actions are free to us, we endeavour to make God a liar, who, by appointing his Son to die as a propitiation, and by promising to pardon us on account of that propitiation, hath declared that we are sinners; consequently his word is not in us.

the meaning of which, according to Bengelius, is, If we endeavour to persuade ourselves and others.

Ver. 7.—1. But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light.—The apostle doth not say, 'as he walketh in the light,' but 'as he is in the light,' to shew that God is essentially and perfectly holy.

2. We have fellowship with one another.—As the apostle is speaking here, not of the fellowship which Christians have with each other, but with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ, 'fellowship (μετ' ἀλλήλων) with one another' must mean fellowship or intercourse between the head and the members of the community. This fellowship consists in the Father's bestowing blessings on us through the mediation of Christ, and in our receiving these blessings from the Father and the Son with thankfulness.—In some MSS. the reading here is μετ' αὐτοῦ, with him. But it makes no alteration in the sense.

3. And the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.]—As the apostle in this passage represents our being cleansed from all sin as the effect of our walking in the light, it is evident, that by our being cleansed from all sin, he doth not mean our being delivered from the power but from the punishment of sin; a blessing which hath been procured by the blood or death of Christ as a propitiatory sacrifice. Accordingly, Christ's blood is said, Heb. ix. 14. to cleanse the consciences of sinners from dead works; that is, from those fears which always accompany the consciousness of having done works which deserve eternal death. Our actual deliverance, however, from punishment, is not accomplished in the present life; but it is promised in the gospel to all who walk in the light; and that is sufficient.—But there is 'a cleansing from all sin' in another sense, which is begun in the present life by the blood of Christ, who, having died to procure us the influences of the Spirit for sanctifying our natures, may be truly said to cleanse us from all sin by his blood. Of this cleansing the apostle does not speak in this verse, as was observed above; but he speaks of it ver. 9.

Ver. 8. If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves.]—This the apostle declared in opposition to the Nicolaitans and Simonians, who, corruptly fancying that under the gospel dispensation no action whatever was forbidden, argued that they did not sin by any thing they were pleased to do.—As the cleansing of men from all sin, mentioned in the preceding verse, doth not mean that believers are pardoned and rendered perfectly holy in the present life, but only that the pardon of all their sins is attainable, and that the sanctification of their nature is begun, and only gradually carrying on, the apostle, without contradicting himself, might affirm, that whosoever saith he hath no sin deceiveth himself. For, through the infirmity of human nature, and the strength of temptation, the holiest sometimes fall into sin; but they quickly recover themselves by repentance; so that they do not continue in sin.—This text, with chap. iii. 3. overthrows the Pelagian notion, that good men may live without sin, and that many good men have actually so lived.

Ver. 9. If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just, so that he can forgive.]—Here the apostle shews what is necessary on our part for obtaining pardon through the blood of Christ. We must confess our sins to God. He mentions confession, not as if it were the only thing necessary, but because it is the first step towards repentance and reformation; and because, if it is sincere, it will be followed with reformation, without which no sinner will be pardoned, if space for amendment is allowed to him.

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Doctrines and Precepts contained in this Chapter.

THE apostle, in the preceding chapter, having mentioned the honour which believers derive from being members of the fellowship of God and of his Son Jesus Christ; also having shewed the obligation which lieth on all the members of that honourable fellowship to imitate God and Christ in their holiness, and described the benefits to be obtained by being in that fellowship, particularly the great benefit of being cleansed from their sins through the blood of Christ, he, in the beginning of this chapter, declared, that he wrote these things to them, not to encourage them to sin, but to prevent them from sinning. Yet if any one happened to sin, through surprise, or strong temptation, or weakness of understanding, he was not to despair of pardon, provided he repented, and did not continue in his sin; because we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Just One, ver. 1.—who is the propitiation appointed of God for the sins of the Jews, and not for theirs only, but for the sins of the whole world; so that penitents, of all ages and nations, may expect pardon through the merit of his death, ver. 2.—

Next it appears that the Nicolaitans, who like the Jews (Rom. ii. 17–20.) were great admirers of knowledge, not only inferred from Christ's words, John xvii. 3. 'This is life eternal, &c. that the only thing necessary to one's obtaining eternal life was to possess the knowledge of the true God and of Jesus Christ, but affirmed, that the person who possessed this knowledge was under no obligation to obey God's commandments. For, in opposition to these impious tenets, John declared, that it is only by the keeping of God's commandments that any man can know that he knoweth God aright; consequently, that that is the only right knowledge of God which leadeth men to a holy life, ver. 3.—Wherefore, if any one affirmeth that he knoweth God, and doth not keep his commandments, he is a liar, and the true knowledge of God is not in him, ver. 4.—Farther, it seemeth to have been a doctrine of the Nicolaitans, that the enjoying of sensual pleasures without restraint, was a proper expression of their love and gratitude to God, for his having freed them, under the gospel, from the obligations of

4 And these things we¹ write to you, that your joy may be complete.

5 (Ka, 224.) Moreover, this is the message¹ which we have heard from him, and declare to you,² that God is light,³ and in him is no darkness at all.

6 If we say,¹ ('Or, 260.) Certainly we have

Ver. 3.—1. That which we have seen and heard.]—John having affirmed this in the first verse, he repeats it here, to show that he and his brethren apostles were the persons to whom Christ said, Mat. xiii. 16. 'Blessed are your eyes, for they see; and your ears, for they hear.'—Further, because the apostles, by hearing and seeing, had the fullest assurance of the things which they testified concerning their Master, John told the elders of the Jews, Acts iv. 20. 'We cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard'; namely, the doctrine, miracles, resurrection, and ascension of their Master, and his return to judge the world.

2. We declare to you.]—As I am of the opinion of those who think John wrote his gospel a considerable time before the destruction of Jerusalem, I suppose he here alluded to his own gospel, in which he had related the particulars whereby the Word was proved to have been made flesh.

3. That ye also may have (κοινωνία) fellowship with us.]—In scripture κοινωνία signifies both the communication of something to others, and the participation of something with others; a joint participation. In the former sense it is used 2 Cor. ix. 13. where it is translated distribution. In the latter sense it is used 1 Cor. x. 16. 'Is it not (κοινωνία) the joint participation of the blood of Christ?' The Greeks likewise, as Chandler informs us in his note on Eph. v. 11. used the word κοινωνία to denote a participation in their religious rites and mysteries, and in the benefits supposed to be procured by them.—κοινωνία also signifies a fellowship, or company of men joined together by some common bond, for the purpose of obtaining certain advantages by means of their union. Among the heathens there were a variety of such fellowships, called by the Latins Sodalitas. And because many of them were instituted for celebrating the mysteries, or secret worship of their gods, the particular god in honour of whom the fellowship was instituted was considered as the head of it, and the author of the benefits which the associated expected to derive from their fellowship in his worship.—In this sense the word fellowship is with great propriety applied to the disciples of Christ, united by their common faith, into one society or church for worshipping the only true God, through the mediation of his Son Jesus Christ, and for receiving from him, through the same mediation, the great blessings of protection and direction in the present life, and of pardon and eternal happiness in the life to come.—Agreeably to this account of the Christian fellowship, the apostle, in this 3d verse, contrasts the heads thereof with the heads of the heathen fellowships: 'Truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ.' The heads of the Christian fellowship are, the great Father of the universe, and his Son Jesus Christ, who governs the world under him; whereas the heads of the heathen fellowships were mere nonentities; or if any of them were real beings, they had no power in human affairs, consequently their votaries could derive neither protection nor any blessing whatever from them.—Farther, in ver. 5. the apostle contrasts the knowledge of the nature and perfections of the true God, communicated in the gospel to the members of the Christian fellowship, with the knowledge of the pretended heathen divinities, communicated in their mysteries to the initiated: 'This is the message we have received from him, and declare to you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all.' He possesses every possible perfection, and is absolutely free from evil; whereas the heathen gods, according to the representation given of them in their mysteries, were polluted with every kind of vice.—Next, in ver. 6. he contrasts the character and manners of the members of the fellowship of the true God, with the character and manners of the initiated into the fellowship of the heathen gods. No person could be in the fellowship of the Father who habitually practised any wickedness; whereas, to be in the fellowship of the heathen gods, it was necessary to imitate them in their characters and vices.—In ver. 7. the apostle contrasts the benefits which the members of the fellowship of God, who imitate him in his moral qualities, receive from him, with the benefits which the votaries of the heathen gods receive from them. The former are the objects of God's love and care, and are cleansed both from the power and from the punishment of their sins through the blood of Christ; whereas the latter receive neither of these blessings from their gods, nor indeed any benefit whatever.

Before this note is concluded, it may be proper to observe, that κοινωνία, Fellowship, is used by the apostle Paul likewise to denote that intercourse which the members of a fellowship or society have with each other, 2 Cor. vi. 15. 'Now what (κοινωνία, fellowship) intercourse hath light with darkness?'

4. And our fellowship truly is with the Father, and with his Son

3 I say, that which we apostles have actually seen and heard, pertaining to the appearing of the Word in the flesh, we declare to you as absolutely certain, that, by believing our testimony, ye also may enter into our fellowship: and our fellowship truly is with the Father of the universe, and with his Son Jesus Christ; consequently it is a more honourable and a more powerfully protected society than any of the heathen fellowships.

4 These things, concerning our fellowship with the Father and the Son, we write to you who have entered into our fellowship, that your joy, on account of the great honour and safety which ye have obtained therein, may be complete.

5 Moreover, to show you the advantage of being members of our fellowship, this is the message which we apostles have heard from the living Word, and which we declare to you, that God, the Father of the universe, and head of our fellowship, is possessed of all moral perfection, and in him is no evil nor error at all.

6 Wherefore, if we say, Certainly we have fellowship with God,

Jesus Christ.]—Fellowship with the Father and the Son, means our being members of that religious community of which the Father and Son are the heads; and our sharing in all the benefits which the members of that community derive from the Father and the Son, on account of their relation to them as votaries or worshippers.—Paul likewise hath mentioned this fellowship under the denomination of the fellowship of Christ: 1 Cor. i. 9. 'Faithful is God, by whom ye have been called into the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord.'

Ver. 4. These things we write.]—Eustasius saith, the apostle useth the plural we, because the things which he wrote were perfectly consonant to the doctrine of his brethren apostles.

Ver. 5.—1. This is the message.]—Here the common reading is ἐπαγγελία, the promise. But our translators have justly followed the reading of above thirty MSS., and several ancient versions, which have here ἐγγίαια, the message; or they have supposed that ἐπαγγελία may be translated a message: for it is plain that the apostle is not speaking of a promise, but of a message.

2. Which we have received from him, and declare to you.]—The initiated into the heathen fellowships gloried in their mysteries, or hidden doctrines, as the only effectual means of purifying the soul from ignorance and error. But the real tendency of these mysteries was to corrupt the minds of the initiated with false notions of the objects of their worship, and of the duties of morality; for which reason they were always communicated under the seal of the greatest secrecy. See Pref. to Ephesians, sect. 7. paragr. 4. The Christian mysteries, or doctrines, being of a very different nature, and having a real tendency to enlighten the soul, the apostles published them to all mankind; particularly that great doctrine concerning the nature of God, which was delivered to them by Christ as a message from God himself, namely, 'that God is light; he is righteousness, goodness, and truth; and in him is no darkness at all,' no ignorance, nor error, nor evil of any kind. See the following note 3. Moreover, he is the source of all the knowledge, truth, and goodness, existing in the universe. This important doctrine having been delivered by the living Word, as a message from God himself to the apostles, their declaration of it was thereby rendered more solemn and certain.—Thus it appears, that while the minds of the heathens were utterly corrupted by the representations given of their gods in the mysteries, the initiated in the fellowship of Christ had in their mysteries, that is, in the preaching of the word and in the sacraments, the highest ideas given them of the holiness and other perfections of God; and were taught to aspire after the greatest sanctity of manners by imitating him.

This message concerning God, so solemnly declared by the apostle, may have been designed likewise as a condemnation of the impure doctrines and practices of the Nicolaitans, and other heretics, who in the first age endeavoured to seduce the faithful to commit idolatry, lewdness, and other impurities.

3. That God is light, and in him is no darkness at all.]—Light being the purest of all material substances, and that which, by means of the eye, conveys to the mind pleasures more grateful, and more various, than those communicated by the other senses, it is fitly used, metaphorically, to denote knowledge and virtue. Wherefore, when we are told that God is light, it signifies not only that he is infinite in knowledge, and possessed of all moral perfection, without the least mixture of evil, but that the contemplation of his nature and perfections is as pleasant to the minds of his rational creatures as light is to the eye: On the other hand, darkness admitting all manner of mixture, and concealing every thing from our view, and being extremely unpleasant as well as hurtful, is used with propriety to denote ignorance, error, and moral evil or vice, which of all things are the most destructive of our rational nature. Hence the devils, the most immoral beings in the universe, and the greatest promoters of ignorance and wickedness, are styled, Eph. vi. 12. 'the rulers of the darkness of this world;' and their kingdom is called, Luke xxi. 53. and Col. i. 13. 'the power of darkness;' and the idolatrous heathen their subjects, who were converted to Christianity, are said, Eph. v. 8. to have 'been formerly darkness, but now light in the Lord.' So likewise the Jews converted to Christ are called, Col. i. 12. 'saints in the light.'—Bengellus thinks the apostle, by calling God light, means to tell us, that God is to the eye of the mind what light is to the eye of the body.—Eustasius, in his note on this verse, says, the Manicheans held that God is a light visible to the bodily eye, and that Christ is the visible sun which we behold.

Ver. 6. If we say.]—This is an expression repeatedly used by John.

fellowship with him, (ver. 311.) although we walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth.

7 But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light,¹ we have fellowship with one another,² and the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin.³

8 If we say (see ver. 6. note) that we have no sin,¹ we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us.

9 If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just, (in apu) so that he can forgive¹ sins to us, and cleanse us from all unrighteousness. (See ver. 7. note 3.)

10 If we say that we have not sinned, we make (Eos. iv. 1.) him a liar, and his word is not in us.

(ver. 3. note 3.), although we practise wickedness, we lie, and do not the truth: we do not act agreeably to the true doctrine of the gospel, nor to the true nature of the fellowship which we pretend to have with God.

7 But if we practise holiness, after the example of God, the head of our fellowship, who is infinitely pure, he and we have fellowship with one another; he by bestowing, and we by receiving happiness: And the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, shed as an atonement, will deliver us from the punishment of all our sins.

8 If we say, with the Nicolaitans, that we have no sin to be cleansed from, being allowed under the gospel to do what we list, we deceive ourselves, and the true doctrine of God is not in us.

9 The doctrine of the Nicolaitans, that believers have no sin to be pardoned, doth not afford men more comfort than the true doctrine of the gospel, which is, If we confess our sins to God with a firm resolution to forsake them, he is faithful to his promise, and just to his Son whom he sent to save sinners; so that he can forgive sins to us, and cleanse us from all unrighteousness by his Spirit.

10 If, with the Nicolaitans, we say that we have not sinned by any thing we have done, because all actions are free to us, we endeavour to make God a liar, who, by appointing his Son to die as a propitiation, and by promising to pardon us on account of that propitiation, hath declared that we are sinners; consequently his word is not in us.

the meaning of which, according to Bengelius, is, If we endeavour to persuade ourselves and others.

Ver. 7.—1. But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light.]—The apostle doth not say, 'as he walketh in the light,' but 'as he is in the light,' to shew that God is essentially and perfectly holy.

2. We have fellowship with one another.]—As the apostle is speaking here, not of the fellowship which Christians have with each other, but with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ, 'fellowship (κοινωνία) with one another' must mean fellowship or intercourse between the head and the members of the community. This fellowship consists in the Father's bestowing blessings on us through the mediation of Christ, and in our receiving these blessings from the Father and the Son with thankfulness.—In some MSS. the reading here is μετ' αὐτου, with him. But it makes no alteration in the sense.

3. And the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.]—As the apostle in this passage represents our being cleansed from all sin as the effect of our walking in the light, it is evident, that by our being cleansed from all sin, he doth not mean our being delivered from the power but from the punishment of sin; a blessing which hath been procured by the blood or death of Christ as a propitiatory sacrifice. Accordingly, Christ's blood is said, Heb. ix. 14. to cleanse the consciences of sinners from dead works; that is, from those fears which always accompany the consciousness of having done works which deserve eternal death. Our actual deliverance, however, from punishment, is not accomplished in the present life; but it is promised in the gospel to all who walk in the light; and that is sufficient.—But there is 'a cleansing from all sin' in another sense, which is begun in the present life by the blood of Christ, who, having died to procure us the influences of the Spirit for sanctifying our natures, may be truly said to cleanse us from all sin by his blood. Of this cleansing the apostle does not speak in this verse, as was observed above; but he speaks of it ver. 9.

Ver. 8. If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves.]—This the apostle declared in opposition to the Nicolaitans and Simonians, who, corruptly fancying that under the gospel dispensation no action whatever was forbidden, argued that they did not sin by any thing they were pleased to do.—As the cleansing of men from all sin, mentioned in the preceding verse, doth not mean that believers are pardoned and rendered perfectly holy in the present life, but only that the pardon of all their sins is attainable, and that the sanctification of their nature is begun, and only gradually carrying on, the apostle, without contradicting himself, might affirm, that whosoever saith he hath no sin deceiveth himself. For, through the infirmity of human nature, and the strength of temptation, the holiest sometimes fall into sin; but they quickly recover themselves by repentance; so that they do not continue in sin.—This text, with chap. iii. 3. overthrows the Pelagian notion, that good men may live without sin, and that many good men have actually so lived.

Ver. 9. If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just, so that he can forgive.]—Here the apostle shews what is necessary on our part for obtaining pardon through the blood of Christ. We must confess our sins to God. He mentions confession, not as if it were the only thing necessary, but because it is the first step towards repentance and reformation; and because, if it is sincere, it will be followed with reformation, without which no sinner will be pardoned, if space for amendment is allowed to him.

CHAPTER II.

View and Illustration of the Doctrines and Precepts contained in this Chapter.

THE apostle, in the preceding chapter, having mentioned the honour which believers derive from being members of the fellowship of God and of his Son Jesus Christ; also having shewed the obligation which lieth on all the members of that honourable fellowship to imitate God and Christ in their holiness, and described the benefits to be obtained by being in that fellowship, particularly the great benefit of being cleansed from their sins through the blood of Christ, he, in the beginning of this chapter, declared, that he wrote these things to them, not to encourage them to sin, but to prevent them from sinning. Yet if any one happened to sin, through surprise, or strong temptation, or weakness of understanding, he was not to despair of pardon, provided he repented, and did not continue in his sin; because we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Just One, ver. 1.—who is the propitiation appointed of God for the sins of the Jews, and not for theirs only, but for the sins of the whole world; so that penitents, of all ages and nations, may expect pardon through the merit of his death, ver. 2.—

Next it appears that the Nicolaitans, who like the Jews (Rom. ii. 17–20.) were great admirers of knowledge, not only inferred from Christ's words, John xvii. 3. 'This is life eternal, &c. that the only thing necessary to one's obtaining eternal life was to possess the knowledge of the true God and of Jesus Christ, but affirmed, that the person who possessed this knowledge was under no obligation to obey God's commandments. For, in opposition to these impious tenets, John declared, that it is only by the keeping of God's commandments that any man can know that he knoweth God aright; consequently, that that is the only right knowledge of God which leadeth men to a holy life, ver. 3.—Wherefore, if any one affirmeth that he knoweth God, and doth not keep his commandments, he is a liar, and the true knowledge of God is not in him, ver. 4.—Farther, it seemeth to have been a doctrine of the Nicolaitans, that the enjoying of sensual pleasures without restraint, was a proper expression of their love and gratitude to God, for his having freed them, under the gospel, from the obligations of morality. For the apostle, in opposition to that impious doctrine, declared, that whosoever keepeth God's injunction to obey Christ's precepts, in that man the love and gratitude which he oweth to God is carried to perfection; and that such a person may thereby know that he is in the fellowship of God, ver. 5.—And with respect to fellowship with Christ, the apostle declared, that he who saith he abideth in fellowship with Christ, ought to live in the holy manner in which Christ lived while he was on earth, ver. 6.

Next, the apostle told his disciples, that, in enjoining them to obey Christ's precepts, he wrote no new commandment, but an old commandment given by Moses in the law, who ordered the Israelites to hearken to the prophet whom God was to raise up from among their brethren, like to him, ver. 7.—But he wrote a new commandment, when he enjoined them to walk even as Christ walked; because it implied that they were to lay down their lives for one another, (chap. iii. 16.), as Christ laid down his life for them, ver. 8.—And because some of the Jews, like the initiated in the heathen mysteries, thought themselves enlightened persons, notwithstanding they were void of love to the rest of mankind, and even hated them, the apostle told them, that the person who thought himself enlightened, and yet hated his brother, was still in darkness, notwithstanding he called himself a Christian, ver. 9.—But he who loveth his brother, in such a manner as to do him every good office in his power, is in the light; he is a truly enlightened person, and there is nothing in him to occasion his falling into sin, ver. 10.—Then, to impress his disciples the more strongly with a sense of the obligation they were laid under by the light to love one another, the apostle repeated the sentiment which he had delivered in ver. 9. that he who hateth his brother is in the darkness of ignorance, and doth not know whither that conduct will lead him, because the darkness of ignorance hath blinded the eyes of his understanding, ver. 11.

Having finished these subjects, John told all the brethren in general, that he was going to write a precept which he knew would be agreeable to them, because their sins were to be forgiven through Christ, ver. 12.—Accordingly, first of all addressing such of them as were of long standing in the church, whom on that account he called fathers, he said he would write to them the precept of which he spake, because they had known Christ from the beginning, consequently they would know that what he should write to them was Christ's precept. Then, turning his discourse to those who were in the vigour of the Christian life, whom therefore he called young men, he observed, that his precept would not be difficult to them, because they had already overcome the wicked one, the devil, by resisting his strongest temptations. And with respect to the newly converted, whom he termed young children, what he was going to write would, he believed, be approved by them, because they were acquainted with the will of the Father, ver. 13.—However, before he wrote the precept of which he spake, he told the fathers, that he had written to them the precept of walking as Christ walked, because they had known Christ from the beginning. The same precept he had written to the young men, because they were strong in the Christian virtues through the doctrine of God abiding in them, and because they had already overcome the wicked one, ver. 14.—Having thus roused the attention of the old, the middle-aged, and the young, John told them his precept was, not to be in love with the men and manners of the world, neither with the things which the men of the world pursue; because, if any one loveth the world much, the love of the Father is not in him, ver. 15.—Besides, the evil affections towards the things of the world, which subsist in the minds of idolaters and unbelievers, do not proceed from the Father, as wicked men falsely suppose, who on that account fancy they may safely gratify them; but they are raised in them by the things of the world, ver. 16.—Farther, though wicked men propose to make themselves happy, by the unrestrained enjoyment of the things which are in the world, they delude themselves; for the world, together with the things which it contains, and the lusts which are gratified by these things, passeth away; they are all of a short duration: But he who doth the will of God, by not indulging worldly lusts, shall abide in happiness through all eternity, ver. 17.

At the time John wrote this letter, the Christians in Judea and in the neighbouring countries were greatly harassed by the unbelieving Jews, in the tumults which they excited immediately before their last war with the Romans. Wherefore, to comfort more especially the newly converted under these sufferings, he assured them, that it was the last hour of the duration of the Jewish state; so that the power of their persecutors would soon be broken. And to prove that it was the last hour, he put them in mind that Christ, in his prophecy concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, had mentioned the appearing of many false prophets as a sign of the impending ruin. Wherefore, since many false teachers, whom the apostle called antichrists, because they were opposers of Christ, (ver. 22.), were then going about deceiving many, they might from that circumstance know it was the last hour of the Jewish commonwealth, ver. 18.—These false teachers, the apostle observed, had gone out from them, having been once in the Christian church; but they were not of the number of the teachers who were commissioned and inspired by Christ: for if they had been of that number, they would have remained with the apostles. But they were permitted to depart from the society of the apostles, that they might be known to be impostors who taught false doctrine, ver. 19.—However, as many of the disciples had the gift of discerning spirits, and could judge with certainty both of teachers and of their doctrine, there was the less occasion to caution them to beware of these deceivers, ver. 20.—The apostle therefore added, I have not written to you because ye know not the truth concerning the life of the Word in the flesh, but because ye know it, and know also that the false teachers affirm an abominable lie, in direct contradiction to the truth, when they say Christ did not come in the flesh, neither did any of the things related of him, ver. 21.—Who then, said he, is the liar or false prophet foretold to arise before the destruction of Jerusalem, but he who denieth that Jesus is the Christ come in the flesh? They are antichrists, who deny the Father's testimony that he hath sent his Son in the flesh, and the Son's testimony that he actually came in the flesh, ver. 22.—Whosoever denieth Jesus to be the Son of God come in the flesh, doth not acknowledge the Father's testimony, delivered at the baptism and transfiguration of Jesus, ver. 23.—Therefore, said the apostle, let the belief of the Father's testimony concerning his Son, which ye have heard from the beginning, abide in you, that ye may abide in the fellowship of the Son and of the Father, and thereby obtain eternal life, ver. 24.—For this is the promise which the Son hath made in the Father's name, to them who abide in his fellowship; namely, that they shall obtain eternal life, ver. 25.

In apology for his writing with such earnestness against the teachers who endeavoured to deceive them, he told them he had written these things to them, ver. 26.—notwithstanding he knew they possessed the gift of discerning spirits, and had no need that any one should teach them, unless it was to confirm them in the belief of what they were taught by their own gifts. Wherefore, said he, as your own gifts have taught you that these teachers are antichrists, reject their doctrine, and hold fast the truth concerning Christ, ver. 27.—I say little children, by holding the truth concerning the Son, and practising holiness, abide in his fellowship, that when he appears to judge the world we may have confidence of your being accepted, and may not be put to shame by the errors and vices of our disciples, ver. 28.—This excellent discourse the apostle concluded by saying to them, If ye have a just idea of the righteousness of God, ye will know that every one who resembles God by working righteousness, is begotten of him; he is a child of God, ver. 29.

Ver. 1.—1. My little children.]—The word τὸν, being the diminutive of τίμιος, is a tender and affectionate appellation, denoting, as Lardner observes, paternal authority, love, and concern, which, in the character of an apostle, John might have used in any period of his life; but in this epistle it seems to imply, together with apostolical authority, advanced age.

2. These things I write to you, that ye may not sin.]—Having told them, chap. i. 10, that no man is without sin, it is plain, that by their not sinning, the apostle meant, either their not sinning habitually, or their not sinning wilfully.—He wrote the things contained in the preceding chapter to prevent them from sinning, because the consideration, that God is faithful to forgive our sins, and to cleanse us from them, suggested chap. i. 9, must have a powerful influence on every good man, to make him solicitous to avoid sin, as far as human infirmity will permit.

3. We have an advocate with the Father.]—Some critics observe that παράκλητος, advocate, here answereth to patronus, patron, among the Latins. Doddridge thinks the import of this appellation may be illustrated by the custom of tributary states, who were wont to have certain eminent persons residing in the courts of the princes to whom they were tributaries, who negotiated their affairs, vindicated their rights, and promoted their interests with the reigning powers.—Concerning the intercession of Christ for his people, see Rom. viii. 34. note 3. Heb. vii. 25.

4. Jesus Christ the just one.]—Δίκαιος. This appellation is given to our Lord as the Messiah, in different places of the New Testament, to denote either that he was just or righteous in calling himself the Christ, and the Son of God, (see James v. 6. note 1.), or that he was absolutely free from sin.—It is introduced in this place 'o make us sensible of the dignity of our advocate, and of the efficacy of his intercession on our behalf, founded on the merit of his death.

Ver. 2.—1. And he is a propitiation for our sins.]—The word ἱκερ is nowhere found in the New Testament but in this passage and in chap. iv. 10. But it occurs often in the LXX. translation of the Old Testament, where it signifies a sacrifice of atonement. Thus, Lev. vi. 6, 7. Numb. v. 8. ἱκερ ἱκερμὸν is a ram for a sin-offering; and, Ezek. xlv. 27, πρόσφετε ἱκερμὸν is to offer a sin-offering.—In considering the death of Christ as a sacrifice for sin, John, like the other apostles, followed his Master, who, in the institution of his supper, directed his disciples to consider it as designed to bring to their remembrance his blood shed for many, for the remission of sins.¹

2. And not for ours only, but even for those of the whole world.]—Some commentators by the whole world understand, the whole world of the elect. But nowhere else in scripture doth the word signify the elect. This appellation is given, either to the wicked of the world, (1 John ii. 16. note 1.), or to mankind in general; in which latter sense John uses it here, to shew that Christ is a propitiation, not for the sins of the Jews only, but also for the sins of all mankind. See Oecumenius's excellent gloss on this verse, Pref. to this Epistle, sect. 5, at the end. Farther, as the first clause of the verse, 'He is the propitiation for our sins,' must be understood only of the sins of those Jews who were penitent, and whose advocate Christ was, so the second clause, 'And not for ours only, but even for those of the whole world,' must be understood only of the

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. II.—1 My dear children, these things I write to you concerning the faithfulness and righteousness of God in the forgiveness of sins, not to encourage you to sin, but that ye may not sin; the consideration of the mercy of God being a strong incitement to avoid sin; Psal. cxxx. 4. Yet, if any one hath sinned, and hath repented of his sin, let him not despair: we have an advocate abiding with the Father, Jesus Christ the just one, or Messiah.

2 And the merit of his death is so great, that he is a propitiation for our sins who have embraced the gospel; and not for ours only, but even for the sins of the whole world of penitents who forsake their sins.

3 And since, without repentance and reformation, no one can be pardoned, by this we know most certainly, that we have known God aright—have a right knowledge of his goodness—if we keep his commandments.

4 He who saith, I have known God, and doth not keep his commandments, is a liar in so speaking; and the true knowledge of God is not in this man; for, by his works, he denieth that God is righteous and good.

5 But whosoever keepeth God's injunction, Matt. xvii. 5. to obey his Son's precepts, truly in such a person the love which he bears to God is rendered complete. By this we know assuredly, that we are in the fellowship of God, and of his Son Jesus Christ.

6 He who saith he abideth in the fellowship of Christ, ought himself sins of those throughout the whole world, from first to last, who, having repented of their sins, attained to a virtuous manner of living.—For the sense in which Christ died for all, see 2 Cor. v. 15. note 1.

Ver. 3. By this we know that we have known him, &c.]—As the apostle is reasoning here against the Nicolaitans and Gnostics, who affirmed that the only thing necessary to eternal life was the knowledge of the true God, (Pref. sect. 3.), the relative him, in this clause, doth not denote Jesus Christ, the immediate antecedent, but God, whose mercy in forgiving men's sins was mentioned chap. i. 9.—The apostle doth not deny the excellency of the knowledge of the true God, nor its efficacy in procuring eternal life: he only affirms, that the right knowledge of God necessarily leads to the keeping his commandments; and therefore, that the keeping of God's commandments is the only sure mark by which we can know that we have known him aright.

Ver. 4. He who saith, I have known him, and doth not keep his commandments, is a liar.]—The Nicolaitans and Gnostics, notwithstanding they lived in an habitual course of the most criminal sensual indulgences, boasted that they were the objects of God's love, and sure of obtaining eternal life, merely because they possessed the knowledge of the true God, and of his mercy in forgiving men's sins. In this boasting the apostle declared them liars, either because they spake what they knew to be false, or at least what was in itself most false.

Ver. 5.—1. Whosoever keepeth his word.]—Here 'his word' does not signify God's commandments in general, but one commandment in particular, namely, that which God gave at our Lord's transfiguration, and which is mentioned, ver. 7. under the character of 'an old commandment;' being the commandment which God delivered to the Israelites by Moses, to hearken to the prophet whom God was to raise up from among their brethren, like to Moses. See however ver. 7. note.

2. Truly in that man the love of God is perfected.]—The love of God, of which the apostle speaks, is not God's love to us, but our love to God; which, when we keep his commandment to obey his Son in all things, is carried to its greatest perfection. Hence Christ said to his disciples, John xiv. 21. 'He who hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is who loveth me;' and 1 John v. 3. 'This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments.'

3. By this we know that we are in him.]—To be in Christ, is to be a member of that society, fellowship, or church, of which Christ is the head, and to enjoy all the blessings peculiar to that society; and, in particular, to be the object of Christ's love. See ver. 6. note 1. This is called, chap. i. 3, 'a having fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ.' Beza thinks the expression denotes one's union with Christ by affection and interest; because the force of love is such, that the parties are often in each other's thoughts.—Some enthusiasts fancy, that to be in Christ means a personal union with him by a mixture of substances: an error which hath led enthusiasts into many extravagances. See ver. 9. note 1.

Ver. 6.—1. He who saith he abideth in him.]—This phrase, which so often occurs in John's writings, is founded on our Lord's discourse, John xv. 1.—10. and particularly on ver. 10. 'If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love, even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love.' Wherefore, to be himself also² so to walk, even as he walked.³

7 Brethren, I do not write a new commandment to you, but an old commandment,¹ which ye had from the beginning.² The old commandment is the word which ye have heard from the beginning.

8 (ΠΛΗΝ, 268.) On the other hand, I write to you a new commandment,¹ which is true (w, 168.) concerning him and concerning you.² For the darkness is passing away, and the light which is true now shineth.³

9 He who saith he is in this light,¹ (xii, 211.) and yet hateth his brother, is in the darkness until now.

10 He who loveth his brother abideth in this light, and there is no stumbling-block (w, 163.) to him.¹

11 But he who hateth his brother is in the darkness,¹ and walketh in that darkness, and doth not know whither he goeth, because the darkness hath blinded his eyes.

in Christ, is to be the object of Christ's love, and to abide in Christ, is to continue in his love, by keeping his commandments. See chap. iv. 15. note 2.—It seems the false teachers boasted of their abiding in Christ, merely through the power of knowledge. But to overturn that pernicious doctrine, our apostle appealed to Christ himself, who, in the words just now quoted, declared the keeping of his commandments to be the only method of procuring his love, and abiding in it.—Though the phrase, abide in Christ, be taken from the similitude of the vine and its branches, mentioned, John xv. 4. which are substantially united, it does not signify a personal union with Christ, as was hinted ver. 5. note 3. but that union of sentiment, affection and will, which subsist between him and all his real disciples, the members of his fellowship.

2. Ought himself also.]—The word also implies that besides a person's saying that he abideth in Christ, he ought likewise to walk or behave as Christ behaved while on earth.

3. So to walk even as he walked.]—He ought to abstain from sin, chap. iii. 8. and follow Christ's example in piety, temperance, justice, benevolence, disinterestedness, and charity to the poor. More particularly, he ought to carry his imitation of Christ's benevolence so far as to lay down his life for the brethren, when called by God to do so, chap. iii. 16.—While Christ lived on earth, he was subject to all the trials, and temptations, and sufferings, to which men are exposed. These he bore with admirable patience and fortitude. His behaviour, therefore, under sufferings, is a pattern which his disciples ought also to imitate.

Ver. 7. But an old commandment.]—Because the apostle affirmeth, that in saying, ver. 5. 'whosoever keepeth his word,' &c. he did not write a new commandment, but an old commandment, which they had heard from the beginning, in explaining ver. 5. I supposed his word to mean, God's command to the Israelites, Deut. xviii. 15. to hearken to the prophet he was to raise up to them, like to Moses; which commandment was certainly an old commandment, though it was renewed by a voice from heaven at Christ's baptism and transfiguration. However, if the reader is of opinion that his word, ver. 5. is Christ's word or precepts in general, it makes not the least alteration in the sense of the passage. The voice from the excellent glory, by which, at our Lord's transfiguration, God declared him his beloved Son, and commanded the disciples to hearken to him, Moses and Elijah being present, was an authentic and clear attestation, that Jesus in the prophet of whom Moses spake in the law. This miraculous attestation, and divine command to mankind to hearken to Jesus, being frequently repeated by the apostles, and referred to in their sermons and conversations, 2 Pet. i. 17. John had good reason to call it 'a commandment which they had heard from the beginning.'

Ver. 8.—1. On the other hand, I write to you a new commandment.]—The old commandment is that mentioned ver. 5. that 'we keep God's word,' or command delivered by Moses, Deut. xviii. 15. which in reality was a command to us to obey all Christ's precepts.—The new commandment of which the apostle speaks, is that contained in ver. 6. that Christ's disciples 'ought to walk even as he walked;' and, in particular, that as Christ laid down his life for his people, they ought to lay down their lives for one another, chap. iii. 16. Thus, to walk as Christ walked, John, with great propriety, termed a new commandment, because, notwithstanding the precept to love one another was strongly enjoined in the law of Moses, consequently was not a new commandment, the precept to love one another as Christ loved us, is certainly a new commandment, and is so termed by Christ himself, John xiii. 34. 'A new commandment I give to you, that ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another.' This new commandment, being included in the precept, ver. 6. of 'walking even as Christ walked,' the also so to walk, even as he walked when he was in the world; that being a much better proof of one's abiding in Christ, than a nominal profession.

7 Brethren, I do not write a new commandment to you, when I tell you that, by complying with God's injunction to hear his Son, the love of God is perfected in you: But I write an old commandment delivered by Moses, Deut. xviii. 15. which ye likewise had from the beginning. The old commandment is the word God uttered at Christ's baptism and transfiguration, ordering men to obey him; which word ye have heard us declare from the beginning.

8 On the other hand, when I exhort you to walk as Christ walked, I write to you a new commandment, which is true concerning him, seeing he laid down his life for men, and concerning you, who ought to imitate him. For the former darkness of heathenism and Judaism is passing away, and the light of Christ's doctrine and example, which is the true light, now shineth, and teacheth you to lay down your lives for the brethren after his example.

9 He who saith he is in the true light, and yet hateth his brother, is in the darkness of ignorance and wickedness until now, whatever his pretensions may be.

10 He who loveth his brother abideth in the true light; he is truly enlightened with the doctrine and example of Christ; and there is nothing in him to occasion his falling into sin.

11 But he who hateth his brother is still in the darkness of error and wickedness, and walketh in that darkness, and doth not know the miserable end of such a course of life; for the darkness hath blinded his eyes, the eyes of his understanding.

apostle called that precept a new commandment, and thus explained it, chap. iii. 16. 'He laid down his life for us, therefore we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren.'

2. Which is true concerning him and concerning you.]—ΑΛΕΓΩ, being in the neuter gender, cannot be construed with ὁ ΧΡΙΣΤΟΣ, commandment, which is feminine. We must therefore supply ὁ ΧΡΙΣΤΟΣ, or some such general word expressive of the subject of the command. See Ess. iv. 21.—By saying that the thing enjoined in the new commandment was true concerning the persons to whom the apostle wrote, he perhaps meant, that some of them had already hazarded their lives in assisting their brethren.

3. For the darkness is passing away, and the light which is true now shineth.]—By the darkness which was passing away, we may understand, not only the darkness of heathenism, but the darkness of the Mosaic dispensation, together with the corrupt doctrines and practices of the Jews under that dispensation; and particularly the impious notion, that they were commanded in the law to hate the Gentiles, Matt. v. 43. This darkness (σκότος) was gradually passing away, by means of the shining of the light which was true; that is, by the publication of Christ's doctrine and example in the gospel. The Mosaic law, with its obscure types, was likewise ready to vanish, in consequence of the destruction of Jerusalem, and the dispersion of the Jewish nation, which were soon to happen.

Ver. 9. He who saith he is in this light.]—The apostle hath declared, chap. i. 5. 'that God is light;' and chap. i. 7. that 'if we walk in the light, we have fellowship with him;' and ver. 8. of this chapter, that 'the light which is true now shineth,' namely, by the preaching of the gospel. From these things he justly inferred in this verse, that 'he who saith he is in the light,' that is, in the fellowship of God, and well instructed in the doctrines of the gospel, 'and yet hateth his brother, is in the darkness till now;' he is still in ignorance and wickedness, and is no member of the fellowship of God, notwithstanding his loud pretensions to illumination.

Ver. 10. He who loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is no stumbling-block to him.]—This is an allusion to Christ's words, John xi. 9. 'If any one walk in the day he doth not stumble, because he seeth the light of this world: but if any one walk in the night he stumbleth, because there is no light to him.'—The apostle, by comparing benevolence to the light of day, hath beautifully illustrated the efficacy in directing men's actions. By expelling ill-will, pride, anger, immoderate selfishness, and all other evil passions which are occasions of sin, love removes every stumbling-block lying in one's way, and enables him to do his duty to his neighbour with ease and pleasure.—Schismatics and heretics, on pretence of having attained to a greater knowledge of the truth, and a greater purity of conduct than others; think themselves authorized to hate and persecute those who differ from them in opinion and practice. But these persons, being void of the dispositions of the really illuminated, are not in the light, but stumble, or sin in their treatment of their brethren.—In the same manner, they who are severe in censuring the faults of others, or who aggravate them, and refuse to forgive them, being destitute of love, are not in the light, but are still in the darkness of ignorance and error; as the apostle remarks in the following verse.

Ver. 11. But he who hateth his brother is in the darkness, and walketh in that darkness.]—By representing a malevolent person as involved in the darkness of night, the apostle strongly expresseth the pernicious nature of malevolence. It blind's a man's reason to such a degree, that he doth not see what is right; it extinguisheth every virtuous inclination which would lead him to do what is right, and putteth him wholly under the power of anger and revenge: so that in this darkness he is in danger, not only of stumbling, but of destroying himself, 'not knowing whither he goeth.'

13 Little children,¹ I write to you, because sins are forgiven you (John, 112.) on account of his name. (Ess. iv. 51.)

13 Fathers,¹ I write to you, because ye have known (John, 72.) him² from the beginning. Young men, I write to you, because ye have overcome the wicked one. Young children,³ I write to you, because ye have known the Father.

14 Fathers, I have written to you, because ye have known him from the beginning. Young men, I have written to you, because ye are strong, and the word of God abideth in you, and ye have overcome the wicked one.

15 Love not the world, neither the things which are in the world.¹ If any one love the world, the love of the Father is not in him.

16 For all that is in the world,¹ the lust of the flesh,² and the lust of the eyes,³ and the pride of life,⁴ is not of the Father, but is of the world.⁵

17 Now, the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: But he who doth the will of God, abideth for ever.

12 Dear children, I write to you the precept which I shall mention immediately, (ver. 15.), because sins shall be forgiven you on account of Christ at the judgment, if ye repent and forsake your sins.

13 Old Christians, I write to you what follows, ver. 15. because ye have known Christ—his doctrine, and precepts, and manner of life—from the beginning, and must know, that what I am going to write is his precept. Vigorous Christians, I write to you the following precept, because ye have already overcome the wicked one, having resisted his strongest temptations to apostasy. New converts, I write to you the same precept, because, though ye have not seen Christ, ye have known the Father: Ye have known his willingness and power to strengthen you.

14 Old Christians, I have written to you to walk even as Christ walked, ver. 6., by loving your brethren as he loved you, ver. 8., because ye have known him from the beginning, and have been deeply affected with the knowledge of his love. Vigorous Christians, I have written the same precept to you, because ye are strong in all the Christian virtues through the word of God abiding in you, and ye have already overcome the devil.

15 What I write to you all is this: Do not love the persons and practices of the men of the world; neither the things which are in the world. If any one love the world—if he enters into friendship with idolaters and infidels, and is fond of the things which they pursue—the love of the Father is not in him.

16 For whatever evil affection subsists in idolaters and unbelievers, namely, the lust of the flesh after sensual pleasures; and the lust of the eyes after magnificence in houses, equipage, and dress; and the pride of life, founded on titles, offices, and riches—is not of the Father, but is of the world: These evil affections are not produced in us by the Father, but by the things of the world exciting them in us.

17 Now, the wicked men of the world shall perish, and the objects of their lust in like manner: But he who doth the will of God, by mortifying his worldly lusts, shall live happily for ever.

Ver. 12. Little children.]—Because this appellation is used, ver. 1. to denote Christians of all ages and characters, Beza supposeth that John here addressed the whole body of Christ's disciples, as their common instructor, (see ver. 1. note 1.) whom he afterwards divided into three classes. In support of Beza's opinion it may be observed, 1. That the word by which, in the distribution, the apostle expresses young Christians, is παιδία, and not νεανία. 2. That the reason which John assigns for writing to those whom he calls παιδία, little children, namely, that 'sins were forgiven them through Christ,' is applicable to the whole body of believers, and was a strong reason for such of them as John addressed to obey his precept, 'not to love the world,' &c.—Nevertheless, if the reading of ver. 13. to be mentioned in note 3. on that verse, is admitted, παιδία here will signify the same class of Christians with those designed by παιδία, ver. 13. And on that supposition the three classes into which the whole body of the disciples was distributed by John, will have been twice addressed by him.

Ver. 13.—1. Fathers, I have written to you.]—John gave the appellation of fathers to those who are called by the other apostles πρεσβυτέρους, seniores, elders, on account of their long standing in the Christian faith. The persons who were written to under this denomination, seem to have been of the number of the eye-witnesses who generally had the office of elders conferred on them. In this part of his letter, the apostle distributes the whole body of Christians into three classes, according to their different standings in the faith, and proficiency in the knowledge of the gospel; namely, παιδία, fathers, νεανία, young men, and παιδία, young children.—Fathers were the most ancient believers, who had made the greatest progress in knowledge and virtue: Young men were those in the greatest vigour of the spiritual life, and who were considered by the apostle as soldiers fighting under Christ, against the powers of darkness: Young children were the newly converted, who, being under a course of instruction, were called in the first age catechumens.

2. Because ye have known him from the beginning.]—So I translate ἐκ τῆς ἀρχῆς; because the article is often put for the pronouns ἐγώ and ἐγώ, see Ess. iv. 72.; also because the apostle is speaking of Jesus Christ, mentioned ver. 6.—If the reader does not admit this use of the article, he may consider the expression as elliptical, and may supply it in this manner: 'Because ye have known [Christ] ἐκ τῆς ἀρχῆς' Jesus from the beginning: 'have known his disengagement from the world, and his contempt of its riches, honours, and pleasures.'

3. Young children, I write to you.]—Several MSS., together with the Syriac version and some copies of the Vulgate, read here ἐγώ, 'I have written.' This reading, if it were well supported, might be preferred to the common reading, for the reason mentioned in the note on ver. 12.

Ver. 16. Love not the world, neither the things which are in the world.]—As the apostle distinguishes 'the world' from 'the things which are in the world,' it is probable that by the world he means the wicked men of the world, and by the things which are in the world, the bad principles and corrupt dispositions belonging to the men of the world. These, if they are the objects of admiration and love, have a powerful influence to seduce both the old and the young from the imitation of Christ, and to extinguish brotherly love or benevolent dispositions in the mind. See ver. 10. note 1.

Ver. 16.—1. For all that is in the world.]—Here, as in the preceding verse, the world signifies the men of the world. In this sense our Lord likewise used the word world, John xv. 19. 'If ye were of the world, the world would love his own: but because ye are not of the world, therefore the world hateth you.' So likewise St. Paul, Rom. xii. 2. 'Be not conformed to this world:' and our apostle, chap. v. 19. 'The whole world lieth under the wicked one.' Hence the evil one is called, John xii. 31. 'The prince of this world:' and Eph. ii. 2. 'The spirit who now inwardly worketh in the children of disobedience.' Wherefore, in the passage under consideration, the world is that collection of idolaters, unbelievers, and wicked men, which compose the great bulk of the inhabitants of the world. Whereas, if by the world we understand the earth, and by the things which are in the world the productions, whether of nature or of art, with which the earth is stored, it would not be true, that 'all which is in the world is not of the Father, but is of the world.' Besides, from what follows it is evident, that John is not speaking of the earth, but of the men of the world, whose lusts he describes.

2. The lusts of the flesh.]—This, as distinguished from 'the lust of the eye and the pride of life,' denotes those fleshly appetites which are gratified by the intemperate use of women, and wine, and meats.

3. The lust of the eyes.]—According to Lightfoot, this is concupiscentia, called, Matt. vi. 23. 'an evil eye.' But I rather think the apostle means an inordinate passion for magnificence in houses, furniture, equipage, and dress, which, because it is gratified by the eye, may fitly be called the lust of the eye.

4. And the pride of life.]—ἡ ἀλαζονεία τοῦ βίου, literally, jacontia vita—the boasting of life. John means all the things pertaining to this life, of which the men of the world boast, and by which their pride is gratified; such as titles, offices, lands, noble birth, honourable relations, and the rest, whose efficacy to puff up men with pride, and to make them insolent, is not of God.

5. Is not of the Father, but is of the world.]—These inordinate lusts do not, as wicked men pretend in excuse for their indulging them, proceed from the Father, but from the things of the world exciting the lusts and passions of wicked men, who are at no pains to restrain them. The Father hath stored this earth with objects suited to the natural desires which he hath implanted in men's minds; and the enjoyment of these objects is innocent, provided they are used in moderation. But inordinate desires, called by the apostle lusts, and their power to tempt men, proceed from the wicked themselves, through indulging their lusts without restraint: see James i. 13, 14.—Or, the meaning of the phrase οὐκ ἐστὶν ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς may be, that the lusts mentioned are not excited in us

18 *Young children, it is the last hour.*¹ And as ye have heard that the antichrist cometh,² (καὶ, 212.) so now there are many antichrists;³ whence we know that it is the last hour.

19 They went (ἐξ ἡμῶν) away from us,¹ but they were not (ἐξ ἡμῶν) of us: For, if they had been of us, they would have abode with us; but THEY WENT AWAY, that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us.

20 (καὶ, 205.) But ye have an unction¹ from the Holy SPIRIT,² (chap. iii. 24.), and know all things.

21 I have not written¹ to you because ye know not the truth, but because ye know it, and that no lie² is of the truth

22 Who is the liar,¹ but he who denieth that Jesus is the Christ? He is the antichrist, who denieth the Father and the Son.²

23 Whosoever denieth the Son, doth not acknowledge the Father.¹

24 Therefore, let what ye have heard from the beginning abide in you. If what ye have heard from the beginning abide in you, ye also shall abide in the Son and in the Father.

by the Father, but by the ruler of the darkness of this world. The apostle mentions the lusts of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, because these inordinate affections are the source of the greatest part of the wickedness which exists among men.

Ver. 18.—Young children, it is the last hour,—namely, of the duration of the Jewish church and state. God will soon destroy the Jewish commonwealth; so that the power of your persecutors will speedily be broken. Some, by 'the last hour,' understand the last hour of the world: But that none of the apostles foresaw the end of the present mundane system was at hand when they wrote their epistles, see proved in the 3d section of the Preface to 2 Thessalonians.

2. And as ye have heard that the antichrist cometh.]—The word antichristos, antichrist, is nowhere found but in John's first and second epistles. It may have two meanings. For, if the preposition anti, in antichristos, denotes in place of, the name will signify one who puts himself in the place of Christ; consequently antichrist is a false Christ: but if the preposition denotes opposition, antichrist is one who opposeth Christ.—The persons to whom this epistle was written, had heard of the coming of antichrist in both senses of the name. For the first sort of antichrists were foretold by our Lord, Matt. xxiv. 5. 'Many shall come in my name, saying I am Christ, and shall deceive many.' The second sort were foretold Matt. xxiv. 11. 'Many false prophets will arise, and deceive many.' From what John hath written, ver. 22, of this chapter, and chap. iv. 3. and 2 Epist. ver. 7. I am inclined to think, that by antichrist he means those false prophets or teachers, who were foretold by our Lord to arise about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, and who were now gone abroad. Some of these denied the humanity of Jesus Christ, others of them denied his divinity: and as both sorts opposed Christ, by denying the redemption of the world through his death, I suppose it is of them chiefly that John speaks in his epistles.—When the apostle mentions these false teachers collectively, he calls them the antichrist, in the singular number, as St. Paul called the false teachers collectively of whom he prophesied, 2 Thess. ii. 3. 'the man of sin'; but when John speaks of these teachers as individuals, he calls them many antichrists, in the plural number.

3. So now there are many antichrists.]—The preterite tense, ἦσαν, is used here to signify, not only the existence of many antichrists at that time, but also that there had been many antichrists who were gone off the stage.

Ver. 19.—They went away from us.]—Hence it is one of the marks of antichrist, that he had been once in the Christian church, and a teacher by profession, but had left it, or apostatized.

Ver. 20.—But ye have an unction.]—Under the law, persons called to offices, to the execution of which singular endowments were requisite, were anointed with perfumed oils, in token of God's conferring these endowments on them. In allusion to that ancient rite, John calls the communication of the spiritual gifts to the primitive Christians, especially the gift of discerning spirits, an unction, because it was an endowment bestowed by God for preventing the faithful from being deceived by false teachers, who, to gain the greater credit to their erroneous doctrine, falsely pretended to be inspired. Wherefore the apostle, knowing that many of the brethren 18 Young children, be not terrified by the rage of the unbelieving Jews: It is the last hour of the Jewish commonwealth. And as ye have heard that the antichrist, who denieth the appearing of Christ in the flesh, chap. iv. 3. cometh before the destruction of Jerusalem, so now there are many such antichrists; from which we know that it is the last hour of the Jewish state.

19 These antichrists, though they once professed themselves Christian teachers, went away from us on the pretence that Jesus is not the Christ. But they were not inspired like us; for if they had been inspired like us, they would have abode with us. But they were permitted to apostatize, that they might be made manifest that they were not inspired like us, and that their doctrine is false.

20 But there is little occasion to put you on your guard against these deceivers; ye have an unction from the Holy Spirit, whereby ye can know whether a teacher is really inspired, and whether his doctrine is true or false.

21 I have not written to you because ye know not the truth concerning the life of the Word in the flesh; but because ye knew it, and know likewise that none of the lies propagated by the false teachers concerning Christ is any part of the gospel.

22 Who is the false prophet foretold to come before the destruction of Jerusalem; but he who denieth that Jesus is the Christ or Son of God? He certainly is the antichrist, who denieth the Father's testimony concerning his Son, chap. v. 6. and the Son's testimony concerning himself, John x. 36.

23 Whosoever denieth Jesus to be the Son of God, doth not acknowledge the Father, who, at his baptism and transfiguration, declared him his Son.

24 Therefore, let what ye have heard us preach from the beginning, concerning the Word's being made flesh, abide in you. If what ye have heard from the beginning concerning that matter abide in you, ye also shall abide in the fellowship of the Son and of the Father, chap. i. 3.

to whom he wrote possessed the gift of discerning spirits, appealed to that gift as enabling them to detect the antichrists or false teachers who were gone abroad; and exhorted them, chap. iv. 1. 'not to believe every spirit, but to try the spirits whether they be of God; because many false prophets were gone forth into the world.'—See ver. 27. note, for a confutation of the pretensions of modern fanatics to inspiration, founded on the apostle's exhortation to try the spirits, and on his affirmation, that the persons to whom he wrote had an unction from the Holy Ghost, and knew all things.

2. From the Holy Spirit.]—So I supply and translate the clause καὶ ὑμεῖς ἔχετε τὴν ἁγίαν. Beza thinks that our Lord was meant here, because he is called, Acts iii. 14. 'The holy One, and the Lord.' But as Jesus himself is said to have been anointed with the Holy Ghost, Acts x. 38. I think the word ἁγίαν may be supplied here.

Ver. 21.—I have not written to you.]—Beza saith, the aorist ἔγραψα may be translated in the past time, because, when the brethren to whom his letter was sent read it, the writing of it would be past. But I rather think the apostle refers to what he had written in the preceding part of this letter, concerning the life of the Word in the flesh.

2. Because ye know it, and that no lie is of the truth.]—Lie here means a doctrine contrary to that taught by the apostles, which being the true doctrine, its contrary must be false, or a lie: or, it may be called a lie, because the teachers who propagated such doctrines knew them to be false, especially the doctrines which the antichrists propagated concerning the person and actions of Christ. They, therefore, in particular, are called the liar, ver. 22.

Ver. 22.—1. Who is the liar, but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ?—What is meant by denying 'that Jesus is the Christ,' see explained chap. iv. 2. note, and ver. 3. note 1.

2. He is the antichrist, that denieth the Father and the Son.]—Eusebius saith, the opinion of Irenæus is probable, who understood John as speaking here of the false teachers of his own time, who denied Christ to be the Son of God, and God to be the Father of Christ. See Pref. to John, sect. 3.

Ver. 23. Whosoever denieth the Son doth not acknowledge the Father.]—The expression in the original, ὁὐκ ὁμολογεῖ τὸν υἱόν, ὁὐκ ὁμολογεῖ τὸν πατέρα, is elliptical. We have it in its complete form Rom. i. 23. 'As they did not approve (οὐκ ὁμολογοῦντες τὸν θεόν) of holding God with acknowledgment;' that is, of acknowledging God. See note 2. on that verse. Wherefore οὐκ ὁμολογεῖ, in this passage, is rightly translated 'doth not acknowledge;' as is plain likewise from this, that acknowledging, here, is the opposite to denying, in the preceding clause. Accordingly in the Syriac it is, 'neque in patrem credit,—doth not believe on the Father.'

In our English Bible the following words, 'But he that acknowledgeth the Son, hath the Father also,' are printed in Italic letters, to shew that they are not in the common Greek copies. Beza, however, hath inserted them in his edition of the Greek Testament, on the authority of four ancient MSS., and of the Syriac and Vulgate versions. See Mill on this verse, who mentions a number of MSS. which have this clause. Eusebius reckoned it genuine; as did Doddridge: But I have omitted it, because it is wanting in the com-

Ver. 25. This is the promise which he hath promised to us, even the life which is eternal.]—Τὴν (αὐτὴν) being in the accusative case, and standing in opposition with ἐν, it is governed, as αὐτὴ is, by ἐκκεν-γισαμένῃ.—This promise John hath recorded in his gospel, chap. xvii. 1. 'Glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee. 2. As thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given him.'—From these words, so solemnly pronounced by Christ in an address to his Father, we learn, that the great end of his coming into the world was to glorify his Father, by procuring through his own death eternal life for all good men, and by bestowing it on them after his judgment. See chap. v. 10, note 1.

Ver. 26. These things I have written to you,]—namely, the things beginning ver. 18.

Ver. 27. And ye have no need that any one should teach you.]—Here two things claim the reader's attention:—1. That when John said to his disciples, 'ye have no need that any one should teach you,' his meaning was, that they had no need to be taught how to distinguish pretenders to inspiration from those who were really inspired. This the connexion sheweth plainly. 2. That the persons who had no need of this kind of teaching were those only who had an unction from the Holy Spirit. Wherefore, as it appears from 1 Cor. xii. 10. that the discerning of spirits was a gift bestowed, not on believers in general, but on some individuals only, it is evident, that when the apostle said, 'ye have an unction from the Holy Spirit,' his discourse was directed only to such as possessed the gift of discerning spirits: consequently he did not mean, that Christians in general had no need of being taught the doctrines of the gospel in the ordinary method; but that those who had received the unction from the Holy Ghost, needed nothing but to be directed or exhorted to judge of teachers pretending to inspiration, and of their doctrine, according as the unction which abode in them led them to judge; because that unction being a real gift, if they followed its suggestions, they would judge truly concerning all things; that is, concerning teachers and their doctrines.—From these things it is plain, that the Quakers and other fanatics, who, from what is said in this and in the preceding 20th verse, infer that all believers have still an unction or inspiration from the Holy Ghost, and hold that inspiration is superior to the scriptures, are in a most dangerous error, as they dignify the productions of their own disordered brain with the name of revelations of the Spirit. They likewise err greatly from the truth, who, on pretence that the inspiration of the Spirit is continued to believers in every age, contend that the outward ministry of the word, by pastors and teachers set apart to the office, and even the scriptures themselves, are unnecessary in the church. Holding such principles, is it any wonder that these enthusiasts and fanatics have fallen into the grossest extravagances and licentiousness?

Ver. 28.—1. Now, therefore, little children.]—The adverb νῦν is used here as an interjection of beseeching. The word μικροὶ, little children, comprehends the whole body of the disciples to whom this epistle was written, and whom John had before divided into three classes. See ver. 12, note, and ver. 13, note 1.

2. That when he shall appear.]—Φανερωθῆναι, being the term by which Christ's appearing in the flesh was expressed, chap. i. 2, note 2, when applied to Christ's second coming, it signifies that he shall then be the object of men's senses by means of his body, as he was at his first coming. See 1 Pet. i. 7, note 2.

Ver. 29.—1. Every one who worketh righteousness hath been begotten.]—This is the literal signification of γεννηθέντες, from γεννᾶν, genero, gigno, I beget. Accordingly, our translators have so rendered the word, chap. v. 18. Besides, born of God is an idea nowhere else found in scripture.

To understand the true import of the high titles which in the New Testament are given to the disciples of Christ; namely, the begotten of God, as here; the sons of God, and children of God, as in the next chapter; the heirs of God, Rom. viii. 17; the elect of God; the adopted of God; saints; a royal priesthood; an holy nation; a peculiar people, 1 Pet. ii. 9. the following observations may be of use.—1. That these high titles were anciently given to the Israelites as a nation, because they were separated from the rest of mankind to be God's visible church, for the purpose of preserving the knowledge and worship of him in the world, as the only true God. This appears from God's own words, Exod. xix. 3. 'Tell the children of Israel, 4. Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagle's wings, and brought you unto myself. 5. Now, therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people. 6. And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation.'—Deut. xiv. 1. 'Ye are the children of the Lord your God: 2. For thou art an holy people to the Lord thy God.'—2. In particular, the title of 'God's son, even his first-born,' was given to the whole Israelitish nation by God himself, Exod. iv. 22. chiefly because they were the descendants of Isaac, who was supernaturally begotten by Abraham through the power which accompanied the promise, Gen. xviii. 10. 'Lo Sarah shall have a son.' So St. Paul informs us Rom. ix. 7. 'Neither because they are the seed of Abraham are they all children,' namely, of God, 'but in Isaac shall a seed be to thee. 8. That is, the children of the flesh, these are not the children of God; but the children of the promise are counted for seed.' The apostle's meaning is, That Ishmael and his posterity, whom Abraham procreated by his own natural strength, being children of the flesh, were not the children of God; that is, they were not made the visible church and people of God. But Isaac and his descendants, whom Abraham procreated through the strength which accompanied the promise, 'Lo Sarah shall have a son,' being more properly procreated by God than by Abraham, were the children of God; that is, were made the visible church and people of God, because by their supernatural generation, and their title to inherit Canaan, they were a fit image of the catholic invisible church of God, consisting of believers of all ages and nations, who, being regenerated by the Spirit of God, are the true children of God, and heirs of the heavenly country of which Canaan was the type.—3. As the promise, 'Lo Sarah shall have a son,' which was given to Abraham when he was an hundred years old and Sarah was ninety, implied that that son was to be supernaturally procreated, so the promise given to Abraham, Gen. xvii. 5. 'A father of many nations I have constituted thee,' implied that the many nations of believers, who by this promise were given to Abraham for seed, were to be generated by the operation of the Spirit of God producing in them faith and obedience, similar to the faith and obedience for which Abraham was constituted the father of all believers.—This higher generation, by which believers have the moral nature of God communicated to them, is excellently described John i. 12. 'As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them who believe on his name. 13. (Οὗτοι υἱοὶ θεοῦ εἰσιν.) Which were begotten not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God; that is, men become the true sons of God, not by their being naturally descended from this or that father, nor by their being called the sons of God by men like themselves, but by God's bestowing on them that high appellation on account of their faith and holiness.

—4. If the Israelites, of whom the ancient visible church and people of God was composed, were all called the sons of God, because Isaac from whom they descended was supernaturally begotten by the power of God, certainly believers of all ages and nations, of whom the invisible catholic church and people of God is composed, may with much greater propriety be called the sons of God, since they are begotten of God, and possess the moral nature of God. This catholic invisible church of God is not limited to any one race of men, nor to any one age or country of the world. It hath subsisted from the beginning, and is scattered over the whole earth. But after the general judgment, the members of this widely extended church will be gathered together, and carried by Christ in a body into the heavenly country, their promised inheritance, of which Canaan, the inheritance of Abraham's natural seed by Isaac, was the emblem and pledge.

Thus it appears that the high titles above mentioned, namely, 'the sons of God, the children of God, the elect of God, the adoption of sons, the election, saints, a holy nation, a royal priesthood, and a peculiar people,' were anciently given to the Israelites as a nation, merely on account of their being the visible church and worketh righteousness hath been begotten of him. He is a son of God by partaking of his nature, and shall obtain that eternal life which God hath promised to his children, ver. 25.

people of God, without any regard to the personal character of the individuals of whom that nation was composed. Also it appears, that under the gospel the same high titles were bestowed on whole churches, merely on account of their profession of Christianity, without any regard to the personal character of the individuals who composed these churches. But these high titles, with some others of greater importance, such as 'the begotten of God, the heirs of God, the adoption,' were given in an appropriated sense to individuals likewise, on account of their faith and holiness. When given to whole churches, these titles imported nothing more but that the society to which they were given was a church of Christ, and that the individuals of which that society was composed were entitled to all the privileges belonging to the visible church and people of God. But when appropriated to individuals, these titles implied that the persons to whom they were given were really partakers of the nature of God, by possessing his moral qualities, and that they were the objects of his paternal love, and heirs of his felicity.—Wherefore, in reading the scriptures, by attending to the different foundations of these titles, and by considering whether they are applied to churches or to individuals, we shall easily understand their true import. Thus, when St. Paul, writing to the Thessalonians, saith, 1 Thess. i. 4. 'Knowing, brethren, beloved of God, your election,' he could not mean their election to eternal life, since many of them were living disorderly, 2 Thess. iii. 11. but their election to be the visible church and people of God, under the gospel dispensation. Whereas, when John saith, in the verse before us, 'Every one who doth righteousness hath been begotten of God,' by restricting the title to individuals of a specific character he teaches us, that the persons of whom he speaks are the sons of God in the highest sense, and heirs of eternal life. Accordingly, in the following chapter, he assures us that such shall see God.

2. Begotten of him.—ΕΓΓΕΝΕΤΟ. The relative αυτου stands here, not for Christ, though he be spoken of in the verse immediately preceding, but for God, of whom it is said 'that he is righteous.' For nowhere in scripture is Christ said to beget believers, nor is he ever called their father. These things are attributed to God only, or to the Spirit, as his agent. Accordingly, in the first verse of the following chapter, the apostle extols the love of the Father in making believers his sons.—That the relative often stands for a person or thing not mentioned before, see proved Eas. iv. 64.

Because in the following chapter the apostle describes the great honours and privileges of believers as the sons of God, Cajetan and Estius were of opinion that that chapter should have begun with this 29th verse.

CHAPTER III.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Chapter.

THE apostle, in the last verse of the preceding chapter, having declared that every one who worketh righteousness hath been begotten of God, and is his son, begins this chapter with an exclamation, expressive of his high admiration of the love of God in calling those who work righteousness his children, although they are not acknowledged to be such by the men of the world, because wicked men have no just notion of the character of God, ver. 1.—Then, to explain the ground of his admiration, he described the dignity and happiness to which the children of God will be raised, at the appearing of Christ to judge the world: They shall be like Christ, because they shall see him as he is, and shall live with him for ever, ver. 2.—Now, this being the greatest honour and felicity of which mankind are capable, every one who hath the hope of seeing Christ, and of becoming like him, and of living with him for ever, is careful to purify himself from evil affections and wicked actions, as Christ is pure, that he may be qualified to associate with Christ, ver. 3.—This naturally led the apostle to condemn a second time the impious doctrine of the Nicolaitans and Simonians, who affirmed, that every action being free to those who have the knowledge of God, such will not be punished for their actions, however vicious they may have been. See chap. i. 8. note. For, in opposition to these heretics, the apostle declared, that whoever worketh sin shall certainly be punished; because sin being a transgression of the law of God, without doubt God will support the authority of his law by punishing severely the transgressors of it, ver. 4.—Besides, that he will punish obstinate sinners God hath shewed, by sending his Son to take away the punishment of sin from those only who repent. For since the Son of God was free from sin himself, he would not die to procure for his disciples a liberty of sinning, ver. 5.—From this it follows, that whosoever abideth in the fellowship of Christ, and is the object of his love, doth not sin habitually. Whosoever sinneth habitually, though he may have seen Christ in the flesh, hath not seen him in his true character, neither hath known his will, ver. 6.—Wherefore, my beloved children, let no teacher deceive you, by affirming that the speculative belief of the gospel will make you righteous in the sight of God. He alone who habitually worketh righteousness, is righteous in the sight of God, and will be accepted with him; even as Christ himself was righteous, by keeping his Father's commandments, and abode in his love, ver. 7.—He who worketh sin, instead of being a child of God, is a child of the devil: for the devil hath sinned from the beginning of the world. Now, the evil nature of sin, and its hatefulness to God, may be known from this, that the Son of God was manifested in the flesh to destroy the works of the devil; namely, sin, and all the miseries which flow from sin, ver. 8.

Having described the character of the children of the devil, together with the evil nature of their works, the apostle explained the character of the children of God, and taught the faithful how to distinguish them from the children of the devil. Whosoever is begotten of God doth not sin habitually, because God's seed, the doctrine of the gospel, abideth and operateth in him constantly. Such a person cannot sin habitually, for this very reason, that he is begotten of God, ver. 9.—By this sure mark, therefore, the children of God and the children of the devil are distinguished. Whosoever doth not practise righteousness habitually is not begotten of God, neither he who doth not love his brother, so as both to do him good and to abstain from injuring him, ver. 10.—And to impress them strongly with a sense of the obligation which lay on them, as the disciples of Christ, thus to love their brethren, John put them in mind, that the message which the apostles brought from Christ, and delivered to them from the very first, was, that they should love one another, ver. 11.—and not behave like persons begotten of the wicked one, as Cain was, who slew his brother from envy and hatred, because his own works were evil and his brother's good, ver. 12.—Having this example of the hatred which the wicked bear to the righteous recorded in the scripture, the faithful were not to wonder that the wicked hated them. It hath been the lot of the righteous, from the beginning of the world, to be hated and persecuted of the wicked, ver. 13.—And to animate them to bear these evils courageously, he told them, if they loved their brethren, they might know certainly that they had passed from death to life—they were sure of eternal happiness hereafter; whereas the person who loveth not his brother, remaineth under the condemnation of death, ver. 14.—because every one who hateth his brother is a man-slayer, like Cain; and unless he repenteth, he is incapable of eternal life, ver. 15.—Further, to prevent them from thinking that the only operation of love is to restrain one from injuring his brother, the apostle told them, that as by this we have known the great love of Christ to us, that he laid down his life for us, we ought to shew our love to our brethren, by laying down our lives for them when called in providence to do so, ver. 16.—Whosoever, therefore, hath this world's goods, and seeth his brother in necessitous circumstances, and yet doth not give him somewhat to relieve him, such a hard-hearted person hath no love to God, ver. 17.—From this consideration, the apostle affectionately exhorted his disciples not to put off their needy brethren with good words only, but to shew the reality of their love to them by relieving their necessities, and even by doing them acts of beneficence, as occasions required, ver. 18.—For by such a conduct alone, they would know themselves to be of the fellowship of the true God, and would have confidence in his presence as his acceptable worshippers, ver. 19.—But if our own conscience condemneth us, as wanting in love both to God and man, because we refuse to relieve our needy brethren in their distress, certainly God, who is a more perfect and impartial Judge than our conscience, and knoweth all things, will much more condemn us, ver. 20.—Whereas, if our conscience doth not condemn us as deficient in love to our needy brethren, we may have confidence with God that we are accepted of him, and are the objects of his love, ver. 21.—And whatever we ask, agreeably to his will, we shall receive; because, by relieving our brethren in their straits, we keep his commandments, and do those things which are pleasing to him, ver. 22.—For this is his commandment, That we should believe on the name of Jesus Christ as his Son, and that we should love one another, as he gave commandment to us by his Son, ver. 23.—Now, he who keepeth God's commandments abideth in his fellowship, and God abideth in him, as the principle of his spiritual life and strength. And by this we know that God abideth in us, even by the gifts of the Spirit which he hath given us, ver. 24.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. III.—1 Behold how great love the Father hath bestowed on us Jews and Gentiles who work righteousness, chap. ii. 29. that we should be declared the children of God! Those who pretend to be the sons of the heathen gods, are readily acknowledged as such by idolaters. But for this reason the idolatrous world doth not acknowledge us as the sons of the true God, because it doth not acknowledge him.

2 Beloved, though despised and persecuted by the world, even now we are the children of God. But it doth not yet appear how glorious, both in body and mind, we the children of God shall be. However, we know, that when Christ shall appear to judge the world, ch. ii. 28., we shall become like him, Philip. iii. 21. for we shall see him as he is, and be for ever with him.

3 And every one who hath this hope of seeing Christ, and of being like him, and of living with him, is careful to purify himself from sin, even as he is pure from sin, that he may be fit to live with him for ever.

4 Every one who committeth sin habitually, committeth also the

Ver. 1.—1. Behold how great love.]—Παραδειγμα signifies both how great, and of what kind. Accordingly Estius translates it here Quantum et qualem.

2. That we should be called the children of God.]—Since God effectually makes us what he calls us, by calling believers his children, he certainly maketh them his children, and entitleth them to all the honours and privileges of his children.—The apostle having declared, in the last verse of the preceding chapter, that all who work righteousness are the begotten sons of God, he naturally thought of the great honours and advantages which belong to the begotten, or true sons of God; but, being dazzled with the grandeur of his own conceptions, and unable to express them in their whole extent, he cries, out, 'Behold how great love the Father hath bestowed on us, that we should be called the children of God!' One particular, however, he mentions in the following verse, which may serve to give us some notion of the felicity of the children of God; namely, that when Christ shall appear to reward every one according to his works, the children of God shall be like him.

Ver. 2.—1. We know that (ἐπεὶ ὁμοιωθήσονται, the subjunctive for the future) when he shall appear.]—I have followed our English translators in supplying the pronoun he before the words shall appear, to prevent the reader from taking ἐπεὶ ὁμοιωθήσονται impersonally, as Benson hath done, who translates the clause 'when it shall appear.'—In this passage the apostle evidently speaks of Christ's appearing to judge the world; for nowhere in scripture is God said to appear so as to be the object of men's sight. John iv. 12. 'No one hath seen God at any time.' I am therefore of opinion, that the nominative to ὁμοιωθήσονται is ὁ Χριστός, 'when Christ shall appear.'

2. We shall be like him;—namely, both in body and mind. For, Philip. iii. 21. 'He will re-fashion our humbled body, in order that it may become of like form with his glorious body.' And with respect to our mind, we shall be made like him in holiness, by seeing him as he is. We shall be like him in happiness also, for according to the measure of our capacity we shall partake of all the ineffable felicity which he possesses. In this perfection of body, and mind, and happiness, consisteth the true import of the phrase, 'joint heirs with Christ.'—Like him, doth not import equality, but similarity to Christ.

3. For we shall see him as he is:—We shall behold him in the glory which he now enjoyeth with the Father, and shall abide with him through all eternity. For the apostle doth not speak of a transient sight of Christ, but alludes to Christ's words which he hath recorded in his gospel, John xvi. 26. 'Father, I will that they also whom thou hast given me be with me where I am, that they may behold my glory which thou hast given me.'—That the apostle is speaking of an abiding sight of Christ, is plain, because a transient view would not be a reason for our being like him; whereas, if we are to live for ever with Christ, our bodies must be fashioned like to his; since corruptible bodies cannot inherit or enjoy the kingdom of God. And with respect to our minds, the seeing of Christ as he is cannot be supposed effectual for making us like him, unless it is an abiding sight, which, by fostering in our minds strong desires, and exciting us to continued endeavours to become like Christ in his moral excellencies, will assuredly produce that happy effect.—At the judgment, the wicked are to have a transient sight of Christ as he is, but they will not thereby be made like him, either in body or mind.

Ver. 3.—1. Every one who hath this hope (of seeing Christ and of being like him) purifieth himself.]—The felicity which the gospel teacheth us to expect in the world to come, is not that of a Mahometan paradise, in which animal pleasures are the chief enjoyments. The happiness of the children of God in the kingdom of their Father, will consist in being like Christ, not only in respect of his immortality, but in respect of his transcendent virtues; especially his boundless benevolence. And the joy which will flow from the possession and exercise of virtues similar to Christ's is so great, that no one who hopes to become like Christ in virtue and happiness, will indulge himself in the unrestrained enjoyment of sensual pleasures; but will purify himself from the immoderate desire of these pleasures, in imitation of Christ, who, while on earth, was dead to sensual pleasure.

2. Purifieth himself;—namely, from the lusts of the flesh, and from every sin.—The apostle, as Beza observes, doth not say, 'hath purified himself, but purifieth himself;' to shew that is a good man's constant study to purify himself, because in this life no one can attain to perfect purity. By this text, therefore, as well as by 1 John i. 8. (see the note there), those fanatics are condemned who imagine they are able to live without sin.

Ver. 4.—1. Every one who worketh sin.]—So ἐργάζεται τὸ ἁμαρτάν should be translated; for ἐργάζεται denotes continued action. Hence it is applied to a tree's producing fruit, Matt. iii. 8. 10. and to a fountain's sending forth its water continually, James iii. 12. The meaning therefore is, he who worketh sin as one worketh in a trade or occupation. This sense of the word should be attended to, because he will not be sensible of the justness of the apostle's reasoning in this and the following part of the chapter, particularly ver. 6. where he saith, whosoever abideth in him doth not sin, unless we know that he is speaking of habitual sin. See ver. 6. note 1.

the transgression of law:² For sin is the transgression of law.

5 (Kai, 224.) Moreover, ye know that he was manifested that he might take away¹ our sins: And sin is not in him.²

6 Whosoever abideth in him (chap. ii. 6. note 1.) doth not sin.¹ Whosoever sinneth hath not seen him, neither hath known him.²

7 Little children, let no one deceive you;¹ He who worketh righteousness is righteous,² even as he is righteous. (Chap. ii. 29.)

8 He who worketh sin (see ver. 4. note 1.) is of the devil; for the devil sinneth from the beginning.¹ For this purpose the Son of God was manifested,² that he might destroy the works of the devil.³

9 Whosoever hath been begotten of God (chap. ii. 29. note 1.) doth not work sin;¹ because his seed abideth in him;² and he cannot sin,³ because he hath been begotten of God.

10 By this the children of God are discovered, and the children of the devil: whosoever worketh not righteousness, is not BEGOTTEN (from ver. 9.) of God; neither he who loveth not his brother.¹

2. Worketh also the transgression of law.]—ἁμαρτία properly signifies a want of conformity to law, consequently might be translated lawlessness. Accordingly ἁμαρτία, 1 Tim. i. 9. is translated in our Bible the lawless.—The apostle's meaning is, that no one should think lightly of his sins, because every sin, even the least, being a violation of the law of God, if not repented of, will most certainly be punished. The Nicolaitans and other heretics in the first age, fancying that knowledge sanctified the worst actions, affirmed that no man who possessed knowledge will be punished for any action whatever. See Pref. sect. 3. at the end. In opposition to this pernicious doctrine the apostle declared, that as the malignity of sin lieth in its being a transgression of the law of God, to maintain the authority of his own government, God will most certainly punish him who worketh the transgression of law; that is, who continueth to transgress his law.

Ver. 5. He was manifested that he might take away our sins.]—In the Old Testament, 'to take away sin,' signifies to procure the pardon of sin: and in this sense the phrase is used John i. 29. 'Behold the Lamb of God, (ἀμνός, tollens) who taketh away the sin of the world;' and 1 Peter ii. 24. 'Who his own self (ἑαυτοῦ, lifted up) bare our sins in his own body on the tree.' See the note on that verse. But in this passage John seems to affix a more enlarged meaning to the phrase take away our sins, agreeably to the sense of the word, ἁμαρτία, which signifies to lift off a load of any kind with which one is oppressed. For, by the manner in which he introduces the phrase, his meaning in it appears to be, that Christ was manifested in the flesh, and died, for the purpose of taking away the power as well as punishment of sin. This likewise is the doctrine of Paul, Tit. ii. 14. 'Gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify to himself a peculiar people zealous of good works.' The assured hope of pardon, which men derive from the knowledge of the atonement made for sin by the death of Christ, being a strong encouragement to sinners to repent, John on that, as on many other accounts, saith, Christ by his death hath taken away our sins; and so, like the other apostles, he hath built the necessity of holiness on the doctrine of the atonement.

2. And sin is not in him.]—If so, our likeness to him consisteth in our ceasing from sin.

Ver. 6.—1. Whosoever abideth in him doth not sin.]—Here οὐκ ἁμαρτάνει signifies 'doth not sin habitually'; as is plain from ver. 9. where it is said by way of explication, 'whosoever is begotten of God (ὁ ἀληθινὸς υἱὸς τοῦ πατρὸς) doth not work sin; doth not continue in the practice of sin. See ver. 4. note 1.

2. Whosoever sinneth hath not seen him, neither hath known him.]—Probably some of the heretical teachers condemned by the apostle in this epistle, to make their disciples believe that their opinions were derived from Christ, boasted of their having seen and conversed with him during his ministry on earth; consequently that they knew his doctrine perfectly. But the apostle assured his children, that if these teachers who avowedly continued in sin, had ever seen or conversed with Christ, they had utterly mistaken both his character and his doctrine.

Ver. 7.—1. Let no one deceive you.]—This implies that some pretenders to inspiration had endeavoured to deceive the brethren by teaching what the apostle here condemneth. And being a solemn address to John's disciples, it shows the importance of the matter which it intrencheth.

2. He who worketh righteousness is righteous.]—Ὁ δίκαιος, see transgression of law habitually: For sin is the transgression of law and will be severely punished, whatever the false teachers may pretend.

5 Moreover, ye may know the certainty of the punishment of sin from this, that the Son of God was manifested in the flesh, that he might take away both the power and the punishment of our sins. And as sin is not in him, he hath procured for no one a liberty of sinning.

6 Whosoever abideth in the love and fellowship of Christ, doth not sin habitually. Whosoever sinneth habitually, though he may have seen Christ in the flesh, hath not seen him in his true character, neither hath known his will.

7 Beloved disciples, let no false teacher deceive you, by affirming that the speculative belief of the doctrines of the gospel will constitute you righteous: He alone who habitually performs good works is righteous, even as God himself is righteous, by doing righteously.

8 He who committeth sin habitually, is begotten of the devil; (see ver. 12. note 1.); for the devil hath sinned from the beginning of the world. But for this purpose the Son of God was manifested in the flesh, that he might destroy the works of the devil, namely, sin and punishment, ver. 5.

9 Whosoever hath been begotten of God, being renewed in his nature, doth not commit sin habitually; because God's seed of the word abideth in him: and he cannot sin habitually; because he hath been begotten of God, and possesseth the moral qualities of his Father.

10 By this sure mark the children of God are discovered, and the children of the devil: whosoever doth not habitually perform good works, is not begotten of God; neither he who loveth not his brother with a real affection. Such, instead of being begotten of God, are begotten of the devil.

ver. 4. note 1.—The apostle doth not mean, that to be righteous in the sight of God it is necessary that one be perfectly righteous; but that to be accounted righteous by God, we must endeavour to work righteousness habitually. This kind of righteousness, consisting in sincere endeavours followed by a corresponding general practice, believers, with the assistance of the Spirit of God, may and do attain; but it is not a perfect righteousness, otherwise their salvation would not be of grace, but of debt.

Ver. 8.—1. For the devil sinneth from the beginning.]—that is, hath sinned. For as the present tense denoteth continuation of action, it implieth what is passed of that action as well as what is present.—The devil sinned at the beginning when he entered into the body of a serpent, or assumed the appearance of a serpent, and seduced our first parents to eat the forbidden fruit: and he hath continued to sin ever since, by tempting mankind to sin.

2. For this purpose the Son of God was manifested.]—Ἐπεὶ οὕτως. See 1 Pet. i. 7. note 2. 1 John ii. 28. note 2. The Son of God was manifested; that is, was made the object of men's senses by being clothed with flesh. For if he had not been clothed with flesh, he could not have done and suffered what was necessary for destroying the works of the devil.

3. That he might destroy the works of the devil.]—Ἄρα, demolish that horrible fabric of sin and misery, which the devil with such art, and industry, and malice, hath reared in this our world. From this text some have argued, that all moral and penal evil will at length be extirpated from the universe.

Ver. 9.—1. Whosoever is begotten of God doth not work sin.]—See ver. 4. note 1. By translating οὐκ ἁμαρτάνει 'doth not work sin,' according to the true import of the phrase, the argument drawn from this text, to prove the sinless perfection of the saints in the present life, is precluded.

2. Because his seed abideth in him.]—The word of God is called, 1 Pet. i. 23. 'the incorruptible seed by which we are regenerated.' This seed is said by John to abide in those who are begotten of God, perhaps in allusion to Paul. cxix. 11. 'I have hid thy word in my heart, that I sin not against thee.'—Or by the seed of God the apostle may mean, that principle of faith which is wrought by God in the hearts of believers; and by which they are said, chap. v. 4. to obtain the victory over the world.

3. And he cannot sin, (namely habitually); because he hath been begotten of God.]—That οὐ δύναται ἁμαρτάνειν signifieth 'he cannot sin habitually,' is plain from the reason subjoined, 'because he hath been begotten of God.' For since the apostle in the beginning of the verse had said, 'whosoever hath been begotten of God (ὁ ἀληθινὸς υἱὸς τοῦ πατρὸς) doth not work sin, because his seed abideth in him.' It is evident, that when he saith in this clause, οὐ δύναται ἁμαρτάνειν or οὐκ ἁμαρτάνει, he uses the word ἁμαρτάνειν in the sense of ἁμαρτάνειν.—That John did not mean in this verse to say of them who have been begotten of God, nor in ver. 6. of them who abide in Christ, that they never commit single acts of sin, I think is plain from chap. i. 8. where he affirms of all without exception. 'If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth of God is not in us.'—On verses 6, 8, 9, 10. of this chapter, Jovinian and Pelagius founded their doctrine, that a good man may live without sin. But these texts, according to their true meaning, give no countenance to such a doctrine.

Ver. 10. Neither he who loveth not his brother.]—Although in the first age, the disciples of Christ called each other brethren, I

11 For this is the message which ye have heard from the beginning, That we should love one another;

12 Not BEING BEGOTTEN¹ of the wicked one, as Cain was, (see, 219.) who slew his brother. And on account of what did he slay him? Because his own works were wicked, and his brother's righteous.

13 Do not wonder, my brethren, (see, 127.) that the world hateth you.

14 We know that we have passed away from death to life,¹ because we love the brethren:² He who loveth not HIS brother, abideth in death.³

15 Every one who hateth his brother is a man-slayer:¹ and ye know that no man-slayer hath eternal life² abiding in him.

16 By this we have known the love of God, that (see, 208.) he laid down his life for us:¹ (see, 208.) therefore we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren.²

17 Whosoever, therefore, hath the goods of this world,¹ and seeth his brother having need, (see, 211.) and yet shutteth up his bowels from him,² how abideth the love of God³ in him?

18 My little children, let us not love in word nor in tongue ONLY,¹ but in deed and in

11 For this is the message which Christ brought from his Father to mankind, and which ye have heard us apostles repeat from the beginning, That we all should love one another:

12 Not being begotten of the wicked one, as Cain was, who from envy and malice slew his brother. And on account of what did he slay him? Because his own works were wicked, and his brother's righteous: and he could not bear that his brother's sacrifice was accepted of God, while his own was rejected.

13 Do not wonder, my brethren, that the wicked men of the world hate you. To be hated by the wicked, hath been the lot of the righteous from the beginning.

14 The hatred of the wicked is not to be regarded by us; for we know that we have passed away from a state of death to a state of life, because we love the brethren. He who loveth not his brother is in a state of condemnation.

15 Every one who hateth his brother is really a man-slayer, as he is in a disposition to take away his brother's life on every provocation: And ye know that no man-slayer hath the capacity of eternal life abiding in him.

16 By this we have known the love of God to us, that his Son by his appointment laid down his life for us. Therefore, instead of hating and injuring our brethren, we ought, after Christ's example, from love to lay down our lives for mankind, and especially for the brethren, when called to do so.

17 Whosoever, therefore, hath the good things of this world, and seeth his brother in need of them, and yet shutteth up his bowels from him, by refusing to give him what is necessary for his present support, how can a sense of the love which God shewed to us be said to abide in such a man?

18 My dear children, let us not love our needy brethren in word nor in tongue only, by giving them nothing but fair speeches; but think the word brother in this passage signifies mankind in general, who are all brethren by virtue of their common nature and their descent from Adam. It is true, the brethren, ver. 14. are our Christian brethren. Nevertheless, since the apostle hath said in the following ver. 15. 'Every one who hateth his brother is a man-slayer,' it is evident that in this discourse the word brother is to be taken in its enlarged sense.—Besides, when he tells us, ver. 17. 'Whosoever hath the goods of this world, and seeth his brother having need, and shutteth up his bowels from him,' we cannot suppose him to be speaking of our Christian brethren only. See chap. iv. 7. note, where a reason is assigned for John's pressing so frequently and earnestly the love of our brethren of mankind.

Ver. 12.—1. Not being begotten of the wicked one.]—Οὐκ ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ is an elliptical expression, which must be completed by supplying the word παιδαγωγεῖται, not having been begotten, as is evident from ver. 9. where the phrase is in its complete form; and from ver. 10. where it is said of those who do not work righteousness, that they 'are not of God,' that is, are not begotten of God. Besides, if wicked men are children of the devil, ver. 10. they may with great propriety be said to have been begotten by him. In representing wicked men as children of the devil, John hath followed his Master, John viii. 44. 'Ye are of your father the devil, and the lusts of your father ye will do.'

2. And (ἀγαπᾷ) supply (κατα) on account of what did he slay him?

Ver. 14.—1. We have passed away from death to life.]—Here it is insinuated that all mankind, as sinners, are under the condemnation of death. Oblique expressions, as Doddridge observes, convey truths like this in a manner both convincing and affecting.

2. Because we love the brethren.]—According to our apostle, the surest mark by which we can know our state, is to consider whether we possess that characteristic disposition towards our brethren which the Christian religion enjoins. The high encomium passed in this and the following verses on love to mankind, is not to be so understood as if no virtue but benevolence were necessary to complete the Christian character. The virtues have all such a connexion with each other, that they cannot subsist separately. And, therefore, if one really loveth his brethren of mankind, he will not only be charitable to the poor, but he will be just in his dealings, true to his promises, faithful in all the trusts committed to him. In short, he will carefully abstain from injuring his neighbour in any respect, and will perform every duty he oweth to him from a sincere principle of piety towards God, whereby his whole conduct will be rendered uniformly virtuous.

3. Abideth in death.]—In this expression John, I think, alludeth to our Lord's words, John iii. 18. 'He who believeth not is condemned already.'

Ver. 15.—1. Whosoever hateth his brother is a man-slayer.]—So I translate ἀνδραπολέω, because a man-slayer differs from a murderer, in the same manner as man-slaughter differs from murder. The hatred of one's brother may be the occasion by accident of putting him to death; for he who indulgeth hatred to his brother, lays himself open to the influence of such passions as may hurry him to slay his brother. So our Lord tells us, in his explication of the precept 'Thou shalt not kill,' Matt. vi. 21. For he mentions causeless anger and provoking speeches as violations of that commandment, because they are often productive of murder.

2. And ye know that no man-slayer hath eternal life abiding in him.]—No person who cherisheth such a hatred of his brother, as either leadeth him actually to put his brother to death unjustly, or disposeth him to put him to death when accidentally enraged, hath the capacity of eternal life abiding in him. This the apostle affirmeth with the greatest truth; because the person who is a man-slayer in either of the senses just now described, being destitute not only of natural good dispositions, but of religion, he is without doubt incapable of eternal life. Nevertheless, if a man-slayer sincerely repenteth, he may be pardoned.

Ver. 16.—1. By this we know the love of God, that (ἐπειδὴ) he laid down his life for us.]—ἐπειδὴ being the relative pronoun by which the Greeks expressed the remote antecedent, it stands in this passage for the Son of God, mentioned ver. 8. On this supposition the apostle alludes to Christ's words, John iii. 16. 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish.'—Many MSS. and versions read here τὸν υἱόν, without τὸν Θεόν. This reading Mill and others have adopted in their printed editions of the Greek New Testament, as genuine; supposing that the love of which the apostle speaks is the love of Christ. But the reading which our translators have followed is supported by chap. iv. 10. where the love which was manifested by sending Christ as a propitiation, is evidently God's love. Nevertheless, as the common printed editions want the words τὸν Θεόν, I have marked them in the new translation as supplied.

2. Therefore we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren;]—namely, from love to God, in return for his great love in sending Christ to lay down his life for us.—Many cases may be mentioned, in which Christian benevolence requires us to hazard our lives, and even to undergo death, for the benefit of mankind. 'Pulchrum est pro patria mori,' was a maxim among the heathen moralists. It is often esteemed praiseworthy to suffer torture, and even death, rather than divulge an important secret, the discovery of which might occasion the destruction of a confederacy for delivering one's country from slavery. Nay, the affection which subsists among near relations will lead them, at the hazard of their lives, to attend and comfort one another, when infected with the plague and other contagious distempers.

Ver. 17.—Whosoever, therefore, hath (τὸν εὖν τοῦ καρποῦ) the goods of this world.]—The word εὖν signifies, not only one's natural life, but the means of supporting that life, and even the conveniences of it; consequently, one's goods and possessions.

2. And shutteth up his bowels from him.]—In scripture, bowels signify the affections of love and pity, Eccl. iv. 34. The apostle's meaning is, doth not exercise pity towards him.

3. How abideth the love of God in him?]—In the preceding verse the apostle saith, 'By this we know the love of God, that he (Christ) laid down his life for us,' and observeth, that the consideration of God's love to us should induce us so to love him, as at his call to lay down our lives for our brethren. Here he tells us, that if, so far from laying down our lives for the brethren, we refuse them, when in need, some part of our worldly goods to support their lives, the love of God can in no sense be said to abide in us.

Ver. 18. Let us not love in word, nor in tongue only.]—I have added the word only, because the apostle cannot be supposed to forbid our using affectionate speeches to our brethren in distress. But he truth.

19 (Kai, 207.) For by this we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts' before him.

20 (Oti, 253. 2.) But if our heart condemn us, (or, 260.) certainly God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things.

21 Beloved, if our heart doth not condemn us, we have (παρρησιας, Heb. x. 19. note 1.) confidence (ως) with God.¹

22 And whatever we ask we receive¹ from him, because we keep his commandments, and work the THINGS which are pleasing in his sight.

23 (Kai, 207.) For this is his commandment, That we should believe on his Son Jesus Christ, and should love one another, as he gave commandment to us.

24 (Kai, 204.) *Now, he who keepeth his commandments abideth in him, and he in him: and by this we know that he abideth in us, EVEN by the Spirit which he hath given to us.*² forbiddeth us to content ourselves with these, when it is in our power to succour them with money, or food, or clothes.

Ver. 19. An I shall assure our hearts. — Bengelius translates πιστις μεν ταυς καρδιαις, pacabimus, 'shall pacify our hearts,' that is, shall restrain our hearts or consciences from accusing us as deficient in love to God, and to our brethren.

Ver. 21. Beloved, if our heart doth not condemn us, we have confidence with God. — If to this it be objected, that wicked men may have hardened their consciences to such a degree that they do not condemn themselves, and yet they cannot from that circumstance justly have confidence with God, the answer is, the confidence of which the apostle speaks is not the confident expectation of salvation; for that cannot be built on our hearts not condemning us as deficient in charity to the poor; but it is confidence with God as having done our duty to the poor. This sort of confidence, men wicked in other respects may have, who perform charitable actions from the natural feelings of humanity, while in the mean time they are not truly virtuous. Or the objection may be removed, by understanding the apostle as speaking of men's hearts not condemning them on account of their not having performed works of charity from a right principle, namely, from love to God, mentioned ver. 19. and from the love of goodness itself. For in that case a man may have confidence with God that he is of the fellowship of the truth, ver. 19. and may confidently expect salvation. This I take to be the apostle's meaning, from his adding, ver. 22. 'And whatever we ask we receive from him, because we keep his commandments,' &c. Others think the apostle is speaking of men's conscience not condemning them as guilty of any habitual sin.

Ver. 22. And whatever we ask we receive from him; — that is, shall receive; for the present tense is often used for the future, to shew the certainty of the thing spoken of. — This general declaration must be limited by the conditions, which, in other passages of scripture, are made necessary to our petitions being granted by God: such as, that we ask things agreeable to his will, 1 John v. 14, 15. and that we ask them in faith, James 1. 6.; that is, in the full per-let us love them in deed and in truth, by relieving them in their straits.

19 For by this behaviour alone we can know that we are of the fellowship of the true God, and shall assure ourselves in his presence, that we worship him acceptably. See ver. 21.

20 But if our conscience condemneth us as deficient in love to our needy brethren, certainly God, who is a more perfect and impartial judge than our conscience, and knoweth all our actions, will much more condemn us.

21 Beloved, to shew you what an excellent virtue benevolence is, I tell you a second time, (ver. 19.), that if our conscience doth not condemn us as deficient in love to our needy brethren, we have confidence with God that we have so far performed our duty to them.

22 And whatever blessings we ask, agreeably to his will, we shall receive; because, by loving our brethren, and relieving them in their straits, we keep his commandments, and do the things which are pleasing in his sight.

23 For this is God's commandment, That we should believe on Jesus Christ as his Son sent into the world to save us, and that we should love one another in truth, as Christ gave commandment to us, chap. iv. 21.

24 Now, as I said concerning fellowship with Christ, chap. iii. 6. so I say concerning fellowship with God, He who keepeth his commandments, abideth in his fellowship, and God abideth in him as the principle of his spiritual life. By this we know that God abideth in us, even by the gifts of the Spirit which he hath given to us.

suasion of the divine wisdom and goodness, and with sincerity and resignation. Such prayers they who keep the commandments of God may hope will be heard, because they keep his commandments by habitually doing the things which are pleasing to him.

Ver. 24.—1. He who keepeth his commandments abideth in him, and he in him. — This is an allusion to our Lord's words, John xiv. 23. 'If a man love me, he will keep my words: and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him.' See 1 John ii. 6. note 1. The apostle's meaning is, that by keeping God's commandments we obtain fellowship with the Father, as well as with his Son Jesus Christ: We have the most intimate society and friendship with the Father and the Son, and are made unspeakably happy by their love. Of this fellowship John had spoken before, chap. i. 3. note 2.

2. By this we know that he abideth in us, even by the Spirit which he hath given to us. — If John is here speaking of the apostles and other ministers of the word, who had the gift of inspiration and miracles bestowed on them, his meaning will be, that by these miraculous gifts they were perfectly assured of their being authorized by God to preach the gospel; and that, by their continuance with them, they knew God approved of their conduct as the apostles of his Son. — If John is speaking here of ordinary Christians, 'the Spirit which he hath given to them' denotes the ordinary influences of the Spirit renewing their nature, sanctifying their wills, and directing their actions; and his meaning will be, that by these influences producing in them a thorough renovation of their nature, and leading them to obey God's commandments habitually, they know assuredly that they are in fellowship with God, and that God abides with them by the influences of his Spirit, and by the communications of his love. Hence St. Paul told the Romans, chap. viii. 16. 'The Spirit itself beareth witness together with our spirit, that we are children of God.' See however 1 John iv. 13. where the sentiment in the verse under our consideration is repeated, in such a manner as to lead us to think the apostle is speaking of the miraculous gifts of the Spirit.

CHAPTER IV.

View and Illustration of the Precepts and Doctrines inculcated in this Chapter.

BECAUSE the Gnostics and other heretics, in the first age, to gain the greater credit to their erroneous doctrines, assumed to themselves the character and authority of inspired teachers, (Pref. sect. 3. at the end), John put his disciples in mind, chap. ii. 27. that they had an unction from the Holy Spirit, by which they were enabled to judge with certainty both of teachers and of their doctrine. He therefore, in this chapter, commanded the disciples in general, not to believe rashly every teacher who pretended to be inspired; and exhorted such of them as were endowed with the gift of discerning spirits, to try the inspiration by which any teacher pretended to speak, whether it was from God or from evil spirits, that after trial they might make their real character known to the church, because many false teachers and pretenders to inspiration were gone forth into the world, ver. 1. — However, because a number of the brethren whom these teachers addressed had not themselves the gift of discerning spirits, and perhaps had not an opportunity of consulting any spiritual man who possessed that gift, the apostle, to secure them from being deceived by impostors, desired them in such cases to consider, whether the teacher who came to them pretending to be inspired, held the great and fundamental doctrine, which all the teachers really inspired of God maintained, namely, 'That Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh.' For if any teacher, calling himself inspired, taught that doctrine, his inspiration might be acknowledged to be from God, ver. 2.—On the other hand, such inspired teachers as did not hold that doctrine, were not inspired of God, but of the devil, and were the antichrists or deceivers foretold by Christ to come before the destruction of Jerusalem, ver. 3.—Moreover, to encourage such of the disciples as had not the gift of discerning spirits to try every teacher pretending to inspiration by the marks which he had mentioned, the apostle observed, that some of the brethren being rightly instructed of God, had already, by applying these marks properly, detected and confuted certain impostors who had come to them, ver. 4.—who, being worldly men, spake from worldly principles, and were listened to by those wicked men who resembled them in their corrupt maxims and practices, ver. 5.—From this, John took occasion to mention another mark by which the disciples might distinguish teachers really inspired, from those who were not so. We apostles, said he, are proved to be from God by the miracles which we perform. Therefore, every teacher who is instructed of God acknowledgeth our authority; but the teacher who is not from God rejecteth our authority. By this mark also ye may know what teachers speak by the inspiration of the Spirit of God, and what by the inspiration of evil spirits, ver. 6.

Having thus taught the brethren how to distinguish the real inspirations of the Spirit of God, both from those which were feigned, and from those which came from evil spirits, the apostle, in an oblique manner, condemned those heretical teachers who made the whole of a Christian's duty to consist in the speculative knowledge of God without any regard to a right practice. For he enjoined mutual love on all Christians, from these considerations, that it deriveth its origin from God, and that every one who loveth his brother, and no one else, hath been begotten of God, and knoweth God, ver. 7.—Withal, that his affirmation might make the deeper impression on his readers, the apostle, according to his manner, denied its contrary: He, said he, who doth not love his brother, whatever he may pretend, doth not know God; for God is love, ver. 8.—and by this manifested his love to us, even by sending his Son, the only begotten, into the world, made flesh, that we might live eternally through him, ver. 9.—Farther, the apostle observed that God greatly enhanced his love to men in sending his Son to save them, by this circumstance, that they did not love God first, but he loved them so exceedingly that he gave his Son to die as a propitiation for their sins, ver. 10.—And from this he inferred, that if God so loved them, they ought from love and gratitude to him to love one another, ver. 11.—Next he told them, that although no man hath seen God at any time, because he is not an object of men's senses, yet if we love one another, God really abideth in us by virtue of his nature communicated to us; and by that great blessing, the love which he bears to us is carried to perfection, ver. 12.—Now, because the sending of Christ into the world to die a propitiation for the sins of men, was the greatest evidence of God's love to them, the apostle, to give us the fullest assurance of that fact, appealed to the miraculous gifts of the Spirit, with which he and his brethren who affirmed it to the world were endowed, as clear proofs, that in declaring that fact they were authorized by God. By this, said he, we apostles know that we abide in him, and he in us; that is, that we continue faithful to him in all our doctrines, and that he authorizes our preaching; namely, that he hath bestowed on us, and never withdrawn from us, the gifts of his Spirit, ver. 13.—Now, both before and after his resurrection, we beheld the Son of God in the flesh, and bear witness that the Father hath sent his Son a Saviour of the world; and our testimony is rendered indubitable, by the miracles which we perform, ver. 14.—From these things John drew this inference: Every teacher who confesseth and teacheth that Jesus is the Son of God sent into the world a Saviour, God abideth in him and he in God; the true doctrine of God abideth in such a teacher, and he abideth faithful to God by preaching it, ver. 15.

Having thus taught the disciples to distinguish true from false teachers by their doctrine, and by their obedience to the apostles, John also taught them to distinguish teachers by their different dispositions and actions. Having known, said he, what the Son of God did in the flesh for the salvation of the world, we apostles have attained the clearest conception and the firmest persuasion of God's great love to men, and are sensible that God is love itself. Wherefore, every teacher who habitually cherisheth love to mankind, and doth all the good in his power to others, abideth in God; he partaketh of the nature of God. And God abideth in him by the communications of his grace and love. This, likewise, is a sure mark by which ye may know a teacher who is really inspired of God, ver. 16.—For by this knowledge of the love which God bears to mankind, and of God's being himself love, which every teacher commissioned of God hath attained, the love of mankind is carried to perfection in his heart, and operates in his actions; so that such a teacher can have boldness at the judgment, because he is conscious that as God is love, so he exercised love to his brethren while he abode in this world, ver. 17.—No fear of the judgment accompanies love to God, and to mankind, carried to perfection. But perfect love casts out of one's mind all fear of the judgment, which is a tormenting passion. Therefore if any teacher, or private Christian, is afraid of the judgment, he is not perfected in love to God and to man; on which account he is greatly to blame, ver. 18.—All rightly instructed persons love God ardently, and shew their love to him by loving mankind, because, as I told you, ver. 10. he first loved us, ver. 19.—Wherefore, if any teacher saith, Certainly I love God, and yet hateth his brother, he is a liar: he is a deceiver if he is a teacher, and if in a private station he is an hypocrite: for he who loveth not his brother, whose good qualities he hath seen, cannot possibly love God, who is not the object of any of his senses, and whose perfections he cannot know but by reasoning, ver. 20.—Love to mankind is an essential part of the character, not only of a teacher, but of a private Christian; for this commandment we have from Christ, that he who loveth God, love his brethren of mankind also, ver. 21.

COMMENTARY.

CHAP. IV.—1 Beloved, since some of you possess the gift of discerning spirits, do not rashly believe every teacher who pretendeth to be inspired, but try those teachers, whether they be really sent from God; because many false prophets are gone forth into the world, with an intention to draw disciples after them.

2 By this mark, such of you as have not the gift of discerning spirits, may know the Spirit of God in a teacher: Every inspired

Ver. 1. Beloved, do not believe every spirit.]—Every spirit means every teacher who pretends to be inspired by the Spirit of God, as is plain from the latter part of this verse, 'many false prophets are gone forth into the world.' These false prophets are called Antichrist, and in the plural number Antichrists, 1 John ii. 18. See the 2d note on that verse.

the flesh, is from God:¹

3 And every spirit that doth not confess Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh, is not from God.¹ And this is that spirit of Antichrist which ye have heard that it cometh, and now is in the world already.²

4 Ye are of God, little children, and have overcome them: (ὅτι) because greater is he who IS (ἐστί, 162.) with you, than he who IS with the world.¹

5 They are of the world, therefore they speak from the world, and the world (αὐτοί, 45.) hearkeneth to them.¹

6 We are of God.¹ He who knoweth God,²

Ver. 2. Every spirit that confesseth Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh, is from God.¹—This is an exact literal translation of the original, ὁ πνεῦμα ὁ ἐκ τῆς σαρκὸς τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἐστὶν ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ. The clause, 'Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh,' imports two things: first, 'That Jesus is the Christ whose coming was foretold by the Jewish prophets; secondly, that this great personage hath come in the flesh.' Here the apostle hath rightly declared, that every teacher pretending to inspiration, who confesseth that Jesus is the Christ come in the flesh, is really inspired. For as Paul told the Corinthians, 1 Cor. xii. 3. 'No one can declare Jesus (Χριστὸν) Lord, or Christ, but by the Holy Ghost.' See note 2. on that verse.

The Socinians contend, that to confess 'Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh,' means simply, to confess that Jesus Christ is a mere man; and from this they infer, that he had no existence before he was conceived of his mother. In proof of their sense of the clause 'hath come in the flesh,' they cite Heb. ii. 14. where the writer, speaking of our Lord, saith 'He partook of the flesh and blood of the children.' Now, though it be true that these words import nothing more but that Christ was a man like other men, I am of opinion that John's words, 'hath come in the flesh,' have a more extensive meaning. For, as B. Horley observes, the sense of a proposition ariseth, not from the meaning of a single word contained in it, but from the union of the whole into one sentence, especially if that union suggests any circumstance by which the sense of the proposition is modified. This is the case in the clause 'hath come in the flesh.' For, in common language, hath come, when the manner of one's coming is specified, signifies, not only that he hath come in that particular manner, but that he might have come in a different manner, if he had pleased. Accordingly John hath used the verb to come in that sense, 1 John v. 6. 'This is he who came by water and blood, even Jesus the Christ; not by water only, but by the water and the blood.' For his meaning plainly is, That Jesus came attested as the Christ by water and blood jointly, although he might have come attested by either of these separately; and that Jesus existed as the Christ before he came attested by the water and the blood. The above interpretation of 1 John v. 6. being allowed, the clause 'hath come in the flesh' will signify much more than the clause 'partook of flesh and blood.' For, while it denotes the reality of Christ's humanity, it goeth farther. By insinuating that he might have come in another manner than in the flesh, namely, in the form of God, as mentioned Philip. ii. 6. 7. it signifies that Jesus Christ existed before he came in the flesh, and chose to come in that manner rather than in any other; consequently, that he is more than a mere man.—That Jesus Christ might have come in another manner than in the flesh, was the opinion of Clemens Romanus, one of the apostolical fathers mentioned Philip. iv. 3. note 3. For in his epistle to the Corinthians, cited by Horley in his 5th letter to Priestley, he saith, 'The sceptre of the Majesty of God, our Lord Jesus Christ, came not in the pride of pomp and arrogance, although he had it in his power, but in humility, as the Holy Spirit spake concerning him.'—I have only to add, that if the foregoing interpretation of John's expression, hath come in the flesh, conveys his true meaning, the Socinians must be mistaken when they affirm, that in his first epistle John hath neither said any thing concerning the divinity of Christ, nor censured those who asserted his mere humanity. For those teachers who denied the humanity of Christ, being condemned by the apostle, ver. 2. in terms which imply that Christ was more than a man, he thereby, without doubt, censured those who affirmed that he was nothing but a man.

Ver. 3.—1. Every spirit that doth not confess Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh, is not from God.¹—To determine whether the Socinian interpretation of the clause 'hath come in the flesh,' expresses the apostle's meaning, let that interpretation be substituted for the expression of which it is the interpretation; and the passages under consideration will run thus: ver. 2. 'Every spirit (every teacher calling himself inspired) who confesseth Jesus Christ hath come as a mere man, is from God;' ver. 3. 'And every Spirit who doth not confess Jesus Christ hath come as a mere man, is not from God. Wherefore, as John is here giving marks by which true and false teachers were to be distinguished, if the Socinian sense of the phrase 'hath come in the flesh' is just, he hath made it the mark of a true teacher, that he confesseth Jesus Christ is a mere man; and the mark of a false teacher, that he doth not confess Jesus Christ is a mere man, but affirmeth that he is more than a mere man: consequently, by so doing, John hath condemned himself as a false teacher, because having declared, chap. iv. 16. v. 5. 'that Jesus Christ is the Son of God,' he hath confessed that he is more than a mere man. For all the teacher who acknowledgeth and teacheth that Jesus Christ the Son of God hath come in the flesh, is from God.

3 And by this other mark ye may know when the Spirit of God is not in a teacher: Every spirit speaking in a teacher which doth not confess Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and hath come in the flesh, is not from God, but from the devil. And this is that spirit which speaketh in the false prophet Antichrist, which ye have heard that it cometh, and now is in the world already.

4 Ye are taught of God, little children, and have detected and confuted these false prophets; because more wise and powerful is God, who is present with you and instructeth you, than the devil, who is present with, and insatiate the false prophets who are now in the world.

5 These false teachers belong to the wicked world, therefore they speak from worldly principles; and the wicked part of the world listeneth to them with pleasure.

6 We apostles belong to God, as is evident from the miraculous Jews, the learned doctors as well as the common people, believed the Son of God to be himself God; as is evident from John's own gospel. See this proved, 1 John v. 5. note.—Further, the same apostle having told us in his gospel, chap. i. 14. 'that the Word (who he had said, ver. 1. was with God, and was God) was made flesh, and dwelt among us; and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father,' he hath certainly confessed that Jesus Christ is more than a mere man. For whose glory, I pray, did the apostles behold, if it was not the glory of the Word made flesh, even the glory of Jesus Christ, 'as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth?' Wherefore, John having confessed that Jesus is the only begotten Son of God, he cannot be supposed to have branded those teachers as deceivers, who did not confess that Jesus Christ is a mere man, but affirmed him to be more than a man; because by so doing he would have condemned himself as a false teacher. But this I think no one will admit, who believes John to have been in his right wits when he wrote this passage; far less will it be admitted by any one who believes him to have been an apostle of Christ.—Upon the whole it must be acknowledged, that the confined sense which the Socinians affix to John's expression, 'Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh,' is manifestly wrong.

In the Vulgate version the first clause of this verse runs thus: 'Every spirit (qui solvit Jesum) which dissolveth Jesus;' & ὁ λύων τὸν Ἰησοῦν. Socrates in his Ecclesiast. History saith this is the true reading; and affirmeth that the Nestorians changed it into the present reading. Yet, when it is considered how numerous the copies of the New Testament were, even in the first ages, it cannot be thought that any one sect of Christians could alter them all.—Besides, in this instance, the Nestorians do not appear to have attempted any alteration, as in no Greek copy which has come to our knowledge, is there any reading of this clause different from the common one, which is the reading of the Syriac version likewise. For these reasons it is now generally agreed, that the reading of the Vulgate above mentioned was an scholium or explanatory note written on the margin of some copy of the Vulgate, which was afterwards inserted in the text, as a more direct confutation of the error of the Corinthian Gnostics concerning the person of Christ, than the reading in the Greek copies.

John had good reason to affirm, that every teacher pretending to inspiration, who did not confess Jesus Christ hath come in the flesh, was an impostor. For, Psal. ii. 7. The Messiah or Christ is called by God 'his Son,' and 'his King whom he would set on his holy hill Zion.' And Psal. cx. 4. God with an oath constituted him 'a Priest after the order of Melchizedec.' And in other passages of the Jewish scriptures it was foretold, that he was to be the son of Abraham and of David:—all which implied that the Christ, or Son of God, was to be made flesh. Wherefore, every spirit or teacher pretending to inspiration, who denied that Jesus Christ had come in the flesh, was by that denial demonstrated to be an impostor: for, as it is expressed 1 John ii. 22. 'He denied the Father,' that is, denied the testimony which the Father had borne to his Son Jesus Christ, not only in the ancient oracles, but also by a voice from heaven, first at his baptism, and after that at his transfiguration, and last of all by raising him from the dead.—Who the false teachers were who did not confess Jesus Christ had come in the flesh, and thereby denied the Father, see chap. ii. 18. note 2.

2. This is that spirit of Antichrist which ye have heard that it cometh, and now is in the world already.—From this, as well as from chap. ii. 18. it appears that Antichrist is not any particular person, nor any particular succession of persons in the church, but a general name for all false teachers in every age, who disseminate doctrines contrary to those taught by the apostles; especially if these doctrines have a tendency to derogate from Christ's character and actions as the Saviour of the world.

Ver. 4. Greater is he who is with you, than he who is with the world.—The issue of the divine government will be, that truth and virtue shall finally be victorious over error and wickedness, because God, the patron of truth and virtue, possesseth far greater power and wisdom than the evil spirits who promote error and wickedness.

Ver. 5. And the world hearkeneth to them.¹—Lest the faithful should be discouraged by the success which false teachers sometimes have in spreading their errors, the apostle observes that their success arises generally from their accommodating their doctrines to the prejudices and evil inclinations of the world. Wherefore, from the prevalence of any doctrine, no argument can be drawn in favour of its truth.

*hearkeneth to us:*³ He who is not of God, hearkeneth not to us. By this we know the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error.

7 Beloved, let us love one another:¹ For love is from God. And every one who loveth hath been begotten of God, and knoweth God.

8 He who doth not love, doth not know God:¹ for God is love.² (See ver. 16.)

9 By this the love of God (α, 163.) to us was manifested, that God sent forth his Son, the only begotten, into the world, that we might live through him.

10 In this is love; not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent forth his Son TO BE A PROPITIATION for our sins.

11 Beloved, if God so loved us, we also ought to love one another.

12 No one hath seen God at any time.¹ If we love one another, God abideth in us, and his love (α, 163.) to us is made perfect.

13 By this we know that we abide in him, and he in us, because he hath given us THE GIFTS of his Spirit.¹

14 Now (νῦν) we have beheld and

Ver. 6.—1. We are of God.—The apostle having appealed, chap. iii. 24, to the miraculous gifts of the Holy Spirit, which God as the first bestowed on the apostles, and still continued with them as proofs of his abiding with them; also, in the beginning of chap. iv. having insinuated that the doctrine which they taught was given them by the inspiration of the Spirit, he in this verse expressly asserted, that he and his brethren were commissioned by God to teach the world; and that all Christians were bound to acknowledge their authority and receive their doctrine; and that if any teacher did not acknowledge their authority, it was a proof that he did not belong to God.

2. He who knoweth God.—By the great pains which the apostle takes here, and in ver. 7, 8, and chap. ii. 3, 4, to shew who the persons are who know God, it is probable he had the Gnostics and other false teachers of the first age in his eye, who, by placing the whole of Christianity in the speculative knowledge of God, encouraged their disciples in all manner of licentiousness.

3. Harkeneth to us.—This mark, by which John directed his disciples to judge of teachers, is not to be understood of their hearkening to the apostles personally, but of their receiving their doctrine with that subordination which was due to persons inspired by the Spirit of God. Wherefore, though the apostles be all dead, yet as they still speak in their divinely inspired writings, John in this passage declares, that their writings are the test by which the disciples of Christ, since the decease of the apostles, are to judge both of teachers and of their doctrine.

Ver. 7. Beloved, let us love one another.—The frequency and earnestness with which the apostle in this epistle inculcated the love of our brethren of mankind, is very remarkable. The greatest part of the present chapter and of chap. iii. is employed in pressing that duty. See also chap. ii. 10. We may therefore believe, that some in the first age professed themselves the disciples of Christ, who were deficient in love. Possibly they were Jewish converts, who by the rites of their law having been cut off from all familiar intercourse with heathens, considered them as unclean persons who were hated of God. And therefore, instead of regarding them with any degree of esteem, they despised and hated them as enemies; and thought themselves warranted by their law in so doing. This I think appears from our Lord's words, Matt. v. 43. 'Ye have heard that I have said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour and hate thine enemy.' Wherefore it is not improbable, that some of the Jewish converts, retaining their ancient prejudices, considered it still as their duty to hate the heathens. And some of them who pretended to be teachers, no doubt taught their disciples the same lesson; and perhaps extended it to those who did not agree with them in their religious opinions; see chap. iv. 20. note. But this doctrine being contrary to the doctrine of Christ, John was at great pains to condemn it.

Ver. 8.—1. He who doth not love, doth not know God.—See ver. 6, note 2. The love of which the apostle speaks, is the love of benevolence, as is plain from the reason subjoined, 'God is love.' He who doth not love his neighbour with the love of benevolence, 'doth not know God.' He hath no just knowledge of the character of God, whose benevolence extends to all, even to the evil and unthankful, and who in this ought to be imitated by all who know him.

powers he hath conferred on us. The teacher who is acquainted with the will of God, hearkeneth to us; he acknowledgeth our authority: The teacher who doth not belong to God, hearkeneth not to us. By this mark also we know the teachers who are inspired by the Spirit of God, and by the spirit of the devil.

7 Beloved, let us not imitate the false teachers in neglecting the offices of love, on pretence that knowledge is the only thing necessary to the children of God: But let us love one another; for love is from God, and every one who loveth his brother hath been begotten of God, and knoweth God.

8 He who doth not love his brother, doth not know God aright, whatever he may pretend: For God is love, without any mixture of malevolence.

9 By this love of God to us sinners was manifested, that God sent forth his Son, the only begotten, into the world, made flesh, that we might live through his doctrine, example, and death.

10 In this is the highest love; not that we loved God first, (ver. 19.), but that he loved us, and sent forth his Son into our world, made flesh, to die as a propitiation for our sins. See chap. ii. 2. note 1.

11 Beloved, if God so loved us whilst we were sinners, (Rom. v. 8.), we also ought, in imitation of God, and from gratitude to him, to love one another, though sinners.

12 No one hath seen God at any time; yet, from what his Son hath taught us, we know, that if we love one another, the nature of God abideth in us, and his love to us is carried to perfection; he loves us greatly, because we partake of his nature.

13 By this we apostles know that we continue faithful to him in all our doctrines, and that he authorizes our actions as apostles, because he hath bestowed on us the gifts of his Spirit, and still continueth them with us.

14 Now we have beheld with our eyes what the Son of God in

2. For God is love:—that is, according to Estius, God is essentially love; even as he is properly and essentially power, wisdom, and goodness. But it doth not appear that the apostle meant to declare what the essence of God is, but only to teach us that God greatly delights in the exercise of benevolence, and perhaps that his other perfections are exerted for accomplishing his benevolent purposes.—The declaration in this verse, and in verse 16, 'that God is love,' being made by inspiration, must afford us the greatest consolation, as it assureth us that all God's dealings with us proceed from love, and in the end will assuredly issue in our happiness, unless we refuse to co-operate with him.

Ver. 9. By this the love of God to us was manifested, that God sent, &c.—This is an allusion to our Lord's words, John iii. 16, 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' Christ is called God's only begotten Son, to distinguish him from all others who in scripture are called the sons of God; and to lighten our idea of God's love to us, in giving a person of such dignity, and so beloved of God, to die for us.—It is supposed, that by giving Christ the title of God's only begotten Son in this passage, the apostle intended to overturn the error of Ebion and Cerinthus, who affirmed that Christ was not God's Son by nature, but that, like other good men, he was honoured with the title of God's Son on account of his virtues: in which opinion these heresiarchs have been followed by some in modern times. They, however, who hold this opinion, ought to shew a reason why the epithet of 'the only begotten,' is appropriated to Christ.

Ver. 12. No one hath seen God at any time.—It is difficult to discover the connexion of these words, either with what goes before, or with what follows. But, as they are the words of the Baptist, recorded John i. 18. If the apostle intended that his readers should take into their view what the Baptist added, namely, 'The only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, he hath declared him,' his meaning probably was this: Though no one hath any knowledge of God by his senses, yet from what the only begotten Son hath declared concerning him, we know that 'if we love one another, God abideth in us,' the divine nature abideth in us, and on that account, 'God's love to us is made perfect;' he loved us most affectionately.

Ver. 13. By this we know that we abide in him, and he in us, because he hath given us the gifts of his Spirit.—Because the expression αὐτοῦ τῶν δώματων αὐτοῦ ἐστὶν is elliptical, I have completed it in the translation by supplying the words the gifts. By possessing the gifts of the Spirit, the apostles knew that they 'abode in God,' that is, continued faithful to him in the execution of their office; and by the same gifts, they demonstrate to the world 'that God was with them,' and authorized their doctrine. Accordingly it is added in the next verse, 'Now we have beheld and bare witness, that the Father hath sent forth his Son (namely in the flesh) to be the Saviour of the world:' intimating, that the gifts of the Spirit were given to the apostles, to enable them to prove the truth of their testimony, concerning the Father's sending his Son in the flesh to be the Saviour of the world. See chap. iii. 24. note 2.

bear witness, that the Father hath sent forth HIS Son to be the Saviour of the world.

15 Whosoever will confess that Jesus is the Son of God,¹ God abideth in him, and he in God.²

16 And we have known and believed the love which God hath to us. God is love; (see ver. 8. note 2.) (Kai, 208.) Wherefore he who abideth in love, abideth in God, and God in him. (See ver. 15. note 2.)

17 By this the love is perfected (μεν, 241.) in us, so that we can have boldness in the day of judgment,¹ because as he is, so we are in this world.²

18 Fear is not in love; but perfect love¹ casteth out fear;² because fear hath torment. (As, 106.) Wherefore, he who feareth is not perfected in love.

19 We love him, because he first loved us. (See chap. iii. 16.)

20 If any one say, (ὅτι, 260.) Certainly I love God, (καί, 211.) and yet hate¹ his brother, he is a liar: For he who loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?

21 (Kai, 224.) Moreover, this commandment we have from him, That he who loveth God, loveth his brother also.

Ver. 15.—1. Whosoever will confess that Jesus is the Son of God.]—For the meaning of this, see ver. 2. note.—Some commentators by 'confessing that Jesus is the Son of God,' understand an outward profession of faith in the gospel. But, notwithstanding that profession of one's faith in the first age exposed him to persecution, I hardly think the apostle on that account would say of such a person, that 'God abode in him, and he in God.' See Rom. x. 10. note 2.

2. God abideth in him, and he in God.]—See chap. ii. 6. note 1.—The expressions 'God abideth in him, and he in God,' occur often in this epistle, and must be understood differently, according to the characters of the persons to whom they are applied. If spoken of teachers, as in ver. 13. 15. of this chapter, and perhaps in chap. ii. 27, 28. their meaning is, that these teachers are faithful to God in teaching the true doctrines of the gospel, and are assisted and beloved of God; but if spoken of private persons, as in chap. ii. 5, 6. iii. 6. 24. iv. 16. they mean one's abiding in the belief of the doctrines, and in the practice of the precepts of the gospel, and his enjoying the love of God.

Ver. 17.—1. So that we can have boldness in the day of judgment.]—The persons of whom the apostle speaks may well have boldness in the day of judgment, because by loving God and their neighbour, being the children of God, they will not be condemned by their Judge.

2. Because as he is, so we are in this world.]—Kai, 241. note 1. The verb in this clause being of the present tense, the relative as must be understood of God, who is represented ver. 11. as the object of our imitation in his love to mankind. If the reader is of opinion that Christ is meant, and that the words 'in this world,' stand connected not only with the words we are, but with the words as he is, the translation must run, 'as he was, so we are in this world.' According to this translation likewise, the sentiment expressed is perfectly just.

Ver. 18.—1. Perfect love.]—The love which the apostle calls perfect, is love to mankind cherished from a regard to the will of God, and exercised habitually, as opportunity offereth, in the disinterested manner in which God exerciseth his love to us. This love, though not perfect in its degree or measure, may be called perfect, because it proceeds from a right principle, and operates habitually in leading the person in whose heart it lodgeth, to do to his neighbour all the good offices in his power.

2. Casteth out fear.]—As the apostle speaks, in the preceding verse, of one's having boldness in the day of judgment, fear, in this verse certainly means 'fear of the judgment,' that is, fear of being condemned at the judgment. This fear, perfect or strong love to mankind casteth out of a man's mind; because, as the apostle declared, chap. iii. 14. 'We know that we have passed away from death to life, because we love the brethren.'—It is a great recommendation of any quality, that it renders a man a child of God, ver. 7. and gives him such an entire assurance of God's love, as banisheth from his mind all fears with respect to his happiness in a future state. This love to our brethren effectually doth; and therefore it ought to be carefully cherished.—Some interpreters give a different explication of this verse as follows: "There is no fear of what one may lose or suffer by loving his brother perfectly; but perfect love casteth out all such fear; for such fear hath torment in it. Wherefore, he who thus fears what he may lose or suffer by loving his brother, is not perfected in love." But as this interpretation doth not shew, how the torment which is in fear is a reason for its being cast out by perfect love, as the interpretation in the commentary doth, I think it should not be admitted.

Ver. 20. And yet hate his brother.]—Here the apostle, if I mistake not, glances at the character of some of the heretical teachers, mentioned ver. 7. note, who, being Jewish converts, had brought with them into the Christian church that malevolent spirit which in Judaism they had cherished towards the heathens, and perhaps considered it as an expression of their love to God, to hate and persecute all who were not of their way of thinking in religious matters. The same spirit hath too much prevailed in the zealots of modern times. But, thanks be to God, this antichristian spirit is gradually passing away.

Ver. 21. That every one who loveth God, love his brother also with the love of benevolence, although he be a sinner or even an enemy.

CHAPTER V.

View and Illustration of the Sentiments, Discoveries, and Precepts contained in this Chapter.

THE apostle, in the preceding chapter, having, from various considerations, inculcated the love of mankind in general, and even of enemies, goeth on in this to speak of the obligation we are under to love, in a more particular manner, all who are the sincere disciples of Christ. And first, to shew that such are worthy of being loved, he declares, that every one who believeth Jesus is the Christ, is begotten of God. He possesseth the nature of God, and thereby is more truly a Son of God than any Jew who claims that high relation, merely on account of his descent from Abraham, John viii. 39. Next, to shew the obligation all who love God are under to love the disciples of Christ, he observes that every one who loveth God the begetter, will love also the begotten of him: he will love good men because they resemble God in his moral qualities, ver. 1.—Then, that they might judge with certainty of their own character, he told them, the best method of knowing, whether from love to God they really loved the children of God, was to consider, whether from love to God they performed to his children what he commands them to perform, ver. 2.—For, said he, this is the natural expression of our love to God, that we keep his commandments. And his commandments are not burdensome to the children of God, because they are agreeable to their inclinations, ver. 3.—and because, by the power of their faith, they are able to overcome all the temptations which the world lays in their way to induce them to break the commandments of God, ver. 4.

But that we may know who the children of God are who overcome the world, and what their faith is by which they obtain that victory, the person who overcometh the world by the power of faith, is he who believeth that Jesus is the Son of God, sent into the world to bestow eternal life on all who believe, ver. 5.—And such a person's faith in Jesus as the Son of God is well founded: for he was demonstrated to be the Son of God by the water and blood, even Jesus the Christ was proved to be God's Son, not by the water alone, but by the water and the blood. For at his baptism with water, Jesus was declared to be God's Son by a voice from heaven. The same was declared by the shedding of his blood, that is, by his death: for by his resurrection from the dead, God demonstrated him to be his Son. Now it is the Spirit who, by the water and the blood, beareth witness to Jesus as the Son of God. For, by descending on him in a visible shape at his baptism, he pointed him out to the Baptist (John i. 32, 33.) and to the surrounding multitude, as the person concerning whom the voice from heaven spake. In like manner, the Spirit bare witness to Jesus as the Son of God by the blood; for it was the Spirit who raised him from the dead, ver. 6.

The apostle, having thus declared how Jesus came into the world, attested as the Son of God by the water and the blood, proceeds to inform us, that there are three in heaven, and three on earth, who are continually witnessing something concerning Jesus, which he does not explain till ver. 11, where he tells us that the facts which they attest are, that God hath given us eternal life, and that this life is through his Son. Now, the three in heaven who bear witness to these important facts, are the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit, ver. 7.—and the three on earth who bear witness to the same facts, are the Spirit, and the water, and the blood. All these witnesses, the apostle tells us, agree in one and the same testimony, ver. 8.—And because they attest these facts by the appointment of God, he calls the joint testimony of the three in heaven and of the three on earth, the witness of God; and observes, that if we receive the testimony of men, and without hesitation rely on it, even in the most important matters, the witness of God is of much greater force, to establish what he attesteth concerning his Son, ver. 9.—especially as he who believeth on the Son of God hath the thing witnessed by God begun in himself, whereas he who doth not believe God's witness concerning his Son, endeavours to make God a liar, ver. 10.—To this account of the witnesses in heaven and on earth, and of the credibility of their testimony, the apostle at length subjoins a declaration of the important facts to which they bear witness, namely, that God will bestow eternal life on believers, and that this life is to be bestowed on them through his Son, ver. 11.—Then repeats what he had hinted, ver. 10, that he who acknowledgeth Jesus to be the Son of God, hath the eternal life which God hath promised to bestow through his Son assured to him by the graces and virtues which his faith produces in him; whereas he who doth not acknowledge Jesus as the Son of God, hath no assurance of eternal life, ver. 12.—Lastly, the apostle told them who believed on the name of the Son of God, that he had written these things to them concerning the coming of Jesus into the world attested to be the Son of God by the water and the blood, and concerning the three in heaven and the three on earth who are continually bearing witness to Jesus, and concerning the facts which they attest, namely, that God hath promised to give believers eternal life through his Son, that they might be assured of obtaining eternal life through him, and that they might continue to believe on his name, ver. 13.

John had told them, chap. iv. 17, that if they imitated God in his benevolence, it would give them boldness in the day of judgment. Here he assured them, that, even in the present life, they who believe on Jesus have this boldness with the Father, that if they pray to him for any thing according to his will, he hearkeneth to them, ver. 14.—and granteth them what they ask, because they are the disciples of his Son, ver. 15.—This assurance the apostle gave to the spiritual men in particular, and perhaps it was applicable to them only, telling them, That if any of them found a brother labouring under a bodily disease, inflicted on him for some sin he had committed, and if, from the signs of repentance which the sick shewed, the spiritual man had reason to think his sin was not to be punished with bodily death, he might, on account of his faith in God's promise, ask his recovery, if moved to do so by an impulse of the Spirit: and God, in answer to his prayer, would grant a miraculous recovery to such a sick person, the temporal punishment of whose sin was not a disease to end in death. At the same time, by observing that there was a sin unto death, for the removing of the punishment of which he did not direct any spiritual man to pray, he insinuated that they were to pray for a miraculous recovery of the sick sinner only in the case of his having repented of the sin for which he was punished, ver. 16.—And to shew this more clearly, he added, though every unrighteous action, especially those by which our neighbour is injured, is sin, there is a great difference in sins, according as they are repented of or obstinately continued in: For there is a sin not unto death, from the punishment of which the sinner may be delivered, because he hath repented, ver. 17.—However, to prevent them from falling into mistakes in judging what sins were unto death and what not, he told them, that no one who hath been begotten of God sinneth habitually, because such a person keepeth himself from the dominion of the devil. By making this observation, the apostle, I think, insinuated to the spiritual men, that the persons for whose recovery by miracle they were to pray, were to be not habitual sinners, but the begotten of God, whose sins were of infirmity, of ignorance, or of surprise; and of which they knew that the sinner had repented, ver. 18.—He added, that by keeping themselves from the dominion of the devil, they would know that they were begotten of God; as, by the wickedness which then prevailed among infidels and idolaters, they knew that the whole of them were lying under the dominion of the devil, ver. 19.—But they knew also that the Son of God had come, and had given them understanding to acknowledge the true God; so that they were under the dominion of the true God, by being under his Son Jesus Christ, ver. 20.—He therefore entreated them to keep themselves from idols, because by worshipping idols they withdrew themselves from their subjection to the true God, and put themselves under the power of the devil, ver. 21.

Concerning the spiritual men's praying for the recovery of sick sinners, and the sinner being restored to health miraculously in consequence of such prayers, of which the apostle speaks in this chapter, it is proper to observe, that the infliction of diseases in punishment of gross irregularities, and the removing of them by miracle at the intercession of the spiritual men, like all the other miraculous powers, was intended to render the Christian societies venerable in the eyes of the heathens, by shewing that God was actually among the Christians, 1 Cor. xiv. 25. and to inspire the heathens with the desire of becoming members of a community which was honoured with such extraordinary privileges.

NEW TRANSLATION.

CHAP. V.—1 Every one who believeth that Jesus is the Christ,¹ hath been begotten,² of God: and every one who loveth the begetter, loveth also the begotten of him.³

2 By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God, and keep his commandments.⁴

3 For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments: and his commandments are not burdensome.⁵

4 (Ors, 254.) Because all⁶ that is begotten of God overcometh the world. And this is the victory which overcometh the world, even our faith.⁷

5 Who is it that overcometh the world, but he who believeth that Jesus is the Son of God!⁸

Ver. 1.—1. Every one who believeth that Jesus is the Christ.—This is not to be understood of a mere speculative belief, but of such a firm persuasion, as influenceth the person who is possessed of it to obey Jesus implicitly, from a sense of his authority as the Christ, or Son of God, sent into the world to save mankind.

2. Hath been begotten of God.—See chap. ii. 29. note 1. where this translation of γεννηται is supported.—The unbelieving Jews thought themselves the children of God, because they were descended from Abraham by Isaac, and possessed the knowledge of the true God: and some even of the believing Jews built their title to that high honour on the same foundation. But the apostle assured both, that God having attested Jesus to be the Christ, the only thing under the gospel dispensation which made men his children, was their believing on Jesus as the Christ or Son of God, and their loving the children of God.

3. Every one who loveth the begetter, loveth also the begotten of him.—The apostle, knowing that all the children of God love him as their Father, declareth it to be a characteristic mark of the children of God, that they love all their brethren because they bear the image of their Father.

Ver. 2.—By this we know that we love the children of God, when we love God and keep his commandments.—Grotius, to render the apostle's reasoning clear, thinks the original should be construed and translated in the following manner:—Εν τούτοις γινώσκουσιν ότι τοις υιοις θεοῦ ὅσοις ἔσονται τοὶ υἱοὶ θεοῦ καὶ τοὶ υἱοὶ ἀνθρώπων αὐτοῦ τῆς αἰῆς. 'By this we know that we love God, when we love the children of God, and keep his commandments.' But, not to mention that this construction is forced, it represents the apostle as giving a mark by which we may know when we love God; whereas his intention is to shew how we may know when we love the children of God in a right manner. Now this was necessary to be shewed, since men may love the children of God because they are their relations, or because they are engaged in the same pursuits with themselves, or because they are mutually united by some common bond of friendship. But love proceeding from these considerations, is not the love of the children of God which he requireth. By what mark then can we know that our love to the children of God is of the right sort? Why, saith the apostle, 'by this we may know that we love the children of God' in a right manner, 'when we love God, and' from that excellent principle 'keep his commandments,' especially his commandment to love his children because they bear his image. True Christian love, therefore, is that which proceeds from love to God, from a regard to his will, and which leadeth us to obey all his commandments.

Ver. 3. And his commandments are not burdensome.—or difficult to his children. This must be understood of the commandments of God in ordinary cases. For his commandment to suffer

CHAP. V.—1 Every one who believeth that Jesus is the Christ, and abideth in his fellowship and doctrine, hath been begotten of God: he is more truly a Son of God, than if he were descended from Abraham. And every one who loveth God the begetter, loveth also the begotten of him: loveth all who bear his image.

2 By this we know that we love the children of God in a proper manner, when we love God, and from love to him obey his commandments; especially his commandment to love one another.

3 For this is the natural expression of our love to God, that we keep his commandments; which is not a burdensome thing to the begotten of God, because his commandments are agreeable to their inclinations, and

4 Because all that is begotten of God overcometh the temptations which the world layeth in their way, to induce them to break God's commandments. And this victory over the world, we the begotten of God obtain through the influence of our faith.

5 That ye may know who it is that overcometh the temptations of the world, and what the faith is by which that victory is obtained, he is one who believeth that Jesus is the Son of God.

the loss of liberty, the spoliing of goods, torture, and death, in times of persecution, must be excepted.—To a good man in ordinary circumstances, the keeping of God's commandments is easy, being the delight of his soul.

Ver. 4.—1. All that is begotten of God overcometh the world.—John useth was, the neuter gender, to comprehend all sorts of persons, males and females, old and young, Jews and Gentiles, free men and slaves.

2. And this is the victory which overcometh the world, even our faith.—Our faith is the cause of our victory over the world. The power of faith in enabling men to overcome the temptations laid in their way by the things of the world, and by the wicked men of the world, is finely illustrated by examples, Heb. xi. which shew, that before the coming of Christ the children of God, by believing the things which he discovered to them, whether by the light of natural reason or by particular revelations, resisted the greatest temptations, sustained the bitterest sufferings, and performed the most difficult acts of obedience, and thereby obtained a great and lasting fame.—But now that Christ hath come, and made the gospel revelation in person and by his apostles, the faith of the children of God by which they overcome the world, hath for its object all the doctrines and promises contained in that revelation, and particularly the great doctrine which is the foundation of all the rest, namely, that Jesus is the Son of God, and Saviour of the world, as the apostle observes in the following ver. 5.

Ver. 5. Who is it that overcometh the world, but he who believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?—That the Jews universally believed their Messiah, or Christ, was to be the Son of God, appears from the following passages of scripture. Matt. xvi. 16. 'Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art Christ, the Son of the living God.'—Luke iv. 41. 'Devils also came out of many, crying out and saying, Thou art Christ the Son of God.'—John xi. 21. 'These are written, that we might believe that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God.'—Acts ix. 21. 'He preached Christ in the synagogues, that he is the Son of God.'—Further, that the Jews universally believed the Son of God to be God, appears from John v. 17. 'Jesus answered them, My Father worketh hitherto, and I work.' 18. Therefore the Jews sought the more to kill him, because he not only had broken the Sabbath, but said also that God was his Father, making himself equal with God.'—John x. 33. 'The Jews answered him, saying, For a good work we stone thee not, but for blasphemy, and because that thou, being a man, makest thyself God.'—Matt. xxvi. 63. 'The high-priest said to him, I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ the Son of God.' 64. Jesus saith to him, Thou hast said. 65. Then the high-priest rent his clothes, saying, He hath spoken blasphemy: Behold now ye have heard his blasphemy. 66. What think ye? They answered and said, He is guilty of death.'

6 This is he who came (John, 113.) by water and blood, even Jesus the Christ:¹ not (by) the water only, but by the water and the blood. And it is the Spirit who witnessed;² (ver. 254.) because the Spirit is truth.³ (See the Illustration of this verse.)

7 (Orti, 261.) Farther,¹ there are three who bear witness² in heaven; the Father,³ the

6 We have good reason to believe that Jesus is the Son of God: For this is he who was proved to be the Son of God by his baptism and death, even Jesus the Christ; not by his baptism only, when he was declared God's Son by a voice from heaven, but also by his death, when the same thing was demonstrated by his resurrection from the dead: And it is the Spirit who was employed to bear witness by these miracles, because the Spirit is a true witness: He can neither deceive nor be deceived.

7 Further, there are three who bear witness in heaven; the Father, the Word, or the Son himself, and the Holy Spirit; and these from printed editions, have been stated with the greatest fidelity and accuracy by Mill in his long note at the end of John's first epistle, where he observes, that this verse is wanting in all the ancient Greek MSS. of the New Testament which have come down to us, except a few which shall be mentioned immediately. It is wanting likewise in the first Syriac, and other ancient versions, particularly the Coptic, Arabic, and Ethiopic, and in many of the present Latin MSS.—With respect to quotations from the Fathers, Mill acknowledges, that few of the Greek writers who lived before the council of Nice have cited this verse. The same he observes concerning those who, after that council, wrote in defence of the Trinity against the Arians and other heretics, which he thinks shews that this verse was not in their copies.

The only proofs, therefore, of the authenticity of the verse under consideration are,—1. Some of the most ancient and most correct Vatican Greek copies, (for others of them want this verse), from which the Spanish divines formed the Complutensian edition of the Greek Testament, and with which they were furnished by Pope Leo X. but especially the one which Mill thus describes, Froleg. No. 1090. "Insignis fidei præ cæteris Codex extimæ vetustatis spectatque fidei, quem tanquam Archetypum Complutensibus nostris tradidit Leo decimus, quemque prout secutus est et Erasmus." 2. A Greek copy, called by Erasmus Codex Britannicus, on the authority of which he inserted this verse in his edition anno 1522, but which he had omitted in his two former editions. This is supposed to be a MSS. at present in the Trinity College Library, Dublin, in which this verse is found with the omission of the words et in terra before et in aqua. It likewise wants the last clause of ver. 8, namely, et in sanguine. Concerning this MS. Porson, in his letters to Travis, page 107, says, "It is certainly not earlier than the 16th century." 3. All Stephen's MSS., being seven in number, which contain the Catholic epistles, have this verse; only they want the words et in sanguine. But Wetstein says, he himself examined five of the seven of Stephen's MSS., which all omit from the words et in sanguine to the words et in terra. 4. The Vulgate version, in most of the MS. copies and printed editions of which it is found, with some variations. 5. The testimony of Tertullian, who, according to Hammond, Bull, Mill, and others, alludes to this verse, Præfation. c. 25. and who lived in an age in which, he saith, Præscript. c. 30. the authenticæ literæ of the apostles were read in the churches. By authenticæ literæ Mill understands, either the autographs of the apostles, which the churches to whom they were written had carefully preserved, or correct transcripts taken from these autographs. Also the testimony of Cyprian, who flourished about the middle of the third century, and who, in his epistle to Jubajanus, expressly cites the latter clause of this verse.—The objections which have been raised against the testimonies of Tertullian and Cyprian, Mill hath mentioned and answered in his long note at the end of I John v. which see in page 582. of Kuster's edition. 6. The testimony of many Greek and Latin fathers in subsequent ages, who have cited the last clause of this verse; and some of whom have appealed to the Arians themselves as acknowledging its authenticity. Lastly, the Complutensian edition, anno 1516, had this seventh verse exactly as it is in the present printed copies, with this difference only, that instead of et in sanguine it had substituted the last clause of ver. 8, namely, et in sanguine, and hath omitted it in that verse.—These arguments appeared to Mill of such weight, that after balancing them against the opposite arguments, he gave it as his decided opinion, that in whatever manner this verse disappeared, it was undoubtedly in St. John's autograph, and in some of the copies which were transcribed from it.

Many modern critics, however, of greater note, are of a different opinion. Wherefore, instead of passing any judgment on a matter which hath been so much contested, I shall only observe,—1. That this verse, properly interpreted, instead of disturbing the sense of the verses with which it is joined, rather renders it more connected and complete; as shall be shewn in the course of the notes. 2. That in ver. 9. the witness of God is supposed to have been before appealed to; 'If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater.' And yet, if ver. 7. is excluded, the witness of God is nowhere mentioned by the apostle. 3. That in the opinion of Beza, Calvin, and other orthodox commentators, the last clause of ver. 7. hath no relation to the unity of the divine essence; see note 6. If so, the Trinitarians, on the one hand, need not contend for the authenticity of this verse, in the view of supporting their doctrine; nor the Arians, on the other, strive to have it excluded from the text, as opposing their tenets. 4. That the doctrine which the Trinitarians affirm to be asserted in this verse is contained in other places of scripture. So Wall saith. Benson likewise in his dissertation written to prove this verse not genuine, saith, "If it were genuine, there could nothing be proved thereby but what may be proved from other texts of scripture."—But of these things every reader will judge for himself.

2. Who bear witness.]—Hammond translates et in the beginning of this verse quemadmodum, and et in the beginning of ver. 8. ita: 'As there are three who bear witness in heaven,—so there are three who bear witness on earth.' But this signification of et is uncon-

The high-priest and council, composed of men of the highest rank and learning among the Jews, equally with the common people, believed that the Christ was the Son of God, and that the Son of God is himself God; otherwise they could not have reckoned Jesus a blasphemer for calling himself Christ the Son of God. From these indisputable facts it is evident, that the modern Socinians contradict the gospel history in two of its essential articles when they affirm, that the first Jewish Christians, before their conversion, had no idea that their Messiah was to come down from heaven, having never been taught to expect any other than a man like themselves. Next, since John hath so frequently declared, and in what followeth the verse under consideration hath proved, that Jesus is the Christ, and the Son of God, the same Socinians must be mistaken, when they affirm that in this epistle John is silent concerning the divinity of Christ, and hath not in any part of it censured those who deny it. See chap. iv. 3. note 1.

Ver. 6.—1. This is he who came by water and blood, even Jesus the Christ.—The coming of Jesus the Christ, here spoken of, is his coming into public life, attested or proved to be the Christ and Son of God. Jesus came thus attested, first, by means of his baptism in water; secondly, by means of his blood or death, followed by his resurrection.—The proof by water is mentioned before the proof by blood, because his baptism was prior to his death.—Concerning Christ's baptism let it be remarked, that it was not the baptism of repentance; for Jesus had no sin to be repented of, I Pet. ii. 22.: But it was the baptism of righteousness, Matt. iii. 14, 15.; that is, a baptism by which his righteousness, in calling himself Christ the Son of God, was manifested to the surrounding multitude. So the Baptist himself declared, John i. 31. 'That he should be made manifest to Israel, therefore I am come baptizing with water.' He was sent to baptize the people with water, that, being gathered together, they might hear and see Jesus proved to be the Son of God. Accordingly, when Jesus was baptized, coming up out of the water, Matt. iii. 17. 'A voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.' This miraculous attestation Jesus himself called a greater witness of his being the Son of God, than the witness which John bare to him. And this witness being borne to him in the hearing of the multitude after his baptism, our apostle had good reason to say, This is he who came attested as the Son of God by means of water. And it was with great propriety that Jesus began his ministry immediately after receiving this miraculous attestation. See note 2.—But Jesus came attested by blood also; that is, he was attested to be Christ the Son of God by means of his death. For, 1. In his sufferings and death all the ancient prophecies concerning the sufferings of the Christ were fulfilled. 2. During his trial, Jesus expressly called himself 'Christ the Son of the blessed God,' before the Jewish council, and before Pontius Pilate. This is called, I Tim. vi. 13. his 'witnessing a good confession'; and for that confession he was put to death as a blasphemer. 3. During his sufferings and death, God bare witness to him as his Son, by the three hours of darkness, the earthquake, the rending of the rocks, and the splitting of the veil of the temple. 4. Jesus being put to death for calling himself Christ the Son of God, his resurrection from the dead was an infallible proof of his being the Son of God. For if he had falsely claimed that high title, God never would have raised him from the dead. On all these accounts, therefore, our apostle had good reason to affirm, that Jesus came attested as the Son of God by blood as well as by water.

2. And it is the Spirit who witnessed;—namely, by the water and the blood. The Spirit bare witness to Jesus by means of the water; for after Jesus came out of the water in which he was baptized, the heavens were opened, and the Holy Ghost was seen descending in a bodily shape, and lighting upon him, whilst he prayed. By this miracle the Spirit pointed him out to all present as the person of whom the voice from heaven spake. Accordingly, John Baptist told the Jews, that Jesus was pointed out to him as the Christ by that witness of the Spirit: John i. 32. 'And John bare record, saying, I saw the Spirit descending from heaven like a dove, and it abode upon him. 33. And I knew him not; but he that sent me to baptize with water; the same said to me, Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost.'—It is the Spirit likewise who witnessed, that Jesus is the Son of God by means of the blood. For it was the Spirit who raised Jesus from the dead, and thereby gave him that great attestation of his being the Son of God. So St. Peter affirmeth, I Pet. iii. 18. Hence he is said by St. Paul, I Tim. iii. 16. to have been 'justified by the Spirit.'

3. Because the Spirit is truth;—that is, the Spirit is true: for in the Hebrew tongue substantive nouns were often used for their corresponding adjectives. See Ess. iv. 17.—The apostle's meaning is, that the Spirit was employed to bear witness to Jesus as God's Son, by means or on occasion of the water and the blood, because he is a witness who can neither deceive nor be deceived.

Ver. 7.—1. For there are three, &c.]—In modern times the authenticity of this verse hath been the subject of much controversy. The arguments on both sides of the question, taken from ancient Greek MSS. and versions, and from quotations made by the Fathers, and

10 (He who believeth on the Son of God, hath the witness in himself. He who believeth not God,² hath made (Esa. iv. 1.) him a liar, because he hath not believed the witness which God hath witnessed concerning his Son.)

11 (Kai, 204.) Now this is the witness, that God hath given to us eternal life; and this life is (w, 167.) through his Son.¹ (See chap. iv. 9.)

12 (O xaw) He who acknowledgeth¹ the Son, hath this life. He who acknowledgeth not the Son of God, hath not (aw, 71.) this life.

13 These things I have written to you who believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may know that ye have eternal life; and that ye may CONTINUE TO believe¹ on the name of the Son of God.

14 And this is the boldness which we have (awos) with him, that if we ask any thing according to his will, (awaw, 45.) he hearkeneth to us.¹

15 And if we know that he hearkeneth to us CONCERNING whatever we ask, we know that we shall have the petitions which we have asked from him.

16 If any one see his brother sinning¹ a sin

Ver. 10.—1. He who believeth on the Son of God, hath the witness in himself.—Here, as in the next verse, the witness, by an usual metonymy, is put for the thing witnessed. And the thing witnessed being, 'that God hath given us eternal life through his Son,' he who believeth on the Son of God may justly be said to have eternal life, the thing witnessed, in himself, because by his faith on the Son, being begotten of God, he hath, in the dispositions of God's children communicated to him, eternal life begun in him, which is both a pledge and a proof that God in due time will completely bestow on him eternal life through his Son.

2. He who believeth not God,—that is, believeth not the witness which God bare concerning Jesus, when at his baptism he declared him his Son by a voice from heaven, and when after his death he demonstrated Jesus to be his Son, by raising him from the dead. The refusing to believe these testimonies, John terms a making, that is, an endeavouring to make God a liar, or false witness.—Some MSS. and ancient versions, particularly the Vulgate, instead of waw have here awos, 'He who believeth not the Son;' which Grotius and Bengelius think the true reading. But, like most of the various readings, this makes no alteration in the sense of the passage.

Ver. 11. Now this is the witness, (this is the thing witnessed; see ver. 10. note 1.), that God hath given to us eternal life; and this life is through his Son.—Here I suppose the apostle had in his eye his Master's words, which he himself had recorded in his gospel, chap. xvii. 2. 'Thou hast given him power over all flesh, that he should give eternal life as many as thou hast given him.'—Though the apostle, in what goes before, hath spoken particularly of the three in heaven and of the three on earth who bear witness continually, he deferred mentioning till now what it is they are witnessing; that by introducing it last of all, and after so much preparation, it might make the stronger impression on the mind of his readers.—In this, as in other passages of scripture, the preterite tense, God hath given, is used instead of the future, God will give us eternal life, to shew the certainty of our obtaining that great blessing through his Son. See Esa. iv. 10.

Ver. 12. 'O xaw, He who acknowledgeth the Son hath this life.]—As the word xaw is used in the sense of acknowledging by our apostle, chap. ii. 23. note, I am of opinion the scope of the passage directs us to take it in that sense here. For notwithstanding xaw in the last clause of this verse is used in its ordinary signification, it is no uncommon thing in scripture to find the same word used in different senses in the same passage.

Ver. 13. And that ye may (awos) continue to believe.]—This is the true translation of the clause: For in John's style awos often signifies continuing to believe, John ii. 11. xi. 15. xx. 31.

Ver. 14. Now this is (awos) the boldness which we have with him, that if we ask any thing according to his will, he hearkeneth to us.—It is commonly thought that this and the following verse is spoken of Christians in general, to assure them, that if they ask any thing necessary to their own salvation, God will grant it to them. In this sense Estius understood the apostle. See his note on these verses, where he describes the qualifications of a prayer 'according to the will of God.' Nevertheless, from verses 16, 17. it is plain that the apostle is speaking, not of our asking spiritual blessings for ourselves, but of our asking 'life for a brother who hath sinned a sin not unto death.' Others, therefore, think John, in these verses, directs Christians in general to pray for the eternal pardon of each other's sins. But as no person's sins will be pardoned at the request of another, a better interpretation will be suggested by observing, that in this direction there is an allusion to the promise which our

10 (But before I declare what the thing witnessed is, I must take notice, that he who believeth on the Son of God hath the thing witnessed by God begun in himself. But he who believeth not God's witness concerning his Son, hath endeavoured to make him a liar, by refusing to believe the witness which God hath witnessed concerning his Son.)

11 Now, this is the thing which God hath witnessed by the three in heaven and the three on earth; namely, that God will give to us who believe eternal life, and that this life is to be bestowed on us through his Son.

12 He who acknowledgeth the Son, hath this life begun in him, and made sure to him, by the virtues which his faith produceth in him: He who acknowledgeth not the Son of God, hath no reason to expect this eternal life which is through Christ.

13 These things concerning the water and the flood, and concerning the witnesses in heaven and on earth, and concerning the things which they have witnessed, I have written to you who believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may be certain ye shall have eternal life through his Son; and that ye may continue to believe on the name of the Son of God.

14 And this is the boldness which we have with the Father through our believing on his Son, that if we ask any miracle according to his will, for his glory and the good of our sick brethren, he lendeth a favourable ear to us.

15 And if we are assured that he lendeth a favourable ear to us concerning what we ask, because we are the disciples of his Son, we have reason to believe that we shall have the petitions granted which we have asked from him.

16 Having this boldness with the Father through our believing

Lord made to his apostles, and which John himself hath recorded in his gospel, chap. xiv. 12. 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also, and greater works shall he do, because I go unto my Father. 13. And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son. 14. If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will do it.'—Also chap. xvi. 23. 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it you. 24. Hitherto ye have asked nothing in my name; ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full.'—Now, since in the first mentioned passage, Christ promised that his apostles should do greater miracles than he himself had done, and that whatsoever they should ask in his name, he would do it, the meaning plainly is, that whatever miracle they should ask for the confirmation of their mission as his apostles, he would do it.—In like manner, when he promised, in the second mentioned passage, that whatsoever they should ask the Father in his name, he would give it them; and then said to them, 'Ask and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full,' it cannot be doubted, that the things he directed them to ask of the Father, were miracles for the manifestation of his character as the Son of God, and for the successful propagation of the gospel, where by their joy as his apostles would be rendered complete.—These declarations and promises were the foundations of the boldness which the persons of whom John speaks 'had with the Father, that if they asked any thing according to his will, he would hearken to them.' That John is speaking of their boldness in asking miracles, is evident from ver. 18. where he saith, 'Let him ask God, and he will grant to him life for those who sin not unto death.' Tillotson being sensible that the boldness in asking of which John speaks, was boldness in asking miracles, supposes that this is to be understood of the apostles alone. But that this boldness belonged also to such of the disciples as, in the first age, were endowed with the gift of healing diseases miraculously, is evident from Mark xvi. 17. 'These signs shall follow them that believe, &c. 18. They shall lay their hands on the sick, and they shall recover.'

Ver. 16.—1. If any one see his brother sinning a sin not unto death, let him ask God, and he will grant to him life for those who sin not unto death.]—According to Benson, 'the sin not unto death,' of which John speaks, is any single sin which a good man commits through infirmity, or surprise. According to Doddridge, it is any sin whatever, except that which Christ himself declared unpardonable. But as no sin will be pardoned which is not sincerely repented of, the circumstance by which the sinner for whom life might be asked, is distinguished from those for whom life might not be asked of God, namely, that his sin is 'not a sin unto death,' implies that he hath repented of his sin. In this persuasion, the learned persons above mentioned give it as their opinion, that John here authorizes any pious person whatever to ask of God eternal life for all penitent sinners, excepting those who have sinned against the Holy Ghost; and assures him, that, in answer to his prayer, God will grant to him eternal life for such sinners. But their opinion is liable to two great objections:—1. No ordinary Christian, however pious, can know certainly whether the person, for whom he asketh life, hath sincerely repented of his sin; and yet, unless he certainly knows this, he is not warranted to ask life for him; far less to ask it with the boldness mentioned in the 14th verse. 2. Although any pious person, as an exercise of his own benevolence, may pray for eternal life to his brother, the scripture gives no one ground to think, that his asking eternal life for his brother hath any influence in procuring that blessing for him. As little doth right reason warrant such an expectation. Nevertheless in this verse, according to Benson not unto death, let him ask God, and he will on his Son, if any one endowed with spiritual gifts is sensible that grant to him life for those who sin not unto his brother hath committed a sin which is not to be punished with death.¹ There is a sin unto death.² I do not bodily death, because he hath repented, or is in a disposition to reand Doddridge, is expressly promised, that any one who seeth his brother sinning a sin not unto death, and asketh of God eternal life for him, shall certainly have it granted to him; as if, without such a prayer, the sinner's own repentance would not procure him that favour from the mercy of God. See note 3.—We may therefore believe, that, in this passage, John speaks of persons and things very different from those which the authors now mentioned had in their eye. What these were will appear, if we attend to the following particulars.

Because it was necessary to the successful propagation of the gospel, that its professors should in the first age be remarkably holy, God so ordered it, that the open miscarriages of individuals were often punished with visible temporal judgments. So Paul told the Corinthians, who had been guilty of great irregularities in the celebration of the Lord's Supper, 1 Cor. xi. 30. 'For this cause many of you are sick, and some are dead.' For this cause being public, had no doubt a great influence in restraining the first Christians from sin.—On the other hand, to encourage those to repent who by their sins had brought on themselves mortal diseases, there were in the first age persons, who being endowed with the gift of healing diseases miraculously, (1 Cor. xii. 9.), were moved by the Holy Ghost to heal the sick, who had repented of the sins which had brought on them the diseases under which they were labouring. We may therefore believe, that when John directed any one, who saw his brother sinning a sin not unto death, to ask God to give him life, he did not mean any ordinary Christian, but any spiritual man who was endowed with the gift of healing diseases; and that the brother for whom the spiritual man was to ask life, was not every brother who had sinned, but the brother only who had been punished for his sin with some mortal disease, but who having repented of his sin, it was not a sin unto death; and that the life to be asked for such a brother, was not eternal life, but a miraculous recovery from the mortal disease under which he was labouring.

According to this view of matters, John, in the passage before us, treating briefly of the subject concerning which James hath treated more at large, chap. v. 14. 'Is any sick among you? Let him send for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, having anointed him with oil in the name of the Lord: 15. And the prayer of faith will save the sick person, and the Lord will raise him up; (as, Esa. lv. 212.) and so, although he hath committed sins, they shall be forgiven him. 16. Confess your faults one to another, and pray for one another that ye may be healed. The inwrought prayer of the righteous man availeth much.'—Now if John, in the passage before us, is treating of the subject which James hath handled in the above verse, the 'any one, who seeth his brother sinning a sin not unto death,' of whom John speaks, was any elder of the church endowed with the gift of healing diseases miraculously; and the asking prescribed by John, is what James calls 'the prayer of faith,' see note 2; and the life to be obtained by such asking, was a miraculous recovery of the sick sinner from the mortal disease under which he was labouring; called also, the raising him up, namely to health, as is plain from James v. 16.

2. Let him ask God.]—In the original it is, 'he shall ask.' But the future of the indicative is often put in scripture for the imperative.—This asking James hath termed 'the inwrought prayer of the righteous man,' because the elder was inwardly moved by the Holy Ghost to pray for the miraculous recovery of the sick person: Also he termed it 'the prayer of faith,' because the elder, feeling himself moved by the Holy Ghost to pray, prayed in the full assurance that the Lord would raise the sick person up to health. See note 3. In this passage, therefore, St. John directed the spiritual men, who had the gift of healing diseases miraculously, to exercise that gift only in behalf of those who had sincerely repented of the sins which had brought on them the diseases under which they were labouring. For the spiritual men could know with certainty the truth of the sick sinner's repentance, either by the gift of discerning spirits with which they were endowed, or, if any spiritual man had not that gift, he must have known it by feeling himself inwardly moved to pray for the sick sinner's recovery.—The anointing of the sick with oil, though not mentioned by John, was fitly prescribed by James; not however on account of any efficacy which it had, as a natural remedy, to procure health for the sick, but merely as an outward sign to the sick person himself, and to those who were present, that a miracle of healing was to be wrought. For the same purpose the twelve, when sent forth by Christ to heal diseases miraculously, anointed the sick persons with oil whom they were to recover. For, although that rite is not mentioned by any of the evangelists who have given an account of their commission, Mark, who hath described the success with which they executed their commission, tells us, chap. vi. 13. 'They anointed with oil many that were sick, and healed them.'

3. He will grant to him life.]—The life which was to be asked for those 'who sinned not unto death,' and which God was to grant, could not be eternal life, because nowhere in scripture is eternal life promised to be given to any sinner, at the asking of another. Besides, right reason teaches, that eternal life should not be granted to any sinner, merely because another asks it for him; nay, that the prayers of the whole world united will not procure eternal life for an impenitent sinner.—On the other hand, if a sinner truly repents of his sin, he will assuredly obtain eternal life through the intercession of Christ, whether any of his fellow men ask it for him or not. Since then, one person's asking God to grant eternal life to another, hath no influence to procure that favour, the life which was to be asked for the person who had not sinned unto death, and which God promised to grant, must have been temporal life only; consequently, John's direction, 'Let him ask God, and he will grant to him life,' is equivalent to that of James, 'Let them pray over them, and the prayer of faith will save the sick, and the Lord will raise him up; and so, although he hath committed sins, they shall be forgiven him;' that is, although he hath committed sins which have occasioned him to be punished with a mortal disease, he shall be delivered from that punishment. In calling a miraculous recovery from a mortal disease, which had been inflicted as the punishment of sins, the forgiving of sins, James hath followed his Master, who called the recovery of the sick of the palsy 'the forgiving of his sins,' Matt. ix. 2–6. In like manner the Psalmist represents 'the healing of all his diseases, as the forgiving of all his iniquities.'

4. For those who sin not unto death.]—Here the relative qui is plural, notwithstanding the antecedent unusquisque is singular. But the number of the relative is changed, to shew that the promise was not restricted to any particular person who had not sinned unto death, but extended to all of that description. See Esa. iv. 22.—For an account of sin not unto death, see note 1. on ver. 16.

In this 16th verse the apostle, according to the Bible translation, directed any one who saw his brother sinning a sin not unto death, to ask life for him from God at the very time he was sinning that sin; and assured him that God would at his request grant life to such a sinner. But this is evidently a great impropriety; which however will be removed by translating the clause in the past tense, agreeably to the import of the word anagorazomena, considered as the participle, not of the present but of the imperfect of the indicative, thus: 'If any one see his brother hath sinned a sin not unto death, let him ask God,' &c. According to this translation, the prayer for life to the sinner was to be made, not while he was sinning, but after he had sinned, and had repented.—I have no doubt that the translation ought to run in the past time; yet I have not ventured to make the alteration in the new translation.

It is now time to inform the unlearned reader, that on this 16th verse of the fifth chapter of John's First Epistle, taken in conjunction with the parallel passage transcribed from the epistle of James, note 1. the Papists have built what they call the sacrament of extreme unction, which the priests of their communion dispense to dying persons, by anointing them with consecrated oil, accompanied with a prayer for the pardon of their sins, and with an authoritative declaration importing that their sins are completely pardoned. But, to shew that that rite is no sacrament, and that it by no means produceth the excellent effects attributed to it by the Papists, I submit the following arguments to the intelligent reader's consideration.

1. If the anointing with oil prescribed by James, and the prayer of the elder which accompanied that anointing, be a sacrament to which the graces of pardon and salvation are really annexed, it ought not to be confined to the sick and dying, but, agreeably to the nature of a sacrament, all who profess to believe the gospel have a right to partake of it. Nevertheless, by the apostolic injunction, it is appointed only for the sick; and, by the practice of the Papists, it is ministered only to such of the sick as are at the point of death. Wherefore, since those who are in health are precluded from this rite, and multitudes of them die without being in a condition to receive it, it cannot be a sacrament instituted for conferring pardon and salvation on those who die in a sick-bed, since those who are cut off in health are, by the apostle's injunction, excluded from these great graces; but it must have been appointed for some such purpose as that which hath been already explained.

2. This pretended sacrament being built on the passages of scripture mentioned ver. 6. note 1. it should be dispensed as directed in these passages; and being so dispensed, it should be followed with the effects there described; that is to say, it should be dispensed only to the sick, and the sick immediately on receiving it ought to have their sins pardoned, without any regard to their character and temper of mind at the time. The reason is, to the forgiving of the sins of the sick, nothing is required in the above-mentioned passages, but that they be anointed with oil in the name of the Lord, and that the elder pray over them the prayer of faith; that is, pray in the full assurance that their sins shall be forgiven them.—If the Papists reply, that to the forgiveness of the sick person's sins his repentance is necessary, the answer is, That in so far as the pardon of sin dependeth on the repentance of the sick, the prayer of the elder and authoritative declaration of pardon, have no influence in procuring for the sick that grace. Perhaps we shall be told, that anointing and prayer being expressly required, they are equally necessary to the pardon of the sick sinner as repentance, both being implied conditions. Be it so. But in that case, no person, who hath the sacrament of extreme unction in his power and neglects it, can be saved. This however, it is to be presumed, no charitable Papist will venture to affirm.

3. If the elder's anointing the sick with oil, and his praying over them the prayer of faith, be a sacrament, the person to whom it is dispensed must not only receive the eternal pardon of all his sins, but he must also be immediately raised up to health by the Lord; for that grace is as expressly promised, James v. 15. to follow the anointing of the sick with oil and the praying over him, as the forgiveness of the sins which he hath committed. To avoid this consequence, the Papists affirm, that the raising up of the sick to health is conditional, depending on its being expedient for the glory of God, and for the good of the sick person himself. But to this it is answered, as before, That to the raising up of the sick nothing is required but anointing and prayer. Granting, however, for argument's sake, that expediency as well as repentance is tacitly implied as the condition on which the sick are to be raised up to health, the Papists ought to shew how it hath come to pass, that of the multitudes to whom their sacrament of unction and prayer hath been dispensed in their dying moments, so few have been raised up to health by the Lord. Hath this happened, because hitherto the Lord hath not seen it expedient to raise up many of them to health, notwithstanding say concerning it, that he should ask.⁵

17 All unrighteousness is sin :¹ (Kai, 205.) But there is a sin not unto death.

18 We know, that whosoever hath been begotten of God doth not sin, (αλλα, 78.) because he who is begotten of God (της) guardeth himself, and the wicked one doth not lay hold on him.¹

19 We know that we are BEGOTTEN of God.¹ (Kai, 205.) But the whole world lieth (ω, 175.) under the wicked one.²

20 (Α, 104.) Moreover, we know that the Son of God (υιου) hath come, and hath given us understanding, that we might know the true GOD,¹ (και, 212.) and so we are (ω, 175.) under the true GOD, (ω) under his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God,² the eternal life.

ing that grace is as expressly promised to follow the anointing of the sick, and the elder's prayer for their recovery, as the forgiveness of their sins? Or, hath this happened, because of those to whom their sacrament of extreme unction hath been dispensed, few have been sincere penitents? I suppose the Papists will affirm neither of these, as they would be a great dishonour to their church. And therefore, till they produce some satisfactory reason for God's not raising up the sick now, as anciently, according to his promise, after they have been anointed and prayed for by the priest, we must believe that these rites are a sacrament to which the graces of pardon and salvation are not annexed.

The foregoing three arguments demonstrate, that the anointing of the sick with oil, and the praying for their recovery, were not appointed as a permanent office in the church, which every priest may perform, and every professing Christian who is sick may demand, as the effectual means of procuring the plenary pardon of his sins. These rites were peculiar to the first age, being appointed, not for procuring an eternal pardon of sins to the sick, but a miraculous recovery from some mortal disease which had been inflicted on them as the temporal punishment of their sins. And no person could minister these rites with efficacy, except those who had the gift of healing diseases miraculously. The directions therefore which the apostles have given concerning these rites, were not intended for the instruction of the ministers of religion in every age, but merely to teach those who in the first age were endowed with the gift of healing diseases miraculously, in what cases and for what ends they were to exercise that gift. See the preceding note 2.

Here a saying, which Bengelius hath quoted from Whitaker, may be introduced as a fit conclusion of this important controversy. "Let them," saith he, "anoint with oil who can procure health for the sick, and let those who cannot, abstain from the vain symbol."

5. There is a sin unto death.]—From the account of 'the sin not unto death,' given in note 1. the reader will easily perceive that 'the sin unto death,' is a sin obstinately continued in, or at least not particularly repented of, the punishment of which is therefore to end in the sinner's death. This the spiritual man knowing, by his not being inwardly moved of the Holy Ghost to pray for his recovery, the apostle in the subsequent clause forbade him, in such a case, to ask it of God.

6. I do not say concerning it, that he should ask.]—Doddridge, who understands this of our praying for repentance and pardon in behalf of obstinate sinners, thinks the apostle's meaning is, 'I do not say that he should pray with a full assurance of being heard.' But as there is neither precept nor example in scripture, authorizing us to pray for pardon to obstinate sinners, the only thing we can pray for in their behalf is, that God would grant them repentance. And if he heareth us in that request, their pardon will follow.—On this subject, Doddridge's reflection is both pious and benevolent. "Let us not," saith he, "too soon pronounce the case of a sinner hopeless; but rather subject ourselves to the trouble of some fruitless attempts to reclaim him, than omit anything where there may be a possibility of succeeding."

Ver. 17. All unrighteousness is sin.]—By unrighteousness the apostle means, every thing by which our neighbour is injured; and by sin, a violation of the law of God. See chap. iii. 4.—Perhaps by making this observation here, the apostle intended to intimate to the sick sinner, that to render his repentance sincere, restitution must be made to every one whom he hath injured by his unrighteousness; in which case his sin, as the apostle adds, will not be unto death.

Ver. 18. And the wicked one doth not hold him,]—namely, in subjection; for κρατειν signifies to hold fast, as well as to touch. Thus John ix. 17. Μη μεσσω, 'Hold me not; for I do not yet ascend to my Father.' Moreover, to touch signifies to hurt, John ix. 18. 2 Sam. xiv. 10. 1 Chron. xvi. 22. and even to destroy, Job i. 11.—The Syriac version of this clause is, 'Malus, non appropriat ei.'—The devil is called 'the evil or wicked one,' by way of eminence, because he entertains the greatest malice towards mankind, and is indefatigable in his endeavours to ruin as many of them as he can.

Ver. 19.—1. We know that we are begotten of God.]—In the original it is, we know that we are αυτου υιου. But the expression pent, let him pray to God, and he will grant, at his request, recovery to those who have not sinned to death. There is a sin which will be punished with death, because the sinner is impenitent. I do not say concerning it, that the spiritual man should ask God to recover such a person by miracle.

17 Every unrighteous action is sin, and merits death; but there are sins which, because they are not committed presumptuously, nor continued in, will not be punished with temporal death.

18 We know, that whosoever hath been begotten of God (chap. ii. 29. note) doth not sin habitually, (chap. ii. 6. note 1.), because he who is begotten of God guardeth himself, and the devil doth not lay hold on him so as to enslave him: For such an one, when sick, ye may pray in the hope of being heard.

19 By keeping ourselves from habitual sin, we know that we are begotten of God. But the whole world of idolaters and infidels lieth under the dominion of the devil. See Col. i. 13. notes.

20 Moreover, we know that the Son of God hath come in the flesh to destroy the works and power of the devil, (chap. iii. 8.), and hath given us his disciples understanding, that we might know the true God; and so we are subject to the true God, by being subject to his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, and the eternal life, which God hath promised to all them who know him, John xvii. 3.

being elliptical, must be completed from ver. 18. by supplying υιου, υιου, as I have done in the translation. See chap. iii. 12. note 1.

2. But the whole world lieth under the wicked one.]—Here, as in chap. ii. 16. note 1. the word signifies not the material fabric of the world, but the wicked men of the world. Wherefore, the whole world denotes all the idolaters, infidels, and wicked men of the world, who having made themselves the subjects of the devil, it may be said of them, that (αυτου κρατειν) 'they lie under the wicked one'; they are under his dominion: just as it is said of believers in the next verse, that they are (αυτου αληθινου, αυτου υιου) in or under the true God by being under his Son: see 1 Thess. i. 1. note.—The power of the devil in this lower world, and over its inhabitants, is often spoken of in scripture. Thus, Eph. ii. 2. he is called 'the prince of the power of the air, the spirit which now inwardly worketh in the children of disobedience.'—2 Cor. iv. 4. He is called 'the god of this world,' and is said to 'blind the minds of the unbelievers.'—1 Pet. v. 8. He is called our adversary, and is said to be 'going about as a roaring lion, seeking whom he may swallow up.'—Farther, wicked men are said, 2 Tim. ii. 26. to be 'held in the snare of the devil.'—And, Eph. vi. 11. he is said to use crafty methods for the destruction of mankind.—And, 2 Cor. xi. 3. he is said to have 'beguiled Eve by his subtilty.'—And, Col. i. 13. believers are said to be 'delivered from the power of darkness, and translated into the kingdom of his beloved Son.' See the notes on 2 Cor. iv. 4. and on Eph. ii. 2.—Because Homer uses the word κρατειν to denote the bodies of men lying on the ground slain, Doddridge thinks the apostle, by using that word here, represents the wicked men of the world as lying slain by the devil, to give us an affecting idea of the miserable and helpless state of mankind fallen by the stroke of that malicious merciless enemy.

Ver. 20.—1. Hath given us understanding, that we might know the true God.]—In the translation of this clause I have supplied the word God from the end of the verse, not only because it is found in the Alexandrian MS., and in the Vulgate version, but because the sense of the passage requires it. In the Vulgate, this verse is translated as follows: 'Et dedit nobis sensum ut cognoscamus verum Deum, et simus in vero filio ejus: Hic est verus Deus, et vita eterna.'—And hath given us understanding, that we might know the true God, and might be in his true Son. This is the true God, and life eternal.' It seems the copy from which the Vulgate translation was made, read here, του αληθινου θεου, και ωσιν εν τω αληθινω υιω αυτου.

2. This is the true God.]—Because the person last mentioned in what goes before is Jesus Christ, many commentators and theologians contend, that the demonstrative pronoun αυτου stands here for Jesus Christ, and that he is the person who is called the true God. But as pronouns often denote the remote antecedent, when the circumstances of the case require them to be so understood, (Esa. iv. 63.), others are of opinion that αυτου, in this passage, refers, not to Jesus Christ the near antecedent, but to του αληθινου, the true one, or true God, whom the Son of God had given the Christians understanding to know. And this opinion they think probable, because, if the apostle by αυτου means Jesus Christ, he maketh him the true God, notwithstanding in the sentence which immediately precedes αυτου, he distinguisheth the true one from his Son Jesus Christ: και ωσιν εν τω αληθινω, εν τω υιω αυτου λεγου Χριστου.—And we are under the true one, under his Son Jesus Christ.' Now, although our translators have destroyed that distinction, and have made Jesus Christ the true God, by inserting the word even, in their translation, between the two clauses of the sentence in this manner, 'And we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ'; yet as they have inserted that word without the authority of any ancient MS., the critics who make αυτου refer, not to Jesus Christ, but to του αληθινου, think their opinion ought to have no weight in a matter of such importance.—Glaucus, Philolog. Sacr. p. 714. tells us that Athanasius, in the council of Nice, disputing against Arius, called this text of John a written demonstration; and added, 'That as Christ said of the Father, John xvii. 3. 'This is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God'; so John said of the Son, 'This is the true God and eternal life.' And that Arius then accused in this written demonstration, and confessed the Son of God

31 Dear children, keep yourselves from worshipping false gods and images. Now, to shew my sincerity in this, and in all the things I have written to you, I conclude the whole with an Amen.

to be the true God. For these facts Glassius appeals to Athanasij Oper. tom. 3. p. 705.

¹ Ver. 21. Little children, keep yourselves from idols.—For the meaning of the word idols, see 1 Cor. viii. 4. note 2.—The apostle cautioned his disciples against going with the heathens into the temples of their idol gods, to eat of their feasts upon the sacrifices which they offered to these gods, and against being present at any act of worship which they paid to them, because, by being present at the worship of idols, they participated in that worship; as is plain from what St. Paul hath written on that subject, 1 Cor. viii. and x.—The exhortation to the brethren to keep themselves from idols, sheweth that this epistle was intended for the converted Gentiles everywhere, as well as for the Jews in Judea, to whom I suppose it was first sent.

II. JOHN.

PREFACE.

SECT. I.—Of the Authenticity of John's Three Epistles.

THE internal evidence of the authenticity of the three epistles commonly ascribed to John,¹ having been explained in the Preface to the First Epistle, sect. 2., this section shall be employed in setting before the reader what is called the external evidence, arising from the testimony of contemporary and of succeeding authors, who speak of these epistles as written by John the apostle.

Lardner on the Canon, vol. iii. p. 262. hath shewed, That the first epistle of John is referred to by Polycarp, and by the martyrs of Lyons;—That his first and second epistles are quoted by Irenæus, and were received by Clemens of Alexandria;—That Origen saith, "John beside the Gospel and Revelation, hath left us an epistle of a few lines: Grant also a second and third: For all do not allow these to be genuine;"—That Dionysius of Alexandria received John's first epistle, which he calls his Catholic Epistle, and likewise mentions the other two as ascribed to him;—That the first epistle was received by Cyprian;—And that the second is cited by Alexander, bishop of Alexandria.

Eusebius's testimony to the first epistle of John hath been already mentioned in his own words; Pref. to James, sect. 2. paragr. 2. In bearing that testimony, Eusebius insinuateth that some ascribed the second and third epistles to another person of the name of John, called the Elder, of whom he speaks, lib. iii. c. 39.—Jerome likewise hath mentioned this John in his catalogue. And Grotius, on a circumstance mentioned by Bede, in a passage to be produced immediately, hath ascribed the second and third epistles to him, in opposition to the testimony of the earliest and best Christian writers.

All the three epistles were received by Athanasius, by Cyril of Jerusalem, by the Council of Laodicea, by Epiphanius, and by Jerome. But the second and third were doubted by some in Jerome's time.—All the three were received by Ruffin, by the third council of Carthage, by Augustine, and by all those authors who received the same Canon of the New Testament which we do.—All the three are in the Alexandrian MS. and in the catalogue of Gregory Nazianzen, and of Amphilochius, who observes that some received only one of them.—The Syrian churches received only the first. See Pref. to James, sect. 2. paragr. 3. Nor did Chrysostom receive any other.

Bede, in the beginning of the eighth century, wrote thus in his exposition of the second epistle: "Some have thought this and the following epistle not to have been written by John the apostle, but by another, a presbyter of the same name, whose sepulchre is still seen at Ephesus; whom also Papias mentions in his writings. But now it is the general consent of the church, that John the apostle wrote also these two epistles, inasmuch as there is a great agreement of the doctrine and style between these and his first epistle. And there is also a like zeal against heretics."

Mill, in his Prolegomena, No. 153, observes, that the second and third epistles of John resemble the first in sentiment, phraseology, and manner of expressing things.—The resemblance in the sentiments and phraseology may be seen by comparing 2 Epistle ver. 5. with 1 Epistle ii. 8.—and ver. 6. with 1 Epistle v. 3.—and ver. 7. with 1 Epistle v. 5.—and 3 Epistle ver. 12. with John xix. 35.—Of John's peculiar manner of expressing things, 2 Epistle ver. 7. and 3 Epistle ver. 11. are examples.—Mill farther observes, that of the 2d Epistle, which consists only of 13 verses, 8 may be found in the first, either in sense or in expression. See Whitty's Pref. to 2 John.

The title of elder, which the writer of the second and third epistles hath taken, is no reason for thinking that they were not written by John the apostle. For elder denotes that the person so called was of long standing in the Christian faith, and had persevered through a long course of years in that faith, notwithstanding the many persecutions to which all who professed the gospel were exposed in the first age. It was therefore an appellation of great dignity, and entitled the person to whom it belonged to the highest respect from all the disciples of Christ. For which reason it was assumed by the apostle Peter, 1 Pet. v. 1.—Heuman gives it as his opinion, that in the title of elder there is a reference to John's great age when he wrote these epistles, and that he was as well known by the title of elder as by his proper name; so that elder was the same as if he had said the aged apostle.—The circumstance that the writer of these epistles hath not mentioned his own name, is agreeable to John's manner, who neither hath mentioned his name in his gospel, nor in the first epistle, which is unquestionably his. Besides, it may have been a point of prudence in the writer of these epistles to conceal himself, under the appellation of the elder, from his enemies, into whose hands these epistles might come.

Beausobre and L'Enfant, in their preface to the second and third epistles, take notice that the writer of the third epistle speaks "with an authority which the bishop of a particular church could not pretend to," and which did not suit John the presbyter, even supposing him to have been bishop of the church of Ephesus, as the pretended Apostolical Constitutions say he was appointed by John the apostle. For if Diotrophes was bishop of one of the churches of Asia, as is reckoned, the bishop of Ephesus had no right to say to him, as the writer of this epistle doth, ver. 10. 'If I come, I will remember his deeds which he does.' That language, and the visits made to the churches, denote a man who had a more general jurisdiction than that of a bishop, and can only suit St. John the apostle." This threatening, therefore, is an internal proof that the third epistle belongs to John, who, by his miraculous powers as an apostle, was able to punish Diotrophes for his insolent carriage toward the members of his church, and toward the apostle himself.

SECT. II.—Of the Person to whom John wrote his Second Epistle.

THE inscription of this epistle is Εκλεκτῇ κυρίᾳ; which hath been translated and interpreted differently, both by the ancients and the moderns.—Some, fancying Eclecta to be a proper name, have translated the inscription thus; 'To the Lady Eclecta.' Accordingly, in the Adumbrations of Clemens Alexandr. this epistle is said to have been written to a Babylonian woman, or virgin, named Eclecta.—Among the moderns, Wolf and Weinstein are of the same opinion as to the name of this woman. But Heuman and Benson contend that her name was Κυρία, Kyria, and translate the inscription thus: 'To the elect Kyria.'—Oecumenius in his prologue saith, "He calls her Elect, either from her name, or on account of the excellence of her virtue." And in his commentary on the beginning of the epistle he saith, "John did not scruple to write to a faithful woman, forasmuch as in Christ Jesus there is neither male nor female."—On the other hand, Cassiodorus, among the ancients, thought a particular church was meant by the apostle; and of the moderns, Whitby and Whiston were of the same opinion; for they say, this epistle was not written to a particular lady, but to a particular church: And Whiston mentions the church of Philadelphia; but Whitby that of Jerusalem, the mother of all the churches. Our English translation expresses the commonly received opinion concerning this matter; which Mill also, and Wall, and Wolf, with Le Clerc and Lardner, have adopted.—Beza too was of the same opinion, for in his note on the inscription he thus writes: "Some think Eclecta a proper name, which I do not approve, because in that case the order of the words would have been Κυρία Εκλεκτῇ, 'To the Lady Eclecta.' Others think this name denotes the Christian church in general. But that is disproved, first, by its being a manner of speaking altogether unusual; secondly, by the apostle's expressly promising, in the last two verses, to come to her and her children; thirdly, by sending to her the salutation of her sister, whom also she calls Eclecta. I therefore think this epistle was inscribed to a woman of eminence, of whom there were some here and there who supported the church with their wealth; and that he called her Elect, that is excellent, and gave her the title of Kyria, Lady, just as Luke gave to Theophilus, and Paul gave to Festus, the title of καριστή, most excellent. For the Christian religion doth not forbid such honourable titles to be given, when they are due."

It is supposed, that the writer of this letter did not mention the name of the lady to whom it was sent, lest the enemies of the gospel into whose hands it came, finding her pointed out as a person of eminence among the Christians, might have given her trouble. But the same reason should have hindered the writer of the third epistle from mentioning the name of Caius in its inscription. Benson therefore thinks Kyria the name of the woman to whom the second of these epistles was written: and in support of his opinion observes, that the authors of the second Syriac, and of the Arabic versions of this epistle, understood Kyria to be her name; for they have inserted the word Kyria in their versions, without translating it.

It is not known where this lady lived; but from the apostle's proposing to visit her soon, it is conjectured that she lived not far from Ephesus, where the apostle abode when he wrote to her.

SECT. III.—Of John's Design in writing his Second Epistle.

THE Continuator of Estius's commentary saith, that any one who compares ver. 7. of this epistle with what is written in the first letter, and with what Tertullian hath said De Prescript. c. 46., and Epiphanius Heres. 24., will be sensible that this short epistle was written to confute the errors of Basilides and his followers, who affirmed that Christ was not a real man, but only a man in appearance; consequently, that he neither did nor suffered what he appeared to do and suffer.

In the preface to the first epistle, sect. 3. it was observed; that in the latter end of the first age many false teachers, the disciples of Basilides, were going about disseminating his doctrine concerning the person of Christ. Wherefore, as that doctrine overturned the whole scheme of the gospel, and in particular annihilated the atonement which Christ is said in the gospel to have made for the sin of the world by his death; robbed Christians of their best hopes, and turned the whole of their faith into a dream or illusion, John did not content himself with condemning that pernicious doctrine in his first epistle, but judged it necessary, in a more particular manner, to put this lady and her children on their guard against the deceivers who taught it. He therefore said to them, ver. 7. If any teacher come to you, who doth not hold the true doctrine concerning the person of Christ, do not receive him into your house, neither wish him health and prosperity; lest, by seeming to encourage him in his errors, ye become partakers in his evil deeds.

Some readers, not attending to the circumstances in which this lady was, may, perhaps, from the apostle's advice to her, conclude that he was of an evil disposition himself, and encouraged in his disciples an intolerant spirit toward those who differed from them in opinion concerning matters of religion. But those who thus reason ought to consider, that the person to whom the apostle gave this advice was a woman, whose benevolent disposition laid her open to be imposed on by cunning deceivers. They ought also to call to mind the black picture which the apostle Paul, in his second to Timothy, chap. iii. 6, 7. and his epistle to Titus, chap. i. 10, 12. hath given of the ancient heretical teachers; together with what the Fathers have written concerning their base arts, their impiety, their monstrous tenets, their hypocrisy, their covetousness, and their debauchery. For, if they attend to these things, they will be sensible that the apostle's directions to this lady and her children were by no means too severe; especially as these heretical teachers pretended to be inspired; nay, to possess an higher degree of inspiration than even the apostles themselves were endowed with.—Besides, John's direction to this lady and her children are not inconsistent with the precepts of the other apostles, who have commanded us meekly to bear with those who err, and in the spirit of meekness to reclaim them: for the persons they had in view in these precepts were not false teachers, who disseminated their corrupt doctrines and who erred from corruption of heart, but persons who erred through weakness of understanding and ignorance. This is plain from Paul's ordering Titus to rebuke the false teachers in Crete with a cutting sharpness; and from his commanding Timothy to shun the company of obstinate heretics. And as John's advice to this lady is not inconsistent with the precepts of his brethren, so neither do they contradict his own precepts, earnestly and repeatedly delivered in his first epistle, to love and to do good to the worst of men. They are only advices to this lady and her children, not to expose themselves to the danger of being seduced by false teachers, and not to aid them in spreading their errors.—His advice, therefore, ought to be attended to by those who, either from piety or benevolence, are disposed to shew hospitality to teachers, of whose character and tenets they are ignorant; because such, notwithstanding their shew of godliness, and their plausible discourse, may be deceivers: in which case, the persons who entertain them in their houses, or who give them money, certainly become partakers of their evil deeds, as the apostle in this epistle hath expressly declared.

5 And now I beseech thee, lady,¹ not as writing to thee a new commandment,² but that which we had from the beginning, that we love one another.³

6 And this is the love, that we walk according to his commandments.¹ This is the commandment,² even as ye have heard from the beginning, that ye may walk in it.³

7 (Ὁτι, 256.) For many deceivers are entered into the world, who do not confess Jesus Christ did come in the flesh. This is the deceiver and the antichrist.²

8 Look to yourselves,¹ that we² may not lose the things which we have wrought, but may receive a full reward.³

9 Whosoever (ἀγαπᾶν) goeth beyond, and doth not abide in the doctrine of Christ,¹ acknowledgeth not God. He who abideth in the doctrine of Christ, the same acknowledgeth both the Father and the Son. (See 1 John v. 12. note.)

10 If any one come to you, and do not bring this doctrine,¹ do not receive him into your

5 And now I beseech thee, lady, not as writing to thee a new commandment—a commandment which thou never hearest before—but that commandment which we apostles had from our Master from the beginning, and which we have all along preached, that we love one another.

6 Moreover, this is the love of God, that we walk according to his commandments, 1 John v. 3. This is the great commandment of God, that ye believe in him whom he hath sent, (John vi. 29.), even as ye have heard from the beginning, in order that ye may constantly obey it. See 1 John ii. 5. note 1.

7 I put you in mind of God's commandment to believe on Jesus Christ, whom God sent into the world in the flesh, because many deceivers are entered into the world, who do not confess that Jesus Christ did come in the flesh, and who refuse to obey him. Every teacher of this sort is the false prophet and the antichrist foretold by our Lord to come.

8 Keep yourselves from these deceivers, that we who have converted you may not, by your following them, lose our labour, but, by presenting you faultless at the day of judgment, may receive our reward complete.

9 Whosoever goeth beyond, and doth not abide in the doctrine taught by Christ and his apostles, (see 1 John ii. 23. note), acknowledgeth not God. He who closely adheres to the doctrines taught by Christ and his apostles, the same acknowledgeth the authority both of the Father and of the Son, who have confirmed that doctrine in the most ample manner.

10 If any teacher come to you, and do not bring this doctrine, that Jesus Christ the Son of God did come in the flesh to save variation was in all respects suitable to the gospel. In this joy the apostle manifested the disposition of a faithful minister of Christ: for such derive their greatest happiness from the faith and holiness of their disciples. John spake in the same manner concerning Caius, 3 Epist. ver. 3.; and Paul concerning his converts, Philp. iv. 1.; 1 Thess. iii. 9.

Ver. 5.—1. Now I beseech thee, lady.]—This sort of address suited a particular person better than a whole church consisting of many individuals, to which, in the opinion of some, this letter was directed. See pref. sect. 2.

2. Not as writing to thee a new commandment.]—The apostle doth not speak of a new commandment, in the sense in which our Lord uses that phrase, when he said to his disciples, John viii. 34. 'A new commandment I give to you, that ye love one another: as I have loved you, that ye also love one another.' See 1 John ii. 8. note 1. But his meaning is, either that the commandment to love one another, which he gave to this lady, was not a commandment which had never been delivered to the church before; or that it was not a commandment peculiar to the gospel. The first of these I take to be the apostle's meaning; as he tells this lady, that the disciples of Christ had had this commandment delivered to them from the beginning.

3. But that which we had from the beginning, that we love one another.]—In inculcating this commandment so frequently and so earnestly in all his writings, John shewed himself not only a faithful apostle of Christ, but a person of an excellent heart. His own breast being full of love to mankind, he wished to promote that amiable disposition in all the disciples of Jesus. See the conclusion at the end of this epistle.

Ver. 6.—1. This is the love, that we walk according to his commandments.]—Most commentators think John is here describing the love mentioned in the preceding verse, namely, the love which Christians owe to each other. But since he tells us, that the love of which he now speaketh consists in the keeping of God's commandments, he must mean the love of God: for he delivers the same sentiment, 1 John v. 3. 'This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments.'

2. This is the commandment;—that is, the commandment by way of eminence. Wherefore, though the apostle doth not tell us what this commandment is, yet by calling it the commandment, he certainly directeth us to God's great commandment to obey his beloved Son Jesus Christ, whom he sent into the world made flesh, to save sinners. To this interpretation, the reason assigned by the apostle in the next verse, for putting the disciples in mind of God's commandment, agreeth; for 'many deceivers are entered into the world,' &c.

3. Even as ye have heard from the beginning, that ye may walk in it.]—The apostle having, from the beginning of the gospel, declared it to be God's commandment to obey Christ, John might well tell his disciples, that 'they had heard it preached from the beginning in order that they might constantly obey it.'

Ver. 7.—1. Who do not confess Jesus Christ did come in the flesh.]—Ἐχρησίου being the participle of the imperfect of the indicative, is rightly translated did come; for Jesus Christ was not on earth in the flesh when John wrote this, as the translation in our Bible, is come, imports. Had had come in the flesh, but was gone. For which reason no translation of this clause, which representeth Jesus Christ as then present, can be just. Beza, in his note on ἐχρησίου, after observing that it is not the participle of the present, but of the imperfect tense, tells us, that this participle is used in innumerable places for the aorist; and gives us an example, 3 John ver. 3. where ἐχρησίου is put for ἔλθοντες, and is rendered accordingly, even by our translators, 'when the brethren came.'—In the Vulgate version of the verse under our consideration, ἐχρησίου is rightly translated venisse.

2. This is the deceiver, and the antichrist.]—Notwithstanding these appellations are in the singular number, they do not denote any particular false teacher, but a number of such; as is plain from the precedent clause, where it is said, 'many deceivers are entered into the world.' Perhaps the apostle used the singular number emphatically, to lead this lady to recollect our Lord's prediction concerning the false teachers who were to arise. See 1 John ii. 18. note 3. iv. 3. note 2.

Ver. 8.—1. Look to yourselves.]—Βλέπετε, look attentively to yourselves, and to those around you, that they may not by any crafty methods seduce you into the paths of error and vice.

2. That we may not lose the things which we have wrought.]—Five of Stephen's MSS., the Alexandrian and other MSS., the Vulgate, the second Syriac, and the Ethiopic versions, for ἀπολομένην ἀ εὐεργεσίαν read here ἀπολήσεται ἀ εὐεργεσίαν, 'that ye may not lose the things which ye have wrought.' Grotius saith, this agrees better than the common reading with what goeth before.

3. But may receive a full reward.]—The elect lady and her children were to take heed to themselves, for this, among other reasons, that the apostles who had converted them might not lose that part of their reward which is promised to them who turn others to righteousness, Dan. xii. 3. And even although no particular reward were promised to those who are instrumental in converting others, certainly, by the apostasy of their disciples, such will lose the joy which their perseverance in faith and holiness would give them; see Heb. xii. 17.—The person who was to receive a full reward, in consequence of this lady and her children's looking to themselves, is the apostle; for if the others apostatized, they would receive no reward at all.

Ver. 9. Whosoever goeth beyond, and doth not abide in the doctrine of Christ.]—Ἰσχυσαίμεν. This word signifies to pass over, in any direction, the bounds which are prescribed to a person. Now, as the doctrine of Christ is contained within certain limits, he who teacheth a different doctrine goeth beyond these limits. And to make this plain the apostle adds, 'And doth not abide in the doctrine of Christ.' Wherefore, the person who either neglecteth to teach any part of the doctrine of Christ, or who teacheth what is not the doctrine of Christ, is equally culpable, and doth not acknowledge God.—The doctrine of Christ which the apostle had in his view here, I suppose, is the doctrine concerning Christ, that he is the Son of God sent into the world made flesh to save mankind; see 1 John ii. 23.

Ver. 10.—1. If any one come to you, and doth not bring this doctrine,]—namely, the doctrine mentioned in the preceding verse. Here more is meant than is expressed. For the apostle, in this soft expression, condemned those who brought or taught a contrary doctrine.—From this precept it appears, that when those who profess to be the disciples of Christ, came to any place where they were not known to the brethren who resided there, nor were recommended to them by some with whom they were acquainted, they made themselves known to them as the real disciples of Christ, by declaring their faith. It is necessary to call the reader's attention to this custom, because it shews the propriety of the apostle's advice to this pious lady and her children. See the following note.

house,² nor wish him happiness.³

11 For he who wisheth him happiness, partaketh in his deeds, which ARE evil.

12 Having many things to write to you,¹ I did not incline TO COMMUNICATE THEM by paper and ink;² (αλλα) because I hope to come to you, and speak face to face, that our joy may be made complete.

13 The children of thy elect¹ sister salute thee.² Amen.

2. Do not receive him into your house.]—In the eastern countries, where there were no inns for the entertainment of travellers as with us, to receive and entertain strangers in one's house was considered, either as a duty which friends mutually owed to each other, or as the beginning of a lasting friendship. But after the inhabitants of these countries became Christians, they exercised hospitality to their stranger brethren from a still nobler principle, especially when these strangers were employed in spreading the gospel. For in that case, love to Christ and a regard to his religion strongly moved them to these kind offices; see Rom. xii. 8. note 5.—From the example of Apollōs, mentioned Acts xviii. 27. and from what is insinuated 2 Cor. iii. 1. concerning the false teachers who had come from Judea to Corinth, it appears, that when the brethren had occasion to go to any church where they were not known, they carried letters of recommendation from persons who were acquainted with some of the members of that church, who, on the credit of these letters, received and entertained them. Or, if these strangers had no recommendatory letters, they made themselves known as sincere disciples of Christ, by declaring their faith to the bishop and elders of the church to which they came, as is insinuated in the first clause of the verse under consideration. These customs were prudently established in the first age, to prevent the churches from being deceived by the heretical teachers, who very early went about disseminating their errors.—The lady to whom the apostle wrote this letter being rich, and of a very benevolent disposition, perhaps living also in a place where the Christians were too few, or too poor, to have a fund for the entertainment of strangers, she might think herself under the more obligation, to pay attention to the wants of those strangers who went about preaching the gospel. Wherefore, to prevent her from being deceived by impostors, the apostle directed her to require these teachers to give an account of the doctrines which they taught; and if she found that they did not hold the true doctrine concerning the person of Christ, he advised her not to receive them into her house, nor even to give them the common salutation of wishing them health and happiness. For, among the Christians of that age, this wish was not a mere compliment, as with us, but an expression of real good-will. The apostle's advice, therefore, was perfectly proper, because they who entertained, or otherwise showed respect to false teachers, enabled mankind, do not receive him into your house, nor express your approbation of him by giving him the common salutation.

11 For he who giveth him the common salutation, thereby expresseth his approbation of his conduct, and partaketh in the evils which his corrupt doctrine may occasion.

12 Having many things to write to you concerning those deceivers who call themselves inspired teachers, I did not incline to communicate them by paper and ink; because I hope to come to you soon, and to speak to you freely face to face concerning these deceivers, that our mutual joy may be made complete.

13 The children of thy excellent sister, who are now with me, desire me in their name to wish thee health and happiness in token of their love. Amen.

them the more effectually to spread their erroneous doctrine, to the ruin of those whom they deceived; consequently, as the apostle observes, they became partakers in their evil deeds. See Preface, sect. 3. last paragraph.

3. Nor wish him happiness.]—Χαίρειν αὐτῷ μὴ λυγιστε. The Greeks usually began their letters to each other with a wish of health and happiness, which they expressed by the word χαίρειν. Alas, with it, they saluted one another at meeting. Wherefore the apostle's meaning is, as in the commentary, Do not express either good-will to a false teacher, or approbation of his behaviour, by giving him the common salutation.

Ver. 12.—1. Having many things to write to you.]—The apostle, I suppose, meant many things concerning the characters and actions of the false teachers: Perhaps also he wished to mention the names of the false teachers whom he had in view. But these things he did not think it proper to write in a letter; especially as he proposed to visit this lady and her children soon, and to converse with them personally.

2. I did not incline to communicate them by paper and ink.]—Δι' ἔργων. From this Bengelius conjectures, that in writing this letter John made use of paper, not parchment.

Ver. 13.—1. The children of thy elect sister.]—The word elect here, as in ver. 1. and some other passages of scripture, doth not signify chosen from eternity to salvation. For the apostle could not know that the lady's sister was so elected, unless the matter had been made known to him by a particular revelation, which is not alleged to have been the case by any who so interpret election. But it signifies a person of an excellent character; such by the Hebrews being called elect persons, Esa. iv. 41.

2. Salute thee.]—Ασπασματα. The salutations which the Christians in the first age gave to each other, were not of the same kind with the salutations of unbelievers, which were wishes of temporal health and felicity only, but they were wishes of health and happiness to their souls, and expressions of the most sincere love. See 3 John ver. 2.—The apostle sent this lady the salutation of the children of her excellent sister, to intimate to her, that they were all Christians, and that they persevered in the true doctrine of the gospel. Probably they and their mother lived in the city, or place of the country, where the apostle had his residence.

CONCLUSION.

THE frequency and earnestness with which St. John hath inculcated mutual love, his declaring that it is the only sure proof of our love to God, and his assuring us that it banisheth from the mind of the person who possesses it all fear of the judgment, may justly make us solicitous to form a just idea of so excellent a quality, and raise in us a sincere endeavour to acquire it. I therefore observe, that since the love which the gospel enjoins is a duty which is due from all to all, it cannot be that which is called the love of esteem, because of that none but the virtuous can be the objects; neither can it be the love of gratitude, since gratitude is due only to benefactors: but it must be the love of benevolence; an affection which all may exercise toward all: only it is more especially due to the good. Yet every kind of benevolence will not mark a person as a real disciple of Christ, nor banish from one's mind all fear of the judgment, because some may be benevolent naturally, and others may do beneficent actions merely to gain applause, or to promote some worldly purpose. Whereas the benevolence peculiar to the real disciples of Christ, is that alone which proceeds from love to God, and from a regard to his will. So John hath told us, chap. v. 2. By this we know that we love the children of God in a right manner, when we love God, and from that principle keep his commandments, particularly his commandment to love one another: Not, however, in word or in tongue only, but in truth and in deed, by doing them good according to our power. If so, our love to each other is to be judged of and measured, not so much by the warmth of our affection, for that depends on one's natural temper, as by our doing good to others from a regard to the commandment or will of God.—That true Christian love consists in beneficence, John hath taught us, by telling us, that as the love of God to us consists in his doing us good continually, so our love to one another consisteth in doing them good, even to the laying down our lives for them, 1 Epist. iii. 16.—According to this view of love, persons whose natural temper does not admit of great warmth of affection, but who, from an habitual regard to the will of God, do all the good they can to others, really possess a greater degree of the love which Christ hath enjoined, than those persons who, having warmer affections, are moved to do acts of beneficence merely from natural disposition, without any regard to the will of God.

If the love which Christ hath enjoined consists in beneficence, how fortunate are those to whom God hath given the means of doing good, not only to their own relations and friends, but to the poor and needy who apply to them; and how cogent are the obligations which God hath laid on the great, the powerful, and the rich, to be general benefactors to mankind, by doing good and communicating. Being thus imitators of God in his greatest attribute, they do what is more acceptable to him than sacrifice, according to the saying of the heathen poet Menander, translated in Adventurer, No. 185. "He that offers in sacrifice, O Pamphilus, a multitude of bulls and of goats, of golden vestments, or purple garments, or figures of ivory, or precious gems, and imagines by this to conciliate the favour of God, is grossly mistaken, and has no solid understanding. For he that would sacrifice with success, ought to be (χρηστικός) beneficent, no corrupter of virgins, no adulterer, no robber or murderer for the sake of lucre. Covet not, O Pamphilus, even the thread of another man's needle; for God, who is near thee, perpetually beholds thy actions."

Temperance, and justice, and purity are here inculcated in the strongest manner, and upon the most powerful motive, the Omniscience of the Deity; at the same time, superstition and the idolatry of the heathen are artfully ridiculed. I know not among the ancients any passage that contains such exalted and spiritualized thoughts of religion.

III. JOHN.

PREFACE.

SECT. I.—Of the Authenticity of the Third Epistle of John.

FOR the proofs of the authenticity of this epistle, see Pref. 2 John, sect. 1. To which may be added, that, in the third epistle, we find some sentiments and expressions which are used in the second. Compare ver. 4. with 2d epistle, ver. 4., and ver. 13, 14. with 2d epistle, ver. 12.

SECT. II.—Of the Persons to whom this Epistle was written.

THIS short letter is inscribed to a person named Gaius, or, according to the Latin orthography, Caius; a common name, especially among the Romans. In the history of the Acts, and in the epistles, we meet with five persons of this name.—1. There is a Caius who was with St. Paul in Ephesus during the riot of Demetrius, and who is called 'a man of Macedonia,' and 'Paul's companion in travel,' Acts xix. 29.—2. A Caius is mentioned Acts xx. 4. called Caius of Derbe, which was a city of Lycaonia or Isauria. Probably he was a person different from the Macedonian Caius, though like him he was Paul's assistant in preaching the gospel. Caius of Derbe accompanied Paul to Jerusalem with the collection for the saints. Probably, therefore, he was chosen by the churches of Lycaonia their messenger for that effect.—3. Paul, writing from Corinth to the church of Rome, speaks of a Caius with whom he lodged, Rom. xvi. 23. who was a very benevolent person, and in opulent circumstances: for the apostle called him his host, and the host of the whole church of Corinth. Wherefore, as the Caius to whom John wrote his 3d epistle, was in like manner a very benevolent person, and in good circumstances, Bede, and after him Lightfoot, conjectured that he was the Caius who, in Paul's epistle to the Romans, sent his salutation to the church at Rome.—4. The same apostle mentions his having baptized one of the name of Caius at Corinth, 1 Cor. i. 14. Probably he was the person whom in his epistle to the Romans, which was written from Corinth, Paul calls his host and the host of the church.—5. There was a Caius to whom John wrote this third epistle. Him Estius and Heuman thought a different person from all those above mentioned, because the apostle, by numbering him among his children, ver. 4. hath insinuated that he was his convert, which they suppose he could not say of any of the Caius's mentioned above.

In the ancient history of the church, we meet with three persons of the name of Caius. One of them a bishop of Ephesus, another of Thessalonica, and a third of Pergamos; all about this time.—Whiston and Mill have said, that the bishop of Pergamos was the Caius to whom John wrote his third epistle. But, as Lardner observes, they said this on the testimony of the pretended Apostolical Constitutions, which in the present affair are of no authority at all. Besides, from the epistle itself it is evident, that Caius, to whom it was written, was at that time a person in a private station.

Lardner's account of Caius is, that "he was an eminent Christian, who lived in some city of Asia not far from Ephesus, where St. John chiefly resided after his leaving Judea. For, ver. 14. the apostle speaks of shortly coming to him; which he could not well have done if Caius lived at Corinth, or any other remote place." Canon, vol. iii. p. 298.

Caius being neither a bishop nor a deacon, but a private member of some church of which the apostle took the inspection, his hospitality to the brethren, and to the strangers who came to him, is a proof that he possessed some substance, and that he was of a very benevolent disposition. Grotius thought Caius a good Christian, who lived in one of the churches or cities mentioned in the Revelation. However, as John hath not suggested any circumstance by which we can distinguish his Caius from others of the same name, it is impossible to say with any certainty who he was, or where he lived.

SECT. III.—Of the Apostle's Design in writing his Third Epistle, and of the Persons who are mentioned in it by name.

It doth not seem to have been John's design in writing to Caius, either to guard him against the attempts of the heretical teachers who were gone abroad, or to condemn the errors which they were at great pains to propagate; but only, in the first place, to praise Caius for having shewed kindness to some brethren and strangers, who, in journeying among the Gentiles, had come to the place where Caius resided; and to encourage him to shew them the like kindness, when they should come to him again in the course of their second journey.—In the next place, he wrote this letter for the purpose of rebuking and restraining one Diotrephes, who had arrogantly assumed to himself the chief direction of the affairs of the church of which Caius was a member; and who had refused to assist the brethren and strangers above mentioned; and even had hindered those from receiving and entertaining them who were desirous to do it.—In the third place, the apostle wrote this letter to commend an excellent person named Demetrius, who, in disposition and behaviour, being the reverse of Diotrophes, the apostle proposed him as a pattern whom Caius and the rest were to imitate.

Commentators are not agreed in their accounts of the brethren and the strangers, to whom Caius shewed kindness as they passed through his city. Grotius and Lampe thought these strangers were believing Jews, who had been driven out of Palestine by their unbelieving brethren, or who had been forced away by the calamities brought on that country during the Jewish war, and had come into Asia in hopes of obtaining assistance from the Christians in that province, or perhaps of obtaining a settlement among them. Grotius supposes Diotrophes would not receive these strangers, nor even the brethren, that is, the Christians who were of his acquaintance, because they joined the rites of the law with the gospel. This, likewise, was the opinion of Le Clerc and Beausobre. Wherefore, according to these authors, Diotrophes was a Gentile convert, and zealous for the freedom of the Gentiles from the yoke of the law. But Mosheim rejects their opinion, as having no foundation in antiquity. Others think these strangers were Gentile converts, whom Diotrophes, a Jew zealous of the law, would not receive, because they did not observe the rites of Moses. That opinion Benson adopted, founding it on this circumstance, that Diotrophes 'did not receive John;' that is, did not acknowledge his authority as an apostle. For he thinks none but the Judaizing teachers denied the authority of the apostles.

The brethren who were hospitably entertained by Caius, were some believers who had gone from Ephesus to the church where Caius abode; for they are said to have praised his liberality, in the presence of the church over which John presided. Probably they belonged to that church as members.—Further, since the apostle desired Caius to help these brethren and strangers forward on their journey, it implieth that they had gone forth, or were going forth, on a second journey among the Gentiles, in which they proposed to visit Caius again. Esius conjectures, that John sent this letter to Caius by them.

The account given, ver. 7. of the purpose for which the brethren and strangers went forth to the Gentiles, inclines me to think they were preachers: 'For his name's sake they went forth.' Bede however informs us, that anciently two interpretations were given of these words. The first was, 'For his name's sake they went forth to preach the gospel;' the second, 'For the faith and profession of the holy name of Christ, they were expelled from their native country.' Heuman adopts the latter interpretation, and often calls these strangers exiles; and saith they were Gentiles. But, as the brethren are distinguished from the strangers, and as it is said that they bare witness to Caius's love before the church, it is reasonable to think these brethren were members of the church over which St. John presided.—And with respect to the strangers, without determining in this place whether they were exiles from their own country or not, I suppose, that, having come to the place where the brethren of whom the apostle speaks dwelled, they joined them in their journey, which I think was undertaken for the sake of preaching Christ to the Gentiles. If I am right in this conjecture, the strangers as well as the brethren were preachers, as above observed. For, if they were only persons in want, it was no commendation of them, 'that they went forth taking nothing of the Gentiles;' because, standing in need of alms, it was their duty, not only to receive but even to ask alms, for the support of their life, from the unbelieving Gentiles; especially as, in many places, there may have been no Christians to whom they could apply for relief. Whereas, if they were preachers, they were greatly to be praised, when, in imitation of the apostle Paul, they supported themselves by their own labour, and took nothing from their Gentile converts on the score of maintenance, lest it might have marred the success of their preaching. In short, if these brethren and strangers had not been preachers, the apostle could not with propriety have said, ver. 8. 'We therefore ought to receive such, that we may be joint labourers in the truth.' For the terms labourers and joint labourers are always, in the apostolical writings, applied to preachers of the gospel, or to those who in some way or other assisted the preachers of the gospel. These things Lardner did not attend to when he said, "I see nothing that should lead us to think preachers are spoken of, but only persons in want."

Commentators are no less divided concerning the character and office of Diotrophes.—Erasmus in his paraphrase saith, Diotrophes was the author of a new sect. This likewise was Bede's opinion. But, as other learned men have well argued, if Diotrophes had been a corrupter of the Christian doctrine, the apostle without doubt would have cautioned Caius, and all the members of his church, to have avoided him, as he desired the elect lady to avoid the false teachers of whom he wrote in his letter to her. But this, as Lamy observeth, he did not do. He only reproved the pride of Diotrophes, his contempt of the apostle's authority, but especially his ordering the members of his church not to shew kindness to the brethren and the strangers who applied to them for relief.

It is the opinion of many, that Diotrophes was a bishop in the church where he resided, and of which Caius was a member. In support of their opinion they observe, first, That he is said to have hindered those from receiving the brethren and the strangers, who were willing to shew them kindness; and to have cast them out of the church, who, contrary to his orders, continued to entertain them. Next, they take notice that the apostle said to Caius, ver. 9. 'I would have written to the church; but Diotrophes, who loveth to rule them, doth not receive us.' The apostles wrote most of their letters to the churches, that is, to the whole body of Christians living in a particular place, and sent them to the bishops and elders of these churches, to be by them read in the public assemblies for the instruction of their people. But, as Diotrophes did not acknowledge John's authority, he had reason to fear, that if he had written to the church, and had sent his letter to Diotrophes to be read by him publicly to the brethren, he would have suppressed it by virtue of his episcopal authority; or, if it had been read to the church without his consent, he would have rendered it ineffectual by means of his adherents.

Heuman thought that Diotrophes was a deacon; and that, having the charge of the church's stock, he had it in his power to refuse relief to the brethren and strangers who applied to him; and that by so doing he cast them out of the church, that is, obliged them to depart. But Lardner, who supposeth Diotrophes to have been a bishop, argueth, that as he loved to rule every thing in his church according to his own pleasure, his office as bishop enabled him to restrain the deacons from employing any part of the church's stock in relieving the brethren and the strangers.

Demetrius, who is so highly praised by the apostle in this letter, is thought to have held some sacred office in the church of which Caius was a member. But Benson rejects this opinion, because, on that supposition, Caius must have known him so well as to need no information concerning his character from the apostle. Benson therefore believed him to be the bearer of this letter, and one of the brethren who went out to preach to the Gentiles. But whoever Demetrius was, his character and behaviour were the reverse of the character and behaviour of Diotrephes. For the apostle speaks of him as one who was esteemed of all men, and whose behaviour in every respect was conformable to the gospel; in short, one to whom the apostle himself bore the most honourable testimony. This high character of Demetrius, John wrote to Caius, that he and all the members of the church might imitate him rather than Diotrephes, whose arrogance, uncharitableness, and contempt of the apostle's authority, were so great, that he threatened to punish him for these enormities when he visited Caius; which he promised to do soon, that he might have an opportunity of speaking with Caius face to face concerning that imperious man.

SECT. IV.—Of the Date of the Second and Third Epistles of John.

Or the time of writing the second and third epistles of John, nothing, as Lardner observes, can be said with certainly. But he tells us, "Mill places them about the same time with the first; that is, in the year 91 or 92. Whiston supposeth that they were all three written about the year 82 or 83. I imagine that St. John was somewhat advanced in age, and that he had resided a good while in Asia before he wrote any of these epistles; consequently I am disposed to think that these two were not writ sooner than the first. And as it was before argued, that the first epistle was written about the year 80, these two may be reckoned to have been writ between the years 80 and 90." Thus far Lardner, Can. vol. iii. p. 313.

In the preface to the first epistle, I have attempted to shew from the epistle itself, that it was written about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem: But there is nothing in the second and third epistles leading us to think they were written so early. We may therefore fix their date as late as Lardner hath done; or even later, when John was so old as with much propriety to take the title of the elder, or aged apostle, by way of eminence.

View and Illustration of the Matters contained in this Epistle.

To encourage Caius to persevere in that virtuous course by which he had obtained the love of all who knew him, John, in the inscription of this letter, declared his own love to him, on account of the uncommon goodness of his character and actions, ver. 1.—and prayed to God to prosper him in his spiritual concerns, ver. 2.—and told him what joy it gave him, when the brethren who had been assisted by him, brought him the welcome news of his perseverance in the true doctrine of the gospel, ver. 3.—because the apostle's greatest joy was to hear that his disciples walked in the truth, ver. 4.—Next, he praised Caius as acting agreeably to the gospel, when he shewed kindness to the brethren and to the strangers who had applied to him for succour in their straits, ver. 5.—And to encourage him to persevere in these charitable Christian offices, he told Caius, that the brethren and strangers, when they returned, bore an honourable testimony to his love publicly before the church over which John presided. And as they were, at the time this letter was written, making a second journey among the Gentiles, he told them, if he helped them forward a second time, in a manner worthy of God whom they served, by succouring them he would still do a good work acceptable to God, ver. 6.—because these brethren and strangers, for the sake of publishing the name of Christ and the doctrine of the gospel among the Gentiles, were gone forth, as formerly, with a resolution of taking nothing on the score of maintenance from the Gentiles, notwithstanding they greatly benefited the Gentiles by preaching the gospel to them, ver. 7.—For which cause, all who had the furtherance of the gospel at heart, he told him, were bound to shew such persons kindness, that they might be joint labourers with them in spreading and establishing the truth, ver. 8.

Next, he told Caius, that he would have written the same exhortation to the church of which he was a member; but he had abstained from writing, because Diotrephes, who ruled every thing in that church according to his own humour, did not acknowledge his apostolical authority: thereby insinuating, that Diotrephes probably would have suppressed any letter which the apostle might write, ver. 9.—He added, that because Diotrephes did not acknowledge his authority, he would, when he came among them, put him in mind of his deeds; his prating against the apostle with malicious words, his not receiving the brethren and the strangers who had applied to him in their straits for relief, his hindering the members of his church from assisting them, who were disposed to do it, and his casting those out of the church who had persevered in assisting them, contrary to his arbitrary orders. By this, I think, the apostle threatened to exercise his miraculous power in punishing Diotrephes for his evil deeds, ver. 10.—But, beloved, said he, do not imitate what is evil in Diotrephes, but what is good in Demetrius, one of your own church: For he who doth good actions is begotten of God; but he who doth evil actions hath not seen God—he hath no right knowledge of God, ver. 11.—He then told Caius, that Demetrius was every way worthy of being imitated, because he was praised not only by all good men, but by the gospel itself, his temper and actions being conformable to the precepts of the gospel in every respect. To these honourable testimonies John added his own approbation of Demetrius's character, which Caius knew to be a true testimony, because he knew that the apostle never praised any person from flattery, ver. 12.—He told him farther, that he had many things to write to him concerning the unchristian temper and conduct of Diotrephes; but he would not commit them to paper, lest his letter, falling into other hands, might be shewed to that imperious man, and enrage him against Caius, ver. 13.—But he hoped to visit Caius soon, and then would speak to him mouth to mouth freely concerning Diotrephes. In the mean time, to testify his esteem of Caius, he gave him his apostolical benediction, together with the salutation of all the faithful who were with him; and whom he named the friends, because they were the friends of Christ, and lived in strict friendship with each other. Lastly, he desired Caius in his name to wish health and happiness to all the faithful in his church, whom he termed the friends, because they also were the friends of Christ, and lived in the strictest friendship with each other, ver. 14.

NEW TRANSLATION.

COMMENTARY.

VER. 1. The elder¹ to Caius the beloved, whom I love in truth.²

VER. 1.—The elder to Caius the beloved of all who know him, whom I also love most sincerely.

VER. 1.—1. The elder.]—This appellation signifies the aged apostle. See Pref. to 2 John, sect. 1. penult para.

2. To Caius (see Pref. sect. 2.) the beloved, whom I love in truth.]—See 2 John, ver. 1. note 5.

2 Beloved, I pray that (ver. 279.) with respect to all things,¹ thou mayest prosper² and be in health, even as thy soul prospereth.³

3 For I rejoiced greatly¹ when the brethren² came and bare witness to thy truth,³ even as thou walkest in truth.

4 I have no greater joys than those WHICH I HAVE¹ (ver. 199.) when I hear² my children³ are walking in truth.

5 Beloved, thou dost faithfully¹ what thou performest for the brethren, and for the strangers.²

6 (Oa. 67.) These have borne testimony to thy (εμας) love in the presence of the church;¹ whom if thou help forward on their journey² in a manner worthy of God, thou wilt do well;

7 Because for his name's sake they went forth,¹ receiving nothing from the Gentiles.²

Ver. 2.—1. Beloved, I pray that with respect to all things thou mayest prosper.]—In the Greek it is, καὶ παντα εὐχόμενος ἵνα εὖ σοι ᾖ, which in our Bible is rendered, 'I wish above all things that thou mayest prosper.' Beza's translation is, 'Deum oro de omnibus rebus—I pray God concerning all things,' things temporal as well as things spiritual, 'that thou mayest prosper.' In this translation Beza is followed by Estius and Erasmus Schmidius. Doddridge's translation is, 'Beloved, I pray that in respect of all things.'

2. Thou mayest prosper.])—εὖ σοι ᾖ signifies to go on safely and successfully in a journey. Hence it signifies to be prosperous in general.

3. And be in health, even as thy soul prospereth.])—From John's using the word καὶ, some conjecture that Caius was of a sickly constitution of body; and from his wishing him prosperity, they fancy that Caius had sustained considerable worldly losses. But I see no reason for either of these conjectures. His worldly affairs, at the time John wrote to him, were such as enabled him to lodge and entertain the brethren and strangers who applied to him for relief. Perhaps also he gave them money to defray the expenses of their journey among the Gentiles. But be this as it may, it is evident that Caius had made himself remarkable among the Christians in that part of the world for his many virtues. For the apostle made his proficiency in the Christian graces the measure of that temporal prosperity and health which he wished to him, not for his own sake alone, but for the benefit of the church. Wherefore, in the apostle's wish there was a delicate intimation, that if Caius's riches, of which he had made so good a use, and his bodily health, were in proportion to his virtues, they would be very great, and the continuance of his life and health would be a singular blessing to the church.

Ver. 3.—1. For I rejoiced greatly.])—The connexion in which this verse stands with ver. 2 where the apostle told Caius that he prayed for him, teacheth us, that the most proper expression of our joy for the happiness and virtue of our friends, is to give thanks to God for the same, and to pray that those blessings may be continued to them.

2. When the brethren came.])—That ἐλπίσαντες is rightly rendered came, see proved 2 John ver. 7, note 1.—The brethren here spoken of seem to have been those mentioned ver. 5, who, having been sent by the apostle either to convert the Gentiles or to water the Gentile churches already planted, had been hospitably entertained by Caius, and perhaps assisted by him with money; and who, on their return to the apostle, had, in a meeting of the church over which he presided, given an account of Caius's perseverance in the true faith, and declared the great kindness which he had shewed to them, ver. 6, which was the more acceptable to them, as they had generously resolved to take nothing for their maintenance from the Gentiles to whom they preached the gospel.

3. And bare witness to thy truth.])—The apostle emphatically terms Caius's joining works of charity with faith in the doctrines of the gospel his truth. For there is no true faith without good works; it always produces good works: neither are any works good but such as proceed from faith. The two joined constitute the truth of religion.

Ver. 4.—1. I have no greater joys than those which I have.])—In the new translation of this clause I have supplied the words which I have; because the plural demonstrative pronoun ταύτων, construed as it must be with καὶ ἡγαπήσατον, cannot be translated without the addition of these words.—Rich. Baxter's note on this verse is good:—"True ministers rejoice more for the welfare of men's souls, than in their procuring wealth and worldly honours."—See 2 John ver. 4, note 2.

2. When I hear.])—So ὡς ἴσμεν must be translated. This use of ἴσμεν is thought by some a peculiarity in John's style. See, however, Rom. iv. 199.

3. My children.])—I think John, by reckoning Caius in the number of his children, means to tell us that Caius was converted by him. Others, however, are of opinion, that the apostle gave to

2 Beloved, having the highest opinion of thy faith and love, I pray to God that with respect to all things thou mayest prosper, and be in health to as great a degree as thy soul prospereth in faith, and love, and every virtue.

3 For I rejoiced greatly when the brethren, who went to the church of which thou art a member, came back, and informed me of thy holding the true faith of the gospel, and of thy walking agreeably to that true faith.

4 I have no greater joys than those which I have when I hear my disciples are walking in the true faith of the gospel.

5 Beloved, thou dost agreeably to the faith which thou professest what thou performest for the brethren who are gone forth to preach the gospel, and for the strangers who assist them in that good work.

6 These brethren and strangers have borne an honourable testimony to thy benevolence in the presence of the church here, whom if thou help forward on their second journey, by entertaining them and supplying them with necessities, in a manner worthy of God, who reckons what is done to his distressed servants as done to himself, thou wilt do well;

7 Because, for making the name of Christ as the Son of God known among the Gentiles, they went forth, and received nothing on the score of maintenance from the Gentiles to whom they preached, that their preaching might be the more acceptable.

those who were under his inspection the appellation of ἡμετέρας τέκνας, my children, to express his tender affection to them, and his concern for their welfare. And in support of their opinion they observe, that the term children is used to express affection, 1 John ii. But the terms used in that chapter are τέκνα μου, my little children, and παῖδες, young children, which strongly express affection. See 1 John ii. 1, note 1; whereas here, ἡμετέρας τέκνας, my children, denotes simply the relation of children to their father.

Ver. 5.—1. Beloved, thou dost faithfully.])—Πίστως ποιεῖς, 'Thou dost a faithful thing;' a thing becoming a faithful person; or one who is a real believer.

2. What thou performest for the brethren, and for the strangers.])—As the brethren are here distinguished from the strangers, the brethren, I suppose, were members of the church over which John presided. Accordingly it is said of them, ver. 7, that they went forth from the place of their residence, which I suppose was Ephesus, or some other city of Asia where John abode, to publish the name of Christ as the Son of God to the Gentiles in those parts. And, at their return from their first journey, they bare witness to the faith and love of Caius in the presence of the church from which they went forth. But the strangers were poor Christians, who, as Heuman supposes, having been driven from their habitation by their persecutors, had come to the city where Caius dwelt, in the hope of finding relief; and happening to meet the brethren there, they joined them in their first journey among the Gentiles.—To shew how unfaithfully the Papists have translated the scriptures, Benson takes notice, that, to give countenance to their pilgrimages, they have in some of their versions of this passage translated the clause καὶ εἰς τοὺς ἐρημικοὺς, and to pilgrims. With the same view they have translated ἐκ τῆς πόλεως, 1 Tim. v. 10. 'If she hath lodged pilgrims.' See another instance, James v. 11, note.—These examples shew of what importance toward the faithful translation of the sacred oracles it is, to give the true literal meaning of the word, as far as it can be done, with propriety.

Ver. 6.—1. These have borne testimony to thy love in the presence, &c.])—Since the apostle represents the strangers as joining the brethren in bearing witness to Caius's love before the church from which the brethren went forth to the Gentiles; also, since in ver. 7, these strangers are represented as having gone forth with the brethren to the Gentiles, it is probable, as was observed in note 2, on ver. 6, that these strangers met the brethren in the city or place where Caius lived, and joined them in their journey to the Gentiles; and accompanied them when they returned to the church from which they had come.

2. Whom if thou help forward on their journey.])—These brethren and strangers, it seemeth, proposed to undertake a second journey, or had undertaken it, for the purpose of preaching to the Gentiles. The apostle, therefore, requested Caius still to assist them in executing their pious resolution, by entertaining them. For, in the language of scripture, to help forward on a journey signifies, not only to accompany a person on a part of his journey, Acts xxi. 5, but also to furnish him with necessities for his journey, Tit. lii. 13.

Ver. 7.—1. Because for his name's sake they went forth.])—For the different interpretation of these words given by the ancient commentators, see Pref. sect. 3, par. 4.—I think these brethren and strangers were preachers, who had gone forth among the Gentiles for the sake of making known to them the name of Christ, that is, his character as the Son of God, and his office as Saviour of the world; because, as was observed, Pref. sect. 3, par. 4, if these strangers had been merely persons in want, there was no reason for their not receiving assistance from the Gentiles, whether converted or unconverted.

2. Receiving nothing from the Gentiles.])—It is not clear whether the apostle meant the converted or the unconverted Gentiles, or both. I am of opinion that he meant both; because, if the brethren and the strangers were preachers, they may have prudently resolved

8 We, therefore, ought to entertain¹ such, that we may be joint labourers in the truth.

9 (Eπελθε, supply as) I would have written² to the church; but Diotrephes,³ who loveth to rule them, doth not receive us.³

10 For this cause, when I come, I will bring his deeds to remembrance¹ which he practiseth, prating against us with malicious words; and, not content therewith, he doth not himself receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them who would, and casteth them out of the church.²

11 Beloved, do not thou imitate what is evil, but what is good.¹ He who doth good is of God; but he who doth evil hath not seen God.²

12 Testimony is borne to Demetrius by all men,¹ and by the truth itself. And we also bear testimony; and ye know that our testimony is true.²

13 I have many things to write:¹ But I do not incline to write THEM to thee with pen and

8 We, therefore, who do not undertake expensive journeys for the sake of preaching the gospel, ought to entertain in our houses those who do so, that in this manner we may be joint labourers with them in spreading the gospel.

9 I would have written the same exhortation to the church of which thou art a member; but Diotrephes, who loveth to rule them according to his own humour, doth not acknowledge my authority as an apostle of Christ.

10 For this cause, when I come, I will bring his deeds to his remembrance—I will punish him for his deeds—which he practiseth, prating against me with calumnious speeches, as if I were no apostle, but had assumed that office; and not content therewith, he doth not himself shew kindness to the brethren in their journey to the Gentiles, and forbiddeth them who are disposed to entertain them; and casteth them out of the church, when they do so contrary to his orders.

11 Beloved, do not thou imitate what is evil in the behaviour of Diotrephes, but imitate rather what is good in the behaviour of Demetrius, knowing that he who doth good works is begotten of God, but he who behaveth uncharitably to the servants of Christ in their straits, hath no right knowledge of God, 1 John iii. 10.

12 Praise is bestowed on Demetrius by all who know him, on account of his benevolence, his meekness, and his humility; and by the gospel itself, his temper and conduct being conformable to its precepts. And I also praise him highly; and ye know that my praise is always well-founded.

13 I have many things to write concerning the affairs of your church, and concerning Diotrephes: But I do not incline to write to receive neither entertainment nor money from the Gentiles, lest it might have marred the success of their preaching among them, when they found the reception of the gospel attended with expense. This at least was the consideration which determined the apostle Paul to preach the gospel gratis.—The commentators who think these brethren and strangers were simply poor Christians, who had been driven from their homes by their persecutors, suppose that they received nothing from the unconverted Gentiles, lest it might have given them occasion to say that there was no charity among the Christians.

Ver. 8. We, therefore, ought to entertain such.]—See Luke xv. 27. Gal. iv. 5. where προσλαμβάνειν signifies simply to receive, which, in the language of the New Testament, means to lodge and entertain a person in one's house; to keep company with him, as one whom we esteem. Wherefore, the apostle's sentiment in this precept is, that such of the brethren as had not devoted themselves to the preaching of the gospel, but followed their ordinary occupations at home, were bound to contribute according to their ability toward the maintenance of those who went about preaching the gospel. And to render his exhortation the more acceptable to them, he included himself in the exhortation: 'We ought to entertain such.' Benson thinks Caius was a Jewish Christian, and that the apostle's exhortation was directed particularly to Jewish believers, who, if they contributed towards the support of those who preached the gospel to the Gentiles, would thereby shew their earnest desire of the conversion of the Gentiles.

Ver. 9.—I would have written to the church.]—Επελθε γὰρ ἐγράψα. Six or seven MSS. read here ἐπελθε γὰρ, which is followed by the Vulgate scriptissem. The second Syriac likewise, and the Coptic versions, follow that reading, which I suppose is genuine; because, if the common reading is retained, the particle γὰρ must be supplied; as is plain from what follows, where the apostle, in apology for not writing to the church, adds, 'But Diotrephes, who loveth to rule them, doth not receive us; doth not acknowledge me as an apostle.' The letters which the apostles wrote to the churches were all sent to the bishops and elders in these churches to be by them read to the people in their public assemblies. See Eas. ii. If Diotrephes was a bishop, or elder, of the church to which John would have written, he might suspect that that imperious arrogant man would have suppressed his letter; consequently, to have written to a church of which he had usurped the sole government, would have answered no good purpose. The translation of this clause of our English Bible represents the apostle as saying, that he had written a letter, which is now lost. This to some may appear a difficulty. But the translation I have given, which is supported by several MSS., and by the Vulgate version, obviates that difficulty.

2. But Diotrephes, who loveth to rule them,]—namely, who are members of his church. From Diotrephes's loving to rule the church of which Caius was a member, many have supposed him to have been the bishop of that church. Besides, they think if he had been a private person only, he could not have hindered any letter which the apostle might have written to that church from being read in it, and from having its due effect. See the Preface to this epistle, sect. 3. par. 3. from the end.

3. Doth not receive us.]—On this circumstance Benson founds his opinion, that Diotrephes was a bigoted Judaizing teacher. For he thinks the persons who denied John's authority as an apostle were the Judaizers only, and not the Gentile teachers.

Ver. 10.—I will bring his deeds to remembrance which he prac-tiseth.]—Τὴν τιμὴν properly signifies to bring another to the remembrance of a thing, and it is so translated Jude ver. 6. In thus speaking, the writer of this epistle shewed himself to be Diotrephes's superior. It is therefore highly probable, that the writer of the third epistle of John was not the person called by the ancients John the presbyter, but John the apostle. Heuman and Lardner are of opinion, that the apostle only meant that he would put Diotrephes in mind of his evil deeds, and endeavour to persuade him to repent of them by mild admonitions. But there is no occasion to give a mild sense to the apostle's words. For, allowing that John threatened to punish Diotrephes for his insolence in prating against him with malicious words, and for his uncharitableness in refusing to entertain and assist the brethren and the strangers, his threatening did not proceed from resentment, but from zeal for the interests of religion, in which he is to be commended; because, as Whitby remarks on this verse, 'Private offences against ourselves must be forgiven and forgotten; but when the offence is an impediment to the faith, and very prejudicial to the church, it is to be opposed and publicly reprov'd.'

2. He doth not himself receive the brethren, and forbiddeth them who would, and casteth them out, &c.]—Because Caius, who shewed great kindness to the brethren and the strangers, doth not seem to have been cast out of the church by Diotrephes, Heuman contends, that the persons who were cast out of the church were not those who shewed kindness to the brethren and to the strangers, but the brethren and strangers themselves, whom he obliged to leave the church, by denying them relief himself, and by hindering others from relieving them. In support of this interpretation it is but fair to observe, that the relative pronoun ὅν ἐκ ἐξέπελθε not the near, but the remote antecedent, Eas. iv. 63. Yet I doubt that Heuman's interpretation doth not give the true meaning of the passage. Some commentators, by Diotrephes's casting the persons spoken of out of the church, understand his excommunicating them; a sense of the phrase which is suitable to Diotrephes's insolent and arrogant disposition, and agreeable to the supposition, that the persons whom he cast out of the church were those who relieved the brethren and the strangers.

Ver. 11.—I. Beloved, do not thou imitate what is evil, but what is good.]—Having reprobated the temper and behaviour of Diotrephes, the apostle naturally cautioned Caius against the pernicious influence of his bad example; and exhorted him to imitate another member of his own church, named Demetrius, who in character and conduct was the direct reverse of Diotrephes, and therefore was highly praised by all good men, and among the rest by the apostle himself.

2. He who doth good is of God.]—ὁ τὸν θεὸν ἀγαπᾷ, 'Is begotten of God;' for so this phrase signifies, 1 John iii. 10. See 1 John iii. 12. note 1.

Ver. 12.—1. Testimony is borne to Demetrius by all men.]—By bearing testimony to a person, the Jews meant the praising of him for his good qualities and actions. Thus it is said of Jesus, Luke iv. 22. 'All bare him witness,' that is, praised him. In like manner, Paul speaking of David, saith, Acts xii. 22. 'To whom God bare witness, saying, I have found David,' &c.—See what is said concerning Demetrius, Pref. sect. 3. last paragr.

2. And ye know that our witness is true.]—This expression is twice used by John in his gospel, chap. xix. 35. xxi. 24. which is a clear internal evidence that this epistle was written, not by John the presbyter, but by John the apostle.

Ver. 13. I have many things to write, &c.]—John said the same ink.

14 For I hope straightway to see thee, (see, 312.) and so we shall speak face to face. Peace be to thee. The friends HERE salute thee.² Salute the friends by name.³

to the elect lady and her children, 2 Epist. ver. 12. See the note on that verse.

Ver. 14.—1. I hope straightway to see thee.—Lardner conjectures that John did actually visit Calus, and adds, "I please myself with the supposition that his journey was not in vain. I imagine that Diotrephes submitted and acquiesced in the advices and admonitions of the apostle. Of this I have no assurance. However, I may add, neither doth any one else know the contrary." Cason, vol. iii. p. 312.

2. The friends here salute thee.—Our translators have inserted the word our in this clause without any authority.—Ο φίλοι, the

them to thee with pen and ink, lest my letter should fall into hands who might make an improper use of it.

14 Besides, it is needless to write these things, for I hope soon to see thee; and so we shall speak face to face freely concerning them. Peace be to thee, which is my apostolical benediction. The Christians with me wish thee health and happiness. In my name wish health and happiness to the Christians with thee, as if I named them particularly.

friends. This appellation is singular, being nowhere else found in scripture. But it applieth excellently to the primitive Christians, as it denoteth in the strongest manner the love which, in the first age, subsisted among the true disciples of Christ. Let it not then be pretended, that the gospel does not recommend private friendship.

3. Salute the friends by name.—The apostle, by sending a salutation to the faithful disciples of Christ, who were in the church of which John was a member, and who were living together in great love, shewed his affection for them, and encouraged them to persevere in the truth.

JUDE.

PREFACE.

SECT. I.—The History of Jude the Apostle, and Brother of James.

In the catalogue which Luke gives of the apostles, chap. vi. 14, 15. James the son of Alphaeus, Simon called Zelotes, and Judas the brother of James, are mentioned. In the catalogue, Acts i. 13. we have the same persons named, and in the same order. But in the catalogue, Matt. x. 3. in the place of Judas there is Lebbeus, whose surname was Thaddeus; and in Mark iii. 18. Thaddeus simply. Wherefore, as all the evangelists agree that there were only twelve apostles, we must suppose that Judas the brother of James was surnamed Lebbeus and Thaddeus.—The appellation of the brother of James was given to Judas, probably because James was the elder brother, and because, after our Lord's ascension, James became a person of considerable note among the apostles, and was highly esteemed by the Jewish believers.

In the Preface to the epistle of James, sect. 1. we have shewn, that James the son of Alphaeus was our Lord's brother or cousin-german. From this it follows, that Judas the brother of James stood in the same relation to Christ. Accordingly we find James and Jesus, and Simon and Judas, expressly called the brethren of Jesus, Matt. xiii. 55. Mark vi. 3.—We have no account of the time and manner in which Judas the brother of Jesus became Christ's disciple. But the history of his election to the apostleship is given Luke vi. 13. Perhaps, like some others of the apostles, he was originally a follower of the Baptist, on whose testimony to Jesus he believed him to be the Messiah.

None of the evangelists have said any thing of Judas after he became an apostle except John, who tells us, that when our Lord spoke what is recorded John xiv. 21. 'Judas saith to him,—22. Lord, how is it that thou wilt manifest thyself to us, and not to the world? 23. Jesus answered and said to him, If a man love me, he will keep my words, and my Father will love him, and we will come to him and make our abode with him;' meaning, that after his resurrection he would shew himself alive to his apostles; and that he and his Father, by the spiritual gifts bestowed on them, would make their abode with them; that is, would shew that they were present with them in all their ministrations. Accordingly, Judas the apostle was one of those to whom Jesus appeared, at different times, after his resurrection. He was also one of the 120 upon whom the Holy Ghost descended in the visible shape of flames of fire, on the memorable day of Pentecost.—Being therefore an eye-witness, and endowed with the Holy Ghost, he no doubt, as Lardner remarks, joined his brethren apostles in witnessing their Master's resurrection from the dead, and shared with them in the reproaches and sufferings which befell them on that account.

Lardner conjectures, that Judas the apostle was an husbandman before he became Christ's disciple; founding his conjecture on a passage of the Apostolical Constitutions, where the apostles are made to say, "Some of us are fishermen, others tent-makers, others husbandmen." He adds, "undoubtedly several of the apostles were fishermen: But by the latter part of the sentence no more may be meant, than that there was among them one tent-maker, even Paul; and one husbandman, intending perhaps St. Jude. For Hegesippus, as quoted by Eusebius, writes, "That when Domitian made inquiries after the posterity of David, some grandsons of Jude, called the Lord's brother, were brought before him. Being asked concerning their possessions and substance, they assured him, that they had only so many acres of land, out of the improvement of which they both paid him tribute and maintained themselves with their own hard labour. The truth of what they said was confirmed by the callousness of their hands," &c. On this passage Lardner's remarks are, "Hence some may argue, that St. Jude himself had been an husbandman; and from this account, if it may be relied upon, we learn that this apostle was married and had children." Lardner on the Canon, vol. iii. chap. xxi. p. 325.

If Judas the apostle was the same person with Judas the author of the epistle, he lived to a great age. And his life being thus prolonged, we may suppose that, after preaching the gospel and confirming it by miracles, he went into other countries for the same purpose. Lardner tells us, some have said that Jude preached in Arabia, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Persia; and that he suffered martyrdom in the last mentioned country. But these things are not supported by any well-attested history. With respect to his being a martyr, it may be doubted; because none of the ancients have mentioned his having suffered martyrdom. It is therefore generally believed that he died a natural death.—Jerome, in his Commentary on Matt. x. 35. says, "That the apostle Thaddeus, called by the evangelist Luke Judas the brother of James, was sent to Edessa, to Agbarus king of Osroene."—Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. lib. i. c. 13. says, Thomas, one of the twelve, sent to Edessa Thaddeus, one of Christ's seventy disciples, to preach the gospel in these countries.

SECT. II.—Shewing that the Epistle of Jude was written by Judas the Apostle, consequently that it is an inspired Writing.

I. In the inscription of this epistle, the writer styles himself Ἰουδᾶς υἱοῦ Ἰακώβ ἀδελφοῦ τοῦ Ἰακώβ, 'Judas, a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James.' By these two characters, the author of this epistle hath shewed himself to be an apostle. For, 1. His name Judas is precisely the same with that of the apostle Judas. 2. His designation is the same, and brother of James.—If it be objected, that Judas, the writer of the epistle, hath not called himself an apostle, but only a servant of Jesus Christ, the answer is, First, As there was another apostle named Judas, to have called himself an apostle was no distinction at all; whereas, by styling himself the brother of James, he hath made himself known to all who are acquainted with the catalogues of the apostles given by the evangelists, to be a different person from Judas the traitor, and hath as effectually declared himself to be an apostle, as if he had expressly assumed that title. Besides, by calling himself the brother of James, he hath asserted his relation to Christ as his cousin-german, (see Pref. to James, sect. 1. paragr. 1.), and thereby hath secured to himself whatever respect was due to him on account of that honourable relation.—Secondly, Some others, who were undoubtedly apostles, have in their epistles omitted to take that title, and have called themselves simply servants of Jesus Christ. Thus, in Paul's epistle to the Philippians, chap. i. 1. we have 'Paul and Timothy, servants of Jesus Christ;' and in the Epistle to Philemon, 'Paul a prisoner for Jesus Christ,' without any addition: also, in the inscription of the epistles to the Thessalonians, we have 'Paul and Silvanus and Timothy to the church of the Thessalonians,' without any designation whatever. In like manner, James in his epistle, chap. i. 1. calls himself simply 'a servant of Jesus Christ.' Yet no one, on account of the omission of the word apostle in these epistles, ever doubted of the apostleship either of Paul or of James. Farther, in the first epistle of John, the writer, neither in the inscription nor in any other part of his letters, hath called himself an apostle, or so much as mentioned his own name; yet, by his manner of writing, he hath made himself known so fully, that his epistle, from the very first, hath been universally acknowledged as John's, and respected as a writing divinely inspired. Why then should Judas be thought no apostle, or his epistle be reckoned an uninspired writing, merely because he hath not called himself an apostle, but only a servant of Jesus Christ?

If, in this epistle, there had been any thing inconsistent with the true Christian doctrine, or any thing tending to reconcile the practice of sin with the hope of salvation, there would have been the justest reason for calling the apostleship of its author in question. But, instead of this, its professed design, as shall be shewed by and by, was to condemn the erroneous doctrines, which in the first age were propagated by corrupt teachers, for the purpose of encouraging their disciples in their licentious courses; and to make those to whom this letter was written, sensible of the obligation which their Christian profession laid on them resolutely to maintain the faith, and constantly to follow the holy practice enjoined by the gospel.

Grotius, however, fancying that the author of this epistle was not Judas the apostle, but another person of the same name, who lived in the time of the emperor Adrian, and who was the fifteenth bishop of Jerusalem, hath boldly affirmed, that the words and brother of James are an interpolation; and that the true reading is, 'Judas, a servant of Jesus Christ, to them who are sanctified,' &c. But as he hath not produced so much as a shadow of authority from any ancient MS. or from the Fathers, in support of his emendation, it deserves not the least regard, and should not have been mentioned, had it not been to make the reader sensible, how little the opinion of the greatest critics is to be regarded when they have a favourite notion to maintain, or wish to make themselves conspicuous by the novelty or singularity of their pretended discoveries.

From the inscription, therefore, of this epistle, I think it certain that it was written by Judas the apostle; and that it is an inspired writing of equal authority with the epistles of the other apostles, which by all are acknowledged to be inspired and canonical.

II. The genuineness of this epistle is established likewise by the matters contained in it, which in every respect are suitable to the character of an inspired apostle of Christ. For, as was already observed, the writer's design in it was to characterize and condemn the heretical teachers, who, in that age, endeavoured by a variety of base arts to make disciples; and to reprobate the impious doctrines which they taught for the sake of advantage; and to enforce the practice of holiness on all who professed the gospel. In short, there is no error taught, nor evil practice enjoined, for the sake of which any impostor could be moved to impose a forgery of this kind on the world.

To invalidate this branch of the proof of the authenticity of the epistle of Jude, it hath been objected, both anciently and in modern times, that the writer of it hath quoted the apocryphal book entitled Enoch, and thereby hath put that book on an equality with the canonical books of the Old Testament. But to this objection learned men have replied, that it is by no means certain that Jude quoted any book whatever: He only says, ver. 14. 'Now Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied even concerning these men, saying, Behold the Lord cometh with his holy myriads,' &c.—Besides, we have no good evidence, that in Jude's time there was any book extant entitled Enoch or Enoch's Prophecy. In the second and third centuries, indeed, a book with that title was handed about among the Christians. But it seems to have been forged on occasion of the mention that is made of Enoch's prophecy in the epistle of Jude; and was universally rejected as a manifest forgery.—In the apostolical writings there are a variety of ancient facts mentioned or alluded to, which are not recorded in the Jewish scriptures; such as, The sin and punishment of the evil angels, 2 Pet. ii. 4. and their confinement in everlasting chains under darkness to the judgment of the great day, Jude, ver. 6.—The prophecy of Enoch concerning the judgment and punishment of the wicked, Jude, ver. 14.—Noah's preaching righteousness to the antediluvians, 2 Pet. ii. 5.—Abraham's seeing Christ's day and being glad, mentioned by Christ himself, John viii. 55.—Lot's being vexed with the filthy discourse of the wicked Sodomites, 2 Pet. ii. 7.—The emblematical purpose for which Moses slew the Egyptian who strove with the Israelites, Acts vii. 25.—The names of Pharaoh's magicians who contended with Moses, 2 Tim. iii. 8.—Moses' exclamation on the mount, when terrified by what he saw, Heb. xii. 21.—The emblematical meaning of the tabernacles and of their services, Heb. ix. 8, 9.—All which ancient facts are mentioned by the inspired writers, as things universally known and acknowledged.—It is no objection to the truth of these things, that they are not recorded in the books of the Old Testament. For it is reasonable to believe, that the writers of these books have not recorded all the revelations which God made to mankind in ancient times; nor all the circumstances of the revelations which they have recorded. As little have they related all the interesting incidents of the lives of the persons whose history they have given. This is certain with respect to Moses. For he hath omitted the revelation by which sacrifice was appointed; and yet that it was appointed of God is evident from Moses himself, who tells us, that God had respect to Abel and to his offering. Likewise, he hath omitted the discovery which was made to Abraham, of the purpose for which God ordered him to sacrifice his son. Yet, that such a discovery was made to him we learn from Christ himself, who tells us, that Abraham saw his day, and was glad.—Wherefore, the revelations and facts mentioned in the New Testament may all have happened; and, though not recorded in the Old, may have been preserved by tradition. Nay, it is reasonable to think, that at the time the ancient revelations were made, somewhat of their meaning was also discovered, whereby posterity were led to agree in their interpretation of these very obscure oracles. On any other supposition, that uniformity of interpretation which took place from the beginning, can hardly be accounted for.

Allowing, then, that there were revelations anciently made to mankind which are not recorded, and that the revelations which are recorded were accompanied with some explications not mentioned, it is natural to think, that these things would be verbally published to the ancients, who, considering them as matters of importance, would lay them up in their memory, and rehearse them to their children; and they in like manner relating them to their descendants, they were preserved by uninterrupted tradition. Further, these traditional revelations, and explications of revelations, after the art of writing became common, may have been inserted in books as ancient traditions which were well authenticated. And the Spirit of God, who inspired the evangelists and apostles, may have directed them to mention these traditions in their writings, and to allude to them, to make us sensible that many important matters, anciently made known by revelation, have been preserved by tradition. And more especially, that the persuasion, which history assureth us hath prevailed in all ages and countries from the most early times, concerning the placability of the Deity, the acceptableness of sacrifice, the existence of the soul after death, the resurrection of the body, the rewards and punishments of the life to come, with other matters of a like kind, was founded on revelations concerning these things which were made to mankind in the first age, and handed down by tradition. The truth is, these things being matters which by the utmost effort of their natural faculties men could not discover, the knowledge and belief of them which prevailed among all nations, whether barbarous or civilized, cannot be accounted for except on the supposition of their being originally discovered by revelation, and spread among all nations by tradition.—Wherefore, in no age or country have mankind been left entirely to the guidance of the light of nature, but have enjoyed the benefit of revelation in a greater or in a less degree.

But to return to the objection formerly mentioned, by which some endeavour to disprove the authenticity of Jude's epistle, founded on the mention which is made in it of Enoch's prophecy. Allowing for a moment, that there was such a book extant in the apostle's days as that entitled Enoch, or the prophecy of Enoch, and that Jude quoted from it the prophecy under consideration, such a quotation would not lessen the authority of his epistle as an inspired writing, any more than the quotations from the heathen poet Aratus, Acts xvii. 28. and from Menander, 1 Cor. xv. 33. and from Epimenides, Tit. i. 12. have lessened the authority of the history of the Acts, and of Paul's epistles, where these quotations are found. The reason is, if the things contained in these quotations were true in themselves, they might be mentioned by an inspired writer, without giving authority to the poems from which they were taken. In like manner, if the prophecy ascribed to Enoch, concerning the future judgment and punishment of the wicked, was agreeable to the other declarations of God concerning that event, Jude might cite it; because Enoch, who like Noah was a preacher of righteousness, may actually have delivered such a prophecy, though it be not recorded in the Old Testament; and because his quoting it did not establish the authority of the book from which he took it, if he took it from any book extant in his time.

Having thus cleared the internal evidence of the epistle of Jude from the objections which have been raised against it, I shall now set before the reader the external evidence by which the authenticity of that writing is proved.—For this purpose I observe, that although the epistle of Jude was doubted of by some in the early ages, yet, as soon as it was understood that its author was Judas the brother of James, mentioned in the catalogue of the apostles, it was generally received as an apostolical inspired writing, and read publicly in the churches as such. The evidence of these important and decisive facts I shall set before the reader, as collected and arranged by the learned and impartial Lardner.

And first of all, Lardner acknowledgeth that the epistle of Jude is nowhere quoted by Irenæus, who wrote about the year 178; but that Eusebius, giving an account of the works of Clem. Alexandr. who flourished about the year 194, saith, Eccles. Hist. lib. vi. c. 14. initio, "In his Institutions he hath given explications of all the Canonical Scriptures, not omitting those which are contradicted; I mean the epistle of Jude, and the other catholic epistles." Clement's Institutions are lost; but we have a small treatise in Latin, called Adumbrations, supposed to be translated from the Institutions. In these Adumbrations there are remarks upon almost every verse of the epistle of Jude except the last. There likewise is the following observation: "Jude, who wrote a catholic epistle, does not style himself at the beginning of it Brother of the Lord, though he was related to him, but Jude, the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James." From this it appears, that Clement thought the writer of the epistle under consideration one of them who are called the Lord's brethren, Matt. xiii. 55. and an apostle.—Farther, verses 5, 6. and 11. of the epistle of Jude, are quoted by Clement in his Pedagogue, or Instructor. Moreover, in his Stromata or Miscellanies he quotes Jude from ver. 8. to ver. 16.—These are sufficient proofs of the antiquity of this epistle, and that it was written by Judas, one of the twelve apostles of Christ.

Tertullian, who flourished about the year 200, hath one very express quotation from Jude's epistle, in his treatise De Cultu Fæminæ, namely this: "Hence it is that Enoch is quoted by the apostle Jude."

Origen, about the year 230, mentions the epistle of Jude in various passages of his writings; particularly in his commentaries on St. Matthew, having cited chap. xiii. 53. 56. he saith, "Jude wrote an epistle in few lines indeed, but full of the powerful words of the heavenly grace, who at the beginning says, Jude, the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James." And in the same commentaries on St. Matthew, having quoted 1 Pet. i. 12. he says, "If any one receives also the epistle of Jude, let him consider what will follow from what is there said, And the angels who kept not their first estate, &c. Wherefore, notwithstanding in Origen's time some doubted of, or denied the authority of this epistle, he himself without hesitation quoted it as written by Jude, one of the Lord's brethren, consequently by an apostle.

In the writings of Cyprian, who flourished about the year 284, no notice is taken of Jude's epistle. But it is quoted by the anonymous author against the Novatian heretic, who wrote about the year 255. However, he does not name Jude. His words are, "As it is written, Behold he cometh with ten thousands of his angels to execute judgment upon all; and what follows." He means the 14th and 15th verses of the epistle.

Eusebius, who flourished about the year 315, hath mentioned Jude's epistle. See the passage in the Pref. to James, sect. 2. paragr. 2. From that passage it appears, that in the time of Eusebius Jude's epistle was generally received, though not by all.

After the time of Eusebius, seven Catholic epistles were generally received by all Christians, Greeks and Latins. Jude's epistle therefore, as well as the rest, was received by Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius, Didymus of Alexandria, Jerome, Ruffin, the third council of Carthage, Augustine, Isidore of Pelusium, Cyril of Alexandria, and others. But it was not received by the Syrians. Lardner adds, that he found this epistle oftener quoted by writers who lived about the time of Eusebius, than the epistle of James.

Lucifer of Cagliari in Sardinia, about the year 354, hath quoted almost the whole of Jude's epistle. He quotes it expressly as written by the excellent apostle Jude, brother of the apostle James.

Epiphanius, about the year 368, in his Heresy of the Gnostics, "cites the catholic epistle of the apostle Jude, brother of James and of the Lord, written by inspiration."

Jerome, in his Catalogue of ecclesiastical writers, Art. Jude, says, "Jude the brother of James left a short epistle, which is one of the seven called Catholic. But, because of a quotation from a book of Enoch, which is apocryphal, it is rejected by many. However at length it hath obtained authority, and is reckoned among the Sacred Scriptures."

SECT. III.—Of the Persons to whom the Epistle of Jude was directed, and of the Time when it was written.

I. ESTIUS and WITSIUS were of opinion that Jude wrote to Christians everywhere, but especially to the converted Jews.—Hammond thought this epistle was directed to Jewish Christians alone; and with a design to secure them against the errors of the Gnostics.—Benson also thought it was written to Jewish believers; especially to those of the western dispersion. For, according to him, Jude wrote to the very persons to whom Peter wrote his epistles. But I agree with Lardner in thinking, that the inscription of this letter leads us to believe, that it was written to all, without distinction, who had embraced the gospel. For it runs in this manner, ver. 1. 'To the sanctified by God the Father, and to the preserved by Jesus Christ, to the called.—8. Beloved, making all haste to write to you concerning the common salvation, I thought it necessary to write to you, exhorting you strenuously to contend for the faith formerly delivered to the saints.'

The only reason which hath induced commentators to suppose that Jude wrote to the Jewish believers alone, is, that he makes use of arguments and examples taken from the sacred books of the Jews. But the apostle Paul followed the same course in writing to the Gentiles; and both apostles did so with propriety, not only because all who embraced the gospel acknowledged the authority of the Jewish scriptures, but because it was of the greatest importance to make the Gentiles sensible, that the gospel was consonant to the ancient revelation.

II. Learned men, as Lardner observes, have differed in their opinion with respect to the time when Jude wrote his epistle. Mill hath fixed it to A. D. 90; for he saith, "It is certain this epistle was written after the death of Peter, but before the year 95, when the descendants of this Jude were suspected by Domitian, because they were of the family of David." See Pref. to Jude, sect. 1. paragr. 4. "For otherwise the suspicion would have reached to Jude himself, if he had been alive, as much as to his descendants."—But Dodwell, who is followed by Cave, is of opinion that Jude wrote his epistle soon after the destruction of Jerusalem, in the year 70, or in 71. L'Enfant and Beausobre thought it might be written between the years 70 and 75. Estius and Witsius supposed it was written in the latter part of the apostolical age, when Jude was very old, and when few or perhaps none of the apostles were alive but himself. Occumenius, in his note on ver. 17. 'Beloved, remember ye the words which were before spoken by the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ,' saith, "Jude means Peter in his second epistle, and Paul in almost all his epistles;" and adds, "Hence it is evident that Jude wrote late after the decease of the apostles."—I agree with Occumenius in thinking, that by the words before spoken by the apostles, Jude meant the words committed to writing; because it is not to be supposed that all, or even many of those into whose hands Jude's epistle might come, had heard the apostles preach. This epistle therefore was written when the writings of the apostles and evangelists were generally dispersed; that is to say, towards the end of the first age.—The same thing appears from ver. 3. 'I thought it necessary to write to you, exhorting you strenuously to contend for the faith formerly delivered to the saints;' for these expressions, I think, imply, that some considerable time had elapsed since the whole scheme of the Christian doctrine had been published to the world, and after the persons to whom Jude wrote had been instructed in it.

Upon the whole, although the precise date of this epistle cannot be determined, it is highly probable that it was written in the latter part of the apostolical age; and not long before Jude's death. See however the following sect. paragr. 3.

SECT. IV.—Of the Occasion on which the Epistle of Jude was written.

IN the latter part of the apostolical age many false teachers had arisen, and were going about speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them, as St. Paul had foretold to the elders of Ephesus, Acts xx. 30. See Pref. to 1 John, sect. 3. In drawing disciples after them, these teachers had nothing in view but to increase their own gains, that they might have wherewithal to spend upon their lusts. For the first Christians having a great affection for their teachers, willingly and liberally contributed towards their maintenance. The false teachers therefore, to draw the vicious part of mankind after them, perverting Paul's doctrine of justification by faith without the works of law, resolved the whole of Christianity into the speculative belief and outward profession of the gospel. See Pref. to James, sect. 4. And, having thus cancelled the obligations of morality, they taught their disciples to live in all manner of licentiousness; and at the same time flattered them with the hope of the favour of God, and of obtaining eternal life.

One of the perverse things which these corrupt teachers spake for the purpose of alluring the wicked was that God is so good that he will not punish men for indulging those natural appetites which he himself hath implanted in their nature, nor be displeased with them for committing a few sins which can do him no harm, but which are necessary to their present happiness. Wherefore, to shew the impiety and falsehood of that doctrine, and to secure the disciples from being seduced by it, the apostle Jude wrote this epistle, in which, by facts recorded in the Jewish scriptures, he proved, that as God had already punished the angels who sinned, notwithstanding their dignity, and the antediluvians notwithstanding their numbers, so he will at length most assuredly punish all obstinate sinners in the severest manner.

Estius hath observed, that the subject of Jude's epistle is the same with that of Peter's second epistle; and hath accounted for the likeness of the two epistles by supposing, that Jude had read Peter's epistle before he wrote his own: and that he imitated it; in some places abridging Peter's sentiments, and in others enlarging upon them, and often using his very words. As an example, he mentions Jude, ver. 17, 18, where he thinks Jude copied 2 Pet. iii. 3. In this opinion Estius is followed by Benson, who, in his Pref. to Jude, sect. 3, thus writes: "Upon comparing the two epistles, it appears not only that St. Peter and St. Jude had translated some passages from the same ancient Hebrew author; (in this Benson follows Bishop Sherlock, Dissert. on 2 Pet.); but it seems highly probable that St. Jude had also seen and read the second epistle of St. Peter."—But Lardner saith, Canon, vol. iii. p. 353. it seems very unlikely that St. Jude should write so similar an epistle if he had seen Peter's. In that case, St. Jude would not have thought it needful for him to write at all. If he had formed a design of writing, and had met with an epistle of one of the apostles very suitable to his own thoughts and intentions, I think he would have forbore to write. Indeed, the great agreement in subject and design between these two epistles, affords a strong argument that they were writ about the same time. As therefore I have placed the second epistle of St. Peter in the year 64, I am induced to place this epistle of St. Jude in the same year, or soon after, in 65 or 66. For there was exactly the same state of things in the Christian church, or in some part of it, when both these epistles were writ." Thus far Lardner.

But I incline to be of their opinion, who, on account of the sameness both of sentiment and language found in the two epistles, think that Jude wrote his epistle after he had seen Peter's, and that he copied it in several passages. For the Spirit may have directed him to write on the same subject with Peter, and even in the words which Peter used, to give the greater authority to both epistles; and that the condemnation of the false teachers, and the exhortations which the two apostles addressed to the faithful in their time, might have the more weight with them, and with Christians in succeeding ages, when they found these things delivered by both, precisely in the same terms.

ARNA inscribing his letter to all who were sanctified, and preserved, and called, Jude, after the example of his brethren apostles, gave to the faithful his apostolical benediction, ver. 1, 2.—Then told them that he judged it necessary, in the then state of the church, to exhort them strenuously to contend for the faith formerly delivered to the holy apostles and prophets, and by them to the disciples of Christ, ver. 3.—because certain ungodly men, under the mask of being inspired, had come in among the faithful, and, from the goodness of God in pardoning men's sins as published in the gospel, had inferred that God would not punish sinners; and, by thus perverting the mercy of God, had encouraged their disciples in all manner of lascivious practices. Moreover, when in danger of suffering for their faith, they had not scrupled to deny both God and Christ; vainly fancying that God would not punish them for so doing, ver. 4.—But, to shew how ill-founded the doctrine of these deceivers was, Jude put the faithful in mind, how God, having saved the people of Israel from Egypt, afterwards utterly destroyed the whole of them in the wilderness for their sin of unbelief, except Caleb and Joshua, ver. 5.—and, how he bound the rebellious angels with everlasting chains, under darkness, in order to their being punished at the judgment of the great day, ver. 6.—Moreover he told them, seeing the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah and of the neighbouring cities, who had given themselves up to unnatural lusts as the false teachers likewise did, are, in the punishment which was inflicted on them, set forth as an everlasting example of God's just indignation against such crimes, ver. 7.—so, in like manner, said he, these wicked teachers and their disciples shall assuredly be punished, who having lost all sense of virtue, defiled their bodies with unnatural lusts, and despised the office of magistrates, and reviled those who exercised it, because they punished them for their misdeeds, ver. 8.—With this insolence of the heretical teachers towards the heathen magistrates, the apostle contrasted the behaviour of the archangel Michael towards the devil. For, as the prophet Zechariah informs us, that great and holy angel, when, contending with the devil who opposed him in his benevolent designs towards the Jews, he disputed about restoring the Jewish church and state, he did not attempt to revile even that apostate spirit, but said to him mildly, The Lord rebuke thee, Satan, ver. 9.—Whereas the wicked teachers who are now gone abroad, speak evil of magistrates, the origin and end of whose office they do not understand; and corrupt themselves by the only knowledge they possess, namely, that knowledge of the use of their body which is suggested to them by their natural appetites, and which they have in common with brute beasts, ver. 10.—The apostle, therefore, declared the misery which was awaiting these impious teachers, whose wickedness in slaying the souls of men by their false doctrine he compared to that of Cain, who slew his brother; and whose excessive love of money he compared to that of Balaam, who, to obtain the hire which Balak promised him, attempted to curse the Israelites contrary to his conscience; and whose miserable end, for opposing Christ and his apostles, he compared to that of Korah and his companions for opposing Moses and Aaron, ver. 11.

These wicked teachers, the apostle told the faithful, were spots in their love-feasts, being guilty of gluttony and drunkenness; so that, even if they had taught true doctrine, they would have rendered it ineffectual by their bad example. For which reason he compared them to clouds without water, and to trees absolutely dead, ver. 12.—And because by their wicked practices they disgraced themselves, he called them 'raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame;' and meteors which were to be extinguished for ever, ver. 13.—Further, to terrify these wicked men, he declared, that Enoch prophesied, not to the antediluvians only, but to them also, when he said, Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousands of his holy angels, ver. 14.—to inflict condign punishment on all the ungodly, both for their impious speeches and for their wicked practices, ver. 15.—And that the faithful might be at no loss to know them, he mentioned it as a trait in their character, that they murmured against God, and complained of the unequal distribution of the good things of this life, as if their share of them was not proportioned to their merits; for they wished to indulge all their own lusts without restraint. And to persuade their disciples to supply them with money for that end, they spake in the most pompous manner in their own praise; and pretended to have the utmost respect for the rich, and flattered them with the hope of salvation, without any regard to their character and actions, ver. 16.—Now, that the success of these impostors might not occasion too much grief to the faithful, Jude, by observing that their rise and progress had been foretold, insinuated that they were permitted in the church for wise purposes. 'But, beloved,' said he, 'remember the words which were before spoken by the apostles,' ver. 17.—How they foretold that, after the destruction of the Jewish commonwealth, scoffers were to arise in the church, who, ridiculing the holy precepts of the gospel, would follow the direction of their own ungodly lusts, ver. 18.—and at the same time would separate themselves from the real disciples of Christ, on pretence that they were ignorant of the true doctrine of the gospel, and void of the Spirit. Whereas they themselves were mere animal men, utterly deserted of the Spirit of God, ver. 19.—But the faithful, shunning to associate with these impostors, were to build one another firmly on their most holy faith, by pious conference. And by praying in their public assemblies with the Holy Spirit, which neither the false teachers nor their disciples could do, ver. 20.—they were to keep one another effectually in the love of God; because such prayers, dictated by the Spirit, would be an evidence to them of God's presence in their assemblies; and, being conscious of their loving God, they would on good ground expect the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ exercised towards them in the pardon of their sins, accompanied with eternal life, ver. 21.—And as their love to God would lead them to attempt the reformation of those who erred, whether they were teachers or private Christians, the apostle desired them to make a distinction in their manner of treating them. They were to exercise compassion towards those who erred through ignorance and weakness; that is, they were to instruct and reclaim such by the gentle method of persuasion, ver. 22.—But the false teachers, who erred wilfully through corruption of heart, they were to save from destruction by the power of terror, reproving them sharply, and censuring them severely, that they might snatch them out of the fire of the wrath of God, which was ready to devour them. But in doing them this friendly office, they were to shun all familiarity with them, as carefully as they would shun touching a garment spotted by the flesh of a person who had a plague-sore, lest they should be infected by their vicious conversation, ver. 23.

Having thus finished what he judged necessary for their instruction and direction, the apostle encouraged the faithful to persevere in the true doctrine and practice of the gospel, by a solemn ascription of praise to him who was both able and willing to keep them from falling into error, and to present them faultless in conduct at the day of judgment, with exceeding joy to themselves, ver. 24.—even to the only wise God our Saviour, whose glory as God and Saviour will last through all ages. Then, to shew his firm persuasion of all the things which he had written, the apostle concluded his epistle, with an Amen, ver. 25.

2 May mercy, and peace, and love, be multiplied to you.¹

COMMENTARY.

VER. 1. Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James, to them who are separated from the idolatrous world by their faith in the true God, the Father of all, and to them who are preserved by Jesus Christ from the corrupt practices of idolaters, and from the errors disseminated by false teachers, even to all the called seed of Abraham;

2 May pardon of sin, and happiness, temporal and eternal (see Rom. i. 7. note 4.), and love to God and man, abound to you.

3 Beloved, making all haste to write to you concerning the common salvation, instead of spending time in explaining the nature of that salvation, and shewing that it is common to Jews and Gentiles, or in proving any of the doctrines of the gospel, I thought it more necessary to write to you, exhorting you strenuously to contend for the faith formerly delivered to the holy prophets and apostles of Christ, and by them published to the world.

Ver. 1.—1. Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James.]—For the history of Jude, see Pref. sect. 1. and sect 2. where it is shewed, that by this designation Jude declared himself an apostle. Jude might have called himself the brother of Jesus Christ, rather than the brother of James. But he avoided that designation in the inscription of a letter which he wrote in the character of an apostle, to shew, that whatever respect as a man he might deserve on account of his relation to Christ, he derived no authority from it as an apostle, nor indeed claimed any.

2. The preserved by Jesus Christ.]—The preposition ἐν, by which the Greek datives are governed, is often wanting, especially when it is expressed in a preceding clause, as in the present verse, where we have ἐν ᾧ ἡμετέρις ἐξαρπάσμενοι. But in translating these datives into English, it is generally necessary to supply the preposition, as I have done in translating καὶ ἱεροῦ Χριστοῦ τὰς ἐκλεκτοὺς, 'and to the preserved by Jesus Christ.'

3. To the called.]—This designation may denote those who are called to believe the gospel by the preaching of the word, and who, having obeyed that call, make an outward profession of the gospel; or it may denote those who, on account of their possessing faith and holiness like Abraham, are called his seed. See Rom. viii. 30. note 1.

Ver. 2. May mercy, and peace, and love, be multiplied to you.]—Estius saith, this is sancta et vere apostolica salutatio, a holy and truly apostolical salutation; and observeth, that from this, and the benedictions in the two epistles of Peter, we learn, that the benedictions in Paul's epistles are to be completed by adding the word multiplied.

Ver. 3.—1. Beloved, making all haste.]—So καὶ οὐκ ἐν ὀλίγῳ, literally signifies.—Jude, being informed of the assiduity, and perhaps the success, with which the false teachers were spreading their pernicious errors, found it necessary to write this letter to the faithful without delay.

2. To write to you concerning the common salvation.]—The salvation preached in the gospel is called common, because it belongs equally to all who believe—to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews; to men of all nations and conditions. For the same reason Paul termed the belief of the gospel the common faith, Tit. i. 4. because an opportunity of believing it was afforded to all.

3. I thought it necessary to write to you, exhorting you strenuously to contend.]—In the circumstances in which the faithful were when Jude wrote this letter, an exhortation to hold fast and maintain the true doctrine of the gospel, against the false teachers, was more necessary and profitable for the disciples than explications of the particular doctrines of the gospel.—By strenuously contending for the faith, the apostle did not mean contending for it with fire and sword; but their endeavouring, in the spirit of meekness and love, to establish the true doctrine of the gospel by arguments drawn, not only from the Jewish scriptures, but especially from the writings of the evangelists and apostles, which were all, or most of them, published when Jude wrote this letter.—In the same manner they were strongly to oppose and confute the errors of the false teachers.—The word ἀγῶνίζεσθαι properly signifies to strive as in the Olympic games; that is, with their whole force.

4. For the faith.]—Here faith, by an usual metonymy, is put for the objects of faith; namely, the doctrines and precepts of the gospel; both being equally the objects of men's faith, and both being in the apostle's view when he wrote this, as is plain from the epistle itself.

5. Formerly.]—So I translate ἀρετή, because it is used in that

4 For certain men have¹ come in privily,² who long ago have been before-written³ to this very punishment;⁴ ungodly men, perverting the grace of our God to lasciviousness,⁵ and denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ.⁶

5 I will therefore put you in remembrance,¹ though ye (ἀπερξ) formerly knew this, that the Lord having saved the people² out of the land of Egypt, afterward destroyed them who did not believe.³

6 (Te) Also the angels who kept not their own office,¹ but left their proper habitation,² he

4 For certain false teachers have come in to the church privily, that is, under the mask of being inspired, who long ago, in what is written concerning the lascivious Sodomites, and the rebellious Israelites, have been foretold as to suffer this very punishment which I am going to describe; ungodly men, who, pretending that God is so good that he will not punish sinners, pervert the grace of our God, in pardoning sinners, to an encouragement to lasciviousness; and deny the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ, in order to avoid persecution.

5 I will therefore, to prevent you from listening to these wicked teachers, put you in remembrance, although ye formerly knew this, that the Lord having saved the people of Israel out of the land of Egypt, afterward destroyed them in the wilderness, because they did not believe his promises, and refused to go into Canaan, Numb. xiv. xxvi. Heb. iii. 18, 19.

6 Also the angels who kept not their own office, the office which was originally allotted to them, but left their proper station, by in-sense, ver. 5. and 1 Pet. iii. 20.—Estius and Beza adopt the common translation, supposing the meaning of 'once delivered to the saints' to be, that the faith spoken of was delivered to the saints once for all, and is never to be changed; nothing is to be added to it, and nothing taken from it.

6. Delivered to the saints.]—By the saints Jude means, the holy apostles and prophets of Christ who consigned to writing the faith, that is, the things which men are to believe and do, according as they were revealed to them by the Spirit. In this sense the word saints is used, Eph. iii. 5. Col. i. 26.—Hence it is evident, that the faith for which Christians are to contend strenuously, is that alone which is contained in the writings of the evangelists, apostles, and ancient Jewish prophets. Now, as they have expressed the things which were revealed to them in words dictated by the Spirit, (1 Cor. ii. 13. note 1.), we are to contend, not only for the things contained in their writings, but also for that form of words in which they have expressed these things, lest by contending for forms invented and established by human authority, as better fitted to express the truth than the words of inspiration, we fall into error. See 2 Tim. i. 13. note 2.—Jude's exhortation ought in a particular manner to be attended to by the ministers of the gospel, whose duty more especially it is to preserve their people from error, both in opinion and practice.

Ver. 4.—For certain men have come in.]—The ungodly teachers here described seem to have been the Nicolaitans, mentioned Rev. ii. 6. whose doctrine Christ himself declared to be hateful to him. Perhaps the Gnostics and Carpocratians, the successors of the Nicolaitans, were also meant. See Preface to Colossians, sect. 2. par. 3. from the end, and Preface to 1 John, sect. 3. at the end.—We are told that the Nicolaitans maintained that marriage was a human invention not binding on Christians, on which account they had women in common, and practised unnatural lusts, as is plain from Jude's account of them. See ver. 7. note 2. ver. 10. note. Farther, they hardened themselves against the fear of punishment in a future state for these crimes, by extolling the goodness and mercy of God, which thus they perverted to lasciviousness.

2. Come in privily.]—ἡσυχισμένοι. Though the false teachers went about openly making disciples, they are said to have come in, or established themselves privily, because, under the pretence of teaching by inspiration, they rendered the faithful inattentive to the consequences of their pernicious doctrine.

3. Who long ago have been before-written.]—ἡτοιμασμένοι εἰς τὴν τῶν αἰώνων κρίσιν. Jude means, that these wicked teachers had their punishment before-written, that is, foretold, in what is written concerning the wicked Sodomites and rebellious Israelites, whose crimes were the same with theirs; and whose punishment was not only a proof of God's resolution to punish sinners, but an example of the punishment which he will inflict on them.—Others think the apostle alludes here to the prophecy of Enoch, ver. 14. in which the utter destruction of the ungodly is foretold.—Others, that in the word ἡτοιμασμένοι there is an allusion to the ancient custom of writing laws on tables, which were hung up in public places, that the people might know the punishment annexed to the breaking of the laws. If this is the allusion, the apostle's meaning will be, that the wicked teachers of whom he is speaking were, by the divine law, condemned to severe punishment from the beginning.

4. To this very punishment.]—ὡς αἰῶνος signifies, Rom. xii. 2. Jude not having mentioned any punishment hitherto, his meaning must be the very punishment he was going to describe; namely, the punishment inflicted on the wicked Sodomites.—The apostle, on this occasion, mentioned the punishment of the rebellious Israelites, and of the angels who sinned, and of the wicked Sodomites, not only to terrify the false teachers by shewing them the greatness and certainty of the punishment which awaited them, but to make the faithful sensible that, although wicked teachers are allowed to enter and remain awhile in the church, for purposes known to God, they are to be destroyed both here and hereafter.

5. Ungodly men, perverting the grace of our God to lasciviousness.]—The 'grace of God,' which these wicked teachers perverted to lasciviousness, may be either the goodness of God, which they affirmed to be so great that he will not punish man for any sin whatever; or it may be the gospel itself, called 'the grace of God,' Tit. ii. 11. For these ungodly men interpreted the gospel doctrine of justification by faith without the works of the law, in such a manner as to free believers from all obligation to obey the law of God; and taught them, that they might commit the worst actions without being liable to punishment, if they possessed faith; by which they meant, the speculative belief and outward profession of the gospel.

6. Denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ.]—καὶ τὸν μόνον θεόν καὶ τὸν κύριον ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦν χριστὸν ἀπαρνέσασθαι. This sentence may be translated various ways, all equally literal:—

1. 'And denying the only Lord God, even our Lord Jesus Christ.' According to this translation one person only is spoken of here, namely, our Lord Jesus Christ, who is called the only Lord God. 2. 'Denying both the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ.' According to the translation two persons are distinctly spoken of, namely, the only Lord God, or God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, his Son. 3. 'And denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ.' This, which is the translation in our English Bible, and which in sense is not different from the second rendering, I have adopted, not only because, according to it, two persons are spoken of as denied, namely, the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ, but because it represents Jude's sentiment as precisely the same with John's, 1 Epist. ii. 22. 'He is the antichrist who denieth the Father and the Son.' By declaring that those ungodly teachers denied both the Father and the Son, the apostle shewed to what a pitch of impiety they had proceeded. Because the article is prefixed only to μόνον θεόν, and not repeated before κύριον ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦν χριστόν, Beza is of opinion that these epithets, μόνος θεός, and κύριος, belong all to Jesus Christ. But the want of the article is too slight a foundation to build so important a doctrine on. For in the following passages, John xvi. 3. Eph. v. 5. 1 Tim. v. 21. vi. 13. 2 Pet. i. 1, 2. God and Jesus Christ are mentioned jointly, with the article prefixed to one of them only. Yet every reader must be sensible that they are not one, but two distinct persons. Besides, θεός is a title not commonly given to Jesus Christ, whose proper title is κύριος. See, however, 2 Pet. ii. 1. note 3.—Jude's meaning in this passage is, that the ungodly teachers of whom he wrote, in order to avoid persecution, denied the only Lord and God of the universe, by acknowledging and worshipping the heathen deities. Also they denied the Lord Jesus Christ, by denying that they were his disciples.

In the Complutensian edition of the Greek Testament, by omitting the first καὶ, and placing θεόν before the second καὶ, and κύριον after it, and by inserting the article before κύριον, the whole clause stands in this manner, τοὺς μόνον θεὸν καὶ τὸν κύριον ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦν χριστόν ἀπαρνέσασθαι, 'Denying the only God and Lord, Jesus Christ our Lord.' But the MSS. and versions on which the Spanish divines formed this reading, are not of sufficient authority to establish it, especially as it excludes the Father from being God and Lord.

Ver. 5.—1. I will therefore put you in remembrance, &c.]—On this and what follows Occumenius observes, that by proposing these examples of the destruction of sinners from the Old Testament history, the apostle designed to shew, that the God of the Old Testament is the same with the God of the New, in opposition to those heretics who denied this, namely, the Manicheans: also to prove, that the goodness of God will not hinder him from punishing the wicked under the new dispensation, any more than it hindered him from punishing them under the old. In this passage Jude hath mentioned two of the instances of the divine vengeance against atrocious sinners which Peter took notice of, 2 Epist. ii. 4, 5.; and in place of the third instance, the destruction of the old world, he hath introduced the destruction of the rebellious Israelites in the wilderness.

2. That the Lord having saved the people.]—Some MSS. and versions read here ἡσυχῶς, Jesus having saved. Two of Stephen's MSS. read θεός, God; which expresses the true meaning of the passage. But the common reading is best supported.

3. Afterwards destroyed them who did not believe.]—Jude doth not mention the various sins committed by the Israelites in the wilderness; such as their rebellion in refusing to go into Canaan, their idolatry in worshipping the golden calf, their fornication with the Midianitish women, their frequent murmurings; but he sums up the whole in their unbelief, because it was the source of all their sins.

Ver. 6.—1. Also the angels who kept not (τὸν ἑαυτοῦ ἀρχόν) their own office.]—So the word ἀρχόν signifies, Luke xx. 20. 'Deliver him (τὸν ἀρχόντα τῆς ἐκκλησίας) to the power and authority of the governor.' The apostle's meaning is, that these superior beings did not keep their original office, but forfeited it by some misbehaviour. Hence they are called, 2 Pet. ii. 4. 'The angels who sinned.'—The common hath reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness,¹ unto the judgment of the great day.⁴

7 (Νε, Parkh.) As Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities around them,¹ which in a manner like to these² had habitually committed whoredom,³ and gone after other flesh, are set forth an example,⁴ having undergone the punishment of an eternal fire,

8 (Ουμωμ μω τω, 294.) In like manner, indeed, these also SHALL BE PUNISHED.¹ Being cast into a deep sleep,² they defile the flesh, and despise (καταφροντα) government, and revile (δεδεκα) dignities.³

9 (Δε) But Michael the archangel,¹ when, contending with the devil, he disputed about the body of Moses,² did not attempt³ to bring

truding into the offices and stations of the angels who were greater than they, God hath driven out of heaven, notwithstanding their numbers and power; and hath kept them, ever since, in everlasting chains of confinement under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day, to be punished.

7 Further, seeing Sodom and Gomorrah, and the cities around them, which in a manner like to these wicked teachers had habitually committed whoredom and bestiality, are publicly set forth as an example of that terrible punishment which is to be inflicted on the ungodly after the general judgment; having from the immediate hand of God undergone the punishment of an eternal fire—a fire whose effects will remain while the world remains;

8 In like manner, indeed, those ungodly men shall be punished with eternal fire. Being cast into a deep spiritual sleep through the intoxication of sin, they, under the pretence of Christian liberty and a superior illumination, defile their body, like the Sodomites, with libidinous practices, and despise every kind of government, and revile magistrates when they punish them for their lewd practices.

9 But how different was the conduct of Michael the archangel, when, contending with the devil, he disputed about the restoration of the Jewish church and state by Joshua the high-priest, Zech. iii. 1.

translation of this clause, viz. 'who kept not their first estate,' expresseth its meaning very well; but it is a paraphrase, and not a translation.—Hunt, in his Dissertation on the fall of man, saith, the office of the angels who sinned was to attend the visible manifestation of the divine presence in paradise, and to minister to mankind. But this is to be wise above what is written. See note 4.

2. But left their proper habitation.]—Οικητηριον denotes the place in which God appointed the angels who sinned to execute the offices and functions which he had assigned to them. According to Hunt, their habitation was this earth. It is of more importance to observe, that by saying, The angels kept not their own office, but left their proper habitation, the apostle insinuates that they attempted to raise themselves to a higher station than that which God had allotted to them; consequently, that the sin for which they are to be punished was pride and rebellion.

3. He hath reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness.]—Everlasting chains is a metaphorical expression, which denotes a perpetual confinement, which it is no more in their power to escape from, than a man who is strongly bound with iron chains can break them. See the explication of the phrase under darkness, given 2 Pet. ii. 4. note 3.

4. Unto the judgment of the great day.]—This great day is elsewhere called the day of the Lord, and that day, emphatically. In our Lord's description of the general judgment, Matt. xxv. 41, he tells us, that the wicked are to 'depart into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels.' This implies that these wicked spirits are to be punished with the wicked of mankind. Hunt, in his Dissertation referred to in note 1. on this verse, saith, Upon the supposition that the fallen angels belong to our system, their punishment with the wicked of our species will appear the more congruous. If the angels who sinned were originally appointed to minister to mankind, as Hunt imagines, and were discontented with this earth in its paradisaical state as an habitation, the atmosphere which surrounds the earth in its present altered state, is very properly made the prison-house in which they are confined till the general judgment.

Ver. 7.—1. And the cities around them.]—These cities were Admah and Zeboim. The four are mentioned Deut. xix. 23.—Zoar, the fifth city in the plain of Sodom, was spared at the request of Lot, for a place of refuge to him and his family.

2. Which in a manner like to these.]—Τον ὁμοιω τούτοις; τούτων. I have followed our translators in completing the construction of this clause, by supplying the preposition κατε, which the sense likewise requires—like to these. The relative τούτοις, being masculine, may refer to the ungodly teachers mentioned ver. 4.; or, though ὁμοιος be a feminine word, yet, as it signifies the inhabitants of a city as well as the city itself, the relative τούτοις may very properly be in the masculine gender, to denote the inhabitants of the other cities of the plain. See Eas. iv. 64.—I make these observations, because some commentators suppose τούτοις stands for the angels who left their proper habitation, as if their sin had been lewdness; which is a very false idea.

3. Had habitually committed whoredom.]—This is the literal signification of the compound word κακοπορευομενοι; because κα increases the signification of the word with which it is compounded. In the language of scripture, καπορευομενοι signifies to commit any sort of whoredom or uncleanness, and among the rest sodomy. See 1 Cor. v. 1. note 1. and Parkhurst in voc. καπορευομενοι. Estius saith the preposition κα in this compounded word denotes the Sodomites committing whoredom out of the order of nature. They committed the unnatural crime which hath taken its name from them.

4. Are set forth (δειγμα) an example.]—See 2 Pet. iii. 6. The burning of the cities of the plain being represented here as an example or type of that punishment by fire which at the general judgment God will inflict on the wicked, the consideration thereof should terrify the ungodly of every description, and bring them to repentance. For when God is about to punish them in that dreadful manner, will they be able to flee from him, or resist him?

Ver. 8.—1. In like manner, indeed, these also shall be punished.]

—I put a full point after the words κατε ὁμοιω; and to finish the sentence, I supply the words shall be punished, from the end of the foregoing verse, with which this clause is connected in the sense, being the reddition to the clause in the beginning of ver. 7.—Ος Σοδωμ κατε Γομορρα, 'Since, or as Sodom and Gomorrah are set forth as an example,' &c. ver. 8. ὁμοιω μιν, 'in like manner certainly these also shall be punished.'—In the next clause of this 8th verse a new sentiment is introduced, which therefore should have been made the beginning of the verse.

2. Being cast into a deep sleep.]—This is the proper literal translation of the word κοιμησιν, as Beza hath shewed. Besides, in other passages of scripture, the wicked are represented as fast asleep. See Rom. xiii. 11. 1 Thess. v. 6.

3. And despise government, (see 2 Pet. ii. 10. note 2.), and revile dignities.]—Δεδεκα ες βασιλευς, literally they revile glories, that is, those who possess the glory of the magistrate's office. This must be the meaning of δεδεκα, as distinguished from καπορευομενοι, government. The Jews, fancying it sinful to obey the heathen magistrates, despised both them and their office. The ungodly teachers of whom Jude speaks carried the matter still farther; they reviled all magistrates whatever, as enemies to the natural liberty of mankind.

Ver. 9.—1. But Michael the archangel.]—Michael is mentioned Dan. x. 13. 21. xii. 1. as standing up in defence of the children of Daniel's people. Because it is said, Rev. xii. 7. that 'Michael and his angels fought against the dragon and his angels,' Estius conjectures that Michael is the chief or prince of all the angels. But this argument is not conclusive. Because the book of Daniel is the first sacred writing in which proper names are given to particular angels, some have fancied, that during the Babylonish captivity the Jews invented these names, or learned them from the Chaldeans. But this seems an unfounded conjecture. For the angel who appeared to Zacharias, Luke i. 19. called himself Gabriel, which shews that that name was not of Chaldean invention.

2. When, contending with the devil, he disputed about the body of Moses.]—In the passages of Daniel's prophecy quoted in the preceding note, Michael is spoken of as one of the chief angels who took care of the Israelites as a nation. He may therefore have been the angel of the Lord, before whom Joshua the high-priest is said, Zech. iii. 1. to have stood, 'Satan being at his right hand to resist him,' namely, in his design of restoring the Jewish church and state, called by Jude the body of Moses, just as the Christian church is called by Paul the body of Christ. Zechariah adds, 'And the Lord,' that is, the angel of the Lord, as is plain from ver. 1. 'said unto Satan, The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan, even the Lord that hath chosen Jerusalem, rebuke thee.' Le Clerc gives a different interpretation of this passage. By Satan in Zechariah's vision, and Δαδολος in Jude's epistle, he understands Tattai and Shetharbozai, the king of Persia's lieutenants, who opposed the restoration of Jerusalem, and who on that account might be called Satan, or the adversary of the Jews, in the same manner that Peter was called Satan by his Master for opposing his suffering at Jerusalem. According to this interpretation, Jude's meaning is, that the angel in Zechariah's vision brought no reviling accusation against the adversaries of the Jews, but reproved them with modesty on account of their being magistrates. This Jude mentioned to shew the ungodly teachers who reviled the Roman magistrates, that they were culpable in doing what the angels, who, as Peter, observeth 2 Ep. ii. 11. are greater in power than they, did not attempt to do.

Beza, Estius, Tillotson, and others, by the body of Moses, about which the devil contended with Michael, understand his dead body, which they suppose the devil contended should be buried publicly, on pretence of doing honour to Moses; but that his intention was to give the Israelites an opportunity of raising his body and worshipping it: That Michael, knowing this, rebuked the devil in the words mentioned by Jude; and to prevent the Israelites from committing idolatry, buried Moses's body so privately, that none of the Israelites ever knew where his sepulchre was. Vitrina, instead of the body of Moses, proposes to read the body of Joshua; but without any authority whatever. The first mentioned account of this against him a reviling accusation,⁴ but said, The Lord rebuke thee.

10 (Δα, 100.) Yet these MEN revile those things which indeed they do not know. But what things they know naturally as animals void of reason,¹ by these they destroy themselves.

11 Wo is¹ to them; for they have gone in the way of Cain, and have run far² in the error of Balaam's hire, and have perished³ in the rebellion of Korah.⁴

12 These MEN are spots¹ in your love-feasts;² when they feast with you,³ feeding themselves without fear.⁴ They are clouds without water,⁵ carried about of winds;⁶

Though that malicious spirit was clothed with no authority of office, he did not attempt to bring against him a reviling accusation, but mildly said, The Lord rebuke thee, Satan.

10 Yet these ungodly teachers, notwithstanding their pretensions to superior illumination and knowledge, revile laws and magistrates, whose origin and usefulness, indeed, they do not know. But the use of the members of their body, which they know only by instinct, as animals void of reason, by perverting these to gluttony, drunkenness, and lust, they destroy both their soul and their body.

11 We is their portion; for, in destroying the souls of their brethren by their false doctrine, they have followed Cain in the murder of his brother; and, by misrepresenting the oracles of God for the sake of gain, they have run far in the error which Balaam followed for hire; and, on pretence of superior illumination, opposing the apostles of Christ, they shall perish, as the men who perished in the rebellion of Korah.

12 These ungodly teachers are a disgrace to your love-feasts; when they feast with you, eating and drinking to excess, without any dread of the baneful consequences of their intemperance, or of the punishment which God will inflict upon gluttons and drunkards. They transaction, which was given long ago by Ephraim the Syrian, (see Lardner, Canon, iii. c. 21. p. 345, 346.) is now adopted by many.

3. Did not attempt to bring against him.—In the common English translation it is durst not bring, as if Michael had been afraid of the devil, which certainly is an improper idea. The translation of οὐκ ἐτόλμα, which I have given, is supported by Blackwall, Sacr. Classics, vol. ii. p. 135.—Tillotson's remark (Posthum. Sermon 31.) on this verse, deserves a place here:—Michael's "duty restrained him, and probably his discretion too. As he durst not offend God in doing a thing so much beneath the dignity and perfection of his nature, so he could not but think that the devil would have been too hard for him at railing, a thing to which, as the angels have no disposition, so I believe they have no talent, no faculty at it:—the cool consideration whereof should make all men, especially those who call themselves divine, and especially in controversies about religion, ashamed and afraid of this manner of disputing."

4. A reviling accusation.—Κριτικὴ κατηγορία ἐλαφροῦς, literally, 'to bring against him a sentence of reviling;' a form of expression founded on this, that whoever reviles or speaks evil of another, doth in effect judge and condemn him. Doddridge thinks the translation might run, 'did not venture to pass a judgment upon his blasphemy,' but referred him to the judgment of God by saying, 'The Lord rebuke thee.' But this translation requires the addition of two words not in the text, and without any necessity. That author, in his note on the passage, saith, "If the angels do not rail even against the devil, how much less ought we against men in authority, even supposing them in some things to behave amiss! Wherefore, to do it when they behave well, must be a wickedness much more aggravated."

Ver. 10. What things they know naturally as animals void of reason, by these they destroy themselves.—Here Jude insinuates, that these ungodly teachers, notwithstanding they made high pretensions to knowledge, had no knowledge, at least concerning the use of their body, but what they derived from natural instinct as brute animals: that they made their lusts the only rule of their actions; that they coupled with women promiscuously like the brute beasts; and that, instead of using the knowledge they derived from instinct rightly, they thereby destroyed both their soul and their body.—In this passage the apostle strongly condemned the lascivious practices of the Nicolaitans, and of all the ungodly teachers who defended the promiscuous use of women; and confuted the argument taken from natural appetite, by which they vindicated their common whoredoms. If these teachers had had any true knowledge, they would have known, that reason is given to enable men to restrain the excesses of their natural appetites, and to lead them to the right use of the members of their body, as well as of the faculties of their mind.

Ver. 11.—Wo is to them.—The substantive verb wanting in this sentence may be taken either from the present of the indicative, or from the present of the optative mood. In the second way, ὦ is wo; must be translated as in our Bible, 'Wo be to them,' and is a curse. But in the first way it should be translated as I have done, 'Wo is to them,' and is only a declaration of the misery which was to come on them. Accordingly the phrase is thus used by our Lord, Matt. xiv. 19. 'Wo unto them who are with child, and to them who give suck in those days.' For certainly this is no wish of punishment, since to be with child, and to give suck in those days, was no crime. But it was a declaration of the misery which was coming on persons in that helpless condition. See Luke vi. 24. for another example of this use of ὦ.

2. And have run far in the error of Balaam's hire.—The word ἐξέτασαν, which I have translated have run far, literally signifies they went out, vagantur, in allusion to the running of liquors, which follow no certain course when they are poured out. The apostle's meaning is, They have gone far in the sin which Balaam committed for hire, when he counselled Balak to tempt the Israelites to commit fornication and idolatry. The ungodly teachers, in the first age, strongly actuated by Balaam's passion for riches, drew money from their disciples, by allowing them to indulge their lusts without restraint. Hence what is here called the error of Balaam's hire, is called, Rev. ii. 14. his doctrine; and 2 Pet. ii. 15. his way.

And the ungodly teachers are there said to have followed in it. See notes 1, 2, on that passage of Peter.

3. And have perished.—Here, as in many passages of scripture, a thing is said to have happened, which was only to happen. This manner of expression was used to shew the absolute certainty of the thing spoken of. Have perished, therefore, means, shall certainly perish. See Est. iv. 10, 2.

4. In the rebellion of Korah.—Literally, ἀνταρξία signifies contradiction. But when princes and magistrates are contradicted, it is rebellion. Wherefore ἀνταρξία here may very properly be translated rebellion; and ἀνταρξία, Rom. x. 21. a rebelling people.—By declaring that the ungodly teachers were to perish in the rebellion of Korah, Jude insinuated that these men, by opposing the apostles of Christ, were guilty of a rebellion similar to that of Korah and his companions, who opposed Moses and Aaron, on pretence that they were no more commissioned by God, the one to be a prince, and the other a priest, than the rest of the congregation, who were all holy, Numb. xvi. 3, 13.—By comparing the ungodly teachers to Cain, to Balaam, and to Korah, Jude hath represented them as guilty of murder, covetousness, and ambition.

Ver. 12.—1. These men are (ἐπιλαδίσ) spots.—The word ἐπιλαδίσ properly signifies spots in the sea, which, when they rise above its surface, appear like spots. For this reason, and because in the parallel passage, 2 Pet. ii. 13, the ungodly teachers are called ἐπιλαδίσ καὶ μωροί, spots, and causes of reproach, Beza hath translated the word ἐπιλαδίσ, spots, in which he followed the Vulgate, which hath maculae.—Jude's meaning is, that the excesses which the ungodly teachers were guilty of in their love-feasts, brought disgrace on the whole body of Christians.

2. In your love-feasts.—Ἀγάπαις. Commentators are not agreed about the meaning of this word. Some think Jude is speaking of the ancient love suppers, which Tertullian hath described, Apolog. c. 39, and which do not seem to have been accompanied with the eucharist.—Others think they were those suppers which the first Christians ate previous to their eating the Lord's supper, and of which St. Paul hath spoken, 1 Cor. x. 21. But being afterwards perverted to the purposes of carnal love by the ungodly teachers, 2 Pet. ii. 14, they were in time disused. The love suppers, however, which Tertullian describes, were continued in the church to the middle of the fourth century, when they were prohibited to be kept in the churches.—As Benson observes, "they were called love-feasts or suppers, because the richer Christians brought in a variety of provisions to feed the poor, the fatherless, the widows, and strangers, and ate with them to shew their love to them."

3. When they feast with you.—For the meaning of συνιωμενοι, see 2 Pet. ii. 13, note 3.—In the common edition of the Greek Testament, the word συνιω is wanting. But several MSS. have it, for which reason our translators have adopted it.

4. Feeding themselves without fear.—Πισμωτικῶς. This word is emphatical, containing an allusion to the name given to the ministers of religion, both under the old and the new dispensation. These were called ποιμνιστῆς, shepherds or feeders, because their office was to feed the people with the spiritual food of true doctrine. The false teachers, because of feeding the people in that manner, fed themselves with meat and drink to excess, without any fear of punishment from God, or of disgrace from the world. I suppose Jude had in his eye here, Ezek. xxiv. 2. 'Wo be to the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves: Should not the shepherds feed the flocks?'

5. They are clouds without water.—The propriety of the comparison by which Jude in this passage, and Peter, 2 Epist. ii. 17, have shewed the emptiness and unprofitableness of the false teachers of their time, will display itself in vivid colours when it is recollected, that in scripture good doctrine and sound knowledge are often represented by water, because sound doctrine beautifies and invigorates the mind, as effectually as rain, in the hot eastern climates, renders the earth verdant and fruitful. Deut. xxxii. 2. 'My doctrine shall drop as the rain,' &c.

6. Carried about of winds.—False doctrine is compared to wind, Eph. iv. 14, on account of its variability. Having no foundation in truth, it is changed as it suits the passions and interests of men. The teachers of false doctrine, therefore, may fitly be compared to withered autumnal trees' without fruit; twice dead;³ rooted out;

13 Raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame;¹ wandering stars,² for whom the blackness of darkness for ever is reserved.³

14 Now Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied¹ even (α, 168.) concerning these MEN,² saying, Behold the Lord cometh with his holy myriads³ OF ANGELS;

15 To pass sentence (κατα, 208. 2.) on¹ all, and to convict all the ungodly among them, of all their deeds of ungodliness which they have impiously committed, and of all the hard things which ungodly sinners have spoken against him.²

16 These are murmurers, AND complainers,¹ who walk according to their own lusts;² and their mouth speaketh great swelling words.³ (Θαυμαζοιτε νεοσυνα) They admire persons for

'clouds without water, carried about of winds,' because, notwithstanding they give an expectation of good doctrine, they afford none; in which respect they are like clouds which promise rain, but being carried about of winds, distil none. See 2 Pet. ii. 17. note 1.

7. Withered autumnal trees.]—So I translate φθινοπωρινα, because it comes from φθινοπωριον, which, according to Scapula, signifies "senescens autumnus et in hiemem vergens"—The decline of autumn drawing towards winter." Or, according to Phavorinus, it signifies νερος φθινοπωρος εμενος, a disease in trees which withers their fruit. This sense of the word Beza hath adopted in his translation, Arbores autumnales infructuosae, suggests a beautiful idea. In the eastern countries the finest fruits being produced in autumn, by calling the corrupt teachers autumnal trees, Jude intimated the just expectation which was entertained of their being fruitful in good doctrine; but by adding without fruits, he marked their uselessness, and the disappointment of their disciples.

3. Twice dead; rooted out.]—Here the apostle insinuates, that while these ungodly teachers, who were mostly of the Jewish nation, continued under the Mosaic dispensation, they were dead and unfruitful: And that under the gospel dispensation, though they seemed to flourish for a little while, and promised to bring forth fruit, they had proved as barren as before, having died a second time, and for that reason were justly rooted out. The commentators observe, that there is a striking climax in this description of the false teachers. They were trees stripped of their leaves, and withering: They had no fruit, being barren that season: They were twice dead, having borne no fruit the former year: Lastly, they were rooted out as utterly barren.

Ver. 13.—1. Raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame.]—Like the raging sea, these ungodly teachers were turbulent and furious, having no command of their irascible passions; and by their wicked outrageous behaviour among their disciples they shewed their own filthiness, to their great disgrace. Perhaps the apostle alluded here to Isa. lvii. 20. "The wicked are like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt."

2. Wandering stars.]—Αστερες πλανηται. Doddridge, in his note on this verse, observes, That the Jews called their teachers stars; and that the teachers in the Christian church are represented under the emblem of stars, Rev. i. 20. ii. 1. Therefore, as the planets have irregular motions, being sometimes stationary and sometimes retrograde, he thinks they are proper emblems of teachers who are unsettled in their principles, and irregular in their behaviour.

3. For whom the blackness of darkness for ever is reserved.]—As the ancients knew that the planets are naturally dark bodies, and derive all their light from the sun, it is supposed that Jude compared the false teachers, not to meteors, or ignes fatui, which have no existence after they are extinguished, but to planets properly so called.

Ver. 14.—1. Now Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied.]—See Pref. sect. 2. No. 2. paragr. 2.—Though Moses hath said nothing concerning Enoch's prophesying, yet, by telling us that he was a person of such piety as to be translated to heaven in the body without dying, he hath warranted us to believe Jude's account of him; namely, that God employed him, as he did Noah, in reforming the wicked of the age in which he lived, and that he inspired him to deliver the prophecy of which Jude speaks. That Enoch was endowed with the spirit of prophecy, Benson saith is apparent from the name which he gave to his son, to wit, Methuselah; which signifies he dieth, and the flood cometh. Enoch is called 'the seventh from Adam,' to distinguish him from Enoch the son of Cain, Gen. iv. 17. who was only the third from Adam.

2. Prophesied even concerning these men.]—So I translate προσεφηνεναι και τουτοις, by supplying εν before τουτοις; or without the preposition, thus, 'prophesied also to these men,' as well as to the are clouds without rain, which intercept the genial rays of the sun and being carried about of winds, render men's habitations gloomy: (see 2 Pet. ii. 17.) They are withered autumnal trees without fruit, although they ought to produce the best: They have died twice; once in the Jewish, and a second time in the Christian vineyard; and are rooted out on that account.

13 They are as unstable in their doctrine, and as turbulent in their manners, as raging waves of the sea, so that they make their own shame apparent to all. Having renounced the true doctrines of the gospel, instead of being the lights of the world, they are wandering meteors, which are quickly to be extinguished in perpetual darkness.

14 Now Enoch, the seventh in descent from Adam, prophesied even concerning these ungodly teachers, when he foretold the destruction of the wicked at the general judgment, saying, Behold the Lord cometh, surrounded with his holy myriads of angels, 15 To pass sentence on all, and to make all the impious and profane among mankind sensible of all the impious actions which they have impiously committed, and of all the impious atheistical scoffing speeches which profane sinners have impiously uttered against Christ, as if he were an impostor who was justly punished with an ignominious death.

16 These ungodly teachers are murmurers against God, and complainers that their lot is not what they deserve, who gratify their own lusts to the utmost; and their mouth speaketh great swelling words in praise of themselves, as the only teachers who free men from the antediluvians. Though Enoch prophesied immediately to the wicked men of his own age, what he said concerning or to them, was intended for the wicked in every age.

3. Saying, Behold the Lord cometh with his holy myriads of angels.]—So οι μυριαδες αγγελιων αυτου must be translated, because αγγελιων being in the feminine gender, agrees with μυριαδων, as an adjective, consequently the word to be supplied is αγγελων, not αγγελων. Μυριας, ten thousand, is a definite number. But it is put here in the plural, μυριαδων, ten thousand, indefinitely, to signify an innumerable multitude.—Ηαυτε, 2 aor. is come. But in the prophetic style the present is often put for the future, to shew the absolute certainty of the event foretold: The Lord is come, or, as it is in our Bible, the Lord cometh, being the genuine prophetic style, it is no proof, as Benson fancies, that Jude took this prophecy out of some book. If it was preserved by tradition, this is the language in which it must have been preserved.

Ver. 15.—1. To pass sentence on all.]—Ποινησαι κρισεις κατα παντων might have been literally translated to execute punishment on all, if the apostle had not added και επιλαβει εσσι, and to convict; for punishment cannot justly be inflicted till the offender is convicted. Wherefore the translation in our Bible, where judgment is used in the sense of punishment, is wrong; namely, 'to execute judgment upon all.' The proper, and I may add, the literal translation of ποινησαι κρισεις, is, to pass judgment or sentence on all. For all shall be judged, but all shall not be condemned. Enoch's prophecy seems to have been generally known among the Jews. For the first words of it, which in the Hebrew are Moran-atha, were used by them with great propriety in that form of excommunication, or cursing, which they pronounced upon irreclaimable offenders, (see 1 Cor. xvi. 22. note), as they put all who were present in mind of God's coming, at the last day, to punish the obstinately impenitent. This same curse the apostle Paul pronounced on all wicked Christians, 1 Cor. xvi. 22.

2. All the hard things which ungodly sinners have spoken against him.]—As Christ is to judge the world, he is the person against whom the ungodly are here said to have spoken hard things; consequently, these hard things consisted in their denying Jesus to be the Son of God; in their calling him a magician, a sorcerer, and an impostor; and in their affirming that he was justly punished with death.

Ver. 16.—1. These are (οι ψευδοι) murmurers, and (οι καταγοιγοι) complainers.]—They murmured against God on account of the dispensations of his providence, and complained of their condition, fancying that they deserved a better lot: μωμολογοι, literally are persons who complain of their lot, or portion. In this, the ungodly teachers resembled the ancient Israelites, who murmured against God on account of the hardships they were exposed to in the wilderness.

2. Who walk according to their own lusts.]—From this circumstance it is probable, that the corrupt teachers complained not only of their lot, but of the restraints which were laid on them by the laws of the countries where they lived. To this conjecture what followeth agrees: 'Their mouth speaketh great swelling words.'

3. Great swelling words.]—If the interpretation of this clause given in the commentary is not admitted, we may suppose the false teachers spake in an insolent manner against the Roman magistrates for punishing them, and against the laws for prohibiting the vices in which they delighted. For they are said, ver. 8. 'to despise government, and to revile dignities.' Perhaps they thus opposed the heathen magistrates and laws, on pretence of maintaining the cause of the people of God against the tyranny and oppression of the Romans; and spake in a pompous boasting manner of their Christian liberty, which they affirmed consisted in a freedom to gratify their inclinations without control, 2 Pet. ii. 19.—Of these teachers, and of the timid speeches by which they defended their vices, John hath given insinuations, 1 Epist. iii. 4—11.

the sake of gain.⁴

7 But, beloved, remember ye the words which were before spoken by the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ:¹

18 That they said to you, that in the last time there *would be scoffers, walking according to their own ungodly lusts.*¹

19 These be they who separate themselves from OTHERS:¹ (φυχαυ) animal MEN,² not having the Spirit.³

20 But ye, beloved, building (αυτις, 65. 1.) one another on your most holy faith, AND praying (σ Πνευματις) *by the Holy Spirit,*³

4. They admire persons for the sake of gain.]—The false teachers of that age greatly admired the rich on account of their riches, thereby feeding their vanity. They flattered them likewise with the hope of salvation; and by so doing hardened them in their sins. In short, they never opposed the will of their rich disciples in any thing: And this servility they shewed towards the rich, merely to draw money from them.

Ver. 17. Remember ye the words which were before spoken by the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ.]—In ver. 18. Jude cites the words spoken by Peter in particular, concerning the coming of scoffers in the last time. Yet Jude's exhortation being general, it comprehends the words spoken by the other apostles concerning the coming of false teachers: Such as Paul's words, 1 Tim. iv. 1—5. 2 Tim. iii. and iv.: Nay, it comprehends the words spoken by Jude himself in the preceding part of this epistle. For we have shewed, Pref. sect. 2. that Jude was an apostle, and that he asserted his title to that office by calling himself the brother of James. Dr. Symonds, in his observations upon the expediency of revising the present English version, &c. thinks this clause should be translated, 'Remember ye the words which were formerly spoken by the apostles.'

Ver. 18. That they said to you, that in the last time there would be scoffers, walking according to their own ungodly lusts.]—Though it be allowed that Jude in this verse transcribed 2 Pet. iii. 3. it will not follow, from his using Peter's words, that the two apostles wrote of the same persons. Peter, in the passage quoted by Jude, evidently speaks of scoffers who were to arise in the age in which Christ was to come to judge mankind, and put an end to this mundane system. For he represents them as ridiculing the promise of Christ's coming, as a thing not likely to happen after being so long delayed: Whereas Jude speaks of his scoffers as already come, ver. 4.; and the account which he gives of them is, that they perverted the grace of God to lasciviousness; denied God and Christ; despised government; reviled dignities; led most immoral lives; imitated Cain and Balaam in their wickedness; and were to share in the punishment of Korah: but said nothing of their scoffing at the promise of Christ's coming; or indeed of their scoffing at any of the doctrines or promises of the gospel. He calls them scoffers on account of their reviling dignities, and perhaps of their ridiculing those precepts of the gospel which prohibited lasciviousness. If, however, the reader is of opinion that Jude, like Peter, speaks of the scoffers who are to arise about the end of the world, his exhortation to remember the words which Peter spoke concerning them was highly proper, because the recollection of Peter's prophecy would put the faithful in every age on their guard against such false teachers as might arise in any future period.

Ver. 19.—1. These be they who separate themselves from others;]—namely, on account of their pretended great illumination. In the common text it is αὐτοὶ, those who separate from. But many MSS. add the word αὐτοὶ, a reading which our translators have followed, and which is warranted by the Vulgate, where we find, Qui segregant semetipsos. I likewise have followed that reading, and have supplied the word others, because the preposition αὐτοῖς requires it.—From Rom. xvi. 17. it appears, that the heretical teachers very early began to set up separate assemblies for worship. See Rom. xvi. 17. note 2. Perhaps they founded their practice on Isa. lii. 11.

2. Animal men.]—Some are of opinion that by φυχαυ, animal men, the apostle means those who are governed by the lusts which properly belong to the animal part of the human nature, and who place their whole happiness in sensual enjoyments. Others, by animal men, understand those who in religion admit of nothing as true but what is consonant to their own preconceived opinions, and can be explained upon what they call the principles of reason. In this sense of the word φυχαυ, αὐτοὶ is used 1 Cor. ii. 14. See note 1. there.—I think the apostle calls the false teachers animal men, because they were neither inspired by the Spirit of God, nor guided by right reason.

3. Not having the Spirit.]—The ungodly teachers boasted of having an illumination from the Spirit superior to that of the apostles, and that of the disciples of the apostles. And on this pretence they separated themselves and their disciples from the others. But their shackles of superstition. They admire and praise persons, not for their good qualities, but for their riches, that they may get money from them for their flattery.

17 But, beloved, to prevent you from giving heed to the vain speeches of these deceivers, continually recollect the words which were spoken prophetically by the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ;

18 That they foretold to you, that in the last time, namely after the destruction of the Jewish commonwealth, there would be scoffers in the church, who, ridiculing the strictness of the precepts of the gospel, would walk according to the impulses of their own impure lusts.

19 These be the teachers, who, opposing the apostles as void of the Spirit because they condemn their errors, separate themselves from the true disciples of Christ. But they are what they call us, mere animal men, who neither have the Spirit of God, nor the spirit of right reason.

20 But ye, beloved, by conversation and mutual exhortation, building one another in knowledge and holiness on the foundation of your most holy faith, and praying in your public assemblies by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost, which the false teachers and their disciples cannot do, boasting was without foundation: these men were truly what they called others, mere animal men, not having the Spirit, either of God or of right reason.

Ver. 20.—1. Building one another on your most holy faith.]—Here faith is put for the objects of faith, namely, the doctrines, precepts, and promises of the gospel. This faith the apostle terms most holy, because its design and tendency is to discourage vice of all kinds, and to make men holy both in mind and body: Whereas the faith of the ungodly teachers, especially those of the Nicolaitan sect, was a most unholy faith, as it encouraged men in all manner of licentiousness.

2. And praying by the Holy Spirit.]—From 1 Cor. xiv. 15. Πνευματις με λαλοῦμαι, 'I will pray with the Spirit,' it appears that the spiritual men in the first age uttered prayers and psalms in their public assemblies by an immediate inspiration of the Holy Ghost. To this exercise of their spiritual gift Jude exhorted the faithful to whom he wrote, not only because they would thereby keep themselves in the love of God, and in the firm expectation of pardon from Christ, as mentioned in the subsequent verse, but because it was a clear proof that they were not animal, but spiritual men: Whereas the ungodly teachers being incapable of praying by inspiration, they were thereby demonstrated to be mere animal men, who had not the Spirit.

Although in this passage Jude speaks only of inspired prayer, it is proper to observe, concerning prayer in general, that it is a duty expressly enjoined by Christ himself, Luke xviii. 1. xxi. 36. and by his apostles, 1 Thess. v. 17.: That it is recommended to us by the example of all the good men whose history is recorded in the scriptures, but chiefly by the example of Christ, who often prayed, not only with his disciples, but by himself in secret: That it is a principal part of the duty which, as the creatures of God, men owe to him, being an expression of the sense which they have of their absolute dependence on him for their being, and every thing they enjoy: That it is not enjoined for the purpose of informing God of our wishes and wants, since our heavenly Father knoweth what things we have need of before we ask him; neither is it enjoined for the purpose of constraining God by our importunity to grant us our desires, but for inspiring us with the love of virtue and the hatred of vice, in order that God, agreeably to the laws of his moral government, may grant our petitions. For if he interests himself at all in human affairs, the virtuous man must be more the object of his love and care than the vicious; and his government must be carried on in such a manner as finally to promote such a person's happiness, who therefore may ask of him the things necessary thereto, and reasonably expect to obtain them.

The influence of prayer in restraining men from sin and exciting them to virtue, and in regulating their whole temper and conduct, is excellently described in No. 98. of the Adventurer, as follows: "I know, that concerning the operation and effects of prayer there has been much doubtful disputation, in which innumerable metaphysical subtleties have been introduced, and the understanding has been bewildered in sophistry, and affronted with jargon: those who have no other proofs of the fitness and advantage of prayer than are to be found among these speculations, are but little acquainted with the practice.

"He who has acquired an experimental knowledge of this duty, knows that nothing so forcibly restrains from ill, as the remembrance of a recent address to heaven for protection and assistance. After having petitioned for power to resist temptation, there is so great an incongruity in not continuing the struggle, that we blush at the thought, and persevere, lest we lose all reverence for ourselves. After fervently devoting ourselves to God, we start with horror at immediate apostasy; every act of deliberate wickedness is then complicated with hypocrisy and ingratitude; it is a mockery of the Father of mercy, the forfeiture of that peace in which we closed our address, and a renunciation of the hope that it inspired.

"For a proof of this, let every man ask himself, as in the presence of Him 'who searches the heart,' whether he has never been deterred from prayer by his fondness for some criminal gratification, which he could not afterwards repeat without greater compunction. If prayer and immorality appear to be thus incompat-

21 Keep one another in the love of God, expecting the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ, (κτ, 143.) with eternal life.

22 And making a difference, have compassion indeed on some.

23 But others save (ω ρεφε) by fear, snatching THEM out of the fire, hating even the garment spotted by the flesh.

24 Now, to him who is able to guard you from stumbling, and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy,

25 To the wise God alone, (see Rom. xvi. 27. note 1.), our Saviour, as glory and majesty, strength and right, both now and (κτ τω τω αμνν) throughout all ages. Amen.

tible, prayer should not surely be lightly rejected by those who contend that moral virtue is the summit of human perfection; nor should it be encumbered with such circumstances as must inevitably render it less easy and less frequent; it should be considered as the wings of the soul, and should be always ready when a sudden impulse prompts her to spring up to God. We should not think it always necessary to be either in church or in our closet, to express joy, love, desire, trust, reverence, or complacency, in the fervour of a silent ejaculation. Adoration, hope, and even a petition, may be conceived in a moment; and the desire of the heart may ascend, without words, to Him 'by whom our thoughts are known afar off.' He who considers himself as perpetually in the presence of the Almighty, need not fear that gratitude or homage can ever be ill-timed, or that it is profane thus to worship in any circumstances that are not criminal.

'There is no preservation from vice equal to this habitual and constant intercourse with God; neither does any thing equally alleviate distress or heighten prosperity. In distress, it sustains us with hope; and in prosperity, it adds to every other enjoyment the delight of gratitude.

'Let those, therefore, who have rejected religion, as they have given up incontestable advantages, try whether they cannot yet be recovered; let them review the arguments by which their judgment has been determined, and see whether they compel the assent of reason: and let those who upon this recollection perceive, that, though they have professed fidelity, they do indeed believe and tremble, no longer sacrifice happiness to folly, but pursue that wisdom whose ways are pleasantness and peace.'

Ver. 22.—1. And making a difference;—namely, in their method of reclaiming those who had fallen from their love to God, and had lapsed into vice. For διακρίνομεν, being the participle of the present of the indicative of the middle voice, signifies to make a distinction between the lapsed, suitable to the nature of their offence.

2. Have compassion indeed on some.—This, being opposed to snatching others out of the fire, mentioned in the next verse, signifies that they were to deal gently with those offenders whose situation was not so criminal and hazardous as that of others, because they had fallen, not through corruption of heart, but through ignorance and weakness of understanding; and being of a tractable disposition, and open to conviction, might be reclaimed. With such, the faithful, especially those who were employed in the office of teaching, were to use the mild methods of instruction and persuasion; and they were to do so from compassion to the lapsed.

Ver. 23.—1. But others save by fear.—Endeavour to save others, who have erred from corruption of heart, and who are obstinate in their errors and vices, by rousing their fears. Set before them a future judgment with all its terrors. And if they continue unmoved, use the censures of the church as the last remedy. These methods Jude terms a 'snatching them out of the fire.'

2. Snatching them out of the fire.—Commentators observe, that this is a proverbial expression, used Amos iv. 11. and Zech. iii. 2. to which St. Paul alludes 1 Cor. iii. 15; and that it denotes haste in reclaiming offenders, and even rough methods, when such are necessary, 'lest, if the opportunity be lost, the offenders should perish.—Sin is here likened to fire, on account of its destructive nature; and the saving sinners from their evil courses, is fitly compared to the snatching one hastily out of a house which is on fire. Or, the fire

21 Keep one another in the constant exercise of love to God, and, in that method only, expect pardon from our Lord Jesus Christ, together with eternal life, as the consequence of pardon.

22 And, making a difference in your methods of reclaiming sinners, have compassion indeed on some who have erred through ignorance and weakness, and reclaim them by the gentle method of persuasion.

23 But the ungodly teachers, and such of their disciples as have erred through corruption of heart, save by the fear of reproofs and censures; snatching them out of the fire of the wrath of God: and, in doing them this good office, shun all familiar intercourse with them, as ye would shun touching a garment spotted by the flesh of one who hath a plague sore.

24 Now, to inspire you with courage to persevere in the doctrine and practice of the gospel, and to shew you with what assurance ye may rely on the protection of God, I conclude with ascribing to him who is able and willing to guard you from stumbling either into error or into sin, and to present you faultless before the manifestation of his glory at the day of judgment, with exceeding joy to yourselves and to the redeemed multitude;

25 Even to God who alone is wise underivedly, and who having contrived our salvation is our Saviour, be ascribed the glory of infinite perfection, and the majesty of empire absolutely universal; strength to govern that empire, and right to do whatever seemeth to himself good; both now and through all eternity. Amen.

which the apostle here speaks of may be the divine wrath, called fire, Heb. xii. 29. 'For even our God is a consuming fire.'

3. Hating even the garment spotted by the flesh.—This, which is a direction to those who snatch others out of the fire, implies, that in doing them that compassionate office, they are to avoid all familiarity with them, even as they would avoid touching a garment spotted by the flesh of one who hath died of the plague; lest they be infected by their vicious conversation.

Ver. 24.—1. Now, to him who is able to guard you from stumbling.—So σωτηριοι; literally signifies. The apostle's meaning is, guard you from falling into sin. For the course of one's life being in scripture represented by the metaphor of walking, sinning is metaphorically represented by stumbling in walking.—Some who translate this clause 'keep you from falling,' by falling understand falling into calamity; in which sense they interpret Prov. xiv. 16. 'A just man falleth seven times, and riseth up again.' But in the apostolical writings the word fall commonly hath the meaning which I have affixed to it. See Rom. xi. 11. James ii. 10. iii. 2.

2. And to present you faultless before the presence of his glory.—

—This being one of the characters of the persons to whom this doxology is addressed, it is argued by some, that God the Father is meant, who is said, Col. i. 20. 'By him (Christ) to reconcile all things to him.—22. In the body of his flesh through death, to present you (the Colossians) holy, and unblamable, and unreprouvable in his sight.'—To this interpretation it is objected, that the Father cannot be meant here, because he is said to present believers faultless before the presence of his own glory; whereas it is well known, that the Father is not to judge the world, having committed all judgment to the Son. Nevertheless it is replied, that the Father may truly be said to present believers faultless at the judgment, before the presence of his own glory, because Christ himself hath told us, that he will come to judgment 'in the glory of the Father,' as well as in his own glory, Matt. xvi. 27; that is, He will come surrounded with the glory whereby the presence of the Father is manifested to the angelical hosts in heaven.—But as Christ likewise is said, Eph. v. 27. 'to present the church to himself a glorious church, without spot,' &c. it renders the above argument doubtful.

Ver. 25.—1. To the wise God alone.—That this is the true translation of νοῦς ὁ σοφὸς Θεός, see proved Rom. xvi. 27. note 1.

2. Our Saviour.—From this appellation it is argued, that the wise God, to whom this doxology is addressed, is Jesus Christ, whose proper title is our Saviour, and who is called God in other passages of scripture, particularly Rom. ix. 5. where he is styled God over all blessed for ever. Nevertheless, as in some passages of scripture, particularly Luke i. 47. 1 Tim. i. 1. Tit. i. 3. the Father is styled our Saviour, this argument likewise is doubtful. They who contend, that the doxology in this passage of Jude belongs to the Father, observe, that the same doxology is ambiguously addressed to God the Father, Rom. xvi. 37. where it runs thus, 'To the wise God alone, through Jesus Christ, be the glory for ever. Amen.'

After the words 'our Saviour,' in this verse, some MSS. add, 'through Jesus Christ our Lord;' and the best copies of the Vulgate have 'Soli Deo Salvatori nostro, per Jesum Christum Dominum nostrum, gloria et magnificentia, imperium et potestas ante omne seculum, et nunc et in omnia secula seculorum. Amen.'—See Mill on this verse.

SUPPLEMENT TO ESSAY IV.

On Translating the Greek Language used by the Writers of the New Testament.

THE author hath judged it necessary to make the following additions to Essay IV. for establishing more fully the translations which he hath given of the Greek particles, &c. as used by the writers of the New Testament, because, as he hath more than once remarked already, by rightly translating the Greek particles, most important alterations have been made in the sense of many passages of the apostolical epistles, whereby the meaning of these passages hath been placed in a more clear, unambiguous, and beautiful light, than formerly. Wherefore, if the reader is of opinion, that the meaning of any Greek word mentioned in Essay IV. is not sufficiently established by the examples there produced, he is desired to consult this supplement.

N. B.—The Paragraphs of Essay IV. being all numbered, the figures prefixed to the following additions point out the paragraphs of that Essay to which they belong.

NO. 1. ACTIVE VERBS express the agent's attempt or intention, &c. John i. 9. 'That was the true light which lighteth (which is designed to light) every man that cometh into the world.' Rom. ii. 4. 'Not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth (is designed to lead) thee to repentance.' 1 John i. 10. 'If we say we have not sinned, we make (we attempt to make) him a liar.' Rev. xii. 9. 'Called the Devil, and Satan, who deceiveth (who endeavours to deceive) the whole world.'

4. Active verbs express, not the doing, but the permission of a thing. 2 Sam. xxiv. 1. 'The anger of the Lord was moved against Israel, and he moved David (that is, permitted David to be moved by Satan) against Israel.' as is plain from 1 Chron. xxi. 1. 'And Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel.'

9.—1. The subjunctive mood put for the indicative. 2 Cor. xiii. 9. 'We are glad (ὅτι ἡμεῖς, ἀσθενούμε, ἡμεῖς ἐς ὑμᾶς ἐσμεν) when we are weak and ye are strong.'

2. The infinitive with the article prefixed, is put for the subjunctive. Philip. iii. 10. Τοῦ γινώσκειν, 'That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection.'

3. Also for the corresponding substantive noun. Philip. iii. 21. Κατὰ τὴν ἐργασίαν τοῦ δουλεύειν αὐτοῖς, 'According to that strong working whereby he is able even to subdue all things.'

10.—1. Buxtorff, in his Thesaur. p. 91. observes, that among the Hebrews, "Frequentissima est temporum commutatio et enallage, ut preteriti pro futuro, et futuri pro preterito: et in continuata sententia sequens tempus trahitur plerumque in naturam precedentis."

2. The preterite used for the future. Col. ii. 13. 'You, being dead through the sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, (ὥστε ἀποθνήσκεσθε, he hath) he will make alive together with him; with Christ. Jude, ver. 11. (Καὶ ἀπολλύεσθε) 'And (have perished) shall perish in the rebellion of Korah.'

12.—1. The present tense put for the preterite. 1 John iii. 8. 'The devil sinneth (hath sinned) from the beginning.'

2. Also for the future. 1 Cor. xi. 24. 'This is my body (Τὸ ὑμῶν ἰμὸν κλάμμεν) which is broken (which shall be broken; or, which is about to be broken) for you.'

16.—1. The Greek participles have sometimes an adverbative sense. Heb. xi. 13. 'All these died in faith, (μὲν λαβόντες) though they did not receive the things promised. For, seeing them afar off, &c. Jude, ver. 5. 'I will therefore put you in remembrance, (μνησκ) though ye once knew this,' &c.*

2. The participle is put for the present of the indicative. Rom. ix. 5. 'O ων, 'Who is God over all.' Rev. i. 8. 'I am Alpha and Omega, (ὁ ὢν) which is, and which was.'

3. Beza, in his note on 2 John, ver. 7. saith, the participle of the imperfect of the indicative is used in innumerable places for the aorist. See 2 John, ver. 7. note 1.

18.—1. When one substantive governs another, the latter must be translated as an explication of the former. Iliad Δ. line 350. Πᾶσι σὺ σῶς φάρεσ ἑστίς τε: 'What kind of speech hath escaped the guard of your teeth?' that is, your teeth which are a guard, namely, to your tongue.

19.—1. Two substantives joined by a copulative particle must be translated in regimen. Philip. i. 25. Ἐκ τῆς ἡμῶν προέσπον καὶ χαρᾶς τῆς πίστεως, 'For your furtherance and joy of faith;' for the advancement of the joy of your faith.

21.—1. Genders of nouns. The neuter is sometimes put for the masculine. Gal. iii. 22. 'But the scripture hath shut up together (τα πάντα, all things) all men under sin.' Eph. i. 10. 'To gather together (τα πάντα) all men (Jews and Gentiles) under Christ.' 2 Thess. ii. 6. 'And ye know (το καταχρῶ) what now restraineth;' ye know the person who now restraineth.

22.—1. The sacred writers, to render their discourse of greater extent, sometimes put the relative in the plural number, notwithstanding its antecedent is in the singular number. 1 John v. 16. 'If any one see his brother sinning a sin not unto death, let him ask God, and he will grant to him life for those,' &c.

24.—2. Genitive case denoting possession. Rom. xv. 8. Ἐπαγγελίας πατρῶν, 'Promises belonging to the fathers.' Eph. iii. i. 'Paul (ὁ δούλος τοῦ Χριστοῦ) a prisoner belonging to Christ Jesus.'

3. Denoting the end for which a thing is done or suffered. Philemon, ver. 13. 'He might minister to me (ὡς τὸν δούλόν μου ἀρχαῖον) in these bonds for the gospel.'

27.—1. Comparison in the third degree, by a repetition of the word. Eph. ii. 4. 'Through his great love with which he loved us; that is, through his exceeding great love. James v. 17. Καὶ προσεύχεται ἀσπασμένον, 'And (he prayed with prayer, that is) he prayed earnestly.' See also Eph. vi. 18.

31.—1. All signifies sometimes a considerable part only. John iv. 29. 'Come see a man who told me all things that ever I did.' Acts i. 1. 'All that Jesus began both to do and teach.' 1 Cor. ii. 15. 'The spiritual man examineth indeed all things.' 1 Cor. ix. 22. 'To all I have become all things.' Wherefore, 1 Pet. iv. 7. 'The end of all things hath approached,' signifies the end of the Jewish church and state only.

41.—1. Elect, elected, in the following passages may signify approved. Rom. xvi. 13. 'Rufus (ἐλεγχον ὡς Κυρίου) the approved by the Lord.' Col. iii. 12. 'Put on therefore, (ὡς ἐλεγχον τοῦ Θεοῦ) as persons approved of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies.'

59.—1. Walk. In scripture one's moral conduct is denoted by the metaphor of walking, because, as walking in a road ends in one's arrival at a place, so his moral conduct will at length end, either in happiness or in misery to him.

60.—1. Word, λογος, sometimes denotes eloquence. 2 Cor. viii. 7. 'Therefore, as ye abound in faith (καὶ λόγῳ) and in eloquence.' Eph. vi. 19. 'That (λόγος) eloquence may be given me in the opening of my mouth.'

2. λογος, A promise. Tit. i. 3. 'Hath manifested (τὸν λόγον αὐτοῦ) his promise, by preaching with which I am intrusted.' See note 1. on this verse.

3. λογος, A prayer. 1 Kings xvii. 1. 'Elijah said to Ahab, As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these three years but according to my word,' my prayer. See James v. 17. note 2.

4. λογος, A doctrine. Tit. i. 9. 'Holding fast (τὴν πύξιν λόγου) the true doctrine.'

5. λογος, An history, a narration, a discourse. Acts i. 1. 'The former (λόγον) treatise* or narration.' 2 Pet. ii. 3. 'Will make merchandise of you (πλάστεις λόγου) by fictitious tales.'

6. λογος, An appearance or shew of a thing. Col. ii. 23. 'Which things have indeed (λόγον) a show of wisdom.'

63.—1. The relative pronouns refer to the remote antecedent. Luke xiii. 14. 'I have found no fault in this man. 15. No, nor yet Herod: for I sent you to him, and to nothing worthy of death is done by him.' Not Herod, who is last mentioned, but Jesus, who is mentioned ver. 14. 1 Cor. xv. 25. 'For he must reign till (ἄντος) he (God, who is mentioned in the preceding verse) hath put all the enemies under his feet.'

65.—1. The pronoun ἑαυτός is often used in the sense of αλλήλους, one another. 1 Cor. vi. 7. 'Ye go to law (μὴδ' ἑαυτῶν) one with another.' See also Eph. iv. 19. 32. v. 19. Col. iii. 16. 1 Thess. v. 13. Jude, ver. 20. John vii. 35.

68.—1. The relative pronoun sometimes differs in gender from its antecedent, regarding its meaning rather than its form. Matt. xxviii. 19. 'Teach (ἀγχατα τα ἔθνη) ἐκ πάντων τῶν ἁνθρώπων all nations, baptizing them.' John xv. 26. Τὸ Πνεῦμα—καὶ αὐτὸς μαρτυρεῖ, 'The Spirit—he shall testify.' Rom. ix. 23, 24. Σκεπὴ οὐκ—ὅς καὶ ἀκαλῶν. Gal. iv. 19. Ταῖς μοι ὡς πατρὶ. Philem. ver. 10. 'I beseech thee (πρὸς τὴν ἐμὴν τέκνη) for my son, whom I begat in my bonds.'

2. The relative pronoun sometimes differs in number from its antecedent. Philip. iii. 20. 'Our conversation is (ὡς κεραιὸς ἐξ ὑμῶν) for heaven, from whence also we look for the Saviour.'

67.—1. The relative pronoun ὅς is sometimes put for the demonstrative οὗτος. 1 Cor. ii. 9. 'Α ὁφθαλμοὶ οὐκ ὤν, 'Those things eye hath not seen,' &c.: So ὁ must be translated, because in the end of the sentence there is another ὁ, signifying which. 2 Cor. ii. 16. 'Ὅς μὴ, 'To these, indeed, it is the savour of death ending in death, (ὅς δὲ) but to those,' &c.

81.—1. Ἀλλὰ, However. 1 Tim. i. 16. Ἀλλὰ διὰ τούτου, 'Howbeit, for this cause I obtained mercy.'

86.—1. Ἀπο, In. Luke xii. 57. Τὶ δὲ καὶ ἀπὸ ἑαυτῶν κρινέτε, 'And why also in yourselves do ye not judge what is right?' xxi. 3. 'Ye see and know (ἀπὸ ἑαυτῶν) in yourselves, that the summer is now nigh.' Luke xix. 30. 'And some of the Pharisees (ἀπὸ τῶν ὄχλων) in the crowd said.' Wherefore Philip. iv. 15. may be thus translated: 'When I went forth (ἀπὸ) in Macedonia.' See the note on that passage.

2. Ἀπο, By, by means of. Matt. vii. 16. Ἀπὸ τῶν καρπῶν αὐτῶν, 'By their fruits ye shall know them.'

3. Ἀπο denotes sometimes the efficient cause. Mark viii. 31. 'And be rejected (ἀπὸ τῶν πρῶτον) by the elders.' James i. 27. 'Unspotted (ἀπὸ τοῦ κόσμου) by the world.'

90.—1. Γὰρ often hath a causal signification. So our translators thought. Rom. iv. 16. 'Ὁ γὰρ νόμος ὁρῶν καταγγέλλεται, 'Because the law worketh wrath.' Heb. vii. 11. 'If, indeed, perfection were through the Levitical priesthood, (ὁ λαὸς γὰρ ἐπ' αὐτῇ) because on account of it the people received the law.'

92.—1. Γὰρ is used to introduce a reason for something in the writer's mind, which he hath not expressed. Thus, Rom. iv. 2. Εἰ γὰρ Ἀβραὰμ ἐκ ἔργων δικαιώθη, 'For, if Abraham were justified by works, he might boast.' Here the proposition suppressed, which this is produced to prove, is, 'Abraham did not obtain justification by the flesh:' for, if Abraham were justified by the work of circumcision which he performed on his flesh, he might have boasted.

94.—1. Γὰρ is used as an affirmative particle, and must be translated indeed, certainly. Rom. viii. 7. Τὸ γὰρ νοῦν τοῦ ὄντι ὑποτάσσεται, ὡς γὰρ δύναιται, 'For it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be.'

97.—1. Γὰρ, Now. Eph. v. 9. 'Ὁ γὰρ καρπὸς,' 'Now the fruit of the Spirit.'

98.—1. Γὰρ has the adversative sense of δὲ, but, yet, although. Rom. xv. 4. 'Ὅσα γὰρ, 'But whatever things were before-written, were written for our instruction.' Philip. iii. 20. 'Ἡμεῖς γὰρ τοῦ πνεύματος,' 'But our conversation is for heaven.' 2 Pet. i. 9. 'Ὁ γὰρ μὴ περικεῖται ταῦτα, 'But he that lacketh these things is blind.'

101.—2. Δε, Also. John viii. 17. Καὶ ὡς τὸ νόμον δὲ τῶ ἡμῶν, 'And in your law also it is written, that the testimony of two men is true.' See Parkh. Dictionary.

104.—1. Δε, Besides, further. 2 Pet. i. 5. Καὶ αὐτοῦ τούτου δὲ σπουδῇ παύσαι, 'And besides this, giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue.'

114.—1. Διὰ, To, forward. Acts iii. 16. 'Yea, the faith which is (δὲ αὐτῷ) toward him;' that is, which hath him for its object. Rom. iv. 25. 'Was raised again (διὰ τὴν δικαιοσύνην ἡμῶν) to our justification:—ad justificationem, nempe, ad testificandam justificationem nostri.' This is Pasor's translation. See his Lexicon, in voce διὰ; where he observes, that Rom. xi. 35. ἐξ, causam procreantem, διὰ, conservantem, et ὡς, causam indicat finalem.

117.—1. Διὰ, In. Heb. vii. 9. 'Even Levi paid tithes (διὰ Ἀβραάμ) in Abraham.'

119.—1. Διὰ, With. Eph. vi. 18. 'Praying always (ὡς πᾶντος προσευχῆς), with all prayer,' that is, most earnestly See 27. 1.

121.—1. Διὰ, Of, from. Matt. xxvii. 18. 'For he knew that (διὰ ῥέσσην) from envy they had delivered him.' 2 Thess. ii. 2. 'Nor by letter as (δὲ ἡμῶν) from us.'

122.—1. Διὸ is sometimes used causally, and must be translated for. Eph. iv. 8. Διὸ λέγει, 'For he saith, he ascended up on high.' James iv. 6. 'He giveth greater grace, (διὸ λέγει) for he saith, God resisteth the proud.' 1 Pet. ii. 6. Διὸ καὶ, 'For even it is contained in the scripture.'

123.—1. Διὰ, For. 1 Pet. i. 24. Διὰτις πάντα σαφές, 'For all flesh is as grass.'

124.—1. Εἰς, An adverb of time, signifying when. 3 John ver. 10. 'For this cause, (ἐπὶ ἧς) when I come I will bring his deeds to remembrance.'

127.—1. Εἰ for ὅτι, That. 1 John iii. 13. 'Do not wonder (ὡς) that the world hateth you.'

130.—2. Εἰ, Though. 2 Tim. ii. 13. Εἰ ἀπιστοῦμεν, πᾶντες ὥστε μὴ. In rendering this clause, our translators being sensible of the absurdity of making the faithfulness of God depend on men's unfaithfulness, and not recollecting that α signifies although, have in their translation endeavoured to avoid the absurdity, not very properly, by supplying the word yet; thus, 'If we believe not, yet he abideth faithful.' The proper translation is, 'Though we be unfaithful, he abideth faithful: he cannot deny himself.'

133.—2. Εἰ γὰρ, Siquidem, since indeed. 2 Pet. ii. 4. Εἰ γὰρ ὁ Θεὸς ἀγγέλους ἀμάρτησάντων ἐκ σφραγίσαι, 'Since indeed God did not spare the angels who sinned.'

134.—1. Εἰ γὰρ, Seeing at least. Chandler saith, α γὰρ is used in this sense by the best writers; and in support of his opinion cites Ælian. Pierce is of the same opinion, in his note on Col. i. 23.

135.—1. Εἰ καὶ, Although. Scapula translates α καὶ, etsi etiam.

136.—2. Εἰ μὴ in the LXX. often denotes a question, and signifies, Num. Gen. iii. 11. Εἰ μὴ φάγε, 'Hast thou eaten of the tree?' 2 Cor. iii. 1. Εἰ μὴ χρεζόμεθα, 'Or need we, as some, letters of recommendation to you?'

141.—2. Εκ, Into. Matt. ii. 13. 'Flee (α) into Egypt.' See also ver. 14. Acts xvi. 15. 'Come (α) into my house.' Gal. iv. 6. 'God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son (α) into your hearts.' Ver. 24. 'Bringeth forth children (α) into bondage.' See Parkhurst's Dictionary in voc. α.

3. Εκ, To, unto. Eph. iv. 13. Εκ, 'Unto the measure of the stature.' 1 Pet. iv. 9. 'Use hospitality (α ἀλλήλων) one to another.'

142.—1. Εκ, Concerning. 1 Thess. v. 18. 'This is the will of God by Christ Jesus (α) concerning you.' Gal. iii. 17. 'The covenant which was afore reified concerning Christ.'

2. Εκ, For. Mark i. 4. 'John did baptize in the wilderness, and preach the baptism of repentance (α) for the remission of sins.' Rom. xi. 32. 'God hath shut up together all (α ἀποθνήσκει) for disobedience.' xiii. 14. 'Make no provision (α) for the flesh.' 1 Cor. xvi. 1. 'Now concerning the collection (α) for the saints.' Col. i. 16. 'All things were created by him (αὐτὸς α) and for him.' 2 Tim. i. 11. Εκ ὅ, 'For which testimony.'

3. Εκ, On account of. Eph. iii. 2. 'The grace of God which was given me (α ὑμῖν) on your account.' 2 Thess. i. 11. Εκ ὅ, 'On which account also we always pray.'

4. Εκ, On, upon. 2 Cor. xi. 20. 'If one smite you (α πρὸς ὤμῳ) on the face.'

5. Εκ, Against, denoting a determined time. 2 Pet. iii. 7. 'Safely kept for fire (α) against the day of judgment.'

6. Εκ, governing the accusative case, signifies in. 2 Pet. i. 8. 'Neither be barren nor unfruitful (α ἐργασθῶν) in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.'

7. Εκ, Until. Eph. i. 14. 'Which is the earnest of our inheritance (α) until the redemption of the purchased possession.' iv. 30. 'With whom ye are sealed (α) until the day of redemption.'

146.—1. Εκ, By. Acts vii. 53. 'Who have received the law (α) by the disposition of angels.'

155.—1. Εκ, Εξ, Belonging to. 2 Cor. ix. 2. 'Ὁ ἐξ ὑμῶν ζῶντες, 'Your zeal.' Luke viii. 27. 'There met him a certain man (α τῆς πόλεως) belonging to the city; as is evident from the latter part of the verse.

2. Εκ, From. Rom. ix. 23. 'Because he seetheth not (α) from faith: for whatever is not (α) from faith is sin.' 2 Pet. ii. 21. 'Than after they have known it, to turn (α) from the holy commandment.'

157.—1. Εκ, Among. Rom. ix. 24. 'Hath called not only (ἐξ) among the Jews, but also (ἐξ) among the Gentiles.'

163.—2. Εν, Into, throughout. Luke vii. 17. 'This rumour of him went forth (α) throughout all Judea, and (α) throughout all the region round about.'

164.—1. Εν, For, denoting the final cause or purpose. Matt. vi. 7. 'They think they shall be heard (α) for their much speaking.' 1 Pet. iv. 14. 'If ye be reproached (α) for the name of Christ.'

167.—1. Εν, Through. Luke i. 77. 'To give the knowledge of salvation (α) through the remission of sins.' Rom. v. 10. 'We shall be saved (α) through his life.' Eph. ii. 7. 'His kindness towards us (α) through Christ Jesus.' vi. 10. 'Be strong (α) through the Lord, and (α) through the power of his might.'

168.—1. Εν, Concerning. Gal. iv. 20. 'For I am exceedingly in doubt (α ὑμῶν) concerning you.'

170.—1. Εν, Nigh to. Josh. x. 10. 'Slew them with a great slaughter, (LXX. Εν Γαζαν) near to Gibeon.' Judg. xviii. 12. 'They went up and pitched (LXX. α Καθ' ὄψιν) near to Kirjath-jearim in Judah; wherefore they called the place Mahaneh-dan: Behold it is behind Kirjath-jearim.'

172.—1. Εν, Among. 1 Cor. iii. 18. 'If any one (α ὑμῶν) among you seemeth to be wise.'

174.—1. Εν, After, denoting similitude. Eph. ii. 3. Εν ὅ, 'After whom also we all had our conversation formerly.'

175.—1. Εν, Under. Rom. iii. 19. 'It saith to them who are (α τῷ νόμῳ) under the law.'

179.—2. Εἰς, has likewise a causal signification, and is translated because, for. Matt. xxi. 46. 'When they sought to lay hands on him, they feared the multitude, (εἰς) because they took him for a prophet.' Luke xi. 6. Εἰς, 'For a friend of mine, in his journey, is come to me.'

186.—1. Εν, Of. Heb. viii. 1. 'Now (αὐτῶν) of the things which we have spoken this is the sum.' ix. 15. 'For the redemption of the transgressions (αὐτῶν) of the first covenant.'

188.—1. Εν, In. 2 Cor. ii. 14. 'Remaineth the same veil untaken away (αὐτῶν) in the reading of the Old Testament.'

190.—1. Εν, On account of. Philip. i. 5. Εν, 'For (that is, on account of) your fellowship in the gospel.'

191.—1. Εν, Against. Matt. xxvi. 55. 'Are ye come out as (αὐτῶν) against a thief?' Mark iii. 24. 'And if a kingdom be divided (αὐτῶν) against itself.' 1 Pet. iii. 12. 'The face of the Lord is (αὐτῶν) against.'

2. Εν, To, unto, denoting the end for which a thing is done. Eph. ii. 10. 'Created (αὐτῶν) unto good works.' Philip. iii. 14. 'I follow on according to the mark, (αὐτῶν) to the prize.'

3. Εν, Over, denoting authority. Acts xii. 20. 'Having made Blastus, (τῷ αὐτῷ ἀποστόλῳ τῷ βασιλεὺς) who was over the king's bedchamber, their friend.' Eph. iv. 6. 'Who is (αὐτῶν) over all.'

4. Εν, Over, in respect of place. Heb. ix. 17. 'Is firm (αὐτῶν ὑμῶν) over dead sacrifices.' James v. 14. 'Let them pray (αὐτῶν) over him.'

195.—1. Η, conjunction, And. 1 Cor. ii. 1. 'Came not with excellency of speech (α) and of wisdom.' xvi. 6. 'And perhaps I shall abide (α καὶ) and even-winter with you.' 2 Cor. i. 13. 'Than what ye read, (α καὶ) and also acknowledge.' x. 12. 'We dare not rank (α) and compare ourselves.'

196.—1. Η is used interrogatively. 1 Thess. ii. 19. Η ὑμεῖς καὶ ὁ κύριος, 'Are not even ye?'

203.—1. Καθὼς, Seeing. Gal. iii. 6. Καθὼς Ἀβραάμ, 'Seeing Abraham believed God, and it was counted to him for righteousness.'

2. Καθὼς, According, according as. Eph. i. 4. Καθὼς ἐξελέξατο ὑμᾶς, 'According as he hath chosen us.'

3. Καθὼς, Even as. Rom. i. 28. Καὶ καθὼς, 'And even as they did not like to retain,' &c. 2 Pet. i. 14. Καθὼς, 'Even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shewed me.'

208.—1. Kai, Therefore. Rom. viii. 17. 'And if children, (καὶ) then (therefore) heirs.'

209.—1. Kai, Even as. Philem. ver. 17. 'Profitable to thee (καὶ) even as to me.'

210.—1. Kai, When. Heb. viii. 8. 'Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, (καὶ) when I will make a new covenant.'

211. Kai, And yet. John iii. 11. 'And testify what we have seen, (καὶ) and yet ye receive not our testimony.' See also ver. 32.

212.—1. Kai, So. Luke vi. 31. 'And as ye would that men should do to you, (καὶ) so do ye to them in like manner.' John vi. 57. 'As the living father hath sent me, and I live by the Father, (καὶ) so he that eateth me.' xv. 9. 'As the Father hath loved me, (καὶ) so have I loved you.'

224.—2. Kai, Moreover. Heb. vii. 15. Kai, 'Moreover, it is still more exceedingly plain.'

225.—2. Kata, As, denoting likeness. Xenoph. Hel. 2. 92. 'Honoured (ὡς διμύσαντα τὸν πατέρα) by the people, as his father was.'

228.—2. Kata, with a genitive, sometimes signifies on, upon. Mark xiv. 3. 'She brake the box, and poured it (κατὰ τῆς κεφαλῆς) on his head.' 1 Cor. xi. 4. 'Every man who prayeth, or prophesieth (κατὰ κεφαλῆς ἔχων) having a veil on his head.' Jude, ver. 15. 'To execute judgment (κατὰ πάντων) upon all.'

3. Kata, Against, contrary to. Gal. iii. 21. 'Is the law then (κατὰ) against the promises of God?' 'contrary to them.'

232.—1. Kata, In. 1 Cor. xiv. 40. 'Let all things be done decently, and (κατὰ τάξιν) in order.' Heb. iii. 8. Kata, 'In the day of temptation.'

238.—2. Me, by our translators, is considered as a causal particle. Rom. xiv. 2. 'Of me, 'For one believeth that he may eat all things.'

249.—2. Nu, is used as an interjection of beseeching. 1 John ii. 28. Kanun, 'Now therefore, little children, abide in him.'

3. Nu, according to Raphaelius, implies somewhat of admiration, or rather of indignation. Luke xi. 39. Nu ἵνα ἰδὲ φαρμακῶν, 'Now do ye Pharisees cleanse the outside of the cup and the platter.' Raphaelius observes, that Arrian in Epictet. uses nu in the same manner.

4. Nu, with the article prefixed, is used as an adjective. 2 Cor. viii. 14. En τῷ νῦν καιρῷ, 'In the present time.' 1 Tim. iv. 8. Ζωὴ τοῦ νῦν, 'The life that now is,' the present life. Matt. xxiv. 21. Εὖς τε νῦν, supp. καινῇ, 'To this (the present) time.' Acts iv. 29. Καὶ τὰ νῦν κινῶν πάλαι τὰς ἀπειλὰς αὐτῶν, 'And, O Lord, behold their threatenings, (τὰ νῦν, supp. κατὰ τὰ πνεύματα νῦν) according to the present circumstances.'

254.—1. Oti, Because. 1 John ii. 11. 'And knoweth not whither he goeth, (ὅτι) because that darkness hath blinded his eyes.'

2. Oti, sometimes hath an adversative sense, and must be translated but, yet. Wherefore Heb. viii. 9. may be thus translated, 'Taking them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt.' Oti, 'But they did not abide in my covenant.' 1 John iii. 20. Oti καὶ, 'But if our heart condemn us.'

259.—1. Oti, When. 2 John, ver. 4. 'I rejoiced greatly (ὅτι) when I found of thy children walking in truth.'

261.—1. Oti is used to introduce a new sentence. 1 John v. 9. 'If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater.' Oti, 'Now this is the witness of God,' &c.

268. Πάλιν, On the other hand. 1 John ii. 8. Πάλιν 'On the other hand, I write to you a new commandment.'

286.—1. Πλὴν. Mintert observes, that πλὴν is used by the LXX. as an illative particle, itaque, propterea.

290.—1. Προς, Of, concerning. Heb. iv. 13. Πρός οὐ, 'Of whom we speak.' Neh. ii. 18. LXX. 'He spake (πρὸς τοὺς λόγους τοῦ βασιλέως) of the words of the king.'

294.—1. Προς, With, denoting presence. 2 Thess. ii. 5. 'Remember ye not (ὅτι ἔτι ἂν πρὸς ὑμᾶς) that when I was yet with you.'

306.—2. Τις, Who, interrogative. Acts xix. 15. 'But ye, (τις ἐστὶ) who (what sort of persons) are ye?' Heb. i. 5. Τίς γὰρ, 'To whom of the angels said he at any time!' Rev. vii. 13. Τίς αὖτις, 'Who are these that are clothed with white robes?'

3. Τις, Any one. Heb. x. 28. Τις, 'Any one who (whosoever) disregarded the law of Moses, died without mercy.' 2 Pet. iii. 9. 'Not willing. (τινας) that any should perish.'

306.—1. Υπερ, Concerning. Phavorinus, ὑπερ, ὑμῶν τε πρὸς.

308.—1. Υπερ, Instead of. 2 Cor. v. 20. 'We pray you (ὑπερ Χριστοῦ) in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God.'

309.—1. Υπερ, On account of. 2 Cor. xii. 10. 'Distresses (ὑπερ Χριστοῦ) on account of Christ.'

310.—1. Υπερ, With respect to. Philip. i. 29. Τὸ ὑπερ Χριστοῦ, 'This with respect to Christ hath been graciously given you, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake.'

318.—2. Εν ᾧ, Therefore. Heb. vi. 17. Εν ᾧ, 'Therefore God, willing more abundantly to shew to the heirs of promise the immutability.' See note 1. on the verse.

319.—1. Ὡς, Certainly. 2 Pet. i. 3. Ὡς, 'Certainly his divine power hath gifted to us.'

321.—1. Ὡς, Namely. 2 Thess. ii. 2. Ὡς ἐστὶ, 'namely, that: or, intimating that the day of Christ is at hand.'

325. Ὡς, That. Rom. i. 9. 'God is my witness, whom I serve in the gospel of his Son, (ὧς) that without ceasing I make mention of you always in my prayers.' In this sense ὧς is used by Xenophon, Memorab. lib. i. Πρωτὸν μὲν οὖν, ὧς ἐκ νομίζω, ὅς ἐστι πόλις νομίζω θύει, ποῖα ποτε ἔχουσιντο τεκμήρια; 'First, then, that he did not reckon them gods, whom the city reckoned gods—what kind of argument did they use?'

ESSAY VIII.

CONCERNING THE RIGHT INTERPRETATION OF THE WRITINGS IN WHICH THE REVELATIONS OF GOD ARE CONTAINED.

THE revelations of God being designed to give mankind the knowledge of his counsels respecting their salvation, the right understanding of these revelations must appear to every religious person a matter of great importance. This Essay, therefore, having for its object to explain the phraseology of the writings in which the revelations of God are recorded, it will meet with attention from the reader, in proportion to the value which he puts on religious knowledge.

SECT. I.—Of the Original Language of Mankind, and of the Method in which Language was at first formed.

THE books which contain the revelations of God, being more ancient than any books now extant, are written in the language which mankind used in the first ages, or in a language nearly allied to it. Wherefore, the style of these writings being very different from that of modern compositions, to interpret them as modern compositions are interpreted is without doubt to misinterpret them. Accordingly, persons ignorant of the character of the primitive languages, have, by that method of interpretation, been led to fancy that the scriptures contain sentiments unworthy of God, whereby they have not only exposed these venerable writings to the scorn of infidels, but have formed to themselves false notions in religion, which have had a pernicious influence on their morals.

For avoiding these evils, the nature and character of the language first spoken by mankind must be well understood; and for that purpose the best method seems to be, to consider in what manner language was originally formed.

The first ideas which come into the human mind being those which enter by the senses, it is reasonable to believe that names for expressing sensible objects would be invented before any others, and, after them, terms for expressing those operations of the senses, by which the ideas of sensible objects are acquired.—And because the operation of the senses have some resemblance to the operations of intellect, to express the operations of intellect mankind would naturally have recourse to the words by which they expressed the operation of the senses.—Thus, many words of the primitive language of mankind must have had a twofold signification. According to the one signification they denoted ideas of sense, and according to the other they denoted ideas of intellect; so that, although these words were the same in respect of their sound, they were really different words in respect of their signification: and to mark that difference, after the nature of language came to be accurately investigated, the words which denoted the ideas of sense, when used to express the ideas of intellect, were called by critics metaphors, from a Greek word which signifies to transfer; because these words, so used, were carried away from their original meaning to a different one, which, however, had some resemblance to it.

Metaphorical meanings being affixed to words in the ancient languages to remedy the poverty of these languages, it is plain, that the more ancient any language is it will consist of the fewer words, consequently the more numerous and bold its metaphors will be. Accordingly we find, that the primitive languages, and even the languages of savage tribes, which may be ranked with the primitive languages, are all of them highly figurative. On this subject it is proper to observe, that even after a language has become sufficiently copious, if the people who use it possess a vigorous and warm imagination, and are favourably situated for enjoying sensual gratifications, as is the case with most of the eastern nations, being by these circumstances peculiarly disposed to relish the sensible pictures exhibited in metaphorical and other figurative expressions, such a people, instead of retrenching, will rather multiply these expressions. Hence the language of that people will be more figurative than the languages of nations whose imagination is languid, and whose situation does not permit them to be occupied in sensual gratifications. This is the reason that the language of the Hebrews, and of the other eastern nations, by the multitude, the variety, the boldness, and even the extravagance of its metaphorical expressions, is distinguished from the more temperate speech of the nations in the western parts of the world, whose imagination is not so warm, and whose climate and soil are not so favourable to luxury as theirs.

Of the bold metaphors used by the ancient Hebrews, the following examples are all taken from their sacred books:—Gen. iv. 10. 'The voice of thy brother's blood crieth to me from the ground.' Gen. xix. 26. 'His wife looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt.' Gen. xlix. 11. 'He washed—his clothes in the blood of grapes,' to signify that Judah was to inhabit a country fruitful in vines. Psal. v. 9. 'Their throat is an open sepulchre.' Psal. lx. 3. 'Thou hast made us to drink the wine of astonishment.' Psal. lxxviii. 25. 'Man did eat angels' food: he sent them meat to the full.' Psal. cxix. 3. 'The plowers plowed upon my back; they made long furrows.' Isa. xxxiv. 3. 'The mountains shall be melted with their blood.' ver. 4. 'And all the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll.' ver. 6. 'The sword of the Lord is filled with blood, it is made fat with fatness.' Isa. xiv. 23. 'I will sweep it with the besom of destruction, saith the Lord of hosts.' Jer. xx. 7. 'O Lord, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived.' Isa. v. 1. 'My well beloved hath a vineyard in a very fruitful hill.' In the original it is, on a horn, the son of oil: The horn being the highest part of horned animals, it is used to denote the highest part of a country; an hill. This horn or hill is called the son of oil, because the olive which produces oil is one of the valuable fruits of the earth. See Lowth on the passage. Isa. xi. 15. 'The Lord shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian sea.'

Having in the scriptures these, and many other examples of bold metaphors, the natural effect of the poverty of the ancient language of the Hebrews, why should we be either surprised or offended with the bold figurative language in which the Hebrews expressed their conceptions of the divine nature and government? Theirs was not a philosophical language, but the primitive speech of an uncultivated race of men, who, by words and phrases taken from objects of sense, endeavoured to express their notions of matters which cannot be distinctly conceived by the human mind, and far less expressed in human language.—Wherefore, they injure the Hebrews who affirm, that they believed the Deity to have a body, consisting of members of the like form and use with the members of the human body, because, in their sacred writings, the eyes, the ears, the hands, and the feet of God, are spoken of; and because he is represented as acting with these members after the manner of man. Gen. iii. 8. 'They heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day.' Gen. ix. 16. 'And the bow shall be in the cloud, and I will look upon it.' Exod. xv. 3. 'The Lord is a man of war.' Ver. 6. 'Thy right hand, O Lord, hath dashed in pieces the enemy.' Ver. 8. 'With the blast of thy nostrils the waters were gathered together.' Psal. xviii. 8. 'There went up a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth devoured; coals were kindled by it.' Ver. 9. 'He bowed his heavens also and came down, and darkness was under his feet.' Ver. 10. 'And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly upon the wings of the wind.' Psal. ii. 7. 'Thou art my Son, this day I have begotten thee.'

In like manner they injure the Hebrews who affirm, that they thought God was moved by anger, jealousy, hatred, revenge, grief, and other human passions, because in their scriptures it is said, Gen. vi. 6. 'It repented the Lord that he made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart.' Exod. xv. 7. 'Thou sentest forth thy wrath, which consumed them as stubble.' Exod. xx. 5. 'I the Lord thy God am a jealous God.' Numb. xi. 23. 'The wrath of the Lord was kindled against the people.' Prov. viii. 13. 'The evil way and froward mouth do I hate.' Isa. xxxiv. 2. 'The indignation of the Lord is upon all nations, and his fury upon all their armies.' Nah. i. 2. 'God is jealous, and the Lord *revenge*th and is furious. The Lord will take vengeance on his adversaries, and he reserveth wrath for his enemies.'

They also injure the Hebrews who affirm, that they believed the Deity subject to human infirmity, because it is said, Gen. ii. 2. 'God rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made.' Gen. viii. 21. 'The Lord smelled a sweet savour.' Gen. xviii. 30. 'Because the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and because their sin is very grievous, 20. I will go down now and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it which is come up to me: And if not, I will know.' Psal. ii. 4. 'He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh; the Lord shall have them in derision.' Psal. lxxviii. 65. 'Then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep, and like a mighty man that shouteth by reason of wine.'

These and the like expressions are highly metaphorical, and imply nothing more but that in the divine mind and conduct there is somewhat analogous to, and resembling the sensible objects and the human affections on which these metaphorical expressions are founded. For if any one contends, that the Hebrews themselves understood these expressions literally when applied to the Deity, and meant that they should be so understood by those who read their scriptures, he must likewise contend, that the following expressions were understood by them in their literal meaning:—Psal. xvii. 8. 'Hide me under the shadow of thy wings.' Psal. lvi. 1. 'In the shadow of thy wings I will make my refuge, until these calamities be overpast.' Psal. lxi. 4. 'I will trust in the covert of thy wings.' Psal. xci. 1. 'He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.' Ver. 4. 'He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust.'—I say, if from the passages of scripture in which the members of the human body are ascribed to the Deity, it is inferred that the ancient Hebrews believed the Deity hath a body of the same form with the human body, we must, from the last mentioned passages of the same scriptures, conclude, that they believed the Deity to be a tree, with spreading branches and leaves which afforded an agreeable shade; and a great fowl, with feathers and wings; and even a rock, because he is so called Deut. xxxii. 15. Psal. xviii. 2. 31.

Such are the bold metaphors by which the ancient Hebrews expressed their conceptions of the attributes and operations of God. To prevent, however, those who are acquainted only with modern languages from being shocked with the boldness of these figures, modern critics have distinguished them by the appellation of Anthropopathia; concerning which Lowth on Isa. i. 24. 'Aha, I will be eased of mine adversaries, I will be avenged of mine enemies,' thus writeth: "This is a strong instance of the metaphor called Anthropopathia; by which, throughout the scriptures, as well the historical as the poetical parts, the sentiments, sensations, and affections—the bodily faculties, qualities, and members of men, and even of brute animals, are attributed to God, and that with the utmost liberty and latitude of application. The foundation of this is obvious, it arises from necessity: We have no idea of the natural attributes of God, of his pure essence, of his manner of existence, of his manner of acting: when therefore we would treat on these subjects, we find ourselves forced to express them by sensible images. But necessity leads to beauty: This is true of metaphor in general, and in particular of this kind of metaphor; which is used with great elegance and sublimity in the sacred poetry: and, what is very remarkable, in the grossest instances of the application of it, it is generally the most striking and the most sublime. The reason seems to be this: When the images are taken from the superior faculties of the human nature, from the purer and more generous affections, and applied to God, we are apt to acquiesce in the notion; we overlook the metaphor, and take it as a proper attribute: but when the idea is gross and offensive, as in this passage of Isaiah, where the impatience of anger and the pleasure of revenge is attributed to God, we are immediately shocked at the application, the impropriety strikes us at once; and the mind, casting about for something in the divine nature analogous to the image, lays hold on some great, obscure, vague idea, which she endeavours in vain to comprehend, and is lost in immensity and astonishment. See De S. Poesi Hebr. Prel. xvi. sub. fin. where this matter is treated and illustrated by examples."

From the above ingenious remarks it appears, that notwithstanding metaphors and other figures derive their origin from the poverty of language, they infuse both strength and beauty into any discourse where they are judiciously used. By exhibiting sensible pictures of our conceptions accompanied with pleasant images, they make a strong impression on the mind of the hearers: for which reason they have found a place, not in the ancient languages only, but in all the modern tongues also; not excepting those which are the most copious and the most refined: in so much that it hath become the business of the poets and orators to ransack the whole compass of nature in search of resemblances between sensible and intellectual objects, on which to graft metaphors; and, not satisfied with natural and apparent likenesses, the most remote and disparate resemblances, nay resemblances founded merely on popular opinions, local prejudices, and national customs, have been made the foundation of metaphors. Hence that diversity of figurative expressions observable in the languages of nations living at a distance from each other: hence, also, the figures which to one nation appear natural and expressive, to others appear unnatural, tumid, and ridiculous.

SECT. II.—Of Picture-writing; and of its Influence in the Formation of the Primitive Languages.

In the early ages, after men had acquired any branch of useful knowledge, either by research or by observation, they naturally wished to communicate that knowledge to their contemporaries, and even to transmit it to posterity. But this they could not do effectually, till they contrived a method of making speech the object of sight. When this was accomplished, the knowledge which they conveyed to the ears of a few by pronounced speech, it was in their power to convey to multitudes, even in the most distant countries, by the eye.

The first method of rendering speech visible, was that which history informs us was practised by all the ancient nations we have any knowledge of, from the Chinese in the east to the Mexicans in the west, and from the Egyptians in the south to the Scythians in the north. All these, taught by nature, formed images or pictures, on wood, or stone, or clay, of the sensible objects for which they had invented names, and of which they had occasion to discourse. By these pictures they represented not only the things themselves, but the articulate sounds or names also by which they were called. Thus, to express in that kind of writing a man, or a horse, that is, to express both the name and the thing, they drew its picture on some permanent substance, whereby, not only the thing itself, but its name, was immediately suggested to those who looked on its picture. But this method being tedious, the Egyptians, who it is supposed were the inventors of picture-writing, shortened it by converting the picture into a symbol, which as Warburton, to whom I am indebted for many particulars in this section, observes in his Divine Legation, they did in three ways. 1. By making the principal part of the symbol stand for the whole of it, and by agreeing that that part should express the character of the thing represented by the symbol. Thus, they expressed a fuller by two feet standing in water; and a charioteer, by an arm holding a whip. This is what is called the Curiolegic Hieroglyphic.—2. From this the Egyptians proceeded to a more artful method of rendering speech visible and permanent; namely, by putting the instruments, whether real or metaphorical, by which a thing was done. Thus, they expressed a battle by two hands, the one holding a shield, the other a bow: a siege by a sailing-ladder: the divine omniscience by an eye eminently placed: a monarch by an eye and a sceptre. Sometimes they represented the agent without the instrument, to show the quality of the action. Thus a judge was expressed by a man without hands looking downwards, to shew that a judge ought not to be moved either by interest or pity. This method was called the Tropologic Hieroglyphic.—3. Their third, and most artificial method of abridging picture-writing, was to make one thing stand for another, where any resemblance or analogy, however far-fetched, could be observed between the thing represented and the thing by which it was represented, whether that resemblance was founded in nature or in popular opinion only. Thus a serpent, on account of its vigour and spirit, its longevity and revivescence, was made the symbol of the divine nature: a mouse was used to represent destruction: a wild-goat, uncleanliness: a fly, impudence: an ant, knowledge: a serpent in a circle, the universe: and the variegated spots of the serpent's skin, the stars. This method of writing was called the Allegorical, Analogical, or Symbolical Hieroglyphic. And being formed on their knowledge of physics, the marks of which it was composed increased in number, as the Egyptians, the inventors of picture-writing, increased in science.

But, in regard there are many qualities and relations of things which are not objects of sense, and many complex moral modes, and other mental conceptions, which cannot be likened to any object of sense, consequently, which cannot be expressed by any picture, natural or symbolical, it became necessary, in all kinds of picture-writing, to introduce arbitrary marks for expressing these qualities, relations, and modes. Yet, even with this aid, picture-writing was still very defective and obscure. The Chinese, therefore, to improve the method of rendering speech visible and permanent by writing, threw away the images or pictures altogether, and substituted in their place new marks, formed, it is said, from the images. However, as in this way of writing every word required a distinct character or mark, and as the greatest part of these characters were arbitrary, the difficulty of acquiring the knowledge of the meaning of such a multitude of characters was so great, that very few could attain to it. Meanwhile, the Chinese method of denoting the separate words of which speech consisteth, by separate marks, is supposed by some to have suggested to the ingenious in other nations the idea of expressing, by separate marks, the distinct articulate sounds of which words are composed. Hence the alphabetical or literal method of writing arose, which, on account of its great facility and utility, hath come into general use among all civilized nations, except the Chinese themselves.

The literal method of writing is generally said to have been first practised by the Phœnicians. But whether they, or whoever else first used that method of rendering speech visible, were the inventors of the art; or whether, as Plato and Tully thought, De Leg. lib. iv. sect. 4. they were supernaturally assisted in the invention, is hard to determine. This however is certain, that the books of Moses were written in the literal method. And some learned men have thought, the first specimen of literal writing was that which God himself engraved on the two tables of stone, and gave to Moses on the Mount; who, being taught the meaning of the characters by inspiration, communicated the knowledge of the same to the Israelites, from whom it passed to the Phœnicians. Perhaps it may be some confirmation of this conjecture to observe, that the Chinese; though they have long possessed the art of writing by characters, have never been able to attain the method of writing by letters.

I have given the above account of the art of rendering speech visible and permanent by picture-writing, not as a matter of curiosity, but to shew the influence which the hieroglyphical manner of writing had on the ancient languages. For the symbols used in that kind of writing denoting the names of things as well as the things themselves, in speaking, men would naturally give to the things represented both the name and the qualities of the symbol by which it was represented. Hence arose a new species of metaphor, altogether unknown in the speech of modern nations, and forming a kind of language which, although it may appear to us fanciful and dark, was well understood, and made a strong impression on those who were accustomed to it.—This higher kind of metaphorical language claims particular attention, because it is that in which the divine revelations, especially those concerning future events, were communicated to mankind, and in which they still remain recorded in scripture. Wherefore, to shew the influence which picture-writing, particularly of the symbolical kind, had to introduce into the ancient languages the boldest, and in the opinion of modern nations the most extravagant metaphors, the following examples are proposed to the reader's consideration.

1. A supreme ruler being represented in symbolical writing by a man with four wings, and his lieutenants or princes by one with two wings; and the stretching out of his wings signifying action or design, (Divine Leg. b. iv. sect. 4.), the names of these symbols were naturally used in the ancient languages for the things signified by them. Hence Isaiah, predicting the invasion of Judea by the king of Assyria, hath termed it the stretching out of his wings so as to cover and desolate the whole land, Isa. viii. 8. 'The stretching out of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy land, O Immanuel.' By the like metaphor Jeremiah predicted the desolation of Moab, chap. xlviii. 40. 'He shall fly as an eagle, and shall spread his wings over Moab.' In the same highly figurative language, Isaiah denounced destruction to a kingdom which oppressed other countries by the greatness of its power, chap. xlviii. 1. 'Wo to the land shadowing with wings.' This use of the symbol shews the propriety of giving the wings of a fowl to two of the four beasts, which in Daniel's vision represented the four great monarchies. By that symbol, the devastation which these monarchies were to bring on other nations, and the speed and force with which they would act, were strongly and beautifully represented to those who understood symbolical picture-writing.—It shews us, likewise, how the power of God in protecting his people came to be termed his feathers and his wings; and the confidence of his people in his power to protect them, by their trusting in the covert of his wings.

2. A crocodile was one of the symbols by which, in the ancient picture-writing, the kingdom of Egypt was represented; Divine Leg. b. iv. sect. 4. Hence the Egyptians are called, Psal. lxxiv. 13. Dragons in the waters; and, ver. 14. their king is called leviathan; and 'the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers,' Ezek. xxix. 3. So also Isa. xxvii. 1. 'In that day the Lord, with his sore, and great, and strong sword, shall punish leviathan, the piercing serpent, even leviathan that crooked serpent, and he shall slay the dragon.'

The king of Ethiopia was termed a fly, and the king of Assyria a bee, probably because in picture-writing they were represented by these symbols: Isa. vii. 18. 'The Lord shall hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria,' that is, the Lord shall call the Ethiopian and Assyrian kings to avenge his quarrel.

3. In the picture-writing, a sword and a bow being symbols of war, the prophets use the names of these warlike instruments to denote great warriors; and arms in general, to denote a powerful warlike nation, such as the Romans, Dan. xi. 81.; and gigantic stature, for a mighty leader of an army; and balances, weights, and measures, for a judge or a magistrate. In like manner, because in picture-writing a sceptre denoted the administration of government, the word is used in that signification by Jacob, in his prophecy, Gen. xlix. 10. 'The sceptre shall not depart,' &c.; and the annihilation of the power of Moab, by the breaking of his sceptre, Jer. xlviii. 17. 'All ye that are about him, bemoan him; and all ye that know his name say, How is the strong staff broken, and the beautiful rod!'

4. The figure of a star being used in picture-writing as a symbol of the Deity, that word was used by Balaam to denote the Jewish Messiah, of whose divine nature and government he seems to have had some obscure conception. Numb. xxiv. 17. 'There shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall arise out of Israel.' Also, a star in picture-writing denoted the image of a god. Thus, Amos v. 26. 'The star of your god, which ye made to yourselves,' means the material image of your God. Lastly, the sun, moon, and stars, were used in picture-writing as symbols of the founders of nations, and of the fathers of tribes, and as the symbols also of mighty kings. Thus the king of Babylon is called, Isa. xiv. 12. 'Lucifer, son of the morning.' Thus also, in ordinary discourse, the sun, moon, and stars, were used to denote patriarchs and princes. Accordingly, when Joseph, Gen.

xxxvii. 9. 'said, I have dreamed a dream, and behold the sun, and the moon, and the eleven stars made obeisance to me,' his father, understanding his words in their symbolical and true meaning, 'rebuked him, and said to him, Shall I and thy mother and brethren indeed come to bow down ourselves to thee, to the earth?' But as the heavenly bodies mentioned by Joseph could not appear, even in a dream, as making obeisance to him, we may believe that he saw in his dream, not the heavenly bodies, but a visionary representation of his parents and brethren making obeisance to him; and that, in relating this to his father, he chose from modesty to express it in symbolical rather than in plain language. Besides, as there never was any collection of stars called the eleven stars, the application which Jacob made of that appellation to Joseph's eleven brethren shews clearly, that the word star, in common speech, was used to signify the father of a tribe.

5. That the use of ensigns, for distinguishing tribes and nations, was very ancient, we learn from Moses's command, Numb. ii. 2. 'Every man of the children of Israel shall pitch by his own standard, with the ensign of their father's house.' What the ensigns of the Israelitish tribes were, Moses hath not told us. But because our Lord, who sprang from Judah, is called, Rev. v. 8. 'The Lion of the tribe of Judah,' it is conjectured, that the tribe of Judah had for its ensign a lion; that Judah assumed that device because Jacob, in blessing his children before his death, had termed Judah a lion's whelp; and that the other tribes assumed for their ensigns the pictures of the animals and trees to which Jacob had likened them. But be this as it may, it is probable, that in the ensigns by which tribes and nations anciently distinguished themselves, they painted the figures of such animals, trees, &c. as were emblematical of the qualities, circumstances, and events, by which they thought themselves most honoured.—Hence it was natural in picture-writing, to represent a nation or tribe by the thing which it carried as its ensign; and in speaking of a nation or tribe, to call it by the name of its ensign. Accordingly, Jeremiah likens Egypt to a very fair heifer, chap. xli. 30. either because the Egyptians carried in their ensigns the image of a heifer, which was the symbol of Isis, their tutelary divinity; or because they were represented in sculpture by that device. And this perhaps is the reason that in Pharaoh's dream Egypt was symbolically represented by kine.—In like manner, because the Roman armies had for their ensign the image of an eagle, they are called, in our Lord's prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem, eagles, Matt. xxiv. 28. 'Whosoever the carcass is, there will the eagles be gathered together.'—Since, then, it was customary to call a nation by the name of its ensign, 'the burden of the beasts of the south,' Isa. xxx. 6. means, the prophecy concerning the destruction of the nations of the south, who had beasts for their ensigns.—And since the Assyrians are called by the prophet Isaiah, chap. viii. 7. The waters of the river, it is not improbable that their armies carried in their ensigns a picture of the Euphrates, not only on account of the advantages which their country derived from that river, but because it was a fit emblem of the irresistible force of their armies. Wherefore, the Assyrians being represented in picture-writing by the waters of the Euphrates and Tigris, the great where, who is said, Rev. xvii. 2. 'to sit upon many waters,' signifies an idolatrous power which ruled over many populous nations.

6. The symbols by which nations and cities were anciently represented in picture-writing, were commonly formed on some remarkable quality belonging to them. Thus, because the laws, institutions, and discipline peculiar to a city or nation, were intended to form the manners of their people, it was natural to consider that nation or city as a mother. This I suppose was the reason that, on coins and in sculpture, nations and cities were symbolically represented by a young woman sitting on a throne, magnificently attired, and surrounded with emblems expressive of the qualities by which that nation was distinguished. Hence the Jewish prophets, in the discourses which they addressed to nations and cities, termed them daughters, and virgin daughters, in allusion to the above described symbol. Isa. xlii. 4. 'I will weep bitterly,—because of the spoiling of the daughter of my people.' Zech. ii. 7. 'Deliver thyself, O Zion, that dwellest with the daughter of Babylon.' Jer. xiv. 17. 'Let mine eyes run down with tears night and day,—for the virgin daughter of my people is broken with a great breach.' Jer. xli. 11. 'Go up into Gilead and take balm, O virgin, the daughter of Egypt. In vain shalt thou use many medicines, for thou shalt not be cured.'

7. In the ancient picture-writing, it would seem that persons and things were represented by the figures of the things to which they were metaphorically likened. Hence, in speaking of them, they were called by the names of these things. For example, because anciently men were metaphorically likened to trees, (Cant. ii. 3. v. 15.), princes and great men, in the animated language of the eastern nations, were called by the name of such trees as were remarkable for their magnitude and beauty; and had the properties of these trees ascribed to them. Thus the great men of Judah were called by Sennacherib the tall cedars of Babylon, and the common people the choice fir trees thereof. Isa. xxxvii. 24. 'By the multitude of my chariots am I come up to the sides of Lebanon, and I will cut down the tall cedars thereof, and the choice fir trees thereof.' Zech. xi. 1. 'Open thy doors, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy cedars. Howl, fir trees, for the cedar is fallen; because the mighty are spoiled! Howl, O ye oaks of Bashan.' See also Isa. ii. 13-16. In like manner, Jeremiah calls the whole people of a country a forest, chap. xxi. 14. 'I will kindle a fire in the forest thereof, and it shall devour all things round about it.' The same prophet, speaking to Judah, saith, chap. xi. 16. 'The Lord called thy name a green olive tree, fair and of goodly fruit.' Hence Messiah is foretold under the idea of a branch of a tree. Jer. xxiii. 5. 'Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous branch.' Zech. vi. 12. 'Behold the man whose name is the branch,' and he shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord.' Suitably to the same idea, the place out of which this branch was to grow is thus described, Isa. xi. 1. 'There shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his root, and the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him.'

8. Anciently princes were metaphorically called shepherds, and their subjects sheep, because the care which they took of their people resembled the care which shepherds take of their flocks. 2 Sam. xxiv. 17. 'I have sinned, I have done wickedly; but these sheep, what have they done?' Homer likewise often calls his princes shepherds of the people.—Among the Jews the priests also were called shepherds, because it was a part of their office to teach the people the law. Ezek. xxxiv. 2. 'Wo to the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves; should not the shepherds feed the stock?'—This phraseology passed from the Jewish into the Christian church. For Christ is called the chief shepherd, and the ministers of the gospel are considered as subordinate shepherds employed by him to take care of the people. 1 Pet. v. 2. 'Feed the stock of God;' ver. 4. 'And when the chief shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive the crown of glory which fadeth not away.'

9. Because it is usual, in all languages, metaphorically to ascribe to men the qualities of beasts, and to call them by the name of such beasts as they resemble in their dispositions, the Psalmist, in predicting Christ's suffering, termed his enemies strong bulls of Bashan, the country most famous for its breed of kine. Psal. xxii. 12. 'Many bulls have compassed me: strong bulls of Bashan have beset me round about. They gaped upon me with their mouths as a ravening and roaring lion.' In like manner the prophet Amos, to mark the stupidity and brutality of the great men of Samaria who oppressed the people, reproved them under the name of Kine of Bashan, chap. iv. 1. 'Hear this word, ye Kine of Bashan, that are in the mountain of Samaria, which oppress the poor,' &c. Upon the same foundation the Israelitish nation is spoken of as a beast of prey in Balaam's prophecy; and hath the actions of a beast of prey ascribed to it. Numb. xxiv. 8. 'God brought him forth out of Egypt; he hath as it were the strength of an unicorn. He shall eat up the nations his enemies, and shall break their bones, and pierce them through with his arrows. 9. He couched, he lay down as a lion; and who shall stir him up?'

SECT. III.—Of the allegorical Manner of Writing.

WHEN the custom, described in the preceding section, of substituting the symbol, the device, and the metaphor, for the thing signified thereby, took place, and the thing signified obtained the name of the thing by which it was signified, it was natural to describe the condition, the qualities, and the actions of the thing signified, by the condition, the qualities, and the actions of its symbol. Hence arose that species of composition which is called allegory, because therein one thing was expressed, and another entirely different from it was meant; and which, for reasons to be mentioned immediately, was of great fame and use anciently among the eastern nations. In mentioning metaphors as the foundation of allegories, I am authorized by Quintilian, who thus writes, lib. viii. c. 6. "Ut modicus atque opportunus translationis usus illustrat orationem, ita frequens et obcurat et tædio complet: Continuus vero in allegoriam et enigmata transit."

* The Egyptians, who are supposed to have invented picture-writing, are thought also to have invented the allegorical method of communicating their sentiments. But by whomsoever invented, it came early into general use, and was greatly delighted in by the orientals, for the following reasons:—1. A well-formed allegory, by its striking images and vivid colouring, never failed, when understood, to make a strong impression on those to whom it was addressed. 2. Being a narration of things which are objects of sense, and between which there is a natural or supposed connexion, it was easily remembered, and could be translated from one language into another with the greatest precision. 3. Professing to contain an important hidden meaning, those to whom it was proposed were led by curiosity to search out that meaning. 4. The discovery of the meaning of an allegory, as an exercise of one's mental powers, afforded great pleasure to the discoverer, especially if it contained a moral lesson useful for regulating life and manners: For a person, by the discovery, being led to instruct himself, he was spared the pain of having instruction forced upon him. 5. Allegory being a kind of speech which none but the learned understood, it was an excellent vehicle for conveying to them the knowledge of such matters as were thought improper for the common people to know.—These reasons led the priests, with whom the whole learning of Egypt was lodged, to teach their religion, their laws, and their politics, under the veil of allegory, both to their own countrymen and to those strangers who came to be instructed in the wisdom of Egypt. And such well-informed strangers, on their return to their own country, in imitation of their teachers, communicated the knowledge which they had acquired in Egypt to their disciples in allegories: by which means allegory came in a little time to be the most approved method of instruction all over the east.

Allegories being in great repute when the Jewish prophets were commissioned to instruct the people, and to foretell future events, it need not surprise us to find them delivering most of their prophecies in allegories; especially when we consider, that at the time these were delivered, it was proper to conceal the events foretold under the veil of allegory, that they might not be understood till they were explained by their accomplishment.—But, notwithstanding the ancient Egyptian allegory was attended with the advantages above-mentioned, its extreme darkness occasioned it to be laid aside after the gift of prophecy ceased. A new species, however, hath been substituted in its room, better fitted to convey instruction, because it is formed on symbols more obvious than those used in the ancient allegory. Of this new species the writings of the moderns furnish many beautiful examples, none of which need be mentioned here, in regard they are generally known.

Of the ancient allegory there were four kinds:—1. The proper allegory; 2. The apologue, or fable; 3. The parable; 4. The enigma.

The proper Allegory was a discourse, in which the condition, the qualities, and the actions of a person, or thing, were represented by the condition, the qualities, and the actions of the symbol, device, or metaphor, by which it was represented in picture-writing. It was therefore a representation of real matters of fact under feigned names and feigned characters.

The Apologue or Fable was a narration of speeches and actions attributed sometimes to men, sometimes to brute animals, and sometimes to things inanimate, according to their natural or supposed qualities. But these speeches and actions had no existence, except in the imagination of the author of the fable, who contrived them in the manner he judged fittest for conveying the moral he had in view to inculcate. Of this kind was Jotham's fable of the trees going forth to anoint a king, Judges ix. 8; and Joash's fable of the thistle, which desired the cedar to give his daughter as a wife to his son, 2 Chron. xxv. 18.

The Parable or Similitude was a discourse in which one thing was compared with another which had a resemblance to it; so that the thing compared was more clearly understood by means of the qualities of the thing to which it was compared, and made a strong impression on the minds of the hearers. Of this kind were many of our Lord's parables. But although the apologue and parable were thus distinguished, we find them sometimes confounded with each other.

Lastly, the Enigma or Riddle was a mysterious assemblage of different symbols, set forth either in a verbal discourse, or by presenting the symbols themselves to the eye. Either way exhibited, the meaning of the assemblage was so dark, that it required the greatest ingenuity to discover it. Of the verbal enigma, Samson's riddle is an example. Of the symbolical enigma, Herodotus hath recorded a remarkable instance, Hist. lib. iv. 128. 130. where he tells us, that when Darius Hystaspes invaded Scythia, the Scythian king sent him a present of a bird, a mouse, a frog, and five arrows. This Gobyras, one of Darius's generals, considering as an enigma, interpreted in the following manner:—That unless the Persians could fly through the air like birds, or hide themselves in the earth like mice, or swim through the lakes like frogs, they should not return to their own country, but be slain by the arrows of the Scythians.

All allegories have two senses; First, The literal sense exhibited in the verbal description, or in the visible symbol; secondly, The remote sense, concealed under the literal sense, or under the visible symbol. Wherefore, in every allegory, the first or literal sense is itself the sign of the second or hidden meaning, called the figurative sense of the allegory. And this figurative sense should be as distinctly represented by the literal sense of the allegory, as the literal sense is exhibited, whether by the verbal description, or by the visible symbol. Properly speaking, therefore, the first or literal sense constitutes the body of the allegory, and the second or figurative sense, its soul. In compositions of this kind, if rightly formed, the literal sense ought to be perfectly plain, and the only exercise of one's ingenuity ought to lie, not in understanding the literal sense, but in finding out its concealed meaning.

Some of the ancient fables and parables exhibited such striking representations and reproofs of the common follies of mankind, that by their frequent application they became proverbs. In allusion to this use of the parable, Habakkuk saith, chap. ii. 6. 'Shall not all these take up a parable against him, and a proverb against him?' and, Micah ii. 4. 'In that day shall one take up a parable against you, and lament with a doleful lamentation.'

In the beginning of this section, the proper allegory was said to be that in which persons and things, together with the accidents befalling them, are set forth by the name of the symbol used in picture-writing to represent them: and by such accidents as may naturally be supposed to befall that symbol. According to this account of the proper allegory, the symbols of which it was composed, together with the accidents befalling these symbols, might be set forth in a verbal description addressed to the ear, or by presenting the symbol either to the eye of a person awake or to his imagination while asleep. Hence of the proper allegory there were three kinds, of which it is proposed to treat separately.

A.—Of the Proper Allegory, as set forth in a Verbal Description.

WHEN the allegory set forth in a verbal description was intended to convey immediate information to the persons to whom it was addressed, it was commonly formed on a symbol which was well known to belong to the persons or things which were the subjects of the allegory; and the circumstances and qualities of the symbol, together with the accidents befalling it, were such as naturally suggested the designed information. Of this species of allegory we have an example, Ezek. xxxii., where, because the dragon or crocodile was one of the well-known symbols by which Egypt was represented in the ancient picture-writings, (Sect. 2. No. 2.), the pride of the kings of Egypt, and the mischiefs which their insolence brought on the neighbouring nations, are allegorically represented by the actions of a dragon or crocodile; and the destruction of the kingdom of Egypt is represented by the taking and killing of a dragon, and by the bringing it to land, and filling all the fowls of the air, and the beasts of the whole earth with its flesh. Ver. 2. 'Son of man, take up a lamentation for Pharaoh, king of Egypt, and say to him, Thou art as a dragon in the seas, and thou camest forth with thy rivers, and troubledest the waters with thy feet, and foulest their rivers. Thus saith the Lord God, I will therefore spread out my net over thee with a company of many people, and they shall bring thee up in my net. Then will I leave thee upon the land.—And will cause all the fowls of the heaven to remain upon thee,' &c.

Because nations and cities anciently were represented on coins, and on sculptured stone, by the image of a young woman splendidly attired and seated on a throne, (Sect. 2. No. 6.), the prophet Isaiah hath formed an allegorical prediction on that emblem, in which he hath described the judgment and punishment of the Chaldeans for oppressing the Jews by the pulling down of a tender and delicate virgin from her throne, and stripping her of her ornaments, and making her a slave, and forcing her to perform the offices of a slave, and treating her with the utmost indignity. Isa. xlvii. 'Come down and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon. There is no throne, O daughter of the Chaldeans; for thou shalt no more be called tender and delicate. 2. Take the millstones and grind meal; uncover the locks; make bare the leg; uncover the thigh; pass over the rivers. 3. Thy nakedness shall be uncovered, yea thy shame shall be seen. I will take vengeance, and I will not meet thee as a man. As for our Redeemer, the Lord of Hosts is his name. 5. Sit thou silent, and get thee into darkness, O daughter of the Chaldeans, for thou shalt no more be called the lady of kingdoms. 8. Therefore hear now this, thou that are given to pleasures, that dwellest carelessly, that sayest in thine heart, I am, and none else besides me; I shall not sit as a widow, neither shall I know the loss of children,' &c.

Upon the same symbol Ezekiel, to make the Israelites sensible of their sin in forsaking the true God and worshipping idols, hath formed an allegory, in which he represents God's choosing the Israelites to be his people, and his giving them his statutes, under the idea of his taking up a female infant, which, when born, had been exposed naked and helpless; his nourishing it till it grew up; his making her his own by marriage, after her breasts were fashioned, and her hair was grown, Ezek. xvi. 4-8; and then clothing her with fine raiment, and adorning her with costly jewels, so that the fame of her beauty went forth among the heathen, ver. 9-14. But this beloved married wife, forgetting her obligations and vows, played the harlot, by making images of men, which she worshipped with the flour, and the oil, and the honey wherewith her husband fed her, ver. 17, 19., and by sacrificing the sons and the daughters which she had brought forth to him, ver. 20.—This adultery she committed with the Egyptians, the Assyrians, and the Chaldeans, ver. 26, 28.—Wherefore, in the same figurative language, God thus addressed the Israelites:—Ver. 35. 'O harlot, hear the word of the Lord. 38. I will judge thee as women that break wedlock and shed blood are judged; and I will give thee blood and fury in jealousy. 39. They shall strip thee also of thy clothes, and shall take thy fair jewels, and leave thee naked and bare. 40. They shall also bring up a company against thee, and they shall stone thee with stones, and thrust thee through with their sword.'

On the other hand, in allusion to the same symbol, the prosperity of a city or nation, after great affliction, is represented by a woman's cleansing herself from filth, and adorning herself with beautiful garments. Isa. lii. 1. 'Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Zion, put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem, the holy city. 2. Shake thyself from the dust; arise, and sit down, O Jerusalem, loose thyself from the bands of thy neck, O captive daughter of Zion.'—In like manner, a nation expressing its joy for being delivered from oppression, is represented by a woman's singing and shouting. Zeph. iii. 14. 'Sing, O daughter of Zion, shout, O Israel; be glad and rejoice with all thy heart, O daughter of Jerusalem. 15. The Lord hath taken away thy judgments, he hath cast out thine enemy; the king of Israel, even the Lord, is in the midst of thee; thou shalt not see evil any more.'

In allusion to the same symbol, Isaiah foretold the restoration of Tyre to her former wealth, and pride, and wickedness under the image of an harlot's resuming her former manners. Isa. xxiii. 15. 'After the end of seventy years shall Tyre sing as an harlot. 16. Take an harp, go about the city, thou harlot that hast been forgotten; make sweet melody, sing many songs, that thou mayest be remembered. 17. The Lord will visit Tyre, and she shall turn to her hire, and shall commit fornication with all the kingdoms of the world upon the face of the earth.'

In the ancient picture-writing, (Sect. 2. No. 4.), the sun, moon, and stars, being used as symbols to denote cities and kingdoms as well as princes and great men, the temporary disasters of cities and kingdoms, in allusion to these symbols, are in the prophetic writings represented by the extinction of the sun and moon; and the destruction of the cities and states, by the falling of the stars from heaven. Thus Isaiah, foretelling the destruction of Babylon by the Medes, saith, chap. xiii. 10. 'The stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine.' Chap. xxxiv. 4. 'All the host of heaven shall be dissolved, and the heavens shall be rolled together as a scroll, and all their hosts shall fall down as the leaf falleth off from the vine, and as a falling fig from the fig tree.'—In like manner, the destruction of Egypt is thus allegorically described, Ezek. xxxii. 7. 'When I shall put thee out, I will cover the heaven, and make the stars thereof dark; I will cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon shall not give her light. 8. All the bright lights of heaven will I make dark over thee, and set darkness upon thy land, saith the Lord.'—Joel also, upon the same symbols, hath formed an allegorical prophecy concerning the overturning of the Jewish state, and the destruction of the heathen idolatry. Chap. ii. 30. 'I will shew wonders in the heavens, and in the earth blood, and fire, and pillars of smoke. 31. The sun shall be turned into darkness and the moon into blood, before the great and the terrible day of the Lord come. 31. And it shall come to pass, that whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord shall be delivered.'—These grand events our Lord hath foretold in the same allegorical language, Matt. xxiv. 20.

On the other hand, national prosperity is allegorically represented by an increase of the light of the heavenly bodies: Isa. xxx. 26. 'Moreover, the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be seven-fold, as the light of seven days, in the day that the Lord bindeth up the breach of his people, and healeth the stroke of their wound.'

In picture-writing, tribes and nations being represented by the figures of the things which they carried in their ensigns, (Sect. 2. No. 5.), various allegorical prophecies were formed on these symbols. Thus, because the Assyrians, it is supposed, had the river Euphrates painted on their standards, Isaiah foretells their invasion of Judea by an allegory formed on that symbol. Isa. viii. 7. 'Behold the Lord bringeth up upon them the waters of the river strong and many, even the king of Assyria, and all his glory; and he shall come up over all his channels, and go over all his banks. 8. And he shall pass through Judah, he shall overflow and go over, he shall reach even to the neck.'

Sect. 2. No. 2. In picture-writing, a crocodile being one of the symbols by which Egypt was denoted, Ezekiel upon that symbol hath formed the following beautiful allegorical prophecy, chap. xxix. 2. 'Son of man, set thy face against Pharaoh king of Egypt, and prophesy against him, and against all Egypt. 3. Speak and say, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold I am against thee, Pharaoh king of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers, which hath said, My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself. 4. But I will put hooks in thy jaws, and I will cause the fish of thy rivers to stick unto thy scales. 5. And I will leave thee thrown into the wilderness, thee and all the fish of thy rivers: thou shalt fall upon the open fields, thou shalt not be brought together nor gathered: I have given thee for meat to the beasts of the field, and to the fowls of heaven,' &c. to ver. 17.

SECT. 2. No. 7. In the ancient picture writing, men being represented by the figures of the things to which they were metaphorically likened, the Jewish prophets have raised many allegories on that foundation. Thus, because princes and great men were likened to trees, the power of the Assyrian kings, and the greatness of their empire, are represented by Ezekiel in an allegory formed on the qualities and circumstances of a tall cedar tree with fair branches, among which all the fowls of heaven made their nests; and under which all the beasts of the field brought forth their young; and under its shadow dwelt all great nations, Ezek. xxxi. 3-9. Moreover, the destruction of the Assyrian empire is in the same allegory represented by the breaking of the boughs and the falling of the branches of this cedar, and by the departing of the people of the earth from its shadow, ver. 10-14.

In like manner, nations being metaphorically compared to a forest, their desolation and destruction are represented by the burning of a forest; as in the following allegory, Ezek. xx. 46. 'Son of man, set thy face towards the south, and prophesy against the forest of the south field; 47. And say to the forest of the south, Hear the word of the Lord, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold I will kindle a fire in thee, and it shall devour every green tree in thee, and every dry tree: the flaming flame shall not be quenched, and all faces from the south to the north shall be burnt therein. 48. And all flesh shall see that I the Lord have kindled it: It shall not be quenched. 49. Then said I, Ah, Lord God! they say of me, Doth he not speak parables?'—On this allegory our Lord's expression, Luke xxiii. 31. 'If they do these things in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry!' seems to have been founded.

In allusion to the symbolical meaning of trees in picture-writing, the introduction of the Israelites into Canaan, and their becoming a great nation in that land, are represented under the allegory of a vine brought from Egypt and planted in Canaan, which took deep root and filled the land: Psal. lxxx. 10. 'The hills were covered with the shadow of it, and the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars. 11. She sent out her boughs from the sea, (the Mediterranean Sea), and her branches to the river, (Euphrates). Why hast thou then broken down her hedges, so that all they which pass by the way do pluck her! The bear out of the wood doth waste it,' &c.

SECT. 2. No. 7. b. Because in ancient times kings, and magistrates, and priests, were metaphorically called shepherds, on account of their care in governing, defending, and instructing their people, the prophet Ezekiel hath, upon this metaphor, formed a beautiful allegorical discourse, in which he severely reproveth the Jewish princes, magistrates, and priests, for their negligence in the execution of their offices; for their enriching themselves and living luxuriously at the expense of their people; and for their being at no pains to promote their happiness. Ezek. xxxiv. 2. 'Thus saith the Lord God unto the shepherds, Wo be to the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves! Should not the shepherds feed the flocks? 3. Ye eat the fat, and ye clothe you with the wool, ye kill them that are fed; but ye feed not the flock!' For this unfaithfulness God threatened to punish the Israelitish princes and priests severely; ver. 10. 'Thus saith the Lord, Behold I am against the shepherds, and I will require my flock at their hand, and cause them to cease from feeding the flock. For I will deliver my flock from their mouth, that they may not be meat for them.' The people, thus neglected and spoiled by their rulers, God comforted in the same allegorical language, ver. 12. 'I will seek out my sheep, and I will deliver them out of all places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day: Ver. 14. I will feed them in a good pasture, and upon the high mountains of Israel shall their fold be; there shall they lie in a good field.' In the mean time, to prevent the wicked among the Israelites from fancying themselves the objects of his love, God reproveth them in the same pastoral dialect; ver. 17. 'As for you, O my flock, thus saith the Lord God, Behold I judge between cattle and cattle, between the rams and the he-goats. 18. Seemeth it a small thing to you to have eaten up the good pasture, but ye must tread down with your feet the residue of your pastures? And to have drunk of the deep waters, but ye must foul the residue with your feet? 19. But as for my flock, they eat that which ye have trodden with your feet, and they drink that which ye have fouled. 21. Because ye have thrust with side and with shoulder, and pushed all the diseased with your horns, till ye have scattered them abroad; 22. Therefore will I save my flock, and they shall no more be a prey, and I will judge between cattle and cattle. 23. And I will set up one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even my servant David, a prince among them,' &c. On this allegory our Lord seems to have formed his parable of the sheep and the goats, in which he hath described the general judgment, Matt. xxv.

B. Of the proper Allegory, as set forth in a Dream or in a Vision.

HAVING treated of verbal allegories, it remains to treat of those allegories which were set forth in symbols actually presented to the imagination of the prophet in a dream while asleep, or in a vision while awake. These allegorical dreams and visions, the persons who were favoured with them communicated to their contemporaries by word of mouth, and sometimes committed them to writing, for the instruction of posterity. In these, as in other allegories, the persons or nations who were the subjects of them were designed, sometimes by their known symbols, whose figure was presented to the imagination of the person who dreamed or who saw the vision, and sometimes by arbitrary symbols, whose character, however, and attending circumstances, were so formed as to lead to their meaning.

Of allegorical dreams formed on symbols which were generally known, that of Pharaoh, Gen. xli. 17. is a signal example. For, one of the symbols by which Egypt was designed being an heifer, the seven years of great plenty which were to be in Egypt, were represented in Pharaoh's dream by seven very fat and well-favoured kine, which came up out of the Nile, and fed in an adjoining meadow; and the seven years of famine which were to succeed the years of plenty, by seven other kine, lean and ill-favoured, which also came up out of the river after the former; and the greatness of the famine, by the lean kine eating up the fat kine, and remaining as lean and ill-favoured as at the beginning.—Nebuchadnezzar's dream, Dan. iv. is another example of an allegorical representation formed on a well-known symbol. For, princes and great men being represented in picture-writing by trees, the greatness of Nebuchadnezzar's kingdom, and the benefits which the nations over which he reigned derived from the power of his kingdom, were represented by a tree which in his dream he saw growing in the midst of the earth, 'whose height reached to heaven, whose leaves were fair, and its fruit was much, affording meat for all.

The beasts of the field had shadow under it, and the fowls of the air dwelt in the boughs thereof.—In the same dream, the punishment which God was to inflict on that proud prince for his impiety and other sins, was allegorically represented by the hewing down of that great tree, the cutting off of its branches, the driving away of the beasts from under it, and of the fowls from its branches. On this symbol our Lord formed his parable of the grain of mustard seed which a man took and sowed in his field, whereby he allegorically represented the wide spreading of the kingdom of heaven, or gospel dispensation, and its beneficial influence on the happiness of mankind: Matt. xiii. 32. 'Which indeed is the least of all seeds, but when it is grown it is the greatest among herbs, and becometh a tree; so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof.'

Of the allegorical dream formed on an arbitrary symbol, we have an example in the great and terrible image which stood before Nebuchadnezzar in his dream, recorded Dan. ii. 31. and which, by the different materials of which it was composed, represented the four great empires which were to rule the nations of the earth in succession.

The head of this image, which was of fine gold, signified the Babylonian empire; its breast and its arms of silver, signified the Medo-Persian empire; its belly and its thighs of brass, the Grecian empire; and its legs of iron, and its feet part of iron and part of clay, the Roman empire in its different states. And whereas this great image was broken in pieces by a stone, which was cut out of a mountain without hands, and which afterwards became itself a great mountain and filled the whole earth, that accident signified the utter destruction of these idolatrous kingdoms, to make way for a kingdom which the God of heaven was to set up, and which was never to be destroyed. The order in which these four empires were to arise, and the peculiar qualities by which they were to be distinguished, were shewed to Daniel himself, chap. vii. 2. in an allegorical vision, formed on the arbitrary symbols of four beasts which arose out of the great sea, after it was violently agitated by storms, and whose forms and qualities were different from any beasts known to exist. See an interpretation of that vision in my Truth of the Gospel History, p. 219.

The living creatures which Ezekiel saw in his vision, chap. i. were still more monstrous, and unlike any thing in nature, than the beasts in Daniel's vision. Each of them had four faces, namely, the face of a man, of a lion, of an ox, and of an eagle. Their feet were straight with soles, like those of calves' feet. They had the hands of a man under their wings, and their appearance was that of burning coals of fire from which went flashes of lightning. They were accompanied with wheels of the colour of beryl. Each wheel had a wheel within it, and their rings were so high that they were dreadful, and had eyes round about; and when the living creatures went, the wheels went; for the spirit of the living creatures was in the wheels. The likeness of the firmament, which was stretched over the heads of the living creatures, was as the colour of chrysal. And above the firmament was the likeness of a throne, as the appearance of a sapphire stone; and upon the throne, the likeness of the appearance of a man above upon it. His loins downward had the appearance of fire, like the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain.

This allegorical vision not being accompanied with an interpretation, its meaning cannot be determined with any certainty. Only, as the prophet in the conclusion of his account of it says, ver. 18. 'This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord;' and insinuates, that the things spoken to him, which are mentioned in the following chapters, proceeded from this appearance, it may perhaps be conjectured, that the vision was an enigmatical representation of the attributes of the Deity exerted in the government of the world; and that that representation was formed by the union of a number of symbols, whose meaning those who understood the ancient picture-writing knew, but which we, whose knowledge of that sort of writing is extremely imperfect, cannot pretend to explain.

It remains to observe, that in foretelling future events, especially those which were of an extensive nature, and at a great distance in point of time, the Spirit of God thought proper to make use of allegorical dreams and visions, rather than of plain verbal descriptions, for the following reasons:—1. These dreams and visions, whether formed on known or on arbitrary symbols, were naturally so dark, even when accompanied with an interpretation, as not to be distinctly understood till they were explained by their fulfilment. This darkness I think was necessary to prevent unbelievers from pretending that the prophecy, by exciting persons to do the things foretold, occasioned its own accomplishment.—2. The images of which these allegorical dreams and visions were composed, being all objects of sight, they made a much more lively and forcible impression on the minds of the prophets, than it was possible to do by words; consequently, they could be more distinctly remembered, and more accurately related to others, than if the qualities and actions of the persons represented by the symbols in the dream or vision, had been expressed in a verbal description.—3. The facility with which the representations in an allegorical dream or vision could be remembered, and the precision with which they could be related in all their circumstances, rendered the transmission of them to posterity as matters of fact easy. And although the meaning of these dreams and visions was not understood by those to whom they were related, yet being of such a nature as to make a strong impression on all to whom they were related, when they came to be explained by their accomplishment, the inspiration of the prophet who had the dream or vision was rendered undeniable, and the sovereignty of God in the government of the world was raised beyond all possibility of doubt.

SECT. IV.—Of the Method of conveying Instruction by significant Actions.

To render speech forcible and affecting, mankind, in all ages and countries, have been in use to accompany their words with such gestures and actions as indicated the sentiments and feelings of their mind. This was the custom more especially in the first ages of the world, when the primitive languages were not sufficiently copious, and men's passions were under little restraint. Hence the eastern nations, whose imaginations were warm, and whose tempers were lively, early delighted in this method of communicating their sentiments and feelings; and even after their language became so copious as not to need that extrinsic aid, they still continued to express their sentiments in the same way. Nay, all savage nations at this day express their strongest feelings by accompanying their words with significant actions, which shews that the custom is founded in nature.—The scriptures furnish many instances of this custom. For example, to render promissory oaths more solemn and binding, the person who swore the oath put his hand under the thigh of him to whom he swore: Gen. xxiv. 2. 'Abraham said unto his eldest servant of his house,—Put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh: 3. And I will make thee swear by the Lord the God of heaven, and the God of the earth, that thou wilt not take a wife unto my son of the daughters of the Canaanites.'

In like manner, Jacob before his death required his son Joseph to put his hand under his thigh, and swear, that he would not bury him in Egypt, but in Canaan with his fathers, Gen. xlvii. 29.

To express extreme affliction and grief, they rent their clothes, and covered themselves with sackcloth. Thus it is said of Jacob when he saw Joseph's coat, 'He rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his loins, and mourned for his son many days.'—1 Kings xxi. 27. when Ahab heard Elijah's words, 'he rent his clothes, and put sackcloth on his flesh, and fasted, and lay on sackcloth and went softly.'

Moses having constrained his wife Zipporah to circumcise her son, she, to express her detestation of the action, and her displeasure with her husband for having commanded it, cast the forekin of the child at his feet, and said, 'Surely a bloody husband art thou to me.' Exod. iv. 25.

Anciently the significant actions with which any kind of information was accompanied, were commonly of the typical kind; that is, they were so contrived as to express the information conveyed by the words. Thus, when Moses saw an Egyptian smiting an Israelite, he slew the Egyptian, to shew, by action, that God would by him deliver the Israelites from the bondage of the Egyptians. So Stephen assures us, Acts vii. 25.—Thus also, 1 Kings xi. 30. 'The prophet Ahijah caught the new garment that was on Jeroboam, and rent it in twelve pieces. 31. And he said to Jeroboam, take thee ten pieces; for thus saith the Lord the God of Israel, Behold I will rend the kingdom out of the hand of Solomon, and will give ten tribes to thee.'—1 Kings xxii. 11. 'Zedekiah the son of Cheneanah made him horns of iron; and he said, Thus saith the Lord, With these shalt thou push the Syrians until thou have consumed them.'—2 Kings xiii. 18. 'Elisha said unto the king of Israel, Smite upon the ground: and he smote thrice, and said, 19. And the man of God was wroth with him, and said, Thou shouldst have smitten five or six times, then hadst thou smitten Syria till thou hadst consumed it; Whereas now thou shalt smite Syria but thrice.' The king's fault was, that knowing his smiting upon the ground was typical of his smiting Syria, he ought to have smitten it oftener than thrice.—Neh. v. 13. 'Also I shook my lap and said, So God shake out every man from his house, and from his labour, that performeth not this promise, even thus be he shaken.'—Ezek. xxi. 6. 'Sigh, therefore, thou son of man, with the breaking (beating) of thy loins; and with bitterness sigh before their eyes. 7. And it shall be when they say unto thee, Wherefore sighest thou? that thou shalt answer, For the tidings, because it cometh; and every heart shall melt, and all hands shall be feeble,' &c. Ver. 14. 'Thou, therefore, son of man, prophesy, and smite thine hands together.'

In later times, likewise, the Jews accompanied their discourses with significant actions, to give their instructions the greater force. Matt. xviii. 2. 'Jesus called a little child, and set him in the midst of them. 3. And said, Verily, I say unto you, except ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. 4. Whosoever, therefore, shall humble himself as this little child,' &c.—Mark xi. 12. 'On the morrow when they were come from Bethany, Jesus was hungry. 13. And seeing a fig tree afar off having leaves, he came, if haply he might find any thing thereon; and when he came to it he found nothing but leaves. Now the time of (gathering) figs was not yet. 14. And Jesus answered and said to it, No man eat fruit of thee hereafter for ever. And his disciples heard it.—20. And on the (next) morning, as they passed by, they saw the fig tree dried up from the roots. 21. And Peter, calling to remembrance, saith unto him, Master, behold the fig tree which thou cursedst is withered away.' Peter called his Master's declaration, in consequence of which the fig tree was destroyed, a curse, agreeably to the phraseology of the Hebrews, who considered land absolutely sterile as cursed; Heb. vi. 8.—By the typical action of destroying the barren fig tree, our Lord intimated to his disciples the destruction which was coming on the Jewish nation on account of their wickedness.—John xiii. 4. 'Jesus riseth from supper, and laid aside his garments, and took a towel and girded himself. 5. After that he poureth water in a bason, and began to wash the disciples' feet, and to wipe them with the towel wherewith he was girded.—12. So after he had washed their feet, and had taken his garments and was set down again, he said to them, Know ye what I have done to you? 14. If I your Lord and Master have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet.' Ye ought to do the meanest offices to each other, when they are necessary for promoting each other's happiness.—Luke ix. 5. 'Whosoever will not receive you, when ye go out of that city, shake off the very dust from your feet for a testimony against them.'—Matt. xix. 13. 'Then there were brought unto him little children, that he should put his hands on them and pray. 15. And he laid his hands on them.'—1 Tim. iv. 14. 'Neglect not the spiritual gift which is in thee, which was given thee according to prophecy, together with the imposition of the hands of the eldership.'—Matt. xx. 34. 'Jesus had compassion on them, and touched their eyes; and immediately their eyes received sight.'—John ix. 6. 'He spat on the ground and made clay of the spittle, and he anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay; 7. And said to him, go wash in the pool of Siloam.'

These examples shew, that our Lord's taking Peter's wife's mother, who was sick of a fever, and Jairus's daughter, who was dead, by the hand; and his touching the eyes of the two blind men mentioned Matt. ix. 2. with other things of the like nature, were merely significant actions, by which he intimated to the persons themselves, and to those who were present, that he was going to work a miracle in their behalf. So also, before he said to his apostles, John xx. 22. 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost, he breathed on them,' to intimate, that by the invisible operation of his power he would confer on them the gifts of inspiration and miracles.

Another remarkable instance of enforcing information by a significant action, we have Acts xxi. 11. Agabus 'took Paul's girdle, and bound his own hands and feet, and said, Thus saith the Holy Ghost, So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles.'

Lastly, it is well known that baptism and the Lord's supper were instituted by Christ, and appointed to be continued in the church, for the purpose of setting before the people by significant action some of the greatest articles of their faith.

Since then it was common in the eastern countries to give instruction by symbolical actions, as well as by words, the many extraordinary things done by the Jewish prophets, for discovering to the Israelites God's purposes concerning themselves, and concerning the neighbouring nations, cannot be matter either of astonishment or of offence to us. They were all of them done at the commandment of God, and agreeably to the manners of the times; and were admirably adapted to convey, in the strongest and most forcible manner, the information intended.

Thus, Isaiah was commanded by God to walk three years, not only barefoot but naked, that is, without his upper garment; namely, the hairy mantle commonly worn by the prophets, Zech. xiii. 4. And this he was to do as a sign and a wonder upon Egypt and Ethiopia,

Isa. xx. 3, 3.; that is, as it is explained ver. 4. to show by action, that the king of Assyria would lead away the Egyptians prisoners, and the Ethiopians captive, young and old, naked and barefoot, even with their buttocks uncovered, to the shame of Egypt.—B. Lowth, in his note on Isa. xx. 3. thinks it probable that Isaiah was ordered to walk naked and barefoot three days, to show that within three years after the defeat of the Cushites and Egyptians by the king of Assyria, the town should be taken. For he thinks the time was foretold, as well as the event; and that the words three days may have been lost out of the text at the end of ver. 2. after the word barefoot, a day being put for a year, according to the prophetic rule.

In like manner Jeremiah was ordered, chap. xix. 1. to get a potter's earthen bottle, and with the ancients of the people and of the priests, ver. 2. to go to the valley of Hinnom, and prophesy in their hearing that Jerusalem was to be destroyed. And that his prophecy might have a strong impression on the imagination of the men who were with him, he was ordered, ver. 10. 'to break the bottle in the sight of these men; 11. And to say unto them, Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, Even so will I break this people and this city, as one breaketh a potter's vessel that cannot be made whole again.'

The same prophet was ordered, Jer. xlvii. 2. to make bonds and yokes, and put them on his own neck, and to send them to all the neighbouring kings, by the messengers whom they had sent to Jerusalem to persuade Zedekiah to enter into the confederacy which they had formed against the king of Babylon; and by that symbolical action the prophet was to signify to them, that the issue of the confederacy would be certain captivity to them all. But we are told, chap. xlviii. 10. that the false prophet Hananiah took the yoke from off the prophet Jeremiah's neck, and broke it, and spake in the presence of all the people, saying, 'Thus saith the Lord, Even so will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, from the neck of all nations, within the space of two full years.'

Once more, Jeremiah having written in a book his prophecy concerning the destruction of Babylon, recorded Jer. li. he gave it to Seraiah, ver. 60. and ordered him when he came to Babylon with Zedekiah to read it, and having read it, to bind a stone to it, and cast it into the midst of Euphrates. Ver. 64. 'And thou shalt say, Thus shall Babylon sink, and shall not rise from the evil that I will bring upon her.'

With the same design of speaking by significant actions, Ezekiel was ordered to delineate Jerusalem upon a tile, and to besiege it by building a fort against it, raising a mount, and setting a camp with battering rams against it round about. This siege the prophet was to continue four hundred and thirty days, and during the continuance thereof he was to eat and drink by measure: and his bread was to be baked, that is, prepared, ver. 15. with dung;—the fuel with which he was to prepare his bread was to be dung. By these symbolical actions the prophet shewed that Jerusalem was to be besieged, and that during the siege the inhabitants were to be punished with a grievous famine, Ezek. iv.—In the following chapter the prophet was ordered, ver. 1. to shave his head and beard, and with a balance to divide the hairs thereof into three parts, and, ver. 2. when the days of the siege were fulfilled, he was to burn with fire a third part of the hairs in the midst of the city: next, he was to take a third part and smite about it with a knife; and the remaining third part he was to scatter in the wind, except a few hairs which he was to bind in the skirts of his garment. The meaning of these symbolical actions God explained to the Israelites as follows:—Ver. 11. 'Because thou hast defiled my sanctuary with all thy detestable things, and with all thine abominations; therefore will I also diminish thee; neither shall mine eyes spare, neither will I have any pity. 12. A third part of thee shall die with the pestilence, and with famine shall they be consumed in the midst of thee; and a third part shall fall by the sword round about thee; and I will scatter a third part into all the winds: and I will draw out a sword after them. 13. Thus shall mine anger be accomplished, and I will cause my fury to rest upon them, and I will be comforted. 15. So it shall be a reproach and a taunt, an instruction and an astonishment, unto the nations that are round about thee, when I shall execute judgments in thee, in anger, and in fury, and in furious rebukes. I the Lord have spoken it.'

For the illustration of the foregoing allegorical action, I will here transcribe B. Lowth's note on Isa. vii. 20. 'In the same day shall the Lord shave with a razor that is hired, namely, by them beyond the river, by the king of Assyria, the head and the hair of the feet: and it shall also consume the beard.'—"To shave with the hired razor the head, the feet, and the beard, is an expression highly parabolical; to denote the utter devastation of the country from one end to the other, and the plundering of the people from the highest to the lowest, by the Assyrians, whom God employed as his instrument to punish the Jews. Ahaz himself, in the first place, hired the king of Assyria to come to help him against the Syrians, by a present made to him of all the treasures of the temple as well as his own: and God himself considered the great nations whom he thus employed as his mercenaries, and paid them their wages. Thus he paid Nebuchadnezzar, for his services against Tyre, by the conquest of Egypt, Ezek. xxix. 18-20. The hairs of the head are those of highest order in the state; those of the feet or the lower parts are the common people; the beard is the king, the high-priest, the very supreme in dignity and majesty. The eastern people have always held the beard in the highest veneration, and have been extremely jealous of its honour. To pluck a man's beard is an instance of the greatest indignity that can be offered, Isa. l. 6. The king of the Ammonites, to shew the utmost contempt of David, 'cut off half of the beards of his servants; and the men were greatly ashamed; and David bade them tarry at Jericho till their beards were grown,' 2 Sam. x. 4, 5, &c."

Once more, God ordered Ezekiel, chap. xii. 3. to prepare stuff for removing, and to go forth with it at even in the sight of the people, as they who go forth into captivity, and, having digged through the wall in their sight, to carry his stuff out thereby upon his shoulders in the twilight, with his face covered that he might not see the ground.—The prophet having performed these actions in the sight of the people, when they said to him, What dost thou? God ordered him to reply, ver. 11. 'I am your sign: like as I have done, so shall it be done unto them: they shall remove and go into captivity. 12. And the prince that is among them shall bear upon his shoulder in the twilight, and shall go forth: they shall dig through the wall to carry out thereby: he shall cover his face that he see not the ground with his eyes. 13. My net also will I spread upon him, and he shall be taken in the snare: and I will bring him to Babylon, to the land of the Chaldeans; yet shall he not see it, though he shall die there. 14. And I will scatter towards every wind, all that are about him to help him,' &c.

From these examples of significant actions, concerning which God declared that they were commanded to be done for the purposes of prefiguring future events, we may conclude, that those uncommon actions which he commanded without declaring the purpose for which they were commanded, had, like the others, a typical meaning. This conclusion is warranted by the inspired writers, who in after times have pointed out the things signified by these actions. For example, when God ordered Abraham to sacrifice his only son, although he did not tell him the purpose for which that difficult command was given to him, yet, from the apostle's terming the suspension of that command a receiving of Isaac from the dead for a parable, Heb. xi. 19. we learn, that by the command to sacrifice Isaac, and by the suspension of that command, the death and resurrection of God's only Son was prefigured. In like manner, when the sacrifice of the passover was instituted, although no intimation was given of its having a typical meaning, we know that it prefigured the sacrifice of Christ, together with the influence of that sacrifice in procuring the salvation of believers. For we are told expressly, John xix. 36. that when our Lord hung on the cross his legs were not broken, that the command concerning the paschal lamb, Exod. xii. 46. 'Neither shall ye break a bone thereof,' might be fulfilled. Besides, in allusion to the typical meaning of the passover, Christ is called, 1 Cor. v. 7. our Passover; and is said to be sacrificed for us. Farther, when God ordered Moses to lift up the image of a serpent on a pole, that the Israelites in the wilderness who were stung with serpents, might be healed by looking at it, although nothing was said concerning its having a typical meaning, yet that it had such a meaning we learn from our Lord himself, who thus explained it, John iii. 14. 'As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth on him, should not perish, but have eternal life. Wherefore, the lifting up of the brazen serpent was a type of Christ's being lifted up on the cross; and the health which the Israelites obtained by looking to it, represented the salvation of those who believe on Christ as the Saviour of the world. Hence, in allusion to the typical meaning of the brazen serpent, Isaiah introduces Messiah saying, chap. xlv. 22. 'Look unto me and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth.'

Upon the whole it appears, that the uncommon actions performed by the Jewish prophets, were all of them significant; both those whose meaning was declared, and those whose meaning was not declared; and that they were commanded by God, for the purpose of prefiguring, in a symbolical manner, future persons and events. It is true, the long duration of some of these symbolical actions, the labour with which they were performed, and the pain which they occasioned to the persons who performed them, have afforded infidels a pretence for speaking of the prophets as fanatics and madmen, who by such doings debased the prophetic office. For which reason, to vindicate the character of these holy men, some of the learned Jewish doctors have given it as their opinions, that these uncommon actions were transacted only in visions, in which the prophets seemed to themselves to do them. But this supposition is contradicted by the scriptures, which represent the actions under consideration as done in the presence of the people, for the purpose of drawing their attention to the informations with which these actions were accompanied: an effect which the relation of a vision could not produce, because the incredulous and profane would naturally consider such a vision either as a fiction or as an illusion. The character, therefore, of the Jewish prophets will be more effectually vindicated, if we recollect what they themselves constantly affirmed; namely, that all the uncommon things which they did, they were commanded by God to do; and that, after the events prefigured by these actions came to pass, no doubt could be entertained of their being commanded by God to do them. Next, if we remember, that in the early ages it was usual to convey instruction by symbolical actions, we shall be sensible, that the things for which the prophets have been censured as madmen, did not appear to their contemporaries in the light in which we moderns view them: that they excited the curiosity of the people among whom they were transacted, and led them to inquire of the prophets what they meant by them, as in the instances mentioned, Ezek. xii. 9. xxi. 7.: that, being addressed to the senses of mankind, they must have conveyed the instruction with which they were accompanied in the most forcible manner: and that instruction thus forcibly conveyed, making a strong impression on the mind of the spectators, must have been long remembered, and could be communicated to others with great accuracy. Thus it appears, that in the early ages, when the art of writing was little known, the most effectual method of communicating and diffusing knowledge was to instruct the people by significant or symbolical actions, and that in fact this method was commonly practised, especially among the eastern nations;—wherefore, the Jewish prophets are not to be ridiculed for the symbolical actions with which they accompanied their predictions. The importance of the end for which they performed these actions, and the success with which they accomplished that end, are a sufficient vindication both of the wisdom of God in commanding them, and of the good sense and piety of the prophets in performing them. For which reason, I think, we cannot be mistaken in believing they were all performed exactly as related in the scriptures.

SECT. V.—Of Instruction conveyed by some Actions and Events happening in the ordinary course of things.

1. It is now time to proceed to the consideration of a method in which God communicated the knowledge of things future, which though different from that described in the preceding section, and more removed from common observation, was nearly allied to it. For, whereas the prophets, by the divine direction, assumed characters not naturally belonging to them, and performed actions altogether out of the common course, for the purpose of prefiguring future persons and events, the characters and actions and fortunes of some eminent persons, whose distinguished stations placed them in the view of the world, were so ordered by God as to be exact representations of future persons, who, when they arose, by the likeness of their characters and actions and fortunes to those of the persons by whom they were represented, would make mankind sensible that the inspired teachers spake truly, when they declared that the one had been prefigured by the other. In some instances, the persons whose characters and actions prefigured future events, were declared by God himself to be typical, long before the events which they prefigured came to pass; but in other instances, many persons really typical were not known to be such till after the things which they typified happened.

1. Of the first-mentioned sort we have a remarkable example in Abraham, whom God declared to be a typical person, by constituting him the father or type of believers of all nations; and by making with him, as their father, a covenant, in which he promised to be a God to him and to his seed in their generations, and to give to him and to his seed the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession; which promises had not only a literal but a typical or second meaning; as was shewed at large in Eze. v. sect. 1, 2, &c. consequently the covenant with Abraham was an allegory.

2. A second example of a typical person we have in Melchizedec, who, in his character of a king and priest united, was declared by God himself to be a type of his Son's becoming a king and a priest in the human nature; and who, by blessing Abraham, prefigured the efficacy of the priesthood and government of the Son of God, in procuring for believers the pardon of their sins. Psal. cx.

4. 'The Lord hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever after the similitude of Melchizedec.'

3. Jacob likewise, and Esau, were typical persons; for their struggling together in their mother's womb prefigured the wars which the nations who were to descend from them were to wage with each other: and Jacob's taking hold of Esau's heel in their birth, prefigured that the descendants of Jacob would subdue the descendants of Esau. So God told Rebecca, Gen. xxv. 23. 'Two nations are in thy womb; and two kinds of people shall be separated from thy bowels: and the one people shall be stronger than the other people; and the elder shall serve the younger.'

4. Joshua, who was the high-priest of the Jews during the rebuilding of the temple, was an eminently typical person: For he prefigured our great high-priest Christ, as we learn from the vision in which the prophet Zechariah, chap. iii. 3. saw him standing before the angel of the Lord in filthy garments, to represent the iniquity of the many which was to be laid on Christ. These filthy garments the angel commanded to be taken away from him; and said, ver. 4. 'Behold I have caused thine iniquity to pass from thee, and I will clothe thee with change of raiment.' 5. And I said, let them set a fair mitre upon his head: So they set a fair mitre upon his head, such as the high-priests wore when they officiated, 'and clothed him with garments.' Then, to show the emblematical meaning of the vision, the angel of the Lord said, ver. 8. 'Hear now, O Joshua, the high-priest, thou and thy fellows that sit before thee, for they are men of wonder,' typical men. So the phrase signifies, Isa. viii. 18. 'For behold, I will bring forth my servant the Branch.' Wherefore, Joshua in his character as high-priest, and his fellows the high-priests who preceded him, were all of them types, or prefigurations, of God's servant the Branch, in his character as high-priest; which also the author of the epistle to the Hebrews hath proved at great length.—Farther, to shew still more clearly that Joshua was a type of Christ, the prophet was ordered by God to take silver and gold and make crowns, and to set them on the head of Joshua in the house of Josiah, and to say to him, chap. vi. 12. 'Thus speaketh the Lord of hosts, saying, Behold the man whose name is the Branch: He shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord;—and he shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne; and the counsel of peace shall be between them both.' But the man whose name is the Branch, and who is here foretold to grow up out of his place, was, according to Isaiah, to be a descendant of Jesse. Chap. xi. 1. 'And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots.' Wherefore, Joshua being a descendant of Aaron, was not the person whom Isaiah foretold under the idea of a Branch growing out of the roots of Jesse; consequently, when God ordered the prophet to say to Joshua and the witnesses, after putting the crowns on Joshua's head, Behold the man whose name is the Branch, his meaning certainly was, that Joshua was a type of the man whose name is the Branch, in his two offices of a king and a priest, and as the builder of the true temple of the Lord. Accordingly, that this cyclical transaction might be remembered, and the Joshua in after ages might be known to have been a type and a pledge of the coming of the Man whose name is the Branch, the two crowns which the prophet had put on Joshua's head, as symbols of the two offices in which he was a type of Christ, were, by the command of God, delivered to the witnesses, to be laid up in the temple as a memorial, ver. 14.

If, because Zerubbabel at this time was the prince of the Jews, any one suspects that he, and not Joshua, was called the man whose name is the Branch, he ought to consider, that of the man whose name is the Branch it is said, ver. 13. not only 'that he shall build the temple of the Lord,—and shall sit and rule upon his throne,' but that 'he shall be a priest upon his throne;' for this could not be said of Zerubbabel, who was not a descendant of Aaron. We may therefore conclude, that the things said and done to Joshua by the prophet Zechariah, were said and done to him as a type of Christ.

5. Of typical persons who were not declared to be such, till the persons of whom they were types appeared, Adam deserves to be first mentioned. For, in respect of his being the author of sin and death to all his posterity, he is said by the apostle, Rom. v. 14. to be by contrast typus, 'the type or figure of him (Christ) who was to come,' for the purpose of being the author of righteousness and life to mankind. See Rom. v. 14. notes. Hence Christ is called, 1 Cor. xv. 45. the last Adam.—Adam was likewise a type of Christ in this respect, that Eve, who was an image of the church, was formed of a rib taken from Adam's side while he was in a deep sleep; for this transaction prefigured the formation of the church, the Lamb's wife, by the breaking of Christ's side on the cross, while he slept the sleep of death, as the prophet insinuateth, Eph. v. 32. See the note on that verse.

6. Of persons who in their natural characters and fortunes were types of future persons and events, Abraham's wives and sons are remarkable examples. His wives, Hagar and Sarah, were types of the two covenants, by which men become the people of God; and his sons Ishmael and Isaac were, in their characters and state, types of the people of God under these covenants. So the apostle Paul assures us, Gal. iv. 22. 'It is written that Abraham had two sons; one by the bond-maid, and one by the free woman.' 23. But he, verily, who was born of the bond-maid, was begotten according to the flesh; but he who was born of the free woman was through the promise. 24. Which things are an allegory; for these women are the two covenants: The one, verily, from Mount Sinai, bringing forth children unto bondage, which is Hagar. 25. For the name Agar denotes Mount Sinai in Arabia; and she answereth to the present Jerusalem, and is in bondage with her children. 26. But the Jerusalem above is the free woman, who is the mother of us all.' See Gal. iv. 24. notes 1, 2. and ver. 25. notes, where, and in the commentary, this allegory is explained.

7. The third typical person I shall mention is David, who was raised by God to the government of the natural seed of Abraham, that in his office as their king, and in his wars against their enemies, he might be a type of Christ the Ruler and Saviour of Abraham's spiritual seed. This appears from what the angel who announced our Lord's birth said to his mother, Luke i. 32. 'The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall rule over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end.' For in what sense could our Lord's spiritual dominion be called the kingdom of his father David, unless David's kingdom was a type thereof? In fact, the power and success with which David governed the natural seed, and subdued the neighbouring heathen nations, their enemies, was a fit prefiguration of the power and success with which Christ rules the spiritual seed, and subdues their enemies.—That David was a type of Christ appears from this also, that the prophets who foretold to the Israelites the coming of Christ, named him David, and David their king: by a common metonymy giving the name of the type to the person typified. See Jer. xxx. 9. Ezek. xxxiv. 23. xxxvii. 24. Hosea iii. 4, 5. and Isa. lv. 3. Acts xiii. 34. particularly the last mentioned passage, where the benefits which the spiritual seed derive from the government of Christ, and in particular their safety from their enemies, are termed, The sure mercies of David.—In short, unless David in his government of the natural seed was a type of Christ in his government of the spiritual seed, no just interpretation can be given of the divine revelations and promises which were made to him, and which are recorded by Ethan, Psal. lxxxix. 19—37. Whereas, if these things are spoken to David as an image or type of Christ, the whole is plain, and hath received a complete accomplishment.

8. The fourth typical person whose history is given in scripture is Solomon, who, in his ruling the natural seed, and in his building the temple, prefigured Christ the ruler of the spiritual Israel, and the builder of the Christian church, the great temple of God which in its perfect form will subsist in the heavenly country. For as David's government was so ordered by God as to be a striking representation of the powerful government which Christ now exercises, for protecting his people and subduing their enemies, so God raised up Solomon a peaceful king, and made Israel enjoy peace and prosperity under his government, and appointed him to build the temple of God at Jerusalem, 1 Chron. xxii. 9, 10. to prefigure the peace and happiness which the spiritual Israel shall enjoy after all their enemies are completely destroyed, and they themselves are introduced into the heavenly country, and formed into one great church or temple for the worship of God. This appears from Psal. lxxii. where Solomon's character and actions as a king are delineated, and the happy effects of his government are described. For in that Psalm things are spoken of him which do not belong to him, unless as a type of Christ; particularly ver. 5. 'They shall fear thee as long as the sun and moon endure, throughout all generations.'—Ver. 11. 'All kings shall fall down before him, all nations shall serve him. 12. For he shall deliver the needy when he crieth; the poor also, and him who hath no helper. 14. He shall redeem their soul from deceit and violence; and precious shall their blood be in his sight.'—Ver. 17. His name shall endure for ever; his name shall be continued as long as the sun: and men shall be blessed in him; all nations shall call him blessed.'—This last circumstance indisputably proves Solomon to have been a type of Christ, for it was one of these distinguishing characters of Christ, Abraham's seed, that 'in him all the nations of the earth were to be blessed.'—Moreover, Psal. xlv. cannot be interpreted of Solomon, unless on the supposition that he was a type of Christ: for in his natural character it could not be said to Solomon, ver. 6. 'Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever; the sceptre of thy kingdom is a sceptre of rectitude. Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated wickedness; therefore, O God, thy God hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy associates.' See Heb. i. 8. note 1.

9. The fifth allegorical or typical person spoken of in scripture, is the son of the prophetess, whose birth was foretold Isa. vii. 14. 'The Lord himself shall give you a sign, Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel. 15. Butter and honey shall he eat, that he may know to refuse the evil and choose the good. 16. For before the child shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest shall be forsaken of both her kings.'—B. Lowth says this passage should be translated in the following manner: 'Behold this virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and thou shalt call his name Immanuel: Butter and honey shall he eat when he shall know to refuse evil and choose good. For before this child shall know to refuse evil and choose good, the land shall be desolate, by whose two kings thou art distressed.' On Isaiah, p. 63. Lowth adds, "Harmer has clearly shewn, that these articles of food (butter and honey) are delicacies in the east, and as such denote a state of plenty. See also Josh. v. 6. They therefore naturally express the plenty of the country, as a mark of peace restored to it." And in confirmation of his opinion he cites Jarchi, "Butyrum et mel comedet infans iste, quoniam terra nostra plena erit omnis boni." He then proceeds thus, p. 64.: "Agreeably to the observations communicated by the learned person above mentioned, (Harmer), which perfectly well explain the historical sense of this much disputed passage, not excluding a higher secondary sense, the obvious and literal meaning of the prophecy is this, That within the time that a young woman, now a virgin, should conceive and bring forth a child, and that child should arrive at such an age as to distinguish between good and evil, that is, within a few years, (compare viii. 4.), the enemies of Judah should be destroyed." And to shew that this prophecy actually hath a higher secondary meaning, that learned expositor reasons as follows: "But the prophecy is introduced in so solemn a manner, the sign is so marked, as a sign selected and given by God himself, after Ahaz had rejected the offer of any sign of his own choosing out of the whole compass of nature; the terms of the prophecy are so peculiar, and the name of the child so expressive, containing in them much more than the circumstances of the birth of a common child required or even admitted; that we may easily suppose, that, in minds prepared by the general expectation of a great deliverer to spring from the house of David, they raised hopes far beyond what the present occasion suggested, especially when it was found, that in the subsequent prophecy, delivered immediately afterward, this child, called Immanuel, is treated as the Lord and Prince of the land of Judah." (Chap. viii. 8.) To the things mentioned by Lowth, I add, that the account of the character and actions of this child, given Isa. ix. 6. is by no means applicable to the son of the prophetess, unless as a type of the divine person who was to be the deliverer of the people of God. 'Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. 7. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end; upon the throne of David and upon his kingdom to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice, from henceforth, even for ever: The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this.'

That the prediction of a virgin's conceiving and bearing a son, who was to be called Immanuel, was at that time understood to be a promise of the birth of a great and even a divine person, B. Lowth says, "may be collected with great probability from a passage of Micah, a prophet contemporary with Isaiah, but who began to prophesy after him, and who, as I have already observed, imitated him, and sometimes used his expressions. Micah having delivered that remarkable prophecy which determines the place of the birth of Messiah, 'the ruler of God's people, whose goings forth have been of old from everlasting,' that it should be Bethlehem Ephrata, adds immediately, that nevertheless in the mean time God would deliver his people into the hands of their enemies: 'he will give them up, till she who is to bear a child shall bring forth,' Micah v. 3. This obviously and plainly refers to some known prophecy concerning a woman to bring forth a child, and seems much more properly applicable to this passage of Isaiah, than to any other of the same prophet to which some interpreters have applied it. St. Matthew, therefore, in applying this prophecy to the birth of Christ, chap. i. 22, 23. does it merely in accommodating the words of the prophet to a suitable case, not in the pro-her view, but takes it in its strictest, clearest, and most important sense, and applies it according to the original design and principal intention of the prophet."

10. The sixth allegorical or typical person mentioned in scripture is the prophet Jonah, whose preservation in the belly of the whale during three days and three nights, and his being after that vomited up alive, Christ himself declares was a type of his own continuance in the grave, and of his subsequent resurrection from the dead: Matt. xii. 39. 'An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign, and there shall no sign be given to it but the sign of the prophet Jonah.' 40. For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth.' Farther, by saying, Luke xi. 30. 'As Jonah was a sign to the Ninevites, so shall also the Son of man be to this generation,' our Lord insinuated, that as the miraculous preservation of Jonah in the whale's belly, when related to the Ninevites, induced them to give credit to the message which he brought to them from God, so Christ's resurrection from the dead, preached to mankind by his apostles, would induce many to believe on him as the Son of God: wherefore, in both these particulars, Jonah was a type of Christ.

11. Having said thus much concerning persons, who in their natural characters, and actions, and fortunes, are declared to have been types of future persons and events, it remains to speak of events happening to the ancient church and people of God, which by the circumstances wherewith they were accompanied, are shewed to have been typical of greater events than were to happen to the people of God under the gospel dispensation. Now concerning these I have two observations to make. The first is, that the things respecting the ancient people of God, which prefigured the greater things to happen to the people of God under the gospel dispensation, were in some instances foretold before they happened to the ancient people. My second observation is, that the prediction of these figurative events were also predictions of the events which they prefigured. Of this double sense of prophecy various instances might be given: Suffice it, however, to mention one instance only: namely, the deliverance of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, and their restoration to the land of Canaan. These, though natural events, prefigured the much greater and more important deliverance of mankind from the captivity of sin, and their introduction into the heavenly Canaan. For, in the writings of the evangelists, passages of the prophecies which foretold the deliverance from Babylon are applied to that greater deliverance. For example, Isa. xl. 3. 3. is said by Matthew, chap. iii. 3. and by our Lord himself, Matt. xi. 10. to have been fulfilled by John Baptist's preaching in the wilderness of Judea. Yet these verses, in their first and literal meaning, evidently relate to the return of the Jews from Babylon: for Isaiah, in the end of chap. xxxix. having foretold that all the riches of his palaces, which Hezekiah had from pride shewn to the messengers of the king of Babylon, should be carried away to Babylon, and that his sons should be carried thither captives, and made eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon, the prophet in his xlii. chapter mitigated the severity of that prediction, by foretelling, that whilst the Jews were oppressed with the miseries of their captivity, God would order his prophets who were among them to comfort his people, by assuring them that their captivity would at length come to an end; because, considering their sufferings as a sufficient punishment for their sins as a nation, he would pardon and restore them to their own land, ver. 3. 'Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned; for she hath received of the Lord's hands double for all her sins.' The people in Babylon being thus assured that they were to be brought back to Judea, "the first thought," as B. Lowth observes, "which would occur to the captives, would be the difficulty and danger of their passing through the deserts of Arabia, where the nearest way from Babylon to Jerusalem lay." Wherefore the prophets in Babylon, to remove the fears of the people, were ordered to assure them, that by whatever road they should return, it would be made commodious for their safe passage. And this assurance the prophets would give them in language taken from the custom of the eastern princes, who, when they were about to march with their armies through difficult roads, sent pioneers before them to widen the narrow passages, to fill up the hollows, to level the heights, and to smooth the rough ways through which they were to march:—Ver. 3. 'The voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord; make straight in the desert an highway for our God. 4. Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low, and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain.' By these images the prophets intimated, that God was to march from Babylon at the head of his people, to protect them during their journey and to bring them safely into Judea. These things are more plainly expressed, Isa. lii. 12. 'Ye shall not go out with haste, nor go by flight; for the Lord will go before you, and the God of Israel will be your re-ward.'

But although this whole prophecy, in its first and literal meaning, evidently related to the deliverance of the Jews from Babylon, the application of the above cited passage to the preaching of John Baptist by the evangelist Matthew, and by our Lord himself, sheweth plainly, that the prophecies concerning the deliverance of the people of God from the Babylonish captivity, had a second and higher meaning, of which the literal sense was the sign. By foretelling the deliverance of the Jews from Babylon, these prophecies foretold the deliverance of mankind from the infinitely worse bondage of sin. Moreover, the command to the prophets in Babylon to comfort God's people, by announcing that their sins were pardoned, and that they were soon to be brought back to their own land, was a command to the ministers of the gospel in every age to comfort penitent believers, by assuring them that their sins shall be pardoned, and that Christ will bring them safely into the heavenly country, (of which the restoration of the Jews to Canaan was an emblem and pledge), because he hath successfully removed all obstacles out of their way. The preparation of the way of the Lord among the Jews by the preaching of John Baptist, was fitly expressed by the voice of one crying in the wilderness. For, as Lowth observes on Isaiah, p. 188. "The Jewish church, to which John was sent to announce the coming of Messiah, was at that time in a barren and desert condition; unfit, without reformation, for the reception of her king. It was in this desert country, destitute at that time of all religious cultivation, in true piety and good works unfruitful, that John was sent to prepare the way of the Lord by preaching repentance."

Many other examples of prophecies might be mentioned in which the return of the Jews from Babylon was foretold, and of which passages are applied, by the writers of the New Testament, to the redemption of mankind from the bondage of sin. But the one explained above may suffice as a proof of what is called the double sense of prophecy, in which the obvious literal sense exhibits a second and higher meaning; so that these prophecies, properly speaking, are true allegories.

Thus it appears, that the high figurative expressions in the Jewish scriptures, which are so offensive to modern ears and to minute philosophers, were occasioned by the poverty of the first language of mankind: that the boldness of these figures were derived from the ancient picture-writing: that the symbols used in that kind of writing gave rise to the dark Egyptian allegory, which was held in great estimation at the time the scriptures were written, and that, in the early ages, mankind, whether barbarous or civilized, were accustomed to express their sentiments and feelings by significant actions as well as by significant sounds. These things considered, it cannot be matter either of surprise or of blame, that the Jewish prophets exhorted the people and foretold future events in such figurative language as to us moderns appears extravagant; or that they delivered their exhortations and predictions in dark allegories, formed on the qualities and circumstances of the symbols by which the persons and nations, concerning whom they prophesied, were denoted in picture-writing: or even that, on extraordinary occasions, they foretold things future by what may be called a drama continued through a great length of time, in which they spake and acted things which excited the wonder of the spectators, and led them to inquire what the prophets meant by them, and, when explained, could not but make a strong impression upon their imagination. These things were all done suitably to the genius and manners of the times, and were easily understood by the people for whose instruction they were intended.—And with respect to the persons who, in the scriptures, are said in their natural characters and actions to have been types of future persons and events, that method of foretelling things future was of the same kind with allegorical prophecy; for surely it made no difference whether the allegory was formed on the qualities and actions of a symbol, or on the qualities and actions of a real person. In the symbolical or instituted allegory, it was shewed to be an allegory by the particulars of which it was composed; but in the natural allegory, the characters and events of which it was composed do not shew it to be an allegory: wherefore, before these are considered by us as allegories, or prefigurations of future persons and events, we ought to be assured by some one or other of the prophets or inspired persons who afterwards arose, that they are allegories, otherwise they ought not to be considered as such.—By this rule, the futility of those allegorical meanings which some of the ancient fathers put on many passages of scripture will clearly appear; and the humour of finding mystical senses in the sacred oracles, which some of the modern commentators have too much indulged, will be effectually repressed.

Upon the whole, the observation suggested in the beginning of this Essay may now be repeated with some confidence; namely, That the high figurative language by which the Jewish scriptures are so strongly marked, together with the allegorical and typical senses with which they abound, and the extraordinary things done by the Jewish prophets, instead of being instances of absurdity, and signs of imposture, are proofs of their antiquity and authenticity; and even strong presumptions of the divine original of the revelation contained in these memorable writings.

LIFE OF THE APOSTLE PAUL,

BY WHOM THE GENTILES WERE CONVERTED,

ACCOMPANIED WITH

PROOFS AND ILLUSTRATIONS.

I OFFER to the Public the history of the Apostle Paul, composed from materials furnished, partly by himself in his epistles, and partly by the evangelist Luke in his book of the Acts. And I do this in the persuasion, that the better we are acquainted with Paul's character and actions, the more will we be disposed to acknowledge his authority as an apostle, and to respect his writings as the oracles of God. This, however, is not the only advantage to be derived from the knowledge of Paul's history: It will establish us in the faith, by showing us in what manner the gospel was preached at the first, both to the Jews and to the Gentiles; what success it met with in the different countries where it was preached; what sufferings the first preachers and the first believers endured for the sake of the gospel; and how amply it was confirmed by the Lord, who gave testimony to the word of his grace, by the signs and wonders which he granted to be wrought by the hands of the apostles, in all the countries where they preached. To these advantages we may add, the use which the knowledge of Paul's history will be of in helping us to understand his writings, which make so considerable a part of the canon of scripture.

CHAR. I.—Paul's Birth and Education; his Persecution of the Disciples of Christ; and his Conversion.

PAUL was a Jew, of the tribe of Benjamin, rightly descended from Abraham, the founder of the Israelitish nation; in which respect he was superior to those Jews whose parents had been converted from heathenism. According to the manner of his people, he was circumcised on the eighth day after his birth, and had an Hebrew name given him, being called Saul; but afterward he took the name of Paulus or Paul, in compliment to Sergius Paulus the proconsul of Cyprus, whom he converted in his first journey among the Gentiles, Acts xiii. 7, 8. Tarsus, the place of Saul's nativity, though not a city of Judea, did honour to such Jews as were born there; for it was the metropolis of Cilicia, and, as a place of education, it excelled Athens and Alexandria, and all the other Greek cities where there were schools of philosophy and of the polite arts. So Strabo tells us, lib. xiv. Saul therefore had reason to boast even of the place of his birth, Acts xxi. 39. 'I am a man which am a Jew of Tarsus in Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city.'

Saul's father was a Roman,* (Acts xxii. 28.), which in the provinces was a distinction highly honourable, as it entitled those who possessed it to many valuable privileges and immunities. For which reason it was either purchased with money, or it was bestowed as the reward of extraordinary services, Acts xx. 28. His being a Roman in the right of his father, is not the only circumstance which shews that Saul was well born: the care and expense bestowed on his education, is a proof that his family was in opulent circumstances.

As Saul hath termed himself an Hebrew of the Hebrews, we may presume that the language of his family was what they then called the Hebrew. Yet having passed the first years of his life in Tarsus, a Greek city, it is reasonable to believe that he spake the Greek language also, and was even taught to read it. But as to his education in the Greek literature I am not so certain. In his sermons and writings there are traces from which it may be gathered, that he had a general knowledge of the learning, the religion, the manners, and the customs of the Greeks, and that he had read some of their best authors. But whether he got that knowledge at Tarsus, in his younger years, may be doubted. He did not remain there the time that was requisite for acquiring it, and at Jerusalem, where he received the greatest part of his education, he had no opportunity of studying the Greek learning. I am therefore of opinion, that Saul's knowledge of the Greek rhetoric and philosophy was not acquired in Tarsus. Neither was it such as could entitle him to the appellation of learned in these matters. But it was a general knowledge only, acquired by conversing with the Greeks in the different countries where he preached the gospel. In any other manner he cannot well be supposed to have got that knowledge; because, however capable he might be of such studies, he had no leisure, after he became an apostle, to prosecute them. Besides the greatest proficiency in the rhetoric and philosophy of the Greeks would have been of no use to him in the discharge of the apostolic office. For Christ 'sent him and the other apostles to preach the gospel, not with the wisdom of words,' lest the conversion of the world might have been attributed to the eloquence, knowledge, and superior abilities of the preachers, and not to the power of God which accompanied their preaching.

But though Saul was no proficient in the rhetoric and philosophy of the Greeks, he was thoroughly instructed in the learning of the Jews. For as soon as the years of his childhood were over, his parents sent him to Jerusalem, to study under Gamaliel, the most celebrated doctor of his time, and who, for his great knowledge and virtue, 'was had in reputation among all the people,' Acts v. 34.—According to Josephus, Ant. xx. the learning of the Jews consisted in the knowledge of their own laws and religion, as contained in their sacred writings. The doctors, therefore, employed themselves in explaining these writings to the studious youth, founding their interpretations upon traditions pretended to be handed down from Moses and the prophets. It is true, the doctors in some instances perverted the meaning of the scriptures; and by their traditions made void the commandments of God. But in general the true sense of the scriptures seems to have been preserved among the Jews by these traditional explanations, as may be understood from the following well known facts:—1. The apostles, especially Paul, in reasoning with the Jews, always proved the doctrines of the gospel by quotations out of the writings of Moses and the prophets. But these quotations would have been no proofs at all of the gospel doctrines, at least to the Jews, unless the sense put upon them by the apostles, which was their real meaning, had been the sense generally put upon them by the Jews.—2. It was owing to the knowledge which they had of the true meaning of the writings of Moses and the prophets, that some of the more learned Jews believed on Jesus: Such as Nicodemus, Joseph of Arimathea, and that great company of the priests who were obedient to the faith, Acts vi. 7.—3. Gamaliel, Saul's master, from his great knowledge of the scriptures, seems to have thought well of the apostles, and of their doctrines, as is plain from the counsel which he gave to his brethren of the Sanhedrim, Acts v. 38. 'And now, I say unto you, Refrain from these men, and let them alone; for if this counsel, or this work, be of men, it will come to nought. 39. But if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it, lest haply ye be found even to fight against God.'—How perfectly Saul was educated in the knowledge of the law of the Fathers, we learn from himself, Acts xxii. 3. 'Born in Tarsus in Cilicia, yet brought up in this city at the feet of Gamaliel, and taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers; and was zealous towards God, as ye all are this day.' And of his proficiency in that kind of learning he says, Gal. i. 14. 'And profited in Judaism above many my equals in mine own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of the fathers.'

* Many of the Jews enjoyed the right of citizenship; nay, some of them were Roman knights, as we learn from Josephus, who, in describing the injustice and cruelty of Felix's government, mentions his having crucified some Jews who were Roman knights.

Saul's parents completed his education, by having him taught the art of tent-making, Acts xviii. 3. In this they followed the manners of the Jews, with whom it was customary to teach the youth of the highest birth some mechanical employment, whereby, in cases of necessity, they might maintain themselves without being burdensome to others. The benefit which Saul derived from this branch of his education while he preached the gospel, will be seen afterwards.

In what year of his age Saul came to Jerusalem, and how long he continued under the tuition of Gamaliel, is not known: But from his saying, that 'he spent his youth among his own nation at Jerusalem,' Acts xxvi. 4. it may be conjectured that he came thither early in life. And seeing, in his epistle to Philemon, which is thought to have been written A. D. 62, he calls himself Paul the aged, we cannot be much mistaken in supposing that he was then about 60 years old; and that when our Lord began his public ministry he was in the 28th* year of his age. Wherefore, having finished his studies, we may suppose that he then professed himself a Pharisee; of which sect also his father was, Acts xxiii. 6.—Farther, seeing our Lord, in the course of his ministry, attracted the attention of the whole Jewish nation, it is probable Saul's zeal for the institutions of his fathers prompted him to join such of his sect as followed Jesus with an intention to find matter of accusation against him. And when he was tried, condemned, and put to death, for calling himself Christ the Son of the Blessed, this zealous young man may have been present. So that, having often seen Jesus, he could know whether he who appeared to him on the road to Damascus, was really the person whom the rulers at Jerusalem had put to death, or only an impostor who personated him. However, if any one calls this conjecture in question, I will not dispute it with him.

What we certainly know from the sacred history is, that when Christ's resurrection from the dead was published in Jerusalem, the rulers were greatly offended with the preachers of that miracle; and the rather, because they urged it as a proof that Jesus, whom God had raised from the dead, was THE CHRIST, and that he had been put to death unjustly.—Wherefore the rulers stirred up some of the most zealous members of the foreign synagogues in Jerusalem (Proofs and Illustrations, No. I.) to oppose them. And these zealots happening to hear Stephen, one of the seven deacons, preach, disputed with him. But, Acts vi. 10. 'They were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake. 11. Then they suborned men, which said,' in the hearing of the multitude before whom they disputed, and in private to the elders and scribes, 'We have heard him speak blasphemous words against Moses and God. 12. And they stirred up the people, and the elders, and the scribes, and came upon him, and caught him, and brought him to the council. 13. And set up false witnesses, which said, This man ceaseth not to speak blasphemous words against this holy place and the law. 14. For we have heard him say, that this Jesus of Nazareth,' whom ye put to death as a deceiver, 'shall destroy this place, and shall change the customs which Moses delivered us.' While the witnesses thus bare testimony against Stephen, 15. 'All that sat in the council, looking steadfastly on him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel.' It seems his face shone with a glory like that which beamed from Moses's face when he came down from the mount. This miraculous testimony from God the council beheld all the while Stephen spake in his own defence; and from it they might have concluded, that the things which he spake were agreeable to God. Nevertheless, when they heard them, being cut to the heart, they 'gnashed on him with their teeth' through rage. But Stephen was miraculously supported by a sight of 'the glory of God, and of Jesus standing on the right hand of God;' and being exceedingly affected with the sight, he told it to the council. But they stopped their ears, as afraid to hear things blasphemous, 'and ran upon him with one accord, and cast him out of the city, and stoned him to death, calling upon God, and saying, Lord Jesus, (for he now saw him), receive my spirit.'

In executions of this kind, it was usual for those who had borne witness against the criminal to cast the first stone. And for that purpose they put off their upper garments, and gave them to be kept by persons equally hearty in the prosecution with themselves. At the stoning of Stephen, the witnesses laid their clothes at the feet of our Saul; by which he is pointed out as consenting to the condemnation and punishment of that blessed martyr, Acts xxii. 20.

Stephen, in his defence, having boldly asserted before the council that Jesus was the Just One, or Christ; and that they were his betrayers and murderers; also, having called them a stiff-necked and uncircumcised generation, whose fathers persecuted the prophets, and slew them which shewed before of the coming of the Just One, and who by no means observed the law of which they pretended to be so zealous; all the council were enraged, and carried on the persecution against the church, after Stephen's death, with the utmost severity, intending utterly to extirpate the whole sect. Acts viii. 1. 'And at that time there was a great persecution against the church that was at Jerusalem; and they were all scattered abroad, the preachers and the chief brethren were scattered abroad, 'throughout the regions of Judea and Samaria, except the apostles.'—One of the main instruments in this persecution was our Saul; 3. 'Who made havock of the church, entering into every house' where the disciples assembled for the worship of God, 'and haling men and women, committed them to prison.' It seems the chief priests had given him a commission to search them out, and imprison them, that they might be punished. So he tells us himself, Acts xxvi. 10. 'Which thing I also did at Jerusalem; and many of the 'saints did I shut up in prison, having received authority from the chief priests.'—The same thing he affirmed in the hearing of the multitude, Acts xxii. 4. 'I persecuted this way unto death, binding and delivering into prison both men and women.' The Jews were now at liberty to put the disciples to death, because, between the removal of Pontius Pilate and the accession of Herod Agrippa, in the second year of the Emperor Claudius, who gave him all the dominions of his grandfather Herod the Great, there was no Procurator in Judea to restrain their intemperate zeal.

* Seeing the Vulgar æra, according to the opinion of the most learned chronologers, commenced at least two years after the birth of Christ, the year 62 of that computation, in which the epistle to Philemon is supposed to have been written, was really the 64th year from the birth of Christ. Wherefore, if Paul was then 60 years old, he must have been four years younger than our Lord; and by consequence, when our Lord began his ministry in the 30th year of his age, Saul was 26 complete.

In employing Saul as the instrument of their malice against the saints, the rulers did not make a wrong choice. For though he had received abundance of Jewish literature from his master Gamaliel, he had acquired nothing of his moderation; but executed his commission with such severity, that the disciples were forced to take shelter in foreign cities. But even there they did not long remain in safety; for, Acts ix. 1. 'Saul, yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, went unto the high-priest; 2. And desired of him letters to Damascus, to the synagogues, that if he found any of this way, whether they were men or women, he might bring them bound unto Jerusalem.' It seems the synagogues in foreign parts had a jurisdiction over their own members, (No. II.), in the exercise of which they were sometimes directed, as on this occasion, by the high-priest and council at Jerusalem. At this time there were several synagogues in Damascus; so that it was full of Jews; and many of them had embraced the gospel. Wherefore, although Damascus was at a great distance from Jerusalem, Saul resolved to go thither with his new commission from the high-priest; and, being joined by assistants equally bigoted and furious with himself, the news of their coming reached Damascus before they arrived, and greatly terrified the saints, Acts ix. 14. 21.

But when this company of persecutors, full of wrath against the disciples, drew nigh to the city, the Lord Jesus appeared to Saul from heaven, surrounded with a light inexpressibly resplendent, which was seen also by Saul's companions: Acts ix. 3. 'And as he journeyed he came near Damascus, and suddenly there shined round him a light from heaven.' Saul himself, giving an account of this circumstance to Agrippa, says, Acts xxvi. 13. 'At mid-day, O king, I saw in the way a light from heaven, above the brightness of the sun, shining round about me and them which journeyed with me.' Luke proceeds thus: 4. 'And he fell to the earth.' But Saul himself, in relating this circumstance, says, Acts xxvi. 14. 'And when we were all fallen to the earth;—they all fell prostrate, from fear or reverence, supposing the supernatural light which they saw to be an indication of the appearance of some divine person;—'I heard a voice speaking unto me, and saying in the Hebrew tongue, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?' By speaking thus, Jesus declared that he considered whatever was done to his people as done to himself. Acts ix. 5. 'And he said, Who art thou, Lord? And the Lord said, I am Jesus whom thou persecutest: It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks.' Thou wilt find it hard for thee to accomplish thy malicious designs against me. In the account which Saul gave of this conversation to Agrippa, he says, that after speaking the words last mentioned, Jesus ordered him to rise and stand upon his feet. Acts xxvi. 15. 'I am Jesus whom thou persecutest. 16. But rise and stand upon thy feet.' Jesus intended that Saul should see him, and be convinced that the person who now spake to him was Jesus of Nazareth, whom the priests had crucified at Jerusalem; and that he was really risen from the dead, as his disciples affirmed. We must therefore believe, that, in obedience to this order, Saul arose from the earth, and with his bodily eyes beheld Jesus standing in the way before him, (No. III.) But being unable to bear the dazzling splendour of his appearance, he fell to the earth a second time; or, he may have put himself into that posture, as worshipping Jesus, whom he now knew to be Christ the Son of God, Acts ix. 20. While in this humble posture, Acts ix. 6. 'he, trembling and astonished, said, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?' By professing a willingness to do whatever Jesus should command him, Saul declared that he had now altered his opinion of Jesus of Nazareth, and had laid aside his enmity against his disciples.—Luke has related none of the things which on this occasion Jesus said to Saul, except that he was to go into the city, and there it should be told him what he was to do; so that, from his account of the matter, we could not have understood that Saul at this time was made an apostle by Christ, and commissioned to preach to the Gentiles. But Saul himself hath supplied that defect; for he told Agrippa, that when Jesus ordered him to rise and stand upon his feet, he added, Acts xxvi. 16. 'I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness, both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee; 17. Delivering thee from the people of the Jews, and from the Gentiles, unto whom I now send thee, 18. To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among them which are sanctified by faith which is in me.' Having thus spoken, he added, as Luke informs us, Acts ix. 6. 'Arise and go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do. 7. And the men which journeyed with him stood speechless, (ἀκούοντες τῆς φωνῆς) hearing indeed his voice, but seeing no man.'* They heard Saul's voice, but did not see the person to whom he spake. 8. 'And Saul arose from the earth; and when his eyes were opened, he saw no man.' Saul having looked steadfastly on Jesus, before he fell to the ground the second time, was struck blind by the brightness of his appearance. So he says, Acts xxii. 11. 'When I could not see for the glory of that light.' But his companions, lying all the while with their faces towards the earth, did not see Jesus; so that their eye-sight remaining, Acts ix. 8. 'they led Saul by the hand, and brought him to Damascus,' to the house of one Judas, ver. 11. with whom it seems they were acquainted. Here Saul abode three days absolutely blind, without either eating or drinking, ver. 9.—If Saul's companions, by what had happened and by what he told them, were induced to alter their faith concerning Jesus of Nazareth, they would remain with Saul, to assist and comfort him in his disconsolate state: But if they continued in their former persuasion,

* 'Hearing indeed his voice, but seeing no man.'—This translation removes the difficulty arising from Saul's account of the matter to the council, Acts xxii. 9. 'And they that were with me saw indeed the light, and were afraid, but they heard not the voice of him that spake to me.' Or this supposition may be removed by translating οὐκ ἤκουον, 'they understood not the voice of him that spake to me;' οὐκ ἤκουον is used 1 Cor. xv. 2.—The same thing happened when a voice came to our Lord from the Father, John xii. 28. the people that stood by heard the voice, but not understanding what was spoken, said it thundered.

they would return to Jerusalem, and inform the high-priest and council of what had happened.

Saul's long-continued fast was a natural expression of his bitter grief for having persecuted the disciples of Jesus. With fasting he joined fervent and often-repeated prayer, perhaps to Jesus; in which he made unfeigned confession of his sin in persecuting him, and earnest supplication for pardon: all which being certain signs of his repentance, they were mentioned by Christ himself as such, Acts ix. 11.—During his three days' blindness and fasting, Saul was instructed by visions and revelations from the Lord, agreeably to what was promised him, 'That in Damascus it should be told him what he was to do.' One vision of this kind is expressly mentioned, in which the restoration of his sight by Ananias was foretold to him, while perhaps he was praying for that very blessing:—Acts ix. 12. 'And hath seen a man named Ananias coming in and putting his hand on him, that he might receive his sight.'

This Ananias, before his conversion to Christianity, had lived so conformably to the law, that he was much esteemed by all the Jews who dwelt in Damascus, Acts xxii. 12. And after his conversion, his piety being equally conspicuous, he was a person of great note among the brethren also. To him Jesus appeared in a vision, on the third day of Saul's fast, and ordered him to go into the house of Judas, and inquire for Saul of Tarsus; of whom he needed no longer be afraid, because he was spending his time in prayer for the pardon of his sin in persecuting the saints; and because Ananias himself had been shown to him in a vision as sent to cure his sight. Wherefore Ananias, laying aside his fears, went forthwith into the house of Judas, Acts ix. 17. 'And putting his hands on him, said, Brother Saul, the Lord, even Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, hath sent me, that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost. (No. IV.) 18. And immediately there fell from his eyes, as if it had been scales. And he received sight forthwith, and arose, and was baptized,' in token of his faith, and repentance, and pardon. And since Ananias told him he was sent that he might both receive his sight and be filled with the Holy Ghost, we may believe that after his baptism the Holy Ghost fell upon him in some visible manner, as upon the other apostles at the first; so that Saul was 'in nothing inferior to the very greatest apostles,' 2 Cor. xi. 6. For, as we shall see afterwards, he enjoyed the inspiration of the Spirit, the power of working miracles, the discerning of spirits, and the gift of tongues, in as ample a manner as any of the apostles; by all which he was not only fitted for being an apostle of Christ, but plainly declared to be so.

The miraculous restoration of Saul's sight, his baptism, and the descent of the Holy Ghost upon him, being undoubted pledges of his pardon and reconciliation with Christ, he put an end to his long fast, and was comforted. Acts ix. 19. 'And when he had received meat, he was strengthened.' He received his bodily strength, which had been impaired by his long fast, as well as by what had happened to him in the way.

In this miraculous manner was Saul, in the very height of his rage against the saints, converted, and made an apostle of Jesus Christ, and called to preach that very faith which he had been so zealous to destroy.

The choice of Saul to be an apostle, was proper on many accounts. For, in the first place, his conversion added great lustre to the evidences of Christ's resurrection from the dead. Saul had persecuted all who preached that miracle. Wherefore, when he himself went over to the persecuted party, and published Christ's resurrection with greater earnestness and diligence than any of them, every impartial person must have been sensible, that such an alteration of sentiment and conduct in a person of Saul's good sense, and learning, and zeal, and that at the very time he was breathing out threatenings and laughter against the disciples of the Lord, could not possibly have happened, unless he had actually received that unquestionable evidence of Christ's resurrection from the dead, which he affirmed had been given him by Christ's appearing to him personally in the body as he went to Damascus, and by conferring upon him the gift of the Holy Ghost. It is true, the appearing of Jesus in the body might seem to many an improbable story. Yet as, by the miracles which Saul performed, he gave convincing proofs that Christ had bestowed on him the gift of the Holy Ghost, no reasonable person, after that, could doubt of his having appeared to him, as Saul constantly affirmed.

Secondly, Saul possessed every natural qualification necessary to the successful discharge of the difficult work of an apostle of Jesus Christ. He was a person of an excellent understanding, whereby he was able to judge rightly of matters. He was remarkable for his address* in managing the humours of those with whom he had to do. His courage was such as enabled him to face the greatest dangers; his industry in prosecuting the most laborious and difficult enterprises, was unwearied; and his patience was equal to his industry, fitting him to bear the heaviest sufferings, however long continued. On all which accounts, there was perhaps no Jew of his age better qualified by nature for undertaking those long journeys, and for enduring those hardships and persecutions, which the Christian preachers were obliged to undergo in propagating the gospel.

Thirdly, Saul's moral character was such as brought no discredit upon the office to which he was now chosen. From his youth up, he had been remarkable for purity of manners, and zeal for the interest of truth and virtue. It is true, when he came of an age fit to engage in affairs, his zeal hurried him too far, when it led him to persecute the Christians; but the prejudices of his education, and the example of his brethren of the sect of the Pharisees, had so blinded him, that he believed Jesus to be an impostor, and thought himself bound to put his disciples to death: Acts xxvi. 9. 'I verily thought I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth.' Wherefore, having acted in this manner from principle, he could safely tell the Jewish council, many of whom knew his doings against the saints, Acts xxiii. 1. 'I have lived in all good conscience before God unto this day.' Nay, he could say to Timothy, i. 13. 'I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly in unbelief.' Saul's general conduct having thus been all along irreproachable, he was able to execute his new office with all that dignity and weight which results from excellence of character.

Fourthly, Since the gospel was to be offered, both to the Jews and to the Gentiles, as a revelation from the same God who had spoken to the Jews by the prophets, it was necessary that it should be preached to both by such a person as Saul, who, being of the Jewish nation, and thoroughly educated in the knowledge of their sacred writings under Gamaliel, the most noted doctor of his time, was, by his great talents and education, as well as by his inspiration, qualified to convince both Jews and Gentiles, that the things done, and taught, and suffered by Jesus, were all foretold in these writings, and had happened exactly as they were foretold. So that, in this method of offering the gospel to the world, all were made sensible that it did not destroy the law and the prophets, but fulfil them.

* Upon this part of his character, Lord Shaftesbury has paid Saul an handsome compliment, Charac. i. p. 30. "When I consider the apostle as appearing either before the witty Athenians, or before a Roman Court of Judicature, in the presence of their great men and ladies, I see how handsomely he accommodated himself to the apprehension and temper of these polite people."

Thus it appears that Saul was truly what Jesus termed him, Acts ix. 15. 'A chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel.'

Luke has not mentioned any date by which we can with certainty fix either Saul's age at his conversion, or the particular year in which that remarkable event happened; nevertheless, from such circumstances taken notice of in the history, learned men have gathered that it happened in the end of A. D. 36, or in the beginning of A. D. 37, when Saul was about 34 years of age. See No. V. and No. VII.

CHAP. II.—The History of Saul, from his Conversion to his Departure from Antioch to preach the Gospel to the idolatrous Gentiles.

THE supernatural brightness of the light which issued from the body of Jesus, and which struck Saul blind; the visions and revelations made to him during his blindness; the miraculous restoration of his sight by Ananias, whom Jesus sent to him for that purpose; and the descent of the Holy Ghost upon him, in the plenitude of his gifts—produced in Saul's mind such a full conviction as left him no room to doubt that Jesus of Nazareth had really appeared to him, and that he was the Christ; and, at the same time, banished all hesitation with respect to the cause he was now called to maintain. He therefore resolved to spend his life in the service of Christ. In the prosecution of this resolution he had no occasion to converse with any person, because, according to Christ's promise, it was told him in Damascus what he was to do. Accordingly, Gal. i. 16. 'He did not converse with flesh and blood, neither did he go up to Jerusalem to them who were apostles before him,' to be instructed in the Christian doctrine, or to be confirmed in his new office; but, Acts ix. 20. 'Straightway he preached Christ in their synagogues, (No. VI.) that he is the Son of God,' foretold Psalm ii. 7.—Acts ix. 21. 'But all that heard him were amazed, and said, Is not this he that destroyed them which called on this name in Jerusalem, and came hither for that intent, that he might bring them bound to the chief priests?'

Soon after this Saul went into Arabia, (Gal. i. 17.) where there were few Christians, and none of them of any note.—This course, we may believe, he took by the direction of Christ, who sent him into that country, to instruct him in the duties of his office, and in the doctrines of the gospel, by immediate revelation. The truth is, now that the Lord Jesus was gone to heaven, this was the only proper method of training an apostle. For if the ministry of men had been used in instructing Saul, he would have been considered as an apostle of men, and on that account might have been reckoned inferior to the other apostles, who were all instructed by Christ himself. In Arabia, therefore, Saul continued more than two years; and during all that time employed himself in studying the Jewish scriptures more carefully than ever, by the help of the new lights which had been bestowed on him, and in searching into the true nature of the law of Moses, and in attending to such revelations as Christ was pleased to make to him. And having, by these revelations, acquired a complete knowledge of all Christ's doctrines, sayings, miracles, sufferings, resurrection, and ascension,* and of the design both of the law and of the gospel, and of the confirmation which the gospel derives from the writings of Moses and the prophets, he returned to Damascus a well-instructed apostle of Christ, and there entered on the stated execution of his apostolical office, (No. XI.)—Acts ix. 22. 'But Saul increased the more in strength.' His natural abilities and his gifts as an apostle increased after his return from Arabia, not only by the revelations which had been there made to him, but now by continual exercise; so that through his knowledge of the scriptures, and by the assistance of the Spirit, and by the power of his eloquence, 22. 'he confounded the Jews which dwelt in Damascus, proving that this is the very Christ,' or the great personage foretold in the second Psalm. 23. 'And after that many days were fulfilled, the Jews took counsel to kill him;' and, in prosecution of their malicious design, they applied to the governor of Damascus, under Arctas the king; and he, in compliance with their request, guarded the city so strictly that the disciples were obliged to let their new preacher down by the wall, through a window, in a basket: 2 Cor. xi. 32. See also Acts ix. 25.

Saul having thus escaped with his life, set out for Jerusalem to see the apostle Peter, (Gal. i. 18.), of whom, no doubt, he had heard a great deal since his conversion. And in the different towns through which he passed, he preached Jesus that he is the Christ, as he had done at Damascus. And being come to Jerusalem, Acts ix. 26. 'he assayed to join himself to the disciples; but they were all afraid of him, and believed not that he was a disciple.' But Barnabas, who may be supposed to have learned Paul's conversion from Ananias and the brethren of Damascus, 'brought him to the apostles,' Acts ix. 27.; that is, to Peter and James, for other of the apostles saw he none, (Gal. i. 19.); 'and declared to them how he had seen the Lord in the way, and how he had preached boldly at Damascus.' After this, the disciples 'willingly received him.' But he abode in Jerusalem only fifteen days, during which he lodged with Peter; and then went forth to Tarsus, as we shall see immediately. So that he was personally unknown to the churches of Judea (Gal. i. 23.) for some time.

On one or other of the fifteen days which Saul now spent in Jerusalem, happening to pray in the temple, he fell into a trance, or ecstasy, in which the whole senses of his body being suspended, the impressions which his soul then received were made by the immediate operation of God. In this trance, Saul had a vision of the Lord, who ordered him to leave Jerusalem quickly, Acts xxii. 18. 'For they will not receive thy testimony concerning me.' But Saul, unwilling to depart, replied, 19. 'Lord, they know that I imprisoned and beat in every synagogue them that believed on thee. 20. And when the blood of thy martyr Stephen was shed, I also was standing by and consenting to his death, and kept the raiment of them that slew him.' It seems Saul thought his change of sentiment and conduct, not well known to the Jews at Jerusalem, would certainly induce them to receive his testimony concerning Christ's having appeared to him by the way, because no other rational account could be given of his espousing that cause which formerly he had persecuted with such fury. But Jesus having called him to a different work, answered, 21. 'Depart, for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles.'—Besides, there was a particular reason for Saul's leaving Jerusalem quickly

Christ; and, 1 Cor. xv. 3. that he 'received from the Lord, that Christ died for our sins, according to the scriptures; and that he arose from the dead on the third day, according to the scripture.'—How fully Saul was instructed in the things which concern the Lord Jesus, may be known from this, that he has mentioned a saying of Christ (Acts xx. 25.) which none of the evangelists have recorded, and an appearance of Christ after his resurrection to James alone, not mentioned by them. Besides, in Paul's epistles, there are many allusions to things done and said by Christ which he could know only by particular revelation.

* In affirming that Saul had the whole history of our Lord, and of his ministry, communicated to him by revelation, I am supported by Saul himself, who tells us, 1 Cor. xi. 23. that he received the institution of the Lord's supper, and the words of institution, from at this time, Acts ix. 29. Having spoken boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus, and disputed against (Ἑλλανιστάς) the Hellenists, the very persons with whom formerly he had joined in persecuting Stephen, 'they went about to slay him. 30. Which when the brethren knew, they brought him down to Cæsarea,* and sent him forth to Tarsus,' thinking that in his native city he might preach the gospel to the Jews, with more success and less hazard than in Judea. After Saul's departure for Tarsus, 31. 'the churches throughout all Judea, and Samaria, and Galilee, had rest and were edified; and, walking in the fear of the Holy Ghost, were multiplied.'

Thus was Saul in his turn driven out of Judea by the rage of the Hellenists or unbelieving Jews, who had come to Jerusalem from the provinces, and who were called Hellenists, probably because they used the Greek translation of the scriptures in their synagogues. These men, whose zeal for the institutions of Moses had brought them up to Jerusalem, were so offended at Paul for preaching Jesus, that they resolved to kill him; being set on by the rulers also, who could not bear that one whom they themselves had employed to persecute the saints, should go over to the persecuted party, and become a zealous preacher of the faith which they had commissioned him to destroy. But the persecution which now befell Saul, instead of hurting the cause in which he was engaged, greatly advanced it, by giving him an opportunity of preaching the Lord Jesus in foreign parts.

That Saul actually preached to the Jews and Proselytes in Syria and Cilicia at this time, may be gathered from his epistle to the Galatians, where, after relating his going from Jerusalem into the region of Syria and Cilicia, he adds, i. 22. 'And was unknown by face to the churches of Judea, which were in Christ; 23. (Μὴ ὁμιλῶντας) Only they heard, That he which persecuted us in times past, now preacheth the faith which once he destroyed.' That is, during Saul's abode in Cilicia, the churches of Judea heard that he was preaching the faith of Christ. Wherefore, in Cilicia particularly, Saul now founded those churches to which afterwards the council of Jerusalem addressed their decree, and which are said to have been confirmed by Paul and Silas, in the journey which they made through Syria and Cilicia after the council, Acts xv. 41.

While Saul was now in Cilicia, he had those visions and revelations of the Lord (No. VII.) of which he speaks 2 Cor. xii. 1.; being caught up into the third heaven, even unto paradise, where he heard and saw things which it was not possible for him to utter, but which were made known to him in this miraculous manner, to encourage him in the dangerous work of preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, whereunto Christ had called him. Nevertheless, on that occasion, 'lest he should have been exalted above measure through the abundance of the revelations, there was given to him a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet him.' This in all probability is what he calls, Gal. iv. 13. his 'infirmity of the flesh;' and, 14. his 'temptation which was in his flesh;' through which he preached to the Galatians at the first. If so, Saul must have converted the Galatians soon after his rapture, having gone from Cilicia into Galatia, through Lycaonia. This thorn in the flesh, or infirmity of the flesh, or temptation which was in his flesh, under which the apostle at the first preached to the Galatians, may have been some bodily distemper of the paralytic kind, which, by affecting his countenance and speech, made him, as he thought, unfit for public speaking; and therefore, fearing it might render his preaching unsuccessful, he prayed thrice in the most earnest manner to be delivered from it. But Jesus told him, 2 Cor. xii. 9. 'My grace is sufficient for thee, for my strength is made perfect in weakness.' By this answer, Saul was perfectly reconciled to his condition. Nay, he gloried in his infirmities, that the power of Christ might rest upon him.

Here, while we leave Saul in Cilicia, it will be proper to relate, that certain of the brethren, who fled from Jerusalem after the death of Stephen, Acts xi. 19. 'travelled as far as Phœnicie, and Cyprus, and Antioch, (No. VIII.), preaching the word to none but Jews only, 20. Also certain men of Cyprus and Cyrene, coming to Antioch, spake to the Hellenists; that is, (if the present reading be genuine), to the Jews born in foreign countries, who used the Greek language, 'preaching the Lord Jesus. 21. And the hand of the Lord was with them;' they wrought miracles, in proof of their doctrine concerning the Lord Jesus; 'And a great number believed, and turned to the Lord; the church of Christ at Antioch, which was originally gathered from among the natives of Judea, being greatly increased by the conversion of the Hellenist Jews. 22. 'When the tidings thereof came to the ears of the church which was at Jerusalem, they sent forth Barnabas, that he should go as far as Antioch.' This was James the Levite of Cyprus, to whom the name of Barnabas, the son of consolation, was given, on account of the relief which he afforded to the brethren, by selling his land, and dividing the price of it among them; and who, by the gifts of the Spirit which he possessed, was one of the superior prophets. 23. 'Who, when he came, and had seen the grace of God, was glad, and exhorted them all, that with purpose of heart they would cleave unto the Lord. 24. For he was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost, and of faith; and much people was added unto the Lord.' The increase of the church of Antioch, last mentioned, was owing, I suppose, to the conversion of the devout proselytes. For, as Barnabas came to Antioch after Peter had preached to Cornelius, it is reasonable to think, that if the gospel was not formerly preached to the proselytes of Antioch, Barnabas would without scruple preach to them now. Wherefore, finding the work too heavy for him singly, and wishing to have the assistance of an able fellow-labourer, he went into Cilicia in quest of Saul, and having found him, brought him to Antioch, A. D. 44, after he had been about five years in Cilicia, (No. IX.)

Barnabas and Saul being come to Antioch, Acts xi. 26. 'assembled themselves with the church a whole year, and taught much people. And the disciples were called Christians, (No. X.) first in Antioch,' perhaps about the time Barnabas and Saul came thither from Cilicia.—Ver. 27. 'And in those days came prophets from Jerusalem to Antioch. 28. And there stood up one of them, named Agabus,* and signified by the Spirit that there should be a great dearth throughout all the world; that is, throughout all the land of Judea, for the original word often denotes a particular land or country; 'which came to pass in the days of Claudius Cæsar.' This famine began in the fourth year of Claudius's reign, answering to A. D. 44.; but it raged chiefly in the 5th and 6th year of that emperor.—Acts xi. 29. 'Then the disciples, every man according to his ability, determined to send relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judea.' This determination was extremely proper: for the churches

* The Cæsarea to which the brethren now conducted Saul, was not the seaport of that name, (described chap. vi. initio), but Cæsarea Philippi. For he himself tells us, that after his leaving Jerusalem on this occasion, 'he came unto the region of Syria and Cilicia,' Gal. i. 21; which I think implies, that he did not go to Cilicia by sea, but travelled thither through the region of Syria.

* Before the clause above mentioned, the Cambridge MS. hath the following words: 'And while we were gathered together, one of them named Agabus,' &c. which reading, if genuine, implies that Luke the writer of the history was then present.

of Judea, being more exposed than other churches to persecution, and to the rapacity of the Roman officers, and to those outrages which the populace, under weak and corrupt governments, commit upon the objects of their hatred, the brethren in Judea could not have supported this dearth, if they had not been assisted from abroad. The church of Antioch, therefore, made collections for them, which they sent by the hands of Barnabas and Saul; not to the apostles, (for they had now given up the custody and management of the funds of the church in Jerusalem, Acts vi. 2.), but to the elders or rulers of that church, chosen perhaps out of the 120 on whom the Holy Ghost fell at the first. And these were to make distribution thereof to the brethren, according to their need. By sending this seasonable gift to the disciples in Judea, the church of Antioch, in which were many Gentile proselytes, did what they could to conciliate the good-will of the Jewish believers. And this mark of their regard seems to have been well received by the brethren in Judea.

After a short abode at Jerusalem, Barnabas and Saul returned to Antioch in the end of the year 44, or in the beginning of 45, and took with them John, whose surname was Mark, to assist them in the ministry there. This is he who is called 'Barnabas' sister's son,' Col. iv. 10.—Some time after this, as Barnabas and Saul, with the other prophets and teachers of the church at Antioch, Acts xiii. 2. 'ministered to the Lord and fasted, the Holy Ghost said,' with an articulate audible voice, 'Separate me both Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them.'—Saul at his conversion was expressly called to preach to the Gentiles; and that call was renewed at the time Jesus appeared to him during his trance in the temple. But at what time Barnabas was called by the Holy Ghost to preach to the Gentiles, is not told. However, the work here meant, being that of converting the idolatrous nations, and the present being their first separation thereto, it is more than probable that no idolaters were at that time converted. Wherefore, though the brethren of Antioch did not understand the nature of the work which Barnabas and Saul were now called to fulfil, yet, as they knew they were going into distant countries, they willingly agreed to be deprived of their useful labours. Accordingly, Acts xiii. 3. 'when they had fasted and prayed for a blessing on their undertaking, and laid their hands upon them,' after the manner of the Jews in their solemn prayers, (see Acts vi. 6.), 'they sent them away,' that is, gave them leave to depart: for they were sent forth, not by the church of Antioch, but by the Holy Ghost, as the historian observes, ver. 4.

However, lest the nature of this transaction should be mistaken, it is proper to observe, that by their separation of Barnabas and Saul, the church of Antioch did not confer upon them the apostolic office, (No. XI.), nor even authority to preach the gospel; far less did they communicate to them any spiritual gift, or miraculous power, to fit them for being apostles. All they did was simply this,—they agreed to send them away, and by prayer recommended them to the grace of God, Acts xiv. 26. xv. 40.

As the separation of Barnabas and Saul by the prophets of Antioch is recorded in the history after the death of Herod Agrippa, which happened A. D. 44, the order of the narration seems to imply, that Barnabas and Saul went among the Gentiles after that event. But how long after it, I cannot pretend to determine; perhaps they left Antioch in the year 45.

The hand of providence appeared visible, at this time, in the removal of Herod Agrippa by death. The emperor Claudius, in the second year of his reign, had given him the kingdom of his grandfather Herod the Great:

After which Agrippa lived mostly at Jerusalem, observed the Jewish institutions, and practised the purity which they required. Josephus tells us, Antiq. xix. 7. "He did not let a day pass, without worshipping God according to the law." Wherefore, being a zealous Jew, his principles led him to persecute the Christians. And as he possessed the supreme power in Judea, he was not under those restraints which tied up the hands of the chief priests while the Romans governed the country. Herod's zeal, therefore, or his policy, having free scope to operate, when he saw the Jews pleased with his putting the apostle James to death, he meant to proceed to farther cruelties, when God cut him off by a mortal disease after he had reigned three years, and thereby gave great relief to the Christian churches.

Upon Herod's death, the Romans reduced Judea a second time into the form of a province. But as they were not animated with any zeal for the institutions of Moses, they did not think themselves obliged to take part with the Jews against the Christians, but restrained their fury; so that, as the historian observes, Acts xii. 24. 'the word of the Lord grew and multiplied.' Cæsius Fadus was the first procurator in Judea after Agrippa's death. He came into the province in the end of A. D. 44, and governed it for the space of two years. Under his government, and that of his successor Tiberius Alexander, the famine happened which Agabus foretold. Tiberius Alexander was succeeded by Ventidius Cumanus; and after him came Antonius Claudius Felix, under whose procuratorship the tumult was raised against Paul in the temple, which ended in his imprisonment, first at Jerusalem, and after that at Cæsarea, where he was shut up two years complete.

CHAP. III.—Of the journey which Barnabas and Saul, by the direction of the Holy Ghost, made into the Lesser Asia, for the purpose of preaching to the idolatrous Gentiles.

Acts xiii. 4. 'So they, being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, departed (with John Mark as their minister) unto Seleucia, a seaport town on the Orentes, twelve miles below Antioch, and about five from the sea, and thence sailed into Cyprus,' the native country of Barnabas, (Acts iv. 36.), where the Jews and proselytes were very numerous—where also the gospel had been formerly preached to the Jews, by the brethren who had fled from the persecution which arose after Stephen's death, Acts xi. 19.

They land at Salamis in the island of Cyprus.

HAVING landed at Salamis, a considerable town in the eastern end of the island, Barnabas and Saul preached in the Jewish synagogues there.

But, before we proceed, it will be necessary to make a pause here, for the sake of explaining the order observed by Saul from this time forth in preaching the gospel. Our Lord, at the time he first sent forth his apostles to preach, having said to them, Matt. x. 5. 'Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not;' 6. But go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel; it was long before they thought themselves at liberty to preach to the Gentiles. And even after they knew the truth concerning this matter, they considered the above direction as an order to offer the gospel in every country and city to the Jews, if there were any in those parts, before they offered it to the Gentiles; Acts xiii. 46. Nor were they mistaken in putting this interpretation upon their Master's precept, who had fixed this order of preaching the gospel, for the following reasons:—

First, The Jews being the keepers of all the former revelations made to mankind by the true God, and these revelations being preparations for the introduction of the gospel, and containing clear predictions thereof, and of Jesus its author, it was necessary that it should be offered first to the Jews; because, if they received it as the completion of the former revelations, it would be no small argument to persuade the Gentiles of the divine original of the gospel. The truth is, the converted Jews, by their knowledge and belief of the former revelations, were well fitted to be zealous and effectual preachers of the gospel, not only among their own countrymen, but among the Gentiles also. Wherefore, it was fit that most of the first preachers of the gospel should be of that nation.

Secondly, The wide dispersion of the Jews among the Gentiles, by the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities, and their extreme passion for commerce, which led them to plant themselves in all the chief cities of the Gentiles, were not accidental events, but were brought about by the providence of God, to prepare the world for the reception of the gospel. Nor could any method more effectual have been devised for that purpose. Because the Jews having from the beginning possessed the knowledge of the only true God, the Maker and Governor of the world, they carried that knowledge with them into the Gentile countries where they resided, and imparted it to all around them who were willing to receive it. And having multiplied exceedingly in their dispersion at the time Saul went among the Gentiles to preach the gospel, he found in every country and city great numbers, not only of his own nation, (No. XII.), but of the Gentiles whom the Jews had turned from idols to worship the only true God. These enlightened Gentiles were called by the Jews Religious or worshipping proselytes,* because they assembled themselves with the Jews in their synagogues, and joined them in worshipping God, by such prayers and hymns as they addressed to him in the character of Maker and Governor of the world: also, because they joined them in hearing the writings of Moses and the prophets read in the Greek translation. These pious Gentiles, by their knowledge of the true God, and of the Jewish scriptures, were much better disposed to listen to the gospel, and better qualified to judge of the arguments by which the apostles proved Jesus to be the Christ, than their idolatrous brethren, who had no knowledge of God, nor of the revelations which God had formerly made to mankind. Nay, they heard the word of the Lord oftentimes with more attention than even the Jews themselves. Wherefore, as this class of men were so well disposed to receive the gospel, and as, after receiving it, they could communicate it to their idolatrous relations and friends, it was extremely proper that it should be preached to them, before it was offered to the others. And as they were nowhere to be found assembled in a body, except in the Jewish synagogues, that circumstance was an additional reason for preaching the gospel to the Jews in the synagogues, before it was offered to the idolatrous Gentiles.

Moved by these considerations, the apostle Paul seldem attempted to preach in any city of the Gentiles unless he found in it a synagogue of the Jews, where he might make the gospel known, not only to the Jews, but to the proselytes, before he offered it to the idolatrous Gentiles. Thus when Paul and Silas came to Amphipolis and Apollonia, they made no stay in either of these places, probably because there was no synagogue of the Jews there in which they could preach. But at Salamis in Cyprus, where Barnabas and Saul now were, the Jews being so numerous as to have several synagogues, they preached in them all, oftener I suppose than once; and as the whole island abounded with Jews, they did not go by sea to Paphos, the chief city of the island, but by land, for the sake of preaching to the Jews and proselytes in the towns through which they were to pass.

In their journey to Paphos, they no doubt met with many disciples. For we are told, Acts xi. 19. that some of the brethren, who fled from the persecution which arose after the death of Stephen, 'came into Cyprus, preaching the word to none but to the Jews only.'

From Salamis they go to Paphos, the residence of the Roman Governor of the Province.

BARNABAS and Saul having gone through Cyprus, came at length to Paphos, where was a famous temple of Venus, and a great confluence of priests and worshippers, who, by their extreme attachment to this false deity, occasioned her to be celebrated under the names of the Paphian and Cyprian Queen.

In Paphos (αδυναμους) the Roman proconsul of Cyprus, Sergius Paulus, (No. XIII.), resided with other principal persons, who had come from Rome to assist in the government of the province. This Roman magistrate, who was a person of good sense as well as of good dispositions, having heard of the arrival of the servants of Christ at Paphos, 'called for Barnabas and Saul,' whose fame it seems had reached Paphos before they came, 'and desired to hear the word of God,' that is, the new doctrine which these strangers were said to preach in the name of God.

But a Jew named Barjesus, a false prophet and a sorcerer, Acts xiii. 8. 'withstood them, seeking to turn away the proconsul from the faith.' Probably this impostor contradicted the account which Barnabas and Saul gave of Christ's miracles and resurrection, and by feigned miracles endeavoured to dissuade the proconsul from embracing the gospel. 9. 'Then Saul, who also is called Paul,' moved by an immediate inspiration of the Holy Ghost, looked steadfastly on that impostor; 10. 'And said, O full of all subtilty and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord? 11. And now behold the hand of the Lord is upon thee, and thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun for a season.' By saying that he should be blind for a season, Paul insinuated, that on the sorcerer's repentance his sight should be restored. 'And immediately there fell on him a mist, and a darkness, and he went about seeking some to lead him by the hand. 12. Then the proconsul, when he saw what was done, believed, being astonished at the doctrine of the Lord.' When he saw Elymas thus punished, he knew him to be an impostor, and believed the things spoken by Barnabas and Saul, being astonished at the power with which the doctrine of the Lord was accompanied.—The conversion of such a person, in so high a situation, and by such means, brought great credit to the gospel, and to its ministers, in that island.

The reader no doubt hath observed, that at this period of the history Luke hath changed Saul's name, calling him Paul, without assigning any reason for so doing

* It may be proper here to set before the reader, at one view, the various names given in the scripture history to those Gentiles whom the Jews had turned from idols to worship the true God.

αἱ ἁγία ἐκκλησία, II. 6.

προσκληνῶν, II. 10. Proselytes. This name was given likewise to those Gentiles who received circumcision, and who were Jews in every respect, except in their descent.

αἱ ἁγία ἰσραήλ, X. 2. 7.

φρόνιμοι τοῦ θέν, X. 2. xiii. 16. 26.

σέβονται.

σέβονται προσκληνῶν, xiii. 43. worshipping proselytes.

σέβονται Ἕλληνας, xvii. 4. worshipping Greeks.

σέβονται τοῦ θέν, xviii. 7.

προσερχόμενοι τῷ θέν, II. xi. 5. ad Deum accitentes. This is the name proselyte a little changed.

Learned men have conjectured, that this change was made by Saul himself, in honour of the proconsul, who perhaps was Saul's first convert from among the idolatrous Gentiles, or the first person of high rank of that character who was converted. For it was customary among the Romans to assume the name of a benefactor whom they highly esteemed. Thus the Jewish historian Josephus took the name of Flavius, in compliment to Vespasian, with whom he was in high favour. But in whatever manner it happened, certain it is, that ever after this the great apostle of the Gentiles was known only by the name of Paul. From this time forth likewise Paul is generally mentioned by the historian before Barnabas; because, by his success in preaching at Paphos, and by the greatness of his miracles, he was now shewn to be the principal person, although formerly he was mentioned after Barnabas, because he was a younger disciple, and because his apostolical authority was not fully understood.

They sail from Cyprus to Perga in Pamphylia, where John Mark deserts them.

AFTER these things, Acts xiii. 13. 'Paul and his company loosed from Paphos,' and sailing to the continent of the Lesser Asia, 'they came to Perga, a city in Pamphylia,' situated on the west side of the river Cestros, about seven miles from the sea. Here there was a celebrated temple of Diana; consequently many priests and others, whose interest and honour depended upon their maintaining the worship of that idol, and who no doubt were not a little displeased with these foreign teachers, for presuming to find fault with the gods of the country, and with the worship that was paid to them. On that occasion, John Mark, who had hitherto accompanied them as their minister, terrified perhaps by the threatening speeches of the priests and bigots, or discouraged by the difficulty and danger of the undertaking, 'departed from them, and returned to Jerusalem.' This desertion, however, did not discourage Paul and Barnabas; neither were they moved from their purpose, by the little success which they had at Perga; for, going away, they travelled through various countries of the Lesser Asia: and, as we shall see immediately, made many disciples to Christ, both among the Jews and the Gentiles.

Paul and Barnabas go to Antioch in Pisidia, where they convert great numbers, both of the proselyted and of the idolatrous Gentiles.

THE first city Paul and Barnabas came to, after they left Perga, was Antioch the metropolis of Pisidia, a country to the north of Pamphylia. Here they went into the synagogue of the Jews; and, after the reading of the law and the prophets, being desired by the rulers of the synagogue to give the people an exhortation, Paul preached to the Jews and proselytes a sermon, which is fully related by Luke, Acts xiii. 16—47, and which is highly worthy of the attention of Christians, being an example of Paul's manner of preaching in all the synagogues, and of the arguments which he used for convincing the Jews and proselytes, that Jesus was the Christ or Messiah foretold by David in the second Psalm. It is therefore an excellent illustration of the short account which Luke hath given of Paul's preaching in the synagogue of Thessalonica, Acts xvii. 2. 'Three Sabbath days he reasoned with them out of the scriptures, explaining and proving that the Christ must needs have suffered, and have risen from the dead, and that this Jesus whom I preach unto you is the Christ.' These were the topics on which Paul insisted in all his sermons to the Jews and proselytes. And the arguments taken from the scriptures by which he proved these topics to the Thessalonians, were no doubt such as he offered to the Jews and proselytes of Antioch, and which are related by Luke in this chapter.

Paul's discourse on this occasion was well received by those who heard it; for, Acts xiii. 42. 'When the Jews were gone out of the synagogue, the Gentiles (or religious proselytes) besought, that these things might be preached to them the next Sabbath. 43. And when the congregation was broken up, many of the Jews and religious proselytes believing, followed Paul and Barnabas; who, speaking to them, persuaded them to continue in the grace of God; that is, in the faith into which they were brought by the grace of God. 44. 'And next Sabbath day came almost the whole city together; the idolaters as well as the proselytes came together to the synagogue 'to hear the word of God. 45. But when the Jews (of the more bigoted sort) saw the multitude, they were filled with envy, and spake against those things which were spoken by Paul, contradicting and blaspheming: They contradicted Paul's doctrine concerning the sufferings and death of the Christ, and reviled the apostle, or rather Jesus, calling him an impostor, because he had not been able to deliver himself from death, though he pretended to be the Christ. Upon this Paul boldly told them, it was necessary to have spoken the word of God first to them; 'but seeing ye put it from you, and judge (αγορεύω, declare) yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, lo we turn to the Gentiles. 47. For so hath the Lord commanded us, saying' by the prophet, Isa. xli. 19. 'I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldst be for salvation unto the ends of the earth. 48. And when the Gentiles heard this,' when they heard that such things had been prophesied concerning them many ages ago, and that the Lord Jesus had commanded his apostles to receive them into his church, without subjecting them to the law of Moses, 'they were glad.' And well might they be so: For they now had the door of faith set wide open to them; and Antioch, where Paul first preached the gospel publicly to the idolatrous Gentiles, hath obtained a fame which will not soon perish.—'And glorified the word of the Lord.' The idolatrous Gentiles praised the gospel for its extensive charity, and yielded a full and ready assent to its doctrines. 49. 'And the word of the Lord was published throughout all that region.' It seems Paul and Barnabas, during their stay at Antioch, made excursions into the neighbouring country, for the sake of preaching to the idolatrous Gentiles. Or the people who came from the country to Antioch, hearing Paul and Barnabas preach, believed; and carried the glad tidings of salvation home with them.

From this time forth, in all the Gentile countries, Paul, after preaching to the Jews, constantly carried the tidings of salvation to the idolatrous Gentiles; and, by so doing, fulfilled the commission which he had received from Christ, when he made him his apostle to the Gentiles.

But the unbelieving Jews in Antioch, greatly enraged at the success with which Paul and Barnabas preached to the Gentiles, stirred up some ladies of the first distinction, who were religious proselytes, over whom they had great influence, Acts xiii. 50. 'and the chief men of the city also,' who probably were the husbands of these proselyte ladies, 'and raised persecution against Paul and Barnabas, and expelled them out of their coasts,' and out of the territory belonging to Antioch; because they had made frequent excursions into the country, and had persuaded many. But although the Christian preachers were thus persecuted, 'the disciples in Antioch were filled with joy, and with the Holy Ghost,' having received the Spirit in the plenitude of his gifts, either by an immediate illapse from heaven, or by the imposition of the apostle's hands. This, with other instances mentioned in the history, Acts ii. 38. viii. 14—17. and 1 Cor. chap. xii. and xiv. and Gal. iii. 5. gives reason to believe, that in all places where churches were planted, the disciples received the gifts of the Spirit in great abundance, to qualify them, not only for edifying each other, but for converting unbelievers also.

Being driven out of Pisidia by the machinations of the unbelieving Jews, they go to Iconium in Lycaonia, where they convert many; but are in danger of being stoned.

PAUL and Barnabas, thus banished from Antioch, came to Iconium, at that time the chief city of Lycaonia, and at present a considerable town still subsisting under the name of Cogni. Here, Acts xiv. 1. 'They went both together into the synagogue of the Jews, and so spake, that a great multitude both of the Jews and also of the Greeks believed.' The great multitude of the Greeks who are said to have believed the gospel on this occasion, being found in the synagogue with the Jews, were without doubt religious proselytes; for few or none of the idolaters frequented the Jewish synagogues. From the Jews and proselytes being so numerous in Iconium, we may infer that it was a very great and populous city, and that the servants of Christ, with great propriety, made a long abode there, to aid the disciples under the persecution which the unbelieving Jews raised against them. 2. Now 'the unbelieving Jews stirred up the Gentiles, and made their minds evil affected against the brethren. 3. Long time therefore abode they, speaking boldly in the Lord, who gave testimony unto the word of his grace, and granted signs and wonders to be done by their hands.' Because the idolatrous Gentiles in Iconium shewed a disposition to listen to truth, the servants of Christ were directed to work many and great miracles among them, for the confirmation of the gospel. The truth is, had it not been for their miracles, Paul and Barnabas might have preached long enough without making many converts, either among the Jews or the Gentiles, in any country. 4. 'And the multitude of the city was divided. And part held with the Jews, and part with the apostles. 5. And when there was an assault made, both of the Gentiles and also of the Jews with their rulers, to use them despitefully, and to stone them' as atheists; 6. 'They were ware of it, and fled unto Lystra and Derbe, cities of Lycaonia, and unto the region that lieth round about.' They fled to Lystra first, and then to Derbe, and after that into the region that lieth around Lycaonia, viz. the region of Phrygia and Galatia; for these countries bordered on Lycaonia. In thus flying from their persecutors, Paul and Barnabas followed their Master's advice, who directed them, when persecuted in one city, to flee into another: For though he enabled them to work miracles for the confirmation of the gospel, he gave them no power of working miracles to save themselves from persecution. 7. Καὶ οὕτως ἀπαρτίζονται, 'And there they were preaching the gospel.' They spent a considerable time in the cities of Lycaonia, and in the region that lieth round about, preaching the gospel.—To this general account of the apostle's labours, the historian subjoins a particular relation of some memorable events which happened in Lystra.

From Iconium Paul and Barnabas go to Lystra, where Paul works a miracle on a cripple, and is considered as a god; but is afterwards stoned, and drawn out of the city as dead.

THE first city Paul and Barnabas came to, after flying from Iconium, was Lystra. Here they converted a Jewish woman, named Lois, and her daughter named Eunice, (2 Tim. i. 5.), and Eunice's son Timothy. For when Paul came to Lystra, in his second journey, the brethren there recommended Timothy to him, as a disciple who, though very young, had made himself remarkable by his knowledge and piety.

Paul at Lystra, Acts xiv. 8. happening to preach in some place of public resort, a man who had been born lame, and never had walked, sat there, and heard him with great attention. On this man, ver. 9. 'Paul looked steadfastly,' and, by the gift of discerning spirits which he possessed, 'perceiving that he had faith to be healed, 10. Said with a loud voice, Stand upright upon thy feet; and he leaped and walked. 11. And when the people saw what Paul had done, they lift up their voice, saying, in the speech of Lycaonia, The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men. 12. And called Barnabas Jupiter, and Paul Mercurius, because he was the chief speaker.' Wherefore, in the persuasion that they were gods, the priests of Jupiter, the tutelary deity of the city, whose statue stood without the gate, 'brought oxen and garlands to the gate' of the house where the servants of Christ lodged, 'and would have done sacrifice to them with the people. 14. Which when Barnabas and Paul heard, they rent their clothes' in token of their deep grief for what the Lystrians were about to do, 'and ran in among the people, crying out,' with the greatest vehemence, 15. 'And saying, Sirs, why do ye these things?' We are men like yourselves, who have come to persuade you to forsake these false deities and to worship 'the living God, who made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein. 16. Who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways,' without instructing them by divinely inspired teachers. 17. 'Nevertheless, he left not himself without witness' of his being, perfections, and providence, in any country; 'in that he did good to all men, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness. 18. And with these sayings scarce restrained they the people.' This remarkable humility, amidst so high a gust of popular applause, plainly shewed these men to be the servants of God.—But mark the fickleness of the multitude: 19. 'There came thither certain Jews from Antioch and Iconium, who,' by representing Paul and Barnabas as two wicked magicians, who were come to overturn every thing sacred both among the Jews and the Gentiles, 'persuaded the people, and having stoned Paul, drew him out of the city, supposing he had been dead. 20. Howbeit, as the disciples stood round him, he rose up, (perfectly whole), and came into the city.' Probably Timothy was one of the disciples who stood round Paul on this occasion; for he says to him, 2 Epist. iii. 10. 'But thou hast fully known,—11. The persecutions, sufferings, such as befell me in Antioch, in Iconium, and Lystra: such persecutions I endured; but out of them all the Lord delivered me.'

Thus, in his turn, did Paul suffer the very punishment which he had been so active in bringing upon the blessed martyr Stephen. And doubtless the recollection of that affair helped very much to reconcile him to what had now befallen him.

They go to Derbe, and into the region round about Lycaonia; then return to Lystra, Iconium, Antioch, and Perga: after which they sail from Atalia to Antioch in Syria.

ACTS xiv. 20. 'And the next day he departed with Barnabas to Derbe;' which city, therefore, was not far off. 21. 'And when they had preached the gospel to that city, and had taught many,' namely, in the region of Galatia and Phrygia lying round about Lycaonia, (ver. 6.), and founded the churches of Colosse, Laodicea, and Hierapolis, mentioned Col. iv. 13. 'they returned again to Lystra, and to Iconium, and Antioch,' being directed so to do by the Spirit. In these cities they spent some considerable time; 22. 'Confirming the souls of the disciples, and exhorting them to continue in the faith, and that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God. 23. And when they had ordained them elders,' that is, bishops, and presidents, and deacons, 'in every church, and (at their ordination) had solemnly prayed with fasting, they commended them to the protection and direction of the Lord, on whom they had believed.' This custom of ordaining elders in the churches which he planted, Paul invariably observed, in order that the brethren being united together, under the direction of stated teachers and leaders, might the better make increase of themselves in love, and sustain persecution for the gospel.

Paul and Barnabas having thus, on their return from Phrygia and Galatia, visited all the cities of Lycaonia and Pisidia where they had formerly planted churches, came at length to Perga in Pamphylia, where they spent some time 'in preaching the word,' ver. 25.; probably because they had remained there but a short space formerly. And having thus revisited all those cities, and given to the churches there their due form, they came down to Atalia, a seaport town below Perga; 26. 'And thence sailed to Antioch in Syria, from whence they had been recommended to the grace of God, for the work which they had fulfilled. 27. And when they were come, and had gathered the church together, they rehearsed all that God had done by them.' This expression is used likewise Acts xv. 4.; but it is explained, ver. 12. of the miracles and wonders which God had wrought among the Gentiles by them; of which wonders the chief no doubt was, that God by the apostles had communicated the Holy Ghost to the Gentile converts, and thereby declared his acceptance of them without circumcision: 'And how he had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles:' by which, I suppose, is to be understood the proselyted Gentiles. See Preface to Galatians, sect. 4.—Acts xiv. 28. 'And they abode long time with the disciples' in Antioch.

CHAP. IV.—The History of Paul, from his going up to the Council of Jerusalem with Barnabas and Titus, to his passing into Europe with Silas to preach the Gospel.

WHILE Paul and Barnabas abode at Antioch, after their return from the Lesser Asia, Acts xv. 1. 'Certain men which came down from Judea taught the brethren, and said, Except ye be circumcised after the manner of Moses,' that is, except ye keep the law of Moses, (see ver. 5. and Gal. v. 3.), 'ye cannot be saved.' This doctrine being an error both in religion and in politics, Paul and Barnabas strenuously opposed it; first, because its direct tendency was to subvert the gospel, which of itself is sufficient for the salvation of men without the works of the law of Moses; and next, because it was a betraying of the natural rights of mankind, who by the gospel are left free, both to obey the good laws of the countries where they live, and to enjoy whatever rights accrue to them from those laws: Whereas, by receiving the law of Moses, the Gentiles really made themselves the subjects of a foreign power. For that law was nothing but the civil or political law of Judea: and all who received it actually put themselves under the jurisdiction of the high-priest and council at Jerusalem. (No. II.)—When, therefore, Paul and Barnabas had no small dissension and disputation with them, they determined that Paul and Barnabas, and certain others of them, should go up to Jerusalem unto the apostles (No. XIV.) and elders about this question.'

From Gal. ii. 2. it appears, that Paul went up to Jerusalem at this time by a particular revelation, wherein it was made known, either to him, or to some of the prophets of Antioch, mentioned Acts xiii. 2. that the decision of the apostles, whose authority was supreme in the church, and of the elders at Jerusalem, who had all received the Holy Ghost on the memorable day of Pentecost, was the proper method of ending the controversy about the admission of the Gentiles into the church. This revelation being communicated to the brethren of Antioch, they willingly agreed to follow the direction of the Spirit; especially as the Jewish zealots pretended that the apostles and elders at Jerusalem had commanded the Gentiles to be circumcised, Acts xv. 24.

Among those who accompanied Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem at this time was Titus, (Gal. ii. 1.), who, being a Gentile, had an interest in the determination of the question. Him, probably, Paul had converted in the Lesser Asia; and being a person of great piety and ability, he had taken him as his assistant, in the room of John Mark, at Perga, and had brought him to Antioch.—Acts xv. 3. 'They, therefore, being sent forth by the church, passed through Phoenicia and Samaria, declaring the conversion of the Gentiles. And they caused great joy to all the brethren.'

Paul and Barnabas go up to the Council of Jerusalem: by whose decree the proselyted Gentiles were freed from observing the Law of Moses as a term of salvation.

Acts xv. 4. 'And when they were come to Jerusalem, they were received of the church, and of the apostles and elders,' who all shewed them every mark of respect. 'And they declared all things which God had done by them.' They declared how that God, by their ministry, had converted the Gentiles in many countries, and had bestowed upon them the Holy Ghost in the plenitude of his gifts.—5. But that at Antioch 'there rose up certain of the sect of the Pharisees who believed, affirming that it was necessary to circumcise them, and command them to keep the law of Moses;' and that the brethren of Antioch had sent them to lay the matter before the apostles. 6. 'And the apostles and elders came together to consider of this matter.' As the apostles commonly resided at Jerusalem, the greatest part of them may have come together on this occasion; as did the elders likewise, men most respectable for their talents and gifts, having been chosen to the office of elders out of those on whom the Holy Ghost descended on the day of Pentecost. The brethren, too, of the church of Jerusalem, were present in this assembly. For the decree which was passed on the question runs in the name of the whole church. (No. XV.)—Acts xv. 7. 'And when there had been much disputing, occasioned by those of the sect of the Pharisees who maintained the necessity of circumcision, 'Peter rose up,' and put the assembly in mind, how he had been ordered of God to preach the gospel to Cornelius, and the other Gentiles who were with him; and how 'God, who knoweth the hearts of men, bare them witness' that he accepted them without circumcision, 'having given them the Holy Ghost, even as to the Jews. 9. And put no difference' between them and the Jews, 'purifying their hearts,' not by the rites and ceremonies of the law, but 'by faith. 10. Now therefore,' said he, 'why tempt ye God to put a yoke upon the necks of the disciples, which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear?' Why provoke ye God, by making circumcision necessary to the salvation of the Gentiles, contrary to his declared will in this matter, and contrary to your own conviction? 11. 'For we (who were apostles) believe, that through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and not through obedience to the law of Moses, 'we (Jews) shall be saved, even as they' (the Gentiles) are to be saved, through the grace of Christ alone.

When Peter had ended his speech, Acts xv. 12. 'All the multitude kept silence, and gave audience to Barnabas and Paul, declaring what miracles and wonders God had wrought among the Gentiles by them.' They listened to Barnabas and Paul, who confirmed Peter's reasoning, by declaring the miracles which God had wrought among the Gentiles by their ministry; of which the chief miracle was, that he had amply conferred the gifts of the Spirit upon the believing Gentiles, although they were uncircumcised. Acts xv. 13. 'And after they had held their peace, James answered' those who were for subjecting the Gentiles to the law, by adding in supplement to Peter's reasoning, that the prophets had foretold the conversion of the Gentiles; so that it was always God's purpose to make them his people. And, therefore, he proposed 'not to trouble them which from among the Gentiles are turned to God; 20. But that we write unto them to abstain from the pollution of idols,' &c. To this opinion the whole assembly agreed; and among the rest the apostle John. For that he also was present appears from Gal. ii. 8. although Luke has not mentioned him in the history; I suppose, because John made no long speech on the question, but simply acquiesced in what was so well and so fully spoken by Peter and James.

That this decision might have the more weight, Acts xv. 22. 'It pleased the apostles and elders, with the whole church, to send chosen men of their own company to Antioch, with Paul and Barnabas; namely, Judas, surnamed Barsabas, and Silas, chief men among the brethren.' Their decision, or decree, they wrote in the form of a letter from the apostles, and elders, and brethren, 23. 'unto the brethren which are of the Gentiles, in Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia,' of the following tenor: 24. 'For as much as we have heard, that certain which went out from us (that is, pretending to be sent by us) have troubled you with words,' by requiring you to be circumcised, and to keep the law, we assure you we gave them no such commandment. And we now inform you, that, 25. 'It hath seemed good unto us, being assembled with one accord, to send chosen men unto you, with our beloved Barnabas and Paul,' whom we greatly respect, as, 26. 'men who have hazarded their lives for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. 27. We have sent, therefore, Judas and Silas, who will tell you the same things by mouth.' This precaution of sending approved witnesses along with the copy of the decree which was delivered to Barnabas and Paul, was intended to prevent the zealous and bigoted Judaizers from affirming that the letter did not contain a just account of what was concluded and determined by the church. For these chosen men, having assisted at the council, could not only tell the brethren of Antioch the same things by mouth, but attest that it was the unanimous opinion of the whole assembly, viz. 28. 'That it seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and consequently to us, to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things.' The council, from the falling down of the Holy Ghost upon Cornelius and his company, though they were not circumcised, and from his falling down upon the Gentiles who were converted by Paul and Barnabas, although they also were uncircumcised, concluded with certainty, that it seemed good to the Holy Ghost to lay no greater burden on the Gentiles than the necessary precepts of the law, to which they were already bound; and therefore it seemed good to the apostles likewise, to lay no greater burden on the Gentiles than these necessary things, 29. 'That ye abstain from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication, (ἐκ τῶν θυσιῶν αἱμάτων, ver-bat.), from which keeping yourselves, (namely, as ye now do, Hammond), ye shall do well. Fare ye well.'

At this time Paul had various conversations with his brethren apostles in Jerusalem, before he returned to Antioch. But these conferences, the chief of them, added nothing either to his knowledge or to his gifts, Gal. ii. 6. Paul's knowledge in the gospel was equal to theirs; and his miraculous powers and gifts were as great and extensive as theirs. Wherefore, 'when James, Peter, and John, perceived the grace given to him,' that is, the inspiration and miraculous powers which he possessed, and had duly weighed what Jesus said to him at his conversion, they were fully convinced he was an apostle equal in authority with themselves. And therefore they publicly acknowledged him to be such, by giving him the right hands of fellowship; and agreed that he should go to the Gentiles, and exercise his ministry among them, even as they resolved to exercise their ministry among the Jews. By this, however, they did not mean to exclude Paul from preaching to the Jews, or themselves from preaching to the Gentiles, as occasion might offer, but that the general course of their labours should be according to this agreement: For, as apostles, they were all teachers oecumenical, being sent by Christ to preach the gospel to all nations, Matt. xxviii. 19.

In some of the conferences which Paul had with the apostles in Jerusalem, he communicated to them the gospel which he preached among the Gentiles. But he tells us, Gal. ii. 2. he did it privately, and to them only which were of reputation, lest by the opposition which he knew the more zealous Jewish believers would make to it, he might seem to have run in vain. This circumstance deserves to be particularly remarked, because it shows that the conversion of the idolatrous Gentiles was not known in Jerusalem at the time of the council; and, by consequence, that the question which was debated and determined in that meeting was moved concerning the proselyted Gentiles, and had no relation to the idolatrous Gentiles at all. See Preface to Gal. sect. 4.

Paul and Barnabas, with the messengers from the church of Jerusalem, having received the letter in which the decree was written, were sent away: Acts xv. 30. 'So when they were dismissed they came to Antioch; and when they had gathered the multitude together they delivered the epistle. 31. Which when they had read, they rejoiced for the consolation.' As the church of Antioch consisted chiefly of converted proselytes, the multitude of that church was glad that the Gentile converts in general were freed from circumcision and obedience to the law of Moses. And their joy was in proportion to the anxiety and suspense with which they had waited for the apostles' determination. 32. 'And Judas and Silas, being prophets also themselves, exhorted the brethren with many words, and confirmed them' in the belief of their freedom from the law of Moses as a term of salvation. 33. 'And after they had tarried at Antioch a space, they were let go in peace from the brethren to the apostles: The brethren of Jerusalem who had come to Antioch with the decree, ver. 25. were dismissed by the brethren of Antioch to the apostles in Jerusalem, with the good wishes usual among affectionate friends at parting.—These brethren who were let go in peace, were Judas, and Silas; see ver. 27. 34. 'Notwithstanding, it pleased Silas to abide there still. 35. Paul also and Barnabas continued in Antioch, teaching and preaching the word of God, with many others also.'

Not long after this Peter came down from Jerusalem to Antioch to visit the church. At his first coming he did eat with certain brethren of the Gentiles, from whom he afterwards separated himself, upon the arrival of some zealous Jewish believers sent from James. These men, it seems, insisted that the Gentiles with whom Peter had eaten, abould, in order to their enjoying full communion with the faithful, be subjected to the law of Moses; or at least to the four precepts bound by the council upon the converted proselytes. Wherefore these Gentiles must have been a class of believers different from the converted proselytes, about whom there could be no dispute now, as their case had been clearly determined by the council. I therefore think these Gentiles were converts from idolatry, who had come from distant parts; or, if they were natives of Antioch, Paul had preached to them, and converted them, since his return from the council: For, from the secrecy with which he communicated the conversion of the idolatrous Gentiles to them of reputation in Jerusalem, it may be concluded that he had not then preached to any of the idolatrous Gentiles in Antioch.

But, whatever may be in this conjecture, certain it is, that the disputes about eating with the Gentiles were carried so high in Antioch at this time, that a number of the brethren who knew the truth, and who were of note in the church, dissembled in the matter, as well as Peter; and the torrent became at length so strong, that even Barnabas himself was carried away with their dissimulation, Gal. ii. 13. Wherefore, when teachers of the greatest authority and reputation in the church, seemed thus to agree in making obedience to the law of Moses necessary to the salvation of the idolatrous Gentiles, Paul found himself under the necessity of standing forth in defence of the truth. And though he was single and unsupported, he opposed the dissemblers in the boldest and most direct manner, and rebuked even Peter himself, in the presence of all who had been misled by his example, for compelling in that manner the Gentiles to be circumcised, contrary to the truth of the gospel, with which he was well acquainted. And Peter, being conscious of his fault, meekly bore Paul's reproof, without making any reply. Thus a stop was put for the present to the attempts of the Judaizers; and Paul, who on that occasion acted as an apostle, equal in authority with Peter, but who shewed more sincerity and courage in maintaining the truth, certainly merited the grateful acknowledgments of all the Gentile converts, who by his faithfulness were secured in the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free.

Such a glaring example of bigotry in many of the Jewish believers, and of timid compliance with their prejudices in some of the chief brethren, having made Paul sensible that the Gentiles in distant countries were in the greatest danger of being perverted by the Jews, his zeal for the purity of the gospel led him to consider by what means the Gentiles might be confirmed in the truth. And as no expedient offered itself more proper for the purpose, than to make the Gentiles universally acquainted with the decrees which were ordained by the apostles, elders, and brethren in Jerusalem, he proposed the matter to Barnabas, saying, Acts xv. 36. 'Let us go again and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the word of the Lord, and see how they do.' On that occasion, Barnabas proposed to take his nephew Mark with them as their minister. But Paul thought him an improper assistant, who in their former journey had shewn such cowardice, or fickleness, as to desert them in Pamphylia. And the contention between them was so sharp that they separated. But though the strife between these good men proceeded from passion, in one of them at least it was made the occasion of the more extensive spreading of the gospel. For Barnabas sailed with Mark into Cyprus, to visit the churches which he and Paul had planted there in their former journey: But Paul, choosing Silas, who was himself a prophet and a chief man among the brethren, departed; after being recommended by the church of Antioch, as before, to the grace of God, Acts xv. 40.

Paul and Silas go into Syria and Cilicia to confirm the Churches, by publishing the Decrees of the Council.

HAVING left Antioch, Paul and Silas, Acts xv. 41. 'went through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches,' by delivering the decrees of the council, which were directed to them in particular, (ver. 21.): so that churches had been planted, not only in Syria but in Cilicia, before the council.—Of the planting of the churches in Syria, Luke has given some account; but of the planting of the churches in Cilicia nothing is said, except that the brethren in Jerusalem sent forth Saul to Tarsus. From which it may be gathered, that he was the spiritual father of the believers in Cilicia, and therefore that his visit to the churches in that country, with the decrees, must have been peculiarly acceptable to them.

Paul and Silas go to Derbe and Lystra in Lycaonia, to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles a second time, and to publish the Decrees. At Lystra Paul takes Timothy as his Assistant.

FROM Cilicia, Paul and Silas went into Lycaonia: and being come to Lystra, Acts xvi. 1. the brethren there, and at Iconium, recommended Timothy to Paul as a young disciple of singular piety and zeal. Him the apostle took as an assistant in the ministry, by the direction of the Holy Ghost, (1 Tim. i. 18.), and conferred on him the gifts of the Spirit, (2 Tim. i. 6.), and had him solemnly set apart to the work of the ministry, by the presbytery or eldership of Lystra, (1 Tim. iv. 14.); for, in his former journey, he and Barnabas had ordained elders in every city. Withal, designing to employ Timothy in preaching to the Jews, he circumcised him; because he knew the Jews would not have respected him as a teacher, if they had taken him for an uncircumcised Gentile.—This is that Timothy, whose teachableness and tears made such an impression on the apostle's mind that he never forgot them, (2 Tim. i. 4.), and who attended Paul in many of his journeys, and who, in respect of his love to Christ and zeal for the advancement of the gospel, was like minded with Paul, (Philip. ii. 20.), so that he was his genuine son; and as a son serveth with his father, so he served with the apostle in the gospel. On all which accounts, he was of such consideration among the disciples, and also so exceedingly esteemed by Paul for his knowledge and piety, that he allowed him to join him in some of those epistles which he wrote to the churches. Withal, he honoured Timothy greatly, by writing to him the two excellent letters found in the canon of scripture, which bear his name.

In Lycaonia they visited most of the cities where they had formerly preached, Acts xvi. 4. And as they went through the cities, they delivered them the decrees for to keep, that were ordained of the apostles and elders which were at Jerusalem.' For although these decrees were written in the form of a letter to the brethren of the Gentiles, in Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia, they belonged equally to all the brethren of the Gentiles everywhere. 5. 'And so were the churches established in the faith, and increased in number daily.' For the burdensome yoke of the law of Moses being now broken, a great obstacle to the conversion of the Gentiles was removed.

Paul, and Silas, and Timothy, go through Phrygia and Galatia, publishing the decrees of the Council. They are hindered by the Holy Ghost from going into Bithynia, and come down to Troas.

Acts xvi. 6. 'And passing through Phrygia, and the Galatian country,' (No. XVII.), they established the churches there in the true faith of the gospel, by delivering to them, in like manner, the decrees for to keep. But they made no stay in any place. So the original word, παρέρχεται, passing through, imports. Nor was it necessary for them to do otherwise. Their business was not to plant churches in these countries, but to confirm those which were already planted, by delivering to them copies of the apostolical decrees.

Paul and his company having gone through Phrygia and (Γαλατῶν χώρας) the Galatian country, were forbidden by the Holy Ghost to preach in the province of Asia; and therefore, when they were come to Mysia, Acts xvi. 7. 'and assayed to go into Bithynia,' a country bounded on the west by a part of the Propontis and the Thracian Bosphorus, and on the north by the Euxine Sea, 'the Spirit suffered them not;' and so, passing by the Lesser Mysia, which separated Bithynia from the country of Troas, they came to the city Troas, a noted seaport, where travellers from the upper coasts of Asia commonly took ship to pass into Europe. Here Paul and his assistants were joined by Luke, (ver. 10.), the writer of the history of the Acts of the Apostles, and a native of Antioch, as is generally believed, who to the profession of a physician had joined that of a Christian minister, or evangelist.

At Troas Paul and his assistants are called to preach the Gospel in Macedonia, by a vision which appeared to Paul in the night-time.

At Troas, Acts xvi. 9. 'Paul had a vision in the night. There stood a man of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us.' Of this vision Paul gave an account to his companions, who from it gathering assuredly that the Lord had called them to preach in Macedonia, they willingly obeyed the heavenly admonition, loosed from Troas and went straight to Samothrace, an island in these seas, famous for being the seat of certain religious mysteries, in equal estimation with those called Eleusinian. But it does not appear that they went ashore there; for they landed the next day at Neapolis, a seaport town of Macedonia.

Thus Paul, having preached first at Damascus, next at Jerusalem, after that throughout all the coasts of Judea, and then to the Gentiles in Syria and Cilicia, and most of the countries of the Lesser Asia, went at length, by the particular commandment of Christ, among the Greek nations, to whom it was proper that the glad tidings of salvation should now be given. For seeing the gospel was a revelation from the true God, and was supported by great and undeniable miracles, it was fit that it should in due course be proposed to those nations who were best qualified to judge of its nature and evidences: because if, upon an accurate examination, great numbers of men embraced the gospel, whose minds were improved by science, and every kind of culture, their conversion would render it indubitable, in after-times, that the gospel was supported by those great and undeniable miracles, which the Christian records affirm were performed in every country by the preachers of the gospel.—Besides, God, in his infinite wisdom, was determined that the reigning idolatry should be utterly overthrown, in those countries of Europe where it had the greatest support from the ability and learning of its abettors; that no person might suspect or affirm, in after-times, that idolatry was destroyed, and Christianity established, merely through the ignorance and simplicity of the people among whom it was first preached.

CHAP. V.—Paul's History, from his Arrival in Europe till his return to Jerusalem, after having preached the Gospel in Macedonia and Greece.

PAUL with his three assistants, Silas, Timothy, and Luke, having, by the direction of the Spirit, passed into Europe to preach to the Greek nations, they made no stay at Neapolis, where they first landed, but went straight to Philippi; because it was the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and a Roman colony, and had a synagogue of the Jews.

Paul and his Assistants, having come to Philippi, convert Lydia; dispossess a damsel who had a spirit of divination; are beaten with rods and imprisoned; but are liberated, and go to Thessalonica.

THE ancient boundary of Macedonia was the river Strymon. But Philip, the father of Alexander, having conquered Thrace, added that part of it which lay between the rivers Nessus and Strymon to Macedonia. And observing that one of the cities of the adjoined country named Dathos, might be made a good defence against the Thracians, he fortified it, and named it Philippi, in honour of himself. Lucian, in his dialogue called The Fugitives, introduces Hercules describing Philippi in the following manner: "The plain, which is very fertile, raises itself into little hills, which serve for a defence to the city Philippi, whose walls are washed by the river Hebrus."—From coins still remaining, mentioned by Pierce in the Synopsis prefixed to his Paraphrase and Notes on the Philippians, it appears, that a colony of Romans was planted by Julius Cæsar at Philippi; and that it was afterwards augmented by Augustus, who sent Anthony's adherents to this and other cities of Macedonia: so that, having received inhabitants from Italy twice, Philippi of a small town became a great city, and enjoyed all the privileges of a Roman colony. Wherefore, Luke speaks with great propriety when he thus describes Paul's journey to Philippi, Acts xvi. 12. 'And from thence to Philippi, which is the chief city of that part of Macedonia, (No. XVIII.), and a colony.'

Ver. 13. 'And on the Sabbath-day we went out of the city by a river's side, (No. XIX.), where a place for prayer was by law allowed.' In this place for prayer the Jews and their proselytes were wont to assemble. 'And we sat down, and spake to the women which resorted thither;' among whom there was one, 14. 'Lydia, a seller of purple, of the city of Thyatira, who worshipped God.' This woman was a devout Gentile, a native of Thyatira, who had fixed her residence in Philippi for the sake of commerce; 'whose heart the Lord opened, that she attended unto the things which were spoken of Paul.' She was so strongly affected with the things which Paul spake, that she embraced them with an entire faith. 15. 'And when she was baptized, and her house, she besought us, saying, If ye have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, come into my house, and abide; and she constrained us.' Lydia being a rich merchant, who had a large house and servants, she was able to lodge them all. And being penetrated with a just sense of her obligation to those messengers of God, for the knowledge of salvation which they had imparted to her, she would take no refusal. So they abode in her house all the time they continued at Philippi. Encouraged by this favourable beginning, Paul and his company continued at Philippi many days, (var. 12. 18.) during which they laid the foundations of a numerous church, gathered both from among the Jews and the Gentiles; and which, after the apostle's departure, increased so exceedingly, that, at the time he wrote his epistle to the Philippians, they had more bishops than one, and many deacons, Philip. i. 1.

While Paul and his assistants abode at Philippi, they were often accosted by a damsel who was possessed with an evil spirit, by which she divined, and brought her masters much gain through soothsaying; that is, by pretending, with the assistance of a familiar spirit, to discover stolen goods, and to point out the concealed authors of mischiefs, and to disclose the general good or ill fortune of the persons who applied to her, and their success in particular affairs, with other secrets, for which the rabble in all countries are willing to give money. This damsel, Acts xvi. 17. 'following Paul and us, (Luke, Silas, and Timothy), cried, saying, (ironically), These men are the servants of the most high God, who declare unto us the way of salvation. 18. And this she did many days. But Paul being vexed, turned and said to the Spirit, I command thee, in the name of Jesus Christ, to come out of her. And he came out that same hour. 19. And when her masters saw that the hope of their gain was gone, they caught Paul and Silas; Timothy and Luke, it seems, were not so obnoxious to them; and drew them into the market-place, unto the rulers,' (αρχοντες, the inferior magistrates), and brought them to the prætors, (πρεσβυτεροι), who were the chief magistrates of the Roman colony, saying, These men, being Jews, do exceedingly trouble our city; 21. And teach customs which are not lawful for us to receive, neither to observe, being Romans.' Knowing them to be Jews, they calumniated them as attempting to introduce the rites of Judaism at Philippi, particularly baptism. Perhaps also they alluded to something said by the apostle relating to the kingship of Christ, concerning which we know he preached afterwards at Thessalonica, Acts xvii. 7. These accusations so wrought on the multitude, and upon the prætors, that the multitude rose up against Paul and Silas; and the prætors tore their clothes from around them, and commanded them to be beaten with rods; and having laid on them many stripes, thrust them into the inner prison, and put them in the stocks, that they might be kept the more securely.

These multiplied injuries the servants of God bore with great joy: for, in the middle of the night, they prayed and sang praises to God with such elevation of spirit and voice, as raised the admiration of their fellow-prisoners, who heard them distinctly. 26. 'And suddenly there was a great earthquake, so that the foundations of the prison were shaken, and immediately all the doors of the prison were opened, and every man's bonds were loosed.' On this the jailer, who dwelt in a part of the prison not far from the ward where Paul and Silas lay, awakening out of sleep, and seeing the prison-doors open, drew his sword, and would have killed himself, to avoid a more severe punishment, supposing that all the prisoners had escaped. 28. But Paul cried out with a loud voice, Do thyself no harm, for we are all here.' The jailer, greatly terrified by the earthquake, and astonished at Paul's discovering his purpose to kill himself, called for a light, sprang into the inner prison, 'and came trembling, and fell down before Paul and Silas,' begging them to forgive the injuries he had been obliged to do them: For he was now convinced they were what the possessed damsel called them in derision, even the servants of the most high God, who shewed to men the way of salvation. He therefore, Acts xvi. 30. 'brought them out of the inner prison, and said, Sirs, what must I do to be saved? 31. And they said, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house.' For Paul having preached a considerable time at Philippi, the jailer, before this, must have heard of Jesus Christ, perhaps oftener than once. The jailer's family being also come into the outer prison, 32. 'They spake unto him the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house:' that is, Paul shortly expounded to them the character of Jesus as Lord, and gave them a brief account of his life, doctrine, miracles, death, resurrection, and ascension; all which Silas confirmed by his testimony; and his discourse on these subjects was so powerfully convincing, that the jailer was baptized, 'he, and all his straightway. 34. And when he had brought them into his house, he set meat before them, and rejoiced' in the knowledge which he had obtained of the way of salvation; 'having believed in God with all his house,' who, it seems, were equally impressed with Paul's sermon as the jailer himself was.

Such were the transactions of this memorable night. But the earthquake having been felt all over the city, and the miraculous opening of the prison-doors having been told to the prætors, they changed their opinion of Paul and Silas, and began to think more favourably of their cause. Wherefore, 35. 'when it was day, the prætors sent the sergeants, (καταχρηται, the rod-bearers, or lictors), saying to the jailer, Let these men go.' But Paul replied, The prætors 'have beaten us openly, and uncondemned, who are Romans, and have cast us into prison: and now they thrust us out privily,' without making us any reparation for the injury they have done us: 'Nay, verily, but let them come themselves and fetch us out;' and by their dismissing us openly, let them shew the people that they imprisoned us unjustly—When the prætors heard that they were Romans, they were afraid of being called to account for having beaten them uncondemned. 39. 'And they came and besought them' not to resent the injury that had been done them; 'and, bringing them out, desired them to depart out of the city.' The servants of Christ, by this public release, being honourably cleared from every crime, left the prison quietly, and went to the house of Lydia, where they met with the disciples, and comforted them by rehearsing what had happened, and by giving them suitable exhortations; then departed, leaving Luke at Philippi. (No. XX.)

Of all the churches planted by Paul, this at Philippi seems to have loved and respected him the most. The sufferings he had undergone in their city, for the sake of giving them the knowledge of the gospel, more precious than gold, greatly endeared him to them; and the rather, that they seem to have put a just value on moral and religious truth, and to have had a great share of good dispositions, which were much strengthened and improved by the gospel; so that they discovered more of the true spirit of Christianity than any other church. For while the apostle was at Thessalonica, the Philippians sent him money twice, that, by making the gospel without expense to the Thessalonians, they might give the more heed to the things which Paul spake, when they found him a teacher of a different character from the Greek philosophers, who taught only for hire. They likewise sent him money during his first imprisonment at Rome, that he might want nothing necessary for him. In short, the injurious treatment which Paul and Silas met with in this first city of Europe where they preached, was abundantly compensated by the readiness of mind with which many of its inhabitants received the gospel; and by the excellent disposition which they shewed after their conversion; and by the great love which they all along expressed toward their spiritual father.

Paul with his Assistants go to Thessalonica. In the Synagogue, Paul proves from the Jewish Scriptures, That it behoved the Christ to be put to death, and to rise from the dead. Many idolaters are converted. The Jews assault the house of Jason, whom they carry, with other Brethren, before the Rulers. Paul goes by night to Berea.

THE apostle having thus successfully planted the gospel in Philippi, departed with his assistants, Silas and Timothy, and passing first through Amphipolis, a city built in an island formed by two branches of the river Strymon, and a colony of the Athenians, and then through Apollonia, they came to Thessalonica, where was a synagogue of the Jews. This seems to imply, that the Jews had no synagogues in Amphipolis and Apollonia; for which reason the apostle made no stay in either of these places, but went straight to Thessalonica, now the metropolis of all the countries comprehended in the Roman province of Macedonia. For it was the residence both of the proconsul and quaestor; so that, being the seat of government, it was constantly filled with strangers, who attended the courts of judicature, or who solicited offices. And as most of the Greeks, about this time, were extremely addicted to philosophy and the polite arts, so great a city as Thessalonica could not be destitute of men of learning, who were well qualified to judge of the gospel and of its evidences. Moreover, the situation of Thessalonica, at the bottom of the Thermaic Gulf, rendering it fit for commerce, many of its inhabitants were merchants, who carried on an extensive trade with foreign countries; and who, as the apostle observes, published in these distant countries the conversion of the Thessalonians, and the miracles by which they had been converted: 1 Thess. i. 9. The Jews likewise resorted to this city in such numbers as to form a numerous synagogue: so that in every respect Thessalonica was a proper theatre whereon to display the light of the gospel.—By the advantage of its situation, this city still subsists a place of great resort and trade, under the name of Salonichi. But it is in the possession of the Turks.

Acts xvii. 1. 'Now, when they had passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia, they came to Thessalonica, where was a synagogue of the Jews. 2. And Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, and three sabbath days reasoned with them out of the scriptures: 'The subject of Paul's sermons in the synagogue of Thessalonica, as in all the synagogues of the Jews, was this, 3. ἀναγνόντων καὶ διακρινόμενος, 'He fully explained and proved that it behoved the Christ to suffer death, and to be raised from the dead; and that this Jesus whom I preach unto you is the Christ.'—If any reader wishes to know more particularly the manner of the apostle's reasoning with the Jews, and the proofs which he brought from their own scriptures in support of the facts which he affirmed, he will find an excellent example thereof in the sermon which Paul preached in the synagogue of Antioch in Pisidia, which is related at large Acts xiii. 16—41.

But notwithstanding Paul's arguments were all taken out of the scriptures, his discourse in the synagogue of Thessalonica did not make such an impression on the Jews as might have been expected; for only a few of them believed. However, of the religious proselytes a great multitude were converted; among whom were many women of the first distinction in the city: Acts xvii. 4. 'And some of them believed, and consorted with Paul and Silas, and of the devout Greeks, (that is of the proselytes), a great multitude, and of the chief women not a few.' This is Luke's account of the success of the gospel at Thessalonica. But from Paul himself we learn, that multitudes of the idolaters also believed; being greatly struck with the miracles which he wrought, and with the miraculous gifts which he conferred on the believers. For in his first epistle to the Thessalonians, as if their church had been chiefly composed of converts from idolatry, he says, chap. i. 9. 'They themselves, the unbelieving Thessalonians, publish in foreign countries concerning us, 'what sort of entrance we had to you, and how ye turned to God from idols, to serve the living and true God.' We may therefore suppose, that when Paul found the Jews averse to his doctrine, he left the synagogue, and preached to the idolatrous Gentiles; with whom he had great success, not only on account of his miracles, but on account of his disinterestedness: For neither he nor any of his assistants, all the time they were in Thessalonica, took the least reward, either in money or goods, from their disciples, but wrought with their hands; and by the profits of their labour maintained themselves, without being burdensome to any person, 1 Thess. ii. 9. None of the Thessalonians, therefore, could suspect, that Paul and his assistants had come to make gain of them, by converting them to the Christian faith.

The great success which Paul had at Thessalonica, in converting the idolatrous Gentiles, raised the indignation and envy of the unbelieving Jews to such a pitch, that they hired (τοὺς ἀρχαίους τῆς ἀρχῆς πορεύς) certain dissolute fellows who frequented the market-place. These, Acts xvii. 5. 'gathered a company, and set all the people in an uproar, and brake into the house of Jason, (with whom the apostle and his assistants lodged), and sought to bring them out to the people,' probably with an intention to put them to death in the tumult. 6. 'And when they found them not, they drew Jason and certain brethren unto the rulers of the city, crying, These that have turned the world upside down (with their new doctrine) are come hither also:—7. Whom Jason hath received; and these all do contrary to the decrees of Cæsar, saying that there is another king, one Jesus:' alluding, I suppose, to Paul's doctrine concerning the lordship or universal dominion of Jesus, which they pretended was inconsistent with the universal lordship of Cæsar; and the rather, that some time before this it had been decreed at Rome, that no person within the bounds of the empire should assume the title of king without the emperor's permission. In uttering this calumny against the Christian preachers, that they were setting up Jesus as a king in opposition to the emperor, the Jews imitated their brethren in Judea, who, to enrage Pilate against Jesus, accused him of calling himself the King of the Jews. In both instances these malicious men, out of spite to Jesus, renounced the then most sacred article of their national faith; for in Judea the chief priests publicly disclaimed all expectation of the coming of their king Messiah, by crying, 'We have no king but Cæsar.' In like manner at Thessalonica, the Jews, enraged against Paul for affirming that Jesus was the Christ, accused him of setting up another king different from Cæsar, and urged their accusation with such clamour and bitterness, Acts xvii. 8. 'that they troubled the people, and (τὸν στρατὸν) the rulers of the city, when they heard these things.' But when the rulers understood that the King of whom Paul spake was no king on earth, neither claimed any temporal dominion, 9. 'they took security of Jason and of the others,' that they would behave as good subjects, 'and let them go.'—This liberal conduct of the rulers of Thessalonica restrained the malice of the Jews for that time; but the brethren, fearing some new tumult might arise, thought it prudent, 10. 'to send Paul and Silas,' and I suppose Timothy also, (ver. 15.), 'away by night to Berea,' a populous city in the neighbourhood.

Luke has not told us what time Paul and his assistants spent at Thessalonica. But there are circumstances mentioned in the apostle's epistles, from which we may infer that they spent some months in planting the church there; such as, that during his abode at Thessalonica he received money twice from the Philippians, (Phil. iv. 15.), and communicated the spiritual gifts to the brethren in plenty, (1 Thess. v. 19.), and appointed προβυμους, presidents, or rulers, stately to exercise the ministry among them, (1 Thess. v. 12.) having formed them into a regular church: all which implies, that he abode a considerable time in this city.

In Berea, Paul and his Assistants preach the Gospel to the Jews with great success; but the unbelieving Jews come from Thessalonica, and stir up the people against them. Paul goes to Athens.

ON their arrival in Berea, Paul and Silas, notwithstanding the evil treatment they had experienced in Thessalonica, went into the synagogue and preached Christ: Acts xvii. 11. 'These Jews were more noble (they were of a more excellent disposition) than those in Thessalonica, in that they received the word with all readiness of mind, and searched the scriptures daily, whether these things were so; namely, the things which Paul preached concerning the sufferings and resurrection of the Christ, using great candour and impartiality in the search. 13. 'Therefore many of them believed; also of the honourable women which were Greeks, (that is, proselytes, for so the word is commonly used by Luke), and of the men not a few.' Thus a numerous church was gathered in Berea likewise, consisting both of the Jews and of the Gentiles; but especially of the Gentiles. For many of the Grecian ladies had Jewish slaves, by whom they were taught to worship the true God, and to frequent the synagogue, where they heard Paul preach, and were converted; and after their conversion were instrumental in persuading their husbands to hear the gospel; so that many of them likewise believed.

While the apostle was thus successfully preaching the gospel at Berea, he often recollected with grief, that he had been obliged to leave Thessalonica before the brethren there were fully instructed; that, being new converts, they were ill fitted to sustain persecution and affliction for the word; and that his enemies might impute his flight either to want of affection for his disciples or to cowardice. For they might allege, that he was afraid to appear before the rulers and men of learning in Thessalonica, being conscious that he was not able in their presence to defend the doctrines which he had preached. These considerations made such an impression on Paul's mind, that, once and again, while in Berea, he had resolved to return to Thessalonica, to strengthen the disciples, and to defend the gospel; but Satan hindered him, by filling the hearts of the unbelieving Jews of Thessalonica (1 Thess. ii. 18.) with such malice against the gospel, that when they heard of its great success in Berea, they came thither, Acts vii. 12. 'and stirred up the people,' the idolatrous multitude, against Paul, whom no doubt they represented as an enemy of their gods; wherefore the brethren, 'anxious for his safety, had him privately conducted to Athens. But Silas and Timothy, being less obnoxious to the Jews, remained at Berea still. Nevertheless, when the brethren who accompanied Paul to Athens departed, he sent an order by them, 15. 'to Timothy and Silas, to come to him with all speed;' because he did not choose, I suppose, to preach at Athens without the aid of his fellow labourers in the ministry, who were now in Thessalonica, 1 Thess. iii. 1, 2.

At Athens Paul disputes daily in the Synagogue with the Jews, and in the Market-place with the Epicurean and Stoic Philosophers. They carry him to the Areopagus, where, in a most elegant oration, he shews the Arcopagites the absurdity of the common idolatry; but with little success. He goes to Corinth.

ATHENS, having now passed the zenith of her political splendour, was declining ever since the Romans, after conquering Greece, fixed the seat of their government at Corinth. Nevertheless its fame for learning was still as great as ever; for at the time Paul visited Athens, that city was full of philosophers, rhetoricians, orators, painters, statues, and of young persons who came to learn philosophy and the arts. But this sort of people, being generally very idle, were great talkers, and had an insatiable curiosity; so that the character which Luke has given of the Athenians and strangers there, is perfectly just: Acts xvii. 21. 'All the Athenians, and strangers who were there, spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell or hear some new thing.'—Further, Pausanias says, 'There were more images in Athens than in all Greece besides; and that they worshipped the gods more than all Greece. Well, therefore, might Paul tell the Areopagites, that 'he perceived they were in all things (παντασιν) very religious.'

The apostle, it would seem, had resolved not to preach in Athens till Timothy and Silas arrived. Yet when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry, he could no longer forbear. Acts xvii. 16. 'Now when Paul waited for them at Athens, his spirit was stirred in him, (he felt great grief and indignation), when he saw a city, (in which learning and arts were carried to greater perfection than anywhere else) καταβαλον, full of idols.' Wherefore, as there was a synagogue of Jews in Athens, he went into it first, as his manner was, 17. 'and disputed with the Jews and with the devout persons,' or religious proselytes; for to them the gospel was to be offered before it was preached to the Gentiles.

While Paul was thus employed, Timothy came from Berea to Athens, and informed him that the idolatrous Thessalonians, displeased to see so many of their countrymen deserting the temples and altars of their gods, had joined the Jews in persecuting the disciples, 1 Thess. ii. 14. On hearing this, Paul thought it good to be left at Athens alone, (1 Thess. iii. 1.), and sent Timothy to Thessalonica, to establish and comfort the brethren concerning their faith.

After Timothy's departure, Paul, Acts xvii. 17. 'disputed in the market daily, with them that met with him. 18. Then certain of the Epicureans and Stoics encountered him; and some said, What will this babbler say! other some, He seemeth to be a setter forth of strange gods; because he preached to them Jesus, and the resurrection (of all mankind by Jesus). 19. And they took him, and brought him unto Areopagus,' the court at Athens which judged of all matters pertaining to religion, and particularly the introduction of new gods; 'saying, May we know what this new doctrine whereof thou speakest is! 20. For thou bringest certain strange things to our ears: we would know, therefore, what these things mean.' This course the Athenians took with Paul, not from the love of truth, but as the historian observes, ver. 21. from mere curiosity; as the event afterwards proved.—The apostle being thus called to declare the new doctrine whereof he spake, to an assembly consisting of senators, philosophers, rhetoricians, and statesmen, willingly embraced the opportunity; and in a most eloquent discourse, prepared his illustrious auditors for receiving that doctrine which appeared to them so strange, by shewing them the absurdity of the commonly received idolatry, and by speaking on that delicate subject, with an address and temper, and strength of reasoning, which would have done honour to the greatest orators of Greece or Rome.

His discourse to the Areopagites Paul introduced with a handsome compliment to the Athenians in general. He told them, that he perceived they were extremely religious; for, lest any God should be neglected by them, he found they had erected an altar to the unknown God; and from this he inferred, that it would not be unacceptable, if he should declare to them that God whom they ignorantly worshipped. Acts xvii. 22. 'Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in all things ye are (θεολατρῶν) very religious. 23. For as I passed by and beheld (ὁρῶμενα) the objects of your worship, I found an altar with this inscription, To the unknown God. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you.' (No. XXI.)—The true God, whom the apostle affirms the Athenians ignorantly worshipped, and the worship that is acceptable to him, he declared in the following manner;—24. 'God, who made the world, and all things therein, seeing he is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in temples made with hands.' God hath no need of temples to dwell in, seeing he hath made the world, and is the Lord or possessor of the universe. Ye therefore greatly err in thinking, that by erecting magnificent temples and images, and by consecrating them, ye draw God down into them, and prevail with him to reside among you in such a manner as to be present nowhere else. That vulgar notion is unworthy of men whose minds are improved by science, and who, from God's having made the world, ought to know that his presence is not confined to temples made by men. 25.

Neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed any thing.' Neither is the true God worshipped with sacrifices and meats prepared by men's hands, if these things are offered to him, as though he needed to be fed with the fruits of the earth, and with the flesh of beasts, and refreshed with the steams of sacrifices and incense. The truth is, 'seeing he giveth to all,' whether men or beasts, 'life, and breath, and all things,' it is evident that men can contribute nothing to his life or happiness. 26. 'And hath made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on the face of the whole earth.' By the liberal provision which he hath made, everywhere, of the necessities of life, he hath from one man and woman multiplied the human race, so as to form those different nations which cover the face of the whole earth. How then can ye fancy that he himself needs to be lodged, and clothed, and fed by men? 'And hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation; also he hath assigned to each of these nations their times of existence, and the particular countries they were to inhabit, according as he had before appointed these things. By all which he shows, that he governs the world by a most wise providence, contrary to what you Epicureans teach; and also that his government is most free, contrary to the doctrine of the Stoics. This most wise and free government of the nations of men, God carries on through all ages, for this purpose, 27. 'that they should be led to seek the Lord, if haply they might feel after and find him; (καὶ τοῦτο) and truly indeed he is not far from any one of us.' Though he be not the object of men's senses, it is no difficult matter to find God; because he is not far from any one of us. 28. For the structure of our body, and the union of our soul to that exquisite piece of material mechanism, together with the noble faculties of our soul wherein we resemble God, and the admirable end for which this wonderful composition of soul and body is formed, affords to every man, not only an idea, but a proof, of the divinity residing within him, supporting and animating him: so that it may truly be said, 'In him we live, and move, and have our being, as one of your own poets (Aratus) hath said.'—Who also hath added another sentiment, equally just and striking: That we are his offspring, in respect of the reason, and intelligence, and other mental powers similar to his, which we possess. 29. 'Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto (that is, can be represented by) an image of gold, or silver, or stone, however curiously graven by art and man's device;' because such things conveying no idea of mind, if they are likenesses of God, they represent him to be mere matter void of intelligence, than which nothing can be more impious.

The apostle having, in this manner, shewn the philosophers of Athens the gross absurdity of their idolatrous worship, concluded his oration with telling them, Acts xvii. 30. that 'the times of this ignorance God winked at.' He allowed mankind to go on in their ignorance, without instructing them by messengers divinely commissioned; because he meant to show them experimentally the insufficiency of their own reason in matters of religion. But now, by messengers divinely authorized, 'he commandeth all men everywhere to repent' of their ignorance, idolatry, and wickedness. And to persuade them effectually to do so, he hath set before them the greatest of all motives, that of a future judgment. 31. 'Because he hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness, by the man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead.' The resurrection of Jesus from the dead hath put the resurrection and judgment of all men, repeatedly declared by Jesus, beyond a doubt. 32. 'But when they heard of the resurrection, some,' namely the Epicureans, 'mocked, and others (more candid) said, We will hear thee again of this matter.' And having said this, they put an end to the apostle's discourse and to the assembly, without allowing him an opportunity of shewing how the resurrection of Jesus renders the resurrection and judgment of mankind probable, or of explaining the other fundamental doctrines of the gospel. 33. 'And so Paul departed from among them,' astonished, no doubt, that men who professed wisdom were so little able to discern truth. 34. 'Howbeit some clave unto him and believed, among the which was Dionysius the Areopagite,' one of his judges, 'and a woman (of some note) named Damaris, and others with them:' who it seems were the only persons Paul met with in this famous mart of learning, capable of seeing and acknowledging the absurdity of the prevailing idolatry.

It is not said that Paul wrought any miracles at Athens; and the little success with which he preached, gives reason to suspect that he wrought no miracles there. Perhaps in this he acted by divine direction, to try what reception the gospel would meet with from learned and inquisitive men, when offered to them merely upon the footing of its own reasonableness. The truth is, if such an experiment was anywhere to be made, in order to confute those, in after-times, who should affirm that the general reception of the gospel in the first age was owing not to miracles, but to the absurdities of heathenism, and to the reasonableness of the gospel doctrine, Athens surely was the place where the trial could be made with most advantage, and Paul's oration in the Areopagus was the discourse which should have convinced reasonable men. Nevertheless, at Athens, where the human faculties were carried to the greatest perfection, the apostle was not able to convince his hearers of the folly of idolatry, nor of the reasonableness of worshipping the only living and true God, by purity of mind and goodness of life. And therefore the gospel, which taught these sublime truths, was rejected by the philosophers as unfit for the common people, and they remained as much attached to their errors as before.

After having so unsuccessfully preached to the philosophers and others in Athens, the apostle judged it needless any longer to attempt, by natural means, the conversion of such a vain, unprincipled, frivolous people. And being allowed to use no other means, he left them as incorrigible, and went forward to Corinth, now become more considerable for the number, the learning, and the wealth of its inhabitants, than even Athens itself.

At Corinth Paul preaches in the synagogue. Timothy and Silas come to him from Thessalonica. He testifies to the Jews that Jesus is the Christ. He teaches in the house of Justus. Christ appears to him in a vision. He writes his First Epistle to the Thessalonians. Then goes into Peloponnesus. At his return to Corinth, he writes his Second to the Thessalonians. The Jews bring him before Gallio, who drives them from the judgment-seat with disgrace. He goes, with Aquila and Priscilla, by sea to Ephesus. Then sails to Syria.

CORINTH was situated on an isthmus, or narrow neck of land, which joined Peloponnesus to Greece. On the east side of the isthmus were the ports of Cenchrea and Schœnus, which received the merchandises of Asia by the Saronic Gulph; and on the west side, the port of Lechæum received the merchandises of Italy, Gaul, and Spain, by the Crissæan Gulph. Corinth, being thus conveniently situated for commerce, soon became extremely rich and populous; and being situated on the isthmus which joined Peloponnesus to Greece, it commanded both countries. In the course of the Achaean war, the Roman consul Mummius burnt it to the ground; but Julius Cæsar rebuilt it after it had long lain in ashes. See Pref. to 1 Cor. sect. 2.—When Achaia was made a Roman province, Corinth, becoming the seat of government, soon regained its ancient celebrity in respect of commerce and riches, but especially in respect of the number and quality of its inhabitants. For, at the time the apostle arrived, Corinth was full of learned men, some of whom taught philosophy, rhetoric, poetry, and painting; others studied these sciences and arts; in so much that there was no city in Greece, where philosophy, and the fine arts, and learning, were carried to greater perfection than at Corinth; no city in which there were more men of a cultivated understanding. These circumstances rendered Corinth a fit scene on which to display the light of the gospel; because if it proved successful among a people so enlightened as the Corinthians, it would be a proof to after-ages of the reality of the miracles by which, as the Christian records affirm, the gospel was established in every country. It is true, but a few of the philosophers and men of learning at Corinth embraced the gospel. Nevertheless, if the apostle's miracles had been impostures, the philosophers and other learned men, being well qualified to judge of such matters, would have detected them, and by so doing, have stopped the progress of the gospel in their city. These were the reasons which induced Paul to spend more than eighteen months in preaching at Corinth, from the time of his first arrival to his departure.

The character of the Corinthians being such as I have described, it is natural to suppose, that they would expect both learning and eloquence in any person who pretended to instruct them. The apostle, well apprized of this, addressed them at the first with great fear and trembling, as he tells us himself, 1 Cor. ii. 3. in so much that Christ found it necessary to encourage him by a vision, in which he commanded him not to be afraid, but to speak boldly, promising that many of the Corinthians should believe the gospel.

Paul, at his first coming to Corinth, Acts xviii. 2. 'found a certain Jew named Aquila, born in Pontus, lately come from Italy with his wife Priscilla, because that Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome. (No. XXII.)—3. And because he was of the same craft, he abode with them and wrought; for by their occupation they were tent-makers.' In his youth, Paul, as was observed above, had been bred to that business. And it was of great use to him on many occasions, particularly at this time; for by the profits of his labour he maintained himself all the while he abode in Corinth, without burdening the Corinthians in the least. The same course he had followed some time before this, while he preached in Thessalonica. 1 Thess. ii. 9. 'Ye remember, brethren, our labour and toil. For night and day we wrought (for our own maintenance), in order not to overload any of you, when we preached to you the gospel of God.' And afterwards at Ephesus and I suppose in many other places, he supported not only himself, but his assistants also, by the profits of his labour, as appears from what he said to the elders of Ephesus, Acts xx. 34. 'Ye yourselves know, that these hands have ministered unto my necessity, and to them that were with me. 35. I have shewed you all things, how that so labouring ye ought to support the weak, and to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than to receive.' Wherefore, not to speak of the apostle's miracles, his disinterestedness in coming all the way from Judea to communicate to the Greeks the knowledge of the true God, and of the way of salvation by Christ, must have made a strong impression on those who were candid; especially when they considered, that their own philosophers communicated none of their knowledge without receiving a hire for so doing.

The Jews being very numerous in Corinth, Paul, according to his custom, began his ministry in the synagogue. Acts xviii. 4. 'And he reasoned in the synagogue every sabbath-day, and persuaded the Jews and the Greeks,' (Εἰσάμαρ), the devout Gentiles; for such only frequented the Jewish synagogue. His first converts at Corinth were Epenetus, and the household of Stephanas, whom he calls 'the first-fruits of Achaia.' But whether they were Jews or Gentiles is hard to say; only this we know, that his sermons had little influence in converting many of the Jews.

About this time Timothy, after establishing the brethren of Thessalonica in their faith, to whom he had been sent from Athens, left that city to join Paul at Corinth. In his way, calling upon Silas, who was at Berea, they travelled together to Corinth, where they found the apostle, and gave him the agreeable news, that the Thessalonian brethren stood firm in the faith, bore the persecution of the unbelievers with exemplary fortitude, and entertained a grateful remembrance of their spiritual father, 1 Thess. iii. 6. These tidings filled the apostle with joy, and encouraged him to deal more plainly with the Jews at Corinth than he had hitherto done. Acts xviii. 5. 'And when Silas and Timothy were come from Macedonia, Paul was pressed in spirit, and testified to the Jews that Jesus was the Christ,' founding his testimony upon arguments brought from the scriptures, and upon the miracles which he wrought in confirmation of his doctrine, and upon the spiritual gifts which he conferred upon those who believed. 6. 'And when they opposed themselves (to this doctrine), and blasphemed' Jesus, by affirming that he was not the Christ, but an impostor, 'he shook his raiment, and said unto them, Your blood be upon your own heads; I am clean:' (agreeably to God's declaration, Ezek. xxxiii. 8, 9.): 'from henceforth I will go to the Gentiles.' I will no longer attempt to convert persons who contemptuously put away the word of God from them, but I will preach the gospel to the idolatrous Gentiles in this city. 7. 'And he departed thence, and entered into a certain man's house named Justus, one that worshipped God, whose house joined hard to the synagogue.' Paul chose to preach in the house of this religious proselyte, because, being near to the synagogue, such of the Jews as were of a teachable disposition had thereby an opportunity of hearing him preach. Accordingly, while he preached in the house of Justus, 8. 'Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, believed in the Lord, with all his house; and many of the Corinthians, (the idolatrous inhabitants of the city), hearing him, believed and were baptized,' by Silas and Timothy, I suppose; for the apostle affirms, that he baptized none of the Corinthians but Crispus and Caius, and the household of Stephanas.—Acts xviii. 9. 'Then spake the Lord to Paul by night in a vision. Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace. 10. For I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee:' speak frequently and boldly; 'for I have much people in this city:' I have in this city many who are disposed to hear the gospel, and who on hearing it will believe.—The apostle, thus encouraged by his Master, 11. 'continued a year and six months teaching the word of God among them.'

Timothy, in the account which he gave of the Thessalonian brethren, had told the apostle, 'That the persecution against them raged more than ever; being carried on by the idolatrous Gentiles, as well as by the Jews: That while the rulers and the multitude used force in destroying the church, the philosophers and the men of learning endeavoured to overthrow the gospel itself by arguments: That the Thessalonian brethren nevertheless had stood firm against every shock; and that they had a great desire to see the apostle, their spiritual father, to be comforted by him in their distress. These tidings made St. Paul wish exceedingly to return to Thessalonica; but the importance of the work in which he was engaged at Corinth, and the success with which he was carrying it on, rendered it improper for him to depart. However, he supplied the want of his presence, in some measure, by writing to the Thessalonians his first epistle, wherein he furnished them with a demonstration of the divine original of the gospel, to enable them to answer such of the Grecian sophists as attacked their faith with arguments. In that epistle also he comforted those who mourned the loss of their dead relations, by foretelling Christ's return from heaven to raise the dead, and carry his faithful servants to the abodes of the blessed.—This by many is reckoned the first of all Paul's apostolical writings; and we may hold it to be so, unless we think his epistle to the Galatians was written from Antioch, a few months after the Council of Jerusalem.

The year^a and six months which Paul is said to have spent, ver. 11. 'in teaching the word of God among them,' is not to be understood of the Corinthians alone, but of the inhabitants of Achaia also. For it is reasonable to suppose, that the apostle occasionally left Corinth, and went into the country of Peloponnesus, where there were many synagogues of the Jews, especially in the chief cities; and having preached to the Jews and Gentiles in these cities, he returned again to Corinth. To this supposition we are directed by Paul himself; for he insinuates that he preached in the region of Achaia, 2 Cor. xi. 10. And the inscription of his second epistle to the Corinthians shews that he had made many converts in that country. For it runs thus: 'To the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the saints which are in all Achaia.' Accordingly, his return to Corinth from Peloponnesus, or some other part of Achaia, is considered by him as his second coming to Corinth. For he tells them, 2 Cor. xii. 14. xiii. 1. that he was then coming to them the third time; although, in the history of the Acts, there is no mention of his being at Corinth more than once before he wrote his second epistle to the church in that city.

It seems, when the letter to the Thessalonians was publicly read, some who were not acquainted with the apostle's manner of writing inferred, from certain expressions in that letter, that the day of judgment was at hand. Impostors also came to Thessalonica, pretending to bring from Paul himself the same doctrine. This error occasioning great confusion among the Thessalonian brethren, with a total neglect of their worldly affairs, tidings thereof were brought to the apostle at Corinth after his return from the region of Achaia. Wherefore he wrote his second epistle to the Thessalonians, to assure them that the day of judgment was not at hand; for that day was not to come till there was a falling away first, and the man of sin was revealed, whose coming he there describes.

Paul's great success at Corinth and in Peloponnesus provoked the Jews to the highest pitch of rage, when they found he led his converts to despise the institutions of Moses, by assuring them that they might be justified and saved through faith in Christ, without the use of these institutions. Wherefore, in the year that Gallio, the elder brother of Seneca the philosopher, Acts xviii. 12. was proconsul of Achaia, that is, about the end of A. D. 52, (being the 12th of Claudius, see No. VII.), 'the Jews made insurrection with one accord against Paul, and brought him before the judgment-seat; (all the Jews in Corinth joined in this assault); 13. Saying, This fellow persuadeth men to worship God contrary to the law.' It seems Paul had taught that the law of Moses being now abrogated, men were no longer to worship God with sacrifices and washings, and other bodily services, but in spirit and in truth. And this manner of worship being deemed contrary to the law of Moses, the unbelieving Jews, in a tumultuous manner, brought Paul, the promoter of it, before the proconsul, in order to have him punished as one who, in prescribing a worship contrary to the law of Moses, had acted contrary to the laws of the empire, which tolerated the Jews in the exercise of their religion. 14. 'But when Paul was now about to open his mouth,' Gallio, sensible of the futility of the charge, would not allow him to make any reply; but himself said to the Jews, 'If it were a matter of wrong or wicked lewdness; if ye accused this man of any injury done to particular persons, or of wantonly disturbing the peace of society; O ye Jews, reason would that I should bear with you. 15. But if it be a question (συνεστυ) of a doctrine, and of names, and of your law; If your accusation respect opinions taught by Paul which ye think heretical; and whether the names of the Christ and the Son of God which he hath given to any one ought to be given to that person; and whether all who worship the God of the Jews are bound to worship him according to the rites of your law, 'look ye to it:' These are matters which belong to yourselves, and with which as a magistrate I have no concern; therefore I will be no judge of such matters.' It seems Gallio knew that Paul had persuaded some of the idolatrous Corinthians to receive his opinions; but he wisely declined determining, by any judicial sentence, what were their obligations in consequence of that alteration of their faith. At the same time, it is plain he was not offended with Paul for having turned many of the Corinthians from idols to serve the true God. He knew the Jews had attempted to do the same thing in various parts of the empire, though not with equal success. 16. 'And he drave them from the judgment-seat.' 17. Then, after the court was ended, all the Greeks, displeased with the Jews for their turbulent persecuting spirit, 'took Sothenes the ruler of the synagogue,' who I suppose had succeeded Crispus, and who was the ringleader in this insurrection, although afterward, following the example of Crispus, he also believed, 'and beat him (with their fists) before the judgment-seat,' while Gallio looked on, without hindering them: 'Gallio cared for none of those things;' being pleased with the indignity done by the Greeks to the chief magistrates of the Jews, whose malicious disposition he detested.

In this manner Christ, according to his promise, ver. 10. protected Paul against the rage of the Jews. The rulers likewise shewed no unfriendly disposition towards the disciples. And therefore Paul abode yet a good while at Corinth after the insurrection.*—Acts xviii. 18. 'And then took his leave of the brethren and sailed into Syria, and with him Priscilla and Aquila, having shorn his head in Cenchrea, for he had a vow.' (No. XIII.) They took ship at Cenchrea, the eastern port of Corinth, where Paul shaved his head, and thereby put a period to the duration of a vow which he had made, perhaps on occasion of the great deliverance he had obtained when the Jews made insurrection against him. But the ship in which they sailed having occasion to touch at Ephesus, Aquila and Priscilla remained there. 19. 'But he himself entered into the synagogue, and reasoned with the Jews,' upon whom his discourse made such an impression, that, ver. 20. 'they desired him to tarry longer time with them.' However, as his vow made it necessary that he should offer the appointed sacrifices in Jerusalem at the ensuing feast, which according to the general opinion was the passover, 'he consented not; 21. But bade them farewell, saying, I must by all means keep this feast that cometh, in Jerusalem.' In the mean time, perceiving there was a probability of preaching the gospel with success, both to the Jews and Gentiles in Ephesus, he promised to return: 'I will return again to you, if God will; and he sailed from Ephesus.'

In this voyage the apostle met with no obstruction. We may therefore believe, that he landed at Cæsarea in such good time as to keep the feast in Jerusalem according to his resolution, and complete his vow. Acts xviii. 22. 'And when he had landed at Cæsarea.' &c.

CHAP. VI.—Paul's History, from his landing at Cæsarea to his going to Jerusalem with the Collections for the Saints.

As we shall have occasion, in the course of the narration, to mention Cæsarea more than once, where Paul now landed after finishing his voyage from Ephesus, it will be proper to give some account of a city, which in those days was so celebrated.—Anciently people who came to Jerusalem by sea landed at Joppa. But the harbour being inconvenient, Herod the Great built one more commodious at Straton's-tower, a town situated not far from Joppa, on an open bay. This harbour he made by running a strong mole in the sea. He likewise enlarged and beautified the city with many edifices, both public and private; particularly with a prætorium, a theatre, and an amphitheatre; in which latter his grandson Herod Agrippa was struck with a mortal disease, for assuming the glory which belonged to God, Acts xii. 23. Withal, to make this as like a Greek city as possible, he set up a colossal statue of Augustus, not inferior to that of Jupiter at Olympia, and named the city Cæsarea.—The beauty of Cæsarea, and the advantages which it derived from its fine harbour, induced the Roman governors of Judea to reside there, rather than at Jerusalem. Accordingly, in the course of Paul's history, we shall find him imprisoned in that city; and during his imprisonment, brought before Felix and Festus, the governors of the province.

Paul, having visited the Churches of Jerusalem and Antioch, goes through Galatia and Phrygia. While he is thus employed, Apollos comes to Ephesus.

AFTER landing at Cæsarea, Paul went up to Jerusalem, and saluted the church. But as there was no need of his labours in a city where there were so many apostles and chief brethren, he did not stay long after keeping the feast, but went down to Antioch, where formerly he and Barnabas had laboured so successfully in the work of the ministry. Acts xviii. 22. 'And when he had landed at Cæsarea, and gone up and saluted the church, he went down to Antioch. 23. And when he had spent some time there, he departed, and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, strengthening all the disciples.'—The apostle went at this time into the countries of Galatia and Phrygia by land, taking Syria and Cilicia of course in his way. And seeing we are told he went over all these countries in order, we may believe he did so for the purpose of visiting every church, and receiving those contributions which, in his former journey, he had requested them to make for the saints in Judea, 1 Cor. xvi. 1.

While Paul was thus visiting the churches of Galatia and Phrygia, there came to Ephesus a certain Jew named Apollos, a native of Alexandria in Egypt. This person having heard John Baptist preach, had become his disciple, and was but imperfectly instructed by him in the way of the Lord. Apollos, however, being mighty in the sacred writings of the Jews, went into the synagogue of Ephesus, and taught with great accuracy what he knew concerning the Lord Messiah, whether from John's preaching, or from the scriptures. But Aquila and Priscilla, who during Paul's abode with them had improved themselves in the knowledge of the gospel, and who had been left by him at Ephesus, happening to hear Apollos, and observing that he possessed great goodness of disposition, Acts xviii. 26. 'took him and expounded to him the way of God more perfectly,' by informing him that Jesus of Nazareth was the Christ: whose coming John had announced; and by assuring him that John had even pointed him out as the Christ to his disciples. Besides, these well-instructed Christians gave Apollos a particular account of the birth, doctrine, miracles, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus; and informed him, that Jesus had proved himself to be the Christ, not only by his miracles and resurrection, but by his baptizing his disciples with the Holy Ghost and with fire, as John had foretold.—Apollos, having received this more perfect instruction in the Christian faith, went with letters from the brethren to Corinth, where 'he helped them much who had believed through grace. 28. For he mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, shewing by the scriptures that Jesus was the Christ.' And, having occasion to tarry some time at Corinth, he became so zealous and useful a preacher there, that the fame of his labours reached the apostle during his abode in Ephesus; and occasioned him, in the letter which he wrote from that city to the Corinthians, to say, 1 Cor. iii. 6. 'I have planted, Apollos watered.'

Paul, having travelled through Galatia and Phrygia, comes with his Assistants to Ephesus, where he confers the Holy Ghost on twelve of John's Disciples; preaches in the synagogue; is opposed by the Jews; teaches in the

* The time the apostle abode at Corinth after the insurrection, I suppose is included in the year and six months which he is said, ver. 11. to have spent in teaching the word among them. If the reader is of a different opinion, the apostle must have spent more than a year and six months in teaching at Corinth.

the School of Tyrannus; and works great miracles. The Magicians burn their Books. He receives a Letter from the Corinthians, in answer to which he writes his First Epistle to them. He is assaulted by the Craftsmen, and leaves Ephesus, after having gathered a numerous Church there.

WHILE Apollos was at Corinth, Paul having passed through the country of Galatia and Phrygia, called, Acts xix. 1. 'the upper coasts, came to Ephesus.' Who were his companions in his journey, Luke has not told us. But it appears that he had several: For Timothy and Erastus are called, ver. 22. 'two of them: who ministered to him.' Timothy was Paul's constant attendant; and Erastus was the chamberlain or treasurer of Corinth, (Rom. xvi. 23.), who, having early embraced the gospel, formed such an attachment to the apostle, that when he sailed from Corinth to Judea he accompanied him; and from Judea he now returned with him to Ephesus. Or he may have met the apostle at Ephesus. Titus also was in Paul's train at this time: for he was the bearer of the first epistle to the Corinthians, which was written from Ephesus. Sosthenes, formerly a ruler of the synagogue in Corinth, but now a convert to the gospel, was with him likewise; for he joined him in writing that epistle. Caius, too, and Aristarchus, men of Macedonia, were also with Paul; for, in the account given of the riot of Demetrius, they are mentioned as Paul's companions in travel, Acts xix. 29.

At this time, Ephesus was the metropolis of the province of Asia, and an exceedingly populous city. For, not to speak of its native inhabitants, which were very numerous, a great concourse of strangers always resorted to Ephesus—some to worship the goddess Diana, whose rites were celebrated with great magnificence in a temple erected to her there at the expense of all Asia; others to learn the arts of sorcery and magic, which were taught and practised at Ephesus with such reputation, that the magical words or sentences used in the practice of sorcery had their name from Ephesus; being called Ἐφεσίων ῥηγματα, Ephesian letters: others came to prosecute law-suits, or to solicit offices from the Roman governor of the province, who had his residence there; others took Ephesus in their way to and from Europe; and others, after the manner of the Easterns, abode there occasionally for the sake of commerce. See Pref. to Eph. sect. 1.—Ephesus, therefore, being a place of such general resort, and the very throne of idolatry, superstition, and magic, the apostle, when he formerly left that city, resolved to return and attack these impieties in this their strongest hold. Wherefore, having discharged his vow in Jerusalem, he made no stay there, nor even at Antioch; but, as was observed above, he travelled through Syria and Cilicia, and the upper coasts, as expeditiously as was consistent with his purpose in visiting those countries; then came to Ephesus, where he abode three years, and gathered a very numerous church, the members of which were so dear to him, that 'he ceased not to warn every one night and day with tears,' Acts xx. 31.

On his arrival, the apostle found certain disciples residing at Ephesus, to whom he said, Acts xix. 2. 'Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost;' any effusion of the Holy Ghost on the disciples, whereby they are enabled to prophesy and work miracles. 3. 'And he said unto them, (ὡς τὴν) With what, then, were ye baptized?' It seems, those who were baptized by the apostles commonly received the Holy Ghost after their baptism. 'They said to him with John's baptism.' Upon this he took occasion to show them, that by John's baptism, they had bound themselves, 4. 'to believe on him which should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus. 5. When they heard this, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.' And, after their baptism, Paul laying his hands on them, 6. 'the Holy Ghost came upon them, and they spake with tongues and prophesied. 7. And all the men were about twelve.' These brethren, being not only the first disciples of Christ in Ephesus, but the first in that city who received the Holy Ghost, we may believe the apostle afterwards ordained them elders of that church. If so, they may have been among the elders of Ephesus who came to Miletus, and received from Paul the pathetic exhortation recorded Acts xix. 18–35.

Paul, after giving this signal proof of his apostleship, 8. 'went into the synagogue, and spake boldly for the space of three months, (διὰλογίζετο) reasoning and persuading the things which concern the kingdom of God; that is, reasoning in proof of the things which concern the gospel dispensation, and persuading the Jews to believe these things. But the Jews, during this second series of preaching, perceiving the drift of his discourses to be, to prove that men are justified by the gospel without obeying the law of Moses, Acts xix. 9. 'Divers were hardened, and believed not, but spake evil of that way before the multitude' in the synagogue; representing it as utterly subversive of the revelations made by Moses and the prophets. Wherefore, finding the Jews incorrigible, the apostle carried the disciples away from the synagogue, and preached daily in the school of one Tyrannus, a philosopher, who either was himself converted, or hired his school to the apostle to preach in it. 10. 'And this continued by the space of two years; so that all they which dwelt in Asia, (that is, in the province so called), heard the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks.' It seems the fame of the apostle's doctrine and miracles brought multitudes to Ephesus from distant parts; and these, by what they heard and saw, being converted, preached the gospel when they returned to their own cities, and founded those churches which the apostle tells the Colossians, chap. ii. 1. 'had not seen his face in the flesh.'

As Paul abode longer at Ephesus than in any other city we read of, he wrought more and greater miracles there than in any other city: Acts xix. 11. 'And God wrought special miracles by the hands of Paul. 12. So that from his body were brought unto the sick, who could not conveniently be carried to him, handkerchiefs (σ) and aprons' belonging to the sick, which had touched his body; 'and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them.' In this respect Paul was equal to Peter, whose shadow, as he passed by, overshadowing the sick who were laid on couches in the streets of Jerusalem, cured them of their distempers, Acts v. 15.—Wherefore it was owing to the multitude and greatness of Paul's miracles that so many of the inhabitants of Ephesus, and of the province of Asia, embraced the gospel.

Paul's reputation was greatly increased at Ephesus by what happened to the seven sons of Sceva, one of the Jewish chief priests. These men are called vagabond Jews and exorcists, because they strolled through the countries of the Lesser Asia, practising that magic which was in such vogue among the heathens. But when they came to Ephesus, hearing of the wonderful things which Paul performed in the name of Jesus, and perhaps seeing some of them, they took upon them, in the name of Jesus, to expel an evil spirit out of a possessed person. But, Acts xix. 15. 'the evil spirit answered, Jesus I know, and Paul I know; I know the authority and power of Jesus and Paul, and I am ready to obey them; but who are ye?' Acts xix. 16. 'And the man in whom the evil spirit was leapt on them, and overcame them, and prevailed against them, so that they fled out of that house naked and wounded.' This acknowledgment of the divine authority of Jesus and Paul, made in the absence of both, 17. 'was known to all the Jews and Greeks also dwelling at Ephesus; and fear fell on them all, and the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified. 18. And many that believed,' strongly impressed by what had happened, 'came to Paul, and confessed' that they had attempted to cure diseases by charms, and other magical practices; and shewed their deeds; 'the arts by which they had deceived the multitude. 19. 'Many also of them who used these curious arts, (of exorcism, conjuration, and magic, now firmly believing the gospel), brought their books,' in which the different forms of incantation for different diseases were prescribed, the method of making these incantations was shewed, the herbs and other medicines to be used with these incantations were pointed out, and the seasons for using them were fixed; 'and burned these books before all men: and they counted the price of them, and they found it fifty thousand pieces of silver,' (£7800 sterling): For these, being books of medicine as well as of sorcery and magic, were of great value; especially if, according to the fashion of the times, they were written on parchment. Nevertheless the owners of them made a willing sacrifice of them to truth and piety; because the arts themselves being unlawful, it was not fit that the books which taught them should be in the possession of any person whatever. Acts xix. 20. 'So mightily grew the word of God, and prevailed.'

But notwithstanding this great success, Paul had many enemies in Ephesus, who on some occasion or other hurried him into the theatre, and forced him to fight with wild beasts: 1 Cor. xv. 32. 'If after the manner of men (ἀνθρώπων) I have fought with wild beasts at Ephesus.'—Some, indeed, understand this metaphorically of certain dangerous contests which the apostle had with the unbelieving Jews, whom on account of their malice and rage he called wild beasts, as he called the Cretians (κρητικῶν) evil wild beasts, Tit. i. 12. on account of their idleness and gluttony. Yet I rather think this was a real combat; because the apostle seems to allude to such a combat, 2 Cor. i. 8—19. For he tells the Corinthians he was in such danger that he passed the sentence of death upon himself; but 'God delivered him from so great a death.' Besides, the expression, 'after the manner of men,' or the custom which then prevailed among the Greeks, seems to imply that this was a real combat. For though, being a Roman citizen, he could not be adjudged to such a punishment, he may have been forced to it by an enraged multitude. Further, as the apostle, in every city where he preached any length of time, had the same dangerous contests with the unbelieving Jews as in Ephesus, there was no reason for mentioning his contests with the Jews in that city more than anywhere else.

About this time some of the family of Chloe, a Corinthian disciple, happening to come to Ephesus, informed the apostle that great divisions had taken place in their church, 1 Cor. i. 11. through the bad practices of a teacher who had come recommended from Judea, and who affirmed that Paul was no apostle, and who at the same time contradicted many of his doctrines. On such an occasion Paul's presence at Corinth, without doubt, was extremely necessary. But the business in which he was engaged at Ephesus not permitting him to depart immediately, he sent Erastus and Timothy into Macedonia, Acts xix. 22. and from thence to Corinth, to inquire into the state of the church: And if they understood that the Corinthians were not wholly alienated from the apostle, they were to tell them he would come among them soon, to increase the spiritual gifts of those who acknowledged his authority, and to punish with the rod all who persisted in their disobedience, 1 Cor. iv. 17.

While the things above related were doing at Ephesus, the sincere part of the Corinthian church, having heard of Paul's residence there, sent three of their number to him with a letter, in which they asked his opinion concerning the subjects of their dissensions. 'These messengers arrived at Ephesus not long after the departure of Timothy and Erastus; and from the account which they brought, the apostle entertained good hopes that the Corinthians might yet be reclaimed. Wherefore, to promote their reformation, he, in answer to their letter, wrote his first epistle to the Corinthians; in which he endeavoured to heal their divisions, reproved the faulty, explained and asserted the doctrines which the false teacher had impugned, and prescribed rules for the orderly and edifying exercise of their spiritual gifts.—This epistle the apostle sent, not by the Corinthian messengers, Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus, but by Titus, who accompanied them on their return: For he wished to inform the Corinthians of his great success at Ephesus by one who was an eyewitness of it. It was likewise proper, that the person who carried his letter should bring him back word how it was received, and what effect it produced. And as Apollos was at Ephesus when Titus and the brethren departed, Paul proposed that he likewise should go to Corinth, in the persuasion that he might be of great use there. But Apollos declined it, (1 Cor. xvi. 12.), for reason of which, at this distance of time, nothing but uncertain conjectures can be formed.

The success with which Paul turned the inhabitants of Ephesus from the worship of idols being very great, the bigots, and all who made gain of the established idolatry, were alarmed; especially one Demetrius, who made silver shrines* for Diana. Of these shrines, many were sold to the inhabitants of Ephesus, and many of those who came from distant parts to worship the goddess, so that great profits were made by those who dealt in this commodity. But Demetrius, perceiving that there would be an end of the trade if Paul's doctrine was suffered to spread, called together the men of like occupation; and said to them, Acts xix. 25. 'Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth. 26. Moreover, ye see and hear, that not alone at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, this Paul hath persuaded and turned away much people, saying, that they be no gods which are made with hands: Paul, it seems, had denied that the gods resided in their images. 27. 'So that not only this our craft is in danger to be set at naught; but also that the temple of the great goddess Diana will be despised, and her magnificence will be destroyed, whom all Asia and the world worshippeth.' An inflammatory speech of this kind, addressed to the superstition and avarice of the multitude, immediately produced the desired effect. The craftsmen, and all who were employed about the temple of Diana, 28. 'when they heard these things, were full of wrath, and cried out, saying, Great is Diana of the Ephesians. 29. And the whole city was filled with confusion; for the craftsmen ran about the streets, and gave the alarm to the multitude; 'and having caught Caius and Aristarchus, men of Macedonia, Paul's companions in travel, they ran with one accord into the theatre,' intending no doubt to throw them to the wild

* In the original it is ἑνὸς ἀργύρου ἑστῆσαντες, silver temples of Diana, i. e. representations in miniature of the temple of Diana, and of the image which fell down from Jupiter. This representation being set on an altar, or some other holy place, the door of it was opened, and the image stood or sat in state, in the view of the spectator who worshipped it. The tabernacles of Moloch, mentioned Acts vii. 43. which the Israelites carried about in the wilderness seem to have been things of the same kind with Diana's shrines.

beasts usually kept there. 30. 'And when Paul would have entered in unto the people, the disciples suffered him not;' because if he had gone in, there would have been no restraining of the multitude. 31. 'And certain of the Asiarchs, who were his friends, sent to him, desiring that he would not adventure himself into the theatre. 32. Some, therefore, cried one thing, and some another; for the assembly was confused, and the more part knew not wherefore they were come together. 33. And they drew Alexander out of the multitude.' This, I suppose, was Alexander the coppersmith, who, though at that time Paul's disciple, became afterwards a teacher of false doctrine, and his great enemy. This person, it seems, by embracing the gospel, had offended the Jews, who wished to expose him to the enraged multitude as one who was active in destroying the established religion: 'The Jews putting him forward. And Alexander beckoned with his hand, and would have made his defence unto the people. 34. But when they knew that he was a Jew,' consequently an enemy to their religion, and to image-worship, 'all with one voice, about the space of two hours, cried out, Great is Diana of the Ephesians.' The rioters, by these violent outcries so long continued, having spent their rage, (ὁ γερμμεντος) the proconsul's secretary, to whom the direction of the affairs of the city was committed, appeased the people; and said to them, 35. 'Ye men of Ephesus, what man is there that knoweth not how that the city of the Ephesians is the temple-keeper* of the great goddess Diana, and of the image which fell down from Jupiter? 36. Seeing, then, these things cannot be spoken against, ye ought to be quiet and do nothing rashly. 37. For ye have brought hither these men,' Caius and Aristarchus, 'which are neither robbers of temples nor yet blasphemers of your goddess,' so ought not to be thrown to the wild beasts, the punishment ye wish to inflict on them. 38. 'Wherefore, if Demetrius, and the craftsmen which are with him, have a matter against any man, the law is open.'—In this speech the secretary took hold on the multitude by their prejudices; for without speaking any thing concerning Paul's doctrine, 'that they be no gods which are made with hands,' he desired the Ephesians to consider that their privileges as the keepers of the temple of Diana, and of her heaven-descended image, were so universally acknowledged, that there was no danger of their losing that honour through any thing Paul had spoken; and therefore they ought to be quiet and to do nothing rashly. He told them farther, that the men whom they had brought into the theatre were not yet proved to be 'either robbers of temples or blasphemers of their goddess;' because, though they might have spoken against the images made by the craftsmen, they had said nothing against the image which fell down from Jupiter; and added, that if Demetrius and the craftsmen had these or any other crimes to lay to their charge, of which they could prove them guilty, the courts of law were open, where the matter might be fairly tried.—39. 'But if ye inquire any thing concerning other matters, it shall be determined in a lawful assembly:' if ye inquire, whether the temple of Diana or her worship be in danger, or what persons or religions should be tolerated in the city, these are public matters, which should be determined in a lawful assembly: Acts xix. 40. 'For we are in danger to be called in question (by the Romans) for this day's uproar, there being no cause (no private injury done to any person) whereby we may give an account of this day's concourse. 41. And when he had thus spoken, he dismissed the assembly,' and set Caius and Aristarchus at liberty.

* Ναοκράτης, qui templum purgat et ornat, from ναός, verre, ornare. This title was given to those cities which had the care of the games celebrated in honour of any god or goddess.

On this occasion it appears, that some of the principal men of the city had embraced the Christian doctrine, or were disposed to do so. For no less persons than the Asiarchs are said to have been Paul's friends, ver. 31. These were the priests of Diana, who had the care of the games celebrated in honour of that goddess. (See Whitby's note on ver. 31.) For although they derived both dignity and profit from the established idolatry, yet their sound sense, their love of truth, and their attachment to good morals, led them to befriend Paul in his arduous undertaking of spreading the knowledge of the true God, and of the way of salvation by Christ. The proconsul's secretary, or, as others think, the town-clerk of Ephesus, declared likewise that he had a good opinion of the Christian preachers. They were neither robbers of temples nor blasphemers of Diana; nay, he told them plainly, that there was no cause for that day's uproar. We may therefore believe, that in preaching against the established worship, Paul and his assistants had spoken nothing against Diana in particular, though their general doctrine struck against all the heathen deities in the lump; and even that, in speaking against the established idolatry, they had used a becoming decency of language. Wherefore, the secretary, observing their prudence, entertained a good opinion of the cause they were engaged in. To these illustrious converts may be added such as had studied magic, and who, on their becoming Christians, burnt the books in which the secrets of their art were contained, For many of them, no doubt, were men of learning, and philosophers. Wherefore, the church gathered at Ephesus was not more considerable for the number than for the quality of many of its members.

We are not told how long Paul remained at Ephesus after the riot. It is said, indeed, Acts xx. 1. 'After the uproar was ceased, Paul called unto him the disciples, and embraced them, and departed for to go into Macedonia.' This, however, does not necessarily imply his immediate departure, as hath been shewn in the preface to the Ephesians, sect. 1. par. 4. The apostle therefore may have remained in Ephesus and its neighbourhood some months after the riot, to comfort the disciples and establish the churches of Asia, whose salutation he sent in the conclusion of his first letter to the Corinthians. Besides, from Paul's own account it appears, that he remained in the neighbourhood of Ephesus, waiting for the coming of Titus from Corinth. But Titus not arriving within the time appointed him, the apostle became impatient, and went forward to Troas in the hope of meeting with him there. But being disappointed in that expectation also, he passed over into Macedonia, where at length Titus came to him, and gave him great joy, by the account which he brought him of the good disposition of the Corinthians, as we shall see immediately.

Leaving Ephesus, Paul goes into Macedonia, where he writes his Second Epistle to the Corinthians, then proceeds to Greece to receive the Collections. In Corinth he writes his epistle to the Romans, and returns to Macedonia in his way to Jerusalem, accompanied by the Messengers of the Churches. At Philippi Luke joins him as one of his attendants.

WHEN Paul left Ephesus he went to Troas, in expectation of meeting Titus as he returned from Corinth, 2 Cor. ii. 12, 13. At Troas the apostle had great success in preaching. Nevertheless he did not remain any time there, but passed over into Macedonia, being anxious to see Titus. While in Macedonia, he doubtless visited the churches which he had planted at Philippi, and Thessalonica, and Berea, and all the other churches in that large and populous province. So the historian informs us, Acts xx. 1. 'And when the uproar was ceased, Paul called to him the disciples, and embraced them, and departed to go into Macedonia.' Here, that he might wholly wean the Corinthians from the false teacher, Paul wrote to them his second epistle, in the summer of the year 57, about five months after the date of his first letter. See No. VII.

In that second letter Paul hath given us a short account of his past sufferings, which deserves to be mentioned here, because his sufferings are the strongest proofs of his firm belief of the doctrines and facts which he preached, and of the righteousness of the cause in which he was engaged. From that account it appears that he had been five times scourged by the Jews in their synagogues, and thrice beaten with rods by the Greeks and Romans; he had been once stoned, and left as dead, namely at Lystra, and three times shipwrecked. In one of these shipwrecks he had been a whole night and a day in the sea. He had made many journeys by land, in which he had encountered perils without number, in passing rivers, and from robbers, and from the unbelieving Jews, and from the Gentiles, and even from false brethren. Also, he had undergone much bodily fatigue, in working for his own maintenance, and for the maintenance of his companions, while they assisted him in preaching. Lastly, in the course of his many and long journeys, he had endured much watching, and hunger, and thirst, and cold, and nakedness, 2 Cor. xi. 23-28. But his trials did not end at this period. He lived nine or ten years after this, in which he suffered yet greater hardships, till at length he was put to death by Nero, for the testimony of Jesus. Would any impostor have suffered such a long course of evils for the sake of propagating a tale, the falsehood of which he was conscious of?

Acts xx. 2. 'And when he had gone over those parts, (Macedonia), and had given them much exhortation, he came into Greece. 3. And there abode three months.'—In going through Macedonia, the apostle certainly received the collections which the churches made for the poor of the saints in Judea; and had those fightings and inward fears of which he speaks, 2 Cor. vii. 5. Perhaps also it was on this occasion that he preached the gospel on the confines of Illyricum, as mentioned Rom. xv. 19.—During the three months the apostle spent in Greece, he received from the churches of Achaia the money which they had collected for the saints, agreeably to his direction to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2, 3.—At that time also he wrote from Corinth his epistle to the Romans, (Rom. xv. 25.), of whose affairs he had heard from Aquila and Priscilla. And having finished all these matters, he proposed to sail directly into Syria. But the Jews, who had heard of the money he was carrying to Jerusalem, and who besides hated him as an enemy to their religion, lying in wait for him in Cenchrea, the eastern port of Corinth, where he was to embark, he changed his resolution. So that, avoiding Cenchrea, which was about nine miles from Corinth, he returned by land through Macedonia, in such time that he left Philippi after the days of unleavened bread, and so began his voyage into Syria; Acts xx. 6.

From 2 Cor. viii. 23. ix. 4. it appears, that before the apostle went into Greece, the Macedonian churches had appointed some of their most esteemed members to accompany him to Jerusalem, to assist him in making their present acceptable to the Jewish believers, and to witness the delivery of it. This they did at the particular request of Paul himself, (1 Cor. xvi. 3, 4), who in this affair wished to place his own conduct above all suspicion of fraud; and the rather, because the money intrusted to him amounted to a great sum.—At that time, likewise, the messengers whom the churches of Galatia, Lycaonia, and Asia, had commissioned for the same purpose, were with him in Macedonia. Wherefore, seeing his first intention was to sail into Syria from Corinth, Acts xi. 3. after receiving the collections from the churches of Greece, all these messengers must have accompanied him from Macedonia into Greece, 2 Cor. ix. 1. And when he altered his purpose on account of the lying in wait of the Jews, they no doubt came back with him into Macedonia.—Their names, and the names of the churches whose messengers they were, we have Acts xx. 4. 'And there accompanied him in his return through Macedonia into Asia, Sopater of Berea, and of the Thessalonians Aristarchus and Secundus, (these are the Macedonians of whom he speaks 2 Cor. ix. 4.), and Caius of Derbe, (the person who with Aristarchus was hurried into the theatre at Ephesus during the riot), and Timothy; and of Asia, Tychicus and Trophimus.' This latter being an Ephesian, I suppose the former was of the same city also, Acts xxiii. 29.—Titus is not mentioned in this catalogue, nor Jason, nor Lucius; yet from the epistle to the Romans, which, as above mentioned, was written at Corinth, we know they also were with Paul there, Rom. xvi. 22. But whether they accompanied him into Syria is uncertain. It was not necessary that every church which made the collection should depute one of their number to attend the apostle to Jerusalem. The churches of Galatia, who certainly made the collections, (1 Cor. xvi. 1.) and of Phrygia, and of Lycaonia, who were many in number, seem to have intrusted that business to Caius of Derbe, and to Timothy of Lystra. The churches of the province of Asia may have done the same to Tychicus and Trophimus, the Ephesian messengers. The church at Philippi seems to have committed its interest in the collections to Aristarchus and Secundus, the messengers of the Thessalonians. And as for the churches of Achaia, they seem to have sent no messengers at all, though expressly invited to do it, 1 Cor. xvi. 3, 4. but to have intrusted their present to the apostle's care.

Paul, accompanied by the Messengers of the Churches, sails from Philippi to Troas, where he raises Eutychus from the dead: after which he sails to Miletus, and sends for the Elders of Ephesus, whom he addresses in the most affectionate manner.

ON Paul's coming to Philippi from Corinth, he was accompanied by Luke in his way to Syria. (No. XX.) But his other assistants, Titus and Timothy, with the messengers of the churches, went before him to Troas. This happened in the spring, A. D. 58. For we are told, Acts xx. 6. that Paul, attended by Luke, 'sailed away from Philippi, after the days of unleavened bread,' that is, after the passover week was ended; and came to Troas in five days, where we abode seven days.' They staid these days in Troas, because there was a numerous church in that city and neighbourhood, gathered by Paul, who had preached there on different occasions, Acts xvi. 8. 2 Cor. ii. 12.—7. 'And on the first day of the week, when the disciples came together (from different parts) to break bread, (No. XXIV.), Paul preached unto them, ready to depart on the morrow; and continued his speech until midnight.' On that occasion the room where they met was so full of people, that they opened the windows to let in the air. But a young man, named Eutychus, who sat in a window, 'falling into a deep sleep while Paul was long preaching, he sank down with sleep, and fell from the third loft, and was taken up dead.' Him Paul restored to life by a miracle, Acts xx. 11. 'When he therefore was come up again, and had broken bread, and eaten the Lord's supper, ver. 7. 'and had talked a long while, even till break of day, so he departed.' In this instance we have an example of the disciples meeting in the night-time to celebrate the Lord's supper, to avoid giving offence to the heathens. And as they performed this rite with so much secrecy, it obtained from the heathens the appellation of the Christian mysteries, which in a little time was adopted by the disciples themselves, I suppose to render their religion the more venerable in the eyes of the heathens.

From Troas Paul's company sailed to Assos, a city to the south of Troas. But he himself went thither by land, that being alone for a while, he might employ himself in meditation and prayer. Acts xx. 14. 'And when he met with us at Assos, we took him in, and came to Mitylene,' the chief city of the island of Lesbos, and passing Chios, Acts xx. 15. 'the next day we arrived at Samos, and tarried at Trogyllium.' There was a small island of this name near to Samos, and opposite to a promontory of Ionia, called likewise Trogyllium. Between this island and promontory there was a bay convenient for ships to anchor in. 'And the next day we came to Miletus,' a city of Caria south of Trogyllium. 16. 'For Paul had determined to sail by Ephesus, because he would not spend the time in Asia: For he feared, if it were possible for him to be at Jerusalem the day of Pentecost;*' knowing that a prodigious concourse of Jews from the provinces would be there as usual, (Acts ii. 1-5.), to celebrate that festival, and expecting to find among them many of his friends and acquaintance. 17. 'And from Miletus he sent to Ephesus,' which was about ten miles distant, 'and called the elders of the church. And when they were come,' he spake to them that most pathetic discourse, which the historian has accurately recorded, ver. 18-35. and which, like the precepts of Moses, deserves to be written on the door-posts of the houses of the ministers of the gospel, that in going out and in they may have it continually in their view, and adjust their behaviour by it as in a looking-glass. Having ended that admirable discourse, Paul kneeled down and prayed, and did not part with the Ephesian elders without much weeping on their part. For they were extremely afflicted, because he had said 'they should see his face no more.'

Paul and his Company, loosing from Miletus, sail to Syria, and land at Tyre, where they abide seven days: From Tyre they sail to Ptolemais, then go on foot to Cæsarea, where Paul lodges with Philip the Evangelist. They all go up to Jerusalem to deliver the Collections.

HAVING parted with the elders of Ephesus, they loosed from Miletus and came to Coos. The day following they came to Rhodes, and thence to Patara, a noted seaport town of Lycia. Here they went aboard a ship bound for Phœnicia; and having a prosperous voyage, they landed at Tyre,† where, meeting with disciples, they abode seven days. These disciples, Acts xxi. 4. 'said to Paul through the Spirit, that he should not go up to Jerusalem; that is, by the Spirit of prophecy foreseeing the troubles Paul was to meet with in Jerusalem, they advised him not to go thither. For if this had been a

* The feast of Pentecost was instituted in commemoration of the giving of the law, on the 50th day after the first passover. It seems to have been the greatest of all the Jewish festivals, and to have been more frequented than any of them, especially by the Jews in the provinces.

† Tyre, after its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar, recovered, as foretold Isa. xlii. 17, 18. its ancient trade, wealth, and grandeur; as it did likewise after a second destruction by Alexander. It became Christian early, with the rest of the neighbouring countries, St. Paul himself found many Christians there, Acts xxi. 4. It suffered much in the Diocletian persecution. It was an archbishopric under the patriarchate of Jerusalem, with fourteen bishoprics under its jurisdiction. It continued Christian till it was taken by the Saracens in 639, was recovered by the Christians in 1124, but in 1290 it was conquered by the Mamelukes, and afterwards taken from them by the Turks in 1516. Since that time it has sunk into utter decay; it is now a mere ruin; a bare rock; a place to spread nets upon, as the prophet Ezekiel foretold it should be, chap. xxi. 14." B. Lowth on Isa. xlii. 17, 18. who cites his authorities.

command of the Spirit, Paul must have obeyed it. But he, knowing it to be their own advice only, founded on what they foresaw, rejected it and departed. The Tyrian brethren perceiving him determined to go to Jerusalem, they all accompanied him out of the city with their wives and children, till they came to the sea-side, where, according to the custom of the Jews, (No. XIX.), they kneeled down and prayed, then went aboard, and sailed to Ptolemais, the ancient Accho, mentioned Judges i. 31. Here they saluted the brethren: For the disciples of Christ were now grown so numerous as to be found in every city of any note. At Ptolemais they abode one day, after which they travelled by land to Cæsarea, where they abode many days with Philip the evangelist, one of the seven deacons.

The gospel was first preached in Cæsarea by Philip, after he had baptized the Ethiopian eunuch, Acts viii. 40.; but with what success the historian hath not said. He tells us, however, that soon after Philip had preached in Cæsarea, Cornelius, a centurion of the Roman legion stationed there, being admonished by an angel to send to Joppa for Simon Peter, who would tell him what he ought to do, Peter came and preached the gospel to him and to his friends, and converted them to the faith. Thus the foundations of a Christian church were early laid in Cæsarea, which being visited from time to time by Philip and other inspired teachers, soon became very numerous. At the time Paul came to Cæsarea in his way to Jerusalem, Philip seems to have resided there with his four daughters, who were prophetesses. For Luke tells us he abode with Philip many days; and doubtless became acquainted with the brethren in Cæsarea, who we may believe visited him, and did him all the friendly offices in their power during his two years' imprisonment in their city.—In later times Cæsarea was a bishopric, which in the fourth century was held by Eusebius, the celebrated ecclesiastical historian.

While the apostle abode with Philip in Cæsarea, a prophet named Agabus, the same who had foretold the famine which happened in the days of Claudius, Acts xi. 28. came from Jerusalem, Acts xxi. 11. 'And when he was come unto us, he took Paul's girdle, and bound his own hands and feet, and said, Thus saith the Holy Ghost, so shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles.' When Paul's company, and the brethren of Cæsarea heard this, being ignorant that this and the former prediction were intended not to hinder Paul from going to Jerusalem, but to make him the more courageous, by signifying to him beforehand what was to befall him, Acts xx. 22, 23. and that he was not to be put to death in Jerusalem, they joined in earnestly entreating him not to go up. But he replied, Acts xxi. 13. 'What mean you to weep, and to break mine heart? For I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem, for the name of the Lord Jesus. 14. And when he would not be persuaded, we ceased, saying, The will of the Lord be done.' And so they all went up to Jerusalem, having in their company some of the brethren of Cæsarea, together with one Mnason of Cyprus, an old disciple who lived in Jerusalem, and with whom Paul and his company were to lodge. For in those days there were no inns for the accommodation of travellers as with us.—Acts xxi. 18. 'And when we were come to Jerusalem, the brethren gladly received us.'

CHAP. VII.—Paul's History, from his arrival at Jerusalem with the Collections for the Saints in Judea, to his Imprisonment in Cæsarea.

It seems that the apostle performed his voyage to Syria so expeditiously, that, after finishing it, he could spend seven days in Tyre, and many days at Cesarea, and yet go to Jerusalem in time to celebrate the feast of Pentecost: for he had left Macedonia with a fixed purpose so to do, Acts xx. 16.; and there is no reason to think he did not accomplish his design.

Paul, with the Messengers of the Churches, go in to James and the Elders, to whom Paul gives an Account of the Success of his Preaching to the Gentiles. The Collections made for the Saints in Judea are delivered to the Elders by the Messengers of the Churches.

THE day after their arrival at Jerusalem, Paul, with the messengers of the churches, Acts xxi. 18. 'went in to James; and all the elders' of the church of Jerusalem 'were present. 19. And when he had saluted them, he declared particularly what things God had wrought among the Gentiles by his ministry.'—In the account which Paul gave of his ministry to James and to the elders, he declared, that many of the idolatrous Gentiles in all the great cities of the Lesser Asia, Macedonia, and Greece, had embraced the gospel; and spake of the churches which he had planted in these cities, and of the gifts of the Holy Ghost, which by his ministry God had communicated to the believers in every church. Moreover, in that account we may be sure he did not forget to mention the liberal collections which the churches of the Gentiles through Asia and Europe had made for the poor of the saints in Judea, and which they had sent by his hands, as a testimony of their gratitude for the knowledge of the true God communicated to them by men of their nation. These collections Paul, no doubt, now delivered, in presence of the messengers of the churches, to James and to the elders, to be by them distributed to the poor of the Jewish Christians, who by that expression of the good-will of the Gentile believers, ought to have been disposed to think favourably of them as their brethren.

Paul goes into the Temple, to assist some of the Brethren to discharge a Vow they were under. The Jews from the Provinces excite the multitude to kill Paul. He is rescued by Lysias the Chief Captain. From the stairs of the Castle he gives the People an Account of the manner in which he was converted to Christianity.

THE Jews at Jerusalem, before Paul's arrival, having heard a false report of his teaching the Jews which were among the Gentiles, Acts xxi. 21. 'to forsake Moses, saying, that they ought not to circumcise their children, neither to walk after the customs,' James and the elders shewed him the propriety of his giving satisfaction on that head to the many thousands of the Jewish believers in Jerusalem, who were all zealous of the law, and who on the news of his arrival would come together to inquire into the matter. For this purpose, they advised him to assist four of the brethren who were under a vow to discharge the same. And to shew his attachment to the law, they proposed that he should be himself at the charges necessary thereto; (No. XXIII.); Acts xxi. 24. 'That all may know that those things whereof they were informed concerning thee, are nothing, but that thou thyself also walkest orderly, and keepest the law.' To this measure Paul very willingly agreed. For he never taught the Jews in foreign countries to forbear circumcising their children, or to forsake the law of Moses. On the contrary, knowing that law to be the civil or political law of Judea, he always enjoined them to comply with its institutions, as the means of preserving their political rights and privileges; even as he enjoined the converted Gentiles to obey the good laws of the countries where they resided, 1 Cor. vii. 17. x. 20.—What he really taught concerning the law of Moses was, That neither Jew nor Gentile could be saved by its institutions; which was the doctrine likewise of James, and of the elders, and of all the more intelligent members of the church of Jerusalem. For, to shew that they did not think obedience to the law of Moses necessary to men's salvation, James added on this very occasion, Acts xxi. 25. 'As touching the Gentiles which believe, we have written and concluded, that they observe no such thing.'—But if the Gentiles were not to observe the law of Moses, obedience thereto could not be necessary to the salvation of any person; and therefore, in recommending this measure to Paul, James and the elders had nothing in view, but to establish the duty which the Jews, as citizens, owed to the municipal law of their country. For it is well known, that in whatever country the Jews were settled, they still considered themselves as citizens of Judea, and observed the law of Moses, as far as it was possible for them to observe it out of Judea, and thereby kept themselves a distinct people from the idolatrous Gentiles among whom they resided. Wherefore, if Paul had really taught the Jews in foreign parts not to circumcise their children, and not to walk after the customs, he would have taught them to put an end to their political constitution, and to renounce their civil rights as Jews; than which nothing was farther from his intention.

Agreeably to the advice which Paul had received from James and the elders, Acts xxi. 26. 'he took the men, and the next day purifying himself with them, he entered into the temple, to signify' to the priest 'the accomplishment of the days of purification;' that is, their resolution to accomplish the seven days of purification, (see i.) 'even to the time that an offering should be offered for every one of them. 27. And when the seven days of purification were almost ended, the Jews which were of Asia,' where Paul had preached so long, and who were especially enraged against him, utterly disregarding this proof of his respect for the law, 'when they saw him in' the women's court of 'the temple, stirred up all the people, and laid hands on him, 28. crying out, Men of Israel, help; this is the man who teacheth everywhere all men against the people;' (No. XXV.); by telling the Jews, that they ought not to circumcise their children, and by assuring them that they may be saved without becoming proselytes to Judaism; 'and against the law, and this holy place,' by predicting that both are to be destroyed; 'and farther, brought Greeks also into the temple, and hath polluted this holy place. 29. For they had seen before with him in the city, Trophimus an Ephesian' Gentile, 'whom they supposed that Paul had brought into the temple.'

There was now in this city a prodigious confluence of Jews from foreign countries, who like Paul had come to the feast of Pentecost, Acts xxi. 30. 'And all the city was moved, and the people ran together, and they took Paul, and drew him out of the temple;' that is, out of the women's court into the court of the Gentiles, as one who had polluted the temple; 'and forthwith the doors were shut. 31. And as they went about to kill him, tidings came unto the chief captain of the legion, (No. XXVI.), that all Jerusalem was in an uproar.' This was the tribune Claudius Lysias, who commanded the Roman garrison stationed in the castle Antonia, hard by the temple. 32. 'Who immediately took soldiers and centurions, and ran down unto them. And when they saw the chief captain and the soldiers, they left beating of Paul.' Then Lysias coming to him laid hold on him, and after the Roman manner ordered him to be bound with two chains to two soldiers, that he might not escape: 'and demanded who he was, and what he had done? 34. And some cried one thing, and some another, among the multitude; and when he could not know the certainty for the tumult, he commanded him to be carried into the castle. (No. XXVII.) 35. And when he came upon the stairs leading to the castle, 'so it was that he was borne of the soldiers for the violence of the people.' 36. For the multitude of the people followed after, crying, 'Away with him.' But the soldiers halting on the top of the stairs, Paul begged of the chief captain permission to speak to him, 'who said, Canst thou speak Greek? 38. Art thou not that Egyptian which before these days madest an insurrection, and leddest out into the wilderness four thousand men that were Sicarii?' (No. XXVII.) To this question Paul replied, that he was a Jew born in Tarsus in Cilicia, and begged that he would suffer him to speak to the people. 40. 'And when he had given him license, Paul stood on the stairs, and beckoned with the hand unto the people,' to shew that he was going to speak to them. 'And when there was made a great silence, he spake to them in the Hebrew tongue,' a discourse which Luke has recorded Acts xxii. 1-22.

In that discourse Paul told the multitude, that he was verily a Jew, who, though born in Tarsus, had received his education in Jerusalem, according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers: that having been instructed by Gamaliel a Pharisee, and a celebrated doctor well known to the people, he was so zealous of the law, that he persecuted the way he was now engaged in to death. And for the truth of what he said, he appealed, ver. 5. to the high-priest, and to the whole estate of the elders, who had given him letters to the synagogues of Damascus for that very purpose. But that, when he came nigh to the city, Jesus himself appeared to him at mid-day, rebuked him for his folly, and brought him over to his cause. And being struck blind by the brightness of Christ's appearance, a disciple named Ananias came to him, restored his sight, and baptized him. And afterward returning from Arabia to Jerusalem, Jesus appeared to him while he was in a trance in the temple, and ordered him to leave Jerusalem, because he would send him far hence unto the Gentiles. So that his preaching to the Gentiles was no scheme of his, but was done by revelation from Jesus, who expressly commanded him to do so.—But no sooner did Paul mention his preaching to the Gentiles, than the multitude, especially such of them as had come from Asia, perfectly enraged, cried out, Acts xxii. 22. 'Away with such a fellow from the earth, for it is not fit that he should live.' 23. And as they cried out, and cast off their clothes, and threw dust into the air, 24. The chief captain commanded 'him to be brought into the castle;' and, thinking him some notorious malefactor, 'bade that he should be examined by scourging, that he might know wherefore they cried so against him.' But, to prevent this ignominy, Paul pleaded his privilege as a Roman, whom it was unlawful to beat with rods, or even to bind with thongs, in order to his being so beaten. 27. 'Then the chief captain came, and said to him, Tell me, art thou a Roman? And he said, Yea. 28. And the chief captain answered, With a great sum obtained I this freedom. But Paul said, I was free born. 29. Then straightway they departed from him, which should have examined him by scourging.'

Paul is brought before the Jewish Council. He declares himself a Pharisee. The Pharisees and Sadducees in the Council strive with each other. The Soldiers go into the Council, and take Paul from among them by force. The Chief Captain commands the Council to accuse him before Felix the Governor, in Cæsarea.

LYSIAS, now that he understood Paul was a Roman, became the more anxious to know certainly what his crime was. And therefore on the morrow, Acts xxii. 30. 'he loosed him from his bonds, and commanded the chief priests and all their council to appear.'—It seems the chief priests had joined the multitude in their clamour against Paul, and had accused him of sedition, with an intention to have him put to death; being exceedingly enraged against him for what he had said concerning them on the stairs, as well as for having deserted their service, and gone over to the Christians:—'And brought Paul down, (from the castle), and set him before them, in their council.

The apostle, being thus placed at the bar of the council, looked steadfastly around on all the members present. And though many of them knew him well, having formerly employed him to persecute the disciples of Jesus, yet, conscious of integrity even in that unrighteous course, as in the whole of his other conduct, he boldly said to them, Acts xxiii. 1. 'Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God unto this day.' But that saying displeasing the high-priest Ananias, as savouring, in his opinion, of falsehood and vanity, he commanded those who stood by, Acts xxiii. 2. 'to smite him on the mouth,' in the manner Pashur formerly smote the prophet Jeremiah, Jer. xx. 2. But Paul, offended at the injury, replied, 3. 'God shall smite thee, thou whitened wall,' thou hypocrite; 'for sittest thou to judge me according to the law, and commandest me to be smitten contrary to the law,' which saith, thou shalt do no unrighteousness in judgment? Lev. xix. 15.—And surely it was unrighteousness in a judge to order one not yet convicted of any crime to be treated as if he had been already condemned; and that for no reason, but because, in beginning to make his defence, he had asserted the uprightness of his general conduct. Wherefore, Ananias having been guilty of injustice under the mask of piety, certainly deserved the rebuke which Paul now gave him.—But some present, 4. 'said, Revilest thou God's high-priest? 5. Then said Paul, I wist not, brethren, that he was the high-priest: For it is written, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people.' In affirming that he did not know Ananias to be the high-priest, Paul assuredly spake the truth. For both the Roman governors and the Jewish princes had for some time past been in use to sell the high-priesthood to the best bidders; and sometimes to depose the persons in office, that they might have it to sell anew. Wherefore, as Paul was but lately come from Greece, after five years' absence, he may very well have been ignorant of Ananias's dignity, notwithstanding he knew him personally. It is alleged, indeed, that by his dress and seat in the council, Paul might have known Ananias to be the high-priest. But that does not seem probable; because, having looked steadfastly on the council at his first coming in, he would by such an excuse have exposed himself to ridicule, if Ananias could have been known to be the high-priest, either by his dress or by his seat in the council.

Paul, seeing many sitting round with whom he was personally acquainted, and knowing that some of them were Sadducees and some of them Pharisees, Acts xxiii. 6. 'cried out in the council, Men and brethren, I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee; of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question;' meaning, that he was brought before them, as a criminal, for preaching the resurrection of Jesus from the dead, as a proof of the resurrection of all the dead at the last day. The council hearing this account of the crime laid to his charge, 7. 'There arose a dissension between the Pharisees and the Sadducees; and the multitude was divided. And there arose a great cry; and the scribes that were of the Pharisees' party arose and strove (in the prisoner's defence), saying, We find no evil in this man; but if a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him,' (so they interpreted what Paul had spoken to the multitude from the stairs concerning the appearing of Jesus to him by the way; for they did not allow that the person whom they had crucified was really risen from the dead), 'let us not fight against God.' The dissension now became so great, that, 10. 'The chief captain, fearing lest Paul should have been pulled in pieces of them, commanded the soldiers,' who had set Paul before the council, 'to go down and take him by force from among them, and to bring him into the castle.' At the same time he ordered his accusers to declare, before the governor himself, what they had to say against the prisoner, (ver. 30.), because he intended to remit the affair to his cognizance.

Jesus appears to Paul in the night. The Jews conspire to kill Paul. The Chief Captain sends him to Cæsarea, escorted by a strong guard.

Acts xiii. 11. 'And the night following the Lord Jesus stood by him, and said, Be of good cheer, Paul; for as thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome. 12. And when it was day, certain' zealots 'of the Jews banded together, and bound themselves under a curse, saying, That they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul. 13. And there were more than forty who had made this conspiracy. 14. And they came to the chief priests and elders,' who were of the sect of the Sadducees, and Paul's greatest enemies, telling them what they had done; and desiring them to ask the chief captain to bring Paul down to the council on the morrow, 'as if to inquire something more perfectly concerning him,' that they might have an opportunity of killing him by the way. But the conspiracy being made known to Paul by his sister's son, he sent him to the chief captain, who, on hearing thereof, prudently sent Paul away to Cæsarea by night under a strong guard to Felix the governor, (No. XXIX.), with a letter, giving him an account of the whole affair from the beginning, and informing him that he had ordered the prisoner's accusers to say before the governor what they had to lay to his charge. Lysias's letter being delivered to the governor, Acts xxiv. 33. 'They presented Paul also before him. 34. And when the governor had read the letter, he asked of what province he was? And when he understood that he was of Cilicia; 35. I will hear thee, said he, when thine accusers are also come: And he commanded him to be kept in Herod's prætorium.' This was a hall which Herod built in Cæsarea for holding courts of judicature in, with apartments adjoining, in which the prisoners who were to be tried were confined.

CHAP. VIII.—Paul's History, from his Imprisonment at Cæsarea, to his appealing to the Emperor.

The High-priest and Elders with Tertullus accuse Paul before Felix. Paul denies the Crimes laid to his charge, and gives an Account of his Faith.

It seems the commander of the horsemen who brought Paul to Cæsarea, was ordered on his return to inform the high-priest and the elders at Jerusalem of the day which the governor should fix for hearing their accusation, and for trying the prisoner. Wherefore, Acts xxiv. 1. 'After five days Ananias the high-priest descended with the elders, and with a certain orator named Tertullus, who informed the governor against Paul.' This Roman orator, or barrister, to persuade the governor to punish Paul as a disturber of the public peace, complimented him on the wisdom and vigour of his administration: Acts xxiv. 2. 'Seeing that by thee we enjoy great quietness, and that very worthy deeds are done unto this nation,' &c. But in this the orator flattered the governor too much. For, although he had repressed the Sicarii and other robbers, he was himself a great oppressor of the nation, by the cruelty and injustice of his administration. (No. XXX.) Having ended his fawning preface, Tertullus roundly affirmed, that Paul was, 6. 'A pestilent fellow, and a mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout the world, and a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes.' But in this there was not a word of truth, except that Paul was a ringleader of the Nazarenes; a term of reproach which it seems was given to the disciples of Christ even in that early period. 6. 'Who also hath gone about to profane the temple,' by bringing heathens into it, 'whom we took, and would have judged according to our law.' By this the orator insinuated, that as the Romans permitted the Jews to govern themselves by their own laws, it was the governor's duty to maintain them in the possession of that privilege, which he meant to tell him had been violated by the chief captain; for he added, 'The chief captain Lysias came upon us, and with great violence took him out of our hands.' Lysias took Paul twice out of the hands of the Jews by force; once, when he delivered him from the enraged multitude who went about to kill him in the temple, Acts xxi. 32. and a second time, when he took him by force out of the hands of the council, that he might not be pulled in pieces of them, Acts xiii. 10. Now, as the Jews thought their law authorized them to punish notorious offenders in a summary manner, after the example of Phinehas, who without any trial or judicial sentence killed Zimri and Cosbi in the act of transgression, Tertullus, I suppose, called the killing of Paul by the enraged multitude, in the supposed act of profaning the temple, a judging or punishing him according to their law. Or, he might give that appellation to the attempt of the council to pull Paul in pieces. Yet the manner in which he expressed himself leads us to think, that he rather meant the attempt of the multitude; 'whom we took, and would have judged.' For the council did not take Paul; but the chief captain placed him before them, merely to obtain certain information of the crimes which they laid to his charge, and by no means to judge and punish him, Acts xxii. 30.: whereas the multitude laid hold on Paul in the temple, and would have immediately punished him with death. Tertullus's accusation of Paul, together with the circumstances by which he aggravated his accusation, were all mere fictions, of which he offered no proof whatever; only, Acts xxiv. 9. 'The Jews, (namely, Ananias and the elders), assented, saying, That these things were so.'

His answer to this accusation Paul introduced, not by paying any fulsome compliment to the governor, after the barrister's example; but by saying, Acts xxiv. 10. 'For as much as I know thou hast been of many years a judge unto this nation,' so canst not be ignorant of the affairs of the Christians, and of the temper of the Jews my accusers, 'I do the more cheerfully answer for myself.' Next, because the charge brought against him was, that 'he was a pestilent fellow, and a mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout the world,' he told the governor, that he had been only twelve days in Jerusalem, during which they had not found him stirring up the people anywhere; and boldly averred, that his accusers could prove none of the things which they laid to his charge. Only as to his 'being a ringleader of the Nazarenes, 14. This I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers: I worship the God of my fathers through the mediation of Christ, which they call heresy, because it renders the mediation of the Levitical priests unnecessary in the worship of God. But this is no heresy; the Levitical services being prefigurations of the mediation of Christ; and the prophets having expressly foretold the same. And therefore, in thus worshipping God, I believe 'all things written in the law and in the prophets; 15. And have hope towards God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust.' All the Pharisees allowed the resurrection, hoping for it, as Paul did, upon the foundation of the promises of God delivered by Moses and the prophets. This was a very proper defence before a Roman magistrate, who by the law of the empire was bound to allow every man to worship God according to the religion of his country. Acts xxiv. 16. (Εἰς τὴν αἰνῶν) 'And on this account, (that I believe the resurrection), I exercise myself to have always a conscience void of offence towards God and towards men.' So that my principles do not lead to sedition.—And as to his profaning the temple, he said, That, 17. 'after many years' absence, he had come with alms to his nation and offerings' to God, which he proposed to make by assisting some Nazarites to discharge their vow: that with this intention he had gone into the temple; but it was not with any multitude attending him, nor tumult made by him. And yet the Jews from Asia laid violent hands on him, as if he had really profaned the temple; 19. 'Who ought to have been here before thee to object, if they had aught against me.' But as they did not appear to make good their charge, it was plain they were conscious of having injured him by their accusation. And doubtless Felix so understood it.—Paul therefore called upon the chief priests and elders, now his only prosecutors, to shew any evil deed that was proved against him while he stood before the council; 21. 'Except it be for this one saying, which I cried standing among them, Touching the resurrection of the dead I am called in question by you this day.' But as that was one of the great articles of the national faith, he could not be blamed, either for maintaining it, or for asserting that God had given a proof of it in the resurrection of Jesus from the dead.

Acts xxiv. 22. 'And when Felix heard these things,' the orator's accusation and the prisoner's defence, having by his long residence in Judea more perfect knowledge of that way of worship mentioned by Paul, ver. 14. or a more perfect knowledge of Jesus and his disciples than had been given him by the high-priest and elders and their orator, he did not find any crime proved against Paul: yet he did not acquit him, for fear of displeasing the Jews, but he deferred them till Lysias should come down, as if he could have given better information concerning the pretended sedition.—In the mean time, being fully convinced of Paul's innocence, he ordered that he should not be confined too closely, but that his acquaintance should be allowed to visit him;—a liberty which we may believe the brethren of Cæsarea made good use of, during his long imprisonment in that city.

Felix, at the request of his Wife Drusilla, sends for Paul, who gives them an account of the Faith in Christ. He reasons concerning Righteousness, Chastity, and a Judgment to come. Felix's Conscience is so roused that he trembles. When recalled from his Government he leaves Paul in bonds.

PAUL's trial having occasioned much discourse in Cæsarea, Felix's wife Drusilla, (No. XXX.) who was herself a Jewess, and of the Jewish religion, desired to hear him. Felix therefore sent for him, Acts xxiv. 24. 'and heard him concerning the faith in Christ;' heard him declare what the Christians believed concerning Jesus; namely, that he is the Christ or Messiah long expected by the Jews; and that he was proved to be the Christ by God's raising him from the dead. Moreover, being well acquainted with the character and actions of his illustrious hearers, the apostle introduced some other articles of the Christian religion, suited to their particular case: For, ver. 25. 'he reasoned of righteousness,' or justice, a virtue highly necessary in a ruler, 'and of continence,' or chastity, against which Felix and his lady had greatly trespassed in their marriage, 'and of a judgment to come,' at which great and small shall answer to God for their actions. His discourse was uttered with such energy, that Felix, who was a very corrupt governor, was exceedingly terrified, and trembled; then dismissed Paul, saying, Acts xxiv. 25. 'Go thy way for this time, when I have a convenient season I will call for thee.' The apostle's discourse however, produced no alteration of conduct either in Felix or his lady. He continued his bad practice, all the time his government lasted; and she, trusting to her privileges as a daughter of Abraham, paid no regard to what she had heard.—Felix indeed sent for Paul, as he promised, and communed with him, not about the amendment of his life, but in hopes to receive money from him for releasing him: 26. and the rather, that Paul, in his defence, had mentioned his bringing alms and offerings to his nation. However, his deliverance by money not being attempted, for a reason too obvious to be mentioned, Felix kept him in prison the two remaining years of his government; and when leaving the province did not release him, wishing to please the great men among the Jews, who earnestly desired to have Paul put to death.

Festus succeeds Felix in the Government of Judea. He sits in judgment on Paul; hears the accusation of the Jews, and Paul's defence; then asks him, if he would go up to Jerusalem, and be judged by him there. Paul appeals from Festus to the Emperor.

FELIX was succeeded in the government of Judea by Portius Festus, who went up to Jerusalem three days after he landed at Cæsarea.—While Festus was in Jerusalem, Acts xxv. 3. 'the high-priest and the chief of the Jews informed him against Paul, and besought him, 4. And desired favour against him, (see ver. 15.), that he would send for him to Jerusalem, laying wait in the way to kill him, (Acts xxv. 5.) But Festus,' knowing their design, 'answered, that Paul should be kept at Cæsarea, and that he himself would depart shortly thither;' and ordered them to go down with him, and accuse him there. Accordingly, the day after his arrival in Cæsarea, he sat in judgment on Paul; and the Jews who had come from Jerusalem, standing round, 7. 'laid many and grievous complaints against Paul, which they could not prove; (see ver. 18, 19.) 8. While he answered for himself, Neither against the law of the Jews, neither against the temple, nor yet against Cæsar, have I offended any thing at all.' But Festus, to gratify the Jews, asked Paul if he would go to Jerusalem and be judged by him, concerning these things, in the presence of the chief priests and elders, who understood them much better than he did! To this Paul replied, That he was standing at Cæsar's judgment-seat, where, as being a Roman, he ought to be tried; that Festus knew he had done no wrong to the Jews; that if he was an offender, he did not refuse to die; but that, if he was innocent, it would be wrong even in the governor to make a gift of his life to the Jews, by sending him to Jerusalem to be judged in the presence of his inveterate enemies, who by their clamour and threatenings might oblige Festus to condemn him. Wherefore, to prevent that injury, Paul, as being a Roman citizen, appealed from Festus to Cæsar, (No. XXXI.), and by so doing put a stop to any farther judicial procedure against his life in Judea; for, after conferring with his council, (No. XIII.), Festus declared in the Court, That Paul should be sent to Cæsar in consequence of his appeal.

CHAP. IX.—Paul's History, from the time of his Appeal to his embarking for Italy to prosecute his Appeal before the Emperor.

- * Festus gives an Account of Paul's Cause to King Agrippa, who desires to hear Paul's Defence from his own mouth.

NOT long after this, King Agrippa (No. XXXII.) and his sister Bernice came to Cæsarea to pay their respects to Festus, who had succeeded their brother-in-law Felix in the province. Acts xxv. 14. 'And when they had been there many days, Festus declared Paul's cause unto the king.' For as the crime of which he was accused related wholly to the Jewish religion, in which the king was very knowing, Festus wished to have his opinion upon it; and for that purpose began by telling him, that Felix had left Paul in bonds, and that the chief priests and elders at Jerusalem had desired him to condemn him: Acts xxv. 16. 'To whom I answered, It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die till he is condemned after a fair trial. And therefore, having sat in judgement upon him in Cæsarea, when his accusers stood up, they did not lay any of those crimes to his charge 'which I supposed. 19. But had certain questions against him of their own religion, and of one Jesus which was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive. 20. And because I was in doubt about such questions, whether they were dangerous to the state and punishable, and whether I was a competent judge of them, 'I asked him if he was willing to go to Jerusalem,' where I could have the advice of persons skilled in the Jewish religion, 'and there be judged of these matters?' But he refused to be judged there, and appealed to Cæsar.

Agrippa having heard these things, Acts xxv. 22. 'said unto Festus, I would also hear the man myself.' This demand the king made, because he was well acquainted with the religious tenets, disputes, and expectations of the Jews, and because many wonderful things had been reported to him concerning Jesus and his disciples. Perhaps also he may have remembered, how his father, who was a zealous Jew, had been so displeased with this sect as to put the apostle James to death. But whatever was his reason, he obtained his desire: 'Tomorrow, said Festus, thou shalt hear him.'

Paul is brought into the place of hearing at Cæsarea, and makes his defence before King Agrippa, Queen Bernice, the Ladies who attended her, the Tribunes, and the principal Inhabitants of Cæsarea.

Festus accordingly performed his promise to the king. Acts xxv. 23. For 'on the morrow, when Agrippa was come, and Bernice, with great pomp' of apparel, attendants, guards, &c. 'and was entered into the place of hearing, with the Tribunes and principal men of the city, at Festus' commandment Paul was brought forth.' Then Festus, rising up, made an elegant speech to the assembly, in which he declared, that at the former trial no crime had been proved against the prisoner; but that having appealed to Cæsar, he had brought him forth, that after a second examination he might have something more certain to write to the emperor, concerning the crimes laid to the prisoner's charge.

Acts xxvi. 1. 'Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Thou art permitted to speak for thyself.' Upon this 'Paul stretched forth the hand,' to draw the attention of the assembly, and declared, He thought himself happy in being allowed to answer the accusations of the Jews, before one so expert in the Jewish laws and religion as the king. This he said, because if Agrippa expressed a favourable opinion of his doctrine before Festus and the Tribunes, it would be of great service to the Christian cause. Then, in the hearing of this illustrious assembly, he called on all the Jews present to bear witness, (No. XXXIII.), That he had received his education at Jerusalem, and had early professed himself a Pharisee: That he now stood as a criminal, for testifying the resurrection of Jesus, and for believing that God will raise all the dead, as he promised to the fathers: ver. 7. 'Unto which happiness,' said he, 'our twelve tribes, by serving God day and night, hope to come.' That formerly, from a principle of conscience, he was a great enemy to Jesus of Nazareth and to his disciples, Acts xxvi. 11. 'and being exceedingly mad against them, he persecuted them even unto strange cities; and, in particular, he went to Damascus for that purpose, 'with authority and commission from the chief priests.' But that Jesus himself appeared to him at mid-day, as he drew nigh to the city, and spake to him, and convinced him that he was risen from the dead, as his disciples affirmed. Moreover, Jesus told him that he had appeared to him to make him a witness and a preacher of his resurrection; and that he now sent him to the Gentiles, 'to open their eyes, &c. 19. Whereupon, O king,' having had this convincing evidence of the resurrection of Jesus, 'I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision,' but preached first to the Jews 'of Damascus, and at Jerusalem, and throughout all the coasts of Judea, and then to the Gentiles.' But the Jews being enraged at me, for promising salvation to the Gentiles through Jesus, without requiring them to obey the law of Moses, they, 21. 'caught me in the temple, and went about to kill me.' But God having preserved me, 22. 'I continue to this day witnessing, both to small and great,' that Jesus of Nazareth is risen from the dead, and that he is the Christ. And in affirming these facts, I say 'no other things than those which Moses and the prophets did say' should come; 23. 'That the Christ should suffer, and that he should be the first that should rise from the dead' to die no more, 'and should shew light to the people and to the Gentiles:' so that, instead of being a conqueror, the Christ, according to Moses and the prophets, was to be a teacher of true religion both to Jews and Gentiles.—When Festus the governor heard Paul speak of Christ's shewing light to the Gentiles, he considered it as a mere chimera, produced in Paul's brain by his too great application to the study of the Jewish learning; and therefore he interrupted him, saying, Acts xxvi. 24. 'with a loud voice, Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad.' Paul replied, 'I am not mad, most noble Festus;' and appealed to the king, as fully acquainted, not only with the doctrine of Moses and the prophets concerning the Christ, but with the miracles, death, and resurrection of Jesus. 26. 'For this thing was not done in a corner.'—Then turning to Agrippa, he said, 27. 'King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest.' Paul knew Agrippa to be of the sect of the Pharisees; for his father, being a zealous Jew, had educated him in the Jewish religion, according to its strictest form. 28. 'Then Agrippa said to Paul, Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian.' Paul's doctrine concerning Jesus of Nazareth appeared so conformable to the things written concerning the Christ by Moses and the prophets, and his testimony concerning the appearing of Jesus to him by the way was rendered so probable by the total alteration of his sentiments and conduct, that Agrippa declared he was almost persuaded of the truth of the things which he affirmed concerning Jesus.—On this new occasion of vindicating himself, and the cause in which he was engaged, the apostle spake with such effect, that the king the governor, and the governor's council, ver. 31. 'going aside, talked between themselves, saying, This man doth nothing worthy of death or of bonds.' After which Agrippa, not in the least offended with Paul for having spoken to him so freely, came forward, and, 32. 'said to Festus,' in the hearing of the whole assembly, 'This man might have been set at liberty, if he had not appealed to Cæsar.'—Paul's appeal, however, was perfectly proper at the time he made it, seeing Festus had shewn an inclination to gratify the Jews by proposing to judge him in Jerusalem. And now, although Agrippa, with the consent of Festus, had declared that Paul might have been set at liberty if he had not appealed to Cæsar, Paul very prudently did not withdraw his appeal, because he foresaw, that by the solicitations and threatenings of the chief priests and elders, Festus might be constrained, contrary to his inclination, to put him to death, even as Pilate formerly had been constrained, contrary to his conscience, to put Jesus to death.

Remarks on Paul's Defences before the Multitude, the Jewish Council, the Governors Felix and Festus, and King Agrippa.

Thus it appears, that besides the defence which Paul made from the top of the stairs to the multitude in Jerusalem, he at four different times, before the highest courts of judicature in Judea, defended the gospel, and his own conduct in preaching it, in the most public manner;—namely, 1. Before the Jewish council, consisting of the high-priest, the chief priests, the whole estate of the elders, and the scribes, who all sat as his accusers.—2. Before Felix the Roman governor, at whose tribunal the high-priest Ananias, and the elders from Jerusalem, were likewise his accusers; and employed a Roman barrister to plead against him.—3. Before Festus the governor; on which occasion the Jews from Jerusalem stood forth, a third time, as his accusers.—4. Before King Agrippa, Bernice, the Tribunes, and the principal persons of Cæsarea, with many others, in whose presence Paul boldly asserted his own innocence, with such a strength of evidence, that both Agrippa and Festus declared he might have been set at liberty, if he had not appealed to the emperor.

Now, it is to be observed, 1. That at these different trials, although Paul was accused of sedition and heresy, and the profanation of the temple, it clearly appeared, that the only offences which with truth could be laid to his charge were—his being a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes; his joining them in affirming that Jesus, whom the rulers at Jerusalem had crucified, was risen from the dead, and was thereby demonstrated to be both Lord and Christ; also his worshipping God through the mediation of Jesus, who was now risen from the dead.—These things the chief priests and elders construed into the crimes of sedition, heresy, and profaneness, most unjustly; for though Paul affirmed that Jesus is Lord, this doctrine had no tendency to sedition, since at the same time he taught that Christ's kingdom is not of this world. Next, as to his worshipping God through the mediation of Jesus, it was no heresy, being agreeable to the doctrine of Moses and the prophets. And with respect to his having profaned the temple, it was a mere calumny, which had not the least foundation in truth.

2. At these different trials, the high-priest and elders, who were all present, did not, either in their own council or before the Roman governors, so much as once attempt to contradict what Paul publicly and directly affirmed concerning the resurrection of Jesus. And yet, if his affirmation had been a falsehood, it might easily have been disproved, as the resurrection of Jesus was said to have happened in Jerusalem, where his accusers commonly resided.

3. At all these trials, Paul offered a proof of the resurrection of Jesus which could not be gainsayed. He openly affirmed, that the chief priests and all the Jews knew, that, both by education and principle, he himself was at the first a furious enemy of the Christians, and had persecuted them to death. Nay, he told them he did so by authority and commission from themselves: But that in going to Damascus, to bring the Christians bound in fetters to Jerusalem, Jesus appeared to him on the way, and thereby convinced him that he was risen from the dead; and ordered him to preach his resurrection both to the Jews and to the Gentiles. And having so done ever after that, notwithstanding he thereby exposed himself to innumerable evils, all impartial persons who heard him must have been convinced, that so total a change of sentiment and conduct, in a person of his acknowledged sense and education, could not have happened, unless Jesus had really appeared to him, as he constantly affirmed.

4. And lastly, it deserves particular notice, that these public defences, whereby the Christian cause was so well established, Paul would have had no opportunity of making, if the Romans had not governed in Judea at that time. For the injurious and violent disposition which the Jews on every occasion displayed against the disciples of Jesus, would have led them to put Paul to death at the first hearing, if the supreme power had been in their hands. We may therefore believe it was owing to the particular providence of God, that Paul was apprehended and tried while the Romans exercised the supreme power in Judea; for they all along behaved towards him in a fair and impartial manner, as magistrates who had to answer for their conduct at the imperial tribunal. So that at all his trials he had an opportunity of speaking freely in defence of the gospel, and of his own conduct, in the hearing of his enemies, who were the chief of the Jews, and who had it in their power to contradict him, and no doubt would have contradicted him, if the things he affirmed had been falsehoods.—And though it may seem strange, that when Paul's innocence was so clearly proved, and even acknowledged by his judges, he was not released, it should be remembered, that this failure of justice in the Roman magistrates was owing to the powerful influence of the people of the country, to whose inclinations governors, who are strangers, are obliged to shew too much regard, from political considerations.

CHAP. X.—Festus having determined to send Paul to Italy by sea, with the other prisoners who were to be judged by the Emperor, they all embark at Cæsarea with the Centurion and Soldiers appointed to guard them. Luke and Aristarchus go aboard with them, resolved to accompany Paul to Rome. They are all shipwrecked on the Island of Melitè, where Paul works many miracles.

THE apostle having, by appeal, transferred his cause to the emperor, Festus determined to send him to Italy by sea; and for that purpose delivered him, with certain other persons who were also to be judged at Rome, to one Julius, a centurion of the Italian legion. All these prisoners, with the soldiers who guarded them, went aboard a ship of Adramyttium, and sailed from Cæsarea in the autumn of A. D. 59.

From the history it appears, that the messengers of the churches, who accompanied Paul into Judea with the collections, Acts xxi. 4. were not intimidated by the evils which the Jewish rage brought upon him in Jerusalem.

For, while he continued there, they remained with him; and when he was sent a prisoner to Cæsarea, they followed him thither; and in both places ministered to him, and perhaps attended him at his trials. And when it was determined to send him to Italy, two at least of these affectionate friends went in the same ship with him, namely, Luke the writer of the Acts, as appears from the style of his history, and Aristarchus the Thessalonian, Acts xxvii. 2.—Aristarchus had accompanied the apostle in some of his former journeys, Acts xix. 29. and being one of the messengers of the churches who were appointed to attend Paul with the collections to Jerusalem, he went with him into Greece, and abode with him there, while he received the collections from the churches of Achaia; then returned with him into Macedonia, where Luke joined them at Philippi; after which they all sailed with the apostle into Judea.

The day after Paul and his company loosed from Cæsarea, the ship in which they sailed happening to touch at Sidon, Julius, who was a person of singular humanity, allowed Paul to go ashore, and refresh himself with the brethren in that city; a favour which must have been peculiarly acceptable to one who had been so long in prison. After that, loosing from Sidon, they sailed to Myra, a city of Lycia; and there finding a ship of Alexandria, bound for Italy with a lading of wheat,* they went aboard, and arriving at Crete, they put in at a port called The Fair Havens; where staying some days, the centurion no doubt, as at Sidon, allowed Paul to go ashore: in which case, we may suppose he preached Christ to all who came to him.

In this port the apostle advised them to winter, because sailing was now become dangerous, on account of the long dark nights, and the tempestuous weather usual at that season: for the fast of the seventh month or anniversary expiation was now past. But the master and the owner of the vessel not thinking the Fair Havens a safe harbour, they set out for one judged more commodious; and had proceeded a little way, when there arose a tempestuous wind, called Euroclydon,† which soon increased into an hurricane: so that not being able to bear up against the storm, they let the ship drive, and were exceedingly tossed for many days, without seeing either the sun or stars.—Acts xxvii. 20. And now, when all hope was gone, an angel of God appeared to Paul by night, and assured him that there should be no loss of any man's life, but of the ship: 'Howbeit they were to be cast on a certain island.' This revelation Paul communicated to all in the ship, and thereby encouraged them. At length, when the fourteenth night from their leaving the Fair Havens was come, they drew near to land; and by break of day were driven on an island in the Adriatic Sea, named Melitè. On that occasion the soldiers proposed to kill the prisoners, fearing they might swim out and escape. But Julius, willing to save Paul, kept them from their purpose, Acts xxvii. 43. and commanded that they which could swim, should cast themselves first into the sea, and get to land, and the rest, some on boards, and some on broken pieces of the ship; and so it came to pass, that they escaped all safe to land; not one life being lost, although there were in the ship no fewer than two hundred and seventy-six persons, ver. 37.

When they came ashore, Acts xxviii. 1. 'they knew that the island was called Melitè.' No. XXXIV.—The people of Melitè, though reckoned by the Greeks and Romans barbarians, on account of their ignorance of the Greek and Latin languages, shewed them no small kindness; for they received them in a very friendly manner, by giving them all the assistance in their power, and kindling a fire for them, because of the rain and cold. But a viper happening to fasten on Paul's hand, as he laid a bundle of sticks on the fire, the islanders, who saw him with his chain on, supposed him some murderer who had escaped the sea, but whom (Nemere) the divine justice did not allow to live. However, when they saw him shake off the beast without receiving any harm, they altered their opinion, and said he was a god.—On this occasion, the promise which Jesus made to his disciples was fulfilled: Mark xvi. 18. 'They shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them.'

It happened that the chief man of the island, whose name was Publius, had his estate in the quarter where the ship was stranded. This excellent person invited them to his house, and lodged them three days, till they could all be disposed of properly through the island. To such goodness Paul was happy to be able to make some return. For the father of Publius, Acts xxviii. 8. 'lying sick of a fever and bloody flux, he went in to him, and laying his hands upon him, healed him. 9. So when this was done, others also who had diseases in the island came, and were healed.' The sick people who were thus miraculously cured, together with their relations and friends, grateful to Paul, performed to him, and to all them who were with him, during their abode in the island, every office of kindness in their power; and at their departure laden them with such things as were necessary for their voyage.

Paul's Voyage from Melitè to Puteoli. His Journey from Puteoli by land to Rome. His reception and confinement in Rome. The Centurion's behaviour to Paul described and praised.

AND now having abode in Melitè three months, they went aboard a ship of Alexandria which had wintered in the island, and sailed to Syracuse, the chief city of Sicily, where they remained three days; then came to Rhegium, a town on the Italian shore opposite to Mesana in Sicily; and from thence to Puteoli, a great seaport town of Campania, not far from Naples. Here finding brethren to whom Paul was known, at least by his fame, they entreated him to tarry with them seven days: and Julius was so good as to grant their request. After which Julius set out with the prisoners and soldiers for Rome, by land. And now the brethren in that city, to whom Paul was well known by his letter lately written to the Romans, hearing that he was on the road, came out to meet him; being not ashamed of his bonds. Some of them therefore came as far as to the town of Apri Forum, which was fifty-one miles from that city; and others, to Tres Tabernæ, a town at the distance of thirty miles, which afterwards became a bishop's see. This unlooked-for testimony of respect from the brethren of Rome, making a strong impression upon the apostle's mind, he thanked God for it, and took courage, being greatly refreshed by the company and conversation of such affectionate friends; after which they all went forward to the city, where it is supposed they arrived in the February of A. D. 60, in the seventh year of the reign of the emperor Nero.

The humanity with which Julius all along treated the apostle from the time he was delivered to him, merits particular attention. At Sidon he allowed him to go ashore to visit his Christian friends: And when they were shipwrecked on the island of Melitè, he kept the soldiers from killing the prisoners, that he might save Paul: And because some brethren at Puteoli wished Paul to remain with them a week, he was so good as to grant their desire: And, as this worthy person is said by Luke to have courteously entreated Paul through the whole of the voyage, he may have bestowed on him favours which are not particularly mentioned. Those, however, which are mentioned deserve notice, as proofs of esteem and love from a heathen, very honourable to the apostle.—Julius's esteem of Paul was founded at first on the favourable opinion which Festus, Agrippa, and the Tribune, had formed of his cause, and which no doubt they made known to Julius before he left Cæsarea. But his esteem of the apostle must have increased by what he himself observed in the course of their acquaintance. For in his conversation Paul expressed such just views of God and religion, and of all the duties of morality, and in his actions shewed such benevolence to mankind, and such a concern for their real interest, as could not fail to endear him to so great a friend to virtue as this centurion seems to have been. Besides, if Paul was represented to Julius as one who could work miracles, that circumstance alone would induce him to treat him with great respect; and more especially, when he became himself a witness to the accomplishment of Paul's prediction concerning their shipwreck, and to the miraculous cures which he performed on the sick in the island of Melitè.

Julius therefore having so great a friendship for Paul, and it may be a favourable opinion of the Christian doctrine, we may suppose, that when he delivered the prisoners to Afranius Burrhus, who was then Prætorian præfect, he did justice to Paul, by representing him, not only as entirely innocent of any real crime, but as a man of singular probity, who was highly favoured of God; and endowed with extraordinary powers. To this representation, as well as to Festus's letter, I think the apostle was indebted for the indulgence which was shewn him immediately on his arrival at Rome. For he was not shut up in a common jail with the other prisoners, but from the very first was allowed to dwell in his own hired house, with a soldier who kept him by means of a chain fastened to his right wrist and to the soldier's left arm. This is the chain of which Paul so often speaks in his epistles, calling it his bonds; and which he shewed to the Jews, when they came to him on the third day after his arrival.

Paul sends for the chief of the unbelieving Jews in Rome to his Lodging, and explains to them the Cause of his Imprisonment; but with little Success.

THE apostle's confinement at Rome being thus easy from the beginning, and every one that pleased having access to him, it came into his mind, that as the unbelieving Jews might be offended, when they heard he had appealed from the courts in Judea to Cæsar, it would be very proper to make an apology to them. Wherefore, on the third day after his arrival at Rome, he called the chief of the unbelieving Jews together; and when they were come, he said to them, Acts xxvii. 17. 'Men and brethren, though I have committed nothing against the people or customs of our fathers, yet was I delivered prisoner from Jerusalem into the hands of the Romans: 18. Who, when they had examined me, would have let me go, because there was no cause of death in me. 19. But when the Jews spake against it, I was constrained to appeal unto Cæsar;' adding, that he had done so, not because he had any thing to accuse his nation of to the emperor, but merely to assert his own innocence. And therefore he had called them together, to tell them that he was bound with the chain they saw on his wrist, because he affirmed that God had accomplished the hope of Israel, by sending the Christ. 21. 'And they said unto him, We neither received letters out of Judea concerning thee, neither any of the brethren that came shewed or spake any evil of thee.' It seems the apostle's accusers had not yet arrived. However, desiring his opinion concerning the sect of the Christians, which they told him 'was everywhere spoken against,' they appointed him a day, and many came into his lodging, Acts xxviii. 23. 'To whom he expounded* and testified the kingdom of God: he expounded the nature of the Messiah's kingdom, and testified that it was come in the gospel dispensation: 'Persuading them concerning Jesus, both out of the law of Moses, and out of the prophets, from morning till evening;' that is, in a long discourse, he shewed that the birth, doctrine, miracles, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus, and the pouring out of the Holy Spirit, had all happened exactly according to the predictions concerning the Christ contained in the law and the prophets; and from that agreement inferred, that Jesus was their long expected Messiah. 24. 'And some believed the things which were spoken, and some believed, not. 25. And when they agreed not among themselves, they departed; after Paul had spoken one word,' or quotation from Isaiah, in which the Jews' unbelief was foretold. And having thus reproved the unbelieving and disobedient among his hearers, he added, 28. 'Be it known therefore unto you, that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles, and that they will hear it. 29. And when he had said these words the Jews departed, and had great reasoning among themselves.' For notwithstanding all Paul had said, many of them still retained their sinful and inveterate prejudices against the gospel.

Luke having thus brought Paul's history down to his arrival at Rome, and having related what happened to him at his first coming, adds a short description of his two years' confinement in that city: Acts xxviii. 30. 'And Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, and received all that came unto him. 31. Preaching the kingdom of God, and teaching those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him.' This singular indulgence, of preaching the gospel without being hindered by any person, Paul enjoyed during the whole of his two years' imprisonment at Rome, because he preached only in his own hired house, and to those who came to him of their own accord. Whereas, if in Rome, as at Ephesus and the other great cities where he suffered persecution, he had gone about publicly preaching against the established idolatry, in all probability both the priests and the bigots would have been enraged; and of course the magistrates would have been obliged to interpose. These evils however the apostle avoided. For though he was brought to Rome, by the direction of God, for the purpose of bearing witness there concerning the Lord Jesus, it was not necessary that he should go about gathering the people to hear the gospel, as in places where he was utterly unknown. His fame as a preacher of the new doctrine, and as a worker of miracles, had reached Rome long before he arrived there, having been published by those who came from the provinces of Greece and Asia. Besides, his imprisonment itself, for preaching doctrines and attesting facts so contrary to the common experience of mankind, made a great noise, as the apostle himself insinuates, Philip. i. 12, 13. Wherefore, seeing Paul's house was open to every corner, it is not to be doubted that many resorted to him daily, some out of curiosity to hear and see the chief of a sect which was now become so numerous, and who was said to be endued with extraordinary powers; others, from an honest inclination seriously to inquire into the strange things which he spake concerning Jesus of Nazareth, and to examine the evidence which he offered in support of them.—Now to all these the apostle willingly preached, bearing witness to Christ at Rome, even as formerly in Jerusalem. And though Luke has not mentioned it, Paul himself hath told us, that his testimony concerning Jesus was well received, and that he made many converts in Rome, among whom were some even of the emperor's domestics, whose salutation he sent to the Philippians, chap. iv. 22.—Further, he says that the brethren in Rome, encouraged by his example, perhaps also strengthened by the gifts of the Spirit, which he imparted to them according to his promise, Rom. i. 11., preached the gospel more openly and boldly than they would otherwise have done; while at the same time some of the Judaizing teachers preached with the malicious intention of adding affliction to the apostle's bonds; namely, by provoking the magistrates against him, as the ringleader of the obnoxious sect, Philip. i. 14, 15.

* Because ἐκτιθέμενος, when historical matters are spoken of, does not signify to expound, but to narrate fully, Le Clerc proposes to construe and translate ver. 23. thus: 'ὅς ἐκτιθέμενος τὰ περί τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, διακηρυττομένης τῆς βασιλείας τοῦ Θεοῦ, κηρύττει τὰς ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου Μωϋσέως καὶ τῆς προφητείας, &c.' To whom, from morning to evening, he narrated fully the history of Jesus, bearing witness to the kingdom of God, and persuading them both from the law of Moses and from the prophets.'

An Account of the Letters which Paul wrote during his first imprisonment at Rome. He is at length set at liberty.

DURING his first confinement at Rome, the apostle wrote four epistles, which are still remaining;—namely, one to the Ephesians; another to the Philippians; a third to the Colossians; and the fourth to Philemon; and after his release he wrote his epistle to the Hebrews. In the epistles to the Philippians, Colossians, and Philemon, Timothy joined Paul: But he is not mentioned in the inscription of the epistle to the Ephesians, though it was written about the same time with the others, and sent along with the epistle to the Colossians. From this circumstance we may infer, that the letters to the Philippians, the Colossians, and Philemon, were written a little before the letter to the Ephesians, and while Timothy was at Rome; but that after they were finished, and before the letter to the Ephesians was begun, he left the city to go to Philippi, agreeably to the apostle's promise to the Philippians 'to send Timothy to them soon,' chap. ii. 19. and to what he tells the Hebrews, that Timothy was actually sent away, chap. xiii. 23. The letter to the Ephesians being written soon after that to the Colossians, and while the matter, and form, and very expressions of that letter were fresh in the apostle's mind, the two resemble each other so much, that they have been termed twin epistles, and throw light on each other. For which reason the apostle, very properly, ordered the Colossians to cause their epistle to be read in the church of the Laodiceans, to which it is supposed the Ephesians, agreeably to the direction given them by Tychicus, sent a copy of their epistle. If I am right in this conjecture, the epistle to the Ephesians is the letter from Laodicea, which the Colossians were ordered to read in their church, Col. iv. 16.

The apostle's letters just now mentioned shew, that during his confinement in Rome he was attended by many of his faithful disciples and friends, who had either accompanied him from Judea, or who had followed him to Rome. Of this number was Tychicus, by whom the apostle sent his epistle to the Colossians, chap. iv. 17. and Onesimus, ver. 9. and Mark, Barnabas' sister's son, ver. 10. to whom the apostle was now fully reconciled, and Jesus called Justus; all Jews by descent, ver. 11. except Onesimus. About this time his faithful friend Aristarchus was imprisoned for his zeal in preaching the gospel; but his other friend, Luke, had free access to him all the time of his imprisonment. Demas, too, was with him, Col. iv. 14. and Timothy, Philip. i. 1.

Besides, the churches of Greece and Asia, hearing of his imprisonment, sent some of their most esteemed members to inquire concerning his welfare, and to minister unto him. Of this number was Epaphras, who came from Colosse, and Epaphroditus from Philippi. These abode a considerable time with the apostle, and gave him all the assistance in their power, especially in the work of the ministry; not to mention the good offices which he received from the Roman brethren, whose esteem and affection he had formerly experienced in their coming all the way to Appii Forum and Tres Tabernæ, to conduct him into the city.

It is now time to relate, that Paul, during his two years' confinement at Rome, having preached the gospel with great success, and edified the churches of Greece and Asia by the divinely inspired letters which he wrote them during that period, was at length released in the spring of A. D. 62, answering to the 9th year of Nero. Luke indeed has not directly mentioned Paul's release: But by limiting his confinement to two years, he has insinuated that he was then set at liberty. His confinement at Rome issued thus favourably through the goodness of his cause, and through the intercession of some powerful friends in Caesar's family, who had embraced the Christian faith, and who were greatly interested in the fortune of one who was so strong a pillar of the new religion which they had espoused.

It is conjectured, that Paul was released when he wrote his epistle to the Hebrews; because he says to them, ch. xiii. 23. 'Know ye that our brother Timothy is sent away, with whom, if he come shortly, I will see you.' Timothy, it seems, had been sent to Philippi, according to the apostle's promise, Philip. ii. 19. and had been ordered to return as soon as possible; and the apostle was waiting his return at Rome, or rather in some of the towns of Italy, Heb. xiii. 24. when he wrote his letter to the Hebrews.

CHAP. XL.—Paul's History, from the time he was released from his first confinement at Rome, to his death.

OF Paul's travels and preaching, between his release and martyrdom, we have no authentic record remaining. Nevertheless, from the intimations which he has given of his purposes, in the epistles which he wrote from Rome during his first confinement, we may suppose the following sketch of the transactions of the latter part of his life to bear some resemblance to the truth.

Paul sails from Italy to Judea. In his way he touches at Crete, accompanied by Titus and Timothy. Leaving Titus in Crete, he sails with Timothy to Judea.

THE apostle being released in the spring of A. D. 62, (as was shewn in the preface to the epistle to the Philippians), embarked with Titus, perhaps also with Timothy, in some of the ports of Italy, designing to visit the churches of Judea according to his promise, Heb. xiii. 23. But in the course of his voyage happening to touch at Crete, he preached in many cities there; and either gathered new churches, or increased the churches already gathered.

About this time Judea was full of robbers and Sicarii, who went about in armed bands, and plundered the villages, after killing the inhabitants who made any resistance. Impostors also arose, who drew many after them, by promising to work for them miraculous deliverances. These disturbances were increased by the extreme severity of the Roman government, which exasperated the people to such a degree, that, in asserting their liberty, they raised those seditions which ended in the war whereby Jerusalem and the Jewish state were overthrown. The mischiefs occasioned by these disorders falling with equal weight upon the disciples of Christ as upon others, the apostle, when he received information thereof, judged his presence and advice might be necessary for supporting the brethren in Judea. Wherefore, leaving Titus in Crete, to set in order the things which were wanting, and to ordain elders in every city, Tit. i. 1. he set sail for Judea with Timothy, who, if he did not accompany him from Italy, had come to him in Crete.

Being arrived in Judea, Paul visited the church of Jerusalem, and the other churches in that country, to which he had lately sent an epistle from Rome, inscribed to the Hebrews.

Paul and Timothy travel through Syria and Cilicia, and the countries of the Lesser Asia, visiting the Churches. They abide some time at Colosse, where Paul writes his Epistle to Titus. He leaves Timothy in Ephesus, and goes into Macedonia.

ARTAX spending some time in comforting and instructing the brethren in Judea, Paul, accompanied by Timothy, left Judea, to visit the churches of the Lesser Asia; taking, as usual, Antioch in his way, where he had so often and so successfully ministered in the gospel. From Antioch, Paul and his assistants travelled through Cilicia into Galatia, and after that went to Colosse, where he had desired Philemon to provide him a lodging, ver. 22. because he intended to spend some time in that city.

While the apostle abode at Colosse, he wrote his epistle to Titus in Crete. Here also he met with Tychicus, who before Paul's release had been sent from Rome with the epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians, Col. iv. 8.; for in his epistle to Titus he told him, he would send Tychicus or Artemas into Crete, that Titus might come to him at Nicopolis, where he proposed to winter. And having finished his business at Colosse, he went forward to Ephesus, in his way to Macedonia. At his departure from Ephesus, the apostle left Timothy there, to direct the affairs of the numerous church in that city, 1 Tim. i. 3.

In travelling to Macedonia the apostle came to Tross, where, lodging with Carpus, he left in his keeping (φωρῶν) the oleak, which, according to some, his father had received as the badge of his being a Roman citizen. But others think this was a bag, or bookcase, with certain books, supposed to be books of the Jewish scriptures. He left likewise some parchments with Carpus, containing, perhaps, the autographs, or original copies of his own epistles to the churches; or the epistles which he had received from the churches. These parchments he afterwards ordered Timothy to bring to him during his second imprisonment, 2 Tim. iv. 13. designing, I suppose, to acknowledge them as his writings, and to deliver them to Timothy with his own hand, to be kept for the use of the churches, after he was gone.

Paul visits the Churches in Macedonia, writes his First Epistle to Timothy, and winters at Nicopolis. From that city he goes into Crete. Leaving Crete, he goes with Titus to Rome, where he is imprisoned a second time.

IN Macedonia Paul visited the several churches; and among the rest that at Philippi, which had shewn him such kindness in his former confinement. From Macedonia he went to Nicopolis, Tit. iii. 12. a city of Epirus, where he spent the winter. Here Titus came to him from Crete, according to his order, Tit. iii. 12. Here also, or at Philippi, he wrote his first epistle to Timothy in Ephesus, to direct him how he ought to behave himself in the church of the living God; fearing it would not be in his power to return to Ephesus at the time he proposed when he parted with Timothy, 1 Tim. iii. 14, 15. Accordingly, the account given by Titus of the churches in Crete determining him to visit them, he changed his resolution, and instead of returning to Ephesus, he set out early in the spring from Nicopolis for Crete, accompanied by Titus, Trophimus, and Erastus; and taking Corinth in his way, Erastus, who was a native of that city, chose to abide there. When they arrived at Crete Trophimus fell sick, and was left in Miletus, a city of that island, 2 Tim. iv. 20.

About this time the emperor Nero began that persecution of the Christians, which is reckoned the first of the ten general persecutions. The occasion of it was this. Nero himself having set fire to the city, on the tenth of July A. D. 64, a great part of it was laid in ashes. And being generally believed the author of that calamity, he became the object of the popular hatred. Wherefore, to clear himself from the imputation of so odious a crime, Nero, in the month of November following, began to punish the Christians as the incendiaries, and treated them with such cruelty, that at length the people's compassion towards them was raised. The torments which the Christians now endured, on account of their supposed guilt, are described by Tacitus, (Ann. lib. xv. c. 44.), who informs us, that many of them being apprehended, some were covered with the skins of wild beasts, and thrown to dogs to be devoured; others were crucified; others were fastened to stakes, and daubed over with pitch, and had fire set to them, that they might burn instead of torches in the night-time. By these, and such like cruelties, the historian says (ingens multitudo) a prodigious number of Christians were destroyed.

The news of these cruelties being brought to Crete, the apostle thinking his presence might be useful in comforting the brethren, went with Titus to Italy, where they arrived about the time Nero set out for Achaia, and where the prætorian prefect, who was left to govern the city in the emperor's absence, continued the persecution with a cruelty equal to that of Nero himself. Wherefore, though the danger was great, the apostle went to Rome in the beginning of A. D. 65, where he exerted the same zeal and activity in promoting the Christian cause as formerly. But the priests and bigots pointing him out to the magistrates as a chief man among the obnoxious sect, he was apprehended and imprisoned, in order to be punished.

How long Paul continued in prison at this time, we know not. But from his being twice brought before the emperor, or his prefect, it may be presumed, that he was imprisoned a year or more before he was condemned.

Paul appears before Nero the first time. Writes his Second Epistle to Timothy, and at last suffers Martyrdom.

THE danger to which Paul was exposed by this second imprisonment, appeared so great to his assistants, that most of them fled from the city. Luke alone remained with him: and even he was so intimidated, that he durst not stand by him when he made his first answer, 2 Tim. iv. 11. 16. While the apostle's friends thus deserted him, his enemies waxed more bold; especially Alexander the Ephesian coppersmith, whom formerly the apostle had delivered to Satan, for his errors and vices. This person, moved with resentment, came to Rome, and did Paul much harm, 'by withstanding his words,' 2 Tim. iv. 14. It seems he joined his prosecutors, and in the presence of his judges loudly contradicted the facts which Paul alleged in his own vindication. Wherefore it was with the utmost difficulty he escaped condemnation after making his first defence; so that he looked for nothing but a sentence of death, when next brought before his judges.

Impressed, therefore, with a view of his approaching condemnation, Paul wrote his second epistle to Timothy; in which he desired him to come to him before winter, ver. 21. and to bring Mark with him, ver. 11. that they might receive his last instructions, and assist him in the ministry during the few months he had to live. Withal, to induce Timothy the more cheerfully to come, he told him he had sent Tychicus to Ephesus, 2 Tim. iv. 12. to supply his place there.—From this epistle we learn also, that although the apostle's assistants, terrified with the danger that threatened him, forsook him and fled, he was not altogether without consolation. For the brethren of Rome came to him privately, and ministered to him; as we learn from his sending their salutation to Timothy, 2 Tim. iv. 21.

Most of the particulars above mentioned the apostle hath suggested in his own letters, especially in his second to Timothy. What followed we learn from ancient Christian writers, who inform us, that Paul was condemned and put to death in the 13th year of the reign of Nero, answering to A. D. 66. And two years after that, namely A. D. 68, Nero put an end to his own life, and to this terrible persecution, after it had continued four years, and swept off a prodigious number of the disciples of Christ.

CHAP. XII.—Character and Eulogy of the Apostle Paul.

SUCH was the life, and such the death of Paul the Apostle of Jesus Christ. In his younger years, being exceedingly zealous of the law of Moses, he persecuted the Christians as enemies of God and religion. But after Jesus appeared to him, and shewed him his error in denying his resurrection, he forthwith became a zealous and indefatigable preacher of that faith which formerly he was so active in destroying. In the rolls of fame, Paul stands deservedly next to his divine Master as a teacher of religion and morality; being without comparison a greater hero by that undertaking, and much more worthy of admiration, than the greatest of those who have been called great. The bodily labour which he endured, the dangers which he encountered, the sufferings which befell him, and the courage which amidst all these evils he exerted in his apostolic office, shew that his virtues, both active and passive, were far superior to those which the most renowned conquerors have exhibited in the pursuits of ambition or fame. The end, likewise, for which he exerted such an high degree of all the virtues, was more noble; being not to amass riches, or to acquire power, or to obtain fame, or to conquer kingdoms, or to enslave mankind; but to deliver the nations of the world from the thralldom of ignorance, idolatry, and wickedness, by imparting to them the knowledge of God and of a future state, and by teaching them those duties of religion and morality, on which their happiness both in time and eternity wholly depends.

This noble, this beneficent employment, Paul prosecuted with unremitting diligence for the space of thirty years; all the while foreseeing and experiencing innumerable evils as the consequence of his generous undertaking, without reaping from it any worldly advantage whatever. Such heroic benevolence is the more to be esteemed, that at the time Paul carried the light of the gospel through the world, mankind were involved in one thick cloud of darkness, which hindered them from discerning those spiritual matters, which, as reasonable beings designed to exist through eternity, it was of the greatest importance for them to know. Wherefore, if any person ever merited well of mankind, it is Paul, who with such unwearied activity, and with such labour and loss to himself, imparted to the nations of the world the knowledge of the true God, and of the way of salvation.

But this most excellent man is entitled to admiration and gratitude, not from those alone who put a just value on religious knowledge, but from those also who esteem nothing but what promotes the interest of the present life. For the gospel which Paul spread through the world, hath been the source of many of those good qualities whereby such as have embraced the Christian religion have been rendered superior to all who have gone before them. More particularly, the gospel hath introduced good faith, which is the foundation of mutual confidence between nations, in their leagues and compacts; it hath banished that fierceness with which the most civilized nations anciently carried on war; it hath diffused that humanity and complaisance, by which modern manners are so happily distinguished from the ancient. Nay, if I am not mistaken, the gospel hath, by accident, contributed to the improvement even of the sciences and the arts: for, by the great objects which it presents to the minds of men, their intellectual faculties have been enlarged and strengthened; and by the rewards of immortality which it promises, its votaries have been inspired with a sense of their own dignity, and such hopes have been infused into their breasts, as have rendered them not only just, but active, even in the affairs of this life. Let the gospel, therefore, have its due praise, which holds out distinguished rewards in the future life even to those who mingle in the affairs of the present, and who, from just principles, promote the temporal interest of their fellow-creatures. Also let the blessed Paul have his praise, to whom chiefly we in this part of the world are indebted for our knowledge of the gospel, and for all the advantages, temporal and eternal, of which the gospel hath been the happy occasion to mankind.

No. I. STIRRED up the most zealous members of the foreign synagogues in Jerusalem.—Vitrings, de Syn. Vet. lib. i. p. l. c. 14. tells us from Jewish authors, that there were 480 synagogues in Jerusalem. And learned men suppose, that of these a number were composed of Jews from the provinces, who chose to worship God in their native language. Lightfoot (Exercit. Acts vi. 9.) observes, that Jewish authors expressly mention a synagogue which the Alexandrian Jews had at Jerusalem. With respect to the synagogue of the Libertines, there are facts in history which shew who they were. Libertinus or Libertine is a Latin word, which signifies a slave who hath obtained his freedom: also, the son of such a person. From Philo we learn, that the 8000 Jews, who, as Josephus (Ant. xvii. 13. initio) tells us joined at Rome the embassy which came from Judea, to petition Augustus against Archelaus, were mostly of this denomination. For he expressly affirms, that the Jews at Rome were generally such as had been taken captives, but were made free by their Roman masters. Tacitus likewise speaks of the Jews, when he tells us, Ann. ii. 85.* that 4000 of the Libertine race were transported into Sardinia. Besides, Suetonius (Tib. c. 36.) and Josephus (Antiq. xviii. 4. fine) expressly calls them Jews who were thus transported.

The Jewish Libertines being so numerous at Rome, and in Italy, it is probable that, like other foreign Jews, they had a synagogue in Jerusalem.—The members of all these foreign synagogues, being generally very zealous, were most fit instruments to be employed in opposing the disciples of Christ. Accordingly they disputed with great vehemence against Stephen. Acts vi. 9. 'Then there arose certain of the synagogue of the Libertines, and Cyrenians, and Alexandrians, and of them of Cilicia and of Asia, disputing with Stephen. 10. And they were not able to resist the wisdom and the spirit by which he spake. 11. Then they suborned men, which said, we have heard him speak blasphemous words against Moses, and against God. 12. And they stirred up the people, &c.

No. II. It seems the synagogues in foreign parts had a jurisdiction over their own members.—In all the provinces of the Roman empire, the Jews were governed by a senate of their own; and where they were numerous, they had a chief magistrate, elected by themselves, who was sometimes called Alabarch, and sometimes Ethnarch.

Of the nature and extent of that separate government which the Jews exercised over those of their own race, we have the most authentic account in a decree concerning the Jews of Sardis, of which Josephus has preserved a copy. Antiq. xiv. c. 10. § 17. Gen. edit. page 437. and which deserves a place here. It is as follows:—“Lucius Antonius, son of Mark, proquestor and promotor, to the magistrates, senate, and people of Sardis, greeting. The Jews which are our citizens have shewn me that they have always had an assembly of their own according to the laws of their country, and a place of their own, in which they decide the affairs and differences which concern themselves. Having desired of me that it may be lawful for them so to do, I have decreed that this (right) be preserved and permitted to them.” Wherefore, Paul had reason to blame the Christians at Corinth for going to law with one another before the unbelievers, (1 Cor. vi. 6, 8,) since they might have decided these differences by their own judges. Josephus has also preserved an edict of Claudius, published in favour of the Jews in the beginning of his reign. In that edict Claudius observes, as a precedent, “That when a Jewish Ethnarch died, Augustus did not forbid the creation of a new Ethnarch; willing that all men should remain subject to him, but in the observation of their own customs.” And Strabo, in a passage not now in his works, but cited by Josephus, Ant. xiv. c. 7. § 2. says, “A good part of Alexandria is inhabited by this people, (the Jews). They have likewise an Ethnarch, who administers their affairs, decides causes, presides over contracts and mandates, as if he were the governor of a perfect republic.”

The Jews, in all the provinces of the Roman empire, being thus allowed to live according to their own customs, they regulated their conduct in every thing by the law of Moses; at least as far as it was possible for them to do it out of Judea. And as the high-priest and elders at Jerusalem were regarded by all the Jews as the interpreters and administrators of the law, the foreign Jews considered themselves as actually under their jurisdiction. And therefore, in all countries, they implicitly obeyed the mandates sent them from the council at Jerusalem; just as, in after-times, the clergy of the Romish communion in every country of Europe obeyed implicitly the mandates of the Pope and conclave at Rome.

No. III. Saul arose from the earth, and with his bodily eyes beheld Jesus standing in the way.—We are absolutely certain, that on this, or on some other occasion, Saul saw Jesus with the eyes of his body. For he hath twice affirmed that he saw Jesus in that manner. 1 Cor. xi. 1. ‘Am I not an apostle? Have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord?’ Chap. xv. 8. ‘Last of all, (ἔσχατος πάντων) he was seen of me also, as of an abortive apostle.’ Now it is to be observed, that this appearance of Jesus, Paul places among his other appearances to the rest of the apostles, which, without all doubt, were personal appearances. Besides, if Saul had not seen Jesus in the body after his resurrection, he could not have been made an apostle; whose chief business it was, as an eyewitness, to bear testimony to the resurrection of Jesus from the dead.—I acknowledge, that if we were to form our opinion of this matter solely upon the account which Luke hath given of it, Acts ix. 3—6, we could not be sure that Saul now saw Jesus. Yet if we attend to the words of Ananias, both as recorded in this chap. ver. 17. ‘The Lord Jesus who appeared to thee (ὁ ἐφάνη σοι, who was seen of thee) in the way;’ and as recorded Acts xxii. 14. ‘The God of our fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldest—see that just One, and shouldest hear the voice of his mouth.' Also, if we consider the words of Christ, 'I have appeared unto thee for this very purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness of those things which thou hast seen;' and that 'Barnabas declared to the apostles, how he had seen the Lord in the way,' Acts ix. 27.—I say, when all these expressions are duly attended to, we shall have little doubt that Saul saw Jesus standing before him in the way, (ver. 17.), when in obedience to his command he arose from the ground; but, not being able to endure the splendour of his appearance, or perhaps the better to express his reverence, he fell to the earth anew, and remained before him in that posture, till Christ ordered him to arise a second time, and go into the city; where it should be told him what he was to do Acts ix. 6. Then it was, that, on opening his eyes, he found himself absolutely blind.—This, I suppose, is a better account of Saul's seeing Jesus after his resurrection, than with some to affirm, that he saw him in his trance in the temple, or in his rapture into the third heaven. For on neither of these occasions did Saul see Jesus with his bodily eyes; the impression, at these times, having been made upon his mind by the power of Christ, and not by means of his external senses; so that he would not have been qualified by such a vision to attest Christ's resurrection from the dead.—I know that Paul had another corporeal sight of Jesus, namely, after he had made his defence before the council, Acts xxiii. 11. But as the first epistle to the Corinthians, in which Paul affirmed that he had seen the Lord, was written before he was favoured with that second corporeal sight of Jesus, he cannot be thought in that epistle to have spoken of an event which had not then happened.

No. IV. That thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost.—From Ananias administering baptism to Saul, Acts ix. 18. it would seem that he was one of the prophets or teachers of the church of Damascus. He may likewise have possessed the gift of healing diseases; and in that character may have been sent to restore Paul's sight. But he told him likewise, he was sent that he might be filled with the Holy Ghost. Nevertheless, from the other examples recorded in the Acts, and from the passages in the epistles where the communication of the spiritual gifts is mentioned, and from Acts viii. 14, 15, 17. it appears, that none but apostles had the power of conferring the Holy Ghost on believers. For, when Philip had converted the Samaritans, the apostles at Jerusalem sent unto them Peter and John, that they might receive the Holy Ghost. Wherefore, if Ananias, who was not an apostle, really conferred the Holy Ghost on Saul, he did it by virtue of a special commission; and having accomplished what was appointed him, his power ended with the fulfilment of his commission. From the history, however, we cannot gather that any such commission was given to Ananias. And therefore we may interpret his words to Saul in this manner: The Lord Jesus hath sent me, that thou mightest receive thy sight, and when thou hast received thy sight, that thou mightest, by an immediate illapse, be filled with the Holy Ghost. According to this way of understanding the matter, Saul received his sight when Ananias spake to him and put his hands on him, Acts ix. 12.; But he did not receive the Holy Ghost till he was baptized; and then, by some visible symbol which Saul saw, the Holy Ghost fell upon him, as upon the apostles at the beginning. So that he was not a whit behind the very greatest apostles, as he himself affirms; being baptized, not with water only, but with the Holy Ghost and with fire, according to John Baptist's prediction. Besides, if an inferior prophet, or even an apostle, had been employed to communicate the Holy Ghost to Saul, that circumstance would have been urged as an argument to prove Saul an apostle of an inferior order: whereas, in the manner we have supposed him to have received the Holy Ghost, no argument could be drawn in prejudices of his authority. An ordinary prophet was sent to give Saul premonition of his being to receive the Holy Ghost. This, with the recovery of his sight, gave him the fullest assurance that what had befallen him by the way was no illusion, but a real appearance. To conclude, the supposition that the Holy Ghost was communicated to Paul by an immediate illapse, will appear still more probable, if the observation of many commentators is just, that the phrase filled with the Holy Ghost is never applied in scripture to those who received the Holy Ghost by the imposition of the hands of men, but to those on whom the Holy Ghost descended in some visible symbol.

No. V. When Saul was about thirty-four years of age.—The time of Saul's conversion may be determined, with a good degree of probability, in the following manner.—When the brethren at Jerusalem sent him forth to Tarsus, it is said, Acts ix. 31. 'Then had the churches rest throughout all Judea, and Galilee, and Samaria, and were edified.' If this rest of the churches throughout all the land, which the historian hath connected with Saul's going to Tarsus, was occasioned, as learned men and chronologers have thought, by the publication of the Emperor Caius's order to set up his statue in the temple of Jerusalem, we can nearly determine the time of Saul's conversion. For Josephus tells us, (Ant. xviii. 9. al. 11.), That "Caius, greatly incensed against the Jews for not paying him that respect which others did, sent Petronius governor into Syria, commanding him to set up his statue in the temple, and if the Jews opposed it, to march into the country with an army, and effect it by force." The same historian adds, (Bell. xi. 10. § 1.), "That he enjoined him, if the Jews opposed it, to put to death all who made any resistance, and to make all the rest of the nation slaves. Petronius, therefore, marched from Antioch into Judea with three legions, and a large body of auxiliaries raised in Syria." Now it is allowed, that Caius sent Petronius into Syria in the third year of his reign, answering to A. D. 39. And it is supposed he came into the province in the autumn of 39, or in the beginning of A. D. 40.

Wherefore, as the publication of Caius's order affected the whole people of Judea, we may suppose with Lardner, that it threw the unbelieving Jews into such a consternation, that they had no leisure to think of persecuting the Christians any longer. A disaster hung over themselves, which threatened destruction to their religion, perhaps to their nation; so that they were wholly possessed by their own fears. Our Saul seems to have been the last who was hurt by the persecution which had vexed the church after the death of Stephen. For the historian having narrated the attempt of the Grecians to kill him, and the care of the brethren to save his life by sending him away, adds, 'Then had the churches rest.' Saul therefore set out for Tarsus in the year 39, a little before Petronius published the emperor's order.

Further, according to Saul's own account, his arrival at Jerusalem, before he went to Tarsus, happened full three years after his conversion, Gal. i. 18. Wherefore, if the rest of the churches was occasioned by the publication of Caius's order in the end of A. D. 39, or in the beginning of A. D. 40, Saul's conversion, three years before, must have happened in the end of the year 36, or in the beginning of 37, when he was 34 years of age; a time of life at which men are as qualified to judge of religious matters as at any time whatever.—That Saul was not more than 34 years of age when he was converted, may be gathered likewise from his being called a young man at the time of Stephen's death, which happened, as is generally believed, A. D. 35, about a year before Saul's conversion. To 34, Saul's age A. D. 36, add the 36 years which elapsed from that time to A. D. 62, when he wrote his epistle to Philemon, and he will then have been 59 or 60 years old, and so might very properly then call himself Paul the aged. But if he was more than 60 when he wrote that letter, he must have been more than 34 at his conversion.

No. VI. Straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues, that he is the Son of God.—Learned men are not agreed, whether this preaching in the synagogues of Damascus happened before Saul went into Arabia, or after he returned thence. They who think it happened after his return, found their opinion on the following argument:—If Saul had begun to preach in Damascus before he went into Arabia, he probably would have preached in that country also. And yet, in the account which he gave of his preaching to Agrippa, he does not say that he preached in Arabia at all, Acts xxvi. 20. Besides, if Paul had preached in Damascus before he went into Arabia, the news thereof must have reached Jerusalem before he went thither himself, and, by consequence, the brethren there could not have been ignorant of his being a disciple.—They who think Saul preached in Damascus before he went into Arabia, found their opinion on the account which Luke has given of the matter Acts ix. 19. 'And when he had received meat, he was strengthened. Then was Saul with the disciples certain days at Damascus: and straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues.' Now, though it does not necessarily follow from the expression 'straightway he preached,' that this happened a few days after his conversion, yet they think the remark which the Jews at Damascus made on Saul's preaching shews that it so happened: ver. 21. 'But all that heard him were amazed, and said, Is not this he that destroyed them which called on this name in Jerusalem, and came hither for that intent, that he might bring them bound to the chief priests?'—To the argument taken from Luke's expression, 'straightway he preached Christ in the synagogues,' it is replied, That the sacred historians often relate things as connected, which happened at a considerable distance of time from each other, and between which things intervened which they did not think proper to relate. See examples of this manner of recording events in Prelim. Observ. iii. prefixed to my Harmony of the Gospels. Next, with respect to the remark which the Jews at Damascus made on Saul's preaching Christ, every reader must be sensible that it might as properly be made on his preaching Christ after his return from Arabia, as immediately after his conversion.

No. VII. While Saul was in Cilicia, he had those visions and revelations of the Lord, of which he speaks, 2 Cor. xii. 1.—The time of these visions, with other dates in Paul's history, are fixed in the following manner. When Paul first came to Corinth, he found Aquila with his family settled there, after being driven from Rome by Claudius's edict, which was published in the eleventh year of his reign. But according to the best chronologers, the eleventh year of Claudius began January 24, A. D. 51. Wherefore, although his decree was published in the beginning of that year, Aquila could not be settled in Corinth sooner than the end of the spring 51. See Pref. to 1 Cor. sect. 1. Consequently Paul did not arrive till autumn. And having abode at Corinth a year and six months, he sailed to Cæsarea in spring 53; then went up and saluted the church of Jerusalem, after which he went down to Antioch; and having spent some time there, he departed, and went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order; and so came to Ephesus.

His voyage from Corinth to Cæsarea, and his journey by land from Judea to Ephesus, may have been performed in a year and ten months, so that if the apostle left Corinth in the beginning of spring, he may have come to Ephesus in the end of the year 54. At Ephesus he abode two years and three months, then went over to Macedonia, where he arrived early in the year 57. In Macedonia he wrote his second epistle to the Corinthians, (2 Cor. vii. 5, 6. viii. 18.), after which, travelling through Macedonia, he preached on the borders of Illyricum, Rom. xv. 19. These transactions would take up all the spring and summer, and part of the autumn of the year 57. The apostle after that went into Greece to receive the collections which the churches of Achaia had made for the brethren in Judea. For it is said, Acts xx. 2, 3. 'Having gone over those parts, and given them much exhortation, he came into Greece, and there abode three months. During his abode in Greece he wrote his epistle to the Romans at Corinth, not long before he set out for Jerusalem with the collections. In making this voyage he proposed to sail from Cenchrea. But the Jews lying in wait for him there, he changed his purpose, returned to Macedonia, and arrived at Philippi about the time of the passover in the year 58. For after the days of unleavened bread he left Philippi, and took ship to sail into Syria, Acts xx. 6.

I now put the reader in mind of what Paul himself tells us, 2 Cor. xii. 2, 4. namely, that he was carried up into the third heaven, more than 14 years before he wrote his second epistle to the Corinthians. Wherefore that epistle being written in the beginning of the year 57, (See Pref. to 2 Cor. sect. 3.), his rapture, 14 years before, must have happened in the end of A. D. 43, or in the beginning of A. D. 43, full seven years before the council of Jerusalem, which was held in the end of A. D. 50, (No. XXII.) But the council of Jerusalem happened about 14 years after Saul's conversion, Gal. ii. 1. perhaps 14 years wanting some months; so that by this computation likewise, Saul was converted in the end of A. D. 36. Three years after his conversion he went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, viz. in the end of A. D. 39; and having abode with him 15 days, he was sent forth to Tarsus in Cilicia, in which country Barnabas found him towards the end of A. D. 45, (No. IX.), about three years after his rapture; which, as is said above, happened in the end of 43, or in the beginning of 43, consequently six years after his conversion.

No. VIII. And Antioch.—Anciently there were many cities of the name of Antioch. But this was the metropolis of Syria, and indeed of all the east, being little inferior in magnitude and populousness to Alexandria in Egypt, or even to Rome itself. It was built by Seleucus, one of Alexander's successors, who named it after his son Antiochus, and peopled it with Greeks. But many Jews also settled there. For Josephus tells us, Bell. vii. c. 3. § 3. 'That the kings of Syria allowed the Jews the freedom of Antioch equally with the Greeks, so that their numbers increased exceedingly; and that they were always bringing over a great many of the Greeks to their religious worship, whom they made in some sort a part of themselves.'—Antioch was remarkable for the beauty of its situation, the magnificence of its buildings, the extensiveness of its commerce, and the learning and ingenuity of its inhabitants. Hence Cicero, in an oration for the poet Archias, a native of Antioch, says, c. 3. "Primum Antiochiæ (nam ibi natus, loco nobili, celebri quondam urbe et copiosa, atque eruditissimis hominibus liberalissimisque studiis adfluente) celeriter antecellere omnibus ingenii gloria contigit."—But while Antioch was thus famous for learning and the arts, the manners of its inhabitants were exceedingly corrupted by its vicinity to Daphne, a village in the neighbourhood, where, under the pretext of religion, all manner of sensuality was practised, in so much that the manners of those who frequented Daphne became a proverb.—But however famous Antioch was for the circumstances mentioned by the orator, it became more famous for its having the light of the gospel so early bestowed on it, and for that numerous Christian church which was early planted there, and for its giving the name of Christians to the disciples. On the other hand, it brought no small honour to the gospel, that such a numerous church was so early gathered in Antioch from among a people so intelligent, and who at the same time were so dissolute, but who changed their manners after they embraced the gospel.—The Christian religion flourished to such a degree in Antioch for many ages, that it obtained the name of ἡ πόλις τοῦ θεοῦ, the city of God. And the church there was considered as the first, and chief of all the Gentile churches.

No. IX. After he had been about five years in Cilicia.—That Saul abode five years in Cilicia and the neighbouring countries, may be proved in the following manner. He was sent forth from Jerusalem to Tarsus, full three years after his conversion: Then, 14 years wanting some months after his conversion, he went to Jerusalem to the council, in the end of A. D. 49, or in the beginning of A. D. 50. Wherefore, between these two events, there elapsed somewhat more than 10 years. Of these 10 years, Saul spent five years with Barnabas, after they left Tarsus; as any one may know who considers the account which Luke has given of their joint labours. For on leaving Tarsus they came to Antioch, where they ‘assembled with the church a whole year,’ Acts xi. 26. After this, they went up to Jerusalem with the alms of the brethren of Antioch; and having finished that ministry, they returned to Antioch, where they abode till the Holy Ghost commanded the prophets of Antioch to separate them for the work to which he had called them, Acts xiii. 2. Upon this, going down to Seleucia, a seaport town on the Orontes, they sailed to Cyprus; and having travelled that island, they came to Paphos, and from thence sailed to Pamphylia; and having preached in that country, they went into Pisidia, and from thence into Lycaonia, preaching the gospel, and planting churches in all the great cities. In Iconium particularly they are said to have ‘abode long time,’ Acts xiv. 3. But being driven out of that city, they went to Derbe, and Lystra, and the region that lieth round about; (I suppose the region of Galatia and Phrygia); and there having taught many, they returned, and visited the churches which they had planted, and ordained elders in every city, till they came to Atalia; where taking ship, they sailed to Antioch in Syria. These different journeys and transactions could not be accomplished in less than three years. After their return to Antioch, ‘they abode long time with the disciples’ before they went up to Jerusalem to the council. Now this, with the three years which they spent in the Lesser Asia, added to the year spent at Antioch before they went to Jerusalem with the alms, and the time they abode in Antioch after their return, cannot make less than five years complete. And these being deducted from the 10 years which elapsed between Saul’s retreat into Cilicia and his going to the council of Jerusalem, there will remain full five years as the duration of his abode in Cilicia, previous to the five years of his labours with Barnabas.

No. X. The disciples were called Christians first in Antioch.—As the name Χριστιανος has a Latin, and not a Greek termination, learned men are of opinion, that it was given to the disciples, neither by themselves nor by the Greeks, but by the Romans, who imposed that name upon them, to signify that they were a new sect, of which Christ was the author. Accordingly, both Luke in his history, and Paul in his epistles, seem industriously to have avoided the use of that name, lest it should have been thought that they meant to represent their Master as an ordinary leader of a sect, like the noted philosophers among the Greeks and Romans. But though the name was thus offensive at first, it became afterwards very acceptable to the disciples of Jesus: for it is used by Peter, 1 Epist. iv. 16.; and some have thought it that worthy name of which James speaks, chap. ii. 17. Besides, we know that in process of time it was much and justly valued by those who bore it. Hence, in the epistles of the churches of Vienne and Lyons, it is styled an honourable, and glorious, and reviving appellation. Lardner, Can. vol. ii. p. 72.

Before the disciples of Jesus were named Christians, they were called by their enemies, men of that way, (Acts ix. 2. xix. 9. 23.) Galileans, and Nazarenes; but among themselves, they went by the name of disciples, saints, brethren, the church, them that call upon the Lord Jesus Christ, or upon his name, or upon the Lord, simply, 2 Tim. ii. 2. And the gospel itself was called the way of the Lord, the way of God, the way of salvation, and sometimes simply the way, Acts xxiv. 22.

No. XI. Did not confer on them the apostolical office.—Barnabas and Saul were not on this occasion separated by the church of Antioch to the ministry in general: They had discharged that office long before. Neither were they made apostles by the church of Antioch. An apostle of men was no apostle; and therefore Paul disclaimed that character, in the loudest manner, by affirming, Gal. i. 1. ‘That he was an apostle, not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ, and God the Father.’ In which he spoke the truth; for at the time of his conversion Jesus expressly made him an apostle, saying to him, Acts xvi. 16. ‘I have appeared to thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister, and a witness, both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in the which I will appear unto thee; 17. Delivering thee from the people (the Jewish people) and from the Gentiles, (οἱ Ἕες καὶ οἱ ἑθνικοὶ) unto whom I now send thee: 18. To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God,’ &c.

To Saul’s being made an apostle at his conversion it cannot be objected, that he did not then begin to discharge the apostolical office, but retired into Arabia: For the other apostles, after their election, did not go forth immediately to preach, but they remained mostly with their Master during his ministry, that they might be eye and ear-witnesses of the things which they were afterwards to testify to the world; and in the course of their attendance, they received from their Master various instructions and directions relative to their office: And when he was about to leave them, though he ordered them to go and teach all nations, they neither understood the full extent of their commission, nor did they immediately execute it. Yet they acted and taught as apostles according to the knowledge they then had of their duty; and by degrees proceeded to fulfil their commission, according as it was opened up to them. This was the case likewise with Saul, who though he was an apostle from the beginning, was fitted for the special duties of his office gradually, as circumstances required, until at length the whole extent of his commission was revealed to him.

Saul therefore was an apostle from the time of his conversion, and always acted and taught as such; preaching ‘first to them at Damascus, (after his return from Arabia), next at Jerusalem, and throughout all Judea, and then to the Gentiles.*

No. XII. He found in every country great numbers, not only of his own nation, but of the Gentiles, whom the Jews had turned from idols.—Lardner has well illustrated this fact, Credib. vol. i. c. 3. by passages from Philo, Josephus, and other authors, of which the following are the principal.

Philo, in the book 'which he wrote against Flaccus, president of Egypt, in the beginning of Caligula's reign, says, "There is no less than a million of Jews in Alexandria and other parts of Egypt;" and adds, "For one country does not contain the Jewish people, they being extremely numerous; for which reason, there are of them in all the best and most flourishing countries in Europe and Asia, in the islands, as well as on the continent; all esteeming for their metropolis the holy city, in which is the sacred temple of the most high God.' The same Philo, De Legatione ad Caium, mentions a letter of Herod Agrippa the elder, to the emperor Caius, to dissuade him from setting up his statue at Jerusalem, in which he says, "Nor can I forbear to allege in behalf of the holy city, the place of my nativity, that it is the metropolis, not of the country of Judea only, but of many others, on account of the many colonies that have been sent out of it at different times, not only into neighbouring countries, Egypt, Phœnicia, both the Syrias; but also into places more distant, to Pamphylia, Cilicia, and many parts of Asia, as well as Bithynia, and the recesses of Pontus. They are in the same manner in Europe—in Thessaly, Bœotia, Macedonia, Ætolia, Argos, Corinth, in the most and best parts of Peloponnesus. Nor are the continents only full of Jewish colonies, but also the most celebrated islands—Eubœa, Cyprus, Crete; not to mention those which are beyond the Euphrates. For excepting only a small part of Babylon, and some other lesser districts, scarce any country of note can be mentioned in which there are not Jewish inhabitants," &c. Lardner, vol. i. p. 232.

The zeal of the Jews in making proselytes is well known. Horace has taken notice of it, lib. i. sat. 4. ver. ult.

—*Ac veluti te
Judæi cogemus in hanc concedere turbam.*

Josephus likewise, in his second book against Apion, says, "We choose not to imitate the institutions of other people, but we willingly embrace all that will follow ours." And from various passages in the Acts it is evident, that many Gentiles, especially of the female sex, were brought to worship the one true God after the manner of the Jews.—To conclude, when the men of Damascus (A. n. 66.) had formed a design to make away with all the Jews of that place, Josephus tells us, Bell. lib. ii. c. 20. § 2. "They concealed their design very carefully from their wives, because all of them, except a very few, were devoted to the Jewish religion."

No. XIII. The proconsul of Cyprus, Sergius Paulus, resided.—When Augustus obtained the supreme power, he gave the inland provinces to the people, and reserved those on the frontiers of the empire to himself, designing by that distribution to keep in his hand the whole power of the armies. Dio (quoted by Lardner, vol. i. p. 52.) tells us, that the governors sent by the emperor into the provinces were called lieutenants, or propretors, though they were consular persons, that is, had served the office of consul in the city. But the governors sent by the senate into the provinces which belonged to them were called proconsuls; not only those who had been consuls, but those also who had been pretors only.—The division of the provinces made at first by Augustus, underwent many changes. For a province originally assigned to the senate, was afterwards given to the emperor; and on the contrary. Such a change happened with respect to the province of Cyprus, which, in the first partition, was one of the emperor's provinces, but was afterwards, together with Gallia Narbonnensis, given to the senate; instead of which he took Dalmatia, which formerly was theirs, as Dio informs us, lib. liv. p. 523. Wherefore, when Paul visited Cyprus, that island was one of the provinces which belonged to the senate; consequently, the proper title of its governor was that of proconsul. Accordingly, Sergius Paulus is so named by Luke; which shews his perfect knowledge of the state of the countries of which he writes.

This honourable and worthy person, like other proconsuls, had persons learned in the Roman law to assist him in judging causes. Also he had a council, (συγκριλον), as Festus likewise had, Acts xxv. 12. to advise with in difficult matters of state, and an officer to collect the taxes paid by the province. Besides, the presidents appointed to govern the provinces, commonly brought with them from Rome the most intelligent and faithful of their friends. These composed their council, and to them were joined some of the most considerable of the Roman citizens who resided in the province: also some of the most respectable natives of the country, who could give information concerning the state of the province, the customs of its inhabitants, and the genius of their political constitution. All, or most of these respectable persons, we may suppose, were witnesses to the apostle's transactions in Paphos.

No. XIV. Should go up to Jerusalem, to the apostles.—From this passage of the history, and from Acts viii. 1. Gal. i. 17. it appears, that while the inferior teachers went to distant parts, whether to avoid persecution or to make disciples, the apostles of the circumcision usually resided at Jerusalem. This I suppose they did by the divine direction, that the brethren in distant parts, who had need of their advice and assistance in any difficult matter, might know where to apply to them: and also that they might establish a church under their own immediate inspection, as a pattern, according to which, those who were converted in distant countries might be formed into assemblies for the public worship of God, and for edifying themselves with the gospel doctrine, steadily dispensed to them by the ministers of the word in these assemblies.

No. XV. The decree which they passed on the question, runs in the name of the whole church;—for it begins in this manner, Acts xv. 22. 'Then it seemed good to the apostles and elders, with the whole church.' The historian, however, does not mean, that all the brethren in Jerusalem were gathered together on this occasion. For what house could have held so great a multitude!—Peter by one sermon converted three thousand, and by another no less than five thousand. And without doubt, many more on other occasions were added to the church of Jerusalem by the joint labours of the whole apostles, who commonly resided there. The Christians being so numerous in Jerusalem, Moseheim (De Reb. Christ. ant. Constant. p. 117.) conjectures, that the faithful in that city met in separate assemblies for worshipping God; and that all who ordinarily came together in one and the same house, considered themselves as more particularly united. And therefore, when the question concerning the Gentiles was to be determined, seeing they could not all be present, they naturally deputed some of their most esteemed members to meet with the apostles and elders, to deliberate on that important subject. And these delegates having signified their assent to James's propositions; it was considered as the determination of the whole church.

This assembly hath long been denominated, very properly, The Council of Jerusalem; for the reason mentioned Pref. to the Galat. sect. 4. last parag. which see.

Concerning this council I have further to add, that the brethren of Antioch having sent to consult, not the apostles singly, but the apostles and elders at Jerusalem, they, it seems, called the brethren of that church to assist them in the deliberation. It is evident, therefore, that in deciding this very important question, the apostles did not use their apostolical authority, but offered an opinion, which they supported by reasons drawn from facts, and from the testimony of the scriptures, with a view to convince those who sat with them as judges of the matter under deliberation; and who, being convinced by the reasons which the apostles offered, agreed to what was proposed; which thus became the unanimous decision of the whole assembly. This method of ending the controversy the Holy Ghost had pointed out as the most proper, by a revelation made, either to Paul, or to some of the prophets of Antioch. For, as was observed Gal. ii. 2. note 1. the unanimous opinion of such a numerous body of men, respectable for their knowledge of the gospel doctrine, and of the dispensations of God, and of the writings of the prophets, and who enjoyed the gifts of the Spirit in abundance, could not but have a greater influence in quieting the minds of the zealous Jewish believers, than if the matter had been decided only by a few, even although they were apostles divinely inspired. To conclude, the decision given by this numerous and respectable assembly, being founded on the testimony which the Holy Ghost had borne to the justification of the Gentiles without circumcision, by his gifts bestowed on them even as upon the Jewish converts, the whole assembly, in the way they worded their decree, bare evidence to the reality of that testimony, and rendered it indubitable by this their unanimous decision: Acts xv. 28. 'It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us,' who have been witnesses of that declaration of his mind which the Holy Ghost made by communicating his gifts to the Gentiles.

No. XVI. Had no relation to the idolatrous Gentiles at all.—See Preface to Galatians, sect. 4. where the arguments which prove that the decree of the council of Jerusalem had no relation to the idolatrous Gentiles, but only to the proselytes, are proposed at great length. See however Lardner's Life of Peter, in his 3d vol. on the Canon, where he contends, that there were no proselytes of the gate.

No. XVII. And passing through Phrygia and the Galatian country.—This is the first mention that is made in the book of the Acts of Paul's being in Galatia and Phrygia. But from his own writings we know, he made many journeys and voyages which are not recorded by Luke. And even of the transactions mentioned by that historian, some are passed over very slightly. Wherefore, though Luke has not mentioned it, we may believe that Paul was in Phrygia and Galatia before this, and that he planted many churches there. If so, what time can we assign for that work more probable, than when he and Barnabas fled from Iconium to Derbe and Lystra, 'and into the region that lieth round about;' for Phrygia and Galatia lay round about Lyconia. Or, if the circumstances mentioned by Paul in his epistles lead us to think that he singly planted the churches of Galatia, we may suppose he performed that work during the five years which he spent in Cilicia and its neighbourhood, after he fled from Jerusalem. But of this, see more in the Preface to Paul's epistle to the Galatians, sect. 1.

No. XVIII. Philippi, which is the chief city of that part of Macedonia, and a colony.—Liv. B. xlv. c. 9. tells us, that when Paulus Emilius conquered Macedonia, he divided it into four parts; of which the first was that which lay between the rivers Strymon and Nessus; and that the chief city of that first part was Amphipolis. To avoid contradicting the Roman historian, the following translation of Luke's words is proposed by some: 'And thence to Philippi, which is (περὶ τὰς μέσας τὰς Μακεδονίας πρὸς ἑσπέρην) the first city of that part of Macedonia which is a colony.' But B. Pearce, in his Commentary on the Acts, thinks the common translation ought to be retained, because Luke, who was with the apostle at this time, could not be mistaken in a fact so obvious. And therefore, although formerly Amphipolis was the chief city of that division of Macedonia, we may on Luke's authority believe, that at the time Paul passed into Macedonia, Philippi enjoyed that honour. I suppose, that when Augustus, after the defeat of Anthony, augmented the colony at Philippi by sending Anthony's adherents thither, he, in honour of the colony, transferred the courts of justice from Amphipolis to Philippi, whereby it became the chief city of that division of Macedonia. But in whatever manner it happened, the fact may be relied on, since Luke, who resided long at Philippi, has expressly asserted it.

Philippi being a colony, the greatest part of its inhabitants were Romans, and were governed by the laws of Rome. They also enjoyed the rights of Latium, and worshipped the gods thereof, and probably spake the Latin language, so that in many respects Philippi was a Latin city.—This is the account which A. Gellius gives of the colonies, Lib. xiii. c. 13. 'Et jura institutæque omnia, populi Romani, non sui imperii habent.' Quoted by Lardner, Credib. vol. i. p. 153.

No. XIX. Went out of the city by a river-side (ἐκ τῆς πόλεως ὅπου ἦν) where a place for prayer was by law allowed.—From this it is evident, that Philippi was built beside a river, or near to one. Yet no such river is marked in the maps of this country, which is the more extraordinary, that Luke, who was long at Philippi, hath represented the river beside which it stood as navigable: Acts xx. 6. 'And we sailed from Philippi after the days of unleavened bread.' But Luke's geography is amply confirmed by the passage from Lucian, quoted page 731. who says, 'The walls of Philippi were washed by the river Hebrus.'

Learned men are not agreed whether προσευχῆς, the word in the original, denotes the act, or the place of prayer. Dr. Lardner, vol. i. p. 236. has produced the following passages, which may be of use in settling this point. The first is from Josephus, Ant. xiv. 10. § 24. where a decree of the city of Halicarnassus permitting the Jews to build (προσευχῆς) oratories is cited; part of which decree runs thus:—"We decree that the Jews who are willing, men and women, do observe the sabbaths, and perform sacred rites according to the Jewish laws, and build oratories by the sea-side, according to the custom of their country," &c. The next passage is from Tertullian, Ad. Nat. lib. i. c. 13. where, among other Jewish rites, he mentions orationes littorales, shore-prayers, that is, prayers by the sea-side, or a river-side: For the Jews esteemed these the most pure places for performing the worship of God in, as is plain from Philo's oration against Flaccus, p. 982. where speaking of the Jews, he says, "And early in the morning, flocking out of the gates of the city, they go to the neighbouring shores, for the (προσευχῆς) oratories were destroyed; and standing in a most pure place, they lift up their voices with one accord." Of this Jewish custom we have an instance Acts xxi. 5. 'They all brought us on our way with wives and children, till we were out of the city, and we kneeled down on the shore, and prayed.'

It is commonly said, that the difference between a proseuche or oratory, and a synagogue, was this:—The synagogue was a covered house, where the law was read, and prayers offered up to God, according to a set form, in name of the whole congregation: But the proseuche, or oratory, was a piece of ground enclosed with a wall, where individuals prayed each by himself apart, as in the courts of the temple. The Jews built their synagogues and proseuchas on the banks of rivers, or on the sea-shore, because, according to the tradition of the fathers, they were obliged to wash their hands before they prayed; for which use they esteemed the rivers and sea-water by far the fittest. See Joseph. Ant. xii. c. 2. Elmer.

No. XX. Then departed, leaving Luke at Philippi.—That Paul left Luke at Philippi, we know from the phraseology of his history. For before that event Luke carries on the narration in the following manner:—Acts xvi. 11. 'Loosing from Troas, we came with a straight course to Samothrace. 13. And, on the Sabbath-day, we went out of the city by a river-side. 16. And it came to pass as we went to prayer.' But after Paul and the rest departed from Philippi, Luke changes his style in this manner,—Acts xvii. 1. 'Now when they had passed through Amphipolis and Apollonia, they came to Thessalonica.' Nor does he resume his former manner of writing, until, chap. xx. describing Paul's voyage to Syria, he thus writes: 6. 'These going before, tarried for us at Troas. 6. And we sailed from Philippi after the days of unleavened bread, and came unto them to Troas, where we abode seven days.' It is therefore more than probable, that when Paul, Silas, and Timothy departed from Philippi, after having gathered a church there, Luke remained with the new converts, until the apostle, in his way from Corinth to Syria the second time, came to Philippi and took him with them.

If the foregoing supposition is well founded, Luke must have remained several years at Philippi; and if he was 'the brother whose praise was in the gospel,' mentioned 2 Cor. viii. 18. he joined Paul on his coming into Macedonia, after the riot of Demetrius, and was sent by him to Corinth with Titus, who carried the apostle's second letter to the Corinthians. And having executed that commission, he returned to Philippi, and gave him an account of the success of that letter. And after the apostle set out for Corinth, Luke remained at Philippi till Paul returned. For there he joined him in his second voyage to Syria, as has been already observed.

No. XXI. Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, him declare I to you.—Because Paul, on this occasion, told the Athenians, that the true God was he whom they ignorantly worshipped under the title of the unknown God, some learned men have supposed, that the altar he speaks of was raised to the God of the Jews, concerning whose power, in the destruction of the Egyptians and Canaanites, the ancient Athenians had received some obscure reports: But because the Jews carefully concealed his name, and had no image of him, the Athenians erected no statue to the God of the Jews, but worshipped him under the appellation of The unknown God. Others think this one of the altars which Diogenes Laertius speaks of in Epimenide. For he relates, that by the advice of Epimenides, the Athenians, when afflicted with a pestilence, brought a number of white and black sheep to Areopagus, and there let them go; appointing a man to follow each, that where any of them lay down it might be sacrificed (ναθναυσθαι) to the God to whom sacrifices were due: after which the plague was staid. Hence, says he, there are among the Athenians various altars without the name of any God. But this deliverance being wrought by the true God, the apostle justly affirms, that they worshipped him by these altars, though they knew him not. Dr. Wellwood, however, in the introduction to his translation of the Banquet of Xenophon, says these altars were erected by Socrates, to express his devotion to the one true God, of whom the Athenians had no idea, and whose nature, he insinuated by this inscription, was far above the reach of human comprehension. According to this account also of the Athenian altars, the apostle's interpretation of the inscription is still perfectly just.

No. XXII. Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome.—That the emperor Claudius banished all the Jews from Rome, is testified by Suetonius in his life of Claudius, c. 25. "Judeos, impulsore Chresto, assidue tumultuantes, Roma expulit." The origin of the tumults which occasioned the banishment of the Jews from Rome, Suetonius, in the above passage, hath related in such a manner, as to make his readers imagine Chrest or Christ was then in Rome, and that the tumults were owing to his instigation. But the true state of the fact seems to have been this:—The Jews, whose darling object was to make proselytes to their religion, shewed the same malicious disposition at Rome, which their brethren shewed in the other great cities where the gospel was preached with success. Being extremely displeased with the heathens for embracing the gospel, they published a number of calumnies against the gospel itself, and against its abettors, by which they enraged the idolatrous multitude at Rome to such a degree, that they assisted the unbelieving Jews in their tumultuous attacks upon the Christians. Wherefore the Jews being the ringleaders in these tumults, the emperor, to preserve the peace of the city, found it necessary to banish all the Jews from Rome; and among the rest such of them as had embraced the Christian faith.

Claudius's edict against the Jews, according to the best chronologers, was published in the eleventh year of his reign; which year began January 24, A. D. 51. Now, supposing Claudius to have published his edict in the beginning of that year, he certainly would allow the proscribed some months at least to settle their affairs, and take themselves away. Wherefore Aquila and Priscilla could not well leave Italy before the end of the spring A. D. 51. Besides, their voyage to Corinth would take up some time; and, when they arrived, a month or two must have passed before they could settle themselves in such a manner as to be carrying on their business of tent-making when Paul came to Corinth. His arrival, therefore, cannot be fixed sooner than the autumn of A. D. 51.

Having in this manner fixed one date in Paul's history, let us next consider, how it may be applied for determining the time of some important events connected with his arrival at Corinth.—After the council of Jerusalem Paul came down to Antioch, where he abode several months; then departed with Titus to confirm the churches of Cilicia, Galatia, and Phrygia. This office he performed by delivering them the decrees of the council to keep. And as he remained no longer in any place than was necessary for that purpose, we may suppose he finished his progress through the churches in four or five months from his leaving Antioch: Then he went over to Macedonia, where, and in Greece, he preached indeed a considerable time, probably ten or twelve months, before he came to Corinth. These, added to the months he spent in Antioch after the council, and in confirming the churches in Cilicia, Galatia, and Phrygia, may have made in all a year and nine months. Wherefore, if these are counted backwards, from the autumn of A. D. 51, when Paul arrived at Corinth, they will bring us to the end of A. D. 49, or the beginning of A. D. 50, as the date of the council of Jerusalem. And seeing that council was held about 14 years after Paul's conversion, (Gal. ii. 1.), perhaps 14 years wanting some months, his conversion will thus be fixed to the end of A. D. 36, or to the beginning of A. D. 37, a date which is likewise confirmed by the rest which the churches of Judea, Samaria, and Galilee enjoyed, through the publication of Caius's order to set up his statue in the temple of Jerusalem in the end of A. D. 39, or the beginning of A. D. 40, three years after Paul's conversion, as hath been shewn No. V.

No. XXXIII. Having shorn his head in Cenchrea, for he had a vow.—This is thought to have been the vow of the Nazarite, whereby Paul, from the time he made it, until he offered the sacrifices prescribed by the law, bound himself to abstain from wine and all fermented liquors. See Numb. vi. 1–21. That this vow was in use in Paul's days, is evident from what Josephus has related of Bernice, Bell. ii. c. 15. init. "She was then (A. D. 66) at Jerusalem, performing a vow to God. For it is customary for those who have been afflicted with some distemper, or have laboured under any other difficulty, to make a vow, thirty days before they offer sacrifice, to abstain from wine and shave the hair of their head." By the law, the Nazarite was to shave his head at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. But as there were a vast number of Jews in the Gentile countries, who lived at a great distance from Jerusalem, they were obliged to dispense with the exactness of many things required in the law. Lardner, vol. i. p. 461. has mentioned a passage of a Jewish book, quoted by Reland, which says, "They who make the vow of the Nazarite out of the land of Israel, shall go into it to complete the vow." This accounts for Paul's concern to keep the next feast at Jerusalem, Acts xviii. 21.

The vow of the four brethren, mentioned Acts xxi. 23. is likewise thought to have been the vow of the Nazarite. There is a passage in Josephus, concerning Herod Agrippa, which shews that it was no unusual thing now for zealous men, who had it in their power, to bear the whole, or a part of the charges of the sacrifices which the Nazarites were obliged to offer at the expiration of their vow. The passage I refer to is Ant. xix. 6. initio, where, having told that Claudius made Herod king of all Judea, he adds, "And he, as it was very likely for one to do who had had so considerable an advancement, made all the expedition he could into his kingdom. And coming to Jerusalem, he offered up sacrifices of thanksgiving, and omitted nothing that was prescribed by the law; for which reason he also ordered a good number of Nazarites to be shaved." That was the common phrase for completing the vow of the Nazarite, by offering the prescribed sacrifices; and therefore the brethren at Jerusalem, when they advised Paul to assist the four men in discharging their vow, did not say, Be at charges with them that they make their offerings, but that they may shave their heads. An action of this kind being extremely popular, and shewing great zeal for the law, the brethren at Jerusalem very prudently advised Paul to it, to shew that he did not contemn the institutions of Moses. Besides, it was one of those popular actions by which Agrippa recommended himself to the Jews when he took possession of the kingdom, as appears from the foregoing quotation.

No. XXIV. On the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread.—From this passage, and from 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2. John xx. 19. 26. it appears to have been the custom of the disciples, after our Lord's resurrection, to observe the first day of the week in honour of that event, by assembling thereon for the worship of God, and for celebrating the Lord's Supper. Accordingly, Justin Martyr, who wrote forty-four years after the death of the apostle John, tells us, Apologet. ii. p. 98. "On Sunday, all Christians in the city and country meet together, because it is the day of our Lord's resurrection, and then we hear read to us the writings of the prophets and apostles. This done, the president makes an oration to the assembly, to exhort them to imitate and do the things they hear: and then we all join in prayer; and after that we celebrate the sacrament, and they that are willing and able give alms," &c. Whitty's note on Acts xx. 7.

No. XXV. Teaching all men everywhere against the people.—Lardner, Credib. vol. i. p. 553. observes, that the Jews in Judea considered it as their due to have particular regard paid to them by their countrymen in the provinces, and by all the Gentiles who worshipped the true God, and who for that purpose assembled themselves with the Jews in their synagogues. And, in fact, the Jews out of Judea, and all the proselytes, shewed great regard to the people of Jerusalem and of Judea, and were very ready to assist them in every difficulty. Thus, the disciples at Antioch, when they heard that there was to be a dearth in the land of Judea, Acts xi. 29. "every man, according to his ability, determined to send relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judea." And in this resolution, not the Jews by birth alone, but the just proselytes also, and even the religious proselytes, joined: And having made a liberal collection, they sent it to the elders at Jerusalem by the hands of Barnabas and Saul. In like manner, when that famine actually happened, Helene, queen of Adiabene, and Izates her son, both of them proselytes to Judaism, contributed largely for the relief of the inhabitants of Jerusalem and of Judea, Joseph. Ant. xx. c. 2. § 6. Also, when the apostles at Jerusalem agreed that Paul should go among the Gentiles, they recommended it to him "to remember the poor; which very thing he also made haste to do," Gal. ii. 10. Wherefore, the collections which Paul afterwards made, among all the churches of the Gentiles, for the saints in Judea, was no novelty. It had been often practised, and was founded in the best reason. For, as Paul writing to the Romans on this subject observed, they were bound to do this both in justice and in gratitude:—Rom. xv. 27. "They have been pleased, verily, and their debtors they are. For if the Gentiles have partaken of their spiritual things, they ought certainly to minister to them in carnal things." And considering, that in the persecution the brethren of Judea were often spoiled of their goods, (Heb. x. 34.), these collections were the more necessary.

Such being the principles and the expectations of the Jews in Judea, no wonder that the bigots among them were enraged, when they heard that Paul, instead of enjoining the converted Gentiles to observe the law of Moses, taught that they were entirely free from that law; for this was to break the tie by which the Jews held those heathens in subjection who had turned from idols to worship the true God. And therefore the outcry of the Jews against Paul, though wholly unjust, was every word of it expressive and popular, especially at Jerusalem: "This is the man who teacheth all men everywhere against the people," Acts xxi. 28.

No. XXVI. Tidings came to the chief captain of the legion.—Χαλεψας τον στρατηγον. The word στρατη is used with considerable latitude. It signifies any gathering of soldiers, without determining their number.

hence it is applied to a legion. At other times, it signifies a much smaller number of soldiers. The other word, χάμαρχος, properly signifies the commander of a thousand men; but it is likewise used for a Roman military Tribune. Wherefore as there was always a legion stationed in Jerusalem, we may suppose that Lysias was the eldest or first Tribune, and, by consequence, that he was the commander of the garrison, and was intrusted by the governor, Felix, with the power which the chief officer under him at Jerusalem usually possessed. But the word χάμαρχος is likewise used to signify the captain of the temple, John xviii. 12. who is thought to have been a Jewish officer. And Luke speaks of εργαρχους, the captains of the temple, Luke xxiii. 52. These, I suppose, were the persons who presided over the divisions of the priests and Levites employed in different ministrations in the temple; but the χάμαρχος, or captain of the temple, was he who had the command of the whole.

No. XXVII. Commanded him to be carried into the castle.—This was the castle Antonia, which was built by John Hyrcanus, high-priest and prince of the Jews, on a rock which stood at the angle of the northern and western porticos of the outer court of the temple. It was at first named Baris. But Herod the great rebuilt it, and raised it so high as to command the temple, and afford a sight of what passed in the two outer courts. On the side where it joined the porticos of the temple, there were stairs which reached to each portico, by which the soldiers descended to keep guard in several places of the porticos, especially during the great festivals, to suppress any disorders which might happen. Further, to render this fortress inaccessible, Herod faced the rock on which it stood with white polished marble; and having completed the fortress, he named it Antonia, in honour of his friend Mark Antony. Afterward, when Judea was made a Roman province, the Romans always kept a strong garrison in that castle. And at the festivals, when the people flocked to Jerusalem in great multitudes, bodies of armed soldiers went down from this castle, and watched in several places of the porticos of the temple, to prevent tumults: for on such occasions, more especially, the multitude was disposed to make disturbances.

No. XXVIII. Leddest out into the wilderness four thousand men (τοις τετρακισχιλιοσιν) of the Sicarii.—The men of whom the Tribune spake were named Sicarii, from the small crooked swords or daggers (called by the Romans Sicae) which they carried under their garments. With these they committed horrible murders in Jerusalem about this time: For their custom was to mix in the crowd at the great festivals, and to stab their enemies, even in the day-time; and to conceal their wickedness, they affected great indignation against the authors of the slaughter. Nay, to such a pitch did they carry their cruelty, that they would kill any person whatever for hire. Thus Josephus, Ant. xx. 7. 5. tells us, that one Dora, at the instigation of Felix the governor, hired some of these miscreants, who murdered the high-priest Jonathan.—The same historian informs us, (ibid. c. 6.), that when Felix was procurator, a certain Egyptian came to Jerusalem, and pretending to be a prophet, persuaded the people to follow him to Mount Olivet, promising that they should see the walls of Jerusalem fall down at his command, and have a free entrance into the city over the ruins: but that Felix attacked them with an army, killed four hundred of them, and took two hundred captives; and that the Egyptian himself, having fled, disappeared. This, it is thought, was the impostor of whom the Tribune spake, when he asked Paul if he was 'that Egyptian who before these days made an insurrection,' &c. The Tribune added that the followers of the Egyptian were Sicarii. Perhaps, besides the Sicarii, many of this impostor's followers were Zealots, who were very forward in all the tumults against the Romans. Josephus, indeed, has not told us what sort of people the followers of the Egyptian were; only, by relating the affair after giving an account of the Sicarii, he seems to insinuate that they were mostly of that description.

In the other account which Josephus has given of this affair, Bell. ii. c. 13. he says, the Egyptian gathered thirty thousand; that, after bringing them round out of the wilderness up to the Mount of Olives, he intended from thence to attack Jerusalem, and, beating the Roman guards, to bring the people in subjection to him. But Felix, coming suddenly upon him with the Roman soldiers, prevented the attack; and that all the people joined with Felix in their own defence; so that, when they came to engage, the Egyptian fled, followed only by a few; that the greatest part of those who were with him were either slain or taken prisoners; the rest of the multitude being scattered. This account of the numbers which followed the Egyptian being very different from the former, no objection can be drawn from either against the number mentioned by the Tribune. The truth is, Josephus needs more to be reconciled with himself, than Luke to be reconciled with him; for it should be remembered, that Luke is not answerable for the Tribune's numbers; all that was incumbent on him was, to relate faithfully what he said.

No. XXIX. Felix the Governor.—Judea, though sometimes called a province, was properly a branch of the province of Syria, as Lardner observes, Credib. vol. i. p. 161. Nevertheless it had a Roman governor residing in it with supreme authority, which was a very uncommon thing. The proper title of this governor was Procurator; a name that was given to the officer who took care of the Emperor's revenue in the provinces belonging to him; whereas, in the provinces belonging to the senate, that officer was named Quæstor. But though the governors of Judea were properly procurators, they had, as was just now observed, the power of presidents. Hence the sacred writers give to Pilate, Felix, and Festus, the title of Governors; which is a general word, and very proper according to the usage of the best writers.

No. XXX. Felix was himself a great oppressor of the nation.—Antonius Claudius Felix, with his brother Pallas, were freed-men of the Emperor Claudius, with whom Pallas being in high favour, he procured for his brother Felix the procuratorship of Judea. But in his government Felix shewed the meanness of his disposition and former condition, by exercising his power in the most wanton acts of cruelty and oppression. So Tacitus tells us, Hist. lib. v. c. 9. "Claudius, defunctis Regibus, aut ad modicum reductis, Judæam provinciam Equitibus Romanis, aut libertis permisit. E quibus Antonius Felix per omnem sævitiam ac libidinem, jus regium servili ingenio exercuit, Druilla, Cleopatæ et Antonii nepte (grand-daughter) in matrimonium accepta; ut ejusdem Antonii, Felix progener, Claudius nepos esset."—Felix married two ladies of the name of Druilla. The one was the grand-daughter of Cleopatras and Antony. She is the lady of whom Tacitus speaks. The other was Druilla, mentioned Acts xxiv. 24. where she is called a Jewess, to distinguish her from the Roman lady of that name. This Druilla was the daughter of Herod Agrippa, (whose death is related Acts xii. 23.), and the sister of Herod Agrippa the younger, before whom Paul pleaded his cause. He gave her to Azizus, king of the Emessence, on his consenting to embrace the Jewish religion. But she did not remain long with him: For Felix having seen this most beautiful of women, as Josephus calls her, (Ant. xx. 5.), became violently in love with her, and sent his friend Simon, a Jew of Cyprus, who possessed the magic art, to persuade her to leave Azizus and marry him. This commission Simon executed so well, that Drusilla, to avoid the affronts put upon her by her sister Bernice, who envied her beauty, consented to marry Felix, though it was contrary to her religion.

This Drusilla having expressed a desire to hear Paul preach, her husband Felix sent for him, and they heard him concerning the faith in Christ. On that occasion Felix's conscience was awakened to such a degree by Paul's sermon, that he trembled. Nevertheless, he continued his cruel and unjust practices all the time his government lasted, which was about the space of two years: for Nero, in the sixth year of his reign, recalled him. After Felix was recalled, some of the principal Jews followed him to Rome, and accused him to the Emperor, who would have punished him, if it had not been for the prayers and entreaties of his brother Pallas, who then possessed the favour of Nero, as he had formerly done that of Claudius.

No. XXXI. He appealed from Festus to Cæsar.—That causes were by appeal removed from the courts in the provinces to Rome, is evident from Suetonius, who, in his life of Augustus, c. 33. says, "Appellationes quotannis urbanorum quidem litigatorum Prætori delegavit urbano, at provincialium, consularibus viris, quos singulos cujusque provincie negotiis præposuisset." And, that Roman citizens, tried for their life in the provinces, had a right to transfer their cause by appeal to Rome, is evident from Pliny, lib. x. epist. 97. Ad Trajanum: "Et lii similis amentia, quos quia cives Romani erant, auctoravi in urbem remittendos."

No. XXXII. King Agrippa and his sister Bernice.—This is he who by Josephus is called King Agrippa the younger. He was the son of that Herod Agrippa whose death is related Acts xii. 23. and the grandson of Aristobulus, (whom his father put to death), consequently the great-grandson of the first Herod, called Herod the Great, in whose reign our Lord was born.

Herod Agrippa the younger was in great favour with the Emperor Claudius, who gave him the kingdom of his uncle Herod, king of Chalcia. But he afterwards took it from him, and gave him the tetrarchy of Philip, with Batanea, Trachonitis, and Abilene, which formerly Lysanias possessed, Luke iii. 1. After this Nero gave him a part of Galilee, with the cities Tiberias, Tarichææ, and Julia, beyond Jordan, with fourteen villages.

Herod the younger was the last king of the Herod family: For he lived to see Jerusalem destroyed, and the Jewish nation sold as slaves to any who would purchase them. After that he went to Rome, where, as Dio informs us, he obtained prætorian honours, and lived in the palace with his sister Bernice. This is the lady mentioned in the Acts. She was first married to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcia: but after his death, being talked of as criminally familiar with her brother Agrippa, she married Polemon king of Cilicia, to quash that rumour. But soon after, influenced more by lewd inclination than by a regard to her reputation, she divorced Polemon, and returned to her brother; by which the rumour of their unlawful commerce was again revived.

Agrippa and Bernice were living together when Festus arrived in the province. They came therefore to Cæsar, to congratulate Festus upon his advancement to the procuratorship. On that occasion, Agrippa having expressed a desire to hear Paul, Festus gratified him by producing the apostle, in the place of hearing, before him and Bernice, and the Tribunes, and all the principal men of Cæsaræa: so that the apostle had a new opportunity of speaking in his own defence; which he did to such good effect, that Agrippa declared, in the presence of the whole assembly, that he had done nothing worthy of death; and that he might have been set at liberty, if he had not appealed to Cæsar.

Tacitus has spoken of Bernice's beauty, and of the court which she paid to Vespasian by her magnificent presents, and of the love which his son Titus bore to her, Hist. lib. ii. c. 81. "Nec minore animo Regina Bernice partes juvabat, florens state formaque, et semi quæ Vespasiano, magnificentia munerum, grata." And, speaking of Vespasian's son Titus, the same historian says, Hist. lib. ii. c. 2. "Neque abhorrebat a Bernice juvenilis animus." Suetonius adds, that Titus promised to marry her: For, after mentioning Titus's cruelty, he speaks of his lust, c. 7. "Nec minus libido, propter exoletorum et spadonum greges, propterque insignem reginæ Bernices amorem, cui etiam nuptias pollicitus ferebatur." Nevertheless, after he became Emperor, he, for reasons of state, dismissed Bernice, though with great regret: "Bernicem ex urbe dimisit, invitæ invitam." Titus Vesp. c. 7.

No. XXXIII. He called on all the Jews present to bear witness.—Bishop Lowth, in his note on Isa. liii. 8. tells us, "It is said in the Mishna, that before any one was punished for a capital crime, proclamation was made before the prisoner by the public crier, in these words: Quicumque noverit aliquid de ejus innocentia, veniat et doceat de eo. On which passage the Gemara of Babylon adds, 'That before the death of Jesus this proclamation was made for forty days, but no defence could be found.' On which words Lardner observes, 'It is truly surprising to see such falsehoods contrary to well-known facts,' Testimonies, vol. i. p. 198. The report is certainly false; but this false report is found on the supposition that there was such a custom, and so far confirms the account above given from the Mishna. The Mishna was composed in the middle of the second century: Lardner ascribes it to the year of Christ 180.

"Now it is plain, from the history of the Four Evangelists, that in the trial and condemnation of Jesus no such rule was observed; (though, according to the account of the Mishna, it must have been in practice at that time); no proclamation was made for any person to bear witness to the innocence and character of Jesus; nor did any one voluntarily step forth to give his attestation to it. And our Saviour seems to refer to such a custom, and to claim the benefit of it, by his answer to the high-priest, when he asked him of his disciples and of his doctrine: 'I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing. Why askest thou me? Ask them which heard me, what I have said unto them: Behold they know what I said;' John xviii. 20, 21. This therefore was one remarkable instance of hardship and injustice, among others predicted by the prophet, which our Saviour underwent in his trial and sufferings.

"St. Paul likewise, in similar circumstances, standing before the judgment-seat of Festus, seems to complain of the same unjust treatment—that no one was called, or would appear, to vindicate his character: 'My manner of life from my youth, which was at the first among my own nation at Jerusalem, know all the Jews, which knew me from the beginning, if they would testify, that after the strictest sect of our religion I lived a Pharisee;' Acts xxvi. 4, 5.—Thus far Lowth.

To comprehend the force and propriety of the above appeal to the Jews who were present at the apostle's defence before Agrippa, the full extent of his expression, My manner of life, must be attended to and understood. For the apostle did not mean only, that all the Jews knew his education was at the first among his own nation at Jerusalem, but likewise that they knew the other particulars which he mentioned in the subsequent parts of his defence; namely, that 'after the strictest sect of their religion he lived a Pharisee,' ver. 5.—'That he thought with himself that he ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth,' ver. 9.—'That he did these things in Jerusalem: That many of the saints he shut up in prison, having received authority from the chief priests so to do. And that when they were put to death, he gave his voice against them,' ver. 10. alluding to his behaviour at the stoning of Stephen. 'That he punished them oft in every synagogue, and compelled them to blaspheme Jesus; and that being exceedingly mad against them, he persecuted them even to foreign cities,' ver. 11.—In particular, that 'he went to Damascus with authority and commission from the chief priests,' ver. 12.—'that if he found any of this way, whether they were men or women, he might bring them bound to Jerusalem,' Acts ix. 2. namely, to be punished.—All these things the Jews, who were present at his defence before Agrippa in Caesarea, well knew. He therefore called on them in this public manner to attest the truth of them, because they were clear proofs of his bitter enmity to the Christians; and demonstrated, that his forsaking the party of the chief priests, and going over to the Christians, whereby he subjected himself to the hatred of the Jews, could be owing to nothing but to the appearing of Jesus to him on the road to Damascus; of which he gave Agrippa an account in the remaining part of his speech, ver. 12-15. At the same time he told him, that Jesus said to him, 'I have appeared to thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness, both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in which I will appear unto thee afterwards.' 19. Whereupon, O king Agrippa, I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision; 20. But shewed first to them of Damascus, &c. that they should repent, and do works meet for repentance.' He added, ver. 22. That in his discourses to the Jews and Gentiles, 'he said no other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come; 23. That the Christ should suffer, and should be the first who should rise from the dead, and should shew light to the people, and to the Gentiles.'—The apostle having given this account of his conversion to Christianity, and of the doctrine which he taught after he became a Christian, the one appeared so rational, and the other so consonant to the writings of Moses and the prophets, that Agrippa entertained a favourable opinion of Paul, and declared that he had done nothing worthy of death, or of bonds.

No. XXXIV. The island was called Melitè.—Bryant, Observat. on Ancient History, contends, that this island was not Malta, because Malta is not in the Adriatic Sea, notwithstanding Bochart endeavours to prove it to be so; but it was an island belonging to Dalmatia, called anciently Melitè, but is now called Mileet by the Sclavonians, and is subject to Ragusa. In support of his opinion Bryant cites ancient authors, who, in enumerating the Adriatic islands, mention Melitè very particularly, and say that it was twenty stadia distant from Corcyra Melana; and among the rest Pliny, Nat. Hist. lib. iii. c. 26. who reckons it among the Adriatic islands, and adds, "Unde Catulos Melitæos appellari Callimachus autor est."
